SECOND EDITION

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN WORLD

EDITED BY PHILIP F. ESLER

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN WORLD

SECOND EDITION

This new edition is a goldmine of up-to-date information for anyone interested in the development of early Christianity. The contributors represent an international collection of top-flight scholars, and the range of topics covered is expansive; yet the essays are written in an accessible style and could certainly be used in a classroom setting at the undergraduate and graduate levels. Of particular note is the way in which the essays situate Christianity within its broader cultural contexts, rather than treating it as if it had developed in a 'holy vacuum'. You will want this book on your shelf as a standard reference work for the study of early Christianity.

– Professor David Eastman, Ohio Wesleyan University, USA

Since its publication in 2000, The Early Christian World has come to be regarded by scholars, students and the general reader as one of the most informative and accessible works in English on the origins, development, character and major figures of early Christianity. In this new edition, the strengths of the first edition are retained. These include the book's attractive architecture that initially takes a reader through the context and historical development of early Christianity; the essays in critical areas such as community formation, everyday experience, the intellectual and artistic heritage, and external and internal challenges; and the profiles on the most influential early Christian figures. The book also preserves its strong stress on the social reality of early Christianity and continues its distinctive use of hundreds of illustrations and maps to bring that world to life. Yet the years that have passed since the first edition was published have seen great advances made in our understanding of early Christianity in its world. This new edition fully reflects these developments and provides the reader with authoritative, lively and up-to-date access to the early Christian world. A quarter of the text is entirely new and the remaining essays have all been carefully revised and updated by their authors. Some of the new material relates to Christian culture (including book culture, canonical and non-canonical scriptures, saints and hagiography, and translation across cultures). But there are also new essays on: Jewish and Christian interaction in the early centuries; Roman Britain, ritual; experience of the supernatural via angels, demons, miracles and magic; Manichaeism; Pachomius the Great and Gregory of Nyssa. This new edition will serve its readers for many years to come.

Philip F. Esler is the Portland Chair in New Testament Studies and Director of the International Centre for Biblical Interpretation in the University of Gloucestershire, Cheltenham, UK. His research focus lies primarily in the social-scientific analysis of biblical and extra-biblical texts and ancient legal papyri, and he also writes on the Bible and the visual arts and on New Testament theology.

THE ROUTLEDGE WORLDS

THE SUMERIAN WORLD
Edited by Harriet Crawford

THE OCCULT WORLD
Edited by Christopher Partridge

THE WORLD OF INDIGENOUS NORTH AMERICA
Edited by Robert Warrior

THE WORLD OF THE REVOLUTIONARY AMERICAN REPUBLIC
Edited by Andrew Shankman

THE SHAKESPEAREAN WORLD
Edited by Jill L. Levenson and Robert Ormsby

THE WORLD OF COLONIAL AMERICA
Edited by Ignacio Gallup-Diaz

THE MEDIEVAL WORLD, SECOND EDITION
Edited by Peter Linehan, Janet L. Nelson, and Marios Costambeys

THE MODERNIST WORLD
Edited by Allana Lindgren and Stephen Ross

Forthcoming:

THE WORLD OF GREAT ZIMBABWE
Edited by Innocent Pikirayi

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN WORLD, SECOND EDITION
Edited by Philip F. Esler

THE SWAHILI WORLD
Edited by Stephanie Wynne-Jones and Adria LaViolette

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN WORLD

SECOND EDITION

Edited by Philip F. Esler

This book is dedicated to the memory of Patrick Bernard Carey
(16 December 1946–18 July 2016)

CONTENTS

Contents

FIGURES

CONTRIBUTORS

James K. Aitken is Reader in Hebrew and Early Jewish Studies, in the Faculty of Divinity, University of Cambridge. His research focuses on the languages and literature of ancient Judaism. He is the author of No Stone Unturned: Greek Inscriptions and Septuagint Vocabulary (2014) and editor of The T&T Clark Companion to the Septuagint (2015).

Pauline Allen is Professor and Director of the Centre for Early Christian Studies, Australian Catholic University, and Research Associate, University of Pretoria, South Africa. She has edited, translated and written substantially on the works of John Chrysostom, Severus of Antioch and Maximus the Confessor, including the Oxford Handbook of Maximus the Confessor (2015, with Bronwen Neil) and John Chrysostom, Homilies on Paul's Letter to the Philippians (2013).

Piotr Ashwin–Siejkowski is a tutor in the Department of Theology and Religious Studies at King's College London. He previously taught early Christian doctrine at the University of Chichester (2001–2013). His research is focused on Christian origins and the formation of Christian doctrine in the period from the first to the later third century CE, particularly in the Alexandrian milieu. Among his recent publications are: 'Clement of Alexandria' in The Wiley Blackwell Companion to Patristics (2015); 'The notion of "heresy" in Stromateis VII and its use in Clement of Alexandria's polemic' in The Seventh Book of the Stromateis: Proceedings of the Colloquium on Clement of Alexandria (Olomouc, October 21–23, 2010) (2012) and SCM Studyguide Early Christian Doctrine and the Creeds (2010).

Richard Bauckham is Emeritus Professor of New Testament Studies and Bishop Wardlaw Professor in the University of St Andrews, St Andrews, UK. He specialises in New Testament studies, historical theology and theology. His recent books include Bible and Ecology: Rediscovering the Community of Creation (2010), Jesus: A Very Short Introduction (2011), Living with Other Creatures: Green Exegesis and Theology (2011), Gospel of Glory: Major Themes in Johannine Theology (2015) and The Bible in the Contemporary World: Hermeneutical Ventures (2016).

Giovanni Bazzana is Professor of New Testament in the Harvard Divinity School, Harvard. His main interests are the Synoptic Gospels and apocalyptic literature. Since the mid 2000s, his work has become increasingly focused on papyrology and the interplay between this discipline and New Testament studies, in particular with respect to the potential broadening of the scope of historical analysis and comparison to the wider Jewish and Greco-Roman contexts. He is the author of Kingdom and Bureaucracy: The Political Theology of Galilean Village Scribes in the Sayings Gospel Q (2015).

Jason David BeDuhn is Professor of the Comparative Study of Religions at Northern Arizona University, USA. His work on Manichaeism and other varieties of late ancient religion include most recently Augustine's Manichaean Dilemma, 1 & 2 (2010, 2013), The First New Testament: Marcion's Scriptural Canon (2013) and co-authorship of Mani at the Court of the Persian Kings (2014).

Gerald Bray is Research Professor at Beeson Divinity School, Samford University, Birmingham, Alabama, USA; Director of Research for the Latimer Trust, London and editor of the Anglican theological journal Churchman. His recent publications include God has Spoken (2014), Augustine and the Christian Life (2015) and The Church (2016). A study of the theological approaches adopted by the Protestant reformers and their Roman Catholic opponents is forthcoming.

Edwin K. Broadhead is Professor in Berea College, Berea, Kentucky, USA. His research interests include the Gospel of Mark, Formalism, Historical Jesus, the Sayings Tradition (Q), Jewish Christianity and the Gospel of Matthew. Among his publications are Naming Jesus (1999), Jewish Ways of Following Jesus (2010) and The Gospel of Matthew on the Landscape of Antiquity (2017).

Dennis Brown is Head of Religion and Philosophy, Manchester Grammar School, UK. His research interests are in Patristic exegesis, especially in the Latin Fathers. He is also interested in the history of ethics and in the application of ethical theories to practical situations, particularly in medicine. His recent publications include Ethics for OCR Religious Studies (2015), Religious Studies for GCSE (2016) and Religion and Ethics for OCR (2016).

Elizabeth A. Castelli is Ann Whitney Olin Professor, Barnard College at Columbia University, USA. She is the author of Martyrdom and Memory: Early Christian Culture Making (2004) and the English-language translator of Saint Paul, the never-produced script by Italian filmmaker Pier Paolo Pasolini (2014). Her current writing project is a collection of essays on the theme of confession.

Malcolm Choat is Associate Professor in the Department of Ancient History, Macquarie University, Sydney. His fields of research are Coptic and Greek papyrology, and Christianity and monasticism in Late Antique Egypt. His recent publications include Belief and Cult in Fourth-Century Papyri (2006) and (with I. Gardner) A Handbook of Ritual Power in the Macquarie Collection (P.Macq. I 1) (2013).

Richard Cleaves is Minister of Highbury Congregational Church in Cheltenham, UK and Tutor in Biblical Studies at the Congregational Institute for Practical Theology in partnership with York St John University, UK. After completing a PhD on the biblical exegesis of Luther, Calvin and Cajetan, he has worked in pastoral ministry. He is currently researching the world of the New Testament in Roman Britain. His other interests include science and religion and the Bible and art. He contributed to the New SCM Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship (2002).

Ivor J. Davidson has held Chairs in Systematic and Historical Theology at the University of Otago, NZ and the University of St Andrews, UK, where he was also Head of School and Dean of Divinity. He is Honorary Professor at the University of Aberdeen, UK. He has published extensively in Patristics and Christian doctrine, including the definitive critical edition of Ambrose, De Officiis (2 vols, 2002); he is currently editing The Cambridge Handbook of Early Christian Theology.

Geoffrey D. Dunn is a a research associate of the University of Pretoria, South Africa and former Senior Research Fellow at the Australian Catholic University. He has research interests in most aspects of Latin Christianity from the first to the fifth centuries CE. His recent publications include Tertullian's Aduersus Iudaeos: A Rhetorical Analysis (2008), The Bishop of Rome in Late Antiquity (2015 ed.) and Christians Shaping Identity from the Roman Empire to Byzantium (2015 ed. with Wendy Mayer).

Elena Ene D–Vasilescu is a research fellow at the University of Oxford. Her research focuses on Patristics, Byzantine and post-Byzantine culture, hagiography, ecclesiastical art, and the relationship between text and image in late antiquity and early Christianity. Her publications include Between Tradition and Modernity: Icons and Iconographers in Romania (2009), 'Gregory of Nazianzus about the "manner of generation" in his poem "On the Son"' (2016), 'How would Gregory of Nyssa have understood evolutionism?' (2013) and 'A case of power and subversion? The Fresco of St Anna from the Monastery of Zaum'. She is the co-editor of Visions of God and Ideas on Deification in Patristic Thought (2016).

Mark Edwards is Professor of Early Christian Studies at the University of Oxford and has held the university lectureship in Patristics since 1993, along with the post of Tutor in Theology at Christ Church, Oxford. His publications include: Origen against Plato (2002), Catholicity and Heresy in the Early Church (2009), Image, Word and God in the Early Christian Centuries (2012) and Religions of the Constantinian Empire (2015).

Jakob Engberg is Associate Professor, Aarhus University, Denmark. His research focuses on apologetics, repression and conversion. Publications include Impulsore Chresto (2007); Contextualising Early Christian Martyrdom (2011) (edited with U. H. Eriksen and A. K. Petersen); In Defence of Christianity (2014) (edited with A.-C. Jacobsen and J. Ulrich); and Clerical Exile in Late Antiquity (2016) (edited with J. Hillner and J. Ulrich). He heads the Centre for the Study of Antiquity and Christianity and the MA programme, Religious Roots of Europe.

Philip F. Esler is the Portland Chair in New Testament Studies and Director of the International Centre for Biblical Interpretation in the University of Gloucestershire, UK. His previous positions include Chief Executive of the Arts and Humanities Research Council (2005–2009) and Principal of St Mary's University College, UK (2010–2013). His research focus lies primarily in the social-scientific analysis of biblical and extra-biblical texts and ancient legal papyri, and he also writes on the Bible and the visual arts and on New Testament theology. His latest monograph is Babatha's Orchard: The Yadin Papyri and An Ancient Jewish Family Tale Retold (2017) and before that he published Sex, Wives and Warriors: Reading the Old Testament with Its Ancient Audience (2011).

Thomas M. Finn was previously Chancellor Professor of Religion, College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, USA. He has a continuing research interest in ritual studies, currently in relation to the twelfth century CE, in the form of a translation and commentary of the De Sacramentis Christianae Fidei of Hugh of St Victor. His recent publications include 'The sacramental world in the sentences of Peter Lombard' and 'Sex and marriage in the sentences of Peter Lombard' (Theological Studies 2008, 2011).

James E. Goehring is Professor Emeritus of Religion at the University of Mary Washington in Fredericksburg, USA. His research interests focus in general on Egypt in late antiquity and early Egyptian monasticism in particular. He has authored numerous articles and books in the field, including Ascetics, Society and the Desert: Studies in Early Egyptian Monasticism (1999), Politics, Monasticism, and Miracles in Sixth Century Upper Egypt (2012), 'Remembering for eternity: The ascetic landscape as cultural discourse in early Christian Egypt' (2013), and 'The Monastery of Apollo at Bala'izah and its literary texts' (2015).

David M. Gwynn is Reader in Ancient and Late Antique History at Royal Holloway, University of London. He specialises in the study of religion in late antiquity, with a particular interest in the transformation of Christianity and the Christian controversies of the fourth century. Recent publications include Athanasius of Alexandria: Bishop, Theologian, Ascetic, Father (2012) and Christianity in the Later Roman Empire: A Sourcebook (2014).

Jill Harries is Emeritus Professor of Ancient History, University of St Andrews, UK. Her research interests include the later Roman empire, Cicero, and the Roman republic and Roman legal culture. Her main publications are: Sidonius Apollinaris and the Fall of Rome (1994), Law and Empire in Late Antiquity (1999), Cicero and the Jurists (2006), Law and Crime in the Roman World (2007) and Imperial Rome, AD 284–363: The New Empire (2012).

Carol Harrison is the Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity and a canon of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford. Her research focuses on the early Church and she has written a number of books on Augustine, including Rethinking Augustine's Early Theology: An Argument for Continuity (2006). Her most recent book is on The Art of Listening in the Early Church (2013) and she plans to follow this with a work on music.

Mark Humphries is Professor of Ancient History at Swansea University, UK. He has published widely on the religious history of the Roman world in late antiquity, including Early Christianity (2006) and, as co-editor, The Great Persecution (2009). He is a general editor of the series 'Translated Texts for Historians'.

Anders–Christian Jacobsen is Professor with Special Responsibilities in the School of Culture and Society, Aarhus University, Denmark. His research focuses on the Christian theologians and theology of the late Roman West.

Robin M. Jensen is the Patrick O'Brien Professor of Theology at the University of Notre Dame, USA. She specialises in the history of early Christian art and architecture. Her published works include Understanding Early Christian Art (2000), Face to Face: Portraits of the Divine in Early Christianity (2005), Christianity in Roman Africa: Development of Its Practices and Beliefs (2014) and, most recently, The Cross: History, Art, and Controversy (2017).

Maxwell E. Johnson, a pastor in the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, is Professor of Liturgical Studies at the University of Notre Dame, USA. His research interests lie in the origins and development of early Christian Liturgy and in the history and theology of the rites of Christian initiation. His book, The Rites of Christian Initiation: Their Evolution and Interpretation, revised and expanded edition (2007), is widely used in schools of theology and seminaries. He is the author and/or editor of several other books and over 75 articles in scholarly and pastoral-theological publications.

Todd Klutz is Senior Lecturer in Biblical Studies in the Department of Religions and Theology at the University of Manchester, UK. His publications include The Exorcism Stories in Luke-Acts: A Sociostylistic Reading (2004), Rewriting the Testament of Solomon: Tradition, Conflict, and Identity in a Late Antique Pseudepigraphon (2005), and an English translation of the Graeco-Egyptian handbook of ritual power, the Eighth Book of Moses (2013).

Ross S. Kraemer is Professor Emerita of Religious Studies and Judaic Studies at Brown University, USA. Her scholarship has focused on gender and women's religions in the Greco-Roman Mediterranean, and on Jews in the Greco-Roman Mediterranean diaspora, including most recently Unreliable Witnesses: Religion, Gender and History in the Greco-Roman Mediterranean (2011). Her forthcoming book examines the fate of Mediterranean diaspora Jews in the wake of Christianisation.

Mona Tokarek LaFosse is Assistant Professor of Christian Scriptures and Sacred Texts at Waterloo Lutheran Seminary, a federated college of Wilfrid Laurier University, Canada. Her research focuses on the socio-cultural contexts of early Christians, especially ancient Mediterranean age structure, intergenerational relationships, gender and the life course. Her most recent publication is 'Age hierarchy and social networks among urban women in the Roman east' in Mediterranean Families in Antiquity: Households, Extended Families, and Domestic Space (2017).

Shira L. Lander is the Director of Jewish Studies at Southern Methodist University, USA, where she holds a faculty appointment in Religious Studies. Her book, Ritual Sites and Religious Rivalries in Late Roman North Africa (2016), examines the rhetorical and physical battles for sacred space between practitioners of traditional Roman religion, Christians and Jews in late antiquity. Her research interests include Jewish–Christian relations, sacred space, martyrdom, religious violence and material culture.

Bill Leadbetter is Cathedral Scholar, St George's Cathedral, Perth, Australia and Adjunct Associate Professor in History, University of Notre Dame, Fremantle, Australia. His research focuses on late Roman history. His recent publications include Galerius and the Will of Constantine (2009).

Outi Lehtipuu is Academy Research Fellow at the Department of Biblical Studies at the University of Helsinki, Finland. She has published widely on the New Testament, early Christianity and gender studies. Her most recent publications include Debates over the Resurrection of the Dead: Constructing Early Christian Identity (2015) and People under Power: Early Jewish and Christian Responses to the Roman Empire (ed., 2015).

Blake Leyerle is an associate professor in the Department of Theology and Concurrent Associate Professor in the Department of Classics at the University of Notre Dame, USA. She is the author of Theatrical Shows and Ascetic Lives: John Chrysostom's Attack on Spiritual Marriage (2001) and the editor (with Robin Darling Young) of Ascetic Culture: Essays in Honor of Philip Rousseau (2013). She has published several essays and articles on pilgrimage in early Christianity.

Alastair H. B. Logan is an honorary research fellow at the University of Exeter, UK, having previously been Senior Lecturer in Christian Doctrine. His research interests include Gnosticism and early Christian heresy and early Christian art, architecture and archaeology. Recent publications include 'Constantine, the Liber Pontificalis and the Christian Basilicas of Rome' (2011) and '"Paul and Peter, pray for Victor!" The history and impact of the earliest Roman martyr cult' (2014).

Andrew Louth FBA is Professor Emeritus of Durham University, UK, and Honorary Fellow, Faculty of Theology, Vrije Universiteit, Amsterdam. He is a Patristics scholar, with interests in philosophy and history, and Orthodox theology. His recent books are: Origins of the Christian Mystical Tradition (ed. 2, 2006), St John Damascene: Tradition and Originality in Byzantine Theology (2002), Greek East and Latin West: The Church AD 681–1071 (2007) and Modern Orthodox Thinkers: From the Philokalia to the Present (2015).

Luther H. Martin is Professor Emeritus of Religion at the University of Vermont, USA. He has recently published three volumes of his collected essays: Deep History, Secular Theory (2014), The Mind of Mithraists: Historical and Cognitive Studies in the Roman Cult of Mithras (2015) and (with D. Wiebe) Conversations and Controversies in the Scientific Study of Religion (2016). A fourth volume of Studies in Hellenistic Religions is in press for 2017.

Wendy Mayer is Professor and Associate Dean of Research at Australian Lutheran College (University of Divinity), and Research Fellow, University of South Africa. Her research interests are John Chrysostom and his works, the reception of Greek medicine in late antiquity, and religious radicalisation. Publications include The Churches of Syrian Antioch (300–638 CE) (2012, with P. Allen) and the edited volume Christians Shaping Identity from the Roman Empire to Byzantium (2015).

Sheila E. McGinn is Professor of Biblical Studies and Early Christianity and Chair, Department of Theology and Religious Studies at John Carroll University, USA. Her main areas of research interest concern the development of the earliest churches (including 'dissenting' movements) and of early Christian writings in their social and cultural environments. Her recent publications include By Bread Alone: The Bible through the Eyes of the Hungry (edited with L. L. Ngan and A. Calderón Pilarski) and The Jesus Movement and the World of the Early Church (both in 2014). She is the General Editor of Conversations with the Biblical World. She is a frequent lecturer and author of numerous articles and books. She also contributes to the scholarship on 'engaged' methods of adult pedagogy.

Kathleen E. McVey is J. Ross Stevenson Professor of Church History at Princeton Theological Seminary, USA. Her research focuses on the intellectual, spiritual and social engagement of early Christians with their cultural contexts within the Roman empire and beyond. Her recent publications include: 'Spirit embodied: The emergence of symbolic interpretations of early Christian and Byzantine architecture' in Architecture as Icon: Perception and Representation of Architecture in Byzantine Art (2010) (ed., S. Ćurčić and E. Hadjitryphonos; 'Syriac Christian tradition and gender in Trinitarian theology' (2014) and 'The Letter of Mara bar Serapion to his son and the second sophistic: Palamedes and the "Wise King of the Jews"' (2015).

Candida R. Moss is Professor of New Testament and Early Christianity, University of Notre Dame, USA. Her research interests are New Testament interpretation, early Christian Martyrdom, resurrection and afterlife, constructions of disease and disability in the Bible and early Christian origins. She has recently published Reconceiving Infertility: Biblical Perspectives on Procreation and Childlessness (with J. Baden; 2015), The Myth of Persecution: How Early Christians Invented a Dangerous Legacy (2013) and Ancient Christian Martyrdom: Diverse Practices, Ideologies, and Traditions (2012).

Douglas E. Oakman is Professor of Religion, New Testament, Pacific Lutheran University, in Tacoma, USA. His research focuses on historical Jesus, the social world of Jesus and the social-scientific criticism of the Bible. He is the author of Jesus and the Economic Questions of His Day (1986), Palestine in the Time of Jesus (co-author K. C. Hanson, 1998; 2e, 2008), Jesus and the Peasants (2008), The Political Aims of Jesus (2012), Jesus, Debt, and the Lord's Prayer (2014).

Carolyn Osiek is Professor of New Testament Emerita, Brite Divinity School at Texas Christian University, USA and was formerly Professor of New Testament, Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, USA. She is the author of The Shepherd of Hermas: A Commentary (1999), co-author of A Woman's Place: House Churches in Earliest Christianity (2006) and co-editor of Ordained Women in the Early Church: A Documentary History (2006).

David Rankin is an ordained minister of the Uniting Church in Australia and was previously Principal and Director of Studies in Church History at Trinity Theological College, Brisbane, Australia. His most recent books are From Clement to Origen (2006) and Athenagoras (2009), and his current research interests include the exploration of notions of personal existence post-death in both the early Church Fathers and contemporary culture (including film and literature).

Richard L. Rohrbaugh is Paul S. Wright Professor of Religious Studies Emeritus, Lewis & Clark College, Portland, USA. His research interests comprise the social/cultural world of early Christianity and the New Testament writings. His recent publications include: Reading the Bible through Ancient Eyes (2016), Honor: Core Value in the Biblical World (2015), 'Genealogies and other descent markers in the New Testament' (2014), 'Foreignizing translation' (2008), 'Zaccheus: Defender of the honor of Jesus' (2008) and 'The New Testament in cross-cultural perspective' (2007).

Anders Runesson is Professor of New Testament, University of Oslo, Norway. Research interests include Christian and Jewish origins and interaction, ancient synagogues, the Gospel of Matthew, Paul, and the historical Jesus. Publications include The Origins of the Synagogue: A Socio-Historical Study (2001), The Ancient Synagogue From its Origins to 200 CE: A Source Book (with D. D. Binder and B. Olsson, 2008), Divine Wrath and Salvation in Matthew: The Narrative World of the First Gospel (2016).

Thomas P. Scheck is Associate Professor of Theology at Ave Maria University in Ave Maria, Florida, USA. His interests lie in New Testament studies and patristic biblical interpretation. He has translated a number of volumes of the writings of the Church Fathers: Origen's Commentary on Romans, St Jerome's Commentaries on Galatians, Matthew, Isaiah, Ezekiel and the Twelve Prophets. Currently he is working on a new translation of the sermons of St Chromatius of Aquileia. Dr Scheck has also published two books, Origen and the History of Justification (2008) and Erasmus's Life of Origen (2016).

Teresa M. Shaw is Special Assistant to the president and Secretary to the board of trustees at Pomona College in Claremont, USA. She previously served as Vice Provost at Claremont Graduate University and held faculty appointments in religious studies at CGU and Scripps College, USA. She received her PhD from Duke University, USA. Shaw is the author of The Burden of the Flesh: Fasting and Sexuality in Early Christianity (1998).

Jeffrey S. Siker is Professor of New Testament Studies at Loyola Marymount University, USA. His research areas include early Jewish–Christian relations, Christian origins before Constantine, the history of biblical interpretation, and scripture and ethics. His most recent book is Jesus, Sin, and Perfection in Early Christianity (2015), on how Jesus came to be viewed as sinless in early Christianity.

Michael Bland Simmons is Distinguished Research Professor, Auburn University Montgomery, USA and Archbishop in The Anglican Church of the Americas. He has published extensively in the religion and philosophy of late antiquity. He is the author of Arnobius of Sicca (1995), 'Porphyrian universalism: A tripartite soteriology and Eusebius' response' (2009), Universal Salvation. Porphyry of Tyre and the Pagan-Christian Debate in Late Antiquity (2015) and 'Dating the Theophany of Eusebius of Caesarea' (forthcoming).

Oskar Skarsaune is Professor Emeritus of Church History at MF Norwegian School of Theology, Norway. His publications in English include The Proof from Prophecy: A Study in Justin Martyr's Proof-Text Tradition (1987), 'The development of scriptural interpretation in the second and third centuries', in Hebrew Bible/Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation, Vol. I, Part I: Antiquity, and 'Justin and his Bible', in Justin Martyr and His Worlds (2007).

John Arthur Smith is an independent scholar and a former full-time organist in the Church of Norway. In 2008 he was elected to a Visiting Fellowship in Music at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. His main interest is Jewish and Christian music in late antiquity. Widely published since 1984, his recent work includes Music in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity (2011) and 'Three Anglican Church Historians on Liturgy and Psalmody in the Ancient Synagogue and the Early Church' (2010).

Columba Stewart OSB is a Benedictine monk of Saint John's Abbey, Collegeville, USA, and Professor of Theology at Saint John's University, USA. He is the author of Working the Earth of the Heart: The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431 (1991), Cassian the Monk (1998), Prayer and Community: The Benedictine Tradition (1998), numerous articles on monastic topics, and a forthcoming history of the first millennium of Christian monasticism.

David G. K. Taylor is Associate Professor of Aramaic and Syriac, and a fellow of Wolfson College, Oxford. His research interests comprise: Syriac literature, history and theology; Syriac and Aramaic biblical versions; Middle Aramaic texts (Palmyrene, Nabataean, Hatran); and bilingualism and language contact in the late antique Near East. He is the author of The Syriac Versions of the De Spiritu Sancto by Basil of Caesarea (1999) and editor of Studies in the Early Text of the Gospels and Acts (1999). His recent publications include 'Early translations in the ancient Orient: From Greek into Syriac' (2016) and 'The forgotten Syriac Biblical version: The South Indian Diamper translation of texts excluded from the Peshitta Canon' (forthcoming).

Christine Trevett is Professor Emerita from Cardiff University, UK. There she was part of the Centre for Late Antique Religion and Culture in the Department of Religious and Theological Studies. In recent years she had time to turn to her second love, which is seventeenth-century sectarians (especially Quakers) in Britain, and to a new field, namely religion and autism. Her writings include 'Early Christian prophets: Wanderings, women and the course of change' in Propheten und Propheziehungen – Prophets and Prophecies (2005), Christian Women and the Time of the Apostolic Fathers (c. 80–160 CE): Corinth, Rome and Asia Minor (2006) and 'Prophets, economics and the rites of man: Some issues of authority in early Christian prophecy', in Revelation, Literature and Community (2011).

Risto Uro is Senior Lecturer in New Testament Studies at the University Helsinki, Finland. His current work focuses on applying ritual theory and cognitive science approaches to early Christianity. He is the author of Ritual and Christian Beginnings (2016) and Thomas (2003), as well as the co-editor of Mind, Morality and Magic (2013), Sacred Marriages (2008), and Explaining Christian Origins (2007).

Craig de Vos is Minister at North Adelaide Baptist Church, Australia, and was formerly the Bromby Lecturer in New Testament at Trinity College Theological School, Melbourne College of Divinity. He has published on the Pauline Letters, Luke-Acts, and the social-scientific interpretation of the New Testament.

Hanne von Weissenberg is Docent of Faculty of Theology in the University of Helsinki, Finland and Diocesan Theologian, Diocese of Tampere, Church of Finland. Her research focuses on the Dead Sea Scrolls, Qumran and Second Temple Judaism. She is the co-author (with M. Pajunen) of 'The Book of Malachi, Manuscript 4Q76 (4QXIIa), and the Formation of the "Book of the Twelve"' (2015) and the co-author (with C. Seppänen) of 'Constructing the boundary between two worlds: The concept of sacred in the Qumran texts' (2015).

L. Michael White is the R. N. Smith Professor of Christian Origins in the Departments of Religious Studies and Classics at The University of Texas at Austin, USA. He is also the Director of the Institute for the Study of Antiquity & Christian Origins and Director of the UT•OSMAP Excavations of the Synagogue at Ostia Antica (Italy). Dr. White specialises in the social-cultural contexts of Jewish and Christian groups in the Greco-Roman world. He is the author of The Social Origins of Christian Architecture (2 vols.; 1996–97); From Jesus to Christianity (2004); Scripting Jesus: The Gospels in Rewrite (2010); and co-author of Early Christianity and Classical Culture (2003); Caesarea Maritima Field O: The "Synagogue" Site (JECM IX, 2009); and Jewish Fictional Letters: The Epistle of Aristeas and Related Literature (2017).

PREFACE TO THE REVISED EDITION

Since its publication in 2000, The Early Christian World has come to be regarded by scholars, students and the general reader as one of the most informative and accessible works in English on the origins, development, character and major figures of early Christianity. In this new edition, the strengths of the first edition are retained. These include: the book's architecture that initially takes a reader through the context and historical development of early Christianity; the essays in critical areas such as community formation, everyday experience, the intellectual and artistic heritage, and external and internal challenges; and the profiles on the most influential early Christian figures. This new edition also preserves its strong emphasis on the social reality of early Christianity and continues its distinctive use of hundreds of illustrations, maps and charts to bring that world to life.

Yet the seventeen years that have passed since the first edition was published have seen great advances made in our understanding of early Christianity in its world. There has been an expanding concern with identity, especially ethnic and non-ethnic identities, such as with respect to relations between Jews (or 'Judeans') and Christians (or 'Christ-followers'), and the impact of the Greco-Roman world on Christianity. Issues of sexuality and gender have become increasingly prominent. There has also been a growing interest in Christian culture and in the material dimensions of early Christian writing, and early Christian realia are attracting increased attention. Ritual studies, strongly linked to the recent research into the cognitive dimensions of religion, have become a mature area of research. Particular areas that now have a strong claim for inclusion include canonical and non-canonical scriptures, hagiography, translation across languages, Manichaeism and two saints omitted from the first edition, Pachomius the Great and Gregory of Nyssa. In addition, a number of scholars in this field have come to prominence in the last seventeen years and this new edition provides an opportunity for their work to become more widely known.

This new edition fully reflects these developments and desiderata and provides the reader with authoritative, lively and up-to-date access to the early Christian world. Eleven new chapters have been added (11, 16, 18, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 46, 42, 55) and eleven of the original chapters have been written afresh by different scholars (5, 6, 19, 28, 32, 36, 38, 44, 47, 48, 53). Thus, roughly 35 per cent of the text is entirely new. The remaining essays have been carefully revised and updated by their original authors (except in one case, where we have retained the fine original and added an extra, supplementary chapter: 17 and 18). There is a whole new section on Christian culture (covering realia, scriptures in early Christianity, saints and hagiography, and translation across cultures). But there are also new essays on Jewish and Christian interaction in the early centuries, the New Testament in Roman Britain, ritual, Manichaeism, Pachomius the Great and Gregory of Nyssa. Whereas there were 230 Figures (images, maps and charts) in the original edition, this number has now expanded to 303. It is hoped that this new edition will serve its readers for many years to come.

In preparing this edition I have been greatly helped by the Taylor & Francis staff. First, I must thank Amy Davis-Poynter who originally approached me in mid 2014 to undertake a revised edition and attended to many of the early details. Thereafter Lola Harre provided valuable help. Most recently, especially in the very busy months leading up to my submission of the manuscript, Lizzi Thomasson has been very professional in her assistance, including in the speed with which she replied to any issues that I raised and in sorting out numerous issues relating to the Figures. I am most grateful to all of them.

Lastly, shortly before this manuscript was complete, Bernard Carey, a close friend of mine for over forty-five years since we first met as we were starting Arts/Law degrees at Sydney University, died in Bristol. I dedicate this book to his memory.

PART I

The context

1

THE MEDITERRANEAN CONTEXT OF EARLY CHRISTIANITY

Philip F. Esler

Introduction

During its first four centuries, from 30 to 430 CE, the phenomenon we now designate as Christianity[1] was closely connected with the Mediterranean region, which also constituted the original heartland of the Roman Empire (see Figure 1.1). Vital Christian areas, such as Palestine, Syria, Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, North Africa, Gallia Narbonensis and Spain were all washed by the Mediterranean Sea. Parts of the empire further afield, like Cappadocia, Pontus and Bithynia, and even Gaul and Britain had been deeply affected by Mediterranean influences, either by their close proximity to the places just mentioned, or by the ubiquitous practices of Roman provincial administration, or both. There were Christians developing notable traditions somewhat away from the Mediterranean and outside the Roman empire, in places like Armenia and Ethiopia, or even further afield, in India, but they were a small minority of the total Christian population. In any event, even they had been shaped by the missionaries from the Mediterranean countries who had evangelised them.

This context for early Christianity inevitably prompts three fundamental questions: first, in what sense are we able to speak of a Mediterranean region in the first five centuries of our era – that is, was it distinctive and, if so, how? Second, what effect did the ensemble of natural and human features constituting this region have on the new religious movement struggling to be born and grow in its midst? And, third, what impact did Christianity have in turn on its Mediterranean context? Posing the matter like this involves acknowledging the validity of the insight from the sociology of knowledge that there is a dialectic relationship between social settings and the religious institutions and ideas which arise within them, with the settings contributing to the creation of the institutions and ideas while they in turn have an impact on their social settings (Berger 1969: 41, 47; Esler 1994: 10). My aim in this chapter is to set out the broad outlines of an answer to the first of these questions, with occasional reference to the second and third, which constitute a central interest in the essays in this work.

Although my focus will be on geographic, socio-economic and broad cultural questions, other contributors in the first broad section of this volume will deal with other aspects of the ancient Mediterranean context of Christianity, such as the political dominance of Rome, or (from 330 CE) Rome and Constantinople together (Jill Harries in Chapter 2), Graeco-Roman philosophy and religion (Luther Martin in Chapter 3) and Judaism (James Aitken in Chapter 4).

THE ROMAN EMPIRE IN A.D. 60

LINDUM

VIROCONIUM

BRITANNIA
(4 legions)

LONDINIUM

VETERA (2)

NOVAESIUM

BONNA

MOGUNTIACUM

VINDONISSA

BELGICA

DUROCORTORUM

2

LUGDUNENSIS

1

AGRI
DECUMATES

ARGENTORATE

Rhenus

Danuvius

AUGUSTA
VINDELICUM

CARNUNTUM

AQUITANIA

RAETIA

NORICUM

VIRUNUM

PANNONIA

BURDIGALA

LUGDUNUM

POETOVIO

ALPES COTTIAE

DALMATIA

ALPES
MARITIMAE

NARBONENSIS

BURNUM

NARBO

ITALIA

SALONAE

TARRACONENSIS
(with Lusitania 3 legions)

SARDINIA
ET CORSICA

ROMA

TARRACO

LUSITANIA

EMERITA AUGUSTA

BAETICA

CORDUBA

CARALES

SICILIA

TINGIS

CAESAREA(IOL)

CARTHAGO

SYRACUSE

MAURETANIA
TINGITANA

MAURETANIA CAESARIENSIS

THEVESTE

AFRICA

NUMIDIA

1 GERMANIA SUPERIOR
   (military area)

2 GERMANIA INFERIOR
   (military area)

0   500
        km

A   B   C   D

1

2

3

4

5

Figure 1.1 The Roman empire in 60 CE. Reproduced by permission of Routledge

The Mediterranean as a physically distinctive region

Topography and climate

'The Mediterranean is a great gulf of the Atlantic cutting back into the land mass of the Eastern Hemisphere' (Semple 1932: 4). It carries the ocean 2,330 miles from the straights of Gibraltar to Lebanon, thus in effect giving Asia an Atlantic seaboard. It is enclosed by three continents – to the north, south and east. The northern, or European, coastline, measuring some 13,000 kilometres, is deeply dissected by peninsulas and islands, lying behind which is a fertile hinterland, these two features together providing the basis for the development of maritime trade. The southern, or African, coast-line, only 5,000 kilometres long, is barely dissected at all by natural features and has situated behind it lands which are frequently arid, with Egypt, watered by the Nile, being the notable exception. The eastern, or Asiatic, coastline is some 6,000 kilometres long, with much of this due to the deeply indented coastline of Asia Minor. Historically, the Asian part continually mediated between the great civilisations of the east, in the Tigris and Euphrates valleys and even India, and those in the west.

In geological terms, the Mediterranean Sea is relatively young, occupying the areas of depression interposed between the belts of young folded mountains stretching across north-west Africa, southern Europe (especially the peninsulas of Spain, Italy and Greece) and the Asian ranges of the Caucasus and the Taurus. Throughout the region are found narrow coastal plains, while further inland deep valleys separate the folds of young mountains, or intersperse the old plateaus that survived the recent burst of mountain building. Extensive flat areas suitable for tillage are uncommon (Semple 1932: 4–34).

At a general level, similar climatic conditions occur across the Mediterranean lands. The characteristic pattern is that of winter rains and summer droughts. During summer, when the sun's rays are vertical at the equator, the Mediterranean is subjected to hot and dry northeast trade winds, which supplant the rain-bearing westerly winds of winter and a heat belt moves north from Saharan Africa. In winter the reverse occurs, and the westerlies sweep in across the sea dropping their precipitation, especially when they meet obstacles such as the mountains of Lebanon and Palestine. In many areas, the summer drought is hard on vegetation, and irrigation can be required to maintain plant growth (Semple 1932: 83–101).

Yet the region produces staple cereals (which are generally sown in autumn around the onset of the rains and harvested in early summer), vegetables and fruits (including figs and grapes) and provides reasonable pasturage for small animals, especially sheep and goats, but is not so good for cattle. Most characteristic of the Mediterranean is the ubiquitous olive, whose deep roots allow it to survive the summer drought and produce the oil that in the ancient period was eaten, burnt to provide illumination and used for anointing the skin. The olive takes several years to produce its first fruit and is a reminder of the sedentary nature of Mediterranean life (Finley 1985: 31).

The steady northeast trade winds, which the Greeks called 'Etesian', appear in late May and begin to fade in mid-September. For the ancients this was the only safe season for sailing in the Mediterranean. The cyclonic storms typical of winter made navigation hazardous. Hesiod advised his readers 'to avoid the winter sea when the winds war loud' (Works and Days 619–25). Merchant vessels operated between 10 March and 10 November, but the safe period was from May to September (Semple 1932: 579–81).

Yet these characteristics common to the region can be deceptive. In 2000, when the original edition of this book was in production, Peregrine Hordern and Nicholas Purcell published a major work entitled The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History. While trying to provide a version of Fernand Braudel's 1949 magnum opus (La Méditerranée et le Monde Méditerranéen a l'époque de Philippe II) appropriate for the ancient Mediterranean and seeking to link ecological, social and political dimensions of the region, Hordern and Purcell above all stressed that it was best understood as an assemblage of a large number of micro-regions that were a response in part to the fact that there was a large measure of climatic variability across the region. This meant that the human population exploited its fragmented landscape and variable climate in a wide variety of different ways. One result of this was that crop failure or another catastrophe in one micro-region might be balanced by a successful harvest in other places, with the sea allowing movement of food from an area of surplus to an area of deficit. Thus the picture was one of fragmentation yet also connectivity enabled by the relative ease of seaborne trade.

Ancient Greek and Roman views on the Mediterranean as a distinct region

The fact that modern people are accustomed to thinking of the Mediterranean as a distinctive region for a variety of reasons, such as its geomorphic structure, climate, culture and vegetation – especially in contrast to Northern Europe – does not necessarily mean that its ancient inhabitants had a similar understanding. Nevertheless, the ancient Mediterranean did have a regional identity and its inhabitants recognised this.

The Greeks and Romans broadly divided the area surrounding the Mediterranean Sea into three continents of Europe, Asia and Africa (which they called Libya: Herodotus, 4.42; Strabo, Book 1). Herodotus (writing c. 450 BCE) shrewdly pointed out that Europe is as long as the other two put together (Histories 4.42).[2] Like the rest of the ancient world, Herodotus was richly aware of the huge variety of locales, peoples, languages and customs, represented around and inland from its shores. In his Histories he inaugurated the focused study of particular peoples in their homelands, with his accounts of the Egyptians in Book 2 (35–99) and the Scythians in Book 4 (2–36, 46–82) and was followed by a large number of Greek and Roman authors (Almagor and Skinner 2013). Yet in spite of this diversity, the sea itself permitted reasonably easy communication between all of these areas and groups. A remarkably useful discovery such as a phonetic alphabet, deployed soon after its discovery by Semitic peoples such as Phoenicians and Israelites, was soon adopted by the Greeks with whom the latter traded. Technological and artistic developments, religious cults, philosophic ideas and literary genres quickly spread across the region. Greek and later Latin became widely used lingua francas. 'Ceaseless intercourse back and forth along "the wet ways" bound together the Mediterranean peoples into one great community life' (Semple 1932: 11). In due course, the Mediterranean would become a vital highway for the spread and institutionalisation of the Christian message (see Chapter 14 of this work).

The ancient Greeks and Romans recognised this sense of regionality. Plato's Socrates said of those who lived between the Phasis river (in the east) and the Pillars of Heracles (that is, the straits of Gibraltar, in the west) that 'living around the sea we are like ants or frogs around a pond' (Phaedo 109B). The Romans called the region the orbis terrarum, the circle of lands, a notion also invoked by an anonymous Greek lyric poet who wrote of 'the sea-bound circle of the whole dry land' (Greek Anthology 9, Epigram 672; Paton 1915: 375). Greeks and Romans referred to the Mediterranean as 'our sea' (mare nostrum), 'this sea' and, simply, 'the sea'.

Ancient Mediterranean map-making

This sense of regionality emerged in ancient attempts to map the world. Older understandings of the cosmos assumed a flat earth, circular in shape and often surrounded by ocean. The Mesopotamian version of this model (which is well represented in the Old Testament) consisted of a flat triple-decker universe, divided into heaven, earth and underworld. Herodotus (writing c. 450 BCE) scoffed at map-makers who drew the earth in perfectly circular fashion, with Oceanus running round the circumference, and with Europe and Asia of roughly equal size (Histories 4.36). He may well have had the maps of Anaximander and Hecataeus, both of Miletus, in his sights (Kirk and Raven 1971: 104). Figure 1.2 is a reasonable modern reconstruction of what such a map might have looked like.[3] Such attempts naturally situated 'our sea' near the centre of the world.

Figure 1.2 Conjectural reconstruction of Hecataeus' map of the world. From Dilke 1985: 56

By the beginning of the first century CE, however, these cosmologies had largely been replaced in educated Greek and Roman circles by the realisation that the earth was a sphere, not a disk. As early as the second half of the sixth century BCE, Pythagoras and Parmenides of Elea had proposed a spherical earth (Dilke 1985: 25). Aristotle (384–322 BCE) offered proofs for the earth's sphericity, such as the earth throwing a round shadow on the moon at eclipses (Thomson 1948: 118; Aristotle, de Caelo 297b) and Eratosthenes (c. 275–194 BCE) actually achieved a remarkably accurate measurement of its circumference of around 25,000 miles (Thomson 1948: 159–61).

The inhabited quadrant of the globe (which the Greeks called the oikoumene) was thought to stretch roughly from the straits of Gibraltar in the west to India and China in the east. While residing in Rome in about 168 BCE, Crates of Pergamum designed an orb which set out the position of the oikoumene in relation to other (imagined) parts of the globe (Strabo 2.5.10; Dilke 36), as conjectured in Figure 1.3.

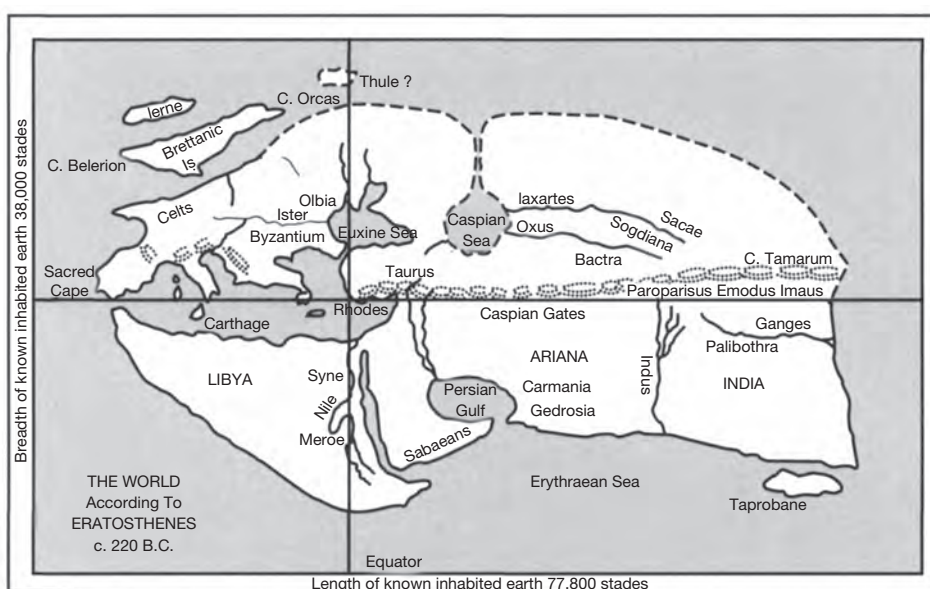
Figure 1.3 Reconstruction of Crates' Orb, a terrestrial globe made c. 170–160 BCE to make sense of Homeric geography. From Dilke (1985: 36)


Figure 1.4 Simplified reconstruction of Eratosthenes' map of the inhabited quadrant of the globe – the oikoumene. From Dilke (1985: 33)

From as early as the fifth century BCE, thought was being given to the need to map the oikoumene of the globe onto a flat surface and what shape to give it, with Democritus of Abdera opting for an oblong with the proportion of length (east-west) to width (north-south) as 3:2 (Dilke 1985: 25). Eratosthenes produced what may be regarded as the first really scientific map (Dilke 1985: 33–5). Figure 1.4 suggests what this might have been like.

In the period before his death in 12 BCE, Marcus Agrippa, a close supporter of Octavian, had begun to erect a world map in Rome, which Octavian completed after Agrippa's death. It was extremely detailed, both as to place names and distances between places (Dilke 1985: 41–53). With the collapse of Rome, however, older and more primitive cosmologies would once again come to the fore (Thomson 1948: 351–91). Overly intrepid voyagers would later be warned of the perils of falling off the world's edge.

Recent research has begun to open up aspects of ancient Roman map-making that have direct implications for understanding the early Christ-movement and the form of some of its written outputs, such as the topography of Palestine and Greek East as they appear in Paul's letters, the Gospels and in the Acts of the Apostles (Kloppenborg 2016). There was a type of document known in Greek as periplous (plural = periploi) and in Latin as periplus (plural = peripli), meaning 'a sailing around', which listed harbours, coastal landmarks and maritime hazards in order and with approximate intervening distances to aid captains of vessels in making their voyages. Hecataeus of Miletus (c. 550–476 BCE) wrote one of these (the Periodos gēs, 'Journey around the earth'), although his work also provided information about peoples along the route. This work and others like it show clearly the centrality of the Mediterranean to ancient Greeks and Romans; by sailing around the Mediterranean (and its extension, the Black Sea) one could describe the world. One such document, the Stadiasmus Maris Magni, from the second half of the third century CE, is extant in large fragments that lists distances between various harbours in the Levant (Dilke 1985: 140–1; Kloppenborg 2016: 101–43). There are also several references in ancient sources to itineraria and itineraria picta ('painted maps'; Cuntz 1929–1990). After the Battle of Actium in 31 BCE, Augustus deputed Agrippa to create a long rectangular map, not just a list of places, and erect it at the Porticus Vipsania (Kloppenborg 2016).

Cultural aspects of context

An initial caveat: the issue of cultural difference

'Culture' refers to the totality of efforts by human beings to create a world for themselves, material and non-material, with the latter including phenomena such as social relations, roles, values and institutions. A preliminary problem which arises in considering any foreign culture, whether distant from us in space or time, is the fact that our immersion in our own culture equips us with a whole set of cues for understanding non-material social features which might well get in the road of our comprehending the other culture. Unless we are careful, we are likely to project ethnocentric or anachronistic interpretations onto other human subjects – in effect, to make the unfortunate blunder of assuming that they are really like us when they might differ in all sorts of ways that they, and we, would consider significant. Eminent ancient historian Peter Brown has spoken of the need to remove 'the patina of the obvious' from that which we are investigating (1972: 18–20). An increasing number of commentators, in the biblical and classical fields, have discovered recently that one way to remove this patina is by drawing upon the recent anthropological research into the modern Mediterranean. This research provides us with a valuable set of social scenarios, or strategies, which are heuristic tools, not social laws, for interpreting the data. They allow us to ask new questions of the ancient data and to make sense of the answers we get (along the lines of 'drawing lines between the dots'). Although these scenarios are not necessarily those of the ancient Mediterranean, the measure of similarity is striking. Moreover, they are certainly far more appropriate than the (usually unrecognised) scenarios derived from modern Northern European and North American individualism which so often undergird modern interpretations in this field.

The initial stage of anthropological research into the Mediterranean region is found in the work written or edited by Pitt-Rivers (1955, 1963, 1965, 1977), Campbell (1964), Peristiany (1965), Bourdieu (1965), Davis (1977) and many of the essays in Gilmore (1987), to mention only some of the main examples which I have recently reviewed (Esler 2011a: 35–76). Much of this work stressed honour as the primary value in Mediterranean society, essentially meaning a person's claim to worth and the social acknowledgement of that claim, the opposite of which is shame. More recently, some anthropologists, such as Herzfeld (1984, 1987), have criticised the pan-Mediterranean value system proposed in the first generation of research. In so far as Herzfeld has warned us against the reification of the Mediterranean area, his contributions are welcome. Contemporary anthropologists should always test the findings of earlier generations of research in relation to new contexts and new perspectives, such as those of a feminist or post-modernist motivation. Nevertheless, the newer work does not necessitate that the older results are now outmoded, only that we should be alert to the possibility of diversity and nuance in ways we had not previously appreciated. The research of the last thirty years represents a vigorous and critical development of the field, not its rejection or replacement. To cite but one example, while Abu-Lughod has provided a more nuanced picture of the role and influence of women in Bedouin culture (1986), she still depends on the original discoveries in the field (usually made by male anthropologists who simply did not have great access to female informants) when she observes that 'individuals in Bedouin society appear able to express through poetry the sentiments of weakness that violate the honor code' (1986: 233). A recent book by R. L. Oprisko (2012) has underlined the continuing importance of honour for the study of human societies. This work, together with the emphasis by Oprisko and others on 'face' (the process, to an extent symbolled on the face, by which an individual gains, loses and maintains his or her status as a recognised member in an honour-group), has been fruitfully applied by David Harvey in a study of Galatians (2016).

A macrosociological dimension: an advanced agrarian society

Agricultural surplus, urban elite and the peasantry

The first dimension of the cultural aspects of the Mediterranean context we need to consider is the broad socio-economic system of the ancient Mediterranean world. Here, to organise our approach to the subject and to raise a useful agenda of questions, it helps to borrow some insights from macrosociology, in particular the approach to that field elaborated by Gerhard Lenski and Jean Lenski in Human Societies: An Introduction to Macrosociology. In the first edition of this work, reference was made to the fifth edition of the Lenskis' book from 1987. It is now in its thirteenth edition (2014), co-authored by Patrick Nolan and Gerhard Lenski (who died in 2015). The Lenskis focused upon the development of social systems from a preindustrial stage, beginning with hunting and gathering societies, proceeding to horticultural societies, and then agrarian (simple and advanced) before moving on to industrial and industrialising societies. Their model is further explained and utilised by Richard Rohrbaugh in Chapter 8 of this work.

Mediterranean societies in the period in question can be analysed in terms of what Lenski and Lenski call the advanced agrarian type. Since this is really part of a model of the socio-economic system, and a model drawn at a fairly high level of abstraction, not an empirical description of such a system, the following account in no way precludes variations across time and space,[4] even on matters as fundamental as the contrast between the typical prevalence of state ownership of land in the temple-states of the ancient Near East and the widespread private ownership of land in Greece and Rome (Finley 1985: 28–9).

The advanced agrarian stage was characterised at a technological level by the use of the plough that allowed permanent cultivation of a much larger area of land than among horticulturists and which thus facilitated the production of agricultural surpluses. In response to these surpluses a broad social and political structure tended to develop. Typically, a tiny ruling elite (2–5 per cent of the population), centred in cities, exercised authority over large numbers of peasants and took a large proportion of their surplus to support their often luxurious life in the city and the religious cult or cults which it contained. As time went on, especially with the introduction of iron ploughs in the first millennium BCE that increased production even more, the number of 'retainers' catering directly to the needs of the elite, such as household servants, stewards and scribes, together with other groups serving them indirectly such as artisans and merchants, grew considerably.

As well as controlling the means of economic production, the elite enjoyed most political power and status and had a virtual monopoly on literacy, through their control over trained scribes. Very few peasants usually learned to read and write in this type of culture (Harris 1989). There was an enormous social distance between those at the top of this extremely hierarchical society and those at the bottom, generally attended by the scorn the elite felt for the non-elite (see Chapter 8 on this approach to stratification as applied to Herodian Palestine).

Yet we should always be open to the complexity of the data, and augment or amend our models whenever necessary. Thus, Averil Cameron (1991: 30) argues that although the Roman empire of the first two centuries CE was characterised by a strong horizontal demarcation between an educated elite and the rest of society, by the fourth century CE the situation had significantly changed: the civil and military had separated, an increase in government posts had opened up the old elite and confused demarcation lines and traditional culture was being challenged by an alternative Christian one, and there was an alternative elite in the form of Christian bishops.

Peter Garnsey has also argued for another dimension to changes in the empire from the first to the fourth centuries – the decline of the urban aristocracy (1998b).[5] At the beginning of the period, the members of the urban elite of the cities across the provinces of the empire, the decurions or curiales, were required to bear the brunt of the financial burdens of imperial administration (the munera). Using the resources derived largely from their rural holdings, they held magistracies, constructed buildings, paid for religious cults and liturgies, and distributed largesse to the citizenry, with the significant enhancement to their honour that resulted representing adequate compensation for the heavy expenditure. Possibly as early as the late third century, and certainly by the fourth, however, various factors, such as the mounting costs of government and a decline in local prosperity, meant that these responsibilities had lost their appeal. Faced with a flight of decurions from the cities, the imperial government responded by seeking to block their entry into other areas of life, in effect trying to turn them into an hereditary order, even if this was never successfully achieved – and a succession of imperial decrees in the Theodosian code directing errant decurions to return to their cities to perform liturgies suggests that it was not (Garnsey 1998b: 3). In the fourth century, imperial exemption of Christian clergy from the duties of the decurionate, such as that as enacted by an edict of Constantine on 21 October 319 (Codex Theodosianus 16.2.2; Croke and Harries 1982: 16) proved a most valuable benefit.

Conditions for the non-elite

Life for the non-elite members of ancient society in agrarian societies of the advanced agrarian type tended to be difficult, although it is useful to distinguish between those who were free in status and those who were unfree. The largest component of those free was the peasantry. By the time peasants had paid taxes to the local political ruler and often to the local temple as well, there might be little left to support themselves and their families. Hunger was common, and the peasantry could even be drafted into military service or made to work on construction projects. Poor harvests generally meant that the peasants had to borrow at high interest rates, with the loans often secured against their next crop or their land itself. A very visible sign of this was the way in which the elite acquired peasants' land, by taking over fields that had been used to secure loans. It was very common for peasants to be forced off their land in these circumstances and to become tenant farmers, landless labourers or even beggars. These pressures sometimes led to the flight of peasants from the land altogether and to the consequent break up of families. Right across the empire, as Garnsey notes (1998c: 93), the expansion of elite land ownership in the form of concentrated holdings, or latifundia, worked largely by slaves, meant that this was a world 'in which peasant proprietors were being steadily transformed into tenant farmers, agricultural labourers, unemployed and underemployed urban residents'. The history of the Roman empire in the first four centuries of Christianity repeatedly reveals the consequences of imperial or local pressures caused by extractive processes on the peasantry (also see Finley 1985: 102–9).

Indeed, the large number of slaves on the land in Italy and other parts of the empire, including Greece, mean that peasants should not be the total focus of enquiry. Rome is often referred to as a 'slave state' (Garnsey 1998c: 91). On the other hand, recent research has suggested that it is a mistake to differentiate too sharply between freemen and slaves in the area of agricultural production. Peasants comprise various groups, such as those who own their own land, those who rent land from others and landless agricultural labourers. All three groups need at times to work on other peoples' holdings and this was certainly the case with the peasants of the ancient Mediterranean, even to the extent of their lending a hand to the regular slave workforce on latifundia at certain times of the year (Rathbone 1981: 19; Garnsey 1998d). Ironically, slaves (at least those capable of work) probably went hungry less frequently than peasants, since they were provided for from the resources of their wealthy owners, which is not to say that we should underestimate the possibility for savage treatment of slaves even in an urban environment.

The Ancient Mediterranean economy

'Economics' did not exist as a separate area of enquiry in the ancient Mediterranean. The very word derives, in fact, from oikonomia, meaning the management of the oikos, or private household – a subject in which there was a keen interest (as in Xenophon's Oeconomicus). More than this, however, the ancient world did not possess an 'economy', in the modern sense of an autonomous area of human interaction largely separate from other social features and governed by the use of money and markets, with associated arrangements for trade and exchange. Karl Polanyi persuasively argued in The Great Transformation (1944) that the movement from a preindustrial society (such as that of the ancient Mediterranean) to an industrial one was marked by a transition from an 'embedded' economy to a 'disembedded' one. In the ancient world, what we refer to as the economic aspects of a social system (pre-eminently the city) were subordinated to other features of which the most important were kinship, politics and religion. Commentators who follow this approach and insist that ancient economic realities can only be understood within this framework are called (perhaps not very helpfully) 'substantivists', while those who, on the other hand, insist that modern formal economic concepts are applicable to preindustrial, non-market economies are referred to as 'formalists' (Kaplan 1968).

One of the most significant 'substantivist' contributions to study in this area came with the publication of The Ancient Economy by Moses Finley in 1973 (second edition 1985). In a manner consonant with the Lenski and Lenski model set out earlier, he argued strongly for an idea of Max Weber's that the ancient city was a 'consumption centre', parasitically living off the produce of the surrounding countryside, while not engaging much in manufacturing and offering little in return (1973: 125–6). Although Finley did recognise that some cities were commercial centres (1973: 126–31), one critique of his views in the debate he provoked has been that he has underestimated the extent of the services ancient cities did provide to the surrounding areas or further afield. Donald Engels has argued such a case for Corinth, for example, calling it a 'service city' (1990). Corinth was certainly located at a strategic point for trade, since goods were carried across the isthmus from the Gulf of Corinth to the Saronic (see Figure 1.5) and many people, including Paul, passed through the city, no doubt enjoying some of the sophisticated civic facilities, such as fountains, that it had to offer (see Figures 1.6 and 1.7).

Figure 1.5 The isthmus at Corinth from the Akrocorinth, with the waters of the Gulf of Corinth to the left and the Saronic Gulf to the right. Photo Philip F. Esler

Figure 1.6   The Lechaion Road in Corinth, that ran from the port of Lechaeum south to the city, with Akrocorinth in the background. Photo Philip F. Esler

Figure 1.7   The Peirene fountain in Corinth, on the left-hand side of the Lechaion Road as it passed from north to south through the city. Photo: Philip F. Esler

Much the same case could probably be made for Ostia, Rome's port at the mouth of the Tiber, through which a huge amount of produce was channelled to the capital, being unloaded from ocean-going boats in its harbour and then shipped up the river on barges. The impressive array of commercial buildings in the current ruins of Ostia testifies to the vibrancy of this trade and the large number of personnel who must have been engaged in it.

Yet we should not let the atypical displace our understanding of the typical. While the possibility of existing on trade was very real for maritime cities, especially those as favoured in their location as Corinth or Ostia, for inland cities the difficulties and great cost of transport and the abiding realities of the grip of the elite on the peasantry across the region probably make Finley's the more attractive model (Oakman 1996). Neither can there be much doubt that the most significant economic reality in the ancient Mediterranean in the first few centuries of the Christian era was the extent to which Rome (with its population of about one million – Garnsey and Saller 1987: 62) drained resources out of the provinces in the form of taxes, especially huge shipments of wheat from Egypt, to supply its large population, including the retainers who served the emperor. This is a good example of the extent to which the realities of imperial power and economic issues were closely integrated. This process has been usefully modelled by Douglas Oakman (see Figure 1.8).

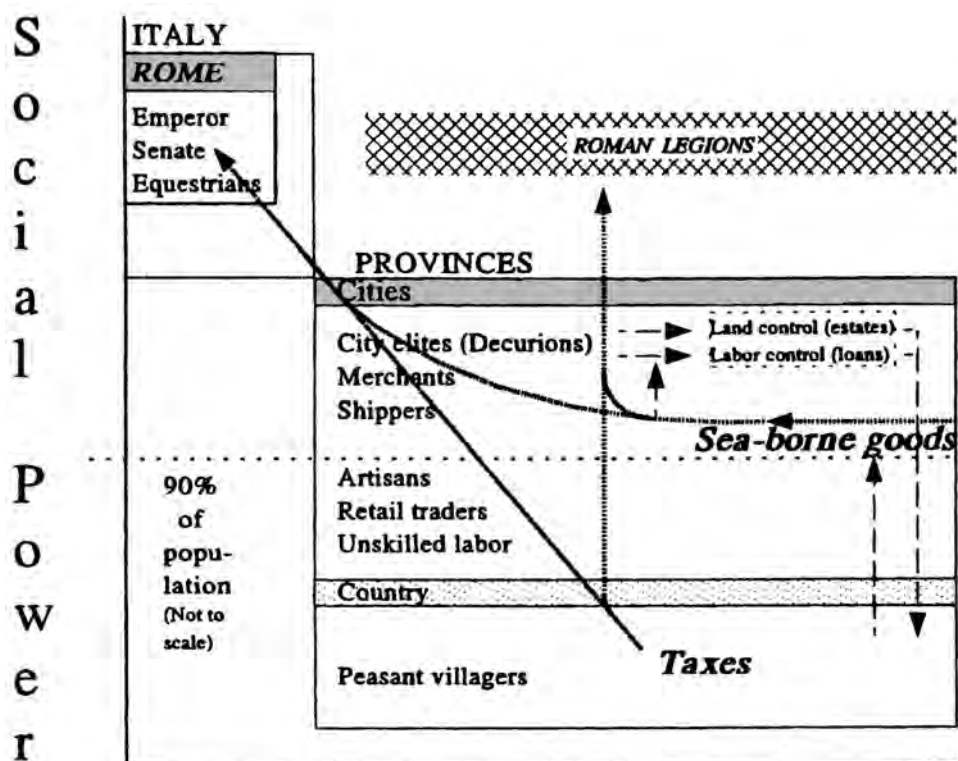
Nevertheless, one area, in particular, provides evidence that runs counter to Finley's position. In part this was due to the rapidly growing archaeological evidence for urban craftsmen and traders in the Roman world, with studies on the North African towns of Sabratha and Timgad, for example, that show them to have contained large numbers of workshops (Wilson 2001). But it was also due to the fact that the idea of a city and its hinterland constituting a self-sufficient unit fell prey to the new emphasis on cross-Mediterranean connectivity as advocated by Hordern and Purcell, whose work The Corrupting Sea (2000) was mentioned earlier (Flohr and Wilson 2016: 37–8).


Figure 1.8 Roman political economy: a systems model. Oakman 1993: 204; slightly modified

Garnsey and Saller describe the Roman economy as 'undeveloped', by which they mean (at an admittedly high level of generality) that the mass of the population lived at a subsistence level off agricultural production, that the level of investment in manufacturing activities was low and that there was little by way of an entrepreneurial class. Poor transport facilities added both to the cost and the risk of manufacturing and trade, which is not to say that some areas of manufacture (for example pottery) or trade (as with wheat, olive oil and wine moving from Egypt, other parts of North Africa and Spain to Rome in large quantities) did not develop in spite of the difficulties. The prevalence of an aristocratic ideology that was inimical to any profitable enterprise except agricultural production restricted the development of a prosperous and confident merchant class (1987: 43–5).

Religion, kinship and politics

As with 'economics', it is anachronistic to speak of 'religion' as having an existence separate from politics or the family in the context of the ancient Mediterranean world. The classic case for this position, presented by William Cantwell Smith decades ago (Smith 1962; Esler 2003: 7–8), has now been augmented by the work of Brent Nongbri, who argues for the reciprocal development of 'religion' and 'secularism' in the modern period (Nongbri 2015). Across the ancient Mediterranean region, the features we label as 'religious' institutions and ideas were also embedded either in structures of political dominance such as the temples of officially recognised cults put in place by local aristocratic elites (including the imperial cult), in voluntary associations (Harland 2003, 2009), in mystery cults (Bowden 2010) and in the household. There was a political religious cultus at the political level and other voluntary or domestic religious practices and beliefs, but not 'religion' per se. Political religion employed the roles, values and aims of politics in religious ideologies and rites. It was characterised by functionaries combining cultic and political functions and tending powerful deities who provided well-being and prosperity or, if provoked, their opposite. Political religion was legitimated in 'the Great Tradition' (Redfield 1956: 68–84), the high and learned culture of the elite. Domestic religion frequently used the roles, values and aims of the household in religious expression. Its functionaries, to the extent that it had them, were family members, and it focused on the deities as the source of familial solidarity and commitment, and well-being for the family members (Malina 1986, 1994, 1996). Domestic religion was legitimated in 'the Little Tradition', the low or folk culture of the non-elite.

Persons, roles and values in the ancient Mediterranean world

The usefulness of anthropological research into contemporary Mediterranean culture for understanding ancient social patterns was proposed and defended above. In this section I will briefly set out some of the main results of this research – in relation to group-orientation, honour and shame, limited good and patronage – and indicate how it may help us contextualise and interpret ancient data in ways less likely to be affected by ethnocentrism and anachronism than approaches which do not avail themselves of social-scientific assistance.

Group-orientation and group identities

Perhaps the greatest difference between modern Northern European and North American cultures, or 'North Atlantic cultures hereafter',[6] and those of contemporary Mediterranean societies is the prevalence of individualism in the former and a strong sense of group-orientation in the latter. By 'individualism' I am referring to the notion that to a large extent persons find fulfilment in life through their own individual efforts – by thinking for themselves, by striking out on their own, for example by leaving their parents' home at an early stage to build a career in another city, and so on.

'Individualism' fosters virtues such as self-reliance, innovativeness and a capacity for introspection. 'Individualism' is not the same as 'individuality', which simply refers to the phenomenon of each person having the capacity to present himself or herself as a distinctive individual in relation to other persons, most notably by being pre-eminent in some way, and which characterises all societies, whether they are individualistic or not, or ancient or modern.

Most of the world is not individualistic in the sense just set out, although many people socialised in North Atlantic cultures often fail to see this. The more common pattern is of group-orientation, where individuals achieve fulfilment in relation to significant groups. The family is by far the most important group in such settings, although other groups such as one's village, town or city, tribe, people, or ethnic group also play a major role, as do voluntary associations in towns and cities. Since the start of the twenty-first century, a group of largely Canadian scholars have rightly insisted on the importance of understanding voluntary associations in Greco-Roman cities from the abundant evidence that survives on stone and papyrus for contextualising early Christ-movement communities (Paul's especially) within their urban environment (Harland 2003, 2009, 2014; Kloppenborg and Ascough 2011; Kloppenborg forthcoming).

In group-oriented cultures, individuals tend to align their activities and attitudes with those of the groups to which they belong (Malina 2001: 60–7). Typical virtues in such contexts are obedience to elders, respect for tradition, a willingness to share goods with other group members and a pronounced tendency to represent the group in its relations to other groups, which is often associated with inter-group competitiveness. One finding from recent research into the Mediterranean region has been the prevalence of group-orientation in cultures as far afield as Iraq in the east and Spain in the west.

Judean and Christ-movement identities

One of the most significant developments in biblical and early Christian studies since the first edition of this work was published in 2000 has been a growing sensitivity to the issue of group identities, in part reflecting a vibrant interest in the issue of identity in the social sciences and the humanities generally. This debate has been especially concerned with identities that are ethnic and 'racial' (Stone and Dennis 2003; Phoenix 2010). I have used inverted commas around 'racial' because I do not consider that 'races', meaning groups that can be categorised (and, often, hierarchically arranged) on the basis of inherited visible characteristics, exist, even though discrimination on the basis that they do exist is sadly common.

The broad issue of ethnic identity has, in particular, influenced discussion of the people whom the ancient sources refer to as Ioudaioi (Greek) or Iudaei (Latin). Many researchers now take the view that these people (the spiritual, cultural and in many cases physical ancestors of today's Jews) manifested an identity best described as 'ethnic' rather than 'religious'. Frequently cited in this connection is an important essay by Fredrik Barth in 1969 in which he argued against the older, 'primordial' view that ethnic groups were identified by fixed bundles of cultural characteristics. Instead, he reasoned that a group's sense of themselves as a group interacting with other groups came first and cultural indicators (which frequently changed over time) were used, as a boundary, to express that group identity. So understood, ethnic identity was a field of ascription and identification used by certain groups to organise their relationships with other groups (Barth 1969). But this fluidity of approach still left hanging the question of what made a particular group ethnic. Barth himself suggested that an ascription of someone to a social category was ethnic in character 'when it classifies a person in terms of his basic, most general identity, presumptively determined by his origin and background' (1969: 13; emphasis added). Yet this was still very general and applied to a family as much as to an ethnic group. A limited repertoire of features was needed that must, to accord with Barth's ascriptive and interactive approach, be regarded as diagnostic and not constitutive of ethnic identity. John Hutchinson and Anthony Smith provided just such a repertoire in 1996:

(a) a common proper name to identify the group;

(b) a myth of common ancestry;

(c) a shared history or shared memories of a common past, including heroes, events and their commemoration;

(d) a common culture, embracing such things as customs, language and religious beliefs and practices;

(e) a link with a homeland, either through actual occupation or by symbolic attachment to the ancestral land, as with diaspora peoples; and

(f) a sense of communal solidarity.

(Hutchinson and Smith 1996b: 6–7)

I applied an approach combining Barth with Hutchinson and Smith to a study of Romans in 2003 (Esler 2003: 41–4) and several other scholars have later done the same.

An increasing number of writers on the New Testament now agree that the identity of the Ioudaioi was an ethnic one in this sense, a position well argued by Steve Mason (2007; 2016). Strong support for this view comes from the fact that in his Contra Apionem the first-century author Josephus defends his people, the Ioudaioi, from attack not by arguing that they are different in some fundamental way from the other peoples (designated as laoi, ethnē, genē) in their world – all of whom were named after the homeland from which they sprang, whether they lived there or in diaspora communities – but were simply an excellent example of such a group. The approach to ethnic identity just described finds responsive data in this text in relation to many peoples, including the Ioudaioi (Esler 2009).

Not all of the researchers who regard Ioudaios as an ethnic identity, however, have yet proved willing to follow that insight to its two logical conclusions, namely, that the word is correctly trans-lated 'Judean' and not 'Jew' or 'Jewish' and that 'Judaism', which focuses almost exclusively on religious beliefs and practices (only one aspect of a much larger ethnic identity), is inappropriate as a means for encapsulating the identity of this people, for the first century CE at least. Following this path, moreover, means that the relationship between Judean ethnic identity and Christ-movement identity (which was clearly not ethnic but rather akin to that of a voluntary association, especially those which contained members from various ethnic groups) was asymmetrical. Recent efforts to 'ethnicise' or, even worse, 'racialise' Christ-movement identity and minimise the distance between Judeans and Christ-followers in the first century and later (Buell 2005; Horrell 2011, 2016) are unconvincing (Mason and Esler 2017). Recognising the asymmetrical relationship between the two has major implications for how New Testament texts are read (Esler 2007, 2011b, 2013, 2016).

Honour and shame

A central value in the modern Mediterranean is honour, meaning one's own sense of worth and the corroboration of that understanding by a relevant group, typically the village in which one lives. The opposite of honour is shame. While honour and shame take on different connotations in different settings around the Mediterranean, so that we must always be alive to their particular nuances, its foundational role in Mediterranean social relations is quite remarkable. Honour can either be ascribed, that is simply attributed to a person by virtue of birth or position, or achieved, that is, actively gained from another in various social arenas in forms of interaction described as the pattern of challenge-and-response. The desire to obtain honour motivates many interactions between individuals and the groups whom they represent. Since the start of the twenty-first century, many New Testament critics, stimulated by Bruce Malina's foundational text The New Testament World (2001; first edition 1981), have utilised the centrality of honour to approach the biblical texts in quite fresh ways. Many classical scholars have moved in the same direction, as in J. E. Lendon's 1997 work Empire of Honour: The Art of Government in the Roman World and Carlin Barton's work (from 2001) Roman Honor: The Fire in the Bones, which offer nuanced accounts of the role of honour in the pattern of imperial control and Roman life, but without neglecting other aspects of the system, including wealth and power.

There are two aspects to the close connection between the fact of group-orientation and the importance of this value. First, while individuals do seek honour for themselves, the groups to whom they belong will also share in that honour and, second, its very existence is dependent on the opinion of some larger social grouping. The Mediterranean world is, and was, intensely competitive. Individuals and groups continually strove with one another to promote their individual or group honour at the expense of some other person or group. This conflict-ridden nature of the culture has led some to refer to it as agonistic (Malina 2001: 33–6). The Roman triumph, for example, was an institution which celebrated a major (and necessarily bloody) victory of Roman armies over their enemies by offering a status elevation ritual for the imperator and his legions and a status degradation ritual for the defeated nations, whose representatives were paraded along in the procession (Esler 1995c: 242–5). If a slight to the honour of oneself or one's group could not be rectified immediately, ancient Mediterranean people nursed powerful hopes of revenge until it could be.

Gender is closely connected with honour and shame, especially to the extent that women must keep within the authority of the men in their lives, either fathers, brothers or husbands, if the men are to preserve their honour. Shame also refers to a woman's honour; her 'shame' is something she must preserve. If a man's daughter, sister or wife is seduced, not only has the woman lost her shame, but her father, brother or husband incur gross dishonour which will require heavy vengeance to restore the status quo ante. Thus honour is held by groups as well as the individuals who represent those groups in dealings with outsiders. This pattern is an exceedingly common one across the Mediterranean. In many parts of the Mediterranean women were, where economically possible, largely relegated to the private sphere of the house, while men operated in the public sphere. But this is not to say that women could not also have roles outside the house, with Susan Hylen having recently described 'virtuous, active women in the Greco-Roman World' (Hylen 2015: 15–42 and the works she cites). In addition, through the use of their dowries, women could play a major role in the commercial activities and sometimes overshadow their husbands (Esler 2017 for Nabatean women).

One could choose to compare aspects of the anthropological model set out above with many of the social realities of the Roman empire in the period 66–430 CE. I will cite two examples. First of all, J. E. Lendon has presented a cogent case for the important role of honour in the area of imperial control (1997). Second, and more specifically, Peter Brown has developed an argument that is particularly helpful here. Brown suggests that in the golden years of the empire, in the period up to about 260 CE, the age of the Antonines, the Greco-Roman elites were motivated by philotimia, love of honour. Propelled by philotimia, individual members of the elite strove to outshine one another in the generosity of the services they offered their local polis, as recorded in the huge number of inscriptions which survive. But the strong competitive urges were channelled into or at least mitigated by attention to the collective life of the town. 'The competitiveness of philotimia still assumed and needed, as it had done for centuries, an audience of significant others who were potential competitors' (Brown 1978: 31). This behaviour aligns closely with that of the model. The elite of this period maintained a strong set of invisible boundaries that circumscribed the aspirations of individuals and directed them into 'forms of achievement that could potentially be shared by all members in the peer group' (Brown 1978: 35). Moreover, the notion of limited good (explained immediately below) prevailed. Goods were there to be spent and not hoarded. Those who accumulated too much were cut down to size. Members of the elite could insure themselves against envy by lavishing funds on the polis, for example to maintain its cults.

Limited good

A factor which sharpens occasions of competition in Mediterranean society is the notion of 'the limited good'. In many cultures, absent the effects of the industrial and green revolutions, the notion of expanding production is unknown and, as a matter of fact, some societies in the past may have witnessed little growth in economic output (and it is doubtful, though possible, that there was economic growth in the Roman empire in the first century CE – see Garnsey and Saller 1987: 51–63). In such a case, all goods are thought to exist in finite quantities and, often, are treated as indivisible, so that someone can accumulate a surplus of any good, including honour, only at the expense of someone else. In ancient Israel, Esau found that Isaac had only one blessing to give and it had gone to Jacob (Gen. 27:36–40). The idea was originally formulated in relation to Mexican peasants (Foster 1967; also cf. Malina 2001: 81–107), but it can be found in many other areas at an advanced agrarian stage of development. An honourable man does not try to build up a hoard of goods which may excite dangerous envy among his peers. Similarly, profiting from trade may be seen as theft. Instead, an honourable man strives to preserve what he has.

Applied to the competitions for honour which social equals enter into in Mediterranean culture (ancient and modern) in virtually any area of social interaction, a social dynamic called 'challenge-and-response', limited good means that there is only so much honour to be obtained in the exchange and that it will be a case of winner takes all.

Patron and client relations

A typical feature of Mediterranean culture is the existence of patron–client relations. These are social relationships between individuals based on a strong element of inequality and difference in power that permit the exchange of different and very unequal resources. Typically, a member of an urban elite will share some of his social, economic and political resources (including legal advice) to people lower on the social scale, who, in return, will give him expressions of loyalty and honour that are useful in one way or another (Moxnes 1991: 242). Often there will be a middle-man, a broker, who mediates the exchange of the various benefits between clients and a more powerful patron. The broker will function as a client to the ultimate patron and as patron to the ultimate clients (Moxnes 1991: 248–9).

Patron–broker–client relations are explicable as a way of overcoming the extremely stratified nature of Mediterranean society and the limited nature of its resources, but also of investing relationships with people who are not kin with some of the characteristics of the reciprocity and even emotional attachment which characterises the household. Thus we may regard patron–client relations as a form of fictive kinship.

When one turns to the ancient data, it is apparent that patron–client relations were a prominent feature of Roman life during both the Republic and the empire (Saller 1982). Members of the Republican elite, senators especially, had groups of clients whom they would receive at their home early in the morning. Perhaps the most interesting evidence for the centrality of patronage in the Republic is found in the text Commentariolum Petitionis (Handbook of Electioneering), which purports to be advice given to Marcus Tullius Cicero by his younger brother Quintus to help him win the election to consulship in 63 BCE. Much of this text is occupied with obtaining large numbers of 'friends' (a polite word as between patron and clients, since cliens was regarded as degrading – Garnsey and Saller 1987: 152) who will agitate on Cicero's behalf. Here is a small sample of the advice to Cicero:

> Inquire and seek out men everywhere, get to know them, pursue them, secure them, see that they canvass their localities for you and act like candidates on your behalf. They will want you as a friend if they see you are anxious for their friendship; pursue the object of making them understand the point by using discourse appropriate to the purpose. Small-town and country folk think themselves our friends if we know them by name; and if they think they are gaining some protection for themselves, they lose no opportunity of deserving it.
>
> (8.31; Henderson 1989: 771–3)

Or again:

> I am very anxious that you should always have a crowd about you; I think it important to the occasion. Further, it will bring you great credit and high prestige if you have around you those whom you have defended, who have been preserved and saved from condemnation by you. Demand of them plainly that since it is due to your unpaid efforts that they have retained their property, or their reputation, or their life and all their fortunes, and since there will never be another chance for them to thank you, they should repay you by this service.
>
> (10.38; Henderson 1989: 777)

Cameron (1991: 76) notes, however, that there were changes later; thus in the empire, when political office came largely through imperial patronage, individual members of the elite no longer had to appeal to the people for support. Yet this simply meant that patrons and clients chose other areas to cement their relationships, from the emperor down. Thus, as far as the emperors themselves went, Augustus set the pattern early by seeking to legitimise his reign by the traditional patterns of patronage and benefaction (Garnsey and Saller 1987: 149). He left an account of his reign, the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, largely extant on an inscription in Ankara (see Figure 1.9), much of which (chapters 15–24 out of 35) is taken up with an account of the staggering level of benefits and services he provided to the Roman people. Here is a sample:

> In the eighteenth year of my tribunician power and my twelfth consulship (5 BCE) I gave 240 sesterces apiece to 320,000 members of the urban plebs. In my fifth consulship (29 BCE) I gave 1,000 sesterces out of booty to every one of the colonists drawn from my soldiers; about 120,000 men in the colonies received this largesse at the time of my triumph.
>
> (15.2–3; translation Brunt and Moore 1967: 25–7)

Figure 1.9 The Res Gestae of Augustus, in the Temple of Rome and Augustus, Ankara. Photo J. C. Coulston

Yet the whole system of keeping the Roman plebs fed and content on 'bread and circuses' illustrates the perennial nature of such support. Since the city population, given its huge number, could not repay such imperial gifts in any direct or specific way, Garnsey and Saller note that the reciprocity ethic demanded that they make a return in the form of deference, respect and loyalty (1987: 149). This is rather similar to the position taken by the author of the Handbook on Electioneering in the second of the two quotations given above.

The emperors became patrons to a large number of members of the elite, many of whom were charged with important roles in the administration of Rome or the provinces. Some of the rewards that went with such imperial preferment were used by their recipients to bestow patronage on others further down the social hierarchy. Provincial governors functioned as brokers between the local population and the empire. In other words, the emperor did not become a universal patron to the exclusion of other patrons, but rather worked within the traditional patterns to allow the aristocracy to continue to exercise patronal influence as they had always done (Garnsey and Saller 1987: 150).

It has been suggested by Millet that Athens was an exception to the rest of the region by not being characterised by patron–client relations on the basis that this sort of social arrangement was incompatible with Athenian democracy (1989). This seems rather unlikely, however, and the fact that Aristotle specifically speaks of unequal friendships (Nicomachean Ethics 8.14), which sound very much like patronage, suggests we should be cautious in denying this social feature to Athens. The lack of a specific language of patronage at Athens parallel to what we have from Rome does not mean that patron–client relations did not exist there.

There is evidence in the New Testament for how this system worked at the local level in Palestine in the story of the centurion of Caphernaum with a sick servant told by Luke (7:1–10). He is able to send Jewish elders to plead with Jesus, so that they act as his clients. They tell Jesus that 'He deserves this of you because he is friendly towards our people; in fact he is the one who built our synagogue' (Luke 7:5). Tricia Gates Brown has persuasively accounted for the role of the Spirit in John's Gospel and 1 John in terms of patron–broker–client relations (Brown 2003).

After Christianity became a legitimate religion with the Edict of Milan in 313 CE, bishops with family wealth behind them, such as Ambrose, continued to operate within the ancient framework of patronage and benefaction, for example by paying for the construction of churches (see Chapter 57 of this work).

Conclusion

The discussion above justifies us treating the Mediterranean region as having, at least at a reasonably high level of abstraction, an ensemble of distinctive natural and cultural features that left their mark on early Christianity in a wide variety of ways which will emerge in many of the essays of this work. None of this means that we should underestimate the huge variety of social features across the region nor our considerable ignorance in many areas; Cameron notes that even on something as fundamental as the shape of urban life, 'We remain very much in the dark about the social composition of most cities' (1991: 45).

Neither should we forget, as noted at the start of this chapter, that the relationship between a religion and its social setting is a dialectical one, with setting influencing religious life and beliefs, while the latter can have a profound impact on the setting. As Cameron, again, has noted, looking at the way things developed to Constantine and beyond, Christianity and the empire affected one another – it is a dynamic process in which both sides were changing (1991: 4). Christianity 'placed an extraordinary premium on verbal formulation' and this led to an attempt, largely successful, to impose an authority of discourse which itself came to be the dominant one in the state. Thus the story of the development of Christian discourse forms part of political history (1991: 19).

In the end, however, any attempt to understand early Christianity apart from the unique cultural context of the ancient Mediterranean in which it was born will lead to a misleading and emaciated form of intellectual history, dangerously divorced from the realities of human experience. 'The Word was made flesh', wrote the Fourth Evangelist, thus provoking or at least enriching centuries of speculation as to the nature of Christ, before adding a clause which is generally given far less attention: 'and dwelt amongst us' (John 1:14). Thus, the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel recognises that the heart of Christian existence is not simply a statement about the nature of Christ in abstracto, but rather an affirmation that this reality found its embodiment within the natural and cultural aspects of everyday Mediterranean society. Even one of the most exalted theological passages in the New Testament strongly encourages us to pay these features our closest attention.

Notes

1 The terms 'Christian' and 'Christianity' are anachronistic for at least the early part of this period, until the end of the first century CE and even for some time beyond. Not only was the word Christianos (which appears only three times in the New Testament and on each occasion as an outsider designation: Acts 11:26 and 26:28; 1 Pet. 4:16) not used by those who followed Christ as a term of self-designation until later, but 'Christian' conveys such particular associations from the later course of the movement as to obscure important aspects of its rather fluid and developing identity at this early time. For the first century CE, 'Christ-movement' and 'Christ-follower' are helpful alternatives for Christianity and Christian, but other expressions are also used.
2 As already noted, the coastline of Europe is about 13,000 km, whereas that of Africa is 5,000 km and Asia 6,000 km (Semple 1932: 5–7).
3 Herodotus did not dispute a flat earth, but argued against Europe, Asia and Libya being the same size and professed ignorance as to whether Europe was surrounded by sea.
4 On the use of models in the analysis of ancient social phenomena, see Esler 1987: 6–16, 1995b: 4–8; Elliott 1995: 36–59.
5 A detailed account of the way Garnsey's views on this subject (1998b, but originally published in 1974) have been received is provided in the addendum by Walter Schiedel at pp. 24–7 of this essay.
6 One should also include here ex-colonial offshoots of these cultures, such as Australia and New Zealand.

Bibliography

Abu-Lughod, L. (1986) Veiled Sentiments: Honor and Poetry in a Bedouin Society. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.
Almagor, E. and Skinner, J. (eds) (2013) Ancient Ethnography: New Approaches. London: Bloomsbury.
Barth, F. (1969) 'Introduction', in Barth, F. (ed.) Ethnic Groups and Boundaries: The Social Organization of Culture Difference. London: George Allen and Unwin, pp. 9–38.
Barton, C. A. (2001) Roman Honor: The Fire in the Bones. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.
Berger, P. (1969) The Social Reality of Religion. London: Faber and Faber.
Bourdieu, P. (1965) 'The sentiment of honour in Kabyle society', in Peristiany 1965, pp. 191–241.
Bowden, H. (2010) Mystery Cults in the Ancient World. London: Thames and Hudson.
Brown, P. (1972) Religion and Society in the Age of Augustine. London: Faber and Faber.
Brown, P. (1978) The Making of Late Antiquity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
Brown, P. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.
Brown, T. G. (2003) Spirit in the Writings of John: Johannine Pneumatology in Social-Scientific Perspective. JSNT Supplement Series 253. London and New York: T & T Clark International.
Brunt, P. A. and Moore, J. M. (1967) Res Gestae Divi Augusti: The Achievements of the Divine Augustus. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
Buell, D. K. (2005) Why This New Race: Ethnic Reasoning in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.
Cameron, A. (1991) Christianity and the Rhetoric of Empire: The Development of Christian Discourse. Sather Classical Lectures, No. 51. Berkeley, CA and Oxford, UK: University of California Press.
Cameron, A. (1993) The Mediterranean World in Late Antiquity. London and New York: Routledge.
Campbell, D. (1964) Honour, Family and Patronage: A Study of Institutions and Moral Values in a Greek Mountain Village. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press.
Cary, M. (1949) The Geographic Background of Greek and Roman History. Oxford, UK: The Clarendon Press.
Croke, B. and Harries, J. (1982) Religious Conflict in Fourth-Century Rome: A Documentary Study. Sources in Ancient History. Sydney: Sydney University Press.

Davis, J. (1977) People of the Mediterranean. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Dilke, O. A. W. (1985) Greek and Roman Maps. London: Thames and Hudson.

Elliott, J. (1995) Social-Scientific Criticism of the New Testament. London: SPCK.

Engels, D. (1990) Roman Corinth: An Alternative Model for the Classical City. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Esler, P. F. (1987) Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lucan Theology. SNTS Monograph Series, 57. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Esler, P. F. (1994) The First Christians in Their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Criticism. London and New York: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (ed.) (1995a) Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context. London and New York: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (1995b) 'Introduction: Models, context and Kerygma in New Testament interpretation', in Esler 1995a, pp. 1–20.

Esler, P. F. (1995c) 'God's honour and Rome's triumph: Responses to the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE in three Jewish apocalypses', in Esler 1995a, pp. 239–58.

Esler, P. F. (2003) Conflict and Identity in Romans: The Social Setting of Paul's Letter. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Esler, P. F. (2007) 'From Ioudaioi to children of God: The development of a non-ethnic group identity in the Gospel of John', in Hagedorn, Crook and Stewart 2007, pp. 106–37.

Esler, P. F. (2009) 'Judean ethnic identity in Josephus against Apion', in Rodgers, Z. with Daly-Denton, M. and McKinley, A. F. 2009, pp. 73–91.

Esler, P. F. (2011a) Sex, Wives, and Warriors: Reading Biblical Narrative with Its Ancient Audience. Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock.

Esler, P. F. (2011b) 'Judean ethnic identity and the purpose of Hebrews', in McGowan and Richards 2011, pp. 469–89.

Esler, P. F. (2013) 'Judean ethnic identity and the Matthean Jesus', in Von Gemünden, Horrell and Küchler 2013, pp. 193–210.

Esler, P. F. (2016) 'Giving the Kingdom to an ethnos that will bear its fruit: Ethnic and Christ-movement identities in Matthew', in Gurtner, Macaskill and Pennington 2016, pp. 177–96.

Esler, P. F. (2017) Babatha's Orchard: The Yadin Papyri and an Ancient Jewish Family Tale Retold. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Finley, M. I. (1985 [1973]) The Ancient Economy. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press. (Second edition, with supplementary notes, (1985) Harmondsworth: Penguin Books).

Flohr, M. and Wilson, A. (2016) 'Roman craftsmen and traders: Toward an intellectual history', in Wilson and Flohr 2016, pp. 23–54.

Foster, G. M. (1967) 'Peasant society and the image of limited good', in Potter, Diaz and Foster, pp. 300–23.

Garnsey, P. (1998a) Cities, Peasants and Food in Classical Antiquity: Essays in Social and Economic History. Edited with addenda by Walter Schiedel. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Garnsey, P. (1998b) 'Aspects of the decline of the urban aristocracy in the Empire', in Garnsey 1998a, pp. 3–27.

Garnsey, P. (1998c) 'Peasants in ancient Roman society', in Garnsey 1998a, pp. 91–106.

Garnsey, P. (1998d) 'Non-slave labour in the Roman world', in Garnsey 1998a, pp. 134–50.

Garnsey, P., Hopkins K. and Whittaker, C. R. (eds) (1983) Trade in the Ancient Economy. London: Chatto & Windus.

Garnsey, P. and Saller, R. (1987) The Roman Empire: Economy, Society and Culture. London: Duckworth.

Giardina, A. (ed.) (1986) Società romana e impero tardoantico. Vol. 3. Le Merci, gli insediamenti. Rome: Laterza.

Gilmore, D. D. (ed.) (1987) Honor and Shame and the Unity of the Mediterranean. American Anthropological Association Special Publication, No. 22. Washington, DC: American Anthropological Association.

Gurtner, D. M., Macaskill, G. and Pennington, J. T. (eds) (2016) In the Fullness of Time: Essays on Christology, Creation, and Eschatology in Honor of Richard Bauckham. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publishing.

Hagedorn, A. C., Crook, Z. A. and Stewart, E. (eds) (2007) In Other Words: Essays on Social Science Methods and the New Testament in Honor of Jerome H. Neyrey. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Phoenix Press.

Hägg, T. (1983) The Novel in Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Harland, P. A. (2003) Associations, Synagogues and Congregations: Claiming a Place in Ancient Mediterranean Society. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Harland, P. A. (2009) Dynamics of Identity in the World of the Early Christians: Associations, Judeans, and Cultural Minorities. New York and London: Continuum/T & T Clark.

Harland, P. A. (2014) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. II North Coast of the Black Sea, Asia Minor. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und did Kunde der ältere Kirche. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Harris, W. V. (1989) Ancient Literacy. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Harvey, D. S. (2016) 'Face in Galatians: "Boasting in the cross" as reconfigured honour in Paul's letter', PhD dissertation submitted to the University of Manchester.

Henderson, M. (1989) 'Handbook on electioneering' in Cicero, volume 28. Loeb Library. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, pp. 739–91.

Herzfeld, M. (1984) 'The horns of the Mediterraneanist dilemma', American Ethnologist 11: 439–54.

Herzfeld, M. (1987) Anthropology Through the Looking Glass: Critical Ethnography in the Margins of Europe. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Hopkins, K. (1983) Death and Renewal. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Hordern, P. and Purcell, N. (2000) The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Horrell, D. G. (2011) '"Race", "nation", "people": Ethnic identity construction in 1 Peter 2:9', New Testament Studies 58: 123–43.

Horrell, D. G. (2016) 'Ethnicisation, marriage and early Christian identity: Critical reflections on 1 Corinthians 7, 1 Peter 3 and modern New Testament scholarship', New Testament Studies 62: 439–60.

Hutchinson, J. and Smith, A. (eds) (1996a) Ethnicity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hutchinson, J. and Smith, A. (eds) (1996b) 'Introduction', in Hutchinson and Smith 1996a, pp. 3–14.

Hylen, S. E. (2015) A Modest Apostle: Thecla and the History of Women in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kaplan, D. (1968) 'The formal–substantive controversy in economic anthropology: Reflections on its wider implications', Southwestern Journal of Anthropology 24: 228–51.

Kirk, G. S. and Raven, J. E. (1971*) The Presocratic Philosophers*. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (2016) 'Luke's geography: Knowledge, sources and spatial conception', in Verheyden, J. and Kloppenborg, J. S. (eds) Luke on Jesus, Paul, and Earliest Christianity: What Did He Really Know? Biblical Tools and Studies, vol. 29. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters, pp. 101–43.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (forthcoming) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. III. Ptolemaic and Early Roman Egypt. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der ältere Kirche. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Kloppenborg, J. S. and Ascough, R. S. (2011) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. I Attica, Central Greece, Macedonia, Thrace. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und did Kunde der ältere Kirche. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Lendon, J. E. (1997) Empire of Honour: The Art of Government in the Roman World. Oxford, UK: The Clarendon Press.

Lenski, G. and Lenski, J. (1987) Human Societies: An Introduction to Macrosociology, fifth edition. New York: McGraw-Hill.

Malina, B. J. (1986) 'Religion in the world of Paul: A preliminary sketch', Biblical Theology Bulletin 16: 92–101.

Malina, B. J. (1994) 'Religion in the imagined New Testament world: More social science lenses', Scriptura 51: 1–26.

Malina, B. J. (1996) 'Mediterranean sacrifice: Dimensions of domestic and political religion', Biblical Theology Bulletin 26: 26–44.

Malina, B. J. (2001) The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology, third edition, revised and expanded (first edition 1981). Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Mann, M. (1986) Sources of Social Power: A History of Power from the Beginning to A. D. 1760. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Mason, S. (2007) 'Jews, Judaeans, Judaizing, Judaism: Problems of categorization in ancient history', Journal for the Study of Judaism 38: 457–512.

Mason, S. (2016) Orientation to the History of Roman Judaea. Eugene, OR: Cascade.

Mason, S. and Esler, P. F. (2017; forthcoming) 'Judaean and Christ-follower identities: Grounds for a distinction', New Testament Studies 63.

Mattingly, D. J. and Salmon, J. (eds) (2001) Economies Beyond Agriculture in the Classical World. London: Routledge.

McGowan, A. B. and Richards, K. H. (eds) (2011) Method & Meaning: Essays on New Testament Interpretation in Honor of Harold A. Attridge. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Millet, P. (1989) 'Patronage and its avoidance in classical Athens', in Wallace-Hadrill 1989, pp. 15–47.

Moxnes, H. (1991) 'Patron-client relations and the new community in Luke-Acts', in Neyrey 1991, pp. 241–68.

Neyrey, J. H. (ed.) (1991) The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Nolan, P. and Lenski, G. (2014) Human Societies: An Introduction to Macrosociology, thirteenth edition. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Nongbri, B. (2015) Before Religion: A History of a Modern Concept. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Oakman, D. E. (1993) 'The ancient economy and St. John's apocalypse', Listening: Journal of Religion and Culture 28: 200–14.

Oakman, D. E. (1996) 'The ancient economy', in Rohrbaugh 1996, pp. 126–143.

Oprisko, R. L. (2012) Honor: A Phenomenology. New York: Routledge.

Paton, W. R. (trans.) (1915) The Greek Anthology. Five Volumes. Volume 3. The Loeb Library. London and New York: William Heinemann and G. P. Putnam.

Peristiany, J. G. (ed.) (1965) Honour and Shame: The Values of Mediterranean Society. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

Phoenix, A. (2010) 'Ethnicities', in Weatherell and Mohanty 2010, pp. 297–320.

Pitt-Rivers, J. (1961 [1955]) People of the Sierra. Chicago, IL: The University of Chicago Press.

Pitt-Rivers, J. (ed.) (1963) Mediterranean Countrymen: Essays in the Social Anthropology of the Mediterranean. Paris–La Haye: Mouton & Co.

Pitt-Rivers, J. (1965) 'Honour and social status', in Peristiany 1965, pp. 19–77.

Pitt-Rivers, J. (1977) The Fate of Shechem or the Politics of Sex: Essays in the Anthropology of the Mediterranean. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Polanyi, K. (1944) The Great Transformation. Boston, MA: Beacon Press.

Potter, J. M., Diaz, M. N. and Foster, G. M. (eds) (1967) Peasant Society: A Reader. Boston, MA: Little, Brown and Company.

Rathbone, D. W. (1981) 'The development of agriculture in the "Ager Cosanus" during the Roman Republic: Problems of evidence and interpretation', Journal of Roman Studies 71: 10–23.

Redfield, R. (1956) Peasant Society and Culture. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Rodgers, Z., with Daly-Denton, M. and McKinley, A. F. (2009) A Wandering Galilean: Essays in Honour of Sean Freyne. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (ed.) (1996) The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Saller, R. (1982) Personal Patronage under the Early Empire. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Semple, E. C. (1932) The Geography of the Mediterranean Region: Its Relation to Ancient History. London: Constable & Co Ltd.

Smith, W. C. (1962) The Meaning and End of Religion: A New Approach to the Religious Traditions of Mankind. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Stone, J. and Dennis, R. M. (eds) (2003) Race and Ethnicity: Comparative and Theoretical Approaches. Blackwell Readers in Sociology. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Thomson, J. O. (1948) History of Ancient Geography. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Von Gemünden, P., Horrell, D. G. and Küchler, M. (eds) (2013) Jesus − Gestalt und Gestaltungen: Rezeptionen des Galiläers in Wissenschaft, Kirche und Gesellschaft: FS Für Gerd Theissen. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Walker, D. S. (1965) The Mediterranean Lands. London: Methuen.

Wallace-Hadrill, A. (ed.) (1989) Patronage in Ancient Society. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Weatherell, M. and Mohanty, C. T. (eds) (2010) The Sage Handbook of Identities. Los Angeles, CA: Sage.

Wilson, A. (2001) 'Timgad and textile production', in Mattingly and Simon 2001, pp. 271–96.

Wilson, A. and Flohr, M. (eds) (2016) Urban Craftsmen and Traders in the Roman World: Oxford Studies in the Roman Economy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

2
ARMIES, EMPERORS AND BUREAUCRATS

Jill Harries

In 417 CE, the Spanish Christian Orosius recalled, in his History Against the Pagans, how Christ came into a Roman world united and at peace:

> In the whole world there was one peace among all, not because of the cessation of wars, but because of their abolition . . . that first and greatest census was taken, since in this one name of Caesar all the peoples of the great nations took oath, and at the same time, through participation in the census, were made part of one society.
>
> (Orosius, 7.2; Deferrari 1964 trans.: 287)

Writing at a time when Christianity had triumphed over its religious competitors to become the dominant religion of the Roman empire, Orosius was aware, as a citizen of the empire himself, that the character of that empire, its unity, its stability for much of its history, and its institutions had had a large part to play in its success. This chapter is about the armies, who defended and policed the empire, the emperors, who were, on occasion, persecutors and, after Constantine (r. 306–337), promoters of the Christian faith, and the administrators who ran a system that was, by modern standards, amateur, yet surprisingly effective.

Although Roman power depended for its daily functioning on the consent of the elite among the governed, military force remained the ultimate deterrent against revolt. Nowhere was that more clearly shown than in the fate, which befell what was, by imperial standards, an obscure city on the edge of empire – Jerusalem. For four years (66–70 CE), the Jewish people revolted from their Roman masters (Berlin and Overman 2002). In 70, the emperor's son, Titus, took the city of the apostles, and their fellow-Jews experienced the consequences of their disobedience:

> The army having no victims either for slaughter or plunder, through lack of all objects on which to vent their rage . . . Caesar ordered the whole city and the temple to be razed to the ground, leaving only the loftiest of the towers . . . All the rest of the wall encompassing the city was so completely levelled with the ground as to leave future visitors to the spot no ground for believing it had ever been inhabited.
>
> (Josephus, JW 7.1.1; Thackeray 1928 trans.: 505)

Figure 2.1   Coin depicting the 71 CE triumph of Vespasian celebrating the defeat of the Jews. Copyright the University of St Andrews

Rebel prisoners, too, suffered punishment that was both painful and public. At games held in honour of his brother, Domitian's, birthday, 2,500 Jewish captives were killed by wild beasts in the arena, burned alive or forced to fight to the death as gladiators for the entertainment of the public (Josephus, JW 7.3.1). Others, including the ring-leaders of the rebellion, were preserved to adorn the joint triumph of Vespasian and Titus at Rome in 71 CE.

Although revolts from the ruling power were rare, the exemplary case of Judea was a reminder of the base on which Roman power ultimately rested, that of armed force and, if necessary, coercion based on terror. Although the bulk of the Roman world was at peace for the first two centuries CE and the visible presence of the armed forces was limited, apart from in the frontier areas, the military origins of the Roman state were never forgotten. Military vocabulary, such as the word militia, which meant both armed and administrative service, applied in both civil and military contexts. Even Plutarch (c. 45–c. 120 CE), meditating on the histories of Greece and Rome in peaceful Chaeronea, was aware of the underlying realities of life under Roman rule: 'do not have great pride or confidence in your crown, for you see the soldier's boot just above your head' (Precepts of Statecraft 17).

The armies

Armies and empire

Most Roman legions were stationed on the frontiers of the empire. In mainland Europe, the main frontiers were the Rhine and the Danube. In the east, the wide lands between Roman Syria and the great Parthian empire, with their rich mix of cultures and peoples, formed a zone within which the two great powers struggled, expensively and indecisively, for dominance. To the south, Roman North Africa was occasionally disrupted by raids by sub-Saharan peoples. Elsewhere in the empire, smaller forces were stationed for garrison duty and to deal with local emergencies; responsibility for routine policing was shared with city administrations (Fuhrmann 2011).

Emperors were commanders-in-chief of the armed forces (Campbell 1983). Under the Republic, military glory had been the main passport to political success and, despite Augustus' advice to his successors that the empire should remain within its existing boundaries, this convention would still apply to emperors. Even the unwarlike Claudius I (r. 41–54 CE), accepted his military obligations, with his launch of his conquest of Britain in 43 CE. However, the Spanish-born Trajan (r. 98–117 CE), who rose through a military career to be adopted as his heir by Nerva (r. 96–98 CE), was the most spectacularly aggressive expander of the Roman empire since Augustus: two wars in Dacia (roughly modern Romania), which were to be commemorated in Trajan's Column at Rome, resulted in the annexation of that area as a new province in 106, and, at the time of his death in 117, he was dealing with the adverse effects of his attempt to expand the Roman empire eastwards beyond the Euphrates into Mesopotamia.

Trajan's successor, Hadrian (r. 117–138 CE), however, signalled a change in policy. Having abandoned Trajan's eastern conquests, he engaged in no further expansion. However, he did travel more extensively in the Roman empire than had any of his predecessors, visiting armies en route and, we are told, participating in their austere lifestyle (Historia Augusta, Life of Hadrian 10); the emperor remained a soldier, but not a conqueror. Not surprisingly, the physical presence of the emperor encouraged local initiatives; Hadrian's Wall, built in the 120s in Britain, was the material consequence of the imperial presence in that remote corner of the Roman world. His example established that glory was no longer a prerequisite for success, a lesson well learned by his sedentary successor, Antoninus Pius (r. 138–161 CE), who hardly ever left Rome.

By the later second century, however, military involvement on the part of an emperor was no longer a matter only of his choice. Faced with serious military pressures on the Danube frontier, Marcus Aurelius (r. 161–180 CE), whose natural bent was for Stoic philosophy, felt obliged to spend long periods in camp (although his son and successor, Commodus (r. 176–192 CE), got away with a patched-up peace and a return to Rome in 180). Further military activity in Britain (206–211) and against the Parthians took place under Septimius Severus (r. 193–211) and his successors. In the 230s, however, a development with ominous implications for Rome occurred in Parthia, with the accession of the new, aggressive Sassanian dynasty in what now became, again, Persia. Pledged to renew the glories of the ancient empire of Cyrus the Great, the new Persian kings adopted a policy of active, albeit sporadic, hostility towards their Roman neighbours (sources in Dodgeon and Lieu 1991). For several centuries, the fortunes of war continued to fluctuate. The Roman emperor, Valerian, was defeated and captured by Shapur I in 260. In 298, the tables were turned by the Caesar Galerius, who forced a humiliating treaty on the Persians. Late in his reign, Constantine sought to expand his empire yet further east – on the grounds that Persia was persecuting his Christians – but died before achieving anything. Intermittent warfare and sieges persisted for much of the fourth century. When, however, the invasion of Persia led by the last pagan emperor, Julian, proved a spectacular failure, resulting in his death in 363, Christian writers took gleeful note of this apparent failure of the pagan gods to protect their own (Lieu and Lieu 1986: 91–134).

Figure 2.2 Roman army from Trajan's column in Rome, showing emperor, standards and army. Photo J. C. N. Coulston

Emperors made by armies

The Roman armies had also an occasional, but crucial, political role in the determination of the imperial succession. Augustus (r. 30 BCE–14 CE) became Rome's first de facto sole ruler after a series of civil wars, culminating in his victory over Mark Antony; his successor Tiberius (r. 14–37 CE) had a long and successive military career prior to his accession. For emperors who were proclaimed at Rome, the support, or at least the acquiescence, of the elite corps, the praetorian guard, was essential. This was true of Tiberius' successor, Gaius Caligula (r. 37–41 CE), who relied on the backing of Macro, commander of the guard, in 37; of Claudius I, who was proclaimed by the guard, in defiance of the Senate, in 41; and of Nero (r. 54–68 CE) in 54. However, experience was to show that the power of the Praetorians was limited if their preferred candidate lacked appeal to the armies of the frontiers. When the Praetorians sought to impose their own man, Otho, on the empire in 68, they failed; Otho was overthrown by the armies of the north under Vitellius (who in his turn was supplanted by Vespasian). In 193, the Praetorians, having murdered the previous emperor, put the empire up for auction between two rival candidates (Dio, Roman History Epitome 74.11). The 'winner', that is the man who promised the highest donative, was to last a mere 66 days, before being overthrown, again by a northern army, this time under the ultimately successful pretender, Septimius Severus. The praetorian guard was finally disbanded by Constantine, after his takeover of Rome in 312.

The events of the years 68–69, known as the 'Year of the Four Emperors', revealed, as Tacitus observed (Histories 1.4), that emperors could be made elsewhere than in Rome. It also revealed the potentially catastrophic effects for the whole empire of a disputed succession as the Roman legions of the Rhine under Vitellius, the Danube (under Antonius Primus, who declared for Vespasian) and of Syria became embroiled in a war of Roman against Roman. This costly experience was not to be repeated for over 120 years, although crisis did loom again in 96, after Domitian's assassination left a vacancy with no obvious heir. Disaster was averted by the Senate's nomination of the pacific Nerva and his subsequent, (perhaps forced) adoption of Trajan. However, in 193, the death of Commodus without issue triggered a more prolonged period of civil war, as Septimius Severus, governor of Pannonia, fought it out in the east with the governors of Syria (194–195) and Britain (196–197). Being a usurper, Septimius' position required legitimation through further military victories, hence a successful attack on Parthia in 197–198. But he had also to do more to win and retain the favour of the legions: substantial increases in pay ensued and the abolition of the anachronistic rules forbidding soldiers to marry. His son, Antoninus Caracalla (r. 211–217), took the militarisation of the administration further, by adopting a soldier's lifestyle and gratuitously snubbing his non-military senatorial advisers (Dio 78.17.3).

The poorly documented third century was a period of imperial and military instability (Potter 2004). Pressures on all the frontiers strained Roman military capabilities and rendered the job of emperor strenuous and often untenable. The inability of successive emperors to impose themselves on the whole empire or establish stable dynasties allowed army candidates to bid for local or pan–imperial power virtually at will. From a distance, the picture seems one of chaos, with emperors achieving reigns of, on average, less than two years. But this picture is misleading. Although the turnover of emperors was high, they came often from the same military milieu, and formed, unofficially, a college of generals (Syme 1971: 194–200), whose combined efforts countered the military threats from the east and central Europe and prevented the threatened fragmentation of the whole imperial structure. Second, the enthusiasm of local armies for local, unauthorised generals should not be ascribed only, or even mainly, to self-serving irresponsibility on the part of the soldiers or the communities they were charged to defend. Irruptions of alien peoples across vulnerable frontiers put pressure on local leaders to find local emperors to give themselves the operational efficiency and boost to morale produced by having an emperor on the spot. Thus, for example, in 260, the Gallic armies proclaimed one Postumus as Augustus. So effective was he that his 'Gallic Empire' lasted, under himself and his successors, for 14 years, until its reintegration into the Roman empire by Aurelian.

For much of the fourth century, emperors remained overtly military in character and the style of their rule. In 284, Diocletian (r. 284–305), having publicly murdered or defeated in battle several rivals, inaugurated a period of comparative stability; he and his colleagues campaigned regularly on the European frontiers and, with spectacular success, against Persia. Constantine asserted his rights as heir to his father, Constantius I, through his proclamation by the army at York in 306 (Hartley 2006; Barnes 2011: 62–6). In 324–325, Constantine won control of the eastern empire by defeating his last surviving rival, Licinius, and became the empire's sole Augustus for the next 12 years.

On the death of Constantine in May 337, the smooth succession of his three surviving sons was assured only by the prompt massacre of other family members in Constantinople. In 360, however, Julian, the so-called 'Apostate', the younger son of one of the murdered claimants, was himself proclaimed Augustus by the Gallic army in Paris. After Julian's death in Persia in 363, the eastern army in its turn successfully asserted its right of choice of emperor, with the selection of Valentinian I, who was acceptable in the west because he had also served previously in Gaul. The most serious challenges to central authority emanated from Gaul and Britain: Magnentius, ruler of the west from 350, was suppressed after three years in 353, the Spanish-born Magnus Maximus survived as Augustus of Gaul, Spain and Britain for five years (383–388) before his overthrow by Theodosius I at Aquileia in northern Italy, and a plethora of usurpers from Britain added to the mayhem in the western empire in the first decade of the fifth century. From c. 400 onwards, unstable coalitions of 'barbarian' federates, often no more than nominally in Roman service and always with their own agendas, would increasingly dominate both the military and the political landscape of the western empire.

A soldier's life

For the first two centuries CE, the structure of the Roman army was based on legions, nominally consisting of 6,000 men, divided into cohorts and centuries; the first-ranked centurion had the title of 'primi pili'. Their job description consisted of more than just fighting, forced marches or building fortified camps every night; Roman soldiers were also the builders of the Roman roads and were directed by highly skilled army surveyors, whose expertise could also be translated to civilian life. From the late third century, Diocletian and Constantine worked to establish two distinct types of military organisation (although the personnel could overlap). Frontier forces, or limitanei, were settled more or less permanently on frontier lands to act as forward lines in the event of invasions; this loose form of organisation could include non-Roman peoples, like the Franks, settled by treaty and known as federates, who would also provide soldiers and even generals for Rome. Alone, however, they could not be expected to contain a major threat. This was the job of the soldiers in the central striking forces, the comitatenses, which had started to evolve by the mid third century, and perhaps earlier. These were commanded by the emperor in person or a chief general, and could move swiftly to deal with crises. At the same time, the civil administration was gradually separated from the military, with the creation of 'masters of the horse/foot', and of duces ('leaders') with military spheres of command often taking in more than one province.

Figure 2.3   Fresco of a soldier in the Via Latina Catacomb in Rome, mid fourth century CE; Photo
           J. C. N. Coulston

The rewards for soldiers were substantial. In the first century, the Roman citizenship was a desired proof of status, and Claudius I established a procedure of issuing diplomas to serving auxiliaries, confirming their citizenship and other privileges. Although they were not allowed legally to marry, soldiers whose units became settled in one area acquired unofficial households and children, whose inheritance could be safeguarded by special testamentary provisions. Given the uncertainties of a solder's life, it also made sense to allow soldiers exemption from most legal formalities in the making of a will, although it was stipulated that oral requests had to be properly witnessed (Digest 29.1.24) and that an unwritten indication of intention was valid only if the soldier died while on service or within a year of his discharge (Ulpian, Tituli 23.10). Soldiers were outside – or above – civilian legal procedure. They had the right to have their cases heard by their own military courts, and civilians in dispute with soldiers were obliged to conform to military justice. Higher ranking soldiers might also find themselves acting as solvers of disputes in the local community. On discharge, veterans were rewarded by the state with money or land. They could receive the right of conubium, which meant that their children, even by a non-citizen mother, would be Roman citizens.

They were also immune from some taxes and were not liable to punishments inflicted on the lower classes, the humiliores. Glory and reputation were all-important, hence the emphasis placed on military decorations, such as the civic crown (corona civica), for being first over a defended wall. So after the fall of Jerusalem in 70, Titus issued the expected rewards:

> Calling up each by name he applauded them as they came forward . . . He then placed crowns of gold upon their heads, presented them with golden neck-chains, little golden spears and standards made of silver and promoted each man to a higher rank; he further assigned to them out of the spoils silver and gold and raiments and other booty in abundance.
>
> (Josephus, JW 7.1.3; Thackeray 1928 trans.: 509)

Despite all these forms of recognition of their importance, the life of a Roman soldier was often hard and always strenuous. Recruits were taught to march fast, at an average speed of four miles an hour (in summer) over five hours, rising to nearly five miles per hour with 'the fuller step' (Vegetius, 1.9). They were also trained to jump, climb, swim and carry a load of up to sixty pounds, as well as perform weapons drill. Punishments for indiscipline and, especially cowardice, were harsh; in the most extreme cases, one in ten of a failed unit could be executed ('decimation'). In 14 CE the insecurity of the new emperor Tiberius encouraged the armies of Pannonia and the Rhine to plead for better conditions:

> [o]ld men, several of them with their bodies disfigured by wounds, were serving their thirtieth or fortieth year. There was no end to military service even when they were discharged, as they remained under the standards and performed the same tasks under another name. If any survived all these dangers, he was dragged off to a far away country, where he received a so-called plot of land that was in fact waterlogged marshes or uncultivated mountainsides. Indeed, military service was unremitting and unprofitable.
>
> (Tacitus, Annals 1.17; Campbell 1994: 20)

Soldiers who ran away, disobeyed orders, passed information to the enemy, or pretended to be ill to avoid having to fight could expect public torture and execution 'in full view of the soldiers, as an example' (Menander, On Military Matters III). The same fate awaited those who renounced their oath of allegiance. This category could include Christians, although it is not clear how far Christian recruits could have reconciled their principles over religious rites and sacrifices with the cultic observances required in army life. In 298, at Tingis in Mauretania, the Christian centurion Marcellus was executed with the sword for 'publicly renouncing his oath of allegiance and having, moreover, put on the record statements full of madness' (Acts of Marcellus 5; Musurillo 1972: 250–9). But, although the army was to be substantially Christianised in the course of the fourth century, few seem to have been put off the career by the Christian horror of shedding blood.

Emperors

The system of one-man rule over the whole Roman empire was created by Augustus; the name 'Augustus' was adopted as a title by all subsequent emperors. Augustus' constitutional position was based on his simultaneous holding of the powers of several of the traditional offices of the Roman res publica. The most important of these was the consulship; the consular imperium, which extended beyond the consul's year of office, enabled the emperor to retain through his legates command of the most militarised of the provinces (mainly Gaul/Germany, various Danubian provinces and Syria). In addition, the power of the tribune of the people (tribunicia potestas) enabled Augustus and his successors to depict themselves as acting with the authority, or in place of, the sovereign people. By virtue of his imperium, the emperor had control of foreign policy, because diplomatic strategies aimed at containing threats from outside the empire could be backed with armed force where necessary.

Figure 2.4   Portrait head of Augustus, 25–1 BCE; Courtesy of the J. Paul Getty Museum; object number 78.AA.261

As the soldiers' paymaster, the emperor also had overall charge of taxation; a new military treasury was set up in 6 CE, funded by the proceeds of an inheritance tax. Hence, too, the (probably non-existent) census reported by Luke (2.1–3) decreed by Caesar Augustus, 'when Quirinus was governor of Syria'. In addition, the emperor derived powers to patronise and bring relief to hard-pressed petitioners from his huge personal wealth, which tended to become confused with the public finances, despite the existence of separate treasuries (the public aerarium and the fiscus).

Although much was to change in the style and manner in which imperial powers were exercised, their basic structure remained remarkably consistent. Thus, in the area of finance, emperors in the fourth and fifth centuries could still produce radical reform of the taxation system. Diocletian, for example, regularised the assessment of taxation under the two headings of the iugum, based on land, or the produce of land, and the caput, based on living things, including animals as well as people, while still retaining an element of local flexibility as revenue-raising systems in the Roman empire had always done. In the honour-oriented society of the Roman empire (see Chapter 1, this volume, and Lendon 1997), it is no surprise that military glory also remained a priority for fourth-century emperors, and the theme continued into the Byzantine empire. However, some of the more pacific emperors of the fifth century laid greater emphasis on Christian piety than war, preferring to achieve their victories (if any) through others.

The administration of the late empire was very different from the system established by Augustus. Under the Republic, Rome and the provinces had been run by magistrates using methods similar to those used in regulating their own households. Governors and other magistrates, like fathers of families, relied on an advisory council, consilium. Following this practice, Augustus established a similar advisory council, consisting largely of senior senators (Crook 1955). His successors followed his lead, but the composition of the council changed over time and, by the third century, had become more overtly military, with precedence being given to the praetorian prefects in preference to senators. The consilium, renamed the consistorium, was formalised in the fourth century and consisted of various heads of civil service departments, provincial supremos and generals, along with special advisers, whose status was advertised through their designation as comites consistoriani.

Over time, the administration centred on the emperor himself also became more formalised. From Augustus onwards, new recruits, often for newly created posts, were drawn from the non-political wealthy and educated elite, the equites; equestrian offices included the highly sensitive posts of prefect of the praetorian guard and prefect of the emperor's personal province, Egypt. Unlike members of the Roman Senate, equites cannot be described as a class with any distinctive political identity or agenda of their own. They were attractive imperial servants because their wealth, education and social status, in conjunction with their complete dependence on the emperor's patronage, made them both loyal (as a rule) and socially acceptable to the elites in the empire as a whole with whom they had to deal. By the second century, equites were established in all the main branches of government. Finance was especially important: equestrian procurators ran the imperial estates, which included other commercial ventures such as mining, all over the provinces, and governors were advised to keep out of their way. Imperial wealth was enhanced by periodic confiscations of property from traitors, rebels and other criminals condemned on capital charges, notably by Septimius Severus, who appointed specific officials to handle the proceeds after the civil wars of 193–197, as well as by taxation receipts.

Imperial women

Republican notables had expected to run their households and, specifically, their correspondence, with the help of their familia, which meant both family and household, including slaves and freedmen (Weaver 1972). Early emperors relied heavily on family, retainers and friends, not always to their advantage. Claudius was allegedly too much influenced by his various wives and freedmen, who exploited his absent-mindedness and poor eyesight. With supreme power came a court culture of intrigue (Spawforth 2007: 121–232), especially over the imperial succession. Augustus' wife, Livia, was accused of engineering the succession for her son, Tiberius; Agrippina, Claudius' wife, perhaps poisoned her husband to ensure the succession for her son, Nero; and in 117, Plotina, Trajan's wife was suspected of fixing the succession for her favourite, Hadrian. Imperial security depended on the reliability of the domestic staff; both Domitian in 96 and Commodus in 192 were the victims of plots organised and carried out by members of the imperial household. In late antiquity too, those intimately involved with the emperor's well-being, such as palace eunuchs, were suspected of running government behind the scenes (Tougher 2002).

Romans understood that power comes in many forms and their words for power (potentia, the ability to get things done) acknowledged that fact: imperium (right of command), potestas (legal power), auctoritas (authority) and gratia (influence). No woman could hold imperial office, command an army or pass a law. Neither was it acceptable that she attend councils of state. This limited the amount of official power that women could wield in the imperial system. Nevertheless, there were widespread perceptions that imperial women could 'get things done'. Emperors did not rule in isolation from their families or dynasty. The Julio-Claudian dynasty, down to 68, was held together by a line of succession that ran from Augustus from mother to daughter. Empresses received public honours: for example, at the end of the second century, Septimius Severus designated his Syrian wife, Julia Domna, the 'mother of the camp'. After Severus' death in 211, Julia, a respected intellectual in her own right, retained power and influence through her son, Caracalla who, unusually, allowed her to answer petitions on his behalf and the Severan dynasty thereafter was perpetuated through women down to 235 (Levick 2007).

With the rise of Christianity, imperial women acquired a new prominence: Constantine's mother, Helena, was his representative at Rome from 312 and an active patron of Christian sites in both Rome and the Holy Land; her daughter, Constantina, patronised the cult of St Agnes in Rome in the 340s (Harries 2014). The accession of child-emperors (McEvoy 2013) permitted the exercise of extraordinary influence by Justina, the Arian mother of Valentinian II (and opponent of Ambrose of Milan), in the 380s and of Galla Placidia, mother of Valentinian III, from 425 (Sivan 2011). In Constantinople, Eudoxia, the empress of Arcadius (395–408), feuded bitterly with the bishop, John Chrysostom, and her daughters, headed by the ostentatiously virginal Pulcheria, gave to the court of their little brother, Theodosius II, a perhaps oppressively devout 'monastic' quality.

Perceptions of empresses, especially in the eastern part of the empire, as having independent power were conditioned by honours previously paid to Hellenistic queens. Because of the suspicions of the male-dominated sources concerning over-powerful women, assertions of petticoat government abound whenever the emperor appeared weak or lacking in dynamic ideas or policies of his own. In fact, court politics were always more complicated. Imperial women, with their privileged access to the male controllers of formal power, were well placed to affect the workings of government, create informal alliances with other courtiers and assist their clients. They had access to 'authority' and 'influence', therefore, even when formally limited as to what they could achieve (Holum 1983 but, on Pulcheria and Theodosius II, see Harries 2013).

The imperial image

Augustus' effectiveness derived in part from his appreciation of the constitutional sensibilities of both allies and opponents. Reassurance could be given to all constituencies through the continuing use of familiar terminologies of power. In 27 BCE, Augustus had 'transferred the republic from my dominion to that of the Senate and People of Rome' (Augustus, Res Gestae 34.1, Brunt and Moore 1988), and had received back the imperial provinces and other powers, ostensibly by free consent of the Senate; his immediate successors were accorded formal recognition by the Senate through a special statute defining their imperium. The notion prevalent in the first century that the Senate at Rome should, at least nominally, choose the emperor was still operative at Rome as late as 455, when the Senate chose one of its own number to replace a recently assassinated (and controversial) incumbent. The outward expression of imperial power, even in the late antique and Byzantine periods, also acknowledged, selectively, some sense of accountability to the people (Kaldellis 2015). Emperors who visited Rome to pay their respects to the symbolic capital of the world, as Constantius II did in 357, were expected to attend public entertainments and exchange pleasantries with the crowd:

> when he presented equestrian games, he enjoyed the witticisms of the plebs, who were neither arrogant nor did they fall short of their traditional freedom, while he too respectfully preserved the proper moderation.
>
> (Ammianus Marcellinus, History 16.10.13, author's trans.)

Despite well-advertised instances of respect for tradition, however, the representation of the emperor changed dramatically between the first and the fourth centuries. From Augustus onwards, Roman imperial art communicated an image of the world which placed the emperor and the state at the centre (Zanker 1988). The successors of Augustus responded in different ways to the pressures on them to conform to a quasi-divine image of imperial rule which took its origins from the habit, well-established in Greek Eastern cities, of offering cult to rulers, be they Hellenistic kings or Roman magistrates. Tiberius was cautious, as was Claudius, but the short-lived and possibly mad Gaius Caligula expected to be worshipped as a god and castigated an unfortunate Jewish embassy for making offerings for him, rather than to him. The omnipresent imperial cult acted as a two-way means of communication, of loyalty from the subjects and of favour on the part of the emperor (Price 1984). Regular celebrations of birthdays and other anniversaries reinforced perceptions of emperors as members of families and dynasties and aimed to promote a sense of unity throughout a highly diverse Roman world. With the deference to local usages characteristic of much of Rome's dealings, the imperial cult was often skilfully imbedded in existing cultic practices (Rives 1995). It was also durable: the Hispellum rescript from Italy in the 330s shows that Christian emperors continued to receive cult (provided blood sacrifice and 'superstition' were avoided).

By the fourth century, the increasingly overt exercise of autocratic rule by emperors was paralleled by the evolution of an ornate court language, indulged in by panegyricists and combined with an ever more elaborate use of ceremonial. It had been normal practice to greet a visiting dignitary with a formal welcoming ceremony – governors had even to be warned not to show boredom during the requisite oration by the local public orator (Ulpian, On the Duties of a Governor 1). By the late third century, the adventus, state arrival, of an emperor was an occasion for ostentatious advertisement of his virtues (MacCormack 1972), even of his divinity:

> Now . . . when from each summit of the Alps, your deity first shone forth, a clearer light spread over all Italy; wonder seized upon all who gazed up . . . But when you came closer and closer and people began to recognise you, all the fields were filled . . . altars were ignited, incense placed upon them, libations of wine were poured, sacrificial victims slain . . . to the immortal gods praises and thanks were sung; they invoked not the god transmitted by conjecture but a visible and present Jupiter near at hand, they adored Hercules not as the stranger but as the emperor.
>
> *(*Latin panegyrics XI. 10.4–5; Nixon and Rodgers 1994: 95)

However, even in these formal settings, communication between emperor and subject was two-way. Imperial panegyricists, while dutifully transmitting what they were expected to say, also reflected the expectations of their audience and hoped for some return for their services. Similarly, the ceremony of adoratio, the kissing of the purple, instituted by Diocletian, although criticised at the time as evidence of oriental absolutism, enabled the emperor to show favour to a subject, as well as allowing the subject to pay homage to the emperor. In this curious fashion, the quasi-divine status of the emperor was fused with the more traditional notions of accessibility, which had characterised the Republican-style princeps.

Emperors and law

Imperial law-making, even in late antiquity, reflected traditional, long-standing legislative practices and precedents; as late as the 530s, Justinian saw Roman legal history as a continuum, stretching back to the time of Romulus, the first king (Constitutio Deo Auctore 1). Emperors, as magistrates, were entitled to issue edicts of general application and instructions (mandata) or letters (epistulae) to their legates in the provinces (Millar 1977: 314–21). Responses to legal queries by individuals as well as officials or representatives of cities were also known as rescripta, replies, or subscripta, notes at the foot of a document. By the early fourth century, edicts and epistulae, along with rescripts, had become the main sources of imperial law. However, problems over both the status (whether of general application or not) and the provenance (by possibly corrupt means) of rescripts led to their sidelining by the early fifth century. Instead, emperors and their administrators tried to impose order on the system by resorting to more refined concepts of 'edictal' or 'general laws' (Justinianic Code 1.14.3, of 426). In 438, Theodosius II issued his attempt at a general codification of imperial law, the Theodosian Code (Matthews 2000). This included, in Book 16, a collection of imperial laws issued by emperors from Constantine onwards on a subject which had never before been formally recognised as a distinct category of law – Christianity.

Much binding imperial regulation was issued on an ad hoc basis, in reply to questions or proposals from officials or members of provincial elites (including bishops). This guaranteed, to a point, that the law would work, as it was in someone's interest that it be implemented or enforced. However, this, plus the absence of organised archives and the propensity of some governors to make unauthorised decisions, creating precedents of dubious validity, meant that the precise law on any matter at any particular time could be hard to ascertain.

This state of confusion may partly explain why persecution of Christians was accepted by Pliny in c. 112 and his imperial boss, Trajan, as legal fact, although Pliny does not seem to have known why this was the case. It was clear, however, to both Trajan and, later, Hadrian that an accused Christian was entitled to the same legal safeguards as was anyone else in the Roman empire. Denunciations were to be acted on, but Christians were not to be hounded by the authorities; if those denounced sacrificed, they were to be let off, as they clearly were not Christians (who, by definition, would refuse to sacrifice); and anonymous denunciations were prohibited (Pliny, Letters 10.96–97; cf. Hadrian's rescript to Minucius Fundanus, cited Justin, Apologia 1.69 and Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 4.9). Although the safeguards were not always operated in practice, their existence is an important reminder of the emperor's role as the ultimate guardian of law and order.

In late antiquity, Christian emperors, who in general acted as patrons of the Church giving both material goods and administrative support, also acquired a new role as active legislators on 'right religion'. Whereas pagan emperors before Constantine had tolerated most religions, provided they avoided atheism, treason or other forms of criminal activity such as human sacrifice (all charges made against Christians), Constantine and his successors found themselves under increasing pressure to legislate on behalf of Christianity and against religious competitors. Although pagans were slow to recognise the threat (Watts 2015), subsidies for public pagan cults were removed, sacrifices were outlawed, some temples were closed and, by the end of the fourth century, practising pagans were (in theory) debarred from high office. At the same time, 'right religion' was defined by Theodosius I (r. 379–395) in terms of the views held by named prominent churchmen:

> It is our will that all the peoples who are ruled by the administration of Our Clemency shall practise that religion which the divine Peter the Apostle transmitted to the Romans, as the religion which he introduced makes clear even unto this day. It is evident that this is the religion that is followed by the Pontiff Damasus (Bishop of Rome AD 367–384) and by Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, a man of apostolic sanctity . . .

> (1) We command that those persons who follow this rule shall embrace the name of Catholic Christians. The rest, however, whom we adjudge demented and insane, shall sustain the infamy of heretical dogmas, their meeting places shall not receive the name of churches and they shall be smitten first by divine vengeance and secondly by the retribution of our own initiative.
>
> *(*Theodosian Code 16.2.1; Pharr 1952 trans.)

This was reinforced by savage laws, issued against heretics such as the Manichaeans, the Macedonians and the Eunomians, whose meetings were forbidden and who were made subject to various legal disabilities (Theodosian Code 16.5.1–65). These enactments did not stop sacrifices or prevent continued activity by heretics (who would never recognise themselves as such), but they signalled the emperor's opinions to the empire at large and could be exploited by Christians prepared to go on the offensive on their own account.

Law and the citizen

In the first century CE, many people ruled by Rome were not subject to, or protected by, the safeguards of Roman law, and the empire's territories were a mosaic of diverse traditions, customs and practices. Roman citizenship was, for many but not all, a much-prized privilege, which could be allocated to communities through various block grants, as well as to individuals, as recognition of Roman-ness or an acknowledgement of service. The granting of citizenship was awarded as an exercise in imperial patronage. This focused gratitude on the emperor (often expressed through inscriptions) but was also a delicate reminder of the discretionary element in the whole procedure. Although there were tacit criteria, which should normally have been observed, some emperors, such as Claudius I, were notably more generous than others.
Figure 2.5   Bust of Trajan from Ephesus. Photo J. C. N. Coulston

Roman legal procedures in the resolution of disputes were also available to some non-citizens. The Spanish city constitutions generated by Vespasian's grant of Latin right stipulated that, when not otherwise provided for, the municipes 'are to deal with each other in all these matters under the civil law under which Roman citizens deal or will deal with each other', even though not all the inhabitants of the cities were Roman citizens (Law of Irni, ch. 93 in Gonzalez 1986: 198–9). However, in some cases, it was inconvenient for a new citizen to be exempted from local usages; thus, under Marcus Aurelius, one Julianus of the North African Zegrenses was granted citizenship along with his children, 'with the laws of their people remaining intact' (Sherwin-White 1973). At the same time, processes of Roman law, initially designed for use in Rome, were adapted for use in the provinces, and the interaction of Roman law (or local perceptions of Roman law) with local usages resulted in multiple courts and jurisdictions, often informal, which were open to exploitation by those best qualified to do so (Humfress 2013).

Law (and legal privilege) had complex ties to citizenship, status and identity. Most famous among Christian examples of this was Paul of Tarsus who, on his arrival at Jerusalem, found himself affirming his multi-cultural identity. Having been seized by a mob, he had to be rescued by the soldiers. The guard commander mistook him for an 'Egyptian' terrorist and asked him if he spoke Greek. Paul replied that he was a Jew from Tarsus in Cilicia, a citizen, he observed patriotically, of no mean city. He was then allowed to address the crowd and did so, affirming his Jewish identity, in Aramaic: 'I am a Jew, born in Tarsus of Cilicia, but brought up in this city. Under Gamaliel, I was thoroughly trained in the law of our fathers' (Acts 22.3). His speech failed to win over the mob and the soldiers prepared to flog Paul to find out more. At this point, Paul's identity as a Roman citizen, who was exempt from flogging without trial, quickly surfaced, much to the embarrassment of his captors (22.25–29) and he was removed to be tried before Felix, the governor (23.23–35). After a long delay in prison, Paul was brought before Felix' successor, Festus, from whose jurisdiction he appealed, as was his right as a Roman citizen, to the emperor.

Confining certain legal privileges to a small elite of citizens worked, while the elite remained small. However, as the Roman citizenship expanded it became less of a privilege. New procedures evolved to deal with the greater numbers of Roman citizens and, in the second century, two new legal categories of person evolved, the 'more honourable' honestiores and the 'more humble' humiliores (Garnsey 1970); the latter were subject to worse and more humiliating punishments than the former, the dignity of whose status was preserved even when convicted of crimes carrying the death penalty – they could simply be beheaded, while the lower classes were liable to crucifixion, burning alive and being publicly devoured by wild beasts (Digest 48.19; Harries 1999: 135–52; for philosophy of punishment, Hillner 2015). This two-tier system underlay the type of punishment that some Christian martyrs endured: Polycarp of Smyrna, for example, was burned alive in the arena in 155, while the martyrs of Lyon in 177 and of Carthage in 203 faced wild boars, bears and other animals in the arena.

In 212, the emperor Caracalla granted citizenship to all the free people of the empire, including Christians, many of whom would have been citizens already. This removed numerous anomalies at a stroke but left the imperial government with a new problem, the numbers of citizens with the right of appeal to the emperor. Over the next two centuries, a more complex and multi-tiered system of justice and appeals evolved (Theodosian Code 11.30). The courts of first resort were those of the provincial governors, now often described simply as iudices (judges), who, under the reforms of Diocletian, were given smaller areas to look after, while the emperor's role as the final judge was delegated, at least in part, to new super-provincial officials, the praetorian prefects, who evolved in the first part of the fourth century. But the emperors could never become entirely disengaged from the judicial process and remained the court of last resort, whenever unprecedented, intricate or politically sensitive matters were at stake.

In a separate development, episcopal jurisdiction (episcopalis audientia) achieved official recognition under Constantine and his successors (Harries 1999: 191–211). Within Christian communities, bishops had long been accepted as arbiters of disputes and held hearings to decide matters between members of the faithful. In theory, the purpose was not to impose a solution but to act as a mediator and reconcile the disputants. When Constantine sought to extend the application of bishops' hearings to include non-Christians, he risked subverting the principle of consent on which much episcopal authority in the settling of disputes was based. For this reason, the evolution of episcopal justice in the fourth century was more hesitant than the laws imply, and by the early fifth century, the imperial lawyers had assimilated the jurisdiction both of bishops and of the judges in Jewish courts to the operation of arbitration, which depended on the consent of all parties involved and from which there could be no appeal. The two main benefits of imperial involvement for episcopal 'judges' were the moral backing provided by the emperors' authority and the right to appeal to the lay authorities for enforcement of their decisions, as or when required.

Bureaucrats

The Christian polemicist, Lactantius, writing in the early fourth century CE, complained of Diocletian that the creation of the Tetrarchy, rule by four emperors, which occurred in 293 CE (see Leadbetter in Chapter 10), gave rise to a military and administrative machine that ruined the state (On the Deaths of the Persecutors 7.3–4). Provinces established in the first century CE and adapted in minor ways since, were split into smaller administrative units, roughly doubling the number of governors and their staffs. These governors (praesides, consulares, proconsuls) were supervised by deputies (vicarii), who also had staffs and were themselves subject to super-governors, the praetorian prefects, whose number stabilised at four after Constantine. Co-existing with this system, which was largely designed for civil administration, was a military structure, designed to cope with defence and security requirements on a regional rather than a strictly provincial basis; thus, for example, the defence of the Channel coasts, in the provinces of Britain and Gaul, was in the hands of a single military official, the Count of the Saxon Shore.

Lactantius, who regarded Diocletian as 'an author of crimes and an inventor of evils' because he persecuted Christians, blamed on him the corrupt and complex system of bureaucratic government which characterised the later Roman empire from the early fourth century onwards. But his hero, Constantine, was no less responsible for increasing the number of those involved in government. Under him, a burgeoning palace administration, headed by the Master of the Offices, helped to centralise the main functions of government on an increasingly intricate court bureaucracy (see Kelly 2004). These included finance (i.e. taxation and the administration of the imperial estates), which was run by two officials, the so-called Count of the Sacred Largesses (comes sacrarum largitionum) and the Count of the Private Estates (comes rerum privatarum); justice, including both criminal justice and dispute settlement and communication with the empire at large, through formal dispatches, drafted by the secretariat; and imperial laws, decided by the fifth century by the emperor's council, the consistory, and drafted in appropriately eloquent language by the imperial quaestor (Harries 1988). The administrative picture was further complicated by the rise of the second imperial capital, Constantinople. Founded by Constantine in 330 as a lesser 'New Rome' (the senators were 'distinguished', clari, but not very distinguished, clarissimi, as they were at Rome), Constantinople evolved in the fourth century as a serious second capital, with its own self-confident bureaucracy composed of members of the eastern elite drawn from the cities of the east. By the early fifth century, this second administration could act independently of the west and was to carry forward the Roman heritage into the Byzantine empire.

However, pace Lactantius, the numbers involved in late Roman administration, although large by comparison with early centuries, were tiny compared with the bureaucracies of the late twentieth century. It has been calculated that there were some 3,000 'very good jobs' (Heather 1994; see also Jones 1964: 572–96) in each half of the empire, east and west, by c. 400 CE, of which c. 2,700 belonged to the central palatine officia. In addition, provincial administration created in the region of 10,000 jobs. All this took no account of unpaid supernumeraries on the waiting lists, or of the turnover.

Holders of high office might serve for little more than a year, while the middle-ranking bureaucrat might be signed up for a period of fifteen or twenty years. So the numbers involved in the administration per generation were considerably greater than the number of posts available. As significant was the evolution of a bureaucratic culture of government. Defined by rules rather than genuinely (or chaotically) creative, late Roman government was excessively concerned with hierarchies, departmental 'empires' and lines of demarcation between jobs and offices. Both within the palace and in society at large, the importance of correct record-keeping was enhanced: a new archive was perhaps created near the Hippodrome at Constantinople in the mid fourth century (Kelly 1994).

The Roman Senate and provincial administration

The Roman Senate, although packed with supporters and clients of emperors, retained a collective sense of its historical identity as the ruling council of the empire, and expected to share in the duties and rewards of its government. The Senate of the first and second centuries retained the core of its traditional career structure, a series of offices, beginning with the quaestorship (finance), proceeding to the praetorship (justice) and culminating with the consulship. Outside Rome, the Senate provided governors for the provinces and generals for the armies. Certain areas of the empire, notably Asia Minor, Africa and Italy (which was not treated as a province before the third century), became and remained senatorial preserves. But although governors were supreme in their spheres while they were in office, tenure of the post was not as easy as it appeared. The governor's duties were straightforward. He was the supreme judge within the province (although minor jurisdiction was delegated to the cities) and had 'the right of the sword' and a duty to ensure that justice was properly administered, the weak protected, and that the rich and powerful did not gain unfair advantages. He had financial responsibilities and might well have military duties, especially in difficult frontier areas, as Tacitus' father-in-law Agricola had in Britain. Powerful vested interests in a province might launch a prosecution after a governor's departure from office. Sometimes such prosecutions, such as that of Marius Priscus, governor of Africa in 100 CE (Pliny, Letters 2.11) were justified. On other occasions, however, private grudges may be suspected. Pliny acted for a governor of Bithynia, who was initially charged by 'the province', but a second delegation arrived, insisting that they truly represented 'the province' and that the charges should be withdrawn (Pliny, Letters 7.6 and 7.10).

The threat of prosecution encouraged governors to take precautions. They were advised to be tactful, but to avoid becoming too close to any of the locals; this should be contrasted with the provincials' propensity to claim close friendship with governors and even emperors. They were forbidden by the statute known as the Lex Julia on extortion (Lex Julia repetundarum) from taking 'gifts', because they could be construed as bribes. Prudent governors like Pliny kept a strict record of their decisions. Pliny also referred anything possibly outside his sphere or potentially controversial to the emperor, in part to ensure that he could not be appealed against later. In the rhetoric of late Roman legislation, which made much of its concern for the accountability of officials, the corruption of governors was taken as almost axiomatic. Yet, despite the fuss made, convictions for corruption were relatively rare. This may have been due to the efficiency of the Roman establishment in protecting its own, but there may also have been a problem in establishing the truth of allegations coming from doubtful or prejudiced sources.

Court records contained summaries of the proceedings in every trial, thus allowing a governor or other judge to be detected in abuses of procedure. Such records underlie the accounts of some Christian martyrdoms, for example those of Scillium in North Africa in 180 CE, which record the interrogation of a group of Christians by a bewildered but nonetheless scrupulous governor. The format was ideal for the 'bearing of witness' before the governor and the official status of the court record lent further veracity and thus authority to the 'witness' of Christians who declared 'Christianus sum' in open court and suffered for their faith. But many later accounts of the interrogation of martyrs, perhaps inspired by Eusebius' lurid accounts of the Martyrs of Palestine under Diocletian, chose instead to focus on the 'madness' and unbridled rage (furor) of the judge, emphasising thereby what they saw as the fundamental illegality of the entire process.

In the course of the second and third centuries, senatorial control of most provinces was replaced by the appointment of equites. The military instability of the third century and the requirement that emperors attend to the needs of the frontiers removed the centre of power finally from the city of Rome and thus effectively sidelined the Senate. New imperial capitals grew up in favoured cities such as Sirmium on the Save, a tributary of the Danube, Trier, on the Moselle, Nicomedia in Bithynia, favoured by Diocletian, and the ultimate new imperial creation, Constantinople, dedicated by Constantine in 330. The Senate at Rome, however, remained a formidable assembly, which could not be ignored. As Roman citizenship spread, so the membership of the Senate expanded in the first and second centuries to take in provincials from much of the empire. Even when its activities seemed largely peripheral to the real needs of the empire in the third century, the Senate was saved from obscurity by the accumulated landed wealth and patronage of its membership and the prestige of its antiquity. In the early fourth century, Constantine revolutionised the senatorial order by granting senatorial rank to holders of office in the imperial administration. At the same time, he may also have removed the requirement that senators be resident at or near Rome. The long-term effect of this was to give provincial office-holders a 'senatorial' identity and status, while creating also a distinction in practice between holders of senatorial rank in the provinces or at court and the 'Romans of Rome' (although the two could and did overlap). In the late fourth century, the Roman Senate became more politically self-assertive. Senators of Rome occupied the Prefecture of the City and key governorships in Italy and Africa, while ties with the imperial court also improved (Matthews 1975). Despite the adherence of most emperors to Christianity, a powerful group of pagan senators persisted in the active promotion of pagan rites and values; the state paper of Symmachus requesting the restoration to the Senate of the Altar of Victory in 384 was taken as a definitive manifesto of the pagan cause and 'refuted' at the time by Ambrose of Milan (Liebeschuetz 2005/2010: 61–94) and in 402 by the Spanish Christian poet Prudentius (Against Symmachus 2). In the fifth century, as the power of the western emperor waned and the Germanic kingdoms of Gaul, Spain and Africa expanded, the Senate at Rome retained a confident separate identity, even creating an emperor again from its number, briefly, in 455.

The scope of government

As the Roman empire evolved through conquest and diplomacy, diversity was accommodated and encouraged. Provided the administration's limited objectives of maintaining military security, supported by the collection of taxes, and of maintaining order and administering justice where appropriate were met, local systems were left largely intact. Cities, especially in the Greek east, accustomed to centuries of autonomy, still ran their internal affairs and jealously guarded their traditional privileges; on the Inscriptions Wall at Aphrodisias in Caria, for example, documents were preserved asserting the city's free status and immunity from, inter alia, the tax on nails (Reynolds 1982, document 15). When times were good, members of local elites competed to hold magistracies and to fund and administer public services, such as the water supply, the markets or the repair of roads. Despite the wide remit of the city councils, much was left to private initiative. Leading citizens vied with their rivals in and beyond their own city to construct beautiful buildings, harbours, colonnades and other public spaces, and to provide fresh amenities. These monumental undertakings entailed often huge expense, but it was more than compensated for, in the eyes of the benefactor, by the status that accrued to the successful patron and the honours that would be offered to him (or her) by his (or her) grateful fellow-citizens.

In private dealings, the role of government was similarly restricted. Apart from limited alimenta schemes, established by both emperors and private patrons for the rearing of some children at public expense, and concern on the part of some city councils for their corn supply, the state took no responsibility for the economic welfare of families, the orphaned, the widowed or the old; there were no pensions or social security. Education and healthcare were not publicly funded, although there were rules about how many teachers of rhetoric (at secondary level), doctors or philosophers could be granted privileges because of the importance of the work they did. Prior to Augustus, public authorities took little interest in private morality; punishment of adultery, for example, was the responsibility of the family, whose 'honour' was damaged, not of the community as a whole.

Under the empire, more powers were drawn to the centre and the private space available to the citizen contracted. This was in part due to the ambition of emperors and administrators to expand their respective remits, but it was also the inevitable consequence of the expansion of the Roman citizen body; as other jurisdictions faded into obsolescence, a correspondingly greater burden fell on the Roman courts and thus also on the emperor, as the supreme judge, and his staff.

By the second century CE, difficulties began to arise in the relationship of centre to periphery due to wider social and economic changes which affected the city councils, the backbone of the imperial system. New social strata evolved above the heads of the decurion or local councillor. Ambitious men with money or connections moved upwards into those strata, leaving their less wealthy colleagues to foot the bill for local services. Local council duties became more onerous and less prestigious, and more people left. Economic changes for the worse in some areas also exacer-bated the hardships of decurions who remained at their posts. Concerned for its revenues, the central government increasingly intervened to prevent the flight from the councils and, by the mid fourth century, to assert control over an increasing amount of the council's revenues and responsibilities (on Antioch in Syria, Liebeschuetz 1972). Such interventions were, however, of limited use. Successful migrants from the councils used patrons to escape detection and emperors themselves would have known that their expanding administrations profited from the fugitive decurions' talents. Part of the running of cities, however, was taken over by local bishops, whose coffers, filled as they were with the charity of the pious and wealthy, financed not only churches but also some of the public services, hitherto the responsibility of the councils.

Some responsibility for the increased centralisation of the Roman system rested with the subjects themselves. Pliny's letters from the wealthy and normally peaceful province of Bithynia from 110 to 113 show an intensely competitive assemblage of cities, where expenditure was out of control (Pliny, Letters 10, 17a, 18, 32), corruption was suspected (ibid. 37–8, 81–2) and records of important transac-tions had conveniently gone missing (ibid. 31, 56, 58). His own special status was significant for the future; he had been sent in as an imperial troubleshooter with special powers to intervene in the cit-ies' financial affairs. Where problems were confined to a smaller area, another solution was to appoint a curator, who was to deal with the locals but be accountable to the centre. Sometimes even a curator was unable to sort things out; Aphrodisias, in the late second century, is found appealing to the pro-vincial governor of Asia to intervene to ensure that the curator's arrangements, which had failed so far, were adhered to (Reynolds 1982: document 16). Such appeals, from subjects in distress, cannot have been unusual and could be advantageous in the short term as the emperor was expected to use his powers of patronage to help out. But the inevitable, if not always obvious, consequence of inviting central intervention was to expand the power of the centre at the expense of local self-determination.

In parallel with this, criminal law became more intrusive, and penalties, partly driven by popular opinion rather than central diktat, more severe. More offences were created in law. More crimes became assimilated to that of treason, a development which restricted the civil liberties and particularly freedom from torture of those accused. Public punishment and torture asserted the state's control over the body of the criminal. But, as Foucault argued (1975), an ideology of control provokes its opposite in a counter-culture of rebellion or subversive discourse. Jewish writers such as the author of 2 Baruch (c. 100 CE) developed a counter-discourse to the sack of Jerusalem in 70 CE and the Judaea Capta coins which celebrated it (Esler 1995). Later, we see this literature of protest take shape in the martyr acts in which Christians are shown defying the efforts of the state to control their bodies through harsh imprisonment, chains, interrogation under extreme torture and, ultimately, through death.

The precedent of Augustus' adultery law encouraged emperors further to interfere in the private lives and beliefs of the citizen. The stridently moralistic tone of late Roman legislation, pagan and Christian, reflects the emperor's perceived right to impose his morality on the empire as a whole, through the force of law if necessary. Diocletian's denunciation of incest in 295 (children of such couples were illegitimate) and Constantine's extensive legislation on celibates (whose testamentary restrictions, imposed by Augustus, were removed), adultery and divorce added up to a formidable programme of interference in marriage and the family (Evans Grubbs 1995). Because of their moral mission, the emperor's right to legislate extended from action to belief. Emperors who persecuted Christians justified their actions on grounds of the public good; the pax deorum was threatened by 'atheists', who refused sacrifice to the gods. In the fourth century, roles were reversed, and the requirements of Christian religious concord were invoked against heretics, pagans and others, who became liable to legal disabilities (or worse) if they persisted. It was not enough for the state to control the body; it also sought to direct the soul.

Conclusion

The new Jerusalem

In the first century CE, Jerusalem was an unknown city on the edge of the empire, emerging briefly and tragically into the limelight when the temple was destroyed and the population of Jerusalem expelled in 70 CE. Hadrian had proceeded to refound the city as the Roman colony of Aelia Capitolina, presided over by the twin deities, Jupiter Capitolinus and the emperor himself, Aelius Hadrianus.

But memories based on identity, religion and history could not be so easily destroyed. Constantine's victory over his rival Licinius in 325 at last gave the first Christian emperor control of the holy places. As Eusebius' List of Place Names (Onomasticon) demonstrated, with vignettes of locals eager to direct visitors to Noah's Ark and other historical or sacred sites, there already existed a thriving tourist industry in the Bible lands. However, the bishop of Jerusalem, Macarius, was quick to exploit the new opportunities offered by imperial patronage. Beneath Hadrian's Temple to Venus was unearthed the Holy Sepulchre itself; under Constantine's active guidance, the site was renovated and a new Golgotha basilica constructed (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.25–40; Cameron and Hall 1999: 137–9). Two other sites, the caves of the Nativity at Bethlehem and the site of the Ascension, also received churches, financed by Constantine, in association with his mother, Helena (ibid. 3.41–43.3). Immediately, all became foci for pilgrimage – and a doubtless lucrative tourist industry. Soon after Helena's journeys in the Holy Land in the late 320s, alleged relics of the True Cross were unearthed in Jerusalem and their discovery became linked to Helena's presence in the Holy City (Hunt 1982: 38–48; Drijvers 1992).

In the footsteps of this legend, another empress, Eudocia, also journeyed to the Holy Land in 438, extending pre-existing court patronage by further activity generated by her personal presence (see Chapter 18 in this volume). In the early 440s, she retired to reside in Jerusalem where she was to remain for some twenty years. Like Helena, Eudocia turned to the Holy Land following a dynastic upheaval (although Eudocia, unlike Helena, was also a casualty) and like her model she built churches, adding to them monasteries and hostels; she is also credited with the enlargement of the city to the south to take in Mount Sion (Hunt 1982: 238).

This transformation is one of the most dramatic instances of how the Roman world changed with the coming of Christianity. Orosius ascribed Christianity's success in part to the stability and unity created by Rome's empire; he did not add that this was also enabled by one of the world's longest-lived and most successful autocracies. Imperial unity was maintained, at some cost, by emperors and armies for over 400 years; even as late as 417, Orosius hoped that the prosperity enjoyed by the Christian empire (by contrast with the disasters experienced under pagan rule) might still endure. What neither he nor any Christian writer could admit was that all emperors, including Christian emperors, were autocrats first and Christians second – despite the efforts of their propagandists, such as Eusebius of Caesarea, to pretend otherwise.

Piety, as Constantine (and others) proclaimed, brought victory – but having good soldiers helped as well. For emperors, Christian and pagan alike, had as their chief duty the defence of the empire. Although it had been possible in the peaceful times of the second century for emperors such as Hadrian to substitute other priorities in the search for military glory, the military character of the emperor was central to his function and the needs of the army could never be ignored. Strategic changes, such as the evolution of designated frontier forces and a central striking force based round the emperor or his deputies, did not affect the basic goals of imperial policy, victory and security. When the frontiers of western Europe collapsed in the face of mass migration early in the fifth century, the failure of imperial security policy was plain for all to see. Local elites in Britain, Gaul, Spain and central Europe reached new accommodations with their new overlords, regional identities reasserted themselves and loyalty to the 'centre' in Italy waned, as many western aristocrats asked themselves 'what have the Romans done for us?' and found no answer. But just as 'Jerusalem' was both a symbol and a city, so Rome in the post-Roman world would also find a new identity; to 'be Roman' in the sixth century was to 'be Christian'.

Bibliography

Translations

Brunt, P. A. and Moore, J. M. (1988) Res Gestae Divi Augusti; the Achievements of the Divine Augustus, with an Introduction and Commentary. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Cameron, A. and Hall, S. (1999) Eusebius, Life of Constantine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Campbell, B. (1994) The Roman Army 31 BC–AD 337: A Sourcebook. London: Routledge.

Deferrari, R. J. (1964) Paulus Orosius, The Seven Books of History Against the Pagans. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press

Dodgeon, M. H. and Lieu, S. N. C (1991) The Roman Eastern Frontier and the Persian Wars. AD 226–363. A Documentary Study. London: Routledge.

Liebeschuetz, J. H. W. G. with Hill, C. (2005/2010) Ambrose of Milan. Political Letters and Speeches. Translated Text for Historians 43. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Lieu, S. N. C. and Lieu, J. (1986) The Emperor Julian. Panegyric and Polemic. Translated Text for Historians Greek series 1. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Musurillo, H. (1972) Acts of the Christian Martyrs. Introduction, Texts and Translations. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Nixon, C. E. V. and Rodgers, B. S. (1994) In Praise of Later Roman Emperors: The Panegyrici Latini. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Pharr, C. (1952) The Theodosian Code. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Radice, B. (1963) The Letters of the Younger Pliny. London; Penguin.

Thackeray, St. J. (1928) Josephus: The Jewish War, Books IV–VII. The Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Books and articles

Barnes, T. D. (2011) Constantine. Dynasty, Religion and Power in the later Roman Empire. Malden, MA: Wiley–Blackwell.

Berlin, A. M. and Overman, J. A. (2002) The First Jewish Revolt: Archaeology, History and Ideology. London. Routledge.

Campbell, J. B. (1983) The Emperor and the Roman Army. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Crook, J. (1955) Consilium Principis. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Drijvers, J. W. (1992) Helena Augusta, the Mother of Constantine the Great and the Legend of Her Finding the True Cross. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Esler, P. F. (1995) 'God's honour and Rome's triumph: Responses to the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE in three Jewish apocalypses', in P. F. Esler (ed.) Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies in the New Testament in Its Context. London and New York: Routledge, 239–58.

Evans Grubbs, J. (1995) Law and Family in Late Antiquity: Constantine's Marriage Legislation. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Foucault, M. (1975) Surveiller et punir. Naissance de la prison. Paris: Gallimard (translated (1977) as Discipline and Punish. The Birth of the Prison).

Fuhrmann, C. J. (2011) Policing the Roman Empire: Soldiers, Administration and Public Order. Oxford, UK. Oxford University Press.

Garnsey, P. (1970) Social Status and Legal Privilege in the Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Gonzalez, J. (1986) 'The Lex Irnitana: A new copy of the Flavian municipal law', Journal of Roman Studies 76: 147–243.

Harries, J. (1988) 'The Roman imperial quaestor from Constantine to Theodosius II', Journal of Roman Studies 78: 148–72.

Harries, J. (1999) Law and Empire in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Harries, J. (2013) 'Men without women; Theodosius' consistory and the business of government', in C. Kelly (ed.) Theodosius II. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 67–89.

Harries, J. (2014) 'The empresses' tale, AD 300–360', in C. Harrison, C. Humfress and I. Sandwell (eds) Being Christian in Late Antiquity. A Festschrift for Gillian Clark. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 197–214.

Hartley, E. (2006) Constantine the Great: York's Roman Emperor. Marygate, York, UK: York Museums Trust.

Heather, P. (1994) 'New men for new Constantines', in P. Magdalino (ed.) New Constantines? The Rhythm of Imperial Renewal in Byzantium, 4th–11th Centuries. London: Variorum, 11–33.

Hillner, J. (2015) Prison, Punishment and Penance in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Holum, K. (1983) Theodosian Empresses. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Humfress, C. (2013) 'Thinking through legal pluralism: Forum shopping in the later Roman empire', in J. Duindam, J. Harries, N. Hirvitz and C. Humfress (eds) Law and Empire. Ideas. Practices. Actors. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 225–50.

Hunt, D. (1982) Holy Land Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire AD 312–460. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Jones, A. H. M. (1964) The Later Roman Empire: A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Kaldellis, A. (2015) The Byzantine Republic. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Kelly, C. (1994) 'Late Roman bureaucracy: Going through the files', in A. Bowman and G. Woolf (eds) Literacy and Power in the Ancient World. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 161–76.

Kelly, C. (2004) Ruling the Later Roman Empire. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press.

Lendon, J. (1997) Empire of Honour: The Arts of Government in the Roman World. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Levick, B. (2007) Julia Domna; Syrian Empress. London: Routledge.

Liebeschuetz, W. (1972) Antioch: City and Imperial Administration in the Later Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

MacCormack, S. (1972) Art and Ceremony in Late Antiquity. The Transformation of the Classical Heritage, I. Oakland, CA: University of California.

Matthews, J. (1975) Western Aristocracies and Imperial Court, AD 364–425. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Matthews, J. (2000) Laying Down the Law. A Study of the Theodosian Code. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

McEvoy, M. (2013) Child Emperor Rule in the Late Roman West AD 367–455. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Millar, F. (1977) The Emperor in the Roman World. London: Duckworth.

Potter, D. (2004) The Roman Empire at Bay, AD 180–395. London: Routledge.

Price, S. (1984) Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Reynolds, J. (1982) Aphrodisias and Rome. Journal of Roman Studies Monograph Series, No. 1. London: Society for the Promotion of Roman Studies.

Rives, J. (1995) Religion and Authority in Roman Carthage from Augustus to Constantine. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Sherwin-White, A. N. (1973) 'The Tabula of Banasa and the Constitutio Antoniniana', Journal of Roman Studies 63: 86–98.

Sivan, H. (2011) Galla Placidia: The Last Roman Empress. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Spawforth, T. (2007) The Court and Court Society in Ancient Monarchies. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Syme, R. (1971) Emperors and Biography. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Tougher, S. (ed.) (2002) Eunuchs in Antiquity and Beyond. Swansea, UK: Classical Press of Wales.

Watts, E. (2015) The Last Pagan Generation. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Weaver, P. R. C. (1972) Familia Caesaris: A Social Study of the Emperor's Freedmen and Slaves. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Zanker, P. (1988) The Power of Images in the Age of Augustus. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

3

GRAECO-ROMAN PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

Luther H. Martin

Doctrines must take their beginnings from that of the matters of which they treat.
(Giambattista Vico)

'Beginnings,' it has been suggested, is a more useful category for the investigation of early Christianity than the more common notion of 'origins,' an idea that implies an ahistorical view of religion as somehow sui generis. Commenting on the passage from Vico cited above (Vico 1970: par. 314), Edward Said has argued that 'beginnings' acknowledges historical relationships of 'continuity or antagonism or some mixture of both' between doctrines and institutions studied and their context (Said 1975: 3, 347–381). In this sense, any historical investigation of early Christian beginnings must include their intellectual and religious alternatives in the Graeco-Roman world and the relationship of the various early Christianities to these alternatives.

The Graeco-Roman world

A change in the course of Western history was initiated by the conquests of Alexander the Great of Macedon (356–323 BCE) who successfully united the Greek peoples in opposition to Persian hegemony and, in the process, established a Graeco-Macedonian empire that extended from the Aegean in the west to the Indus River in India and from the Black Sea in the North to Nubia and the Sahara in Africa.

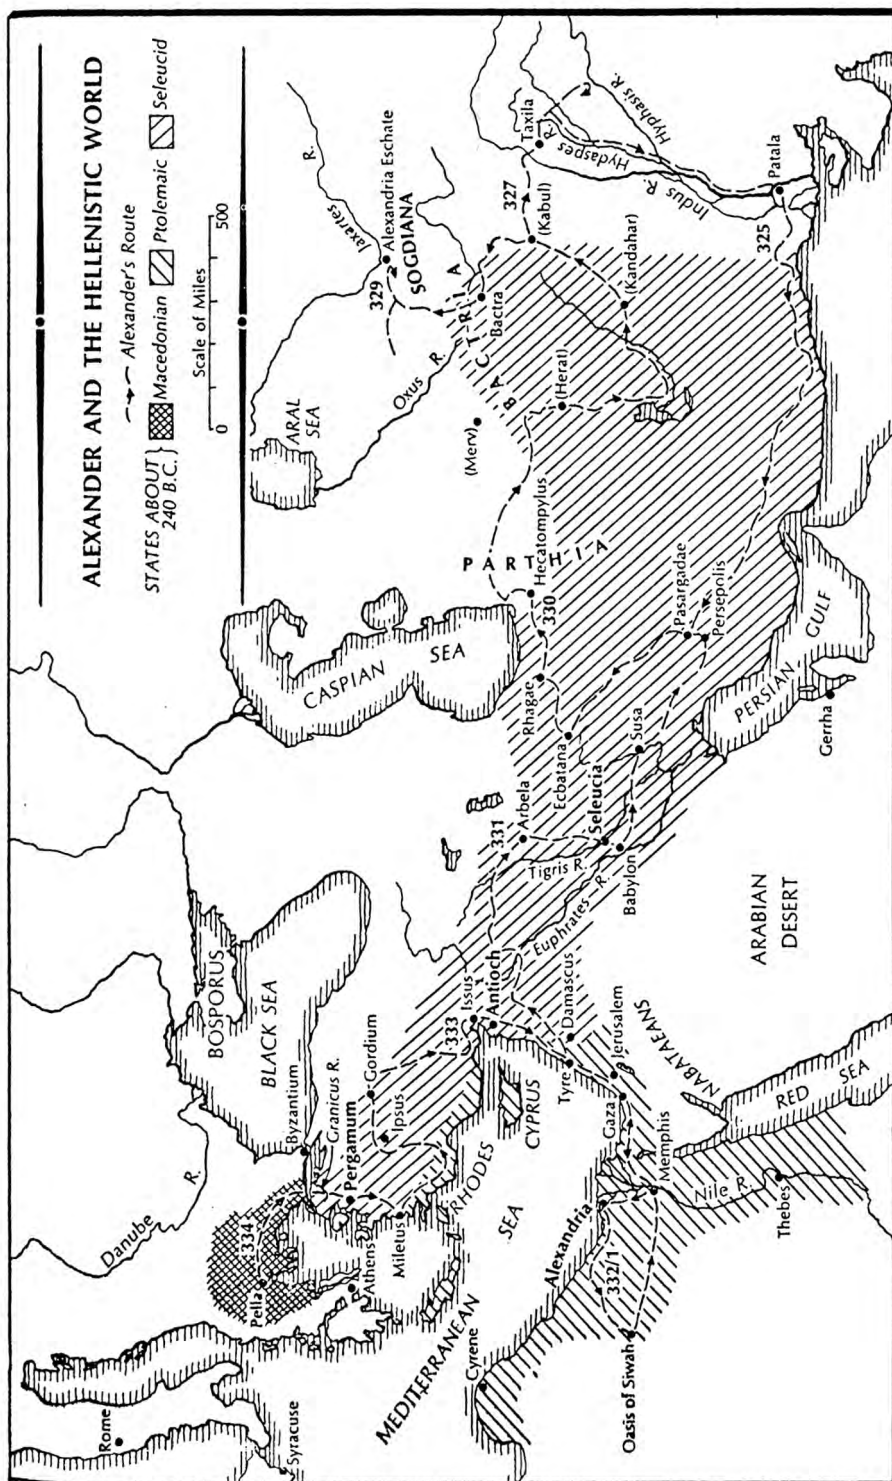
Already the second-century CE Bithynian historian, Arrian, had written a seven-book history of Alexander, the Anabasis of Alexander, and a ten-book history of Affairs after Alexander (of which only fragments survive). It was not until the eighteenth century, however, that Alexander's imperial conquests became defined as initiating a discrete period of history with a conclusion in 30 BCE, the year Augustus annexed Egypt, the final autonomous kingdom of Alexander's former empire, into that of Rome (Gast 1782; similarly, Gillies 1807). The significance of this period of history, defined in political terms as extending from Alexander to Augustus, was initially dismissed by scholars as 'of no interest in itself, and is only so far of value as it helps us to understand the preceding centuries,' at least until 'the absorption of Greece by the Romans.' It was certainly considered to have no influence 'on the destinies of the future world' (Grote 1854: x). Only in the final quarter of the nineteenth century did this important and transformational period of history begin to attract scholarly attention (with the second edition of Droysen's Geschichte des Hellenismus (1877)).


Figure 3.1 Map of Alexander's empire (from Martin 1987: 5), with the permission of Oxford University Press

Scholarly neglect of the historical period after Alexander until late in the nineteenth century had much to do with the prevailing assumption among scholars in Christian Europe that a new historical era had been inaugurated during the reign of Augustus with the birth of Jesus (Luke 2:1–7). The 'pagan' world of the period immediately preceding this Christian 'charter event' became relegated, thereby, to a theologically and thus historically diminished background against which the emergence of a new Christian period of Western history might be writ. A predominantly Christian culture was only realized historically and politically, however, in the final decades of the fourth century CE with the imperial decrees of the Christian emperor, Theodosius, that prohibited all non-Christian religious practices and established Christianity as the sole legitimate religion of the Roman empire. From this perspective, a Graeco-Roman period of cultural—in contrast to political—history may be defined as extending from the encounter of ideas and religious practices occasioned by the internationalism of the first 'Western' empire in the late fourth century BCE to the establishment of the West as a 'Christian culture' in the late fourth century CE; it includes the intellectual and religious histories not only of the Greek empire established by Alexander and those of his successors but that of the Roman imperium as well. It is out of the world of this Graeco-Roman period with its largely 'Hellenistic' culture (Droysen 1836–1843) that the early Christianities emerged and were given their shape.

Broadly understood, the predicate 'Hellenistic' refers to the general diffusion of Greek culture among those peoples conquered by Alexander as a consequence of his Hellenizing policies, a cultural program actively pursued by his successors. It included the establishment of Greek as the international language of politics and commerce, the introduction of Greek cultural and civic institutions into those cities among the peoples Alexander had incorporated into his empire and even the founding of new Greek cities, such as Alexandria in Egypt, and subsequent Greek emigration as well as non-Greek immigration with a consequent dissemination of Greek values and ideas. Despite interactions which occurred as a consequence of cultural contact among the diverse cultures included in Alexander's empire, especially in the area of religion, it was Greek values and ideas which dominated into late antiquity, even throughout the reign of Rome, and which defined a Hellenistic cultural world.

The category of 'world' has re-emerged in cultural studies to describe a boundaried set of social relationships together with its system of acquired knowledge. It differs from the earlier idea of Weltanschauung or 'world view' first used by Kant to describe the holistic comprehension of the phenomenal world (Kant 1951: 93). In the nineteenth century, the notion was internalized to designate the subjective 'meaning' of the world in terms of an individual's total experience of reality; its formulation was considered the proper function of culture, pre-eminently, of religion. In contrast to its Enlightenment and Romantic predecessors, the current usage of 'world' is as an analytic category employed to describe a particular religious system in terms of 'cosmos' and 'nomos,' coextensive scientific and socio-political categories of world formation and maintenance (Berger 1967: 24; see Paden 1994). Although the scientific framework of Hellenistic culture has received some attention in connection with the relationship of cosmology and religion (Martin 1987), the nomic, or social-political, aspects of Hellenistic philosophy and religion have received less. And questions concerning the relationship between these 'vertical' (cosmic) and 'horizontal' (socio-political) grids of world structure remain largely unaddressed.

Hellenistic cosmology

The scientific framework of the Hellenistic world is well exemplified by the Ptolemaic cosmology, the first comprehensively scientific view of the cosmos. Named for the second-century CE Alexandrian astronomer and mathematician, Claudius Ptolemy, who compiled and systematized contemporaneous astronomical knowledge in his thirteen-book Almagest, this cosmological model developed earlier Babylonian, Persian, Egyptian and Greek astronomical and astrological observations into a mathematically precise system (Adamson 2015: 195–201). Its descriptive and predictive efficacy endured until the sixteenth century when the Copernican cosmological revolution established for modernity the heliocentric model of the 'solar system,' a view first proposed in the third century BCE by Aristarchus of Samos.

Most simply, the Ptolemaic cosmology described a geocentric system in which the earth, fixed in its position, was encompassed by seven successive spheres identified with the planets visible to the naked eye. Although alternative planetary orders were proposed, the most common was: the moon (considered, from a geocentric perspective, a planet), Mercury, Venus, the sun (like the moon, considered a planet), Mars, Jupiter and Saturn. The scientific basis for this system may be traced from the fourth-century BCE astronomer, Eudoxus of Cnidus, who described the motion of these heavenly bodies as concentric spheres moving around different axes and devised a mathematical explanation for these motions. This entire planetary system was understood to be encompassed within a stationary 'realm of the fixed stars.' This image of the cosmos—though not all of its mathematical evidence—dominated Hellenistic culture from its beginnings.

In the second century BCE, the Bithynian astronomer Hipparchus discovered the precession of the equinoxes, the gradual movement of the plane of the earth's equator relative to the stars. This observation, explained in modern astronomy as a wobble in the earth's axis, could only be understood in terms of the static geocentricity of Hellenistic science as movement in the entire celestial structure, including the realm of the stars. Since the fixed and motionless character of the stars was seen as the most important indication for regularity and stability in the universe and provided an empirical reference for philosophical speculations concerning absolutes, Hipparchus' discovery challenged any view of existence modelled upon cosmic immutability (Ulansey 1989: 76–82).
Figure 3.2 Diagram of the Ptolemaic cosmos. From Martin (1987: 9), with the permission of Oxford University Press

Following Hipparchus' discovery, philosophical and religious questions and reflections were increasingly modified or reformulated in consonance with this revisionist scientific discovery. The natural order of things, for example, once acknowledged as the inviolate rule of 'fate,' became relativized as the problematic of cosmic transitoriness, now designated by the play of 'chance' (personified as Tychē or Fortuna). And the gods, once imagined as superhuman beings inhabiting high places and the celestial regions, had to be relocated from their now transitory terrestrial, and increasingly even from their celestial, loci to an atemporal, transcendental locus and re-imagined as supernatural and 'otherworldly.' As this Hellenistic problematic was expressed by Pliny the Elder in the first century BCE:

> Everywhere in the whole world at every hour by all men's voices Fortune alone is invoked and named . . . and we are so much at the mercy of chance that Chance herself, by whom God is proved uncertain, takes the place of God.
>
> *(*Natural History 2.5.22)

A few examples will suffice to illustrate that early Christians, too, were concerned with these cosmological transformations and referenced their problematic. The astrological character of the story in the Gospel of Matthew about 'Magi from the East' who followed a star to Bethlehem in order to pay homage to the 'newborn King of the Jews' (Matt. 2:1–12) has been well considered (e.g., Brown 1977: 166–177). Less noticed are the astrological implications of the discrepancy between the Gospel according to Matthew and that according to Luke as to whether conception or birth was the most propitious moment from which to calculate the 'beginning point' of Jesus' life. The author of Matthew seems to attribute significance to the birth of Jesus (Matt. 1:16, 18–24) while the author of Luke emphasizes his conception (Luke 1:30, 35). These different views concerning the beginning of life reflect a technical debate in astrological practice, as Ptolemy documented (Tetrabiblos 3. 1).

Second, we might note that the Gospel according to Mark, which recounts stories neither of conception nor of birth, begins its account of Jesus' life with his baptism by John. On this occasion, the Gospel reports, 'the heavens opened . . . and a voice came from heaven, "Thou art my beloved Son"' (Mark 1:10–11). The Greek verb for the 'opening' of the heavens is schizō, 'to tear' or 'to rend asunder.' The only other occurrence of this word in this Gospel is at the conclusion of the life of Jesus when he 'uttered a loud cry, and breathed his last.' At that moment, the Gospel notes that 'the curtain of the [Jerusalem] temple was torn in two (schizō), from top to bottom' (Mark 15:37–38). This temple veil was described by Josephus as depicting a comprehensive representation of the heavens (Josephus, Jewish War 5.214). Thus, the author of this Gospel marks the end of Jesus' life as he marks the beginning—with reference to a 'rending of the cosmos' (Ulansey 1991).

Even as the Gospel of Mark seems to equate the life and death of Jesus with an alteration in the existing cosmic order, so Paul proclaims that Christians are liberated from an earlier view of the cosmos (Gal. 4:3). Paul described the dominance of this earlier view in terms of an observance of 'days, and months, and seasons, and years' (Gal. 4:10), seemingly a reference to the biblical creation story in which God creates the 'lights [the sun, the moon and the stars] in the firmament of the heavens . . . for signs and for seasons and for days and for years' (Gen. 1:14–15). However, this passage references also Hellenistic astrological concerns generally. The various early Christian groups, in other words, had regularly to relate to their scientific/cosmological context in their theological formulations.

Socio-political context of the Hellenistic world

More complex than the more or less commonly assumed cosmological framework of the Hellenistic world was its diverse socio-political structure. This complex structure can be typologized, however, in terms of two alternative kinds of social organization: kingship, on the one hand, a consolidation of power such as was claimed by the Hellenistic rulers, and kinship, on the other, a dispersion of power consequent upon the spread of numerous alternative social groupings traditionally organized on the basis of kin-claims, which was replaced by imperial imposition.

Power in the Graeco-Roman world was officially claimed, and often imposed, by the structures and functionaries of the imperium, whether that of Alexander, those of his diverse successors or that reinstated by Rome. These imperial or kingship claims were reinforced by state cults, including, finally, the deification of the emperor. Already Alexander had encountered Persian cult practices that attributed divine qualities to their king. In Egypt he found a formal cult of the king as god (Taylor 1931: 6) and, in both places, the young king himself was so received. In 324 BCE, in response to Alexander's demand, Athens, followed by other Greek cities, voted Alexander to be Dionysus (Taylor 1931: 21–23). According to later accounts, Alexander's virgin mother was impregnated by a lightning bolt; her son nevertheless claimed to be descended on his father's side from Heracles, the greatest of the Greek heroes, and on his mother's side from Achilles, the bravest of Homeric heroes (Plutarch, Alexander 2; Nilsson 1951: 108). Both heroes, according to Greek mythology, had ascended to divine status. By claiming 'succession' from Alexander, the Hellenistic kings also made claim to heroic and divine descent (Taylor 1931: 25). Julius and Augustus were the real successors of Alexander, both in political terms as well as in their claim to rule by divine right—a right subsequently claimed by monarchs in the West until the rise of the modern democratic state.

Alternative to the consolidation and centralization of political power exemplified by Alexander's empire and by the subsequent Hellenistic and Roman kingdoms, a legion of counter-cultural groups—clubs or collegia—proliferated during the Hellenistic period claiming, by default, social power for themselves, whether that expression of power was expressed in political, religious, esoteric or transcendental terms. Documented from the political context of classical Greece (Thucydides 3.82; 8.54, 65), the founding and spread of such associations was provoked by the new possibilities of commercial and mercenary activity occasioned by the international successes of empire itself. As inhabitants of once locally defined cultures ventured forth into the cosmopolitan context of the Hellenistic world, they understandably sought to retain something of their traditional ancestry and identity: their language, their dress, their cuisine, their religion. Consequently, these new immigrants often formed 'social clubs' with their compatriots. They met together and drew up rules of association, they paid dues, they ate and drank together, they typically venerated one of their native deities as their patron and they often assumed the traditional familial responsibility for the 'proper' burial of their brethren in the alien lands they now inhabited. The ubiquitous characteristic of these Hellenistic associations was their sense of being a household or extended family, perhaps the most fundamental mode of human social organization. As one scholar summarizes the evidence concerning some twenty-four voluntary associations on Delos, they 'reinforced a sense of kinship and national identity on an island where disparate nationalities and languages abounded' (Kloppenborg and Wilson 1996: 189; for texts see Kloppenborg and Ascough 2011, Harland 2014 and Kloppenborg and Ascough forthcoming 2017).

Greek society and state, like that of virtually all cultures, had been founded on the family—groups of men who claimed descent from a common ancestor. This ancestor gave his name to the family and the veneration of the ancestor gave religious sanction to these social entities (Nilsson 1951: 65). If, for some reason, a common ancestor was absent, one might be invented, especially if a heroic or divine progenitor was desired. Whether ethnic or fictive, the sense of kinship was the most common characteristic of the Hellenistic associations (Kloppenborg and Wilson 1996: 13, 18, 112, 132, 134–135, 180, 189). The establishment of fictive-kin ties by adoption was a common Graeco-Roman practice of recruitment that ensured legitimate descendants in the face of high mortality. And Hellenization, in the sense of assimilating non-Greeks to Greek culture, often involved inventing for colonized or conquered peoples eponyms that might be connected with figures from Greek myths who had similar names (Nilsson 1951: 97, 98, 105). 'Greekness' was a matter of kinship (Thucydides 1.95.1).

While the Hellenistic kinship groups or 'clubs' seem to have limited membership to a particular ethnic group and/or to class or gender, some at least experimented with values of inclusiveness and equality in the face of a largely segregated and hierarchical world—as did some early Christians.

The association of Zeus in Philadelphia, for example, admitted 'men and women, freeborn and slaves' (Kloppenborg and Wilson 1996: 25; see Paul in 1 Cor. 12:13). These alternative values may have derived from the private religious associations of classical Athens in which foreigners, women and slaves all enjoyed equal rights with Athenian citizens (Foucart 1873: 5–12). Or, these values may have been championed for the Hellenistic world by the notion of 'the brotherhood of mankind' attributed to the emperor Alexander (see the prayer for the 'unity of mankind' reported by Arrian, Anabasis of Alexandria 7.11). Whether or not such a program was ever advanced by Alexander himself, Hellenistic romances clearly propagated this value in his name. Thus, the first-century BCE historian Diodorus Siculus wrote that the bringing together of the largest continents through intermarriage and ties of kinship to a common harmony and family ties was among Alexander's 'last plans' (Diodorus Siculus 18.4.4). Similarly, Plutarch averred that Alexander 'instructed all men to consider the inhabited world to be their native land . . . being blended together by ties of blood and the bearing of children' (Plutarch, The Fortune of Alexander 1.329C–D).

The claims to universal brotherhood and, thus, to centralized power inevitably favored a centralized political state in opposition to the dispersion of alternative social organizations with their local and limited criteria of kinship, no matter how egalitarian they may otherwise have been. The oppositional character inherent in the two differing types of socio-political organization and their differing views of power thrust Hellenistic efforts at imperial rule into conflict with local kinship associations. The dispersion of any such organized subgroups is typically viewed as a threat to the centralized authority and stability of political power unless a mutually accommodating relationship can be assured.

Classical Greek philosophy had always attempted to legitimate the dominant, non-democratic forms of rule. 'Thales' [sixth-century BCE] sophia was an attempt to legitimate tyranny, whereas the philosophia of Pythagoras and of later thinkers was designed to provide a non-democratic alternative to post-tyrannical society (Frischer 1982: 16). And Greek religion was always supportive of the state. As the classical Greek view of a world ordered by laws of nature that man and polis sought to replicate and to which even the gods were subject became confounded by the socio-political conflict wrought by the warring successors to Alexander's empire, innovative and redefined philosophical schools and novel religious associations proliferated as alternatives to a political order imposed by the Hellenistic kings. Examples from some of the philosophical and religious traditions were accepted by political power as supportive or at least non-threatening, while others, including the early Christianities, were viewed as subversive, or at least suspicious.

The writing of a Christian 'universal history' by the author of Luke-Acts, was an early Christian referencing of Roman international hegemony; the author even has a Roman centurion support the innocence of Jesus (Luke 23:47). However, this Lucan history, established by the later Christian world as 'normative,' was at the time of its writing only one of a wide spectrum of views held by various 'Jesus people' and 'Christ cults' making differing claims upon the name of Jesus (Mack 1988, 1993, 1995; Smith 1990). Some of these groups—the group which produced 'Q,' the early Jesus 'sayings source,' for example, and those who compiled Mark and the other 'canonical' gospels, and, of course, the letters of Paul—would eventually be reconciled, harmonized or synthesized into the Lucan-Roman model of a universalized theological history. Those 'Christian' groups that would not or could not accept the Lucan standard were branded as heretical: the group which produced the 'Gospel of Thomas,' for example, or those which composed other non-canonical gospels or 'acts' of various apostles. When the Lucan view was accorded the authority of the 'Great Church' in the fourth century, these alternative Christian groups were themselves banished or burned.

The problematics, then, referenced by the early Christian movements mirrored those addressed by Greek and Roman philosophical and religious groups generally. They pursued similar cosmic and nomic questions with similar assumptions. They all offered explanations for their view of the world, required a disciplined style of life with a clearly articulated goal, produced a tradition of exemplary predecessors—some of whom, like Socrates, were martyred—which culminated in a contemporaneous teacher, compiled an authoritative literature, and they all organized themselves in social groups defined by kinship terminology, membership in which required some type of formal recruitment or initiatory rites (Nock 1933: ch. 5). And claims to superhuman power as the legitimating basis for their authority, the most minimal definition of a religious system, were as likely to be made by 'philosophical' as by 'religious' groups.

Of course, there were differences between groups within both traditions, for example, between those whose views were influenced by the supernaturalism of Platonic tradition and those that adhered to the more naturalistic tradition of Aristotle. And a major difference between Greek philosophical and religious systems generally was a different 'division of labor' concerning ethics. Whereas Hellenistic religious groups had been concerned, for example, with venerating and propitiating the gods and with legitimating the social boundaries over which they presided, whether of kin or king, they were not, like those groups that identified with the biblical tradition, concerned with questions of ethics, relegating this issue to the philosophers.

To map the differing philosophico-religious groups that populated the Graeco-Roman period, their goals and aspirations, their differences and similarities, is to map a central feature of the cultural world of Christian beginnings.

Hellenistic philosophies

Although a classical period of Greek philosophy is generally concluded with the death of Aristotle in 322 BCE, the year following the death of his student, Alexander the Great, the naturalistic and empirical tradition of research exemplified by Aristotle's work continued throughout the Hellenistic period. This tradition was exemplified not only by the observations of such astronomers as Aristarchus (fl. mid third century BCE) and Hipparchus (fl. second half of second century BCE) but also by the advances of such mathematicians as Euclid (c. 325–c. 250 BCE), Archimedes (c. 287–212 or 211 BCE), Apollonius of Perga (fl. 200 BCE) and Erathosthenes (c. 285–194 BCE), and by the work of the naturalist Theophrastus (372/1 or 371/2–288/7 or 287/6 BCE). Despite continuing progress in scientific knowledge, however, Hellenistic philosophy was primarily characterized by 'a critical synthesis of earlier philosophies about the world' (Frischer 1982: 34). Life during this period was increasingly understood as subjected to irrational forces, to chance for example, or to powers beyond ordinary human control, which could only be dealt with by cult and magic (Samuel 1988: 169). This intellectual lapse, popularized in modern judgment as 'a failure of nerve' (Murray 1955), was as evident in the philosophical traditions as in the religious alternatives of the period. The popular successes of the Hellenistic philosophies were bought, in other words, at the price of their separation from scientific research (Long 1986: 12). By the time Rome eventually restored a generally ordered world through its efficient administration of the empire, the general investigation of nature and of the role of rational man in the ordered cosmos had become largely replaced by a practical concern with ethics, the rule and exercise of life that might offer a viable view of human identity in the face of both cosmological and socio-political transitoriness and transformation. Philosophical theoria was replaced, in other words, by praxis. All of the Hellenistic philosophical schools emphasized the question, first posed by Plato and Aristotle: 'What is happiness or well-being and how does a man achieve it?' (Long 1986: 6).

The increased focus upon practical ethics during the Hellenistic period established philosophers as exemplars and their philosophical 'schools' as, ideally, groups of exemplary followers. These schools not only endeavored faithfully to transmit the teachings of their founder, whose thought, however, was in fact often elaborated and modified, but also to emulate his life style. The first of the philosophical schools, established by Pythagoras in the sixth century BCE, were organized as quasi-religious associations that included rites of initiation, private teachings, the following of a dietary regime and provisions for burial (Burkert 1985: 302–303). In addition to the well-known contributions by the Pythagoreans to mathematics, music and astronomy, Pythagoreanism subsequently became a designation also for recondite religious movements. The establishment of the Pythagorean societies was followed in the fourth century BCE by that of the Platonic 'Academy' and the Aristotelian 'Peripatetics,' both organized on the legal model of religious associations, and then in the early third century by the founding of the Epicurean 'Garden' and of Stoicism (Mason 1996).

In his historical overview of philosophers from Thales to Epicurus, the third-century CE writer Diogenes Laertius described these philosophical schools as 'successions.' He further organized these 'successions' into two major traditions (1.13): an Ionian lineage, from the pre-Socratics, through Plato and Aristotle, culminating with the Stoics (1.22–27) and an Italian lineage, from Pythagoras to Epicurus (8–10). Philosophy in the early Hellenistic period was dominated by the Epicurean and Stoic traditions along with a subsequent renaissance of Platonism from the late first century BCE.

The Epicureans

Epicurus (341–270 BCE), an Athenian citizen born on Samos, first met with some followers in the secluded garden of his home in Athens. His school, named after this original meeting place, soon spread throughout the Greek world and subsequently developed branches in Egypt, Asia, Mytilene and Lampsacus. By the first century BCE, Epicureanism had been introduced to the Roman world by Lucretius (c. 94–55 or 51?) through his magisterial poem On the Nature of Things. As such, the Epicurean schools—to which women were admitted as equals alongside men—epitomized the cosmopolitan and inclusory values of the larger Hellenistic world. Nevertheless, Epicurus and his followers rejected the allure of internationalization, opting instead for small alternative associations of philosophers bound by the ideal of friendship. The Epicureans recognized, however, the political reality of the civic world from which they sought to retire and they attempted, consequently, to establish good relations with those in power in order that they might be left alone (Frischer 1982: 40–41).
Figure 3.3   Epicurus, Roman copy of Greek original, third/second century BCE, in the British Museum. Wikimedia Creative Commons (photo Chris O—own work, all rights released)

As with Hellenistic philosophy generally, the Epicureans were not so concerned with abstractions, such as Plato's 'Good' or Aristotle's superlunar and superhuman cosmos, as they were with the immediate human condition and the practical goal of a happy life. Although they did not deny the existence of the gods, the Epicureans—like the eighteenth-century deists—did reject any view of divine intervention in the affairs of this world. Rather, the deities, in their sublime and tranquil detachment, provided the model for human detachment from civic life. The Epicureans attributed value, consequently, only to this worldly reality as defined by sense perception.

Adopting and adapting the atomic theory of the fifth-century BCE philosopher, Democritus, they understood the world as the consequence of an infinite number of atoms that might collide and, from time to time, combine to form the phenomena of the sensible universe. Holding the cosmos to be a natural if accidental combination of atoms that would, at some point, decompose, they epitomized the Hellenistic attribution of existence to chance. Since, consequently, any phenomenon had value only in terms of its immediate practical advantage, pleasure was considered the highest good by Epicurus and his followers. By 'pleasure,' however, the Epicureans did not mean 'the pleasures of the prodigal or the pleasures of sensuality,' as many understood them in antiquity as today. Rather, as Epicurus wrote in a 'Letter to Menoeceus' preserved by Diogenes Laertius:

> By pleasure we mean the absence of pain in the body and of trouble in the soul . . . It is sober reasoning, searching out the grounds of every choice and avoidance, and banishing those beliefs through which the great tumults take possession of the soul.
>
> (Diogenes Laertius 10.122–135: 131)

For the Epicureans, in other words, pleasure referred to the ideal of a trouble-free existence in which the body was healthy and the mind undisturbed (Adamson 2015: 31–37).

Despite a veneration of Epicurus to the point of divinity by his followers (Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 5.1–54; Adamson 2015: 47), the Epicurean emphasis on withdrawal from the political world and its dismissal of any transcendent destiny had little appeal to Romans and their ideal of a just and good state guaranteed by the gods. Consequently, this thoroughly materialistic tradition was eclipsed by Stoicism in the philosophical imagination of the later Hellenistic period.

The Cynics and the Stoics

Stoicism was founded by Zeno of Citium (335–263 BCE), who began his career as a student of Crates (c. 368/365–288/285 BCE), a follower of the Cynic philosopher, Diogenes of Sinope (c. 412/403–c. 324/321 BCE). In some ways similar to the Epicureans, the Cynics had taught that the wise man will reject what is conventional in order to follow a 'natural' way of life based on action rather than thought. By 'natural,' however, Diogenes meant 'primitive' and the Cynics consequently withdrew not only from civic life as did the Epicureans but flaunted as well all social convention as constructs contrary to their ascetic style of life (Adamson 2015: 14–15). Although never institutionalized as a philosophical school, Cynicism continued to be influential throughout the Hellenistic period. Some have even noted a relationship between the simple life style advocated by the Cynics, the aphoristic form of their teachings and their social critiques, and those of the earliest Jesus traditions (Mack 1988: 67–69, 1993: 114–121).

When Zeno broke with Crates, he began to expound his own teachings in the marketplace of Athens among the colonnades (stoa), from which his school derived its name. He essentially developed the Cynic way of life into an ethical system that he integrated into a comprehensive philosophy (Adamson 2015: 78). Zeno and his followers prided themselves on 'the remarkable coherence of the[ir] system and the extraordinary orderliness of the subject-matter' (Cato, in Cicero, On the Ends of Good and Evil 3.74). Generally, the Stoics conceived of the cosmos as an organic whole, a pan-theistic system of universal law. They owed much of their success to an ability to unify, by means of allegory, the various philosophical and popular expressions of cosmic law, whether this 'many-named' cosmic law was imagined as fire, as taught by the fifth-century BCE philosopher Heraclitus, or as fate or heimarmenē, the natural order of things or as the rational order of things (logos). This law received 'religious' expression by Zeno's successor, Cleanthes (331–232 BCE):
Figure 3.4   Herm of Zeno of Citium, cast in Pushkin Museum from an original in Naples. Wikimedia
Creative Commons. Photo shako; own work https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/
File%3AZeno_of_Citium_pushkin.jpg

> Most glorious of immortals, Zeus
> The many-named, almighty evermore,
> Nature's great Sovereign, ruling all by law—
> . . .
> For thee this whole vast cosmos, wheeling round
> The earth, obeys, and where thou leadest
> It follows, ruled willingly by thee.
>
> (Hymn to Zeus, trans. Grant 1953: 152)

Stoicism provided, thereby, a philosophical rationale for the increasing universalism that came to characterize the Hellenistic philosophical and religious traditions.

Chrysippus (c. 280–207 BCE), the third head of the school after Cleanthes, refined the teachings of Zeno and consolidated them with various directions that were beginning to develop in Stoic teachings into what thereafter was considered throughout the Hellenistic period to be the orthodox or standard position. 'Had there been no Chrysippus,' the saying went, 'there would have been no Stoa' (Diogenes Laertius 7.183).

Despite the Stoics' comprehensive integration of logic, physics and ethics, Stoicism attracted less interest in late antiquity as a philosophical system than as a way of life, as the ethical writings of Seneca the younger (c. 4 BCE/1 CE–65 CE), Epictetus (mid first to mid second century CE) and Marcus Aurelius (121–180 CE) exemplify. Since cosmic law, in the Stoic view, governed moral order as well as the natural world, to live a life of virtue was to live a harmonious life in accord with nature. The primary characteristic of this natural law was rationality (logos), and reason, consequently, was the way to knowledge of its universal truth (Samuel 1988: 203). To cultivate this rationality, both a human endowment and the essence of divinity, and to live in harmony with it were to become 'offshoots' of god (Epictetus, Discourses 1.14.6) and thus 'kin' with him (Marcus Aurelius, Meditations 10.6). The Stoics thus shared with Epicureans the goal of human perfectibility in this existence, but, in stark contrast to the Epicureans, the Stoic idea of a universal norm of virtue accorded more with Platonic (and later Christian) views concerning the transcendental nature of truth.

Hellenistic Platonism

A 'middle-Platonism' may be traced from the reaction of Antiochus of Ascolon (c. 130–69/68 BCE) against the first-century BCE emergence of philosophical scepticism, a position which, claiming the authority of Socrates, rejected all doctrine and questioned all positions on the grounds that things are finally unknowable (Diogenes Laertius 1.16). Influenced by Stoicism, however, Antiochus had understood that the goal of life was to live in accordance with nature. During this same century, Eudorus of Alexandria challenged this Stoic view of nature with the Platonic ideal of living in accordance with the 'likeness of god' (Plato, Theaetetus 176B; Dillon 1977: 44). At about the same time, Nigidius Figulus, considered by Cicero to be the founder of neo-Platonism (Cicero, Timaeus 1), revised and revived Pythagoreanism in Rome. Pythagoras' teachings had been preserved by Plato and had influenced especially Plato's views of cosmology (Plato, Timaeus) and religion (Plato, Phaedo).

The transcendentalism of Hellenistic Platonism constituted a reaction against the scientific traditions of the Aristotelian tradition as well as against the materialistic and empirical philosophies of the Epicureans and, in part, the Stoics (Adamson 2015: 158). Platonists had always differentiated between the world of the senses and the world of ideas, insisting that sense perception is subject to deception. Consequently, early Hellenistic philosophical appeals to sensual reality became supplemented and, in late antiquity, even replaced by claims to a transcendental truth that blurred the distinction between philosophy and religion (Adamson 2015: 159). If Stoicism first provided a philosophical rationale for the universalism that came to characterize Hellenistic religions, middle-Platonism reinforced that rationale with a hypercosmic transcendentalism appropriate to the Ptolemaic cosmological map. This commitment of Hellenistic Platonism to 'a non-material, intelligible world beyond this one' together with 'a transcendent supreme principle' was central to all variations of Hellenistic Platonism; it culminated in the neo-Platonism of Plotinus (205–269/70 CE; Dillon 1977: 51).

Plotinus understood that the true self or soul is a child of 'God,' the 'Father' or the 'One' (Enneads 2.9.16), and that those who are with the One are, consequently, 'brothers' (Enneads 5.18.12; Adamson 2015: 209–215). The souls, in other words, are children of 'their father, God' which are 'brought up far away' not knowing 'who they themselves or their parents are' (Enneads 5.5.1). Those who know themselves—which is the command of God (Enneads 4.3.1)—will know their genealogy and, consequently, their divine origins (Enneads 6.9.7). For Plotinus, in other words, the human soul is kin by nature to the higher reality (Enneads 1.6.2, 2.3.9, 2.9.18, 3.3.1, 3.5.1, 4.4.45). Recognition of this kinship with God is the beginning of the soul's return.
Figure 3.5   Plotinus, from the Museum in Ostia Antica. Wikimedia Creative Commons. Photo anonymous, but in the public domain https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File%3APlotinos.jpg

Some of the early philosophers had claimed descent from the gods who gave sanction to the existing social and political order, or at least they claimed some analogy between themselves and divine characteristics (Frischer 1982: 18, 77–79). Pythagoras, for example, had not only claimed descent from Hermes (Diogenes Laertius 8.4) but asserted also that 'only god is wise' and that philosophy was 'the love of wisdom' (Diogenes Laertius 1.12; Frischer 1982: 20–21). Modern differences assumed between at least some of the philosophical schools and religious traditions, both social alternatives which sought legitimation by claims to superhuman power, were not so sharp in antiquity; their claim of kinship with the gods by descent later became transformed into philosophical and theological claims of epistemological privilege concerning truth.

Given Plotinus' emphasis on the kinship of realized souls, his vision of the ideal society would be constituted as a kinship group on the social model of the alternative communities that proliferated in the Hellenistic period generally. Plotinus actually petitioned the Emperor Gallienus to consign him a deserted city in Campania in which he and his aristocratic companions might resettle according to his utopian ideals under the name of Platonopolis (Porphyry, Life of Plotinus 12). Although Plotinus' request was rejected, his utopian vision was revived in Christian metaphor by Augustine's ideal of a transcendental 'City of God'—a legitimating model for political hierarchy (Williams 1955: 9–10) and the 'dream of many Christian centuries' (Hardy 1955: 257).

Hellenistic religions

Whereas philosophy retained an essentially Hellenic character during the Graeco-Roman period and was consequently one of the factors that shaped a Hellenistic culture, the history of religions was profoundly altered by the non-Hellenic cultural contacts and interactions initiated by the conquests of Alexander. Native cults with their base in local populations, including native Greek cults such as those of Dionysus, for example (Nilsson 1957), or of the Eleusinian Demeter, found themselves increasingly situated in an international and multicultural context. The Hellenization of these previously local deities, the Egyptian Isis, for example, and of their cults, involved their adaptation and transformation to the newly established and increasingly dominant Greek language, to conditions of scientific/cosmological universalism, political internationalism and to the consequences of military and commercial mobility and subsequent emigration.

Not all native religions wholeheartedly embraced Hellenization. Some, like the Hellenistic associations, resisted by attempting to preserve their traditional linguistic and cultural forms and, especially, the native character of their local deities; some even resisted Hellenization to the point of revolt against its political pressures and its military forces (Eddy 1961; Rudolph 1983: 286, 288). A series of Egyptian anti-Hellenistic revolts from 245 BCE provide one example, as do the Jewish revolts against Seleucid attempts to Hellenize Jerusalem in the second century BCE (1 and 2 Maccabees). Even Judaism, however, was strongly influenced by Hellenistic culture—especially in its diaspora—as the translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek around the second century BCE indicates. Known as the Septuagint (LXX), after an alleged team of seventy-two translators, six from each of the twelve Jewish tribes, completed this translation in exactly seventy-two days. This translation was held to be as inspired and thus as authoritative for Greek-speaking Jews as was the Hebrew original (Letter of Aristeas 32, 307, 310–311). Native cults, which did not in some way adapt to the transformed conditions of the Hellenistic world, survived only in poetic reference or political rhetoric, if at all.

Hellenistic mysteries

The religious form generally considered most characteristic of the new Hellenistic religiosity is the 'mystery cult' (Bowden 2010). The characterization is, however, elusive since 'mystery' is both the self-designation of a wide range of Hellenistic social groups, from small collegial associations to some well-established Hellenistic religions, as well as a modern categorization for a number of Hellenistic cults for which a certain 'family resemblance' is proposed. As a self-designation, 'mystery' indicated minimally an association in which membership required some formalized procedure of initiation (Gk. mysteria = Lt. initia), usually under the patronage of a particular deity (Bremmer 2014). As a modern category, the Eleusinian Mysteries of Demeter—also a self-designation—is most often presented as paradigmatic.

The Mysteries of Demeter

The Mysteries of Demeter, celebrated in the town of Eleusis, fourteen miles west of Athens, seemingly developed from a family cult that initially admitted only citizens of Eleusis and perhaps only members of certain noble families of that town. At least the prerequisite for late priestly administrators of the cult was membership in one of two Eleusinian hereditary 'lineages' (genea).

According to a brief account of the origins of the Eleusinian mysteries by the Athenian orator Isocrates (436–338 BCE), Demeter founded her cult in Eleusis out of gratitude for certain unspecified 'services' extended her by the 'ancestors' of Eleusis and that initiation into the cult consisted, in part at least, of revealing to the initiates the nature of these 'services' (Panegyricus 28). According to the Homeric Hymn to Demeter, one of the ancestors of Eleusis, who had shown Demeter hospitality in her wanderings in search of her abducted daughter Persphone, was Eumolpus, a presumed son of Poseidon and one of the mythical rulers of Eleusis. Consequently, Demeter 'showed [the Eleusinians] the conduct of her rites and taught . . . all mysteries' (Homeric Hymn to Demeter 184, 475). The 'Hierophant,' or chief priest of the Eleusinian cult, continued to be selected from the Eumolpidae, the family that claimed descent from this ancestor, as were the cult officials, known as the 'Exegetes of the Eumolpidae.' Similarly, the 'Daduch,' the second highest administrator of the cult, and the offices of 'Sacred Herald' and 'Altar-priest' were selected from the Kerykes. Although the genealogy of this family is less clear, they claimed descent from the lineage of Keryx, the 'herald,' who either was a son of Eumolpos (Pausanias 1.38.3) or of Hermes, the divine herald (Mylonas 1961: 234; Clinton 1974: 8). Figure 3.6 is a photo of Demeter in the form of a kistophorous Caryatid from her sanctuary in Eleusis. This object supported (with a matching sculpture) the roof of the sanctuary. Demeter carries on her head a kiste or sacred basket which probably contained the 'objects' of the mysteries and is decorated with symbols of the cult: ears of corn, poppies and roses.

Gennētai, members of a particular genos, were generally identified by their claims of descent from a common ancestor. Such gennētai were particularly concerned with the deity who was considered to be their ancestor or who had been the protector of the ancestors from whom they claimed descent and who, consequently, had some responsibility in the cult of that deity (Foucart 1914: 224–225). In addition to those claiming descent from a common ancestor, a (fifth-century?) law defined gennētai as including also 'foster-brothers' or 'sisters' as well as members of religious associations (Philochorus, fr. 35). The implication is that membership in a particular genos might also be conferred by adoption (or initiation)—even as a fictive ancestor might be adopted to give heroic or divine legitimacy to the genos. Under Greek and Roman law, adoptees were fully received into the family of the adopter—and into the familial cult—and accorded full rights of inheritance, succession and divine protection.

Figure 3.6   Demeter as a kistophorous Caryatid, from the museum in Eleusis. Photo Luther H. Martin

Isocrates' account suggests, in other words, that a special relationship, claimed for the ancestral families of Eleusis and the deity Demeter, was ritually replicated in the initiations into the mysteries. In this way, initiation into the rites of Demeter established a fictive/adoptive relationship between the ancestral families of Eleusis and the initiate and, thereby, between Demeter and the initiate such as was claimed for the ancestors and the deity. At least one Hellenistic source indicates that claims to relationship with Demeter were even extended to kinship with the deity herself. According to the pseudo-Platonic dialogue Axiochus, dated in the second or first century BCE, Axiochus became 'kin to the gods' as a consequence of his initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries (Axiochus 371D). Though there is little further documentation for this view, the notion of kinship with deity through adoption/ritual initiation might have had a basis in Homer's Odyssey, where Menelaos is promised an afterlife on the Elysian Plain as a consequence of his adoption into the family of the gods through his marriage to Helen (Odyssey 4.561–569). And, of course, Paul uses the Greek juridical term for adoption to describe those redeemed by God's son as themselves adopted sons of God (Gal. 4:4–5; Rom. 8:14, 23).

The ten-day initiation rite into the Mysteries of Eleusis was celebrated in the latter part of each September. The celebration began at the Eleusinion in Athens, where a branch of the Eleusinian cult had been established and a 'lesser mysteries' celebrated each spring in deference to Athenian political dominance, but then moved in torchlight procession to Eleusis along the 'Sacred Way.' The institution of a procession from the political to the cult center was a procedure typically followed in the spread of cults too closely identified with their locale to be fully disseminated (Nilsson 1951: 16, 38). After a day of rest and fasting, the pilgrims would enter the sacred precincts of Demeter and into the Telesterion or the 'House of Initiation' therein for the initiation rite itself. This 'night of mysteries' was followed again by rest and finally by the return of the new initiates from this religious center of the Panhellenic world to Athens, its cosmopolitan center.

The sole requirement for initiation throughout the history of the Eleusinian mysteries (apart from such practical necessities as sufficient funds to travel to Eleusis, per diem and cultic expenses such as providing for the required sacrifices) was that the initiates should not have taken human life and that they speak Greek—the latter being the same linguistic criterion that defined the social boundary between Greek and barbarian generally. Thus, initiatory admission into the Eleusinian community generally supported kin-claims of 'Greekness.' To this extent, the international popularity of the Eleusinian cult during the period following the conquests of Alexander furthered his program of Hellenization and that of his successors. Whatever their attraction, celebration of the Eleusinian Mysteries retained a widespread popular appeal throughout the Roman period (Cicero De legibus 2.14, 36), until they were terminated by the anti-pagan decrees of Theodosius in the final decade of the fourth century.

The Mysteries of Isis

Although the worship of Isis had been familiar to Greeks since the fifth century BCE when Herodotus had identified this Egyptian deity with Demeter (Herodotus 2.42, 48, 145), the worship of Isis outside of Egypt was initially limited to associations of expatriate Egyptians. In the fourth century BCE, for example, the veneration of a pre-Hellenistic Isis is documented among some Egyptian immigrants in Piraeus, the port of Athens (Heyob 1975: 6). By the third century BCE, however, Hellenized cults of Isis are documented along the Greek coast and on some of the Greek islands (Heyob 1975: 7).

In contrast to the Mysteries of Demeter, which retained its traditional cult center at Eleusis and to which initiates were required to travel if they desired to become initiates, a non-ethnically based Hellenized Mysteries of Isis finally spread, according to Diodorus Siculus, through 'practically the entire inhabited world' (Diodorus Siculus 1.25.4)—not, however, without resistance from Rome. Given imperial suspicion of foreign or foreign-sounding associations, Rome attempted in the first century BCE to suppress the cult and again early in the first century CE. This popular cult nevertheless survived and flourished until the prohibition of paganism at the end of the fourth century CE.

The Hellenistic Mysteries of Isis shared some interesting features with that of Demeter. Whereas similarities between differing religious groups sharing a cultural context can often be accounted for by varying perspectives on common cultural problematics, those between the Demeter and Isis cults, as among a number of Hellenized native cults and religious innovations during the period, may be accounted for in part by an overt modelling of the renowned Eleusinian rites. According to Plutarch, Timotheus, a Hierophant of the Eumolpid family, had been summoned from Eleusis by Ptolemy Soter of Egypt (367/6–282 BCE) to assist the king in propagating a new cult of Serapis as Isis' con-sort (Plutarch, On Isis and Osiris 28). And, in Plutarch's account, there are a number of similarities between the Hellenized myth of Isis and the version of the Demeter myth preserved in the Homeric Hymn to Demeter: Isis, like Demeter, founded her own cult after a period of sorrowful wandering; during their wanderings both goddesses came to rest by a spring in silence until taken in by the local queen as a nurse for her infant child, and, in a curious account common to both stories, the two deities burned away the mortality of their adopted child by night. Despite such common motifs, apparently borrowed from the earlier myth of Demeter, the Hellenized Mysteries of Isis retained its Egyptian 'aura' by employing iconic Egyptian motifs and by displaying sacred books purportedly written in Egyptian hieroglyphics, a language that, according to the second-century CE writer and purported initiate, Apuleius, was 'impossible to be read' by non-initiates (Metamorphoses 11.22).

Since Hellenistic religious groups never established any official headquarters or authority (the Eleusinian cult being an exception) which might have sent out missionaries to propagate a particular doctrine or which might have insured some measure of 'orthodoxy,' the question remains of how to account for the widespread dissemination of such formerly native religious cults as that of Isis. It would seem that a number of formerly native religions might initially have developed from the Hellenistic proliferation of ethnic associations; there is no question that a 'religious' (or idealistic) dimension was 'embedded' in virtually all of these groups (Cotter 1996: 79; Kloppenborg and Wilson 1996: 18). When the ethnic or familial rationale for these ethnic societies was no longer compelling, as in the demise of the first-generation founders and/or in cases of assimilation, new members could be recruited by conferring fictive kinship status upon non-ethnic petitioners through rites of initiation modelled on the widespread juridical practice of adoption. Some of these fictive-kin societies, many of which already claimed the designation 'mystery,' may have evolved into the famous mystery cults of the Hellenistic world in which formerly familial or native deities became universalized in order to provide patronage for their clientele in an internationalized context.

Figure 3.7   Temple of Isis in Pompeii. Photo Luther J. Martin

The sole reason for anyone to be initiated into such a cult as that of the Egyptian Isis would be if he or she were in fact 'non-Egyptian.' Membership in the Hellenized (second century CE) Mysteries of Isis was no longer attainable, according to Apuleius' Isis novel Metamorphoses, by birth or by inheritance (Metamorphoses 11.15) but now by an initiatory rebirth (Metamorphoses 11.16, 21) in which Isis became recognized as the initiate's spiritual mother and the presiding priest of Isis as his spiritual father (Metamorphoses 11.25). An earlier story in the novel proleptically confirms this view of initiation: Venus, who is subsequently identified with Isis (Metamorphoses 11.2), admonished her son for his disobedience and threatened to 'produce another son much better than' him through 'adoption' and bequeathing to this adopted son her divine legacy (Metamorphoses 5.29).

Whereas the Mysteries of Isis, like that of Demeter, retained its character of conferring fictive kinship, at least in its initiatory discourse, the Hellenized cult of Isis thoroughly redefined the character of its formerly Egyptian deity as a 'universal queen of heaven' (Metamorphoses 11.2, 5). Unlike the local deities of an earlier period, Hellenistic deities like Isis came to be understood as playing a cosmic role. Thus, in contrast to an earlier Hellenistic problematic of life governed by a cosmic rule of chance or fortune, Isis was portrayed as the beneficent 'Good Fortune' that 'is not blind, but can see' (Metamorphoses 11.15). Initiation into the Mysteries of Isis involved, in other words, not only adoption into the 'ethnic' circle of the Hellenized Isis and the acquisition of her 'Egyptian' wisdom but also her universalized cosmic protection.

The Mysteries of Glycon

The oracle and 'mysteries' of Glycon, established in the second century CE by Alexander of Abonoteichos, offer a good example of Hellenistic religious innovation on the model of the Eleusinian mysteries. According to an exposé of Alexander by his contemporary Lucian of Samasota (Alexander the False Prophet), Alexander began his career as a teacher of spirituality in the tradition of Apollonius of Tyana, a first-century CE contemporary of Jesus and an itinerate, neo-Pythagorean sage, who healed the sick, exorcized demons and taught ascetic purity. Subsequently, Alexander teamed up with a certain Cocconas and the two devised an elaborate scheme to construct an oracle of 'Glycon' who they claimed was a new manifestation of Asclepius, the physician deity who cured illness by giving oracular instructions through dreams and who was most often portrayed with a serpent coiled about his staff. Following the untimely death of Cocconas, Alexander successfully established his oracle in Abonoteichus. This oracle, which involved a serpent, a puppet head controlled by hidden strings and a speaking tube, amazed the growing crowds that responded to extravagant reports that Alexander had planted throughout the empire (Lucian, Alexander the False Prophet 15, 26).

Eventually, Alexander established 'a celebration of [the] mysteries' of Glycon over which he presided as hierophant accompanied by 'a number of would-be Eumolpids and Kerykes' but which explicitly excluded such 'atheists' as Epicureans and Christians. The rites of these mysteries included an initial proclamation 'as at Athens,' a reference to the Athenian proclamation that preceded the Eleusinian mysteries, and 'torchlight ceremonies' as in the Eleusinian celebrations (Lucian, Alexander the False Prophet 38–40). The widespread popularity of this cult, which was given imperial recognition by Marcus Aurelius, is corroborated by a number of gems, coins and inscriptions discovered from this period (Harmon 1925: 173).

The Mysteries of Mithras

The Mysteries of Mithras provide an example of religious innovation based on fictive claims to ethnicity. According to Plutarch, Romans were introduced to the cult of Mithras, originally an Indo-Persian deity, by Cilician pirates who had been transported to Italy following their defeat in 67 BCE by the Roman general Pompey (Plutarch, Life of Pompey 24). Whatever the historical origins of Roman Mithraism (Beck 2004), it is clear that the Mysteries of Mithras were one of the 'new' religions of the late Hellenistic period. Its widespread presence is documented from the second through to the fourth century CE by archaeological finds of Mithraea or Mithraic temples. While Mithraic finds are distributed throughout the Roman world, they are clustered especially in Rome and its vicinity as well as along the borders of the empire, especially along Hadrian's Wall in England, along the Rhine and Danube. This distribution of Mithraea along the boundaries of the empire but centering in Rome itself has led some to suggest that perhaps Mithraism was largely a Roman innovation rather than a cult transported from Persia. Although Persia was one of Rome's traditional enemies, this view capitalizes upon Mediterranean peoples' attraction to 'wisdom from the East'—similar to that in the modern West—an attraction which in antiquity dates from the attribution of universal wisdom to Pythagoras as the consequence of his purported travels in Egypt.

While dispersed throughout the empire, Mithraic organization was characterized by numerous small, apparently autonomous, groups. Inscriptions indicate that these Mithraic cells, similar to other religious groups of the Hellenistic period, were organized as 'brotherhoods' under the leadership of a 'father,' the highest of the seven grades of Mithraic initiation. Initiation into this brotherhood, consequently, must have had overtones of adoption into the Mithraic 'family lineage,' a fictive genealogy that claimed ancestry with the 'Persian' deity, Mithras, and, according to the name of the fifth stage of initiation, claimed Persians as ancestors. Consequently, all members of this gens (= Gk. genos) were, in principle, eligible to achieve the highest grade of initiation, the presiding 'pater'—functionally equivalent to 'hierophant'—and to minister to his own Mithraic cell, contributing thereby to the spread of the cult.

Figure 3.8   Fresco of a Mithraic tauroctony from Marino. Photo Luther H. Martin

Figure 3.9   Mithraeum of San Clemente. Photo Luther H. Martin

Although the Mithraic groups seem to have shared the similarity of kin–organization, there seems to have been no unifying doctrine or system of beliefs for the cult apart from the ubiquitous presence of the tauroctony, the central cult image of Mithras slaying a bull. This sacrificial image has been identified as a 'star-map' with each of its component images, e.g. the dog, cup, scorpion, bull representing signs of the zodiac positioned with respect to the celestial equator.

Recognition of the tauroctony's representation as both sacrifice and star-map would have triggered among initiates a mental state of cognitive dissonance, a contradictory confusion that results in experiences of discomfort. A resolution of such incongruities understands the ambiguity of the tauroctony as a repetitive, serial representation of mundane existence transcended by a celestial promise that seems to be central to the Mithraic initiatory experience.

The tauroctonous cult icon clearly indicates an astrological orientation for the cult. Every Mithraeum was constructed in caves or rooms made to resemble caves (with spectacular examples of the latter to be seen in the Mithraeum of Capua Vetere and in that beneath San Clemente in Rome). These Mithraea symbolized the cosmos; their arched ceilings often decorated with planets, stars, or the signs of the zodiac.

When initiates in rites held in these Mithraea proceeded progressively through the seven grades of Mithraic initiation, they symbolically ascended a seven–runged ladder of initiation.

As a result, initiates ritually entered the astrologically constructed world of Mithraism and transcended this worldly existence with its cosmic and social problematics and symbolically entered for a time into the eighth, hypercosmic realm (Martin 2015). Mithraism thus shared with late-antique Platonism a soteriological goal of cosmic transcendence (see the reports of the neo-Platonist Porphyry on Mithraism, in Origen, Contra Celsum 6.22 and Porphyry, De antro nympharum 5–6, 15, 18, 20 and 24).

Gnostic and Hermetic traditions

At the core of those positions that may be termed 'Gnostic' is a dualistic view of the cosmos in which spirit and matter are understood to be sharply antithetical together with the conviction that the true or spiritual self is consubstantial with a spiritual reality or deity which transcends the material cosmos. This consubstantiality with a transcendent or hypercosmic deity was based on Gnostic claims to spiritual descent from and, therefore, kinship with the deity. The nature of this genealogical descent was spelled out in various mythologies of cosmogonic fall that offered an explanation for the Gnostics' earthly existence in the flesh, governed by the senses. In a tractate representative of the 'Sethian' Gnostic tradition, we read, for example, that after the Invisible Spirit had placed Adam over the first aeon 'with the mighty one, the Autogenes, the Christ':

Figure 3.10 Mithraic 'ladder' of initiation from the Mithraeum of Felicissimus at Ostia.
Photo Luther H. Martin

> [h]e placed his son Seth over the second aeon . . . And in the third aeon the seed [descend-ants] of Seth was placed . . . And the souls of the saints were placed (there). And in the fourth aeon the souls were placed of those who do not know the Pleroma and who did not repent at once, but who persisted for a while and repented afterwards.
> (The Apocryphon of John II.1.9.11–22, trans. Robinson 1990: 109–110)

If a soteriological 'restoration' was to be 'realized,' one's true origin and spiritual genealogy must be 'known.' In the famous words of Theodotus, a second-century Valentinian—one of the two major Gnostic traditions alongside the Sethian, true knowledge, is that 'of who we were, and what we have become, where we were or where we were placed, whither we hasten, from what we are redeemed, what birth is and what rebirth' (Excerpts of Theodotus 78.2, trans. Casey 1934). Consequently, Gnosticism explic-itly represented the kinship claims characteristic of Hellenistic social groups generally but now expressed cosmologically in terms of the revival of Platonic transcendentalism in the late Hellenistic period.

Some Gnostics in third-century Rome, in fact, associated themselves with the neo-Platonic circle of Plotinus and even attended some of the philosopher's lectures (Enneads 2.9.10). Perhaps because of the closeness of this association, Plotinus wrote a treatise Against the Gnostics attempting to distinguish his teachings from theirs (Enneads 2.19). Whereas the Gnostics rejected this material world and, consequently, its creator as evil and developed their teachings around the theme of a hypercosmic or transcendent goal, Plotinus maintained that this creation is good and beautiful—an argument that later led Augustine to break with the Manichaean-Gnostic tradition with which he had earlier identified. And, according to the philosophers, the Gnostics complained that 'Plato had not penetrated to the depths of intelligible reality' and they appealed, consequently, to occult revelations by such figures as Zoroaster, Zostrianus, Nicotheus, Allogenes, Messos (Porphyry, Life of Plotinus 16). This claim by the Gnostics to an oral tradition of revelation allowed a degree of mythological imagination in these traditions that exceeded the rational speculations of even the most metaphysically inclined of the philosophers and was matched only in the Hermetic tradition.

Hermeticism was a philosophico-religious tradition that was similar in many ways to Gnosticism, though the oral teaching to which the Hermetists appealed was transmitted characteristically in the 'succession' of Hermes, the Greek name for the Egyptian deity Thoth (Herodotus 2.67, 138). Like the Greek Hermes, Thoth was a guide of souls, a messenger of the gods and the lord of wisdom. In addition, the Hellenistic Hermes/Thoth was considered by some to be the ruler of the heavenly bodies and of their influence on individual destiny (Fowden 1986: 22–23). Whereas the Hermetic traditions also assumed consubstantiality with a deity, many of them assumed some sort of continuity rather than dualism between matter and spirit, and employed, consequently, an 'alchemical' strategy in which matter as well as spirit might be transformed.

Though there may have been organized Gnostic and Hermetic associations, little is known of their social organization; rather their transcendental views seem to have been interpretations of existing traditions, such as Pythagoreanism, Platonism, Judaism and especially Christianity. Thus, Valentinus, one of the more well-known of the Christian Gnostics, claimed an interpretation of Christianity that was based upon direct revelation from the child Logos. And Theodotus wrote, with typical reference to typical Hellenistic cosmic imagery, that:

> [a] strange and new star arose doing away with the old astral decree, shining with a new unearthly light, which revolved on a new path of salvation, as the Lord himself, men's guide, who came down to earth to transfer from Fate to his providence those who believed in Christ.
>
> *(*Excerpts of Theodotus 74.2)

Adherents of these transcendentally structured interpretations understood themselves to possess an understanding superior to that held by non-Gnostic, 'orthodox' representatives of the various traditions to which they adhered, even as Plotinus understood his philosophical interpretations to be superior to that of traditional Platonism. Nevertheless, their claims to kinship with transcendent reality, which essentially divinized the human, represented a bold, humanistic challenge to the perduring materialistic traditions of Hellenistic philosophy, and came to dominate Western philosophy and religion until the rise of modern empirical sciences.

Conclusions

The Hellenistic period was one of transition—from local kinship or ethnic identities and political organization to imperial internationalism and cosmological universalism. This new spatial expanse of terrestrial and astronomical vastness was unintelligible to the average citizen. In response to the incomprehensibility of this geographic and cosmic expansion, numerous small, special-interest groups proliferated, replicating, as it were, the small-scale social organizations of yore. The Graeco-Roman philosophies and religions of this period belonged to this proliferation and were defined by their various understandings of and reactions to this new spatial expanse (Martin 1987). The Mysteries of Demeter, for example, retained its locative character at Eleusis, continuing to convey upon initiates, who were required to be Greek speakers, a fictive 'Greekness.' This proved to be an attraction for educated Roman subjects who were drawn to the rich achievements of Greek culture. The cult of Isis, on the other hand, developed mysteries in which the native Egyptian goddess was redefined as a celestial 'queen of heaven' and allowed her cult to migrate throughout the imperial world, as did the increasingly itinerate philosophers. The Mysteries of Mithras further imagined an initiatory process in which initiates would be able to transcend both the terrestrial and the celestial realms and enter (at least ritually) a hypercosmic domain beyond, a transcendental alternative similar to that imagined by various Gnostic movements, by the Hermetic tradition and by neo-Platonic philosophy. The alternative religious communities and teachings with their assorted locative, celestial and hypercosmical claims continued to exist side by side throughout the Graeco-Roman world until Theodosius' juridical prohibition of non-Christian practices at the end of the fourth century; the Platonic, neo-Platonic and Aristotelian philosophical traditions dominated Western thought until the rise of modern science.

Hellenistic intellectual traditions and religious practices were the forces that produced and propelled those first-century CE experiments in thought and practice that later became known collectively as 'Christian,' as well as providing the foil against which the early Christianities defined their identity. These forces and foils were diverse, only a few of which have been proposed in the previous discussion as markers on the cultural map of the Graeco-Roman world. A complete philosophical cartography for the context of the Christian beginnings must include, in addition to further discussion of the Epicurean, Stoic and Sceptic traditions (for which, see Long 1986; Adamson 2015, Pt. I), a full discussion of the emergence and influence of Hellenistic Platonism (Dillon 1977; Adamson 2015, Pt. II)—and not only the ideas of these philosophical traditions but their style of expression and argumentation as well as their real practices—and the development and use of Stoic technologies of the self in late antiquity, for example (Foucault 1986; Gill 2006). And, in addition to those religious options surveyed above, a complete cartography of the religious landscape during the Graeco-Roman period would include discussions of the introduction into the West of Hellenized rites of such cults as those of the Thracian Dionysus, of the Syrian goddess Atargatis and the Syrian Jupiter Dolichenus, and the introduction into Rome of Asclepius and of the Phrygian 'Great Mother of the Gods,' as well as of the largely neglected influence of official Roman religious practices. The web of continuities and antagonisms between all of these philosophical, religious and religio-philosophical alternatives must be precisely considered. These relationships must include not only those of thought and practice but also those of mythology and social formation. Perhaps the previous overview provides some hint of the richness and complexity of that culture which has so determined the intellectual and religious views of subsequent Western civilization, both in its own right and through that of the Christian religion from which it emerged.

Bibliography

Unless otherwise noted, all classical sources are cited from the editions of the Loeb Classical Library, London: William Heinemann/Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Adamson, P. (2015) Philosophy in the Hellenistic and Roman Worlds. Vol. 2. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Beck, R. (2004) 'The mysteries of Mithras: A new account of their genesis,' in R. Beck (ed.) Beck on Mithraism: Collected Works with New Essays. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 31–44.

Berger, P. (1967) The Sacred Canopy: Elements of a Sociological Theory of Religion. Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Company.

Bowden, H. (2010) Mystery Cults of the Ancient World. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Bremmer, J. N. (2014) Initiation into the Mysteries of the Ancient World. Berlin: De Gruyter.

Brown, R. E. (1977) The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary of the Infancy Narratives in Matthew and Luke. New York: Doubleday.

Burkert, W. (1985) Greek Religion, trans. J. Raffan. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Casey, R. P. (1934) The Excerpta ex Theodoto of Clement of Alexandria. London: Christophers.

Clinton, K. (1974) The Sacred Officials of the Eleusinian Mysteries, Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, 64, 3 N. S. Philadelphia, PA: The American Philosophical Society.

Clinton, K. (1992) Myth and Cult: The Iconography of the Eleusinian Mysteries. Stockholm, Sweden: Acta Instituti Atheniensis Regni Sueciae 8, XI.

Cotter, W. (1996) 'The collegia and Roman law: State restrictions on voluntary associations,' in Kloppenborg and Wilson 1996, 74–89.

Dillon, J. (1977) The Middle Platonists. London: Duckworth.

Droysen, J. G. (1836–1843, 2nd ed. 1877) Geschichte des Hellenismus, 3 vols, new ed. by E. Bayer, 1952–1953. rpt. Munich, Germany: Deutscher Taschenbuch, 1980.

Eddy, S. K. (1961) The King Is Dead: Near Eastern Resistance to Hellenism, 334–31 BC. Lincoln, NE: University of Nebraska Press.

Foucart, P. F. (1873) Des associations religieuses chez les grecs. Paris: Klincksieck.

Foucart, P. F. (1914) Les Mystères d'Eleusis. Paris: A. Picard.

Foucault, M. (1986) The Care of the Self, trans. R. Hurley. New York: Pantheon Books.

Fowden, G. (1986) The Egyptian Hermes. A Historical Approach to the Late Pagan Mind. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Frischer, B. (1982) The Sculpted Word: Epicureanism and Philosophical Recruitment in Ancient Greece. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Gast, J. (1782) The History of Greece from the Accession of Alexander till Its Final Subjection to the Roman Power. London: J. Murray.

Gill, C. (2006) The Structured Self in Hellenistic and Roman Thought. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Gillies, J. (1807) The History of the World from the Reign of Alexander to that of Augustus. London: A. Strahan and T. Cadell and W. Davies.

Grant, F. C. (1953) Hellenistic Religions: The Age of Syncretism. Indianapolis, IN: The Bobbs–Merrill Co.

Grote, G. (1854) History of Greece. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Hardy, E. R. (1955) 'The City of God,' in R. W. Battenhouse (ed.) A Companion to the Study of St. Augustine. New York: Oxford University Press.

Harland, P. A. (2014) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. II North Coast of the Black Sea, Asia Minor. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der ältere Kirche. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Harmon, A. M. (1925) Lucian, vol. IV, Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Heyob, S. K. (1975) The Cult of Isis among Women in the Graeco-Roman World. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Kant, I. (1951) Critique of Judgment, trans. J. H. Bernard. New York: Hafner Publishing.

Kloppenborg, J. S. and Ascough, R. S. (forthcoming 2017) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. III. The Aegean Islands, Syria-Palestine, Egypt. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der ältere Kirche. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Kloppenborg, J. S. and Ascough, R. S. (2011) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. I Attica, Central Greece, Macedonia, Thrace. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der ältere Kirche. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Kloppenborg, J. S. and Wilson, S. G. (eds) (1996) Voluntary Associations in the Graeco-Roman World. London: Routledge.

Long, A. A. (1986) Hellenistic Philosophy: Stoics, Epicureans, Sceptics, 2nd ed. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Mack, B. L. (1988) A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Mack, B. L. (1993) The Lost Gospel: The Book of Q and Christian Origins. San Francisco, CA: Harper.

Mack, B. L. (1995) Who Wrote the New Testament? The Making of the Christian Myth. San Francisco, CA: Harper.

Martin, L. H. (1987) Hellenistic Religions: An Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press.

Martin, L. H. (2015) The Mind of Mithraists: Historical and Cognitive Studies in the Roman Cult of Mithras. London: Bloomsbury.

Mason, S. (1996) 'Philosophiai: Graeco–Roman, Judean and Christian,' in Kloppenborg and Wilson, 31–58.

Murray, G. (1955) Five Stages of Greek Religion. Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co.

Mylonas, G. E. (1961) Eleusis and the Eleusinian Mysteries. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Nilsson, M. (1951) Cults, Myths, Oracles, and Politics in Ancient Greece, Acta Instituti Atheniensis Regni Sueciae, Series In 8, 1. Lund, Sweden: C. W. K. Gleerup.

Nilsson, M. (1957) The Dionysiac Mysteries of the Hellenistic and the Roman Age. New York: Arno Press.

Nock, A. D. (1933) Conversion: The Old and the New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo. London: Oxford University Press.

Paden, W. E. (1994) Religious Worlds: The Comparative Study of Religion. Boston, MA: Beacon Press.

Robinson, J. M. (ed.) (1990) The Nag Hammadi Library, 3rd rev. ed. San Francisco, CA: Harper.

Rudolph, K. (1983) Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism, 2nd ed., trans. and ed. R. McLachlan Wilson. San Francisco, CA: Harper & Row.

Said, E. W. (1975) Beginnings: Intention and Method. New York: Basic Books.

Samuel, A. E. (1988) The Promise of the West: The Greek World, Rome and Judaism. London: Routledge.

Smith, J. Z. (1990) Drudgery Divine: On the Comparison of Early Christianities and the Religions of Late Antiquity. Chicago, IL: The University of Chicago Press.

Taylor, L. R. (1931) The Divinity of the Roman Emperor. Middletown, CT: American Philosophical Association.

Ulansey, D. (1989) The Origins of the Mithraic Mysteries. New York: Oxford University Press.

Ulansey, D. (1991) 'The heavenly veil torn: Mark's cosmic inclusio,' Journal of Biblical Literature 110: 123–125.

Vico, G. (1970) The New Science of Giambattista Vico, trans. T. G. Bergin and M. H. Fisch. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Williams, D. D. (1955) 'The significance of St. Augustine today,' in R. W. Battenhouse (ed.) A Companion to the Study of St. Augustine. New York: Oxford University Press.

4

JEWISH TRADITION AND CULTURE

James K. Aitken

Any visitor to Rome up to the present day may gaze on the carved reliefs of the Arch of Titus in the heart of the ancient city, situated on the Via Sacra facing the forum. There represented on this triumphal arch, constructed posthumously to celebrate the emperor's victory over the Jews and his apotheosis (cf. Suetonius, Titus 1), are symbols of the Jewish Temple (the menorah, Torah Scrolls, shofars and the table for the shewbread), plundered from the Temple in 70 and subsequently brought to Rome (see Figure 4.1).

Figure 4.1   Relief on the Arch of Titus in Rome depicting the spoils of the Jerusalem Temple. Photo: J. K. Aitken

The relief encapsulates two aspects of Judaism in this period.[1] It attests to the Jewish resistance to Roman rule that was to repeat itself on several occasions, most notably in 115–18 against Trajan in the Diaspora as well as possibly in Palestine, 132–5 led by Bar Kochba in Palestine, and finally in 351 by Patricius in Palestine. The destruction of the Temple in 70 CE and, following the Bar Kochba revolt, the exclusion of Jews from Aelia Capitolina, the colony founded on the site of Jerusalem by Hadrian, required a consolidation and realignment of some major aspects of religious practice. However, the relief also attests to the very prominence of Jews in the Roman empire and beyond. They were important enough to be portrayed on a major monument in the very centre of the Roman empire. Their large numbers, estimated at eight or nine per cent of the population in the Roman empire alone (Horbury 1991: 40), gave them power and influence, of which some Christians could only be envious (see, e.g. Tertullian, Apologeticum 18.8; 21.1), and also ensured that they were a force to be reckoned with when in revolt. The large geographical spread of the Jewish communities meant that Jewish life and religion continued and was sustained without serious upheaval following the destruction of the Temple. The consolidation required was eased by the continuance of traditions and religious life in places with well-established Jewish communities outside as well as inside of Palestine.

The distribution of Jewish communities

In what is certainly an exaggeration (see Stern 1974: 119, 122) the first-century Alexandrian writer Philo records the total number of Egyptian Jews alone at one million (In Flaccum 43), an excessive figure matched only by the historian Josephus's similar massaging of numbers (e.g. Jewish War 2.561, 7.368). Such figures have led scholars earlier this century to estimate the total number of Jews in the Diaspora as running into many millions by the first century CE (e.g. Juster 1914: 209–12). The truth is that we can never be certain,[2] but both are probably correct to aim at a figure in the several millions, and it is likely that Jews outnumbered Christians in the Roman empire into the fourth century, if not later. The description in Acts 2:5–9 of Jews 'from every nation under heaven', and the listing of the many nations, indicate that Jews were considered at least to be all over the known world in the first century. Philo's figure for Egyptian Jews does indicate that they were a significant proportion of the population and that they were a comparatively old and established group in both Alexandria and Egypt (for a full history, see Modrzejewski 1991).

Outside of Rome, Egypt and Palestine where there were large communities, we must rely on non-literary remains and especially inscriptions and some synagogue sites. Recent publications and editions of inscriptions (e.g. Horbury and Noy 1992; Noy 1993, 1995) have helped our task, but even then it can be difficult to identify what is Jewish and what is not (cf. Kraemer 1991: 141–62). We can deduce much, nonetheless, of the cultural life and interaction with Christianity for the third to fifth centuries from the art and architecture of synagogues and of the Roman catacombs. It seems that by the first century, Jews were spread across the west coast of Italy, Cyrenaica in north Africa, Egypt, Palestine, all of Greece and Asia Minor, in the Bosphorus region on the north of the Black Sea and throughout the Parthian empire in the east. During the following centuries, we have evidence of Jewish presence further west, across the north coast of Africa and penetrating further into north and south Italy, France and Spain, as well as south into Arabia and Yemen.

Beyond the bounds of the Roman empire there existed large communities of Jews throughout Mesopotamia and Babylonia, a region for which we have greater literary evidence. The Jews in this region seem to have had sustained contact with Christians and held some political force, stationed as they were under the opponents of the Roman empire and with an interest in Palestine (see Goodblatt 2006). We should not forget either the large Jewish communities in Syria on the frontier of the empire. These communities are particularly important, being in areas where early Christian communities also arose and where Jews shared a common language of Aramaic (or Syriac in its Christian dialect). Although our knowledge is very limited for this area, we may surmise that there was close and long-standing contact between the two communities there. The close contact between Syrian Christianity and Judaism in Antioch in the second to fourth centuries has already been documented (Fiensy 1985). Certain possibly Jewish elements in the Syrian liturgy (see Gelston 1992: 23) and the tradition of reading two lessons from the Hebrew Bible may be added to this evidence (Jammo 1979: 108; cf. Acts 13:15). Contact and mutual influence may have continued in this region until well into the fourth century, and Fiensy draws attention to Chrysostom's need to preach to the Christians in Antioch (in c. 386 CE) in order to dissuade them from attendance at the synagogue (1985: 215–19). Whilst the Syriac version of the Hebrew Bible, known as the Peshitta, was translated from a Hebrew text, it was, surprisingly, preserved by the eastern churches alone.

Given the broad spread of Jewish communities, it is not possible to write a comprehensive synthesis of tradition and culture without some recognition of diversity. We should, however, be careful not to produce artificial divisions. Traditions and customs probably varied from town to town and country to country (cf. Rajak and Noy 1993: 75–93), dependent on the local situation, and it is not to be expressed in terms of a Diaspora–Palestine divide. It is perhaps artificial to envisage a Mediterranean Diaspora, rather than Mediterranean Jewish life as a whole (including Palestine), or the Roman empire as a place of lived experience (cf. Schwartz 2009). Amidst the diversity within Judaism certain themes constantly come to the fore as concerns for both Diaspora and Palestinian Jews. This has been succinctly put as 'the Pentateuchally based constitutional ideal of a holy nation governed within the covenant by high priest and king' (Horbury 1998a: 6). The ideals of a holy nation, self-government and a coming messiah or divine kingdom might in part account for the Jewish revolts, the art and images, the liturgical language, the literary production, the contact with non-Jews and the status placed on the patriarch and rabbis. At the same time, the aspirations and ideals, the art and literature, form part of wider Mediterranean cross-cultural traditions.

The Jews under Roman rule

The numbers of Jews around the Mediterranean ensured that when they revolted in one country it was of concern to the Roman authorities, especially as it meant that a revolt in one city or region could easily spread to another, as seems to have been the case in the revolts under Trajan of 115–17 CE. The revolts should, however, be seen in broad terms in the context of the Roman empire. One could point to Jewish dissatisfaction with an earthly ruler in place of a theocratic state, and indeed messianic hopes might have fuelled many of the revolts (see, e.g. Hengel 1961, 1983). But socio-economic factors play an equally important role. It is, therefore, instructive to note the factors that bear on most revolts in the Roman empire. Dyson (1975) in particular has demonstrated how native revolts in the Roman empire follow certain forms, and although he does not discuss the Jewish revolts, they could easily be included within this pattern (see Cohen 1986: 43–4). Revolts usually were instigated both by landless peasants, often forming bands of brigands, and by local aristocracy who had their own grievances against the Romans, whilst heavy Roman taxation causing economic distress for all provided an added incentive. In addition, and of particular moment in any comparison with the Jewish revolts, is the observation that religious 'messianic' speculation, or at least national aspirations, fuelled native revolts (for differing views of the evidence, see Goodman 2007; Horbury 2014). In 69 CE, at the time of the Jewish revolt in Judaea, Vespasian was forced to begin his rule as emperor by putting down a revolt that had arisen in Gaul led by Julius Civilis with the support of the Druids. It appears that the Druids, according to the Roman historian Tacitus (Histories 4.54.2), predicted the destruction of Rome and the rule of empire falling into the control of transalpine Gaul (Cohen 1986: 44). Tacitus notes similar aspirations being banded abroad in the first Jewish revolt against Rome (Histories 5.13.2; cf. Josephus, Jewish War 6.312–13).

The enduring effect of the first three Jewish revolts against Rome, in addition to the warning they sent regarding the strength of the Jews, was the consequences it had for Jewish political and religious life. The first revolt against Rome (66–72) had the support of both the upper and lower classes of society, each of whom had something to gain. The burden of heavy taxation and poor Roman administration as factors are signalled by the burning of public archives, including money-lenders' bonds, at the start of the war (Josephus Jewish War 2.427). It also appears that by the outbreak of the revolt, Jewish society in Palestine had broken down into factional disputes and violence, and that the ruling class had lost any claim to authority in the eyes of the people (Goodman 1987; Price 1992; but contrast Goodman 2007). The defeat of the Jewish forces and the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE ended Jewish political independence and brought to an end the role of the Temple as the religious centre and source of priestly power. From this point, the new centre of learning and the base from which a new system of leadership began to grow was Jamnia (Yavneh) to the west of Jerusalem, followed by Galilee and in time Babylonia.

Although it is unlikely that the Jews in Palestine participated in the revolts against Rome that arose in various countries in the time of Trajan (115–17), they did revolt once again with disastrous results in 132–5. Little is known of the revolts in 115–17 because of the lack of historical sources, but it seems they began in Egypt or at least in Cyrene and then continued into Egypt (see Smallwood 1981: 389–427) and Cyprus, perhaps motivated by general revolts in Mesopotamia (on which see Barnes 1989: 145–62). Slightly more evidence is available for the years 132–5, thanks to some manuscript and coin finds, although it is still not possible to reconstruct with any certainty the causes and order of events (see Mor 2016). The revolt appears to have been led by the figure of Bar Kochba ('son of the star'), whose name in rabbinic texts suggests that he was presented by some as a messianic figure, derived from an interpretation of the star in Num. 24:17 (cf. Septuagint). We know that Jewish messianic and some apocalyptic speculation existed at the time (e.g. Sibylline Oracle 5), and some of the symbolism on the coins of the period (apparently used as a means of propaganda) could be so interpreted (Meshorer 1982: 138–50). Nevertheless, we cannot say whether he saw himself as a messiah or indeed if he actually instigated the revolt or merely became its champion. There had already been unrest in Palestine in the years before the outbreak of the revolt, perhaps accounting for intense road building in 120–30 (Isaac and Oppenheimer 1985: 50–1), and some economic hardship may have been felt by the Jewish peasantry (Applebaum 1976: 15–17), although this is disputed (Mildenberg 1984: 84–94). It is also possible that the emperor Hadrian had planned before the revolt to rebuild Jerusalem as the Hellenistic city Aelia Capitolina (Dio Cassius, Epitome 69.12; see Smallwood 1981: 431–4). Whatever Hadrian's precise plans were, after decisively defeating the Jews in Palestine he was able to found Aelia Capitolina. Jews were officially (if not in practice) excluded from entry into the city, and were not allowed onto the Temple mount up until the fourth century, and even then only on the commemoration day of the destruction of the Temple. After 135, the majority of the Jewish population in Palestine lived in Galilee in the north and not Judaea, and consequently the centre of Jewish life moved to there, to Usha (until c. 170), then Beth Shearim and Sepphoris, and eventually, from the middle of the third century, Tiberias. It was also at this point that the Roman province was named Syria Palaestina, and from this name we can legitimately call the region Palestine. Another consequence of the revolt was that many people, including rabbis, fled to Babylonia for safety and remained there afterwards. Babylonia already had had for many centuries a sizeable Jewish population since the exile of 586–38 BCE, but this new wave of settlers ensured its establishment as the centre, along with Palestine, of Jewish learning and literary activity.

The rabbinic movement

It used to be held that the period of putative Jewish self-government in Jamnia following the fall of the Temple was formative for later Judaism, some even speaking of a synod meeting there, on the model of early church synods. The fixing of the Hebrew canon, the exclusion of Christianity from Judaism and the codification of Jewish law were all activities traditionally ascribed to Jamnia. This picture now seems far from satisfactory. From the perspective of someone living at that time, it would not have been clear until after the Bar Kochba revolt that the Temple would not be rebuilt. Tradition has it that Yohanan ben Zakkai was granted permission by Vespasian to establish an academy in the city of Jamnia, a small concession to the Jews (for discussion, see Saldarini 1975; Cohen 1984). The group that formed there was probably small and had little influence initially, but it appears that its teachings and decisions eventually became definitive and were incorporated into the foundational literature of the Judaism of this period, rabbinic Judaism. It probably took centuries for rabbinic Judaism as we now know it to become normative, and diversity, reflected in art, literature and language, can be found even in places of rabbinic influence.

Neusner has drawn attention to the fact that the discontinuity from the pre-70 era would not have been felt at Jamnia, but that the real historical break would have been in c. 140 with the re-establishment of the rabbis in the north after the devastation of southern Palestine (1971: vol. 3, 282–3). Our sources are primarily the rabbinic documents themselves, which are ideological and generally written or compiled much later than the time of which they are writing. They do, nonetheless, attest to the development of this rabbinic Judaism. The title 'rabbi' as a specific designation rather than as a polite form of address (as it is used in the Gospels) implies a new consciousness, and this appears to have been an established usage by the second century. A well-known dictum in the Tosefta (Eduy 3.4) indicates this self-consciousness:

> He who has students who in turn have students of their own is called a Rabbi. If his students are forgotten, he is called Rabban; if even the students of his students are already forgotten, he is called by his name [alone].

The rabbinic literature presents the rabbis as direct inheritors of the wisdom and law imparted to Moses by God at Sinai, and passed on through the chain of Pharisees (Mishnah Aboth 1). Certainly, some of the rabbis had connections with Pharisaism, but it should not be pushed too strongly (Cohen 1984). The study of the Bible and the law contained therein became a central aspect of rabbinic Judaism, as well as the very importance of study itself, in a way that it had not in Pharisaism.

From the second century, there arose the office of head of the Palestinian Jewish community, known in Greek as 'ethnarch' or 'patriarch' and in Hebrew as the nasi 'prince'. The details of the origins and status of the ethnarch are disputed (see Jacobs 1995: 1–9; Hezser 1997: 405–49). It was probably in Galilee that limited Jewish self-government was restored after Bar Kochba and the ethnarch gradually rose to prominence and stature. Perhaps in response to the rise of the ethnarch, an exilarchate was also established in the eastern Diaspora. The ethnarchs seem to have amassed great wealth and privilege, and behaved in a royal fashion, even seeing themselves as descendants of David. Origen in the third century confirms their royal manner, although his report that they tried capital cases may be an exaggeration of this (Epistles 1, 14). Such royal aspirations would have befitted the climate of the second century and the hopes of some Jewish circles (see Goodblatt 1984: 113–32). In the manner of the Roman salutatio, the ethnarch had clients who would pay their daily respects (e.g. j.Shabbat 12.3, 13c), whilst the local communities had to pay taxes for his upkeep (Codex Theodosianus 16.8.14, 16.8.29). His prime functions appear to have been judicial and legal, and he was assisted in this by a council of advisors. It is therefore appropriate that our first definitive ethnarch in the sources is Judah I (Judah Ha-Nasi) from the beginning of the third century, who is said to be responsible for the compilation of the major Jewish legal work, the Mishnah. The importance of the ethnarch is probably to be seen in the fact that after Bar Kochba there were no more Jewish revolts until the fourth century, and even then there was only one minor revolt, and it was not supported by the ethnarch. The authority of the ethnarch coupled with the appointment of high-ranking Roman governors in Palestine allowed for a time of peace and stability.

Jewish literature

Whilst the destruction of the Temple in 70 was not the end of Jewish religion and some no doubt considered it merely an interlude until the Temple would be rebuilt, as had happened before, it has left its mark on the literature in a number of ways. In the first place, the centre of Jewish literary activity increasingly shifted towards the east and to the population in Babylonia, although northern Palestine remained of equal importance in this respect. These twin centres were responsible for the production from the fifth century onwards of the Hebrew and Aramaic works, the Talmuds (one Palestinian and one Babylonian), and various exegetical commentaries on scripture (midrashim), incorporating ideas that had developed over the centuries. It also led to greater attention being focused on the activities of the synagogue and its role in education. The oral exposition of the Bible in the synagogue was eventually written down in the form of targumim, whilst paintings and mosaics depicted the same themes that were being expounded. There seems to have developed at the same time a move towards the compiling and editing of different traditions, perhaps local traditions, and finding a resolution between opposing opinions. This editorial work and the compilation of principally legal traditions found its expression in rabbinic literature.

Rabbinic literature

The one document above all others that came to predominate in Judaism after the Muslim conquest, both in itself and in its application in the Talmuds, was the Mishnah (meaning 'study' or 'oral tradition'). How this text came about, how representative it is of Judaism in the early centuries, and why it became normative are puzzles that none can satisfactorily answer. It is a compilation of legal rulings and sayings, often attributed to rabbis of the first two centuries CE, and tradition has it that it was put together by R. Judah the Prince (Ha-Nasi) in c. 200. It is clear that the Mishnah contains early traditions, but it is no easy task to determine the dates of the various traditions or even to confirm the date for the redaction of the Mishnah as 200 CE. Evidence of a non-rabbinic stream in Judaism can now be seen in the discovery of certain Second Temple texts (the Damascus Document, Aramaic Levi and the Wisdom of Ben Sira) in a medieval synagogue in Cairo (the Cairo Genizah). It seems that these texts, one sectarian and one disapproved of by the rabbis (see b.Sanhedrin 100b), indicate that even marginal works were copied and read throughout antiquity. The Mishnah is a legal text, concentrating on issues on which there is the greatest disagreement. What it omits may be ideas so central to Jewish belief that they do not need mentioning (cf. Sanders 1990: 330). It should not be taken as definitive of Judaism in the time from which it arises.

At some point after the completion of the Mishnah, the Tosefta (meaning 'addition, supplement') was compiled. This is a collection of books containing additional legal material to the Mishnah, and it is clear that it is closely related (in time and content) to the Mishnah. That much is evident in its naming of the same rabbis, its corresponding structure and its use of a similar Hebrew combined with occasional Aramaic words and Greek and Latin loan-words (see Stemberger 1996a: 149–63). Other legal works that were redacted in this period are the Tannaitic or halakic midrashim, which are exegetical commentaries (midrashim) on the biblical books Exodus to Deuteronomy. Although the rabbis named in these midrashim are from the Tannaitic period (i.e. from the first to the beginning of the third century), it seems likely that they were redacted after this period, even if it is not possible to give any certain dating.

One of the earliest halakic midrashim is known as the Mekhilta (meaning 'rule') of Rabbi Ishmael, comprising a commentary on portions of Exod. 12:1 through to 35:3. Various features suggest that it derives from an early period (Lauterbach 1933: xix–xx), although it appears to have undergone a series of redactions. It is an important work as it demonstrates the complexity of the legal tradition in this time, as well as providing many examples of early biblical exegesis, often sharing interpretations with the Aramaic targumim. Extensive passages discuss features of the biblical text, applying it to contemporary belief, often without reference to legal issues at all. The discussion of Exodus 15, the 'Song of Moses', is a case in point (recorded in tractate Shirata of the Mekhilta). In that section, the Mekhilta discusses at length God's role as a warrior, his dominance over earthly powers, his redemptive qualities and the prediction of the destruction of foreign nations. It also draws attention many times to the use of the imperfect verbs in the text, which can be translated with a future sense (as well as a present), and thereby adds a prophetic sense to the words: e.g. 'Thou overthrowest them that rise up against thee [Exod. 15:7], It is not written harasta "Thou hast overthrown", but taharos "Thou wilt overthrow", in the future. For it is said, "Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth" (Ps. 58:7)' (Shirata 6.64–66). These are themes, typical of apocalyptic literature, that often seem to be lacking in other literature from this period, but attest to the zealous nature of Judaism at this time. The Mekhilta has, therefore, preserved for us evidence of the breadth of thought and of the variety of streams that continued through this time.

Another type of midrash that is primarily exegetical rather than legal in nature begins to appear in the course of this period. In the first half of the fifth century, comments on the biblical text of Genesis were compiled to form what is known as Genesis Rabbah (= 'great'), a name that perhaps suggests that there was at one time a 'smaller' commentary on Genesis. Probably from the same period comes Lamentations Rabbah, a commentary on the text of Lamentations. In view of the content of the biblical book, this commentary contains stories of the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 and other times of crisis, including the Bar Kochba revolt and tales of martyrdom. Many of these are fabulous rather than historical.

The Aramaic targumim

As Hebrew began to die out as a spoken language and be replaced by Aramaic, the need arose to give a translation into Aramaic of the Scriptures as they were read in the synagogue. They are to be distinguished from the midrashim in that they are primarily translations, but they include many interpretative elements (cf. Jesus' exposition of the biblical text in the synagogue according to Luke 4:16–22). This (probably oral) translation was called targum (cf. Ezra 4: 7), and the targumim (to use the plural) came to be written down over time. Our first Aramaic translations appear as early as the first century BCE (as attested by a Qumran text of Job), but the written forms of most of the targumim now extant are very late. Even the Palestinian targumim to the Pentateuch (and notably Neofiti), which were thought possibly to contain Second Temple traditions, can be dated late on the basis of the language (Kaufman 1994). The importance of the targumim as witnesses is that they preserve many non-rabbinic traditions not found in other literature, and they are as important as the rabbinic texts for the study of Jewish biblical exegesis in Christian works (see Hayward 1987: 105–23). They also attest to the multilingual environment in which learned Jews operated (Smelik 2013).

Greek literature

The last great Jewish writers in Greek in antiquity were probably the philosopher Philo and the historian Josephus. They both interpret and expound the Greek Bible, Philo particularly reading it in terms of Greek (and especially Stoic) philosophy and Josephus in terms of history. It remains a puzzle, however, that hardly any Jewish literature in Greek has survived from after the beginning of the second century, some of the last being the translation 4 Ezra and the Stoic 4 Maccabees. The majority of Jewish inscriptions are Greek and Jewish translators were still operative in the second century (Aquila, Symmachus). It raises the question of whether this is a matter of chance or indicative that no such literature was ever produced. It would seem unlikely that Jews were not writing literature in Greek, especially since Christian authors, with whom it is clear they were in contact, were doing so (Carleton Paget 2010: 409–13).[3] In some Jewish literature, Hebrew was considered the sacred language, described as the language of the sanctuary (Targum Ps.–Jonathan to Gen. 42:23 and 45:12) and the language of creation (Testament of Naphtali 8:3ff.; Targum Ps.–Jonathan to Gen. 11:1; j.Megillah 1.2). Greek, however, was the prime language of the Roman Empire, especially in the east where it had been the long-established lingua franca (see Horrocks 2010: 125–6). The Roman biographer Suetonius even has the Emperor Claudius remark on a barbarian's command of both Latin and Greek – 'you know both our languages [utroque sermone nostro]' (Claudius 42.2). As much as biblical Greek is no longer to be seen as a peculiar dialect used by Jews, so too the Greek employed by Jews in Rome did not differ from that used by other Romans or Christians (Rutgers 1995), even if the translation of the Bible sanctioned for Jews was that by Aquila.

Greek was held in special regard by some Jews since, in an interpretation based on Gen. 9:27, certain rabbis declare that the language of Japhet (i.e. Greek) 'is to be found in the tents of Shem' (Megillah 9b and cf. j.Megillah 1.71c; see Lévinas 1984: 331–69). Even the Mishnah allows for the liturgical prayers the Shema' and Eighteen Benedictions to be recited in Greek, and from the period of the sixth century, Justinian intervened in a dispute in a synagogue (perhaps in Byzantium) over those wishing the readings in Greek and those in Hebrew (Novella 146; see De Lange 2015: 60–7). There probably was other Jewish literature in Greek in this period, but the dominance of the rabbinic tradition has prevented its preservation. We have already seen that non-rabbinic texts have by chance been preserved in the Cairo Genizah, substantiating the claim that texts were in use even if they had been disapproved of by the rabbis. Further evidence from the Cairo Genizah comes in the form of Greek texts (albeit in some instances only glosses in Greek) dating from the tenth to twelfth centuries, including a translation into Greek of Ecclesiastes (De Lange 1996). Indeed, there are many traces of ongoing use of Greek biblical versions by Jews into the Byzantine period (De Lange et al. 2009).

Greek enabled writers to express themselves more articulately, whether they were Jewish or not. Both Jewish-Greek writers and the rabbis were concerned with the exposition of the Bible and its law, containing both prophetic hopes and religious requirements. The rabbinic literature indeed is suffused with Hellenic culture, visible in its mode of argumentation, its thought and its very vocabulary (see especially Schäfer 1998: 1–3). The Greek age should probably, therefore, be seen as extending as far as the Arab conquest (Kamesar 1990: 576–7; De Lange 1998–99: 23), and in that the rabbinic literature is a part. The rabbinic literature is as much a part of Greek culture as Philo or Origen; our only loss is that we do not have the truly Greek literature that Jews may well have written at that time.

Apocalyptic literature

The defeat of the Jews in the revolt of 66–72 and the loss of the Jerusalem Temple were felt by many to be a major religious catastrophe and they sought theological expression in the writing of apocalypses (e.g. the New Testament book of Revelation). The apocalypse of Ezra (4 Ezra) was probably composed towards the end of the first century, the writer himself declaring that the vision came in the thirteenth year after the destruction of Jerusalem (3.1). It is now extant only in Latin and Syriac translations, most likely deriving from a Greek translation of a Semitic original. It appears to be dependent on a slightly earlier work, the Apocalypse of Baruch (or 2 Baruch). Both works are concerned with the question of theodicy and express the belief that God will shortly intervene, destroying the Roman empire and bringing to an end the reign of the victorious conqueror, portrayed as an 'eagle' in 4 Ezra 11–12. This will be followed by a temporary messianic age and the creation of a new heaven and a new earth (see Stone 1989). It is possible that 2 Baruch, as argued by Murphy (1985), opposes any form of armed resistance to Rome, conceding the struggle to God alone, which would be in opposition to those who continued to resist until the time of Bar Kochba.

In 4 Ezra's eschatology, the law is presented as a guarantor of God's mercy and of the continuance of Jewish life and religion (7.36–38, 70–74, 79–101). Although this could be seen as 'pivotal' in the development of Judaism after 70 (Esler 1994: 125–8), this would imply 4 Ezra was the last of the Jewish apocalypses, paving the way for Torah-centred rabbinic Judaism. It is true that 4 Ezra is related in certain exegetical and theological themes with rabbinic literature (Stone 1990: 38–9), although the mode of expression and the message are utterly different from the Mishnah. Neusner, for example, draws attention to how remarkable is 'the Mishnah's utter silence on these tremendous issues of suffering and atonement, catastrophe and apocalypse, expressed with such power [in the apocalypses]' (1981: 37). It has already been seen, however, that the Mishnah should not be taken as representative of all Jewish thought in this period. There appears to have been a resurgence of the writing of Jewish apocalyptic after 500 CE, and from then to the medieval period we have many examples of the genre, including the Book of Zerubbabel, the Prayer of R. Simeon b. Yohai and 3 Enoch (Alexander 1990: 197–218; Trebolle Barrera 1998: 448–50). The connection between such works and the classical apocalypses is uncertain. Although it is possible that Christian apocalyptic was the mediator from which Judaism drew its inspiration for these late apocalypses, it is feasible that there was a line of continuity from the ancient to the medieval period that has been obscured in our sources. Once again, the Aramaic targumim provide partial evidence for this, where we find two apocalyptic passages that have been composed in a similar manner to their first-century counterparts. The targum to Lam. 4:21–2 describes the Parthians devastating Rome, which implies that this text dates from a tradition before 224 CE, when the Parthian empire came to an end. And in Targum Ps.–Jonathan to Num. 24:19–24 there is a triumphant declaration of the destruction of Rome and Constantinople, perhaps originating as an apocalypse on the destruction of Rome, to which were added references to Constantinople. These passages recall the early medieval apocalyptic texts, but may well date from the time when it is often believed that Jewish apocalypses did not exist. Furthermore, we have already seen that the Mekhilta, which probably dates from the third century, contains many of the themes that Neusner says are expressed with such power in the apocalypses. One need only read a passage such as tractate Shirata 4:19–29, commenting on Exod. 15:3 ('The Lord is a man of war, the Lord is his name') to gain a taste of these ideas.

One may ask whether Christian interpretation of Jewish apocalypses may help us to reconstruct something of the Jewish understanding towards apocalypses in this period. Frankfurter has, for example, speculated regarding the relationship between Jewish apocalypses and heretical Christian groups, the Gnostics on the one hand, and wise men and sages on the other (1996: 196–8). If apocalypses were particularly associated with sectarian groups, this may in part account for its lack of prominence in Jewish thought at the time. Scholem, who saw some of the roots of the Jewish mystical tradition in the ancient apocalypses, felt that apocalyptic was greatly reduced, preserved as part of an esoteric movement, but that with the eventual acceptance of messianism apocalyptic movements were able to resurge (1961: 73–5). Whatever the real explanation is, Judaism never lost hope in the power of God to intervene and restore the former kingdom in Jerusalem. Such beliefs are encapsulated in the targum translation to Isaiah (Chilton 1982), perhaps dating from the early second century, and in the Eighteen Benedictions, the most important prayer in Jewish liturgy. The detailed prescriptions for the Temple services and priestly duties contained within the Mishnah may also have been preserved because of a strong belief in an immanent reversal of the present situation. Even if there was no specific apocalyptic genre, apocalyptic beliefs and expressions continued to be uttered.

Proselytes and godfearers

The position of proselytes and godfearers and what they may tell us of Judaism in antiquity are greatly disputed issues. There seems to have been a rapid spread of Jewish communities across the Roman empire which has to be accounted for by factors greater than Goodman's reference to Jewish 'opposition to abortion, infanticide, and contraception' (1994: 84; cf. Tacitus Histories 5.5). It seems likely that there was some form of mission or promulgation of the attractive elements in Judaism, even if not universally practised (Carleton Paget 1996: 65–103, esp. 82–3). Many have assumed that there was active Jewish proselytism in the Second Temple period (e.g. Feldman 1993, with bibliography on pp. 555–6), whilst others have suggested it only came about in the second and third centuries CE (e.g. Goodman 1994: 122–4, who presents it as a response to Christianity), or that it never existed at all (Will and Orrieux 1992). There is no precise missionary strategy evident and many texts do not appear to be interested in the question, but that does not mean that some Jewish circles did not seek converts. Jewish disapproval of gentile idolatry (e.g. Wisdom of Solomon 13–15), Jewish-Greek literature extolling Jewish virtues (e.g. Letter of Aristeas) and the openness to proselytes expressed in some works (e.g. Eighteen Benedictions no. 13; 2 Baruch 41.4–6 and 42.3) imply if not a proselytic mission, a promotion of ideas by Jews from early on (see Carleton Paget 1996: 83–7). The adoption of Jewish practices by non-Jews is implied by the term 'godfearers', if the group even existed (Feldman 1993: 342–3 is sceptical). By the third century (or maybe fourth; see Botermann 1993: 184–94), such a group appears in Aphrodisias (Reynolds and Tannenbaum 1987), but before that the term is used rather inconsistently (e.g. Acts 10: 1–2, 13, 16, 26, 43, 50) and is applied by Josephus to both Jews and Gentiles (Jewish Antiquities 7.130; 12.285; Against Apion 2.140). Perhaps there were sympathizers who followed Jewish religious practice without full conversion, although many have pointed to the lack of evidence for such groups (e.g. Kraabel 1981: 113–26) in the context of the ancient Mediterranean where many were cautious to appease any gods of the locality or gods whom they may have neglected (cf. the altar to an unknown god in Acts 17: 23). Gentile adherents to Judaism is a possibility.

Goodman's willingness to see Jewish proselytism from the second to third centuries onwards may be supported by evidence found in the targumim. Abraham's calling upon the name of God at Beer-Sheba (Gen. 21:33) was an opportunity for the targumists to speak of conversion to Judaism (contrast Philo, de Plant. 73–89, and Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 1.207–12; Hayward 1998: 29–31). All the Palestinian targumim on Gen. 21:33 present Abraham informing strangers about the God of Israel (Hayward 1998: 31–6). One of them (Ps.–Jonathan) is more educative than missionary in intent, presenting him as a preacher. Others (Targum Neofiti, its glosses and the Fragment Targums) share traditions with the Talmud and Midrash and present Abraham as a proselytizer, associating Abraham's preaching at Beer-Sheba with the observance of worship and prayer. These traditions seem to be no earlier than the fourth century and suggest that synagogues of the time that used these targums (which ones and where we cannot say) took great interest in the matter of proselytes (Hayward 1998: 37). Synagogues may not have been missionary institutions as such (McKnight 1991: 62–6), but the activity in them and the preaching may have been used to draw attention to the religion (cf. Carleton Paget 1996: 84, n. 78). Philo even says that on the Sabbath the synagogue 'stands wide open' (Philo de Specialibus Legibus 2: 62–3; cf. later Jerome and John Chrysostom). As we shall see, their magnificence, size and decoration would have further drawn attention to Judaism. It may be significant that from the period when Goodman sees the appearance of proselytism, there also developed a tradition of Jewish pictorial art and the finest examples of ancient synagogues begin to be found.

Synagogues and services

The precise historical origins of the synagogue are lost to us, but certainly by the time of the fall of the Second Temple it had become an established institution throughout the Diaspora, and, with the loss of the Temple, stimulus would have been given in Palestine to develop its use into a place of worship and to replace there the older 'prayer houses' (proseuchai). Some synagogues were clearly very impressive structures. The destroyed synagogue/basilica in Alexandria was lauded by the Babylonian Talmud (Sukkah 51b), 'He who has never seen the double colonnade of Alexandria has never seen the glory of Israel in his life', and such claims can now be substantiated by the excavation of synagogues in the Diaspora. The synagogue at Sardis, in what is now western Turkey, dating from the second or third century and destroyed in 616, is perhaps the largest that we have surviving (see Figure 4.2). Measuring over 90 metres in length, it appears to have had a different use as a public building before being converted into a synagogue.

Synagogues were used as assembly halls for the local communities so that it was necessary for them to be of a suitable size, and their architectural plan was generally modelled on Graeco-Roman meeting halls, large areas divided by supporting columns and benches along the sides (see Levine 2005). The Galilean synagogue at Hammath-Tiberias with its rich mosaic floor was probably also a magnificent building (see Figure 4.3), whilst that of the Roman harbour at Ostia displays the elegance of first-century design.

Figure 4.2 The synagogue forecourt and public fountain in Sardis, with a view into the large main sanctuary; photo: J. J. Meggitt

Figure 4.3 The synagogue at Hammath–Tiberias. Photo: G. I. Davies

There is no consistent plan for a synagogue design, and great variety in architecture and style exists across the Mediterranean. Kraabel has argued that such synagogues had a social purpose in a Graeco–Roman context in providing an architectural symbol of the community, a form of social cohesion in the manner of voluntary associations (1987: 49–54). Certainly, the size and splendour of some of the buildings denoted the prominence of Jews in these locales, and the designs were probably eclectic, drawing upon various local and traditional influences. Evidence from inscriptions suggests that the organization and structures of authority of synagogues varied considerably from place to place (Rajak and Noy 1993: 75–93), and although attempts have been made to see church structure as deriving from the synagogue (e.g. Burtchaell 1992), the variation does not allow for any certainty on this. Christianity can at least be said to partake of the same cultural tradition, embodied in elaborate buildings and decoration, prayers and scripture readings, and the presence of gentile adherents.

Synagogues and art

The development of Jewish iconographic art from the third century seems to have centred on the synagogue, although it is not restricted to it. Biblical themes were often depicted in the art, sometimes sharing motifs from interpretations in rabbinic and targumic texts, and often the same stories recurred in different places (e.g. the sacrifice of Isaac). Some of the finest examples of Jewish art work are the frescoes on the walls of the synagogue of Dura Europos on the Euphrates and in the Roman catacombs. But not all the representations were religious.

The primary purpose of the artistic representations is most likely decorative. Whilst they pose a problem for the prohibition on graven images (Exod. 20:4–5), which could be interpreted as anti–idolic rather than anti–iconic (Fine 2010), they contribute to the sacrality of the synagogue buildings (Fine 2010; cf. Schwartz 2001: 243–63). They do also show that synagogues participated in local traditions and were supported by local sponsors rather than being under rabbinic authority or jurisdiction.

Figure 4.4 The Zodiac mosaic of the synagogue at Hammath-Tiberias. Photo G. I. Davies

Having no tradition of figurative art, the Jews naturally drew upon the art of their surrounding cultures and especially Hellenic art (cf. the art in the tombs of Beth Shearim in Jerusalem). One striking example of this is the appearance of the signs of the zodiac in four synagogues in Palestine, ranging in date from the fourth to the sixth centuries: at Hammath-Tiberias (see Figure 4.4), Beth-Alpha, Huseifa and Na'aran. Evidence of the use of the zodiac can also be found at Susiya and En Gedi. This depiction of the calendar was adopted by Jews, and particularly displayed in synagogues, to represent the annual cycle of festivals. The decorative had also become symbolic (Hachlili 1977: 61–77).

Amongst the various motifs and objects that are depicted in the art, symbols of particular importance in Judaism frequently appear. The Ark for the scrolls, the menorah (seven-branched candlestick; see Figure 4.5), ritual utensils (e.g. incense shovel) and festival items (e.g. the lulav and ethrog from the Feast of Tabernacles; Figures 4.4 and 4.5). These are obvious symbols for the synagogue and of the festivals that would have been celebrated there. And yet, did they have a wider significance? The presence of the menorah and ritual items from tabernacles in non-synagogue art, such as in the catacombs in Rome and the funerary art of Beth Shearim (third to fourth centuries) may imply that they became more than simply symbols of Judaism. A Syrian inscription from the end of the fourth century indicates that the synagogue could even be called naos 'Temple' (Horbury 1991: 42). Even the symbols of the Festivals that they would have been celebrating may have been there to remind them of the greater grandeur of the celebration in the Temple that they had now lost. Such reminders are found indeed in the fifth-century liturgy for the Day of Atonement (of Yose ben Yose; see Horbury 1981: 150, 166–72). In rabbinic tradition, the setting of Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac was located on the Temple mount (e.g. Sifre Deut. 28; Genesis Rabbah 55:7), the place of redemption, and hence this motif may also be consistent with the aspirations of Jews of the time.

Figure 4.5 Three menoroth, with lulav and ethrog beneath, on a synagogue column from Corinth. Photo G. I. Davies

Liturgy

Increasing caution has grown over deriving Christian liturgical practices from Jewish, and this has been strengthened by doubt amongst specialists of Jewish liturgy as to how much we may reconstruct of it. The earliest Jewish prayer books, compiled to answer liturgical disputes, date only from the ninth and tenth centuries (Hoffman 1979: 5). Attempts to reconstruct early liturgical texts through analysis of variants in manuscripts and issues of dispute in rabbinic texts (e.g. Finkelstein 1925–26; Elbogen 1931) are beset with problems of method, including the assumptions that the prayers were from the start fixed literary creations and that the rabbis are debating the same texts as those preserved in the medieval period (Hoffman 1979: 4). Heinemann's approach (1977) is to analyse the forms and contents of prayers, from which he concludes with some justification that Jewish prayer, whilst sharing certain common themes and forms, varied considerably up until the Geonic period (eighth to eleventh centuries). Fleischer concluded that obligatory prayer was an innovation of Gamaliel II towards the end of the first century CE (1990: 397–441, 1991: 683–8; and in response Reif 1991: 677–81). He sees the loss of the Temple as determinative for the development of Jewish prayer. Fleischer's position does not take into account the wide distribution of Jewish communities outside Palestine, for whom the Temple would not have been their primary focus. There is also evidence for the themes and forms of later Jewish prayer from the time of the Second Temple (Falk 1998: esp. 236–51). Institutionalized prayer (cf. Luke 11:1) and forms of prayer (Luke 11:2–4; Matt. 6:9–13) are attested in Christian writings (Falk 1998: 250; Horbury 1998b: 305–6). The Christian evidence does imply that there was some borrowing from set Jewish forms (e.g. 1 Clement 34:7; Didache 10), but we cannot be sure precisely what the form and wording were.

One of the most important Jewish prayers (see m.Berakhot 3.3, 4.1) was and still remains the Eighteen Benedictions (or Amidah), whose themes seem to date back to before the fall of the Temple (Elbogen 1931: 29; cf. Ecclus. 36:1–17 and 2 Macc. 1:27–29). Gamaliel II is said to have finalized its form (m.Berakhot 4:3; b.Berakhot 28b), but this too may be an exaggeration of his role in the liturgy. Certainly, in his time, an emphasis on national unity and hope following the destruction of the Temple would have been themes that were gladly inherited by some rabbis from the time before 70 (Horbury 1998a: 7).

The Bible and its interpretation

By the end of the Second Temple Period there was already an acknowledgement of a collection of important books in Judaism that paved the way for a canon. As early as the prologue to the Greek translation of Ecclesiasticus in the second century BCE, one could speak of 'the Law, the prophets and other writings', words prefiguring the rabbinic division of the Hebrew Bible. It is likely that Christians had respect for the Jewish 'scriptures' (1 Cor. 15:3–4), as much as Jews had. R. Aqiba is said to have called the Song of Songs 'The holy of holies' (m.Yadayim 3.5), indicating deep respect for even those writings that do not fall under the categories of 'Law' or 'Prophets'.

The Septuagint translation of the Pentateuch itself can be said to be one of the earliest extant Jewish biblical interpretations, reflecting methods of exegesis employed by the Palestinian rabbinic schools. Josephus in his Jewish Antiquities (Liber Antiquitatum), a reworking of biblical history, displays similar methods. The translation into Greek of the Bible provided a text in a common language for exegesis and disputation for both Jews and Christians. Hengel has shown how the Septuagint was used as much by Jews as Christians in Rome (1994: 182–284), and Horbury has extended this argument to cover the rest of the Mediterranean, indicating that it should not be seen purely as a Christian text (1998a: 29–33; cf. Veltri 1994). But equally important was the translation of the Hebrew Bible into Aramaic, the targum, which provided an extensive interpretation of the biblical text in a language shared by many Jews and Christians, most notably in the east. Stemberger has emphasized the disproportion of Jewish to Christian biblical interpretations and the differences between the different texts used (1996b: 569–86). His interest, however, is on rabbinic commentaries. But when one considers the Aramaic targum on, for example, the prophets, we find there a wealth of comments in proportion to Christian commentaries on these books, even if there is a lack of Jewish midrashim on them (Horbury 1998a: 26–7).

Christian scholars were sometimes reliant on Jewish evidence for the biblical text, since they were for the most part unable to read the Hebrew original, and they had to take into account Jewish revisions of the Septuagint, including that attributed to Aquila. Two Christian scholars who were able to stand out by their own knowledge of the biblical text, but who were at the same time greatly indebted to Jewish interpretation, were Origen (see De Lange 1976) and Jerome (see Chapter 56 of this volume). Although it has been proposed that Jerome's approach to the biblical text was original in its use of Greek and Latin philology (Kamesar 1993: 76–81, 174–5, 189–94), Jerome himself expresses his originality ('opus novum') probably because of his use of Jewish interpretative traditions (Hayward 1995: 7–14). He seems to have had a good knowledge of Hebrew, which he used to criticize the Septuagint text in his Hebrew Questions, and, despite being an innovator, he claimed that he had many Christian predecessors in his adoption of Hebrew tradition (Apology against Rufinus 1.13, 2.34). It appears that he was in particular reliant on targumic tradition, suggesting that his main source was either a person whose duties involved translation for the synagogue or an actual written text (Hayward 1987, 1990: 71). Nonetheless, Jerome's motivation was theological, and he felt a Christian was a better translator of the Hebrew text than the original Septuagint translators for whom the fulfilment of the prophecies had not yet become a reality (Kamin 1991: 248–51).

Contact and controversy

It has come to be recognized that there was close contact between the early Christian and Jewish communities. No longer can we hold with Harnack (1883: 63) that anti-Jewish polemic in Christian writings was a literary genre rather than the result of real encounter, or with Freimann (1911: 561) that the Jews referred to are Hellenized Jews who know nothing of Pharisaic interpretation (see Krauss 1996: 28–9). Separation may have been gradual and never fully realized (Becker and Reed 2003), and only achieved through Christian self-demarcation from Judaism (Boyarin 2004). The image of the Jew in Christian writings is varied, ranging from stereotypic to a more genuine perception, forming a part of Christian self-perception as well as informing on the contemporary Jewish situation (Lieu 1996). In Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, from a time (c. 155) when there were still many Jews in the Christian body (Dialogue with Trypho 47.3), there appears a genuine Jewish propaganda against Christians and a knowledge of Jewish and Christian messianism (Lieu 1996: 101–50; Horbury 1998a: 25). The sermons of Chrysostom against judaizers in Antioch indicate that even under Constantine the close contact continued. The Jewish criticism of Jesus as a deceiver and magician (cf. Origen Against Celsus 1.28, 32; b.Sanhedrin 43a) was used as a tool in the disputations. Whilst there was evidently close cooperation between individual Jews and Christians, apparent in the shared biblical interpretations, in the literature they present each other as hostile groups.

Hostility towards Christianity was matched by treatment of the Samaritans (cf. Targum Ps.-Jonathan on Genesis 35), an opposition that would have been exacerbated by the Samaritan religious revival in the fourth century (MacDonald 1964: 36–40). One aspect of their polemic is found in the Eighteen Benedictions, where the twelfth benediction contains a curse on heretics (minim). This has been shown to be intimately connected with the theme of redemption in the prayer and the desire for a unified, pure nation (Horbury 1998a: 8). It is disputed when this denunciation of heretics was actually applied to Christians (the medieval Palestinian, but not the Babylonian, manuscripts actually name the 'notzerim'), opinions ranging over centuries, but the mood and content is fitting for Judaism as early as the first century. Horbury indicates that by the time of Justin Martyr in the second century, Christians were probably envisaged (1998b: 306). Certainly, a spirit of exclusivism and opposition to heretics or sinners was a part of Judaism from the time of the rise of Christianity, and with messianic hopes and longing for redemption it was natural for Christianity to adopt a similar ethos.

Julian and the Jerusalem Temple

With the Christianization of the Roman empire under Constantine, life for Jews was to change, if at first gradually. In September 324, Constantine's defeat of Licinius, emperor of the east, placed him as ruler of Palestine. This allowed him to reinforce existing measures, which, although being little more than had existed previously, may have caused some discontent amongst Jews since the practice of them had probably lapsed (Avi-Yonah 1976: 162–74). Constantine, however, was a diplomat and his opposition to Judaism expressed in his letters to church authorities did not manifest too strongly in his treatment of Jews. His successor, Constantius (337–61) was not so wise, passing laws (Codex Theodosianus 16 8:1, 6; 9:2) which, although apparently consistent with Roman practice, may actually have caused financial hardship to Jews and loss of trade. From the revolt of Bar Kochba in 135 to the year 351, there had been no Jewish revolts, but in 351, perhaps as a consequence of these laws, an attempt seems to have been made to restore the kingdom under one Patricius (recorded by the historian Sextus Aurelius Victor, Liber de Caesaribus 42.9–12). Constantius was busy with a revolt in Gaul at the time, and the governor of the east, Gallus Caesar, was an incompetent ruler. Support from Persia for the Jews may also have incited matters further. Little is known of the details of the revolt, except that it was concentrated in Galilee and the coastal plain (perhaps the areas of manu-facturing industries), but the attempt was short-lived, and significantly the patriarch and authorities remained loyal to Rome.

One consequence of the revolt against Gallus may have been an acknowledgement of the need to appease the Jews in some quarters. This appeasement nearly came from the unlikely source of the emperor Julian (361–3), the Hellene trained in neo-Platonism at Athens. Ammianus Marcellinus (History 23.1, 2) records that Julian, as he was preparing a campaign against Persia, planned the rebuilding of the Jerusalem Temple, but that this venture was halted by miraculous balls of fire bursting from the foundations, an incident that appears from other sources (e.g. Rufinus, Historia Ecclesiastica 10.39–40) to have been an earthquake (for the sources, see Levenson 1990: 261–79). Although rabbinic sources are surprisingly silent on this matter, it need not be doubted. The support of the Jews of Palestine would have been important for Julian's campaign against Persia, especially if some Jews were pro-Persian. It would have also been consistent with his Hellenic beliefs that each religion should be able to offer its own sacrifices, and Hellenic pagans seem to have assisted in the undertaking even though some had suffered in the revolt against Gallus. This was the beginning of friendly relations between Jews and pagans that persisted for some time (Avi-Yonah 1976: 198). It should, however, also be seen in the context of Julian's opposition to Christianity, since the destruc-tion of the Temple had been taken for centuries as a sign of the truth of Christianity (Avi-Yonah 1976: 192–3). Julian reacted against the Christian stance of his predecessors by promoting the very religion that could 'disprove' the truth of the gospel. The political strength that the Temple would have given to the Palestinian Jews against the Christian bishops may also have been a factor and accounts for the rise in the status of the patriach at this time.

The end of the patriarchate

It may have been Julian who bestowed on the ethnarch/patriarch the lofty honorary title of praefectus praetorio, an acknowledgement of his status in conjunction with other grand titles that accrued to the office in this period (Codex Theodosianus 16 8:8, 11, 13, 15). Certainly, there appears to have been a rise in the status of the ethnarch in the fourth century. Levine suggests that it should be seen in the context of the rise in the power of bishops at this time, and a consequent desire on the part of the emperor to counter ecclesiastical authorities (1996: 32). This would be in accord with the motives for Julian's attempt to rebuild the Jerusalem Temple. Whatever the reason for the increase in status, the honorary title was cancelled in 415 by emperor Theodosius II, and in 429 a law speaks of the 'ending of the patriarchate' (Codex Theodosianus 16 8:22, 29). We do not know the reasons why the patriarchate ceased. Perhaps Theodosius refused to recognize a successor to the last patriarch and the office simply died out rather than actually being abrogated. One suggestion is that it was abolished as a result of a Jewish revolt in 418 (see Levine 1996: 32, n. 161). In the eastern Diaspora, the exilarchate was probably also abolished sometime after this and until the Arab conquerors took over the region in the seventh century, the Jews lived in difficult times. But the heritage of the first five centuries ensured a strong cultural and intellectual life for their descendants, and paved the way for great works such as the Talmud, leaving a resilient religious tradition to survive the demands of the changing political and religious environment that was ahead.

Notes

1 I will continue to use the expressions 'Jew', 'Jewish' and 'Judaism' in this essay, since I am unconvinced by the arguments in favour of their replacement by 'Judean' and 'Judeanism'. For the debates, see Schwartz 2011.
2 McGing (2002) shows how tendentious most calculations of population are.
3 There is also a lack of Jewish Latin writings, rendering the study of Jewish–Christian relations in Western Christianity more difficult. In a similar way to the argument here for the existence of Jewish Greek writers, Rutgers (1995: 210–59) argues for an active Jewish Latin community in Rome.

Bibliography

Alexander, P. S. (1990) 'Late Hebrew apocalyptic: A preliminary survey', in La Fable Apocryphe, vol 1. Paris: Brepols, 197–218.

Alon, G. (1989) The Jews in Their Land in the Talmudic Age (70–640 C.E.), trans. and ed. G. Levi. Cambridge, MA/London: Harvard University Press.

Applebaum, S. (1976) Prolegomena to the Study of the Second Jewish Revolt (A.D. 132–135). British Archaeological Reports Supplementary Series 7. Oxford, UK: British Archaeological Reports.

Avi-Yonah, M. (1976) The Jews of Palestine: A Political History from the Bar Kokhba War to the Arab Conquest. Blackwell's Classical Studies. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Barnes, T. D. (1989) 'Trajan and the Jews', Journal of Jewish Studies 40: 145–62.

Becker, A. H. and Reed, A. Y. (2003) The Ways that Never Parted: Jews and Christians in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Borgen, P. (1996) Early Christianity and Hellenistic Judaism. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Botermann, T. (1993) 'Griechisch-jüdische Epigraphik: Zur Datierung der Aphrodisias-Inschriften', Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 98: 184–94.

Boyarin, D. (2004) Border Lines: The Partition of Judaeo-Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Burtchaell, J. T. (1992) From Synagogue to Church: Public Services and Offices in the Earliest Christian Communities. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.

Carleton Paget, J. (1996) 'Jewish proselytism at the time of Christian origins: Chimera or reality?', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 62: 65–103.

Carleton Paget, J. (2010) Jews, Christians and Jewish Christians in Antiquity. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Chilton, B. D. (1982) 'The glory of Israel: The theology and provenience of the Isaiah targum', Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Suppl. 23. Sheffield: JSOT Press.

Cohen, S. J. D. (1984) 'The significance of Yavneh: Pharises, rabbis, and the end of Jewish sectarianism', Hebrew Union College Annual 55: 27–53.

Cohen, S. J. D. (1986) 'The political and social history of the Jews in Greco-Roman antiquity: The state of the question', in R. A. Kraft and G. W. E. Nickelsburg (eds) Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Collins, J. J. (1997) Seers, Sybils and Sages in Hellenistic-Roman Judaism. Supplements to the Journal for the Study of Judaism 54. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

De Lange, N. R. M. (1976) Origen and the Jews: Studies in Jewish-Christian Relations in Third-Century Palestine. University of Cambridge Oriental Publications 25. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

De Lange, N. R. M (1996) Greek Jewish Texts from the Cairo Genizah. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

De Lange, N. R. M. (1998–99) 'Review of P. Schäfer, "Talmud Yerushalmi and Graeco-Roman culture"', Bulletin of Judaeo-Greek Studies 23: 23–4.

De Lange, N. R. M. (2015) Japheth in the Tents of Shem. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

De Lange, N. R. M., Krivoruchko, J. G. and Boyd-Taylor, C. (eds) (2009) Jewish Reception of Greek Bible Versions: Studies in their Use in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

De Lange, N. R. M., Krivoruchko, J. G. and Boyd-Taylor, C. (eds) (2015) Japheth in the Tents of Shem. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Dothan, M. (1983) Hammath Tiberias: Early Synagogues and the Hellenistic and Roman Remains. Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society.

Dyson, S. L. (1975) 'Native revolt patterns in the Roman empire', in H. Temporini (ed.) Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt 2.3. Berlin: de Gruyter, 138–75.

Elbogen, I. (1931) Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner Geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 3rd edn. Frankfurt, Germany: J. Kauffman.

Esler, P. F. (1994) The First Christians in Their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. London: Routledge.

Falk, D. K. (1998) Daily, Sabbath, and Festival Prayers in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah 27. Leiden, The Nethelands: E. J. Brill.

Feldman, L. (1993) Jews and Gentiles in the Ancient World: Attitudes and Interactions from Alexander to Justinian. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Fiensy, D. A. (1985) Prayers Alleged to be Jewish: An Examination of the Constitutiones Apostolorum. Brown Judaic Studies 65. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.

Fine, S. (2010) Art and Judaism in the Greco-Roman World. 2nd edn. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Finkelstein, L. (1925–26) 'The development of the Amidah', Jewish Quarterly Review new series 16: 1–43, 127–70.

Fleischer, E. (1990) 'On the beginnings of obligatory Jewish prayer [Hebrew]', Tarbiz 59: 397–441.

Fleischer, E. (1991) 'Rejoinder to Dr. Reif's remarks [Hebrew]', Tarbiz 60: 683–8.

Frankfurter, D. (1996) 'The legacy of Jewish apocalypses in early Christianity: Regional trajectories', in J. C. VanderKam and W. Adler (eds) The Jewish Apocalyptic Heritage in Early Christianity. Compendia rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum. Section 3, Jewish traditions in early Christian literature 4. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 129–200.

Freimann, M. (1911) 'Die Wortführer des Judentums in den ältesten Kontroversen zwischen Juden und Christen', Monatsschrift für die Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums 55: 555–85.

Gelston, A. (1992) The Eucharistic Prayer of Addai and Mari. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Goodblatt, D. (1984) 'The title nasi and the ideological background of the Second Revolt', in A. Oppenheimer and U. Rappaport (eds) The Bar-Kokhva Revolt: A New Approach. Jerusalem: Yad Izhak Ben Zvi, 113–32.

Goodblatt, D. (2006) 'The political and social history of the Jewish community in the land of Israel, c. 235–638', in S. T Katz (ed.) The Cambridge History of Judaism. Volume 4. The Late Roman-Rabbinic Period. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Goodman, M. (1987) The Ruling Class of Judaea: The Origins of the Jewish Revolt against Rome A.D. 66–70. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Goodman, M. (1994) Mission and Conversion: Proselytizing in the Religious History of the Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Goodman, M. (2007) Rome and Jerusalem: The Clash of Ancient Civilizations. London: Allen Lane.

Hachlili, R. (1977) 'The zodiac in ancient Jewish art: Representation and significance', Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 228: 61–77.

Harnack, A. (1883) 'Die Altercatio Simonis et Theophili, nebst Untersuchungen über die antijüdische Polemik in der alten Kirche', Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 1.3. Leipzig, Germany: J. C. Hinrichs, 1–136.

Hayward, C. T. R. (1987) 'Saint Jerome and the Aramaic Targumim', Journal of Semitic Studies 32: 105–23.

Hayward, C. T. R. (1990) 'Some observations on St. Jerome's "Hebrew questions on Genesis" and the rabbinic tradition', Proceedings of the Irish Biblical Association 13: 58–76.

Hayward, C. T. R. (1995) St. Jerome's Hebrew Questions on Genesis. Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hayward, C. T. R. (1998) 'Abraham as proselytizer at Beer-Sheba in the Targums of the Pentateuch', Journal of Jewish Studies 49: 24–37.

Heinemann, J. (1977) Prayer in the Talmud: Forms and Patterns. Studia Judaica 9. Berlin: De Gruyter.

Hengel, M. (1961) Die Zeloten: Untersuchungen zur Jüdischen Freiheitsbewegung in der Zeit von Herodes I. bis 70 N.Chr. [Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Spätjudentums und Urchristentums 1]. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Hengel, M. (1983) 'Messianische Hoffnung und politischer "Radikalismus" in der "jüdisch–hellenistischen Diaspora": Zur Frage der Voraussetzungen des jüdischen Aufstandes unter Trajan 115–117 n. Chr.', in D. Hellholm (ed.) Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 655–86.

Hengel, M. (1994) with R. Deines, 'Die Septuaginta als "christliche Schriftensammlung", ihre Vorgeschichte und das Problem ihres Kanons', in M. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer (eds) Die Septuaginta zwischen Judentum und Christentum. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 182–284.

Hezser, C. (1997) The Social Structure of the Rabbinic Movement in Roman Palestine. [Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum 66] Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck).

Hoffman, L. A. (1979) The Canonization of the Synagogue Service. University of Notre Dame Center for the Study of Judaism and Christianity in Antiquity. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Horbury, W. (1981) 'Suffering and Messianism in Yose ben Yose', in W. Horbury and B. McNeil (eds) Suffering and Martyrdom in the New Testament: Studies presented to G. M. Styler by the Cambridge New Testament Seminar. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Horbury, W. (1988) 'Messianism among Jews and Christians in the second century', Augustinianum 28: 71–88.

Horbury, W. (1991) 'The Jewish dimension', in I. Hazlett (ed.) Early Christianity: Origins and Evolution to AD 600, In Honour of WHC Frend. London: SPCK.

Horbury, W. (1992) 'Jews and Christians on the Bible: Demarcation and convergence (325–451)', in J. Van Oort and U. Wickert (eds) Christliche Exegese zwischen Nicaea und Chalcedon. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos, 72–103.

Horbury, W. (1996) 'The beginnings of the Jewish revolt under Trajan', in H. Cancik, H. Lichtenberger and P. Schäfer (eds) Geschichte – Tradition – Reflexion. Festschrift für Martin Hengel zum 70. Geburtstag. Band I: Judentum. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 283–304.

Horbury, W. (1998a) Jews and Christians in Contact and Controversy. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Horbury, W. (1998b) 'Early Christians on synagogue prayer and imprecation', in G. N. Stanton and G. G. Stroumsa (eds) Tolerance and Intolerance in Early Judaism and Christianity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 296–317.

Horbury, W. (2014) Jewish War under Trajan and Hadrian. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Horbury, W. and Noy, D. (1992) Jewish Inscriptions of Graeco-Roman Egypt: With an Index of the Jewish Inscriptions of Egypt and Cyrenaica. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Horrocks, G. (2010) Greek: A History of the Language and Its Speakers. Longman Linguistics Library. 2nd ed. Chichester, UK: Wiley-Blackwell.

Isaac, B. and Oppenheimer, A. (1985) 'The revolt of Bar Kokhba: Ideology and modern scholarship', Journal of Jewish Studies 36: 33–60.

Jacobs, M. (1995) Die Institution des jüdischen Patriarchen. Eine quellen- und traditionskritische Studie zur Geschichte der Juden in der Spätantike. [Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum 52] Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck).

Jammo, S. Y. H. (1979) La Structure de la Messe chaldéenne: du début jusqu'à l'Anaphore: Etude historique. [Orientalia Christiana Analecta 207] Rome: Pontificium Institutum Orientalium Studiorum.

Juster, J. (1914) Les Juifs dans l'Empire Romain: Leur Condition Juridique, Economique et Sociale, 2 vols. Paris: P. Geuthner.

Kaufman, S. A. (1994) 'Dating the language of the Palestinian Targums and their use in the study of first century CE texts', in D. R. G. Beattie and M. J. McNamara (eds) The Aramaic Bible: Targums in Their Historical Context. Sheffield: JSOT Press, 118–41.

Kamesar, A. (1990) 'Review of E. Bickerman, "The Jews in the Greek Age"', Journal of the American Oriental Society 110: 576–7.

Kamesar, A. (1993) Jerome, Greek Scholarship, and the Hebrew Bible: A Study of the Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim. Oxford Classical Monographs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Kamin, S. (1991) 'The theological significance of the Hebraica Veritas in Jerome's Thought', in M. Fishbane and E. Tov, with the assistance of W. W. Fields (eds) 'Sha'arei Talmon': Studies in the Bible, Qumran, and the Ancient Near East presented to Shemaryahu Talmon. Winona Lake, IN: Eerdmans, 243–53.

Kraabel, A. T. (1981) 'The disappearance of the "God-fearers"', Numen 28: 113–26.

Kraabel, A. T. (1987) 'Unity and diversity among Diaspora synagogues', in Levine 1987: 49–60.

Kraeling, C. H. (1956) The Excavations at Dura-Europos: Final Report VIII, Part I, The Synagogue. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Kraeling, C. H. (1996) Greek Jewish Texts from the Cairo Genizah. Texte und Studien zum Antiken Judentum 51. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck).

Kraemer, R. S. (1991) 'Jewish tuna and Christian fish: Identifying religious affiliation in epigraphic sources', Harvard Theological Review 84: 141–62.

Krauss, S. (1996) The Jewish-Christian Controversy from the Earliest Times to 1789: vol 1, History, ed. and rev. by W. Horbury. Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum 56. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Lauterbach, J. Z. (1933) Mekilta de-Rabbi Ishmael: A Critical Edition on the Basis of the Manuscripts and Early Editions with an English Translation, Introduction and Notes. Philadelphia, PA: Jewish Publication Society.

Le Déaut, R. (1966) Introduction à la Littérature Targumique, première partie. Rome: Institut Biblique Pontifical.

Le Déaut, R. (1989) 'Targum', in W. D. Davies, and L. Finkelstein (eds) The Cambridge History of Judaism, Volume Two: The Hellenistic Age. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Levenson, D. (1990) 'Julian's attempt to rebuild the Temple: An inventory of ancient and medieval sources', in H. W. Attridge, J. J. Collins and T. H. Tobin (eds) Of Scribes and Scrolls: Studies on the Hebrew Bible, Intertestamental Judaism, and Christian Origins. College Theology Society Resources in Religion 5. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 261–79.

Lévinas, E. (1984) 'Leçon talmudique', in Israël, le judaïsme et l'Europe [Colloque d'intellectuels juifs de langue française]. Paris: Gallimard, 331–69.

Levine, L. I. (ed.) (1987) The Synagogue in Late Antiquity. Philadelphia, PA: American Schools of Oriental Research.

Levine, L. I. (1996) 'The status of the patriarch in the third and fourth centuries: Sources and methodology', Journal of Jewish Studies 47: 1–32.

Levine, L. I. (2005) The Ancient Synagogue: The First Thousand Years. 2nd ed. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Lieu, J. (1996) Image and Reality: The Jews in the World of the Christians in the Second Century. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Lightstone, J. N. (1983) 'Form as meaning in Halakhic Midrash: A programmatic statement', Semeia 27: 24–35.

MacDonald, J. (1964) The Theology of the Samaritans. London: SCM Press.

McGing, B. (2002) 'Population and proselytism: How many Jews were there in the ancient world?', in J. R. Bartlett (ed.) Jews in the Hellenistic and Roman Cities. London: Routledge, 88–106.

McKnight, S. (1991) A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

McNamara, M. (1966) The New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch. Analecta Biblica 27. Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute.

Meshorer, Y. (1982) Ancient Jewish Coinage, Vol. 2: Herod the Great through Bar Cokhba. New York: Amphora.

Mildenberg, L. (1984) The Coinage of the Bar Kokhba War. Typos 6. Aarau, Switzerland: Sauerlander.

Modrzejewski, J. M. (1991) Les Juifs d'Egypte, De Ramases II à Hadrien. Paris: Editions Errance.

Mor, M. (2016) The Second Jewish Revolt: The Bar Kokhba War, 132–136 CE. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Murphy, F. J. (1985) '2 Baruch and the Romans', Journal of Biblical Literature 104: 663–9.

Neusner, J. (1971) The Rabbinic Traditions about the Pharisees before 70, 3 vols. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Neusner, J. (1981) 'The symbolism of ancient Judaism: The evidence of the synagogue', in J. Gutmann (ed.) Ancient Synagogues: The State of Research. Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 7–17.

Noy, D. (1993) Jewish Inscriptions of Western Europe, vol. 1: Italy (excluding the City of Rome), Spain and Gaul. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Noy, D. (1995) Jewish Inscriptions of Western Europe, vol. 2: The City of Rome. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Perkins, A. (1973) The Art of Dura-Europos. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Petuchowski, J. J. (1983) 'The liturgy of the synagogue: History, structure, and contents', in W. S. Green (ed.) Studies in Liturgy, Exegesis and Talmudic Narrative. Vol. 4 of Approaches to Ancient Judaism. Brown Judaic Studies, 34. Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1–64.

Price, J. J. (1992) Jerusalem Under Siege: The Collapse of the Jewish State 66–70 C.E. Series in Jewish Studies 3. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Rajak, T. (1983) Josephus: The Historian and His Society. Classical Life and Letters. London: Duckworth.

Rajak, T. and Noy, D. (1993) 'Archisynagogoi: Office, title and status in the Greco-Jewish synagogue', Journal of Roman Studies 83: 75–93.

Reif, S. C. (1991) 'On the earliest development of Jewish prayer [Hebrew]', Tarbiz 60: 677–81.

Reif, S. C. (1995) Judaism and Hebrew Prayer: New Perspectives on Jewish Liturgical History. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Reynolds, J. M. and Tannenbaum, R. (1987) Jews and God-Fearers at Aphrodisias: Greek Inscriptions with Commentary. Cambridge Philological Society, Suppl. 12. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge Philological Society.

Rutgers, L. V. (1995) The Jews in Late Ancient Rome: Evidence of Cultural Interaction in the Roman Diaspora. Religions in the Graeco–Roman World 126. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Saldarini, A. J. (1975) 'Johanan ben Zakkai's escape from Jerusalem: Origin and development of a rabbinic story', Journal for the Study of Judaism 6: 189–204.

Sanders, E. P. (1990) Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia, PA: Trinity Press International.

Schäfer, P. (ed.) (1998) The Talmud Yerushalmi and Graeco-Roman Culture, 1. Texte und Studien zum Antiken Judentum 71. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck).

Scholem, G. (1961) Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism. Jerusalem: Schocken Books.

Schwartz, S. (2001) Imperialism and Jewish Society, 200 B.C.E. to 640 C.E. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Schwartz, S. (2009) Were the Jews a Mediterranean Society? Reciprocity and Solidarity in Ancient Judaism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Schwartz, S. (2011) 'How many Judaisms were there? A critique of Neusner and Smith on definition and Mason and Boyarin on categorization', Ancient Judaism 2: 208–38.

Simon, M. (1986) Verus Israel: A Study of the Relations between Christians and Jews in the Roman Empire (135–425), translated from the French by H. McKeating. The Littman Library of Jewish Civilization. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Smallwood, E. M. (1981) The Jews under Roman Rule, corrected reprint. Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity 20. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Smelik, W. F. (2013) Rabbis, Language and Translation in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Stemberger, G. (1996a) Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, trans. and ed. by M. Bockmuehl, 2nd ed. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Stemberger, G. (1996b) 'Exegetical contacts between Christians and Jews in the Roman empire', in M. Saebø (ed.) Hebrew Bible/Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation, vol 1, From the Beginnings to the Middle Ages (Until 1300), Part 1, Antiquity. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 569–86.

Stern, M. (1974) 'The Jewish Diaspora', in S. Safrai and M. Stern (eds) The Jewish People in the First Century [Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum I.1]. Assen, The Netherlands: Van Gorcum; Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 117–83.

Stern, M. (1974–1984) Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism. Publications of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, Section of Humanities Fontes ad res Judaicas spectantes. Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.

Stone, M. E. (1989) Features of the Eschatology of IV Ezra. Harvard Semitic Studies 35. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Stone, M. E. (1990) Fourth Ezra. Hermeneia. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Trebolle Barrera, J. (1998) The Jewish Bible and the Christian Bible: An Introduction to the History of the Bible. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Veltri, G. (1994) Eine Tora für den König Talmai. [Texte und Studien zum Antiken Judentum 41] Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck).

Will, E. and Orrieux, C. (1992) Prosélytisme Juif?: Histoire d'une Erreur. Paris: Les Belles Lettres.

Williams, M. H. (1998) Jews among the Greeks and Romans: A Diasporan Sourcebook. London: Duckworth.

PART II

Christian origins and development

5

THE GALILEAN WORLD OF JESUS

In memoriam Seán Freyne[1]

Douglas E. Oakman

> Interpretation in [history and archaeology] . . . necessitates a degree of guided conjecture, but, to quote Max Weber, 'an ingenious error is more fruitful for science than stupid accuracy.'
>
> (Shimon Applebaum)

For such a small region of the globe, Galilee has surely had scholarly and world impact out of all proportion to its size. Over the last few decades, understanding of the social world and imperial realities of Roman Galilee has become ever more important for narratives about the emergence of early Christianity and Judaism. Since the magisterial synthesis of Professor Freyne in the first edition of this work (in 2000), both social theory (or its lack) and archaeological information, as well as studies of the Roman social world, have played ever more prominent roles in historical interpretation. Freyne expressed concern that then-current historical Jesus research was too theologically motivated. Certainly, recent scholarship has raised and struggled with a variety of new questions related to the Galilean world of Jesus. These questions arise, not only from theology, but also from various ideological commitments, social preconceptions, and interpretive assumptions.

This chapter situates Jesus of Nazareth especially within the pre-70 CE realities of Roman Galilee. Of course, this setting also holds importance for the emergence of rabbinic Judaism in the late first century. Yet both Christianity and rabbinic Judaism took on more distinctive shapes in the post-70 CE period after the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple, and especially in the second century CE with rabbi and synagogue on the one hand and bishop and church on the other. Jesus lived under the overlays of Roman imperial, Herodian, and Judean political cultures, and his historical activity held profound political ramifications.

The ecological setting of Hellenistic-Roman Galilee

Both Josephus and the Mishnah subdivide Galilee into Lower Galilee, Upper Galilee, and the valley of Tiberias (JW 3.35–40; m. Sheb. 9:2; Strange 2014). Presumably, these sources also include the Galilean Lake. Good general accounts of the physical characteristics of Galilee are available (Goodman 1983: 17–40; Aviam 2013). Most of Galilee is made up of sedimentary limestone (hard and soft), though volcanic basalt dominates the eastern areas near the Galilean Lake and Huleh Valley. Buildings in Lower and Upper Galilee are primarily made of limestone; on the north end of the lake, buildings, stone presses, and grinding stones are made of basalt. Lower Galilee is crosscut by fertile east-west valleys and low mountains (Mt. Kamon peaks at 598 meters above sea level); Upper Galilee reaches about 1,200 meters at Mt. Meiron (Ronen et al. 1993: 449). The lake is on average about 210 meters below sea level, covering an area of about 21 by 13 kilometers. The geology of the lake region is subject to the plate tectonics that have also created the Jordan River Valley (see Shroder and Inbar 1995: 1:65–98).
Figure 5.1   Map of Galilee in the time of Jesus. Photo in Hanson and Oakman 2008: x, with permission of Fortress Press

The total area of Galilee is estimated at about 2,073 square kilometers, of which 65 to 70 percent was cultivated at the turn of the eras (Applebaum 1976: 646; Strange 2014: 265). The natural vegetation is Mediterranean woodland (including especially evergreen thickets and oaks). Lower Galilee receives on average 600 millimeters of rain, while Upper Galilee receives 800 millimeters, quite adequate for all kinds of agriculture, viticulture, and arboriculture. Soils and rainfall encouraged grain in the valleys, and vines and olive trees on the rugged hill- and mountainsides. Deuteronomy 8:8 already names the fundamental products of the land: 'a land of wheat and barley, of vines and fig trees and pomegranates, a land of olive trees and honey.' Many types of other crops were possible, including pulses and fruit trees. The lake offered rich fare in edible fish. Indeed, the two prominent staples in the Galilee of Jesus were bread and fish (Mark 6:38). In the poorly drained eastern Beit Netofa and Huleh Valleys, flax could be cultivated. But equally, malaria was a problem in those areas (Reed 2014).

Settlements generally were sited on the hills to provide maximum agricultural land and to rise above the mosquitoes carrying malaria. If natural springs were not nearby, watertight plastered cisterns were necessary. Josephus remarks that the Galilee of his day was fully under cultivation (JW 3.42–43) and populous with 204 settlements (Life 235). For Galilee, considering the agricultural carrying capacity, the population was at maximum around 175,000. Further considerations of agricultural production and population will be pursued below.

Figure 5.2   A contemporary fisherman landing his catch at Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee. Photo Philip F. Esler

Galilean social systems and conflicting interests

The understanding of the context of Jesus of Nazareth has been enormously enriched in the past forty years by interdisciplinary engagement with comparative social sciences. This engagement has made ever more clear that historical interpretation is hazardous; but interpretation in historical narrative is unavoidable. If interpretation can be characterized as 'reading between the lines,' or 'connecting the dots,' then the fact that much of the past is lost to us will indicate the absolute centrality of interpretation in historical work. Moreover, preconceptions of the interpreter must be critically examined in order to avoid the twin dangers of anachronism and ethnocentrism. John Rogerson puts the matter this way:

> [w]hile we do not invent the past, our narrative accounts of it are affected and shaped by factors such as our very limited knowledge of what happened in the past, and our situated-nesses in nation, gender, class, political and religious commitment or lack of the same, and aims and interests in wanting to construct narratives about the past, in the first place.
>
> (2009: 18)

The current state of Galilee research stands in much flux precisely because of competing interpretations, problematic anachronisms, and ethnocentrisms. Over the almost twenty years since the original article of Seán Freyne for this volume, work on the social world of Galilee and the involvement of archaeological data have required the rethinking of almost all the old verities. Gone is the sunny, innocent Galilee of Ernest Renan. Galilee, the hotbed of revolutionaries, has now become a hot-bed of reinterpretation. Galilee is no longer 'the circle of the nations,' but in the minds of some a monochrome 'Jewish region.' Culture is given uncritical precedence over politics, and anachronistic economic ideas befuddle the question.

  The New Testament gospels and Josephus all post-date 70 CE. So too do the rabbinic sources. While all have memories and recollections of the pre-70 situation, the danger of anachronism looms very large. For instance, the dictum of Julius Wellhausen over a century ago is well known: 'Jesus was not a Christian, he was a Jew' (1905). Today, the notion of Judaism as a first-century

'free-standing religion' is under intensive scrutiny. The nomenclature 'Jew' or 'Judean' has spawned numerous scholarly arguments and explicit appeals to social identity theory (Cromhout 2007, 2008; Mason 2007; Berlin 2014: 211; Esler 2015).

Furthermore, archaeology has played an increasingly important role in interpreting the Galilean world of Jesus as well as Jesus in context (Reed 2000; Crossan and Reed 2001; Fiensy 2007; Oakman 2012). Important archaeologists working in Galilee have eschewed the use of comparative social sciences, such as appeals to Gerhard Lenski's Power and Privilege (1984; but see Magness 2011: 13–15). A prominent development over the last decade, however, is the claim that Galilee at the turn of the eras enjoyed prosperity for all, under moderate Herodian rule, with insignificant social stratification, and such that social problems and dislocations can hardly be invoked to explain the appearances of John the Baptist in Peraea or Jesus of Nazareth in Galilee (Jensen 2006; Mattila 2010, 2013; Aviam 2013).

How to locate Jesus in Galilee, then, has been a matter of strenuous debate. Was Jesus a 'Peasant Jewish Cynic' (Crossan 1991), 'Jewish Galilean' (Freyne 2004), or simply a Galilean (Fiensy 2007)? Was he Torah observant or not? What were his views of Judean eschatology or the Jerusalem Temple? Did he think of himself as a messiah? Was he literate or illiterate? Was he wealthy or poor? Was he a 'middler' or a vagabond? These are the kinds of questions being given a complex variety of answers. In the midst of this flux, then, it is impossible to avoid the hazard of interpretation. The quest of the historical Jesus, as Freyne held, has indeed become also the quest of the historical Galilee; but prospects for a consensus seem more remote than at the time of the first edition of this chapter.

Power and culture

All of these scholarly conversations involve assumptions about how power and culture were related in the early Roman empire and in Roman Galilee. Perhaps one of the most persistent disagreements in the study of the social world of the Roman Empire, including Roman Galilee, has been over the use of comparative social science and macro-social models. Historians and archaeologists tend to like detailed narratives based upon inductive inferences, and there has been the frequent accusation that comparative social models supply missing data inappropriately (Fiensy and Hawkins 2013; Oakman 2013, 2014a; Fiensy 2014: 81–84; Freyne 2014: 6, 91–93). However, even archaeologists and social historians have to supply missing data since the data of antiquity is always incomplete.

In recent archaeological approaches to Galilee, for example, cultural interpretations have prevailed. However, these approaches have to a high degree ignored the question of the relationship between power and culture. It is important, therefore, to make an a priori decision about whether power precedes culture, that is, culture is embedded within power, or vice versa, that is, power is embedded within culture. Of course, religion has been a central feature of human cultures, so the question of priority also pertains to the relationship between religion and politics.

In the Mediterranean world of Rome, Galilee, and Jesus, extended families (natural and fictive) provided the central institutional structures. Caesar could view the empire as an extended household (Phil 4:22). This implies that 'power' in the world of Jesus had to do with how elite families controlled and treated everyone else. This understanding can be modeled as in Figure 5.3.

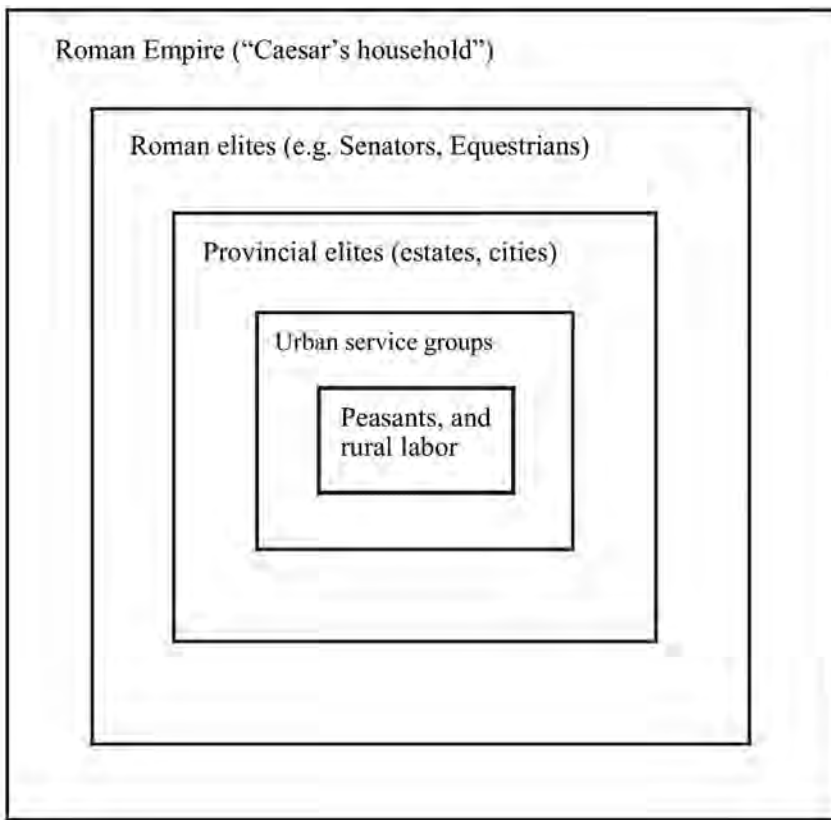
This diagram suggests that the culture of the leading family becomes the dominant culture. Power determines Culture. This does not preclude subcultures of other families from functioning within or contesting the culture of the ruling elite. No social power is absolute, and non-elites had various forms of power for negotiating life from below. From a different point of view, if religion provides meaning to the cultural world, then political religion is the religion of the ruling elite, which legitimates the way things are. Further, religious politics of the non-elites may contest the way things are in the name of a higher power. In this respect, Culture determines Power. While the ways of the elites tend to be imprinted in the grand traditions of the dominant culture, the little traditions of families and regions tend to bolster counter-cultures and contest the dominant power. These considerations will become important in the case of Jesus of Nazareth when it is perceived that for his in-group God is Father (the absolute householder and patron), but for Jesus' worldly action in early Roman Galilee, his guiding idea was that God is King.


Figure 5.3   Power in the early Roman empire. Diagram by Douglas E. Oakman

Power (and consequent privilege) must be the more-or-less 'independent variable' in the interpretive proposals of this chapter. Non-elite families, local cultures, economic realities, and religion all are embedded in the fields of force exerted by the ruling families. In the Galilean world of Jesus, power relations were by and large vertical in structure. Not surprisingly, then, the literature of patronage has become more prevalent in recent work on the gospels (Elliott 1996; Malina 2001a: 31–35, 2001b: 94–96). The politics in the Galilee of Jesus was patronal, and the dependency relations thus spawned affected all aspects of society. This is especially important when considering the politics and political economy of Roman Galilee.

Provincial elites: Judeans and Herods in Galilee

The political history of Galilee has been unfolded in numerous scholarly places. The literary sources are clear that Palestine was a political bone of contention between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids, which terminated in favor of the latter by the definitive conquests of Antiochus III (Panion 200 BCE; Jerusalem 198 BCE; Tcherikover 1937). Subsequently in 167 BCE, the policies of Antiochus Epiphanes provoked the uprising of Mattathias and his sons. The wars of the Maccabeans included the campaigns of Simon and Jonathan to the north and the annexation of Galilee (1 Macc 5:15–23, 10:30, 11:63). Ideologically, Hasmonean aspirations may have aimed at establishing the borders of Ezekiel's ideal Israel (Cromhout 2008: 12–87). Recent archaeology correlates the disappearance of Hellenistic period

Galilean Coarse Ware storage jars with this expansion (Aviam 2004: 44–50, 2013: 6). Yodefat likely originated as a Persian or Ptolemaic fort and was taken by the Hasmoneans along with other such forts; it later became an administrative town for Lower Galilee and was destroyed in 67 CE at the beginning of the Judean-Roman War of 66–70 CE.

It has been debated as to how populous Galilee was before the Hasmonean takeover, and whether Israelites of the northern kingdom survived down to the times of the Hasmoneans. Richard Horsley has argued vigorously that descendants of Israelite peasants remained in Galilee throughout the Persian and Hellenistic periods and preserved northern Israelite traditions in Galilee (Horsley 1995, 1996), but Reed and Cromhout speak against this (Reed 2000; Cromhout 2008). Archaeological surveys suggest that Galilee was sparsely populated during the Persian and early Hellenistic periods (Reed 2000: 23–61, based on Gal's survey). Yet this makes it difficult to understand how Judeans got there to be liberated by the Maccabees. It also would imply that agricultural land, which was considered highly valuable by the Hellenistic monarchs preceding the Hasmoneans, would have been mostly abandoned. Archaeologists like Mordechai Aviam can document the power of Akko/Ptolemais before the Hasmonean conquests. Fortresses guard the agricultural territory (Aviam 2004: 29). If royal estates of the Seleucids, inherited from the Ptolemies, endured up until Hasmonean times, then there had to be peasants working the best land. After 100 BCE, Hasmonean policy in Galilee encouraged settlement by Judeans.[2]

First Maccabees 12:1–3 also recounts that the Hasmoneans made a treaty with the Romans. Their appearance in the east would have enormous consequences for Palestine in the first century BCE with the conquests of Pompey, the demise of Hasmonean rule, the reorganization of taxation districts by Gabinius (Jos. JW 1.170), the favors of Julius Caesar and Mark Antony during the Republican civil wars, and eventually the rise of the house of Herod. Herod consolidated his power by killing prominent Hasmoneans and expropriating their estates. He also expropriated estate lands of the Sadducean (wealthy) faction of Jerusalem priests. Applebaum (1989: 245) gives a comprehensive survey of estate lands under the control of the Herods: Sadducean estates in Samaria; domains of Berenice on the Esdraelon Plain, in southwestern Samaria, and in the Golan; Antipas in the eastern Hepher Plain and in northwestern Samaria; Yavneh belonging to Salome; Herod the Great's estate lands in eastern Perea, estates on the Jericho Plain; Herodian interests in Bashan and Hauran. Temple and priestly lands were probably under the purview of Sepphoris (Fiensy 2014: 98–117). After 70 CE, many of these estates came under the control of the imperial authorities.

Herod the Great at the beginning of his rule as King of the Judeans subdued banditry in Galilee, suggestive of very unsettled agrarian conditions up to that time. At Herod's death, Hezekiah led an armed insurrection that had to be put down by a Roman legion under Varus. Strong-man rule continued in Galilee under Herod's son, Antipas. He ably controlled things through his patronage networks (Mark 6:21). Powerful, wealthy Judeans also had significant interests in Galilee during Jesus' lifetime. Sepphoris was a Judean-oriented city, which may suggest why Herod Antipas wanted to found Tiberias as a more Hellenized capital. (The Hebrew University excavations have definitely dated the theater found in Sepphoris to post-70 CE (Fiensy and Strange 2015: 67).) Mark indicates that Jesus' most important Galilean opponents were the clients of these powerful interests, namely, the Herodians (Herod partisans and clients) and the Pharisees (3:6).

Figure 5.4　A view of the Beit Netofa valley from Sepphoris. Photo Douglas E. Oakman

Galilee's agrarian political economy

Political history alone is inadequate to understand the context of Jesus. Political histories based on ancient literary sources, or archaeology focused solely on cultural artifacts, have tended merely to follow the perspectives and interests of the elite factions at the top of the social ladder. Further theoretical nuance can be gained by taking seriously the general character of 'agrarian civilizations.' The models of Lenski (1984), Kautsky (1982), and Sjøberg (1960) have been deployed in previous work to understand the context of Jesus. To them now can be added the perspectives of world systems and Big History (Christian 2004). In the words of David Christian, drawing upon ecological metaphors:

> [a]grarian civilizations [are] large societies based on agriculture, with states and all that that implies (literacy, warfare, etc.) . . . Human society became the 'niche' in which elites foraged for the resources they needed. Society became multilayered, with a base level of those who exploited nature (the primary producers) and upper layers of those who exploited those who exploited nature.
>
> (2004: 248–249)

Homomorphic macro-models become necessary to highlight important general features of the agrarian social world. These abstract models have to be selective in order to be informative. Though they do not satisfy the social historian's desire for detailed isomorphic micro-models, they can help to correct anachronistic assumptions about social processes and cultural details (Carney 1975; Finley 1986; Rohrbaugh 1987; Elliott 1993; Morley 2004).

For the greatest clarity about the agrarian social situation of Galilee, it is necessary to model Jesus' world from the bottom up. Figure 5.5 gives a sense of how this all works at least for agriculture (leaving out of consideration for now the fishing industry of the Galilean Lake).

Elite power and politics frustrate the small farmer ideal of self-sufficiency and subsistence agriculture along with the possibility of consuming 100 percent of the harvest. This is the clear meaning of the term 'peasant'—someone not living according to the self-sufficiency ideal, but rather subject to vertical power relations that frustrate that ideal. After all, elite rents and taxes extract so-called surpluses. *So the emphasis must be on 'so-called.'* Dependency relations and patronage politics were the Galilean rule and norm. The idea of a 'free peasant' or 'freeholder' seems hard to sustain if this is the case (on tenancy, see Kloppenborg 2008). All pre-industrial agriculture after the appearance of cities and states was accomplished by some form of dependent labor.

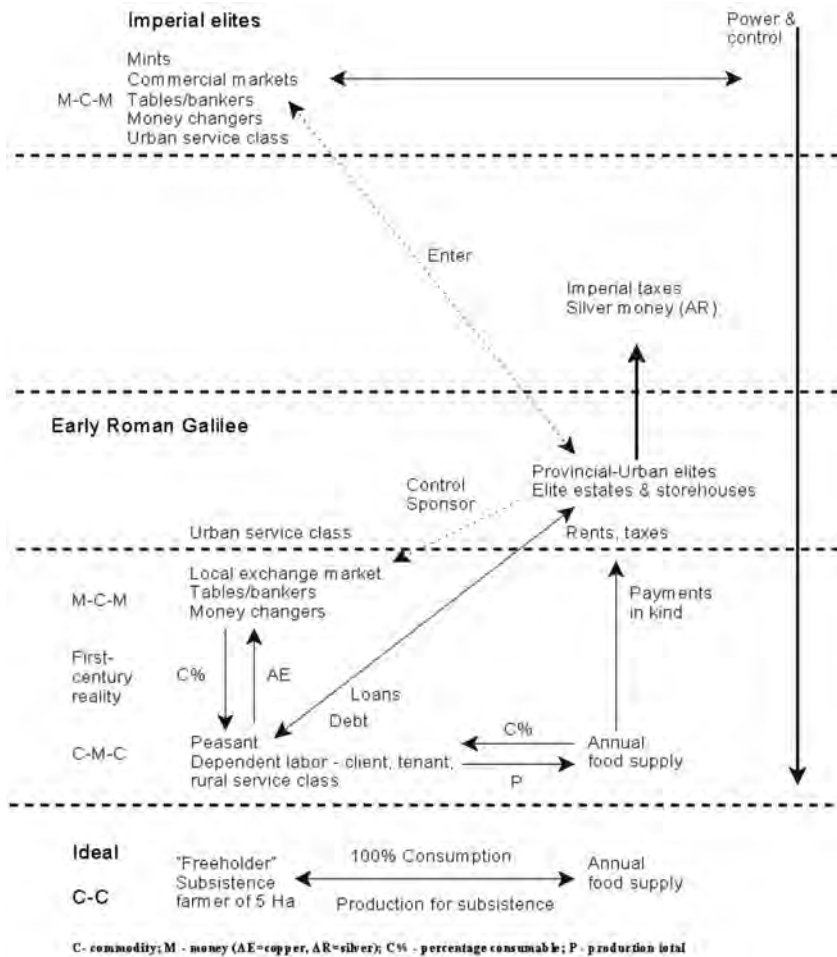
And under the early empire, the elites themselves seek resources to repay their own provincial and imperial patrons, and the elites themselves hold to the ideal of their own self-sufficiency—which entails the control over the productive resources of land and other people's labor. This entails Mammon, that is, money in the treasure house, on loan, or on deposit; and the building of storehouses (Luke 12:18). Elites have the power to modify productive decisions away from subsistence farming and toward cash crops and commerce. These decisions impact the subsistence margins of the dependent labor that works the land. Bad years and poor productive decisions can yield a crop of landless peasants and a harvest of banditry.


Figure 5.5 A model for early Roman Galilee. Devised by Douglas E. Oakman

Debates continue on the level of rents and taxes in early Roman Galilee (Udoh 2014). Keith Hopkins (2002) has argued that the Roman authorities allowed a sizeable 'take' to the provincial elites, precisely to buy their allegiance, but also with the expectation of costly demonstrations of loyalty. The Herods obliged with extravagance. Josephus notes the hatred for Herod the Great for despoiling the country, but also hatred for Agrippa I for largesse to Berytos (Ant. 17.306; 20.211–212). Ehud Netzer, of course, discovered Herod's tomb a few years ago, with his sarcophagus broken into hundreds of small pieces by the insurgents who held the Herodion during the 66–70 revolt.

Broshi notes the importance of the Babatha archivea for assessing the question of the typical extraction level. Babatha paid half the dates per tree in her contracts, and 1 Maccabees 10:30 suggests that this level may have been a standard for rents and taxes on tree crops throughout the Hellenistic-Roman period (Broshi 1992: 236). First Maccabees also mentions one-third of the grain per annum. The rents implied in the Luke 16 story of the 'Dishonest Steward' are sizeable. They were also burdensome, for why else would falsifying the books be acclaimed in the villages? And patronage politics, the return obligation and loyalties incurred by the villagers, are clearly in view.

As for any taxes imposed in money, what would the villager have left from so-called surpluses on the threshing floor to sell for cash? Gildas Hamel calls attention to the following interesting passage in the Tosephta:

> The renter of a field harvests, makes sheaves, [threshes], and winnows. [Then] the measurers, diggers, bailiff, and steward come and take from the middle (before the product is shared by the landowner and sharecropper). The well-master, bather, barber, boatsman, when they come [to collect] by the owner's authority, they take from his share; if they come [to collect] by the sharecropper's authority, they take from his share. The customs of the region are not to be changed . . . (tBM 9.14; pBM 9.1.12a adds the salaries of town watchmen).
>
> (1990: 154)

It is absolutely essential to realize that rents and various kinds of local taxes always had to be paid to a significant extent in produce. The reason for this is that these so-called surpluses line the larders of the landlords and urban elites. Correspondingly, the 'stores' of the village and the peasant household shrink, and beyond harvest time, subsistence anxiety must have been a persistent reality. Peter Brown has called storehouses the 'economic villains of the ancient world' (2012: 14).

Literary sources and archaeological finds do offer some information about elite storehouses in Roman Palestine (cf. Borowski 1987: 82). An early midrash reports that Nakdimon ben Gorion, Ben Kalba Sabbua, and Ben Zizit Hakeset 'could provision Jerusalem for ten years' (Midrash Lament. Rabba 1; Applebaum 1976: 659); b. Gittin 56a confirms that these three were remembered as fabulously wealthy. The horreum at the Northern Palace of Herod the Great is a prominent sign of the costs of the royal house to the agricultural producers. Josephus refers to an imperial granary in Upper Galilee (Life 71) and to wheat of Queen Berenike stored at Besara (Life 119). Acts 12:20 reports that Agrippa I supplied Tyre and Sidon with food. It has been reported that there were large granaries at Sepphoris, and most likely at Tiberias as well. Mendel Nun calls attention to the talmudic phrase 'from Susita to Tiberias' as indicating the regular conveyance of grain by boat to the Galilean city.

Moreover, the Herods and the chief priests under the Romans developed commerce far beyond the level achieved in the Hasmonean kingdom. Herod built the emporium Caesarea Maritima, and had commercial interests also with the Nabateans (Dar 2007: 306). The megalithic building programs of Herod the Great, Antipas, and Philip, especially seen in building and expansion of cities, would place much strain upon the country dwellers. The temple required enormous resources from Palestine, and Galilean wheat and oil supplied the on-going temple rituals (Hanson and Oakman 2008: 127–145). The wealthy high priests were involved in various kinds of business ventures—both private and temple-related. Eleazar ben Zadok and Abba Saul ben Batnith controlled wheat flour, wine, and oil interests. Eleazar was also involved in the sale of Ennion glassware to pilgrims

Figure 5.6   Herod's storehouse at Masada. Photo Douglas E. Oakman

(Engle 1977; Oakman 2012: 105). Tyrian silver money held sway in Jerusalem and Galilee; Antipas was only allowed to mint copper coins. Mediterranean sea-borne commerce made possible accumulation of luxury goods, but also for cities on the coast trade in bulk goods (esp. wine and oil, but also grain). Overland transport was difficult and expensive, but clearly possible for powerful wealthy families.

What about the food supplies and food security of the villager? Based upon studies of Serbian peasant economics in the 1950s, Joel Halpern determined that the north Mediterranean peasant (with some degree of modern technologies) could reach self-sufficiency on five hectares of land (1967: 74–75). Anything less than this area would require supplemental wage income—but this would imply that additional food surpluses were available to be purchased. And if landlords and urban elites were to extract exorbitant taxes and rents from the produce, then what would be left to the smallholder to be sold for money in the market? Low-paid labor done for others would have to compensate. Estimates of plot sizes in ancient Palestine are in accord with this comparative instance. Ben-David 'supposes an area of 7 hectares for a family of six to nine people' (cited in Hamel 1990: 134). Eusebius relates in The Ecclesiastical History (3.20.1–2) that relatives of Jesus shared a 2.5 Ha plot between two families. This also seems to be a standard plot size from Dar's survey of Samaria (Dar 1986; see also m. Baba Bathra 1:6; DJD II, p. 145, cited in Applebaum 1976: 657).

There are further systemic issues to be reckoned with. As inheritance customs require plot-divisions into smaller and smaller parcels, the five self-sufficient minimum is no longer possible. Animal fodder, seed requirements, the necessity for fallow periods—all press against subsistence. With no refrigeration, food preservation and storage is a significant issue. Low to zero inter-annual storage rates for most peasants are the rule. Belt-tightening is the ordinary (but, see Wilson 2014: 81–132).

Population pressure and land scarcity add additional danger. The available arable land in ancient Galilee has been variously estimated. The best recent estimate is 2,073 square kilometers (Strange 2014: 265). Abstractly, say 145,110 cultivable hectares (70 percent of 207,300 Ha) are available in the Galilee of Herod Antipas (cf. Applebaum 1976: 646, based upon Reifenberg). This amounts to 29,022 subsistence plots of 5 Ha each. If family sizes on average were five to six, then the Galilean population correspondingly would maximally amount to around 175,000 people at any one time. Viewed from a different angle, the 145,110 Ha, assuming 30 percent fallowing and fields entirely sown to grain at 150 kg per Ha, and a yield of 1:5, would produce 76,183 metric tons. One-fifth of this would need to be set aside for the next seeding. Two hundred kilograms per annum is a starvation ration. Assuming 250 kg for a working peasant, an absolute subsistence population would be around 244,000 (Broshi 1980: 7; Hamel 1990: 138). And when all agrarian production decisions are made by the elites who own (control) the land, subsistence crops compete with cash cropping!

The feedback model (Figure 5.7) can illustrate the factors endangering and perhaps strategies embraced by villagers to protect peasant subsistence.

Given very small cultivable plots and perennial elite exactions, local exchange markets or fairs become a necessity, but these are controlled and staged by people with resources (MacMullen 1970; Safrai 1994: 239–269). Once a 'middle man' (whether personal, money, or market) is interposed between peasant and consumable produce, the primary producer is at a distinct disadvantage. Long-distance commerce is no help since it is solely an elite game. Peter Brown has expressed it this way:

> Farmers could bring their produce into the nearest town. But the rich had privileged access to wider and more lucrative markets. They alone could defeat distance . . . The rich alone could also defeat time. They could store the abundance of the harvest and wait to sell when the prices were at their highest.
>
> (2012: 14)

And in accordance with Gresham's Law, 'bad' copper (i.e., token) money in the provincial Roman bi-metallic monetary system drives out the 'good' silver money. This fact is amply attested by coin

Enemies of peasant subsistence [Factors having negative impact on village subsistence, i.e., negative feedback]	Ideal of production for 100% consumption [Factors having positive impact on village subsistence, i.e., positive feedback]
Social threats •Taxes & rents - visible diminishment of annual consumption •Elite storehouses •Absentee or "single-strand" landlords •Corvée labor - labor siphoned away from the fields •Monumental building programs - labor conscription or "wage slavery" •Money (leading to loans, debt) - what is produced has to be repurchased •Chronic debt •Markets - what is produced can be sold to the highest bidder •Translocal markets •Cash cropping, commercial interests •Partible inheritance •Banditry Natural threats •Land pressure, marginal plots •Population pressure •Contamination •Pestilence or blight •Drought •Soil depletion (inadequate fallow periods) •Soil salinization	Tactical measures •Hiding produce •Contaminating in-kind tax produce, keeping the good produce •Surreptitious cultivation Social measures •Patron, "multi-strand landlord" (clientship, loyalty and obligation) •Tax and debt relief •Sharecropping vs. fixed rents •Agrarian revolt? Natural opportunities •New or more land available •Foraging during periods of famine

Figure 5.7　Factors in food security and insecurity. Diagram by Douglas E. Oakman

hoards and the prevalence of copper coinage at archaeological sites. The Romans may have sensed the power of money to work in this way—engendering ever more debt and dependency at the agrarian bottom (Goodman 1982; Hamel 1990: 156–158). Bad money will drive out the good, and only the good can support commercial ventures. Bad money, in effect, drives the goods to the urban and provincial storehouses. The villager's room for maneuvering for viable annual subsistence becomes very small in this social world.

These systemic considerations underscore the important point that the ancient provincial elites held all the power and productive levers in early Roman Palestine. They controlled land through estates and labor through debt, client loyalty, and obligation. The significant Galilean elites at that time, of course, derived from the Herods and their clients (the Herodians) and the Jerusalem priestly elites and their clients (temple scribes and Pharisees).

Jesus in his Galilean world

It is crucial to remember that almost all of our written sources of Jesus and his Galilee date from a later time, after the catastrophe of 70 CE. While Josephus mentions Jesus of Nazareth in the famous Flavian Testimony (Ant. 18.63), the report has been embellished through the hands of later Christian copyists. And of course Tacitus mentions the execution of 'Christus' at the hands of the provincial governor Pilate (Annals 15.44). Various rabbinic traditions provide information largely about second-century Galilee (Goodman 1983; Safrai 1994).

The earliest written records to provide substantial information about Jesus stand in the reconstructed document Q and the Gospel of Mark. Parallel sayings of Jesus in the Gospel of Thomas may be as old as those in Q, or at least in more original forms. Not all scholars are persuaded about a written document Q; and even more debate focuses on a Q stratified into at least two editions. But the reasons for seeing a sayings source used by both Matthew and Luke are very strong, and the alternate hypotheses for explaining the relationship of the Synoptic Gospels have many problems (Kloppenborg 2000). Moreover, earliest or wisdom Q is distinctive in its use of simple chreiai (aphorisms) and concern for economic issues; the later or deuteronomic Q edition incorporates more elaborated chreiai as well as strong elements of Judean eschatology (for instance, the Danielic figure of the Son of Man, also notable in the Gospel of Mark). Earliest Q seemingly was the product of scribes in the administration of Herod Antipas (Arnal 2001); the deuteronomic recension, with its decidedly Judean color, probably took shape after the transfer of the royal archives from Tiberias to Sepphoris at the beginning of the reign of Nero (54 CE; Josephus, Life 38–39).[3]

It is most probable that Jesus was born in Galilee. However, the Synoptic Gospels indicate problems surrounding his paternity, so it also seems highly probable that Jesus was illegitimate (Schaberg 1987; Van Aarde 2001; Oakman 2012: 67–68). As such, his honor rating would have been low in the eyes of contemporaries, especially in the conservative ethos of the village, and this may have been one reason for his departure from Nazareth (Mark 6:1–6; Matthew 4:13). Contemporaries of Jesus familiar with Deuteronomy 23:2 may have considered him a non-Israelite. Early traditions associate him with 'tax collectors [telōnai] and sinners' (Q 7:34; Mark 2:16). The genealogies of Matthew and Luke, or the making explicit of Joseph's paternity in Matthew, Luke, and John, show the tendency to rescue Jesus' honor (despite the information in Q and Mark that Jesus was alienated from his family).

Jesus and the Galilean fishers

Given land scarcity, a landless peasant from Nazareth would be forced into wage labor. Jesus is called a tektōn in the Gospel of Mark (6:3). The meaning of this trade has been debated; it probably refers to a worker in wood or stone and a building generalist (although Justin Dialogue with Trypho 88 reported that Jesus made yokes and plows; Fiensy 2007: 69). It is possible that passages in Q 6:41–42 or 48; Luke 13:4, 14:28–30; or Gos. Thom. 77 reflect Jesus' experiences in his trade. It is probable that Jesus' travels and experiences, reflected in the parables especially, had more to do with finding work than conducting a religious mission (Fiensy 2007: 74; Oakman 2012: 83). Moreover, the parables and sayings also show knowledge of estates and markets in the cities.

Figure 5.8   Limestone door-jamb from Jotapata. Photo Douglas E. Oakman

Figure 5.9   First-century boat from the Sea of Galilee, on display in the Yigal Alon Museum in Kibbutz Ginosar. Photo from Wikicommons; Travellers & Tinkers, own work

In the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus leaves Nazareth and takes up residence in Capernaum. When not wandering elsewhere, Jesus spent considerable time in the environs of the Galilean Lake and in the company of fishers. As a peasant artisan, he could perhaps find work in the local building trade and in boat repair (McCown 1928). The Galilee boat recovered in 1985 showed numerous patches and repairs, demonstrating the necessity of wood workers. Moreover, the boat attested the use of both oars and sails, with a capacity of up to fifteen persons (Wachsmann 2000: 315).

Archaeology has shown that development of harbors on the lake began in the Hellenistic period; a harbor was established by the Hasmoneans at Magdala (Aviam 2013: 13–14). This suggests that in the late Hellenistic period the lake was considered a royal monopoly. Herod Antipas and Philip probably held the same (competing) view on the lake's resources. Both built cities on the lake (Tiberias and Bethsaida/Julias respectively), which probably attests a desire for greater control over the fishing. Both cities also signify through their names the loyalty and obligation shown toward Rome by the Herods (Hirschfeld et al. 1993, 2008; Arav and Freund 1995–2009; Strickert 2011: 165–168). Nun has identified at least fourteen harbors around the lake and commented that they would have required substantial building labor (Nun 1988: 27). These might have been constructed with conscript or corvée labor.

The fishing syndicates were not exceptionally wealthy and paid their fixed 'rent' in fish to telōnai, that is, agents who contracted rent and tax collection from the Galilean elites. Figure 5.10 shows how control over the lake resources can be represented (Hanson 1997; Hanson and Oakman 2008: 101).

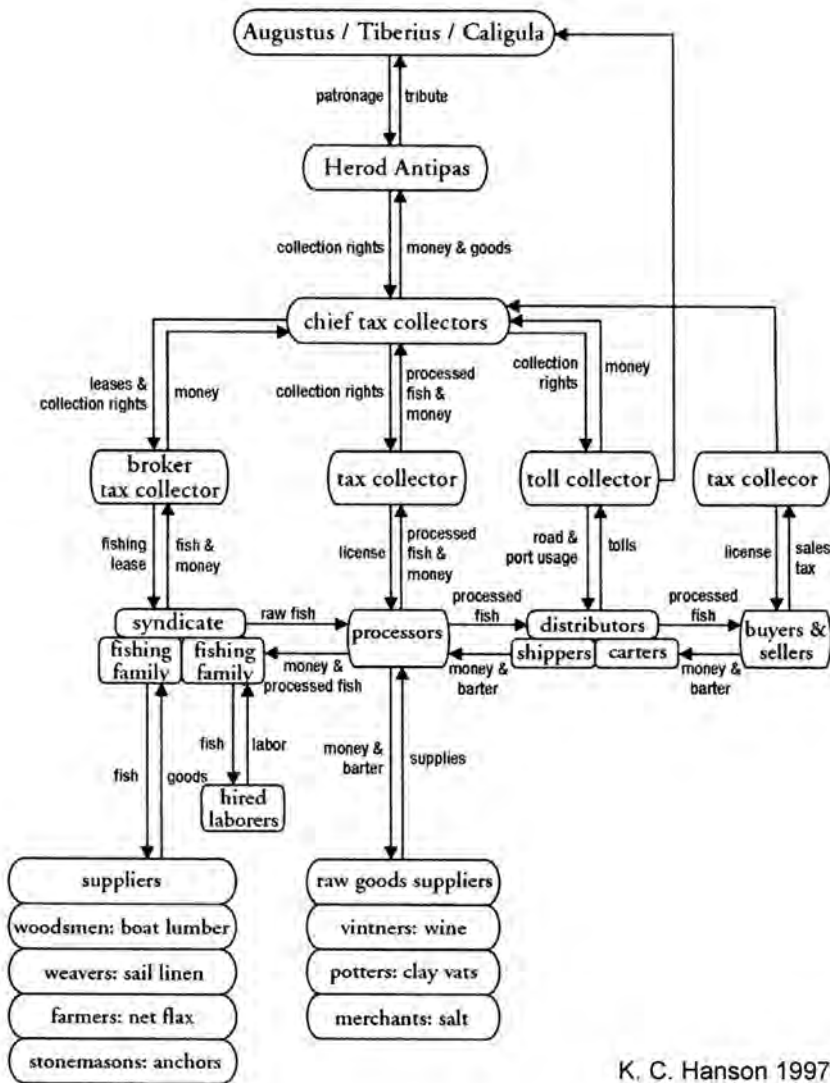
The vertical structures and flow of goods replicate the patronal structures and relations of the landed estates under elite control. Fish were salted in Magdala (Nun 1989: 51); some Galilean fish were processed for Mediterranean commerce (Hanson 1997; Freyne 2014: 95). As with bulk commodities or luxuries, only the powerful wealthy could (through agents) conduct circum-Mediterranean commerce. It is clear, however, that the fishers themselves were not in a position to carry on long-distance trade. Like their agricultural relatives, the fishers lived precariously and had to buy back from their own catch!


Figure 5.10   Resources associated with the Sea of Galilee and their control. Diagram by K. C. Hanson

Jesus and Judeans in Galilee

The incorporation into recent discussion of ethnic identity theory, and careful philological analysis of Ioudaios, has urged that the translation 'Judean' is to be preferred for the first century over 'Jew'; and that the more accurate translation of Ioudaismos is 'one embracing ethnic markers and customs of Judea.' The usage of the terms Jew or Judaism as exclusively religious or cultural terms in the early first century further ignores the over-determining realities of power and 'political identity' (Feldman 1999; Moxnes 2001; Cromhout 2007, 2008; Elliott 2007; Mason 2007; Berlin 2014: 211; Esler 2014, 2015).

Based on an important synthetic study of archaeological materials, Andrea Berlin has argued for a 'household Judaism' in Galilee during the early Roman period (2005, 2014: 208–215). Central to her proposal are miqva'oth (ritual purity baths), a common simple cooking assemblage, unadorned Jerusalem oil lamps (also called 'Herodian lamps'), and burial customs. The cooking assemblage contains a cooking pot form found at Judean sites as well as in Galilee stemming from Kefar Hananya (Berlin 2014: 210). Bag jars made at Kefar Shikhin are also part of this profile. She also includes simple stone cups and plates, and at sites like Gamla Eastern Terra Sigillata plates made on the coastal cities. Her argument is that this material culture evidences a heightened 'Jewish piety' up until the time of the Judean–Roman War. However, this interpretation can be contested in several respects. First, the pottery uniformity and limited production locations suggest the interests of controlling families. In particular, the lamps point to Jerusalem interests. Furthermore, Berlin acknowledges that while Galileans are eating with very simple cooking technology, wealthy Jerusalem houses contain imported wares from the Mediterranean and Nabataea. Would it not be more natural to think that Galileans are very poor and positioned within distribution networks of powerful Judean and Galilean families? As for miqva'oth, it is claimed that over 300 are known (Berlin 2005: 253, 700 according to Magness 2011: 16). However, the rush to see these as ritual purity baths seems anachronistically to read in rabbinic values and institutions from the second century CE. Ritual baths in the upper city of Sepphoris are credible as Sepphoris was a priestly city. Large miqva'oth such as at Gamla may have functioned like showers in modern electronics manufactories—that is, to cleanse workers for the production of pure wine for the temple (Magness 2011: 16–17). This could also make sense of other miqva'oth, as evidence of production for the temple.

Still, Berlin's synthesis does not mention where grain would be stored, and at least some of these miqva'oth could be reservoirs with other functional purposes. (In the Hebrew Bible, the word miqveh can refer to collections of other things besides water, and even figuratively of associations of people.) That peasants stored grain in underground areas is known from excavations at Nazareth. Underground areas at other Galilean sites may likewise have functioned as food storage areas (Aviam 2004: 123–132). Arabs in the late Ottoman period stored dry figs in a hiding place called mikhba (Grant 1921: 139). Likewise, stone vessels in Galilee have not displaced hard-fired ceramics in commoner contexts. If these vessels are evidence for priestly purity concerns, then it seems most probable that they are restricted to domestic contexts of those families or to priestly clients and domains in Galilee. Many Galileans were either disinterested in purity laws or were incapable of observing them. Yohanan ben Zakkai's statement, 'Galilee, you hate the Torah,' needs to be kept in mind (y. Shabbat 16:7, 15d). And certainly, even in the second century, the rabbis berated the amme ha-aretz ('people of the land,' i.e., either landowners or villagers) for their disregard of Torah strictures. Through most of the second century CE, the rabbis were not very influential in Galilee (Goodman 1983: 102–111; Hezser 1997: 386–399; Freyne 2014: 133, 156).

Figure 5.11 The theater at Sepphoris. Photo Douglas E. Oakman

It is notable, then, that neither Q nor Mark identify Jesus as a 'Judean,' nor employ the explicit term Ioudaios in any significant measure. In the Q story of the centurion's slave (Luke 7:1–10), the centurion (understood here as commanding a unit in Herod's mercenary army) is shown as a patron of Ioudaioi who built the synagogue in Capernaum. Such patronage of local building projects is well known in the inscriptions of Syria and Arabia (Grainger 1995). Then, the centurion addresses Jesus directly to broker God's healing patronage for the benefit of the slave (and centurion). Regarding the faith of the centurion, Jesus remarks that he has not found such faith in Israel. Israel is the more comprehensive term, with scope far beyond the ethnos of Judea (Freyne 2014: 143, 168). Q and Mark otherwise associate Judeans only with John the Baptist, and Mark uses the term in relation to Jesus only in the title 'King of the Judeans.' This information is obviously important in showing that 'Judeans' were more an elite presence in Galilee and expressive of the projected power of Jerusalem elites. Conversely, it says something about the interests of the scribes of the earliest Jesus traditions, and how their interests may have coincided with those of Jesus.

Pharisees from Jerusalem are mostly in conflict with Jesus in deuteronomic Q and Mark. These Pharisees sensibly were there to look after priestly and temple interests in Galilee. Their scribes promoted especially strict sabbath observance, tithing (extra temple liens), and ritual purity at meals. Sepphoris was a home for priestly elites, and their lands presumably were spread across Lower Galilee. Further, they controlled the pottery industry at Shikhin, and for their loyalty in the Judean-Roman War their villages (such as Khirbet Qana) were spared destruction. There is no mention of Pharisees in earliest wisdom Q. Deuteronomic Q includes the 'Woes' against the Pharisees in relation to tithing and purity (11:41–42; Magness 2011: 21–24). For Mark, conflicts more frequently center around sabbath observance (Mark 3:2), though there is also concern over purity (Mark 7:1–8). The same tensions are felt in Josephus's Life, as he leads an armed force and comes into conflict with Galilean elite factions. Josephus is in Galilee precisely to defend the interests of powerful Jerusalem priestly groups, and it seems more that he is on the side of those who will surrender to Rome to preserve their own privilege. (This certainly is how things played out for Josephus himself; he was rewarded for surrender.)

The scribes of the latest stage of Q can be characterized by their interest in John and Jesus as eschatological prophets in the line of deuteronomic prophets. If earliest wisdom Q was produced by scribes in the Herodian administration of the lake, then deuteronomic Q most likely emerged from scribal groups in Sepphoris after the transfer of the archives from Tiberias under Nero and Agrippa II. Deuteronomy emphasizes the sole worth of the God of Israel and 'all Israel.' The Gospel of Mark likewise 'reads' John and Jesus as eschatological prophets in the mold of Elijah (Mark 1:2; Mal 4:5). Zvi Zahavy (1990) has identified non-Jerusalem scribes in early rabbinism who emphasized the Shema' and the Exodus over Jerusalem scribes who sponsored the Amidah. The Q scribes of Sepphoris likely affiliated in Galilee with the former groups. Their conflict with scribes of the Jerusalem Pharisee groups is thus understandable. Their interest in Jesus sensibly derived from his central concern with God's Kingdom and with the Exodus at Passover. Consider Mark 12:28 for an example of a scribe who probably would be sympathetic as well to the Q tradents. Hence, the scribes and Pharisees in Galilee representing the interests of Jerusalem, the temple, and priests came into conflict with Jesus in ways that involved both ideology and material concerns.

Figure 5.12   Courtyard from a house in Khirbet Qana. Photo Douglas E. Oakman

Jesus and the Kingdom of God in Galilee

All contemporary Jesus scholars concede that Jesus' central concern was expressed through the meta-phor 'Kingdom of God.' How to construe this has long been discussed. The two major options are first the eschatological rule of God as found in Second Temple literature like Daniel 7 or in the Dead Sea Scrolls. This is indeed how Jesus is presented in both Q and Mark. However, the second option is that Jesus sees this rule as 'real and present' in the fields, natural world, and human relations of his Galilee. In the one view, Jesus' parables and sayings will warn of imminent catastrophe and reveal the opportunity to respond before the final Judgment; in the other view, the parables and sayings invite hearers to decide how they must act in the presence of this Power.

The tension between the eschatological outlook of the Synoptic Gospels (and deuteronomic Q's and Mark's construal of John and Jesus as eschatological prophets) and the natural theology elements of the earliest Jesus traditions in wisdom Q have led to extended arguments about the relationship between Jesus and John the Baptist. For Meier, Allison, and Freyne, for instance, Jesus' apocalyp-tic eschatology is largely in accord with the Baptist's (Meier 1991–2009: 2:19–181; Allison 2010: 31–220; Freyne 2014: 134–139). Paul Hollenbach and John Dominic Crossan, by contrast, argue that Jesus broke with the Baptist (Hollenbach 1982; Crossan 1991: 237–238). This alternative seems more likely, and the peasant artisan Jesus is hardly an eschatological prophet (Oakman 2012: 81). This, rather, is the portrayal of him given in the earliest sources Q and Mark. Peasant theology (ideology) is immediate and concrete (Oakman 2012: 75). The Prayer of Jesus is about immediate human need, in particular the deadly mortgage of debt upon adequate subsistence and free life. Jesus the peasant artisan seems best understood as a village sage whose wide travels garnered a unique social experience and wisdom. Under the dominant metaphor of the Kingdom of God, Jesus spoke of the real presence of God in the midst of perceived Galilean social problems.

For Jesus, God's Kingdom is closely associated with Israel's story of liberation in the Exodus. Jesus identifies himself with the Passover bread and wine in the traditions of the Passion Narrative. And these political interests eventually call Jesus to the attention of the authorities as well as the scribes behind Q.

Though the meanings of the parables of Jesus will continue to be debated, it is generally conceded that they had to do with Jesus' central interests, concerns, and praxis. The parables and sayings of Jesus again and again point to the everyday situations of Galilee. The eschatological readings of the parables are demonstrably secondary. So, sociological imagination is called for to place their meanings firmly in the context of a colonized Galilee. Fundamental here is that God's ruling presence pertains substantively to subsistence anxiety brought on by the conflicting social goals of Galilean elites (Q 12:22–32; cf. Mark 2:19). Patronage politics imply debt and obligation, as well as required expressions of loyalty. The exploitive practices of the elites are clear (Q 19:12–27; Mark 12:38–44; Luke 16:19–31). Jesus appears to advocate a 'reverse patronage' (Q 11:4; Luke 16:4). The two revolutionary cries of antiquity were abolition of debts and redistribution of land (Lev 25:10; Oakman 2012: 102). Jesus says little about the latter issue; only Mark 10:30 or Luke 12:13–14 seem to address land issues. However, there is a clear concern for debt in the Prayer of Jesus, and radical sayings about making loans without expectation of repayment appear in Q 6:35 and Gos. Thom. 95.

The Parable of the Sower takes on an interesting light when one considers that it reflects sowing on marginal ground, not on fertile bottom-land. In relation to the ruling power of God, what can the Sower signify? The harvest 'despite' all the bad odds has often led to claims that it is about growth and signifies kingdom success in the face of great odds. This approach ties into concerns about temporal eschatology. More likely, the story indicates the foolhardiness of the Sower and the preposterousness of the food situation facing the average Galilean. The bottom-lands invariably belong to elite estates. The peasant is forced to eke out a living even on marginal lands and rocky soils. In sum, the Sower signifies 'the Ruling God has compassion over subsistence anxiety.' Q 9:58 again suggests that the huios tou anthropou (Aramaic bar 'enash), 'the Galilean commoner,' is homeless! Interestingly, the term huios tou anthropou also appears in a wisdom Q context at 6:22 and need not signify there the eschatological figure of deuteronomic Q. Both 6:22 and 9:58 show that Jesus is vexed about the shameful plight of commoners. There is a sense of this meaning as well in the suffering Markan huios tou anthropou. Of course, wisdom Q contains the discourse on anxiety 12:22–32.

In addition to the parables, Jesus' sayings, and maxims especially found in the early Q material point to social and political meanings. Q 9:58 saying 'foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests' can be a veiled comment about the ease and plenty of both Herod Antipas and the people of Sepphoris. Their stores are full, and they perch (like birds, zippori) securely. That foxes and birds are also a natural threat to the fields will not go unnoticed by the villagers and villages owned by Sepphoris! The elites are parasites upon the countryside! Interestingly, John Pairman Brown points to a parallel to Q 9:58 in Plutarch's biography of Tiberius Gracchus: 'The wild beasts that roam over Italy have a hole, to each is its lair or nest; but the men who fight and die for Italy have no share in anything but air and sunshine' (1991, after Toynbee). Were the early Q tradents then familiar with agrarian problems in other parts of the Roman world? Their concern for wisdom would suggest a broader horizon of knowledge (Kloppenborg 2000: 200).

Q 16:13, 'You cannot serve God and Mammon,' stands in close connection with the Dishonest Steward parable where rents in kind would naturally imply need for storage. Far from being advice on investment strategies, Mammon here signifies more generally than money the security arrangements— the treasury and storehouse—that the provincial elites trust (which seems to be at the Semitic root of the word) to hedge about their estates. Luke's Rich Fool (Luke 12) will build more barns (apothēkai), and in the end trusts the wrong things and has the wrong investment calculus. These suggest that Jesus was more interested in immediate access to adequate food resources, or in acquiring it for others.

The critiques of Mammon and Debt are leveled at the patronage politics of Galilee that keep most everyone in dependent and servile status. The Prayer of Jesus (the Lord's Prayer) encapsulates the concern with debt as it endangers secure subsistence. In particular, the second table links the interlocking concerns of inadequate bread, debt, and courts that serve creditors (Oakman 2008: 199–242, 2014b: 42–91). This concern is also visible in wisdom Q 12:58–59 where the creditor's court and debtor's prison are mentioned in the same breath.

The feeding stories associate secure food with God's ruling power. The feeding of the 5,000 men centers on adequacy of bread and fish, which were the staples of Galilee. (Five loaves and two fish are probably a 'subsistence unit,' perhaps for a day for a peasant family or a week for a single person.) In general, the stories of healing and exorcism express Jesus' ability to broker help in the name of the Kingdom of God. So Crossan has said on the basis of Q 10:8–9 and parallel in Gos. Thom. 14 that eating and healing were at the center of Jesus' concerns (1991: 332–333). God's presence indeed can be compared to a wedding feast (Mark 2:19).

For Jesus' in-group, God's patronage was expressed in the address to God as 'Abba,' Aramaic for Father. This implies that Jesus' group and network were a fictive family, though not exclusive about membership. Jesus' conflict with the purity standards of the Pharisees in part had to do with his willingness to accept the outcasts, the 'tax collectors and sinners,' and to cross lines that Judean purity standards would not allow. The sharing ethic of the Jesus network counteracted the threats to adequate subsistence by so to speak building capacity to supply acute need. The healing and feeding narratives express this capacity. Jesus as broker of God's ruling power developed a network of powerful friends among the 'haves' and the reputation for brokering real goods for the 'have-nots.' Upon this fictive kin network and reputation of effective connection with God's present power would later be built the earliest christological claims and Christ-believing communities. Central to the life of their assemblies (ekklēsiai) was Jesus' Passover table and his continuing mediation (as a broker) with God even after his death (Hebrews 8:6; 9:15).

Developments after Jesus

Jesus' lasting influence in Galilee seems to have been minimal. His failure to address land redistribution or land tenure issues, despite his concerns about debt and insecure subsistence, made his vision unattractive to conservative peasant villagers. For the elites, calls for debt release were enough to indict and convict. There is no evidence of a Galilean Jesus movement after Jesus' death. Close associates like Peter leave Galilee after the crucifixion; James the son of Zebedee and James the brother of the Lord are killed in Judea. The 'Jesus movement,' it seems, takes form and shape in the post-Easter period in Jerusalem. From there, of course it moves to Syria and Egypt, and via Paul and others to Asia and Europe. Christians are first identified as a distinct group in 1 Peter 4 in Roman Asia and in Syrian Antioch (Acts 11:26). How Christianity reached Rome is uncertain, but it was certainly there when Paul wrote his letter to Rome c. 56 CE. The most remarkable thing to remember, and perhaps one of the greatest events in the history of religions, was the transformation of the message and influence of a provincial and rural peasant artisan into a predominately urban movement and universal salvation religion that eventually triumphed over Roman imperial power!

Notes

1 Professor Freyne lamentably died in 2013. He provided judicious assessments of Galilee studies in Freyne 2007. His final comprehensive views on the Galilean world of Jesus have been published posthumously (2014).
2 Without a doubt, however, both Q and Mark reflect scribal readings of Jesus that do in fact invoke northern Israelite keynotes (Moses, Elijah) and scribal interests not entirely sympathetic with Judean interests in Galilee.
3 Q by scholarly convention is cited by position in the Gospel of Luke. See Robinson et al. 2000. For details on the stratigraphic hypothesis, see Kloppenborg 2000: 143–165; for critique of the stratified Q hypothesis, see Tuckett 1996: 69–74.

Bibliography

Adan-Bayewitz, D. and Aviam, M. (1997) 'Iotapata, Josephus, and the Siege of 67: Preliminary report of the 1992–94 seasons,' Journal of Roman Archaeology 10: 131–165.
Adan-Bayewitz, D. and Perlman, I. (1990) 'The local trade of Sepphoris in the Roman period,' Israel Exploration Journal 40: 91–100.

Allison, D. C. (2010) Constructing Jesus: Memory, Imagination, and History. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

Applebaum, S. (1976) 'Economic life in Palestine,' in S. Safrai and M. Stern (eds) The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions, 2 vols. Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 2: 631–700.

Applebaum, S. (1989) 'Josephus and the economic causes of the Jewish war,' in L. H. Feldman and G. Hata (eds) Josephus, the Bible, and History. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 237–264.

Arav, R. and Freund, R. A. (eds) (1995–2009) Bethsaida: A City by the North Shore of the Sea of Galilee, 4 vols. Kirksville, MO: Truman University Press.

Arnal, W. E. (2001) Jesus and the Village Scribes: Galilean Conflicts and the Setting of Q. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Aviam, M. (2004) Jews, Pagans and Christians in the Galilee. Land of Galilee 1. Rochester, NY: University of Rochester Press.

Aviam, M. (2007) 'Distribution maps of archaeological data from the Galilee: An attempt to establish zones indicative of ethnicity and religious affiliation,' in Zangenberg et al. 2007: 115–132.

Aviam, M. (2013) 'People, land, economy, and belief in first-century Galilee and its origins: A comprehensive archaeological synthesis,' in Fiensy and Hawkins 2013: 5–48.

Barag, D. (1982–1983) 'Tyrian currency in Galilee,' Israel Numismatic Journal 6/7: 7–13.

Ben-David, A. (1969) Jerusalem und Tyros: Ein Beitrag zur palästinensischen Münz- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte (126 A.C.–57 P.C.). Basel, Switzerland: Kyklos-Verlag.

Berlin, A. M. (2005) 'Jewish life before the Revolt: The archaeological evidence,' Journal for the Study of Judaism 36(4): 417–470.

Berlin, A. M. (2014) 'Household Judaism,' in Fiensy and Strange 2014: 208–215.

Borowski, O. (1987) Agriculture in Iron Age Israel. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.

Brandon, S. G. F. (1967) Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Broshi, M. (1980) 'The population of western Palestine in the Roman-Byzantine period,' Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 236: 1–10.

Broshi, M. (1992) 'Agriculture and economy in Roman Palestine: Seven notes on the Babatha archive,' Israel Exploration Journal 42: 230–240.

Brown, J. P. (1991) 'Prometheus, the servant of Yahweh, Jesus: Legitimation and repression in the heritage of Persian imperialism,' in D. Jobling, P. L. Day and G. T. Sheppard (eds) The Bible and the Politics of Exegesis: Essays in Honor of Norman K. Gottwald on His Sixty-Fifth Birthday. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 109–125.

Brown, P. (2012) Through the Eye of a Needle: Wealth, the Fall of Rome, and the Making of Christianity in the West, 350–550 AD. Princeton, NJ and Oxford, UK: Princeton University Press.

Carney, T. F. (1975) The Shape of the Past: Models and Antiquity. Lawrence, KS: Coronado.

Case, S. J. (1926) 'Jesus and Sepphoris,' Journal of Biblical Literature 45: 14–22.

Chancey, M. (2014) 'The ethnicities of Galileans,' in Fiensy and Strange 2014: 112–128.

Christian, D. (2004) Maps of Time: An Introduction to Big History, Foreword by W. H. McNeil. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.

Cromhout, M. (2007) Jesus and Identity: Reconstructing Judean Ethnicity in Q. Matrix: The Bible in Mediterranean Context. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Cromhout, M. (2008) 'Were the Galileans "religious Jews" or "ethnic Judeans?",' Hervormde Teologiese Studies 64(3): 1279–1297.

Crossan, J. D. (1991) The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant. San Francisco, CA: HarperSanFrancisco.

Crossan, J. D. and Reed, J. L. (2001) Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts. New York: HarperSanFrancisco.

Dar, S. (1986) Landscape and Pattern. An Archaeological Survey of Samaria 800 BCE–636 CE, 2 vols. BAR International Series, 308 i and ii. Oxford, UK: BAR.

Dar, S. (2007) 'The agrarian economy in the Herodian period,' in N. Kokkinos (ed.) The World of the Herods. Stuttgart/Munich, Germany: Franz Steiner Verlag, 305–311.

Edwards, D. R. (1992) 'The socio-economic and cultural ethos of the lower Galilee in the first century: Implications for the nascent Jesus movement,' in Levine 1992: 53–73.

Edwards, D. R. (2002) 'Khirbet Qana: From Jewish village to Christian pilgrim site,' in J. H. Humphrey (ed.) The Roman and Byzantine Near East, vol. 3. Portsmouth, RI: Journal of Roman Archaeology, 101–132.

Edwards, D. R. (2007) 'Identity and social location in Roman Galilean villages,' in Zangenberg et al. 2007: 357–374.

Elliott, J. H. (1993) What Is Social-Scientific Criticism? Guides to Biblical Scholarship. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Elliott, J. H. (1996) 'Patronage and clientage,' in R. L. Rohrbaugh (ed.) The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 144–166.

Elliott, J. H. (2007) 'Jesus the Israelite was neither a "Jew" nor a "Christian": On correcting misleading nomenclature,' Journal for the Study of the Historical Jesus 5(2): 119–154.

Engle, A. (1977) 'An amphorisk of the Second Temple Period,' The Palestine Exploration Quarterly 109: 117–122.

Esler, P. F. (ed.) (1995) Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context. London and New York: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (2014) 'An outline of social identity theory,' in J. B. Tucker and C. A. Baker (eds) T&T Clark Handbook to Social Identity in the New Testament. London: Bloomsbury, T&T Clark, 13–40.

Esler, P. F. (2015) 'Intergroup conflict and Matthew 23: Towards responsible historical interpretation of a challenging text,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 45: 38–59.

Feldman, L. H. (1999) Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary, Judean Antiquities, Books 1–4. Boston, MA: Brill.

Fiensy, D. A. (2007) Jesus the Galilean: Soundings in a First Century Life. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Fiensy, D. A. (2014) Christian Origins and the Ancient Economy. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Fiensy, D. A. and Hawkins, R. K. (eds) (2013) The Galilean Economy in the Time of Jesus. Early Christianity and Its Literature 11. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Fiensy, D. A. and Strange, J. R. (eds) (2014) Galilee in the Late Second Temple and Mishnaic Periods. Vol. 1: Life, Culture, and Society. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Fiensy, D. A. and Strange, J. R. (2015) Galilee in the Late Second Temple and Mishnaic Periods. Vol. 2: The Archaeological Record from Cities, Towns, and Villages. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Finley, M. I. (1986) Ancient History: Evidence and Models. American Council of Learned Societies. New York: Elisabeth Sifton Books Viking.

Frankel, R. (1992) 'Some oil presses from western Galilee,' Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 286: 39–71.

Frankel, R. and Freyne, S. (1992) 'Galilee,' Anchor Bible Dictionary 2: 879–899.

Freyne, S. (1980) Galilee from Alexander the Great to Hadrian 323 B.C.E. to 135 C.E. Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier and Notre Dame University Press.

Freyne, S. (1988) Galilee, Jesus and the Gospels: Literary Approaches and Historical Investigations. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Freyne, S. (1992) 'Urban–rural relations in first-century Galilee: Some suggestions from the literary sources,' in Levine 1992: 75–94.

Freyne, S. (1994) 'The geography, politics, and economics of Galilee and the quest for the historical Jesus,' in B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (eds) Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research. New Testament Tools and Studies 19. Leiden, The Netherlands; New York; and Cologne, Germany: E. J. Brill, 75–121.

Freyne, S. (1995) 'Herodian economics in Galilee: Searching for a suitable model,' in Esler 1995: 23–46.

Freyne, S. (1999) 'Behind the names: Galileans, Samarians, Ioudaioi,' in E. M. Meyers (ed.) Galilee through the Centuries: Confluence of Cultures. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 39–55.

Freyne, S. (2004) Jesus, A Jewish Galilean: A New Reading of the Jesus-Story. London and New York: T&T Clark.

Freyne, S. (2007) 'Galilean studies: Old issues and new questions,' in Zangenberg et al. 2007: 13–29.

Freyne, S. (2014) The Jesus Movement and Its Expansion: Meaning and Mission. Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans Publishing.

Gal, Z. (1992) Lower Galilee During the Iron Age. ASOR Dissertation Series 8. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.

Golomb, B. and Kedar, J. (1953) 'Ancient agriculture in the Galilean mountains,' Israel Exploration Journal 3: 94–98.

Goodman, M. (1982) 'The first Jewish revolt: Social conflict and the problem of debt,' Journal of Jewish Studies 33: 417–427.

Goodman, M. (1983) State and Society in Roman Galilee A.D. 132–212. Oxford Centre for Postgraduate Hebrew Studies. Totowa, NJ: Rowman and Allanheld Publishers.

Grainger, J. D. (1995) '"Village government" in Roman Syria and Arabia,' Levant 27: 179–195.

Grant, E. (2005 [1921]) The People of Palestine: An Enlarged Edition of 'The Peasantry of Palestine, Life, Manners and Customs of the Village'. Eugene, OR: Wipf and Stock Publishers.

Halpern, J. M. (1967) A Serbian Village: Social and Cultural Change in a Yugoslav Community, revised. New York; Evanston, IL; and London: Harper Colophon Books.

Hamel, G. (1990) Poverty and Charity in Roman Palestine, First Three Centuries C.E. Near Eastern Studies 23. Berkeley, CA and Oxford, UK: University of California.

Hanson, K. C. (1997) 'The Galilean fishing economy and the Jesus tradition,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 27: 99–111.

Hanson, K. C. (2002) 'Jesus and the social bandits,' in W. Stegemann, B. J. Malina and G. Theissen (eds) The Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 283–300.

Hanson, K. C. and Oakman, D. E. (2008) Palestine in the Time of Jesus: Social Structures and Social Conflicts, 2nd ed. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Hanson, R. S. (1980) Tyrian Influence in the Upper Galilee. Meiron Excavation Project 2. Cambridge, MA: American Schools of Oriental Research.

Hengel, M. (1974) Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine During the Early Hellenistic Period, J. Bowden, trans. 2 vols. in 1. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Herrenbrück, F. (1981) 'Wer waren die "Zöllner"?,' Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 72: 178–194.

Herrenbrück, F. (1990) Jesus und die Zöllner. WUNT 41. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr.

Hezser, C. (1997) The Social Structure of the Rabbinic Movement in Roman Palestine. Texte und Studien zur antiken Judentum 66. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Hirschfeld, Y., Foerster, G, Vitto, F., Stepansky, Y. and Gutfeld, O. (2008 [1993]) 'Tiberias,' in Stern 2008 [1993], vol. 4: 1464–1473, vol. 5: 2048–2054.

Hoehner, H. W. (1972) Herod Antipas. SNTS Monograph Series 17. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Hollenbach, P. W. (1982) 'The conversion of Jesus: From Jesus the baptizer to Jesus the healer,' Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt II 25(1): 196–219.

Hopkins, D. C. (1996) 'Agriculture,' in Meyers 1996: 1: 22–30.

Hopkins, K. (2002) 'Rome, taxes, rent and trade,' in W. Scheidel and S. Von Reden (eds) The Ancient Economy. New York: Routledge, 190–230.

Horsley, R. A. (1995) Galilee: History, Politics, People. Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International.

Horsley, R. A. (1996) Archaeology, History, and Society in Galilee: The Social Context of Jesus and the Rabbis. Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International.

Horsley, R. A. (2014) Jesus and the Politics of Roman Palestine. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press.

Horsley, R. A. and Hanson, J. S. (1985) Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs: Popular Movements at the Time of Jesus. San Francisco, CA: Harper & Row.

Jensen, M. H. (2006) Herod Antipas in Galilee: The Literary and Archaeological Sources on the Reign of Herod Antipas and Its Socio-Economic Impact on Galilee. WUNT 215. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Kautsky, J. H. (1982) The Politics of Aristocratic Empires. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (2000) Excavating Q: The History and the Setting of the Sayings Gospel. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (2008) 'The growth and impact of agricultural tenancy in Jewish Palestine (III BCE–I CE),' Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 51(1): 33–66.

Lenski, G. E. (1984) Power and Privilege: A Theory of Social Stratification, 2nd ed. Chapel Hill, NC and London: University of North Carolina.

Levine, L. I. (ed.) (1992) The Galilee in Late Antiquity. New York and Jerusalem: The Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

MacMullen, R. (1970) 'Market-days in the Roman empire,' Phoenix 24: 333–341.

MacMullen, R. (1974) Roman Social Relations. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Magness, J. (2011) Stone and Dung, Oil and Spit. Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans Publishing.

Malina, B. J. (2001a) The New Testament World, 3rd ed. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Malina, B. J. (2001b) The Social Gospel of Jesus: The Kingdom of God in Mediterranean Perspective. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Malina, B. J. and Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1992) Social-Science Commentary on the Synoptic Gospels. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Mason, S. (2007) 'Jews, Judaeans, Judaizing, Judaism: Problems of categorization in ancient history,' Journal for the Study of Judaism 38: 457–512.

Mattila, S. L. (2010) 'Jesus and the "middle peasants?" Problematizing a social-scientific concept,' Catholic Biblical Quarterly 72(2): 291–313.

Mattila, S. L. (2013) 'Revisiting Jesus' Capernaum: A village of only subsistence-level fishers and farmers?' in Fiensy and Hawkins 2013: 75–138.

McCown, C. C. (1928) 'Ho Tektōn,' in S. J. Case (ed.) Studies in Early Christianity. New York and London: The Century Co., 173–189.

Meier, J. P. (1991–2009) A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4 vols. New York; New Haven, CT; and London: Doubleday; Yale University Press.

Meyers, C. L. and Meyers, E. M. (1996) 'Sepphoris,' in Meyers 1996: IV: 527–536.

Meyers, E. M. (1986) 'Sepphoris, the ornament of all Galilee,' Biblical Archaeologist 49: 4–19.

Meyers, E. M. (1992) 'Roman Sepphoris in light of new archaeological evidence and recent research,' in Levine 1992: 321–338.

Meyers, E. M. (ed.) (1996) Oxford Encyclopedia of the Ancient Near East, 5 vols. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Meyers, E. M. and Martin-Nagy, R. (eds) (1997) Sepphoris in Galilee: Crosscurrents of Culture. Raleigh, NC: North Carolina Museum of Modern Art/Eisenbrauns.

Morley, N. (2004) Theories, Models and Concepts in Ancient History. London and New York: Routledge.

Moxnes, H. (2001) 'The construction of Galilee as a place for the historical Jesus,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 31: 26–37, 64–77.

Netzer, E. and Weiss, Z. (1994) Zippori. Jerusalem: The Israel Exploration Society.

Nun, M. (1988) Ancient Anchorages and Harbours Around the Sea of Galilee. Kibbutz Ein Gev, Israel: Kinnereth Sailing Co.

Nun, M. (1989) The Sea of Galilee and Its Fishermen in the New Testament. Kibbutz Ein Gev, Israel: Kinnereth Sailing Co.

Oakman, D. E. (1986) Jesus and the Economic Questions of His Day. Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 8. Lewiston, NY and Queenston, ON: The Edwin Mellen Press.

Oakman, D. E. (2008) Jesus and the Peasants. Matrix: The Bible in Mediterranean Context. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Oakman, D. E. (2012) The Political Aims of Jesus: Peasant Politics in Herodian Galilee. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Oakman, D. E. (2013) 'Execrating? or Execrable Peasants!' in Fiensy and Hawkins 2013: 139–164.

Oakman, D. E. (2014a) 'Debate: Was the Galilean economy oppressive or prosperous? A. Late Second Temple Galilee: Socio-archaeology and dimensions of exploitation in first-century Palestine,' in Fiensy and Strange 2014: 346–356.

Oakman, D. E. (2014b) Jesus, Debt, and the Lord's Prayer: First Century Debt and Jesus' Intentions. Foreword by K. C. Hanson. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Overman, J. A. (2014) 'Debate: Was the Galilean economy oppressive or prosperous? B. Late Second Temple Galilee: A picture of relative economic health,' in Fiensy and Strange 2014: 357–365.

Rappaport, U. (1992) 'Phoenicia and Galilee: Economy, territory and political relations,' Studia Phoenicia 9: 261–268.

Reed, J. L. (2000) Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus: A Re-Examination of the Evidence. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.

Reed, J. L. (2001) 'Galilean archaeology and the historical Jesus,' in M. Meyer and C. Hughes (eds) Jesus Then and Now: Images of Jesus in History and Christology. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 113–129.

Reed, J. L. (2014) 'Mortality, morbidity, and economics in Jesus' Galilee,' in Fiensy and Strange 2014: 242–252.

Robinson, J. M., Hoffmann, P. and Kloppenborg, J. S. (eds) (2000) The Critical Edition of Q. Minneapolis, MN and Leuven, Belgium: Fortress Press and Peeters Publishers.

Rogerson, J. W. (2009) A Theology of the Old Testament: Cultural Memory, Communication, and Being Human. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1987) 'Models and muddles: Discussions of the social facets seminar,' Forum 3(2): 22–33.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (2007) The New Testament in Cross-Cultural Perspective. Matrix: The Bible in Mediterranean Context. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Ronen, A., Gal, Z. and Aviam, M. (1993) 'Galilee,' in Stern 1993, vol. 2: 449–458.

Safrai, Z. (1994) The Economy of Roman Palestine. London and New York: Routledge.

Sanders, E. P. (1985) Jesus and Judaism. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Schaberg, J. (1987) The Illegitimacy of Jesus: A Feminist Theological Interpretation of the Infancy Narratives. San Francisco, CA: Harper & Row.

Schürer, E. (1973–1984) The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), 4 vols. Rev. and trans. of the 2nd German ed. (1886–90) by G. Vermes, F. Millar and M. Black. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Shroder Jr., J. F. and Inbar, M. (1995) 'Geologic and geographic background to the Bethsaida excavations,' in Arav and Freund, vol. 1: 65–98.

Sjøberg, G. (1960) The Preindustrial City: Past and Present. New York: Free Press.

Stern, E. (ed.) (1993, 2008) The New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, 5 vols. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Strange, J. F. (2014) 'The Galilean road system,' in Fiensy and Strange 2014: 263–271.

Strange, J. F., Groh, D. and Longstaff, T. (1994) 'Excavations at Sepphoris: The location and identification of Shikhin, Part 1,' Israel Exploration Journal 44: 216–227.

Strange, J. F., Groh, D. and Longstaff, T. (1995) 'Excavations at Sepphoris: The location and identification of Shikhin, Part 2,' Israel Exploration Journal 45: 171–187.

Strickert, F. (2011) Philip's City. Collegeville, MN: Michael Glazier.

Syon, D. (2004) Tyre and Gamla: A study in the monetary influence of southern Phoenicia on Galilee and the Golan in the Hellenistic and Roman periods. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Hebrew University.

Tcherikover, V. (1937) 'Palestine under the Ptolemies (A contribution to the study of the Zenon papyri),' Mizraim: Journal of Papyrology, Egyptology, History of Ancient Laws, and their Relations to the Civilizations of Bible Lands 4–5: 1–90.

Theissen, G. (1991) The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition, L. M. Maloney, trans. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Theissen, G. and Merz, A. (1998) The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, J. Bowden, trans. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Tuckett, C. M. (1996) Q and the History of Early Christianity: Studies in Q. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers.

Udoh, F. (2014) 'Taxation and other sources of government income in the Galilee of Herod and Antipas,' in Fiensy and Strange 2014: 366–387.

Van Aarde, A. (2001) Fatherless in Galilee: Jesus as a Child of God. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.

Wachsmann, S. (2000) The Sea of Galilee Boat: An Extraordinary 2000 Year Old Discovery. Cambridge, MA: Perseus Publishing.

Wellhausen, J. (1905) Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien. Berlin: Reimer.

Wilson, C. B. (2014) For I Was Hungry and You Gave Me Food: Pragmatics of Food Access in the Gospel of Matthew. Eugene, OR: Pickwick Publications.

Zahavy, T. (1990) Studies in Judaism. Lanham, MD; New York; and London: University Press of America.

Zangenberg, J., Attridge, H. W. and Martin, D. B. (eds) (2007) Religion, Ethnicity, and Identity in Ancient Galilee: A Region in Transition. WUNT 210. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

6

EARLY JEWISH CHRISTIANITY

Edwin K. Broadhead

Patristic writers insisted that Jewish Christianity emerged as a late hybrid of Judaism and Christianity, and they labeled as heretics groups such as Nazarenes, Ebionites, Elkesaites, Cerinthians, Symmacheans, and Judaizers. Most of church history and much of critical scholarship has accepted this patristic critique. Careful critical analysis, however, unveils a sharply different reality.

Jewish Christianity in the history of scholarship

The terms Jewish Christian and Jewish Christianity are not used anywhere in antiquity. These designations emerge only in the wake of the Enlightenment and English Deism.[1] John Toland (1718) argued that Jewish Christians such as Nazarenes and Ebionites were the earliest form of Christianity, and Toland contrasted these with a Pauline Gentile Christianity. By 1740 Thomas Morgan contrasted Jewish Christians or Christian Jews as a negative parallel to the natural religion sponsored by Paul (Kümmel 1972: 56).

The ideas of the Deists made their way into Germany, and there interest in Jewish Christianity flourished. Johann Semmler, writing from 1771–75, initiated a type of critical analysis when he sought to divide the books of the New Testament according to their origin in Jewish Christian or Gentile Christian communities (Kümmel 1972: 67–8). In a similar way, Johann Michaelis in 1771 distinguished between Christians of Jewish and Gentile origin (Michaelis 1788). By 1776 Gerhard Lessing would connect the idea of a primitive Nazarene gospel to the comments of Papias and Jerome in an attempt to reconstruct the foundational stages of the Christian religion (Frey 2010: 94–8). While most retained the negative contrast found in much of English Deism, a few scholars began to see in Jewish Christianity a positive, foundational image. Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860) would posit the contrast between such early groups as a key component in the synthesis from which Christianity emerged.

Baur thus placed Jewish Christianity on the map of the ancient world and made it a primary factor in the history of primitive Christianity. In Baur's model, Jewish Christians were the oldest party and could trace their origins to apostles who knew Jesus. Baur believed Jewish Christians dominated the Jerusalem church, they were foundational to the church at Rome, and they were behind opposition to Paul in Galatia, Philippi, and Corinth. They emerged in church history as the Ebionite sect, and they can be seen in the conflict narrated in the Pseudo-Clementine writings. For Baur, the reconciliation between Paulinists and Jewish Christians was the generative factor behind the emergence of the Catholic church.

From Toland and the Deists through Baur and into the modern era, the question of Jewish Christianity has left a decisive imprint on the history of critical scholarship, and it continues to impose itself onto literary and historical studies. This can be seen in two areas of current New Testament scholarship: (1) the presumed 'parting of the ways' between Judaism and Christianity, and (2) the developmental history of primitive Christianity.

Toward a definition of Jewish Christianity

The question of how to define Jewish Christianity has emerged anew in recent scholarship. James Carleton Paget (1999) notes three major trends.[2] The first of these is an ethnic definition: 'a Jewish Christian was a Jew who became a Christian' (1999: 733).[3] A second approach is praxis-based: 'a Jewish Christian is someone who accepts the messianic status of Jesus . . . but feels it is necessary to keep, or perhaps adopt practices associated with Judaism' (1999: 734). A third pattern seeks a common set of ideological and doctrinal issues (1999: 736–39). A fourth way sees anti-Paulinism as an intrinsic trait of Jewish Christianity (Baur 1831; Lüdemann 1989).

Jörg Frey notes how dogmatic interests may shape the decisions about which groups and texts are designated as Jewish Christian (2010: 93–8). The designation is sometimes based on ethnic origin, sometimes on practices, and sometimes on theological differences with the Great Church tradition. These ancient elements reappear in various combinations in modern attempts at definition. Frey (2010: 98) concludes:

> The most practical approach is certainly a cumulative determination of Jewish Christian identity which is based on a conscious foundation of Jewish Torah observance and reckons with a continuing connection to synagogue Judaism, but does not presume the necessity of fixed theological positions. Anything more than this relatively open definition appears, in light of the fragmentary nature of the source materials, hardly possible. Because of the difficult nature of the source materials, further concretization beyond this relatively open definition is hardly possible.

Any nomenclature and definition must be relevant for both the ancient evidence and for the modern history of research. Thus, the label Jewish Christianity will be used here as metalanguage—as a synthesizing construct of modern scholarship. Various groups in antiquity who exhibit Jewish ways of following Jesus will thus be labeled as Jewish Christianities. In this definition, both their Jewishness and their connection to Jesus are expressions of a continuing covenant between Israel and God. Jewish Christianity is thus, in my formulation, a scholarly label for persons and groups in antiquity whose historical profile suggests they both follow Jesus and maintain Jewishness and that they do so as a continuation of God's covenant with Israel.

Points of origin

Jewish Christianity has key points of origin. Among these are the Jewishness of Jesus, the earliest communities of Jesus' followers, and the earliest writings from these communities.

Jesus the Jew

Numerous scholars have interpreted the perceived distance of Jesus from Temple, scribe, Sadducee, Pharisee, and Zealot to be a distance from Judaism. More careful investigations, however, have shown that Jewishness in the first century of the common era was a widely variegated religious phenomenon, both in doctrine and in practice. Closer analysis suggests that the eccentricity of Jesus fits in a general way within the complexity of first-century expressions of Jewishness.

Jesus was, however, almost certainly distinguished by his association with John the Baptist and by his obsession with the coming Reign of God. In this light, Jesus re-evaluated the power of Rome, the authority of the Temple, the role of holiness and purity, and the practice of the law. More significantly, Jesus saw his own identity and mission—and that of his followers—in the light of the coming Kingdom of God. This vision for the dramatic fall and rise of Israel was deeply rooted in the stories and visions of her prophets, and his life likely represents an attempt to recover the prophetic traditions of Israel. As a consequence, all descriptions of the historical figure of Jesus must begin and end with his profile as a Jewish prophetic figure.

The religious map of antiquity looks quite different when Jesus is separated out from Christianity and resituated as a historical figure wholly within the variegated framework of first-century Judaism. If Jesus is a Jewish prophetic figure, it is also reasonable to expect that a prophetic, revisionist form of Jewishness will dominate among the earliest communities of his followers and within the earliest texts produced by those communities.

The earliest communities of Jesus' followers

The earliest Christian communities arose in a variety of locales and contexts between the death of Jesus and the framing of Nicene orthodoxy (325 CE). Most communities claimed to be rooted in some form of apostolic tradition, and this claim to apostolic, Jewish origins takes two distinct forms: intrinsic and constructed.

Constructed connections are extrinsic to the structure, location, and ideology of the community. These serve as a type of gemeindegründungslegende (foundational myth): their function is to legitimize a community that often stands at some distance from any apostolic orientation. Such constructions root the community in Jewish Christian persons, but not in Jewish Christian ideas and practices.

In contrast, some communities show intrinsic connections to the Jewishness of the apostolic era. Chief among these are literary connections, theological focus, archeological data, and sociological profiles. The four primary sees of orthodox Christianity—Jerusalem, Antioch, Rome, Alexandria— each present evidence of a formative period under the influence of some type of Jewish Christianity (Broadhead 2010: 80–160). Furthermore, in each of these four major communities, the memory of the formative role of Jewish Christianity endures in the face of changing identity.

The earliest writings

Do the earliest Christian writings reflect groups who both follow Jesus and maintain Jewishness? This is certainly true in a general sense. Early Christian writings borrowed Jewish frameworks such as apocalypticism and drew upon Jewish ideas such as Wisdom. Furthermore, almost all Christian writings draw in some degree upon the Hebrew Bible. Standing out from this general legacy, however, are a few works that suggest a unique connection to some form of Jewish Christianity.

First, a few of the texts and traditions under consideration may be Jewish, but not Christian. This is plausible for the Two Ways Tradition and the earliest forms of the Sermon on the Mount. This is possible, but less plausible, for materials used in the canonical books of James, Jude, and 2 Peter.

Second, some texts and traditions can only be explained in terms of Jewish Christianity. In its present state of reconstruction, the Sayings Tradition (referred to by the term Q in most scholarship) says nothing of the Christian kerygma based on the death and resurrection of Jesus, it says nothing of a Christian movement, and it does not describe Jesus by the Christ title. The earliest tradents of the Sayings Tradition appear to be Jews who follow Jesus and, like him, expect the imminent reformation and revitalization of Israel. William Arnal discusses the role of village scribes as the tradents of this tradition (2001).

The canonical book of James reflects some form of Jewish Christianity. The tradents of this material have embraced Greek language and rhetoric, but the conceptual world is one of Jewish paraenesis and eschatology held by followers of Jesus and practiced in a synagogue setting.

The canonical books of Jude and 2 Peter possibly reflect a similar identity. While Jude is addressed to a later, Greek-speaking context, it draws upon the literature and the conceptual world of Palestinian Judaism to call for a renewed faithfulness to Jesus. The Jewish Christian content of Jude, but also its conceptual framework, are used in 2 Peter to stir up eschatological zeal and endurance among the followers of Jesus.

The Didache presumes a Jewish community that seeks to distinguish itself from some other Jews. The Jewish Christian identity of the Didache is particularly evident in its use of the Two Ways Tradition. Here following Jesus is presented as a way of fulfilling a Jewish paranetic tradition.

The Gospel of Matthew envisions a mission to the nations and becomes the favorite gospel of Gentile Christianity. Its identity, however, is best explained in terms of a Jewish Christianity negotiating its way between its past and its vision of the future. The Gospel of Matthew seeks to facilitate this transition by incorporating numerous traditions, most, if not all of which can be explained in terms of Jewish Christianity. The Gospel of Matthew respects these traditions, recognizes their authority, and incorporates them into a gospel oriented in three directions: (1) continuity with the Jesus movement; (2) a polemic against some other Jews; and (3) a mission to the nations.

Summation

These insights may help to clarify the origins of Jewish Christianity and its place on the religious map of antiquity. The historical profile of Jesus reveals a prophetic Jewish figure proclaiming an eschatological message of the coming of God's Kingdom. Jesus' first followers were Jews who saw in him the promised messiah, and this is reflected in the nature of the earliest communities and in the character of the texts they produced.

Patristic representations

Do patristic writings point to groups in antiquity who seek to fulfill God's covenant with Israel by both following Jesus and maintaining Jewishness?

Literary representation

Patristic writers offer a literary representation of Jewish Christianity that is extensive, variegated, creative, and contradictory (Broadhead 2010: 161–251). Its development is marked by layers of repetition and accretion. Two hermeneutical designs control this complicated presentation.

The patristic representation of the sects is dominated by the hermeneutics of heresiology. Although the rubric of church history is sometimes used, the patristic representation of the sects functions as a rhetoric of dismissal. The hermeneutics of heresiology determine the form and style of the presentation, its tone, and its rhetorical strategy.

In contrast to this hermeneutics of heresiology, the patristic representation of the Judaizers is controlled by the hermeneutics of reproof. In contrast to the rhetoric of exclusion, this approach is centripetal: it defines the boundary between church and synagogue and seeks to reclaim and maintain its own.

Traditions

Major streams of tradition flow through the larger patristic representation of Jewish Christianity. The most significant of these is a mapping process that involves the naming and locating of heresies. The tools employed in the characterization of the sects—name, beliefs and practices, founder, location, history, consequences, dismissal—all serve to name the heresy and to locate it outside the boundaries of the church.

A second major line of tradition is evident in the foundational myths framed around biographical sketches. In the logic of this worldview, it is clear, for example, that Ebionites were founded by Ebion and that Symmachus was followed by Symmachians.[4]

A third major line of tradition is found in the need to create overarching categories of heresy. Presuming shared ideas, practices, books, histories, and territories, a few major types such as Gnostics and Ebionites are used to locate heretical groups on the religious map of antiquity.

A fourth line of tradition describes the inevitable consequences of such heresies. According to patristic accounts, false doctrine, evil practice, idolatry, and libertinism all follow in the wake of such movements.

The fifth stream of tradition describes a history of rejection. Apostles are said to have rebuked such heretics and to have fled from their presence. Biblical texts are employed to refute them, as are truth, logic, common sense, and orthodoxy. Heretics are, in patristic perspective, guilty by association. As a final resort, dismissal by definition is practiced.

Historical analysis

Literary representations such as the patristic reports sustain various streams of tradition, and some elements of these traditions may point to historical realities.

General plausibility

The patristic representation of Jewish Christianity offers lines of general plausibility. First, the nature of the patristic portrait—its extent, its diversity, its intensity—makes it probable that Jewish Christianity represents a historical entity. It would be extremely difficult to explain such a patristic assault in the absence of any historical threat.

Second, the variegated nature of Jewish Christianity suggests a general plausibility. The beliefs and practices assigned to Jewish Christians demonstrate a large measure of contradiction, confusion, carelessness, and incompetence. The most plausible explanation is that patristic writers magnify and confuse an existing diversity.

Third, the interconnected nature assigned to Jewish Christian sects contains a general level of plausibility. It is almost impossible that sects such as Ebionites and Cerinthians held the wide range of diversities and dependencies assigned to them by Epiphanius. But it is highly plausible that different sects were related in a variety of ways.

Furthermore, Jewish Christian sects could be expected to relate in differing ways to movements such as gnosticism, philosophical schools, paganism, magic, and others. While the patristic portrait is hyperbolic, the interconnected nature of individual sects contains a reasonable level of historical plausibility.

A fourth area of general plausibility may be reflected in the perceived threat represented by Jewish Christianity. Christian orthodoxy finds real resistance in areas such as Egypt and Syria, and it is faced in general by two distinct disadvantages: it lacked the official tolerance extended by Rome to Judaism, and Christian movements had to explain themselves in light of their Jewish roots. The enduring stance of defensiveness, hostility, and even paranoia that marks the Christian response to Judaism was likely practiced as well against Jewish Christian sects.

A fifth area of general plausibility may be found in the vitality and endurance of Jewish Christianity. While much of the patristic representation is developed through repetition, accretion, and expansion, this does not offer a sufficient explanation for the persistent reference to Jewish Christian movements. As in most polemical literature, the insistent response suggests a persistent question.

Particular plausibility

In addition to the general realm of plausibilities, some specific aspects of the patristic representation of Jewish Christianity are plausible. First, there is historical plausibility in the distinct portrait of the Nazarenes or Nazoreans (Broadhead 2010: 163–87). While the distinction between two types of Ebionites was noted earlier, it is Jerome who locates Nazarenes as a specific historical group. Although Epiphanius disagrees with Jerome's general assessment, he confirms the core representation. Nazarenes are described as Jewish followers of Jesus who observe the law. They are said to be found in the area of Syrian Beroea in the last half of the fourth century. They are credited with a noteworthy Hebraic tradition that includes both texts and commentaries. They are ignored or tolerated for most of the patristic period, and their assignment to the list of heresies is quite late.

Second, strands of historical plausibility reside in the characterization of the Ebionites (Broadhead 2010: 188–212). The larger representation of Ebionites—as a collective heresy that incorporates almost every trend known to patristic writers—is untenable. It is plausible, however, that some pieces of this collective portrait have historical grounding. Patristic responses to Ebionite use of scripture, citations from Ebionite gospels, and reference to geographical location may provide historical markers. Multiple attestation from different contexts increases the level of plausibility.

Third, there is a strong probability that Jewish Christians defended their faith and practice by citing a saying of Jesus from Matt. 10.24–25 (Broadhead 2010: 211–12): 'A disciple is not above the teacher, nor the slave above the master. It is enough for the disciple to be like the teacher, and the slave like the master.' Several patristic writers note the use of the saying by the Ebionites.[5] Different patristic writers connect the saying to different Ebionite practices, providing multiple attestation. The criterion of dissimilarity applies, as does the criterion of embarrassment. Patristic writers find it difficult or impossible to refute this claim, yet they persist in the effort. This makes it, by all critical standards, highly unlikely that this is a patristic invention. Some Jewish Christians claimed that their practices of circumcision, observance of Passover, and obedience to the law are a conscious imitation of Jesus, and they supported this claim by citing Matt. 10.24–25. This is the most certifiable piece of historical data in all of the patristic representations of Jewish Christianity.

Fourth, Origen (de princ. 4.3.8) notes that some Jewish Christians invoke the words of Matt. 10.5–6 that Jesus came only for the lost sheep of Israel. Patristic writers cannot answer this Jewish Christian claim, and they certainly did not invent it.

Fifth, there is historical plausibility in the patristic references to Jewish Christian gospels and other texts.

Sixth, the process identified as Judaizing likely contains strands of historical plausibility. Historical plausibility is not to be found in the patristic portrait of Judaizers, but rather in the underlying motivation for the patristic reproof.

Conclusion

While Jewish Christians are known primarily through patristic writings, they are also known despite patristic efforts to dismiss them. Employing the hermeneutics of heresiology and the hermeneutics of reproof, patristic authors have written over the stories of Jewish Christianity. As a consequence, Jewish Christianity, particularly as it is represented in the patristic era, can only be recognized through an intentional, critical process of rediscovery, reconstruction, and redefinition.

Such critical analysis suggests that showing through the fabric of the patristic accounts are significant markers that might serve as keys to the historical location of Jewish Christianity. These markers support a general realm of plausibility: Jewish Christianity existed as a vital, enduring movement and presented a variety of forms, locations, and connections. These markers also support the historical plausibility of specific traits: Nazarenes wrote texts from Syrian Beroea; some groups of Ebionites are historical; Jewish Christians claimed to imitate Jesus and cited his words; they preserved a significant textual tradition; despite the efforts of Christian leaders, some believers continued to live between church and synagogue. Such markers make it difficult to deny the ongoing presence and impact of various forms of Jewish Christianity.

Jewish Christian texts

Several patristic writers refer to Jewish Christian gospels, with some offering citations. Such references and citations, however, are fragmentary and selective, they are often conflated, and they serve almost exclusively in the patristic rejection of heresy. In addition to these, a few manuscripts of canonical texts offer marginal references to Jewish Christian gospels.

Scholars have reached a general consensus that the tradition of Jewish Christian gospels is represented in three specific texts: the Gospel of the Nazoreans, the Gospel of the Ebionites, and the Gospel according to the Hebrews.[6]

The Gospel of the Nazoreans is the most transparent piece of the Jewish Gospel tradition. It can be placed in a specific location (Syrian Beroea), its language is known (Aramaic or Syriac), and its origin can be assigned a broad time frame (from the time of the Gospel of Matthew, 80–90 CE, until its first mention by Hegesippus in the late second century). The length and general content of the Gospel of the Nazoreans approximate that of the Gospel of Matthew. The Jewish focus of the gospel is clear from the concern for 'your brothers, sons of Abraham' (Origen, in Matt. 15.14). Testimony to its impact extends from Eusebius in the late third century up to marginal references in manuscripts of the thirteenth century.

The Gospel of the Ebionites is a Greek text known to Epiphanius and placed by him among Jewish Christian sects in the Transjordan. Its content draws in part upon the synoptic gospels, harmonizing their portraits. Its theology, however, seems to include a mix of ideas described by Epiphanius. The Gospel of the Ebionites emerges somewhere between the Gospel of Matthew (80–90 CE) and its appearance in Epiphanius (315–402/403 CE).

The Gospel according to the Hebrews may be used as early as Papias (early second century), but the first clear attestation is with Clement of Alexandria (around 150 CE). References to this gospel appear in a chain of Latin medieval writers stretching from Jerome to the twelfth century, with particular favor among English and Irish texts (Klijn 1992: 20–25). The Gospel according to the Hebrews is likely of Egyptian origin and was probably described in this manner to distinguish it from other texts. The length of the gospel is given by Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantine from 806–815 CE, as 2,200 lines, while the Gospel of Matthew had 2,500 (Vielhauer and Strecker 1991: 41–42, 172). The content and theology of the Gospel according to the Hebrews set it apart from canonical gospels and from other Jewish Christian gospels.

It is almost certain that some form of Jewish Christianity of the late second or early third century stands behind the Pseudo-Clementine material known as Recognitions 1.27–71 (Jones 1995: 157–67; Van Voorst 1989: 176–80). This can be seen first in its consistent focus on the land of Israel. The Christology of this document also testifies to its Jewish Christian identity: it centers on Jesus as the prophet promised by Moses, as the Jewish messiah, and as the one who completes Moses' attempt to put an end to sacrifices. Moreover, the debate about Jesus is addressed throughout to Jewish dialogue partners, engaging various segments of Judaism. There is a consistent attempt to portray faith in Jesus as the goal and fulfillment of Israel's history and faith. Finally, Paul is not opposed for his mission to the Gentiles, but rather for his intrusion into the conversion of the Jewish leaders and the people of Jerusalem.

In the mid second century, Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue, recognizes two types of Jewish Christians. One type insists that all Christians are obligated to follow Jewish law, while the other type does not. Justin concludes that only the second type of Jewish Christians will be saved (Dial. 47.1). It is clear, then, that Justin knows and even honors some forms of Jewish Christianity. It is also possible that Jewish Christian sources may underlie a significant portion of the work of Justin Martyr (Skarsaune 1987, 2007: 379–416).

The Apocalypse of Peter is very likely the work of Jewish Christians, and it is probably written in response to the Bar Kokhba war (132–135 CE).[7] This position is based on several factors.

1   the dating of the text;
2   its assignment to the genre of Jewish apocalyptic;
3   the reference of the text to the teachings of Jesus;
4   evidence of Bar Kokhba's harsh treatment of Jews who rejected his call to revolt.

A few other Jewish Christian texts are mentioned in patristic literature, and some citations are given (Broadhead 2010: 278–79). According to Epiphanius, Ebionites have a gospel associated with Matthew (Pan. 30.13.2–3), a work associated with Peter (Periodoi Petrou, Pan. 30.15.1–2), a text linked with James (Anabathmoi Iakobou, Pan. 30.16.7–9), 'other Acts of the Apostles' (Pan. 30.16.6), and they claim various apostolic traditions (Pan. 30.23.1–2).

A text known as the Book of Elxai is mentioned by Hippolytus, Origen, Eusebius, and Epiphanius. The book seems to be a Jewish apocalyptic work that originates in Parthia in response to the invasion of Trajan (114–117 CE). It was brought to Rome and used in a Christian debate by Alcibiades (Broadhead 2010: 213–22).

Reference is made on occasion to a Gospel according to the Apostles (Jerome, adv. Pelag. 3.2, implied perhaps in Epiphanius, Pan. 30.13.2–3). If such a text existed, its title suggests that it is Jewish Christian in orientation.

Jerome knows a version of the book of Jeremiah that belongs to the Nazoreans (Broadhead 2010: 163–87). He claims to have seen this text, and he uses it in his commentary on Matt. 27.9–10. Here the Gospel of Matthew attributes to Jeremiah a citation that is actually found in Zechariah. Jerome says this citation is indeed found in the version of Jeremiah used by the Nazoreans.

Jerome knows a Nazorean commentary on the book of Isaiah. The passages cited by Jerome[8] show that Nazoreans are well-versed in Hebrew and in Hebrew texts, they are acquainted with the targumic tradition of biblical commentaries, they know about rabbinic tradition but reject its authority, and they reject the oral tradition in favor of their own interpretation of scripture. They accept the apostleship of Paul and affirm a mission to the Gentiles, and they still hope for a renewed mission to the Jews.

From a critical historical perspective, it is not likely that the extent and the impact of Jewish Christian texts were overstated by the emerging Christian orthodoxy. Indeed, it is more probable that the extent and the impact of these traditions were understated, underrepresented, and undervalued.

Rabbinic evidence

When read critically, a few rabbinic traditions scattered across various stages of the tradition seem to reflect an ongoing conversation with Jewish followers of Jesus (Broadhead 2010: 284–300). First, the characterization of Jesus as a Jewish heretic is present in some passages. This characterization is applied as well to his followers: his disciples were executed on scriptural grounds, and followers like Jacob continue to trouble the rabbis. Second, among the variety of Jews who fall under the category of min are Jewish Christians. Third, in some times and places, Jesus and his followers may be one target of a synagogue curse against heretics. Fourth, rabbinic traditions seem to exhibit some concern about Jewish Christian texts. This engagement between some rabbis and some Jewish Christians seems to endure at least into the fourth century.

Archeology

Can archeological evidence help to locate Jewish Christianity on the religious map of antiquity? The most extensive reconstruction is found in the publications of two Italian scholars working within the Franciscan order—Bellarmino Bagatti and Emmanuela Testa.[9] Bagatti and Testa looked for Jewish Christianity in distinctive ideas and practices: they interpreted mystical, apocalyptic, and gnostic forms as signals of a distinctive Jewish Christianity. Bagatti and Testa believed this group developed a heterodox theology and venerated holy places, especially caves. Bagatti and Testa associated Jewish Christians with the minim slandered by the rabbis and with the Ebionite heretics abused by the Church Fathers.

Bagatti and Testa argued for a continuity of veneration for the major Christian holy places.[10] Based on their reconstruction of Jewish Christianity from literary sources, they expected to find evidence of Jewish Christian veneration beneath numerous Christian sites.

The Baggatti-Testa group claimed to find evidence of Jewish Christian holy sites in ossuaries (burial boxes), stelai (upright stone slabs or pillars), and in various caves and tombs. Many details of the archeological work of Bagatti and Testa have been questioned, and numerous scholars have challenged their larger model of Jewish Christianity and the holy sites. Joan Taylor (1993) gathered this evidence and added to it her own persistent critique of the work and the conclusions of the Bagatti–Testa school.[11] Her rejection of the Bagatti–Testa hypothesis of cultic continuity through heterodox Jewish Christianity is thorough and decisive.

Nonetheless, it is plausible that three sites testify to the early and continued existence of Jewish Christianity.

Capernaum

Two sites at Capernaum are of archeological interest for primitive Christianity and may bear evidence of Jewish Christianity.[12] These are the synagogue and the house of Peter.

In the western half of Capernaum an octagonal structure made of basalt was excavated in the years before and after World War I. This structure consists of three concentric octagons. The sixth-century Piacenza Pilgrim says there was a basilica in Capernaum where the house of Peter was once located.

Figure 6.1   Octagonal church (left) and synagogue (right) at Capernaum. Photo from Broadhead 2010: 335; Taylor 1975: 269, courtesy of the Studium Biblicum Franciscanum

In 1968, V. C. Corbo identified two major strata beneath the octagonal structure.[13] At the fourth-century level there is an enclosure wall. This enclosure is partially divided by an inner wall that runs from the southern wall into the enclosure. At the center of the enclosure is a second structure creating three small rooms and one larger room divided by an arch. There is evidence of rebuilding in some walls and in the roof. Plastered walls have been painted with plant motifs and geometric designs, and Christian graffiti is scratched upon the plaster. Two fish hooks were found in the destruction level of the fourth-century ruins. Literary testimony to this fourth-century structure is probably found in the report, recorded by Peter the Deacon, that Egeria visited Capernaum (c. 383 CE) and wrote that the 'house of the prince of the apostles has been made into a church, with its original walls still standing' (Taylor 1993: 276; Wilkinson 1981: 194).

Below the fourth-century strata are extensive remains from the Hellenistic/Roman period. Corbo excavated four trenches within the central area of the octagonal church (Corbo 1975: 79–98), identifying six stages, some with multiple layers. The initial fill contained pottery from the second and first centuries BCE.

These trenches represent different sequences of development and likely are part of different rooms or areas. It is clear that the small area that served as the central octagon and as the central room of the fourth-century church exhibits a history of extensive use. The debate over the details of that history is intense.

Corbo believes that the sequence of three successive beaten lime floors in the western trenches provides the key to the structure. He believes that these more elaborate and expensive floors at the center of the fourth-century church and the later octagonal church support two conclusions: this was, for an extended period, a holy site for Jewish Christians, and it was in fact the house of Peter.[14]

Joan Taylor reads the evidence in a different way (Taylor 1993: 278–84). Taylor believes that, beginning with the fourth-century house church with its beaten lime floors and continuing with the later octagonal church with its peacock mosaic, Christian pilgrims traveled from various regions to visit what was described to them as the site of Peter's house—which it may have been. Thus, it is plausible that the memory of Peter's house was maintained through subsequent generations, and it is possible that the site of this house is beneath the octagonal church.
Figure 6.2 Strata in the octagonal church at Capernaum. Illustration from Broadhead 2010: 336; Taylor 1993: 271, sketch based on Corbo 1975
Figure 6.3   Excavation trenches within the central area of the octagonal church at Capernaum. Illustration from Broadhead 2010: 338; Taylor 1993: 279, based on Corbo 1976

Figure 6.4   Cross section of the central area excavation of the octagonal church at Capernaum. Broadhead 2010: 338; Taylor 2010: 279, based on Corbo 1975

Some ninety meters from the octagonal church stands the site of the Capernaum synagogue. Most scholars now agree that the partially reconstructed white limestone synagogue should be dated to the fourth century CE.

The controversy lies in the dating of the black basalt structures that underlie the white synagogue. This shows, obviously, that the black basalt walls and pavement are older than the white limestone synagogue that sits upon them. Since there is no evidence of an earlier synagogue beneath the central basalt pavement of the fourth-century synagogue, the basalt layer seems to represent the first public structure on the site. The gospels say that Jesus used a synagogue in Capernaum built by a Roman centurion (Luke 7:5), and logic and literature suggest the basalt pavement and walls are the remains of that synagogue.

Mount Zion

The presence of an apostolic church on Mount Zion has been argued by Bagatti and Testa, but more recently by Bargil Pixner.[15] Pixner builds on three claims: (1) the structure on Mount Zion identified to visitors as the tomb of David is actually a synagogue from the Roman period; (2) this was a Jewish Christian synagogue; (3) this synagogue was later known as the Church of the Apostles. Pixner's argument is largely dependent on literary traditions.

Disagreement arises over the results of a 1951 study of the site by Jacob Pinkerfeld. Behind the Crusader memorial to David, Pinkerfeld identified a niche belonging to an older structure. Beneath the marble floors of the present structure, Pinkerfeld found three earlier levels. The first of these (at 12 cm) was the Crusader floor, and the second (60 cm) belonged to a Byzantine structure. At 70 cm Pinkerfeld found another plaster floor and what appeared to be remains of a stone pavement. Pinkerfeld concluded that this floor belonged to the original building, together with the northern wall and its niche.

Pinkerfeld concluded the niche and the deepest floor belonged to the same original structure, and he claimed that the niche was designed to hold a Torah scroll. On this basis, Pinkerfeld concluded the structure was a Roman era synagogue.

Pixner takes the matter a step further, arguing that this is a Jewish Christian synagogue. He contends that the synagogue is not directed toward the Temple Mount, as Pinkerfeld claimed, but is slightly askew and points toward the traditional site of Golgotha—now the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.[16]

Pixner then attempts to reconstruct the history of this synagogue, mostly from literary observations. He argues that it was built by Jewish Christians returning to Jerusalem after 70 CE upon the spot they considered the site of the Last Supper—the Upper Room later used by James as the center of the Jerusalem church. Pixner finds confirmation in the writings of Eusebius and various patristic works. He also draws upon the tenth-century work of Euthycius, who says the Pella community returned to Jerusalem in the early 70s CE and built their church there. Pixner suggests this event is also remembered in the Odes of Solomon (Ode 4).
Figure 6.5   Earlier remains in the tomb of David, Mount Zion. Broadhead 2010: 317; Taylor 1993: 214, sketch adapted from Bagatti 1981

JUDEO-CHRISTIAN SYNAGOGUE

The Judeo-Christian synagogue, later known as the Church of the Apostles (late first century AD).

OCTAGONAL CHURCH AND CHURCH OF THE APOSTLES

The Judeo-Christian synagogue, now known as the Church of the Apostles, next to an octagonal memorial church built by Theodosius 1 (c. 382 AD). Seen here as portrayed in the Pudentiana mosaic

---

HAGIA SION BASILICA

The Church of the Apostles is now an extension to the Hagia Sion basilica (415–1009 AD). They are seen here in plan, at left, and as portrayed in the Madaba mosaic map.

CRUSADER CHURCH OF ST. MARY

The Church of the Apostles (c. 1110–1219 AD) now incorporated within the Crusader Church.

Figure 6.6 Pixner's reconstruction of the Church of the Apostles in Jerusalem. From Pixner 1990: 25

Pixner also notes the mention of a synagogue on Mount Zion by the Bordeaux Pilgrim of 333 CE. Reference to the church is given by Cyril in 348 CE and by Eucherius in 440 CE. Finally, Pixner claims that the Madaba map (sixth century) indicates that the Byzantine Hagia Sion was built along-side the Church of the Apostles, not over it.

A key problem is the sequence of layers. On this basis, Taylor and other scholars have challenged the proposal that beneath the site of Hagia Zion is a Jewish Christian structure that was the 'mother of all the churches.'[17]

The literary evidence also presents a mixed portrait. There are numerous references to the idea that the Holy Zion basilica occupies the site of an apostolic church identified with the Upper Room. This tradition is traced back to the visit of Hadrian in 133 CE.[18] However, mention of this tradition postdates the construction of the basilica of Holy Zion (likely between 333 and 348 CE). The literature reports one surviving synagogue (333 CE, but gone by 349 CE), one surviving apostolic church (purportedly 133 CE, but reported later by Cyril and by Epiphanius). However, Eusebius never mentions the survival of an early house church in Jerusalem. The merging of the two traditions—a surviving synagogue and the Church of the Apostles—seems to be found nowhere in antiquity; it was first suggested by Bagatti and Pixner.

Despite the fervor generated by this site, critical analysis allows only modest and tentative conclusions. From a literary standpoint:

1   There was a tradition that the basilica of Holy Zion was built over the Upper Room.
2   There was a tradition that one synagogue survived on Mount Zion until the time of Maximus (335–349 CE).
3   There was a tradition that the Church of the Apostles survived at least until the time of Hadrian (133 CE).
4   All reports of these traditions appear after the construction of the Holy Zion basilica (333–348 CE).
5   The association of the Church of the Apostles with the surviving synagogue is likely a modern phenomenon.

Archeological conclusions are equally meager.

1   The present 'tomb of David' and 'Upper Room' on Mount Zion are mostly Crusader constructions.
2   The Crusader construction is built upon earlier walls and foundations.
3   The earlier walls are made of recycled stones of large dimension.
4   Like some nearby Byzantine structures, the earlier layers are oriented toward the supposed tomb of Jesus.
5   One of the earliest walls contains a niche of unusual height and size.
6   The plaster scraped from the walls by Pinkerfeld contains Greek graffiti.
7   There are four floor levels within the earliest walls: the present floor level is a marble slab; 12 cm below that is a plaster floor from Crusader times; at 60 cm is a Byzantine mosaic floor; at 70 cm is the earliest floor containing both plaster and stones.

It is indeed plausible that the first meeting place of the Jerusalem community was remembered by subsequent generations and that some remnant of this site endured into the fourth century. If this was the worship center of the first generation of Jesus' followers, then it is a Jewish Christian site. It is also plausible that Jewish Christians referred to their places of worship as synagogues.[19] It is possible, then, that the basilica of Holy Zion was built on the site of the Church of the Apostles. If that is true, any archeological remains of the Church of the Apostles would likely be limited to the lowest floor level. Nothing in these remains provides meaningful information about the nature and extent of Jewish Christianity.

The Transjordan

The most plausible evidence for Jewish Christianity lies beyond the realm of Palestine and outside the debate over the continuity of Christian holy sites. In the Bashan region west of the Jordan, four separate villages have produced inscriptions that include both Jewish and Christian symbolism. In each case a menorah is found alongside or conjoined with Christian symbols (Broadhead 2010: 346–49; Taylor 1993: 9–41).

One inscription contains four or five variations on the menorah image, combined in one instance with a fish and perhaps a cross, in another with a palm branch. A second inscription contains a cross, a menorah, a cross with a fish, a cross inside a circle, possibly a fishing net, and four Greek letters. A third inscription contains a cross, a menorah joined with a palm branch, and what appears to be an incomplete menorah. A fourth inscription contains three menorahs, each incorporating a bar to form a type of cross.

Similar evidence was found in the same region at Khan Bandak and at Butmiyeh by Schumacher almost 100 years earlier (Schumacher 1888). In 1925, W. F. Albright found the same type of inscriptions at the village of Nawa, ten kilometers north of Farj (Albright, 1925: 5–19).

In this material from the Transjordan, the literary and material evidence appear to cohere. Farj is less than 20 kilometers from the site identified by Michael Avi-Yonah as Kokaba (or Chochaba in Hebrew). Epiphanius, who is writing to priests from Coele Syria, designates the town by both its Greek (Kokaba) and Hebrew name (Chochaba), and he is quite specific about its location. This, says Epiphanius, is the home of the Nazoreans.[20]

Figure 6.7   Inscriptions; Broadhead 2010: 347; Dauphin 1984, 1993. Drawings to scale by Shimon Gibson, used by permission of C. M. Dauphin and Shimon Gibson, captured through a tracing process by Edwin Broadhead
Figure 6.8   Transjordan sites, possible sites of Kochaba. Broadhead 2010: 348; Taylor 1993: 37

A second literary line coheres with the material evidence of Jewish Christianity in the Transjordan. Eusebius says that members of the Jerusalem church in the 60s CE were warned in a dream to flee the coming war with Rome. Eusebius says that they fled to Pella in the Transjordan region of Decapolis (HE 3.5.3). Epiphanius says that these refugees are the source of two Jewish Christian groups: Ebionites and Nazoreans (Pan. 29.7.7–8, 30.2.7; De Mens. et Pond. 15). Epiphanius also tells of the return of some of the Pella refugees and the continuation of the Jerusalem church (De Mens. et Pond 15).

Taken as a whole, the evidence for Jewish Christianity in the area of Bashan in the Transjordan is noteworthy. The excavation and recognition of Jewish Christian inscriptions at four different villages by different archeologists working across the span of a century provides multiple, independent attestation. It is also significant that these findings form no part of the quest to show the continuity of holy sites. The coherence of this material evidence with two lines of literary traditions is noteworthy, and there is a strong degree of historical plausibility to the claim that Epiphanius knows of Jewish Christians in this region.

This material evidence points to the presence of Jewish Christians in the Transjordan as late as the fourth and fifth centuries. These findings neither prove nor exclude the possibility of an earlier presence. Consequently, the Jewish Christian inscriptions of the Transjordan represent the most significant material evidence for the presence of Jewish Christianity.

Summation

The search for archeological evidence for Jewish Christianity has generated more heat than light. Joan Taylor has convincingly demonstrated that the Bagatti-Testa hypothesis is not sustained by the evidence. Indeed, no type of Christianity seems to have left significant material traces of its formative years, and this is particularly true of groups that were eventually marginalized.

The evidence in the Transjordan seems to provide the one clear instance of material evidence for Jewish Christianity, and this coheres with what is known from the literary evidence. If there is any plausible material evidence of Jewish Christianity at its earlier stages, it is meager: a floor beneath the house of Peter, the foundational pavement of a Capernaum synagogue, the lowest strata of the Church of the Apostles. While the Transjordan inscriptions present strong evidence for the later stages of Jewish Christianity, at present there is no extant archeological data that adds intrinsically to our understanding of the formative years of Jewish Christianity.

Conclusion

Scholarly attention was given to Jewish Christianity as a part of the Enlightenment and the Deists' quest for the religion of Jesus. Critical analysis makes it clear that the historical profile of Jesus as a Jewish prophet of the Kingdom stands in continuity with the Jewish character of the earliest communities of his followers and the texts they produced. The patristic representation of Jewish Christianity, when sifted with critical care, testifies to the continued existence of such groups. Various texts assigned to Jewish Christians signify the continued vitality of these movements, as do the scattered responses to Jesus in rabbinic tradition. A few scattered pieces of material culture may also testify to the continuation of Jewish Christianity.

Are there genetic relationships between these various historical markers? If so, to what degree is a synthesis possible? Is it reasonable to speak of Jewish Christianity as a coherent religious and social movement?

Plausible coherence and continuities within Jewish Christianity

The evidence for Jewish Christianity is limited, scattered, obscured, and suppressed. It is difficult to provide a comprehensive description of any single group, and no synthesis of the larger movement is possible. One may speak, however, of apparent connections in terms of influence, theology, and location. Consequently, a plausible description of a few clusters or lines of influence may be offered. The concept of a matrix is used to describe a cluster of traditions in a particular locale; the concept of a trajectory is used to describe the extension of a tradition into other locations.

A Galilean matrix

The expectation for a continued movement in the Galilee is apparent in the synoptic gospels, but evidence for this proves elusive. If there was a continuing Galilean movement, it likely clustered around three poles.

The tradents of the Sayings Tradition appear to operate initially in the villages of the Galilee. The Gospel of Matthew and the Didache suggest some parts of this tradition are being absorbed into the wider flow of Christianity.

The family of Jesus may provide a second center for Galilean Christianity. Julius Africanus says that relatives of Jesus used Nazareth and Kochaba as bases for their missionary activity, which apparently involved a salvation history based on a theological interpretation of the Davidic genealogy. When the grandsons of Jude are arrested under Domitian, they claim to own and work a farm, presumably in the Galilee.

The third focal point of Galilean Christianity may be found in the figure of Peter. He is recognized in Jerusalem as a Galilean (Mark 14:70; Matt. 26:69–75; Luke 22:59), and the shadow of Peter seems to fall across several lines of tradition. Peter alone is named in the command to go to the Galilee to see the risen Jesus (Mark 16:7), and Luke makes him the first male disciple at the tomb of Jesus (24:12). For Luke, Peter the Galilean is the leader of the Jerusalem community. Most significantly for Luke, the first clear mission to the Gentiles begins with the work of Peter (Acts 10:1–48). Peter also plays a key role in John 21. The Jewishness of Galilean Christianity is probably confirmed by a few rabbinical stories where followers of Jesus are treated as minim and where the rabbis show particular concern for heresy in the Galilee.

A Jerusalem matrix

The Jerusalem community was composed of Jewish Christians, and it provided the center for most forms of Christianity up to the first Jewish War (66–74 CE). Luke treats the Jerusalem community as an idealized form of Judaism and understands it as the first stage of the mission to the Gentiles. Even when his focus turns to Paul, the story continues to pass through Jerusalem. Central to this phase is the leadership of James, the brother of Jesus.

A plausible case can be made that the Jerusalem community continued after the war under Jewish Christian leaders, primarily from the family of Jesus, and that it continued to play a central role in the larger world of Christianity. This appears to change with the failure of the second Jewish revolt (132–135 CE), when Jews are forbidden to enter Jerusalem.

TRAJECTORIES FROM JERUSALEM OR PALESTINE

The Jerusalem community exerted its impact as a cluster of Jewish Christianity, but it also spread its influence along several trajectories. Luke records in Acts the expansion of Christianity in the tracks of a variety of Jerusalem missionaries.

Three specific trajectories are suggested by the development of Jewish Christian communities at Antioch, at Alexandria, and at Rome. Luke shows Antioch as a development from the Jerusalem community, and he traces continued correspondence and visits between the two communities (Acts 11:27–30). Paul says that the 'brothers of the Lord' (1 Cor. 9:5) are traveling missionaries, and some missionaries of this type likely create a Palestinian trajectory to Rome. A similar development seems to be at work in Alexandria. The figure of Barnabas is associated with Alexandria, as is the name of the evangelist Mark. The Gospel of Matthew and the Gospel of John are known there by the second century. The first Christian known from Alexandria is Apollos, a Jewish follower of Jesus who combines rhetorical eloquence with exegetical skill. Thus, Alexandria also appears to lie along a trajectory that leads back to Palestine and Jerusalem.

A fifth trajectory connects Jerusalem to the Transjordan. Eusebius says the Jerusalem community fled in the face of the first Jewish revolt to Pella in the Transjordan (HE 3.5.3), a tradition echoed by Epiphanius (De Mens. et pond. 15). Both suggest the community returned to Jerusalem after the revolt (HE 4.5.1; De Mens. et pond. 15). Epiphanus subsequently locates both Nazarenes and Ebionites in the Transjordan (Pan. 29.7.7, 30.2.7). Archeological evidence supports the existence of Jewish Christians in the Transjordan in the fourth century, though the material may be earlier.

An Antiochene matrix

The second major center for Jewish Christianity was Antioch. The evidence for Jewish Christianity in and around Syrian Antioch implies connection and continuity (Broadhead 2010: 384–86). Luke presents Antioch as a vital center of Jewish Christianity in the period between the death of Jesus and the mid 60s CE. The Gospel of Matthew, likely from Antioch in the 80s or 90s, engages Jewish Christian traditions in its debate with local synagogues. The Didache and the prophets of the Sayings Tradition appear to have a home here. Early in the second century, Ignatius is using the Gospel of Matthew at Antioch, and he warns against the dangers of 'Judaizing.' In the mid third century, Syrian followers of Jesus who speak Aramaic are known in Persia as Nazarenes. In the late fourth century, Jerome and Epiphanius know of Jewish Christians from Syria who practice a Hebraic tradition of scriptural interpretation, including a Hebrew version of the Gospel of Matthew. Consequently, Antioch and its surrounding areas provide a primary location for Jewish Christianity on the religious map of antiquity.

Luke presents the Antioch community as the base for a number of itinerant missions. Barnabas and Saul are sent to preach in the synagogues of Seleucia, Cyprus, Pamphilia, Iconium, and other locations (Acts 13:1–5). Judas and Silas are sent from Antioch back to their own communities (Acts 15:32–35). Paul and Silas go from Antioch through Syria and Cilicia, while Barnabas and John Mark go to Cyprus (Acts 15:36–41). Paul's third missionary journey begins from Antioch (Acts 18:22–23). All of these missions are directed first to the synagogues. Luke shows the turn to the Gentiles as a move caused by rejection and exasperation (Acts 13:46–47; 18:6; 28:25–28).

When the Persians conquer Antioch and Aleppo (Syrian Beroea) in the period from 255–260 CE, they deport large numbers to various cities in Persia (Broadhead 2010: 181–4). These deportees maintain among themselves a distinction already present in Syria: Greek-speaking followers of Jesus are called Christians, while followers of Jesus who speak Aramaic are called Nazarenes. Although this may represent only a linguistic description, it does cohere with patristic information.

While the composition of the Gospel of Matthew likely reveals a Jewish Christian cluster at Antioch, its transmission may be understood as a trajectory from Antioch. The Gospel of Matthew is taken up into the larger canon and becomes the favored gospel in most Christian communities.

The Gospel of Matthew may also be traced along another trajectory. Whether Hebrew Matthew is an original production or a translation, it is transmitted along its own trajectory into the center of Jewish Christianity. The concept of a Hebrew Matthew has an extraordinary, much-debated history that continues in the medieval period (Howard 1995; Ochs 2013). This makes it likely, from a historical perspective, that the Gospel of Matthew emerged from Antioch along two distinct trajectories.

A Transjordan matrix

There is a noteworthy sequence of Jewish Christian associations with the Transjordan. These include the flight to Pella tradition from the first century, the patristic description of Nazarenes and Ebionites from the fourth century, and the archeological data from the fourth or fifth century.

The synagogues as a matrix for Jewish Christianity

A different type of cluster may be found in the relation of Jewish Christianity to synagogues in various locales. The Gospel of Matthew seems to sponsor debate among Jewish followers of Jesus with varying relations to local synagogues. Luke portrays the early Christian missionaries, especially Paul, as working primarily in connection with Jewish synagogues. Archeological and sociological studies suggest that Christianity emerged in Rome and Alexandria in the same places, ways, and forms as the Jewish synagogues. In Antioch, Rome, and Alexandria, the imprint of the synagogue on Christian worship and interpretation is evident. It is clear that in a number of important sites Jesus movements grew up within the synagogues and continued for some time to express traits of Jewish identity.

'The parting of the ways' and the history of primitive Christianity

The history of scholarship in relation to Jewish Christianity has been framed, for the most part, under the dominant paradigm of an early and decisive separation of church and synagogue and the triumph of Gentile Christianity. This model has been challenged in a wide range of recent scholarship (Broadhead 2010: 354–74, 389–91).

Historical markers suggest that the Galilee, Jerusalem, Antioch, the Transjordan, and some Jewish synagogues each provided a matrix for Jewish Christianity. In addition, the growth of Jewish Christianity may be traced along trajectories leading from Palestine and from Syrian Antioch. In light of this analysis, the early and decisive parting of the ways described by several generations of scholars is untenable; it appears to be mostly a literary pronouncement, and it is primarily the work of bishops and rabbis.

The process of ebb and flow observed in the first four centuries of the common era is more accurately described as a forming of the ways. Jewish ways of following Jesus were foundational, and only later were such groups described as heretical. It has become increasingly clear that Jewish Christianity did not emerge as a hybrid of rabbinic Judaism and Christian orthodoxy; it participated in the formative stages of both. By the close of the fourth century, Jewish Christianity has been officially excluded from both groups, but some evidence may testify to its continued presence and influence.

These findings require a rethinking of how Christianity developed, both in its social and its theological dimensions. The story of primitive Christianity is usually traced as a series of transitions and triumphs: from Jerusalem to Rome; from James to Paul; from Hebrews to Hellenists; from law to grace; from nationalism to universalism; from Judaism to Christianity. The analysis of various lines of evidence for Jewish Christianity in the first four centuries and the reconstruction based on that analysis suggest a very different understanding of the landscape and of the dynamics at work within the religious environment of antiquity.

Notes

1 For a full discussion on the history of research, see Broadhead (2010), especially pp. 6–27.

2 For extensive bibliography on the question of definition, see especially Carleton Paget, 1999: 733, n. 7.

3 There is a growing awareness that the ethnic connotations of Ioudaioi may take precedence over religious elements implied by the term in the first century CE. Consequently, there is a debate over whether the term is best translated Judean (as by Philip Esler and Douglas Oakman in this volume) or 'Jew.' In this essay I will continue to use the words 'Jew' and 'Jewish' in relation to the people in view.

4 From a historical perspective, Ebion is likely fictional, though Ebionites are real; Symmachians are likely a constructed image, though Symmachus is real.

5 Pseudo-Tertullian (adv. omn. haer. 3); Pseudo-Hieronymus (indic. de haer. 10); Epiphanius (Pan. 28.5.1–2 of Cerinthians; Pan. 30.26.2 and 30.33.4 of Ebionites). The claim to imitate Jesus is sometimes noted without mention of Mt 10.24–25.

6 For reconstruction, discussion, and bibliography, see Broadhead 2010: 254–83.

7 For analysis and bibliography, see Broadhead 2010: 277–8.

8 Isa. 8:11–15, 8:19–22, 9:1, 11:1–3, 29:17–21, 31:6–9.

9 Their work was presented in a series of publications, but is summarized in Bellarmino and Bagatti 1971. A detailed summary is found in the extensive refutation by Joan Taylor 1993. See the discussion in Broadhead, 2010: 301–51.

10 Since Christianity had no official sanction, Jewish Christianity provided a necessary component for their theory of continuity.

11 The initial work for Christians and the Holy Places served as the basis for Taylor's 1989 University of Edinburgh doctoral dissertation.

12 See the discussion and bibliography in Broadhead 2010: 334–42.

13 The description is given by Corbo 1975: 59–74. I am dependent on the description, photographs, charts, and drawings provided by Taylor 1993: 268–88.

14 See Corbo 1975: 97–8. Corbo cites the rabbinic stories of minim at Capernaum. This is discussed in Taylor 1993: 24–31.

15 See Bagatti 1971: 117–18. Pixner's argument may be found in Pixner 1990: 16–35, 60. Pinkerfeld's argument is found in Pixner 1990, Taylor 1993, and Broadhead 2010.

16 Pixner cites the Constantinian orientation of the Martyrion toward the tomb of Jesus. Pixner also cites the conclusion of Bagatti that the church in front of Mary's tomb, considered by Bagatti to be Jewish Christian, is oriented toward the tomb of Jesus.

17 The language of Theodoret, Hist. Eccls. 5.9.17.

18 Epiphanius in De Mens. et Pond. 14.

19 James 2.2; Epiphanius (Pan. 30.18.12).

20 Epiphanius gives this description in the Panarion (29.7.7; see also 30.2.8–9).

Bibliography

Albright, W. F. (1925) 'Bronze Age mounds of northern Palestine and the Hauran: The spring trip of the School in Jerusalem,' Bulletin of the American School of Oriental Research 19: 5–19.

Arnal, W. (2001) Jesus and the Village Scribes: Galilean Conflicts and the Setting of Q. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress Publishers.

Bagatti, B. (1981) 'Ritrovamento archeologico sul Sion,' Liber Annus 31: 249–56.

Baur, F. C. (1831) 'Die Christuspartei in der korinthischen Gemeinde, der Gegensatz des petrinischen und paulinischen Christenthums im der ältesten Kirche, der Apostel Paulus in Rom,' Tübinger Zeitschrift für Theologie 4: 61–206.

Bellarmino Bagatti, B. (1971) The Church from the Circumcision, trans. E. Hoade. Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press.

Broadhead, E. K. (2010) Jewish Ways of Following Jesus: Redrawing the Religious Map of Antiquity. WUNT I/266 Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Carleton Paget, J. (1999) 'Jewish Christianity,' in W. Horbury, W. D. Davies and J. Sturdy (eds) The Cambridge History of Judaism: The Early Roman Period. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, vol. 3: 731–75, 1168–72.

Corbo, V. C. (1975) Cafarnao, i. Gli edifice della città. Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press.

Dauphin, C. M. (1984) 'Farj en Gaulanitide: refuge judéo-chrétien?' Proche-Orient chrétien 34: 233–45.

Dauphin, C. M. (1993) 'De l'église de la circoncision à l'église de la gentilité: Sur une nouvelle voie hors de l'impasse,' Liber Annuus 43: 223–42.

Frey, J. (2010) 'Zur Vielgestaltigkeit judenchristlicher Evangelienüberlieferungen,' in J. Frey and J. Schröter (eds) Jesus in apokryphen Evangelienüberlieferungen. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 93–138.

Frey, J. (2012) 'Fragmente judenchristliche Evangelien,' in C. Markschies and J. Schröter (eds) Antike Christliche Apokryphen I: Evangelien. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 560–660.

Howard, G. (1995) Hebrew Gospel of Matthew. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Jones, F. S. (1995) An Ancient Christian Source on the History of Christianity: Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions 1.27–71. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Klijn, A. F. J. (1992) Jewish-Christian Gospel Tradition. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Kümmel, W. (1972) The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems, trans. S. McLean Gilmore and H. C. Kee. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press.

Lüdemann, G. (1989) Opposition to Paul in Jewish Christianity. Trans. E. Boring. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Michaelis, J. (1788) Einleitung in die göttlichen Schriften des alten und neuen Bundes I-II, 4th edition. Göttingen, Germany.

Ochs, C. (2013) Matthaeus Adversus Christianos: The Use of the Gospel of Matthew in Jewish Polemics Against the Divinity of Jesus. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Pixner, B. (1990) 'Church of the Apostles found on Mount Zion?' Biblical Archaeology Review 16: 16–35, 60.

Schumacher, G. (1888) The Jaulan. London: Richard Bentley.

Skarsaune, O. (1987) The Proof from Prophecy: A Study of Justin Martyr's Proof-Text Tradition: Text-Type, Provenance, Theological Profile. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Skarsaune, O. and Halvik, R. (eds) (2007) Jewish Believers in Jesus: The Early Centuries. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers.

Taylor, J. (1993) Christians and the Holy Places: The Myth of Jewish-Christian Origins. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Toland, J. (1718) Nazarenus: or Jewish, Gentile and Mahometan Christianity. London: J. Brotherton, J. Roberts and A. Dodd.

Van Voorst, R. E. (1989) The Ascents of James, History and Theology of a Jewish Christian Community. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Vielhauer, P. and Strecker, G. (1991) 'Jewish-Christian Gospels,' in W. Schneemelcher (ed.) New Testament Apocrypha. Cambridge, UK: James Clark, 134–78.

Wilkinson, J. (1981) Egeria's Travels, rev. ed. Warminster, UK: Aris and Phillips.

7

FROM THE HELLENISTS TO MARCION

Early gentile Christianity

Todd Klutz

At the beginning of the second century, Ignatius, bishop of the church of Antioch, was travelling through Asia Minor to Rome, where his zeal to die for the sake of Christ was soon to be satisfied. Prior to his arrival in the capitol, however, he composed several letters, seven of which survive (see Chapter 27 of this volume), and one of which – his Epistle to the Magnesians – preserves a fascinating image of the relations that obtained at this time between Christians and Jews.

After stressing that his Christian audience should be united in obedience to their bishop and elders (Magn. 3.1–7.2), Ignatius shifts to a related issue that sheds light on why he considered the authority of the church's leadership to be so important in that context; namely, he was aware of the existence of certain Christians who were so attracted to Jewish customs that they were conducting themselves not according to 'the new leaven' of Jesus Christ, but rather according to the 'bad leaven' of Judaism, which in Ignatius's view had 'grown stale and sour' (Magn. 8.1–10.3). As Ignatius further-more implies that his judgement on this matter was shared by the Magnesians' bishop, his emphatic approval of that bishop's authority at another point in the letter (Magn. 2.1–3.2) appears to have been motivated, at least partly, by a desire to discourage Christian adoption of Jewish practices.

In order to achieve this aim, Ignatius not only enjoins the Magnesians to submit to the bishop, but also explicitly evaluates Christian adoption of Jewish practices in a negative manner: 'It is absurd', he says, 'to talk of Jesus Christ and to practise Judaism'. Immediately thereafter he attempts to defend this stance by means of an abstract theological ideology of the historical relationship between Judaism and Christianity: 'For Christianity did not believe in Judaism', he reasons, 'but Judaism in Christianity, in which every tongue that has believed in God has been gathered together' (trans. mine, Magn. 10.3). While many features of this passage invite comment, a couple of observations on it are particularly relevant to the larger story below. First of all, the passage's vocabulary, and in particular the distinction it presupposes between 'Judaism' and 'Christianity', encodes a larger cultural system of assumptions and values in which Christianity is no longer conceptualised (as it is for example in Acts 18:12–15 and 25:19) as a phenomenon within Judaism, but rather outside and very different from it (Jefford 2006: 167–68). To be sure, Ignatius' assumption on this matter should not be taken as representative of all Christian opinion in his milieu; but neither should it be construed as idiosyncratic, for his authority as bishop of one of the Christian movement's earliest centres of missionary endeavour both reflected and reinforced his power to attract followers and influence their perspectives (Jefford 2006: 168).

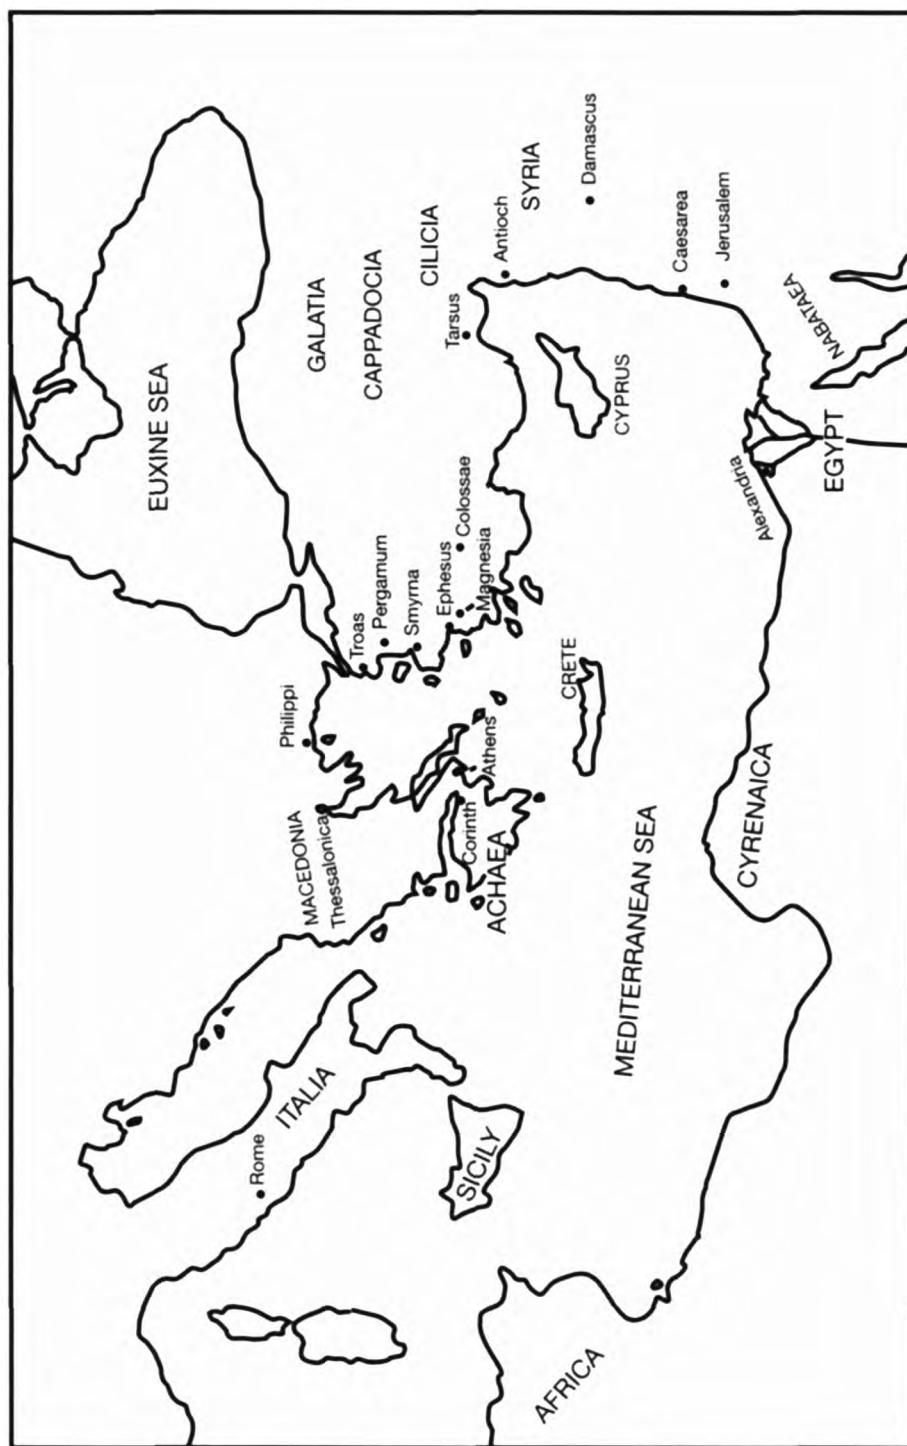
Second, and on the other hand, because the aforementioned return by some Christians to the church's Jewish roots is no minor concern in the Magnesians' letter, but rather is one of that text's most salient themes, the implied author of that document is best understood as someone who realised his own point of view on the issue was not shared by all of his Christian contemporaries, and that at least an important part of his audience in the Magnesian church was familiar with the phenomenon challenged by his letter. Thus, as is amply attested in a variety of other ancient sources, neither in public perception nor in religious practice were 'Christianity' and 'Judaism' unanimously distinguished from one another at the beginning of the second century CE, notwithstanding the rhetorical aims of the bishop of Antioch.


Figure 7.1 Major places and cities associated with the spread of the Christ-movement among gentiles in the first century CE

Still, for a figure such as Ignatius merely to presuppose the kinds of theological distinctions noted above, significant steps must already have been trodden down that dendriform path whereby the imprecisely labelled entity 'Christianity' became increasingly perceived and experienced as distinct from what for centuries has been called, with arguably greater violence to the details, 'Judaism'. Those steps – the most important situations, rhetorical moments, and developments that led to the sorts of ambiguities just inferred from Ignatius – are the main focus of the present narrative; and in the process of explaining those same developments below, I will assume that a proper account of them necessitates discussion of the process whereby faith in a Jew, Jesus of Nazareth, as God's agent of salvation became an increasingly non-Jewish phenomenon. The ensuing story thus begins with Judean Christ-followers in Jerusalem in the days immediately after the death of Jesus and ends with controversies sparked outside Palestine by the second-century gentile Christian theologian, Marcion of Sinope (c. 85–160 CE), strongly renounced as a heretic in the deviance-labelling rhetoric of his Christian critics (see, e.g. Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.27.2–4), but nonetheless highly influential in spreading among the gentiles an anti-Judaic adaptation of the apostle Paul's teachings.

The first mission to gentiles

Saul of Tarsus (c. 4 BCE–c. 62 CE), known chiefly by his Roman name, Paul, to subsequent generations of Christians, formulated opinions that powerfully influenced later Christian writers as diverse as Ignatius of Antioch (Koester 1982: 281–284), the anonymous author of the Nag Hammadi tractate known as the Gospel of Philip, and Augustine of Hippo. Indeed, because Paul's letters have been so influential in the history of Christianity that he might properly be regarded as the strong poet of early Christian theology, he continues to seduce many exegetes and historians into treating him in a fashion reminiscent of the now widely discredited great-man theory of history, according to which the landscape of the past is heavily coloured by the thoughts and deeds of a few extraordinary individuals (Carr 1987: 53–55).

Against any great-man interpretation of Paul, however, and notwithstanding his undeniable influence on the beliefs and practices of subsequent generations of Christians down to the present, the apostle's theology and missionary praxis can be adequately understood only within a framework of assumptions derived from his ancient Mediterranean cultural environment (see Chapter 1 of this work). For the purposes of the present narrative, it is important to realise that Paul almost certainly was not the first Jewish believer in Jesus to proclaim the gospel of Christ to non-Jews. Instead, Paul's practice and theology of mission are best understood as having been moulded in good measure by a group of Greek-speaking Jewish 'Christ-followers' who were the first to include gentiles as equal members in their redemptive communities. On the basis of a story found in Acts 6:1–6, this group is often referred to as the 'Hellenists'; and in order to understand either the development of gentile Christianity or the role of Paul in that process, attention needs to be given to what can be known about these Hellenists, to some of the problems they pose for the historian, and to recent scholarship and methodological developments pertinent to a critical understanding of this group.

Hellenists and Hebrews

In general, most modern interpreters of the key reference to the Hellenists in Acts 6:1 have tended to view it as part of a larger section of narrative (Acts 6:1–8:4) that includes at least partially reliable traditions about a distinct group of Greek-speaking Jewish (and possibly gentile – Esler 1987: 148–61) Christ-followers, some of whom, in response to intense conflicts with the Aramaic-speaking (and supposedly more traditional) apostles in the church of Jerusalem, departed from Judea and initiated a movement that offered salvation to gentiles through faith in Jesus, without requiring them to observe the ritual laws of Judaism (Conzelmann 1973: 58–59). According to this view, these so-called Hellenists undertook a Torah-free mission to the gentiles within a year or so of the crucifixion of Jesus (c. 33 CE), and thus prior to Paul's conversion. But just as importantly, the same perspective understands the Hellenists to have been both the primary target of Paul's pre-conversion activities as a persecutor and, through the efforts of their own distinctive community in Damascus, the main agents of his post-conversion resocialisation into the ethnically mixed subculture of Jesus' worshippers; accordingly, the Hellenists are viewed from that same standpoint as a major influence on the conceptual reconfiguration that attended Paul's conversion and developed into the ideology of universal mission expressed in his letters (cf. Rom. 1:16; 1 Cor. 10:32; Gal. 3:27–29).

In recent years, however, a small but growing contingent of scholars has arisen which judges these conclusions to be inadequately nuanced and the methods used to reach them as misleading. More specifically, due in some instances to doubts about the capacity of biblical criticism to uncover early and reliable traditions in the narratives that mention the Hellenists, but in others to scepticism about the referential value of the Acts narrative as a whole (Penner 2004: 41–44), several recent publications in the field of Christian origins have chosen simply to avoid the term 'Hellenists' altogether. They have either replaced it with phrases such as 'the Christ cult' to refer to a slightly different but comparable phenomenon (e.g. Mack 1995: 75–96), or urged that what really needs to be revised is the suspiciously tidy denotatum of 'liberal' or 'radical' Jewish Christians which scholars have so often attached to the word 'Hellenist' in Acts 6:1 (Hill 1992: 193–96). From the latter perspective, moreover, developed in detail by Craig Hill in his Hebrews and Hellenists: Reappraising Division within the Earliest Church, a worthwhile advance could be made by modifying our inherited image of the Hellenists in Acts 6:1–8:4 as uniformly liberal or radical, and associating the category with a more variegated range of social referents and values.

Some of Hill's most important conclusions rely heavily on an earlier monograph (1978) written by Earl Richard concerning the main narrative in which the Hellenists are treated, namely Acts 6:1–8:4. On the basis of painstaking literary analysis of this section and the material surrounding it, Richard's study demonstrates that the types of linguistic features which permeate the speech attributed in Acts 7:2b–53 to the Hellenist Stephen are the same as those that dominate the surrounding narratives in 6:1–7, 6:8–7:2a and 7:54–8:4 (Richard 1978: 229–42). By thus undermining the widespread assumption that this section of Acts can be confidently divided on stylistic grounds into pre-Lukan units of earlier tradition on the one hand and Luke's own narrative additions and theological rhetoric on the other, Richard's study has drawn attention to the methodological limitations of traditional varieties of biblical criticism to produce sure insights into the identity and character of the Hellenists.

However, by using Richard's conclusions to argue that Acts 6:1–8:4 yields virtually no reliable knowledge about Stephen or the Hellenists as a whole (Hill 1992: 101), Hill appears to have quit the enterprise of historicisation too quickly. First of all, he fails to observe that although a high degree of literary and stylistic cohesion does indeed unite the narrative framework of this section and the speech material embedded in it, the Lukan characterisation of the Hellenists as a group, and of Stephen and Philip as exemplary Hellenists in particular, significantly deviates in ideational substance from some of the most prominent themes of Luke-Acts, about which more will be said below. And second, while Hill is correct to highlight the limitations of biblical source criticism, he surprisingly shows no theoretical interest in any of the historicist varieties of contemporary literary criticism which, had he utilised any of them, could have substantially enriched his own historical inquiry.[1] One critical resource capable of producing refinements at both of those points is the Russian theorist Mikhail Bakhtin's (1981) sociological poetics, amply illustrated in his renowned The Dialogic Imagination.

From the standpoint of the Bakhtinian concept of 'dialogism', which in general would see Acts 6:1–8:4 as an instantiation of struggles between sociocultural energies that promote heterogeneity and those that foster unity (Bakhtin 1981: xviii), the coherence and literary cohesion that obstruct source-critical efforts to identify pre-Lukan traditions in this section are best interpreted as an instantiation of the Graeco-Roman political assumption that any human institution perceived to be disunited will suffer dishonour and loss of status (Welborn 1997: 1–8).[2] From that same perspective, moreover, the aesthetic phenomenon of literary unity in Acts 6:1–8:4, as in Luke-Acts as a whole, is indicative of an attempt to represent the earliest Christians as socially unified, even though the ideological nature of that attempt is partially exposed by the acknowledgement of discord in Acts 6:1.

At the same time, though, and from the same Bakhtinian point of view, whatever theoretical shortcomings may have weakened the attempts by modern historians to uncover pre-Lukan traditions about the Hellenists, scholars such as Martin Hengel and Étienne Trocmé have not been obtuse in thinking that alongside Luke's centripetal fiction of Christian harmony and unity are hints of an antithetical force – a sense of centrifugality and conflict – in the Lukan depiction of the Hellenists (Trocmé 1997: 21–22). Only what these interpreters were sensing was not, as they themselves believed, evidence of a pre-Lukan literary source; rather, it was evidence that a thoroughly Hellenised group of Greek-speaking Jewish members of the Christ cult had made such a memorable impression on other participants in the original context of reference that complete homogenisation of the Hellenists' distinctives was considered by Luke to be blatantly unreliable and thus rhetorically inexpedient. Thus, although Acts 6:1–8:4 tells us only a tiny fraction of what we might want to know about the early years of the Jerusalem church, it almost certainly gives us better information about a single formative and widely remembered instance of heteroglossia and social conflict in that setting than it does about the history of primitive Christian theological development.

Diversity and conflict in the Jerusalem church

On the foundation of this dialogic reading of the Acts narratives, we might wish to press our inquiry farther by asking what else can be responsibly conjectured about the Hellenists, or at least about how they may have been perceived and evaluated in their own social environment by persons other than the author of Acts. To begin, in view of Luke's conspicuous need to portray the earliest believers (and especially their leaders) as members of a unified and harmonious movement within Judaism (cf. Acts 11:1–18, 15:1–35), any images in his narratives that even feebly suggest otherwise can be evaluated as signs of a diversity which, though Luke was able to downplay or partially tame it, was too powerful, diffuse and familiar to be omitted entirely from his account. For instance, just as Luke puts into the background of his story the conflict which rhetorical credibility requires him to acknowledge in Acts 15:1–35 (cf. Gal. 2:1–10), so in his terse acknowledgement of the Hellenists' complaint against the Hebrews (Acts 6:1–6) he is undoubtedly downplaying still another momentous conflict which, though a detached account of its agonistic fireworks would have contravened his larger rhetorical goals, the effective mechanisms of gossip networks compelled him to admit. More specifically, since Luke's heavy emphasis on intra-Christian solidarity is scarcely served by his inclusion of such a complaint, the most fruitful questions we can bring to this text do not involve whether some kind of dispute like this actually occurred (undoubtedly it did) but rather why the occasion of the actual complaint – the Hellenists' widows had been neglected by the Hebrews in the distribution of poverty relief – had arisen in the first place.[3]

As for why the widows among the Hellenists had been neglected, the narrator of Acts 6:1–6 tells us almost nothing. While his brevity could of course have been due to a lack of information, it just as easily could have been due to an entirely understandable desire to minimise as many of this conflict's shameful features as possible. A cluster of clues supporting the latter option is found in the terminology used to denote the disputants, that is 'the Hellenists' and 'the Hebrews'. As implied above but widely overlooked, the occurrence of the Greek article ('the') with the noun 'Hellenists' conveys what grammarians call a 'well-known' nuance, implying that the construction as a whole denotes an entity with which the implied reader/hearer is assumed to be familiar; this interpretation is reinforced by the absence of any explanatory aside which, had it been present, would have suggested among other things that the audience was unfamiliar with this group. The Greek noun translated into English as 'Hellenists', moreover, is widely agreed to indicate the linguistic habits (i.e. Greek) of those so denoted (Penner 2004: 68–71), though debate continues concerning whether the implied language habits also entail distinct modes of thought and culture (Barrett 1994: 308). This latter question, however, is of no small importance, since the way it is resolved bears vitally on the present question.

Once this point in the inquiry is reached, what historical scholarship normally does is either highlight the undeniable prominence of language in cultural systems in general, the conclusion therefore being that the Hebrews and Hellenists differed significantly both in linguistic practice and in cultural and theological tendency (Esler 1987: 135–63), or stress the cultural heterogeneity that can be found within every distinct language grouping, the point being that the wide diversity within each distinct system − whether linguistically or culturally defined − stoutly defies valid generalisation (Hill 1996: 131, 152–53). On different levels of abstraction, both schools offer valid perspectives; but unfortunately, they both miss the point. For both of them ignore what surely needs to be recognised as a fundamentally important distinction in discussions of the present topic, namely, the difference between an etic, observer-orientated historiography and an emic, participant-orientated ethnography. The former mode of analysis can scarcely contribute more than it already has to this discussion, whereas experimentation with the latter may have something to offer the present inquiry.

In brief, as soon as we ask the emic question of how two linguistically distinct groups, one of which preferred to speak Aramaic and the other probably being limited to Greek, would have viewed one another in the tense atmosphere of Jerusalem around 33–34 CE, some useful answers offer themselves to us for consideration. Most significantly, in view of the tendency of people in the ancient Mediterranean world to stereotype each other on the basis of group affiliation (Esler 1998: 55–57; Malina 2001: 60–67), it seems very likely that a group of Aramaic speakers in this context would have been powerfully predisposed to formulate negative generalisations about another group that spoke only Greek, despite the high volume of cultural tradition the two may have shared, regardless of the now widely acknowledged Hellenisation of all Palestina, and notwithstanding the unconscious internalisation of Hellenistic ideas and values by the 'Hebrews' themselves.[4] In other words, the conflict whose long-remembered effects compelled Luke to acknowledge in Acts 6:1 what he surely would have omitted if he could, illustrates a widely attested social-scientific maxim: what may seem to an outgroup observer to be a minor difference between people who are deeply alike, can often be perceived by the in-group participants as a tremendously important disagreement, which can lead the disputants into heated arguments, hard feelings and division into factions that define themselves at least partly in terms of their mutual antagonism (Pruitt and Rubin 1986: 7–8).

The dispute regarding the widows, then, was probably only a minor symptom of a far deeper ailment that had been worsening for some time. For instance, if, as seems virtually certain, the Hellenists consisted chiefly of Jews from the diaspora who had accepted the apostles' preaching at or around the Feast of Pentecost (Martin 1992: 135–36), they can easily be imagined to have fallen quickly into conflict with the apostles over any of a number of issues: having probably belonged to that stratum of Jews who had assimilated to the dominant gentile culture of the relatively populous cities of the Greek east in order to enhance their status and economic prospects, the Hellenists may well have found it difficult to grant the honour and authority claims made by the relatively agrarian, traditional, 'Hebrew' apostles who had introduced them to Jesus. Another possible underlying cause for the dispute mentioned in Acts 6:1, suggested by Esler (1987: 159–61), is the inclusion of gentiles at a very early stage into Hellenist circles and the tensions this could have caused with the 'Hebrews' precisely in regard to meals and table fellowship as represented in the text. In view of these differences in culture and socioeconomic background, the dispute over the widows must have been only one of a number of intra-group squabbles experienced by this heterogeneous community.

Consequently, whatever credit Luke might deserve for his preservation of this snippet of primitive Christian heteroglossia, his account of the resolution of this conflict should be interpreted as exemplifying the same ideological tendency displayed so clearly in his subsequent narratives about Paul (Acts 21:17–26). To be more precise, his depiction of the outcome of the tension as an amicable arrangement, with seven of the Hellenists being selected to minister under the apostles to the previously neglected widows (Acts 6:2–6), is best understood as a rhetorically positive redescription of an ending that in reality had damaged the new movement's already vulnerable reputation. And, in the ensuing narratives, his emphatic portrayal of the more violent hostilities towards the Hellenists as originating not from within the Jerusalem church, but rather from a coalition of unbelieving Jewish outsiders (Acts 6:11–14), is probably intended at least partly to divert attention away from the same internal discord and its damaging resolution.

Stephen in a context of challenge and riposte

The content of the accusations levelled by the Jewish outsiders against the Hellenist Stephen (Acts 6:11–14) offers further insight into that same conflict and its implications. In brief, the accusations, which the narrator of Acts not surprisingly attributes to 'false witnesses' (6:13), are that Stephen had been speaking profusely against both the Jerusalem temple and the law of Moses. While Luke cannot be expected to have preserved the original charge precisely as it had been given, he is most unlikely to have invented this sort of accusation, not only because the manufacture of fictitious criticism would have been rhetorically counterproductive but also because the accusations have no counterpart, or macro-structural parallel, in the Lukan stories about Peter and the other apostles. In fact, since the only parallels to this charge within Acts are criticisms levelled against Paul (Acts 21:27–28, 18:13, 25:8), and since Luke's conspicuous effort throughout much of Acts to counteract antagonism to Paul is not helped in the least by a parallel of this kind with Stephen (unlike one with Peter or Jesus), the accusations summarised in 6:13 are almost certainly indicative of real charges brought against Stephen and his Hellenist associates. But most importantly, although the speech presented in Acts 7 as Stephen's response to these criticisms shows every sign of being Luke's own composition, it also displays the same sort of ideological polyphony discussed above in connection with the dispute over poverty relief: most notably, while Luke scarcely conceals his desire to portray Stephen as innocent of the charges brought against him (Acts 6:13),[5] he almost simultaneously cites Stephen as uttering ideas that actually confirm the outsiders' criticisms (7:44–50).

Stephen's criticism of the temple would undoubtedly have been understood by his opponents as entailing antagonism to a larger set of attitudes held by the pious regarding purity, which of course played a vital role in maintaining Jewish identity vis-à-vis gentile culture (Harrington 1993: 36–37). Thus, when Luke subsequently portrays the Hellenists as preaching not only to Jews but also to gentiles (Acts 11:19–21), he stands clearly within the boundaries of cultural and historical plausibility. To say this, of course, is not to say that this section of Acts is entirely accurate on details or matters of sequencing: both the substantial amount of attention devoted to Peter's evangelisation of the gentile Cornelius (Acts 10:1–11:18), for instance, and the positioning of that story just ahead of Luke's first and only reference to a large scale outreach to gentiles by the Hellenists (Acts 11:19–26), have less to do with the order and proportion of historical events than with Luke's need to associate the controversial inclusion of the gentiles with the accepted authority of Peter, rather than with the questionable status of the Hellenists. For even if the story about Peter and Cornelius contains reliable tradition about the founding of a church in Caesarea that included gentiles, the prominent role played by the Hellenists in the geographical and ethnic extension of the new message could only have exacerbated the reputational problems which already confronted the church in the eyes of many of its Jewish neighbours.

Figure 7.2 Silver tetradrachm of the emperor Nero (54–68 CE); minted c. 61/62 in Syrian Antioch, where only a few decades earlier Christ-followers were first called 'Christians' (Acts 11:26). Photo credit Yale University Art Collection, and reproduced by their permission

Therefore, Luke's emphatic attempt to associate the first mission of the Christ cult to gentiles not only with the Hebrew part of the movement but also with the recognised authority of Peter and the full approval of Heaven (Acts 10:1–11:18), was a response to earlier stories that acknowledged the leading role played by the Hellenists in that first outreach. The assumed outreach by the Hellenists, moreover, can be usefully redescribed – in terms borrowed from the social psychology of interpersonal conflict – as a phase of 'escalation' in the same multi-phase game of challenge and response. At an earlier stage, this game had expressed itself in less weighty disputes such as the distribution issue. Since the conflict over aid had undoubtedly not been resolved as ideally as Acts 6:2–6 suggests, the residual inequities would have been interpreted by the Hellenists as an affront to their honour. They therefore would have been likely to increase the number and importance of the issues in the dispute (e.g. from the distribution of aid, to the sanctity of the temple and rules for admission into the group); and from there the deterioration of the relationship between the two parties could easily have led to violence (Acts 7:58–8:3), involvement of people originally outside the conflict (Acts 6:9–15, 8:4–40, 11:20–22) and separation (Acts 8:1b).[6]

One singularly important consequence of this conflict is that, if not prior to the separation phase (although that is possible), then certainly afterwards, it facilitated a missionary campaign by the Hellenists that resulted in the conversion of a number of uncircumcised gentiles, and thus in the establishment of several communities outside Judea that included both Jews and uncircumcised gentiles among its members. By relaxing the demands of Jewish ritual observance and fully incorporating gentiles without requiring them to become Jews, these communities would have been an offence to the ethnic sensibilities of any pious, Torah-observant Jew. One Jew, in fact, was so offended by the existence of these groups that he zealously devoted himself to stirring up as much trouble for them as he could.

Paul: persecutor, convert and missionary[7]

According to the author of Acts, Saul the Pharisee was present in Jerusalem to play a supporting role in the stoning of the Hellenist Stephen (Acts 7:58, 8:1). While some interpreters have judged

Luke unreliable on this point since Paul himself seems to imply that even after his conversion he was unknown to the churches of Judea (Gal. 1:22; so Knox 1989: 21–23; cf. Hill 1992: 29, n. 41), this judgement is based on a misunderstanding of the force of the periphrastic imperfect in Gal. 1:22 (Esler 1998: 250, n.9) and ignores the tacit correspondence between the account in Acts and Gal. 1:23, where Paul implies that these same churches of Judea did in fact know him as a result of his pre-conversion opposition to them. It therefore seems likely that the zeal which led Paul the Pharisee about 135 miles northwest to Damascus, which was now home to a church that would help transform the persecutor into a proponent, had already been expressed earlier in Jerusalem through actions that had contributed to the dispersion of the Hellenists from Jerusalem and thus, ironically, to the establishment of those ethnically mixed churches Paul was now hoping to undermine.

Figure 7.3   The Stoning of Saint Stephen, etched by Giovanni Domenico Tiepolo (1726–1804). Digital image courtesy of the Getty's Open Content Program

Like the antagonism of other Jewish opponents depicted in Acts 6:8–8:3, the persecuting zeal of Paul in particular (cf. Gal. 1:13; Phil 3:6) was apparently directed not against Jesus' whole community of followers – both 'Hebrews' and 'Hellenists' – but rather solely, or at least primarily, against the Hellenist faction (cf. 7:58–8:1). Paul's bias in this matter, moreover, is no insignificant detail, for a consideration of its implications leads directly to two important conjectures regarding the Hellenists and the nature of their influence on Paul. First of all, by entailing that Paul himself had distinguished between the Hebrews and the Hellenists, this same observation strongly reinforces the position defended above regarding divisions in the Jerusalem church, namely, however extensive the similarities between the Hebrews and the Hellenists may have been in reality, their differences were perceived to be important, not only by the two groups themselves, but by contemporary outsiders as well. And second, since Paul's subsequent career as a Christian missionary and thinker was profoundly shaped by tensions between him and the church of Jerusalem (cf. Rom. 15:30–32; Gal. 2:1–14), the same church, in other words, which the Hellenists had been forced earlier to leave, the resultant similarity between these tensions on the one hand and the Hellenists' earlier conflict with the Hebrews on the other invites us to explore whether the two situations may have been causally interconnected; whether, to be more precise, the reservations of the Jerusalem church about Paul may have stemmed from conspicuous affinities between the missionary-theological practice of Paul and that which the apostles had encountered previously in the Hellenists.[8]

A couple of factors suggest that a causal nexus of this sort is historically feasible to imagine, however vague our reconstruction of it is destined to be. For one thing, in order to be able, as Paul evidently was, not only to distinguish between the Hebrews and Hellenists in the Jerusalem church but also to develop a singularly intense antagonism towards the latter, he must have acquired a considerable body of information about them and their apparently idiosyncratic views. And second, the church in Damascus, which almost certainly was established by the Hellenists (cf. Acts 9:21), managed to escape becoming another victim of Paul's zealous intervention (cf. Acts 9:1–2); instead, and against Paul's original designs, it became the first church in which Paul actually participated as a worshipper of Jesus, the community that resocialised him in the values of the new movement (Acts 9:8–22; Gal. 1:17). At least some ideas and practices of a distinctly Hellenist flavour, therefore, must have been mediated to Paul through the church in Damascus.

However, in the interest of understanding both Paul's subsequent labours as a missionary for Christ and the relationship between this work and his writings, we must not pass over too quickly either his life as a Pharisee (Phil. 3:5) or his conversion. Regarding the former, if we are right in thinking that one of the qualities Paul found especially offensive in the Hellenists was that their inclusion of gentiles as equal members of the redemptive community was facilitated by an abandonment of the usual Jewish requirement of circumcision, then any information his letters might provide concerning this same matter – that is, his pre-conversion ideas about the relationship between Jewish mission to gentiles and the custom of circumcision – could help us towards an understanding of how the various phases and key moments of his life fit together into a meaningful whole. Fortunately, we happen to possess a uniquely valuable piece of such information in the fifth chapter of Paul's letter to the Galatians, where he insinuates that at some earlier point in his life he had actually upheld circumcision as a requirement for gentiles wishing to become full members of the covenant community (Gal. 5:11a).

Paul as preacher of circumcision?

Gal. 5:11a contains the following rhetorical question: 'If I am still preaching circumcision, brothers, why am I still being harassed?'[9] In this context Paul is best understood as responding to a claim made to his Galatian audience by his Judaising Christian opponents. The opponents' claim appears to have been that while Paul himself might not perform circumcision on his gentile initiates, he really does understand and advocate circumcision as an implicit and essential part of his gospel (Donaldson 1997: 282). Paul's question in Gal. 5:11a, therefore, read properly as a rebuttal of this assertion, should be taken to imply that although he did at one time advocate circumcision as a necessity for gentiles who wished to become full members of the people of God, he no longer espoused this view (so also Esler 1998: 74). Furthermore, in light of the pivotal significance that Paul attributes earlier in the same letter to his revelatory experience of conversion (Gal. 1:11–17), the change implied in Gal. 5:11a with regard to Paul's conviction about circumcision is best understood as having coincided with his conversion and call to preach Christ to the nations. And finally, the more immediate communicative effect of this construction should not be overlooked, namely, as far as Paul was concerned, the harassment he was suffering at that time because of his circumcision-free version of the gospel constituted strong evidence that he no longer endorsed his opponents' position.

The rhetorical force of this passage in its Galatian context, however, is relevant to our present purposes only insofar as it enables us to recover Paul's pre-conversion attitudes regarding the interrelated issues of circumcision and gentiles. In brief, by enabling us to infer that he was strongly interested in the connection between these issues before his conversion to Christ, this remarkable piece of discourse implies the existence of a powerful tension in Paul that probably contributed to his eventual conversion. More specifically, since on the one hand the advocacy of circumcision mentioned in Gal. 5:11a entails involvement in a number of culturally related activities, ranging from attracting potential converts among the gentiles and instructing them in Jewish tradition, to arranging the surgical operations that would complete their conversion, Paul's interest in the status of gentiles vis-à-vis the God of Israel and their proper initiation into the covenant community was clearly alive prior to his conversion/call. Similar interest, moreover, is not only well documented from the Judaism of Paul's time (Borgen 1996: 45–59, 68–69), but also is consistent with the universalistic belief shared by Paul and his kin that the God of Israel was the one true God of all creation and thus of all humanity (Boyarin 1994: 39).

On the other hand, as that same letter to the Galatians also implies a stark contrast between Paul's new proclamation of gentile inclusion without circumcision and his former advocacy of circumcision as an entrance requirement, it suggests that sitting very uneasily next to Paul's pre-conversion ideal of a single humanity united under the one true God of creation was a competing particularism that was zealous to preserve Jewish difference, to protect the cultural and racial distinctiveness of Judaism, and to perpetuate all the ancestral traditions and practices that served these ends (e.g. circumcision, dietary restrictions and sabbath observance). While on the whole the distinctiveness of these customs probably served to attract gentile interest in Judaism as much as it did to repel it, the practice of circumcision in particular – the custom most relevant to the process of gentile conversion – was a quite different matter: it was ridiculed by many Greeks and Romans as a barbaric form of bodily mutilation (Murphy-O'Connor 1996: 229), and was also forbiddingly painful for any adult males who underwent the operation. Furthermore, although the non-exclusive character of Graeco-Roman paganism entailed that in most contexts a considerable range of Jewish customs could be adopted by a gentile without loss of honour among his or her neighbours, gentile submission to the rite of circumcision in particular tended very much to be perceived, especially by members of the upper strata, as a shameful attachment to foreign rites (cf. Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 20.38–40).

Circumcision therefore must have prevented more than a few God-fearers (that is, gentiles who sympathised with Judaism to one degree or another but had not yet permitted themselves to be circumcised) from becoming full converts; furthermore, in view of the social problems and related difficulties it could bring to the gentile who submitted to it, circumcision was probably far less popular among the upper strata of society than among those with considerably less to lose. In view of these kinds of considerations, Paul's apparent pre-conversion advocacy of circumcision as a condition for gentile conversion (Gal. 5:11a) can be realistically contextualised within an inner-Jewish conversation precisely about whether circumcision was always necessary in this connection. Not only would such a discussion give Paul's earlier views some much needed relevance – why after all had he been preaching circumcision if its necessity for the assumed purpose (gentile conversion) had not been under challenge – it also corresponds to a web of assumptions embedded in the first-century Jewish historian Josephus's story about the God-fearing (and eventually proselyte) King Izates of Adiabene, who is torn in different directions by two Jewish teachers with contrasting views concerning the merit of circumcision in his particular case (Jewish Antiquities 20.38–46).

Prior to his dramatic experience en route to Damascus, Paul must have internalised tensions and contests similar to those represented in Josephus' narrative about King Izates. Consequently, when the pre-conversion Paul first encountered Christ-followers such as the aforementioned 'Hellenists' and became aware of their proclamation that circumcision was unnecessary for gentiles seeking admission into the people of God, he could easily have seen them as similar in various ways to a range of other Jewish groups he had encountered.

At least one feature of the Hellenists that Paul probably considered distinctive, however, was the degree of success they were achieving at incorporating gentiles into their fellowship, an achievement stemming in part from their substitution of an executed but subsequently resurrected messiah for circumcision as a boundary marker for entering the community. Even worse, almost all the gentiles persuaded by the Hellenists' gospel had been associated, and in many cases probably were still associated, with Jewish synagogues (cf. Acts 9:1–2). To someone like the pre-conversion Paul, then, the views, practices and mission of the Hellenists would have been a scandal on several fronts: first of all, the Hellenists' replacement of circumcision with faith in a cursed criminal executed by the Romans, as the fundamental requirement for entrance into the community, blatantly contradicted the stance to which Paul had already committed himself in the inner-Jewish debates assumed in Gal. 5:11a; second, by encouraging their gentile associates to view themselves not as alien to Israel, but rather as equal participants with Jews in the covenant community, the Hellenists would have been seen by Paul as a serious threat to the boundaries, identity and very existence of Judaism (cf. Dunn 1993: 70); and third, as Paul himself was keenly interested in seeing the honour of Israel's God recognised and increased by the gentiles, the success of the Hellenist mission to non-Jews must have provoked in Paul intense pangs of envy, however peculiar and misguided the theology of that mission must have seemed to him when he first encountered it.

Paul's jealousy of the Hellenists' missionary success also probably helped to lay the psychological foundations for his own conversion. Apart from the suspiciously energetic zeal with which he attacked this group just before his conversion, the evidence for this is limited to a single fascinating comment addressed explicitly to the gentiles in the audience of his Romans letter, written around twenty-two years after his experience on the road to Damascus. More specifically, when he states in this context that he seeks to make the success of his own gentile mission known among his Israelite kinfolk – 'in order', he says, 'to make my own people jealous, and thus save some of them' (Rom. 11:13–14) – the connections that he assumes between successful ministry to gentiles, the potential jealousy of non-Christian Jews who hear of his missionary accomplishments among the nations, and the possibility that this jealousy might lead some of these Jews to the salvation now proclaimed by Paul, create a missiological formula that encapsulates what Paul could easily have deduced, in retrospect, from the circumstances of his own conversion. If, as a strict Pharisee with an interest in fulfilling Israel's witness to the nations, Paul had been provoked to jealousy by the success of the Hellenists' outreach to the gentiles, and thereby lured to Christ, then perhaps other observant Jews might be stimulated to jealousy by the success of his mission, and so unite themselves with the Christ of his gospel. Furthermore, as is commonly overlooked but discussed further below, that same set of interconnected motifs in Rom. 11:13–14 is strengthened by Luke's frequently criticised portrayal of Paul as one who, though his call may have been to proclaim Christ among the gentiles, persistently preached his gospel to the Jew first (Acts 13:5, 14; 14:1; 17:1–3, 10, 17; 18:1–11), even though this sometimes resulted in painful punishments from unsympathetic authorities in the synagogues (2 Cor. 11:24).[10]

Spirit affliction and ecstasy in Paul's conversion/call

Paul's jealousy of the Hellenists was only one of several forces that had to coincide in order to effect his conversion. Another factor that, due to its significance for the subsequent development of Paul's theology, merits special attention here is the onset of an illness that befell him as he was en route to Damascus. The most explicit evidence for this illness is found, once again, in the Lukan account, though it possibly has some attestation in Paul's own letters. More specifically, in the first of Luke's three accounts of Paul's conversion (Acts 9:1–19a), the circumstances of Paul's vision of the resurrected Jesus are described as including both an affliction – he is unable to see for three days (9:9) – and a subsequent healing (9:17–19), accomplished in Damascus through the hands of the disciple Ananias. Both the onset of illness and the therapy, moreover, are loosely linked by the narrator of Acts to mundane processes of eating and drinking: the initial vision is followed immediately not only by blindness but also by abstinence from food for three days, during which additional visions are experienced (9:12), while the process of healing includes 'taking some food' (9:19), which is said to restore the patient's strength.

While the period of abstinence here is not presented by the narrator of Acts as having preceded Paul's initial vision and loss of sight, but rather as having followed immediately afterwards, the prominence of fasting and eating in that context raises the question whether a period of abstinence from food may have conditioned Paul's religious experience on the road to Damascus. That way of modelling Paul's experience finds support from several relevant considerations. Fasting, for instance, is well attested in antique religious sources as one of the most widely used methods of inducing altered states of consciousness and ecstatic experiences of the spirit world (Luck 1985: 8, 11).[11] Second, and relatedly, a wealth of psychiatric and related research on the effects of being deprived of physiologically basic provisions such as food and sleep indicates why this kind of self-deprivation is able to induce these states: namely, by destabilising the physiological processes that enable human beings to interpret reality in the mundane but pragmatically reliable ways of everyday experience, it can often trigger alternative perceptions of reality that many health care specialists would label as hallucinatory or even psychotic (Walsh 1997: 110–14). And finally, later in Luke's narrative, after Paul has become an effective witness to Christ among both Jews and gentiles, a group of more than forty zealous non-Christian Jews are described not only as harbouring the same kind of hostility to Paul that Paul himself had displayed earlier to the Hellenists, but also as having 'bound themselves by an oath neither to eat nor drink [italics mine] until they had killed Paul' (Acts 23:12; cf. vv. 14, 21); perhaps Paul too, then, in his earlier zeal to destroy the Hellenists, had employed such techniques.

Figure 7.4 The Conversion of St Paul, a limewood relief by Christoph Daniel Schenck (1633–1691), with Christ's utterance to Paul in Acts 9:4, 'Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me?', inscribed in Latin on the arrow emanating from Christ's mouth. Digital image courtesy of the Getty's Open Content Program

As this kind of strategic fasting for particular socioreligious objectives was well-known in the Judaism of Paul's day and firmly established among Christians in the immediately ensuing centuries (Brown 1988: 218–24), the thesis that Paul had included this strategy among others in his attack against the Hellenists is not historically implausible. For in addition to explaining both his illness and his attendant encounter with the heavenly Christ, this sort of scenario corresponds to a pattern of interconnected experiences – some physiological, others mystical – which Paul claims in his own letters to have had. Most notably, in 2 Cor. 11:27, Paul explicitly includes sleeplessness and deprivation of food and drink among the routine experiences that distinguish his apostleship from that of his opponents; and in the immediately ensuing chapter of the same document (in its canonical form) he establishes an overt link between his own ongoing struggles with some form of spirit affliction – 'a thorn . . . in the flesh, a messenger of Satan' (2 Cor. 12:7) he calls it – and mystical experiences which, though they cannot be unproblematically identified with the revelatory experience of his conversion, certainly seem to have had much in common with it (Segal 1990: 35–38).[12] Writing to the churches of Galatia, he speaks of some physical weakness, possibly connected with his eyes, which contributed to the circumstances leading to his initial proclamation of the gospel in that context (Gal. 4:12–15).

Notwithstanding the conjectural character of any aetiology that might be assigned to Paul's affliction, one point seems virtually certain: like his subsequent 'visions and revelations' (2 Cor. 12:1), the experience that Paul himself viewed, at least in retrospect, as an essential part of his own call to proclaim Christ, occurred in connection with an illness. Just as importantly, though, the timing of this illness coincided with his trip to Damascus – a journey undertaken with the deliberate aim of persecuting a movement that was worshipping the spirit of a man recently crucified. One question therefore which ought to be asked (but seldom is in discussions of Paul's conversion) is how someone like Paul would have been inclined to understand an instance of affliction that happened to intersect strenuous participation in a socioreligious conflict.

As a Pharisee and, thus, as someone who believed in angels and spirits and demons,[13] Paul would have been strongly predisposed to interpret this illness as the work either of God or of some lower, possibly demonic, spirit being; furthermore, due to the aforementioned synchronism of the affliction and the conflict with the Hellenists – a phase during which, by Paul's own later admission, he 'was violently persecuting the church of God and trying to destroy it' (Gal. 1:13) – it is highly unlikely that he would have seen the two sets of phenomena as unrelated. In his eyes, there probably were only two ways in which his affliction could be interpreted: either his current antagonists, the Hellenists, had employed some magico–religious ritual, like those abundantly attested in ancient cursing formulas (Gager 1992: 25–30, 175–98), to conjure up a malevolent spirit (perhaps that of their violently killed hero) against him, or, far more disturbing in the long term, the illness was in accordance with the good pleasure of the Almighty Himself, who therefore would be understood as intervening on behalf of the Hellenists, and against Paul.

If, as suggested above, Paul's persecution of the Hellenists was partly coloured by pangs of jealousy over the success of their mission to the gentiles, he may have needed very little time after his illness on the road to Damascus to interpret this experience as the intervention of his opponents' now resurrected and vindicated founder. Although his subsequent interactions with the church in Damascus undoubtedly contributed to the positive interpretation which he eventually assigned to this event, he may well have been predisposed to construe it in this dramatically self-redefining way quite apart from the Christian community's influence: as modern studies of conversion suggest, people tend not to convert to a 'new' pattern of religion unless they are unhappy in some way with their 'old' one (Stark 1996: 19). But however far Paul may have travelled down the path to his conversion/call before arriving at Damascus, his willingness to travel yet farther in that direction was undoubtedly increased by his experience in Damascus of appearing before his enemies in a state of physical weakness.

Furthermore, a combination of factors working in unison – Paul's pre-conversion awareness of the Hellenists' universalist proclivities, his interpretation of his illness as the work of his enemies' vindicated founder, and his shift of allegiance from Torah observance (and thus circumcision) to faith in Christ as the boundary marker for membership in the community of salvation – all would have encouraged him to conceptualise the agency that confronted him in his illness less as the historically particular Jewish male Jesus of Nazareth than as the universal spirit of the Hellenists' Christ (Boyarin 1994: 39).[14] Indeed, this conception of Jesus' person became one of the most consequential axioms of Paul's whole missionary enterprise, theology and legacy. For it not only played a key role in his efforts to promote a tangible social unity between Jewish and gentile believers in Jesus but also eventually contributed, in ways Paul neither could have foreseen nor would have approved, to both the 'gentilisation'[15] of the churches and to the gradually widening split between Judaism and Christianity.

In Paul's own eyes, of course, the main functions of Jesus' universal lordship were to provide grounds for the inclusion of gentiles, as equal members together with Jews, in the people of God, and to create conditions whereby these Jewish and gentile members would be able to worship and fellowship together in unity, with no member having to surrender every trace of his or her ethnic particularity. While actualising this ideal even on a limited scale was no easy task, the apostle's own letters generally agree with the narratives about him in Acts concerning how energetically he worked to turn his vision of Jew–gentile unity in Christ into a social reality. In his letter to the churches of Galatia, for example, whose gentile members had recently been persuaded by Torah-observant Jewish Christians to believe that full conversion to Judaism (i.e. circumcision) was necessary for salvation (Gal. 1:6–9; 3:1–5), Paul argues that a proper understanding of his Torah-free gospel had already made table fellowship between Jewish and uncircumcised gentile believers not only possible, but a fact of ecclesial praxis (Gal. 2:11–14). This same gospel is furthermore inseparably linked in Paul's mind to the Spirit of Christ that had come to possess him at his conversion (Gal. 1:15–16), which also had mystically united him with Christ so as to radically alter his self-understanding (Gal. 2:19–20), and which the Galatians themselves had received when they accepted Paul's law-free gospel (Gal. 3:2–5). Indeed, in the rhetorical situation addressed by this same remarkable letter, those same experiences of the Spirit are represented by Paul as entailing the validity of his interpretation of the Gospel, for at least in retrospect he saw those experiences as having been facilitated not by observance of Torah (i.e. the laws given to Israel through Moses) but rather by trust in Christ.

A comparative perspective on Galatians and 1 Corinthians

In contrast to the Galatians letter, whose distinctive situation inspired Paul to emphasise the obsolescence of the Torah with regard to salvation, his so-called First Letter to the Corinthians was powerfully shaped by a need to stress the law's abiding relevance to matters of morality and ethical conduct (Fee 1987: 17–18). Particularly prominent among those matters are various types of sexual sin, idolatry and deviations from widely accepted norms of conduct expected of husbands and wives. Strikingly, in response to each of those problems, Paul relies heavily on the Torah to provide at least part of the necessary corrective (1 Cor. 5:6–8, 13; 10:1–13; 11:7–10). By applying the Torah to the moral problems of the Corinthian church, Paul may seem to have allowed his response to be so deeply shaped by the contingencies of the church's situation that he has compromised the Christ–Torah antithesis which, as noted above, pervades his letter to the Galatians. However, if we wish to understand the larger web of concepts implied by Paul's letters, we must not allow suspicions of incoherence to submerge completely the hermeneutical continuities that cut across his different compositions; and here, three such continuities are particularly worth noting.

First, as in 1 Corinthians so in Galatians, Paul does in fact commend the law, reinterpreted in light of the coming of Christ, as a moral bulwark against self-indulgence (Gal. 5:13–15).[16] Second, in both letters Paul applies a broadly allegorical hermeneutic to the pertinent passages of the Torah in order to arrive at the desired ethical maxim: examples of this tendency include the spiritualisation of food and drink in 1 Cor. 10:1–5 and of Abraham's two wives in Gal. 4:21–31 (Boyarin 1994: 32–34). And third, just as Paul perceived the crisis in Galatia as analogous to previous threats to his ideal of tangible unity between Jews and gentiles in Christ (Gal. 2:11–14), so also he probably saw many of the problems in Corinth as obstacles to the same socioreligious goal; his instructions in 1 Cor. 16:1–4, for instance, regarding the monetary collection for the impoverished Jewish believers in the Jerusalem church, were certainly regarded by Paul himself, if not also by his predominantly gentile audience in Corinth, as a way of fostering unity between Jewish and gentile believers in Christ (see esp. Rom. 15:25–27; Witherington 1995: 314).[17] To be sure, the tension between the purposes of the collection and the difficulties addressed earlier in the letter is not asserted on the surface level of the text, but its reality and impact on Paul's response are tacitly signalled by the macro-structural parallelism that unfolds through his repeated use of the construction 'Now concerning' (Greek peri de), which, in addition to introducing the collection issue (16:1), serves to broach a variety of ethical problems (e.g. the cases of sexual immorality mentioned in 7:1 and idolatry in 8:1; see also 7:25) whose presence in the Corinthian community would have made the 'saints' of the Jerusalem church anxious about being identified with such a group.
Figure 7.5 The Corinthian bema ('dais') from which Lucius Junius Gallio, proconsul of Achaia, would have heard the charges brought by local Jews against Paul (Acts 18:12–17), charges described in that context as part of an intra-Jewish squabble and dismissed as having no consequence to Rome and her officials. Photo Philip F. Esler

Further comparison of Galatians and 1 Corinthians discloses another contrast worthy of comment. In general terms, whereas the prominence of the circumcision issue in the implied situation of Galatians presupposes that the only people of consequence in that controversy are males (Stowers 1994: 73–74), the foregrounding of topics pertaining to gender and sexuality in 1 Corinthians (e.g. 1 Cor. 5:1–13; 6:12–20; 7:1–40; 11:2–16) presupposes a situation in which both men and women play important roles. In particular regard to gender, sexuality and the human body, the process by which the Corinthian community arrived at its beliefs and practices must have included interplay between instruction Paul had previously given the community face to face (2:1–5) and assumptions which the Corinthians had internalised prior to their conversion. As the assumptions held in those regards by at least part of that community (e.g. the so-called 'strong' faction in particular) have been shown by Dale Martin not to have been distinctively Jewish but rather 'a more general upper-class Greco-Roman ideology' (Martin 1995: 207–8) that placed the body and sexual activity at the bottom of human values, the use of Pauline teaching regarding the implications of baptism in that context – 'there is no male and female' (Gal. 3:28) – to promote sexual asceticism within marriage (1 Cor. 7:1–7), condone divorce (7:10–16) and devise patterns of worship that blurred customary distinctions between the sexes, is scarcely surprising (e.g. 1 Cor. 7:1–40; 11:2–16).

However, despite the role that Paul's own previous teaching may have played in the formation of that synthesis, the apostle viewed the resultant amalgam as a threat to the purity of the community. Indeed, in view of the aforementioned parallelism between Paul's initial references to some of the church's problems on the one hand (1 Cor. 7:1, 25; 8:1) and his subsequent mention of the collection for the Jerusalem church on the other (16:1–4), as well as his awareness of practices accepted by 'the churches [note the plural] of God' collectively (11:6), Paul undoubtedly assessed the troubles noted above at least partly in terms of how they might damage the community's reputation among other Christ-followers (especially in Jerusalem), how they might impact on his collection strategy and how they might ultimately undermine the honour of his own ministry.

That the baptismal formula attested in Gal. 3:28, moreover, did in fact play a role in the gender troubles of the Corinthian community is suggested by the well-known absence of the 'male and female' phrase from the version employed in 1 Cor. 12:13 (Horrell 1996: 169), where Paul explains, 'For in the one Spirit we were all baptised into one body – Jews or Greeks, slaves or free – and we were all made to drink of one Spirit'. Since the Gal. 3:28 version is probably closer to what Paul normally taught his new converts, the increasingly recognised success of the Pauline churches at winning the allegiance of women in particular (MacDonald 1996: 78–79, 189–95) is scarcely surprising. As implied in both 1 Cor. 7:1–40 and 11:2–16, many female converts apparently interpreted their ecstatic experience of the Spirit at baptism as entailing the end of confinement to the kinds of private roles (e.g. submissive wife, caring mother) which Greco-Roman codes of tradition had long assigned them. And, while it would certainly be anachronistic to equate either Paul's spiritual ideal or the ancient churches' imperfect realisation of it with 'feminism', it would be equally misleading to suggest that women among the Christ-followers experienced all the frustrations common in their patriarchal environment (Beattie 2005: 54). Women married to non-Christian men, for instance, are encouraged by Paul not to rule out the unconventional possibility that, instead of simply adopting (as most wives did) the religion of their husbands, they might actually function as God's chosen means of bringing their husbands to salvation (1 Cor. 7:16). Similarly, rather than advising all unmarried women and widows in the church to embed themselves through marriage in the identity of some marriageable male, Paul actually commends his own preference, namely singleness and celibacy, to all that can endure it – not only male but also female – as long as they do not succumb to sexual passion or extramarital intercourse (1 Cor. 7:7, 25–26, 32–40). And consonant with those same positions are the prominent roles and levels of status that Paul implicitly assigns to various female converts in the personal notes and greetings in the endings of Rom. 16:1–16 and Phil. 4:2–3.

Ethnic difference and Pauline adaptability among Jews and gentiles

Unlike Ignatius of Antioch (c. 35–107), whose letter to the Magnesians assumes the existence of 'Judaism' and 'Christianity' as clearly distinct entities, Paul in his letters never gives the impression that the Christ cult he promotes can be conceptualised as something outside his own deeply Jewish world of assumptions and practices. Indeed, although a big step towards the aforementioned rhetoric of difference in Ignatius might seem to be taken by Paul's earliest biographer, the author of the Acts of the Apostles, who twice shows awareness of the word-group adapted by Ignatius only a few decades later for the purposes of his own discourse, any movement in that direction to be inferred from the narrative in Acts should not be understood as very great; for in both of the key Lukan passages, the term Christianos signifies a group understood to be predominantly Jewish, albeit hybridised and ethnically mixed, in the context of reference (Klutz 2008: 172–79).

The similarity between the Pauline and the Lukan perspectives on that matter can be partly explained by considering that although Paul's converts certainly included gentiles from backgrounds largely or even completely pagan (1 Thess. 1:9; Gal. 4:8), the access he had as a Jew to social networks associated with diaspora synagogues must have aided his evangelistic work among a particular class of non-pagan gentiles: namely, the so-called God-fearers, mentioned briefly above, many of whom would have been psychologically ripe for Paul's circumcision-free gospel because of the status ambiguity they endured among their Jewish acquaintances. In fact, in view of the role that social networks play in most conversions to new religious movements, the sorts of pagan (i.e. non-God-fearing) gentiles that would have been most likely to take an interest in Paul's gospel would have been those who possessed social connections to gentiles of the God-fearing sort, whose involvement in the life of the synagogue scarcely would have prevented them from maintaining a wide range of relationships with persons untouched by Judaism. As Abraham Malherbe observes, Paul's normal pattern in each of his missionary locales was to begin in the synagogues, where, after winning an audience from the local God-fearers (and perhaps a few Jews), he would eventually encounter strong opposition (2 Cor. 11:24–25); once the opposition became an obstacle to further fruitful participation in the synagogue, he would then rely both on opportunities provided by his own workshop and on the households of whatever sympathisers he had found in the Jewish community to consolidate and expand his network of potential followers (Malherbe 1983: 68–69). Thus, although the prominence of synagogues and God-fearers in the Acts account of Paul's missionary work (e.g. Acts 13:14–48; 16:13–15; 17:10–12) is something of an exaggeration, stemming in part from a rhetorical need to defend Paul against charges of apostasy (Acts 21:21), it is not without support from Paul's own letters (e.g. 2 Cor. 11:24) and probably points to a routine feature of his missionary endeavours.[18]

Alongside Paul's high degree of continuity with his Israelite cultural heritage, however, was a pastoral philosophy that contained seeds of discontinuity and momentous change in regard to the Christ congregations' ethnic composition. The seeds in question consisted of Paul's approach to the problem of how the ethnically diverse range of people in the Christ cult might best be enabled to accept one another, given their diverse individual blendings of ethnicity, gender and socioeconomic level, as equal members of the one people of God. A key facet of Paul's preferred solution can be seen in his teaching that, since in Christ the physical practices of Judaism have no direct relation to the essential domains of the heart and the Spirit (Rom. 2:28–29), those who belong to Christ are free to follow their own conscience regarding those practices. A closely related and equally important feature of that same philosophy was the notion that each Christ-follower's practice of free conscience must always be subordinated to and motivated by a loving concern for the welfare of others in the community, especially that particular subgroup of others understood to be 'weak in faith' (i.e. those whose understanding of liberty had not yet progressed to Paul's level of insight).

Figure 7.6 Streets and shops in the ancient agora of Thessaloniki, whose first community of Christ-followers, composed of gentiles alone, was established by Paul and praised by the apostle for its exemplary faith and hope (1 Thes. 1:2–10). Photo Philip F. Esler

Contributing to a larger programme of moral leadership and guidance that resembles contemporaneous Epicurean ideals more than it does the ethics of Jewish Scripture, this Pauline ethic of adaptability allowed the apostle not only to follow Jewish custom when it suited his purposes but also to tolerate the continuation of Jewish practices by select Jewish (but not gentile) members of his churches (1 Cor. 9:19–23);[19] yet because the same principle could be used to relativise the importance of dietary and calendrical observances, and thus to reduce their status to that of non-essential externals (cf. Rom. 14:1–23), it must have prevented nearly all Jews other than the most assimilated types from attaching themselves to churches in Paul's sphere of influence. For whatever being Jewish meant in the eyes of the kinds of Jews Paul encountered in the synagogues of the diaspora, it rarely if ever could have entailed rating the aforementioned practices as merely peripheral; on the contrary, the cultural difference of being Jewish consisted at least partly of taking those same customs as essential markers of one's identity (Boyarin 1994: 9–10; Esler 1998), and the almost complete absence of Jewish parallels to the conceptual space shared by Paul with the Epicureans – Josephus' portrayal of the Sadducees is perhaps the sole notable exception (Croy 2000: 326) – only reinforces the impression noted above that the apostle's house of psychagogic adaptability would not have felt like a home to most of his Jewish contemporaries outside the Christ cult.

Paul's pastoral praxis of adaptability therefore held little promise in the long term of attracting future generations of Jews into the churches he founded, whatever degree of effectiveness it may have had as a short-term strategy of engaging present Christ-followers in reciprocal exhortation and moral improvement. The apostle's commitment to a strategy limited by what may seem, at least to our eyes, as a form of myopia, should not surprise us; for his expectation of Christ's imminent return (1 Cor. 7:29–31; 1 Thess. 4:13–5:11) virtually precluded any formulation of a long-term pastoral strategy that might enhance the Christ cult's evangelistic activities among both gentiles and Jews (Donaldson 1997: 246). So, when Paul's expectation of Christ's return failed to materialise and thus needed to be revised by his students, his own precedent of devaluing the key markers of Jewish identity came to be reinterpreted in various ways and, in some contexts, given meanings that Paul himself could never have envisioned (Martyn 1997: 84). With the aid of hindsight, it is tempting to say that what happened to the Christ cult's ethnic constituency in the initial generations after Paul might easily have been predicted by some ancient ethnographer watching Paul's operations with the hypothetical detachment of a non-participant observer. Whatever value that speculation might possess, the predictable progress of the Christ cult's gentilisation did in fact continue apace, as illustrated by a few key developments in the Wirkungsgeschichte of Paul's letters (i.e. the history of their use, effects and influence) and of the teachings of the Hellenists, with whom the present story began.

Gentile mission, anti-Judaism, and the afterlife of Galatians in Marcionism

The letters of Paul, it is now widely acknowledged, have been reinterpreted and used in a great variety of ways, with diverse and sometimes conflicting effects, from the moment of each letter's initial reception down to our own time. One particular sequence in that larger story of reception intersects the present narrative about the gentilisation of the Christ cult in a singularly interesting and, I believe, very illuminating way. The sequence in question is best conceptualised for my present purpose as having the mid second-century Christian thinker Marcion's treatment of Paul's Galatians letter,[20] discussed at various points above, as its focal point, and being connected on either side to Galatians' original context of production (c. 50 CE) and to anti-Marcionite discourse in the heresiologists Tertullian (c. 160–225 CE) and Epiphanius of Salamis (c. 315–403 CE). Epiphanius' critique of the Marcionites' use of Galatians serves as the best possible beginning for the ensuing analysis, not least because of the clarity with which he defines both the problem and his perspective on it.

Epiphanius on the placement of Galatians in Marcionite copies of Paul's letters

According to Epiphanius' Panarion (c. 374–376, also known as the Refutation of All the Heresies), most of the Christian churches of his time have a collection of Paul's letters whose sequence begins with Romans and proceeds in the order familiar to most readers/hearers of the New Testament throughout the history of the church (Panarion 42.11.7–8). One of the numerous problems posed by Marcion and his disciples in Epiphanius' day, the heresiographer explains, is that their collections of Paul's letters do not have Romans 'in first place' but rather have Galatians in that position and thereby deviate from 'all the copies which are sound and true' (Panarion 42.12.3). Epiphanius' objection to Marcion's placement of Galatians rather than Romans at the beginning of his collections of Paul's letters raises a host of questions too numerous and complex for adequate treatment here,[21] but for purposes of the present narrative at least one of them deserves immediate attention: namely, since Galatians was undoubtedly composed and first read/heard prior to Paul's composition of Romans, why in subsequent contexts of reception should Galatians not be read or heard without Romans having been read first? What is it about Romans that should give it value as a type of hermeneutical control for early Christian reading of Paul's other letters, and in particular Galatians? But more importantly for the present narrative, what is it about Galatians that could make that letter potentially dangerous (or at least unsuitable) reading material for a Christian who had not already become familiar with the apostle on the basis of prior reading/hearing of Romans and the Corinthian correspondence? By putting into the foreground considerations of hermeneutical framing, theological controls and canon-formation, I do not intend to suggest that those are the only factors relevant to an adequate explanation of Epiphanius' perspective; but as indicated below, in the construction of the larger canon of the

New Testament,[22] decisions about the optimal sequencing of writings in an authoritative collection were informed very much by hermeneutical and theological factors, in ways that illuminate not only the letters of Paul but also the larger historical process of the Christ movement's gentilisation.

Both for the sake of clarity in my own analysis, and to preview much of what remains to be told in the present story, a brief outline of how the questions just posed might best be answered ought to be offered here. In the first place, and against any overhasty assault upon the bishop of Salamis, it is likely that Epiphanius' objection to the elevation of Galatians in Marcionite collections of Paul's letters was related to other features of Marcionite teaching which Epiphanius himself and many other Christians in the latter half of the fourth century considered unsalutary (Tyson 2006: 36). To be more precise, for the purposes of arguing against Marcion's identification of the creator god of Jewish Scripture as the Demiurge, against his theology of radical discontinuity between Israel and the new revelation of love brought by Jesus, and against his more generally anti-Judaic outlook (Gager 2000: 12), the Pauline epistle that gives more attention than any of his other letters to his conflicts with other Judean members of the Christ cult (e.g. Gal. 2:11–14; 5:7–12) and to his relativisation of the worth of various aspects of Jewish tradition (e.g. Gal. 4:8–11; 5:2–6) would have been a very weak line of defence, less effective by far than some of Paul's other letters (e.g. Romans, esp. chaps 9–11, and the Corinthian correspondence) and the second volume of Luke-Acts, with its revisionist frontgrounding of Paul as a Torah-loving embodiment of salvation-historical continuity (Tyson 2006: 62–78) would increasingly prove to be. Thanks chiefly to the Marcion movement, early Christian heresiographers such as Epiphanius and Tertullian acquired an understanding of how very promiscuous Paul's letter to the churches of Galatia could be without a circle of carefully chosen intertextual chaperones.

But just as importantly, in terms of the letter's influence upon subsequent religious discourse and practice, Galatians must have seemed at best a work of apostasy whenever it fell into the hands of early Jewish readers outside the Christ cult, so that its best chances for favourable reception would have been in heavily gentile or even anti-Jewish contexts such as Marcion's, whose missionary activity in general and distinctive handling of Paul's letters in particular would almost certainly have reinforced and expanded the process of gentilisation advanced earlier by the Hellenists, Paul and Ignatius among others. Accordingly, while the ethnic composition of Marcionite communities is a matter given little or no attention in most of the relevant scholarship,[23] a paucity of Jews in that network is a reasonable inference to draw from the character of Marcion's theology (Stark 1996: 65). Moreover, in view of the wide scholarly agreement that Marcion was hugely successful as a planter of new churches,[24] he must remain a leading candidate for the most powerful known driver behind the mechanisms of gentilisation throughout the church's first two centuries.

Canonical hermeneutics, heresiography and the gentile mission in Tertullian versus Marcion

As acknowledged above, the portrayal of Marcion by Epiphanius is highly polemical; it is also produced for a context roughly 200 years later than that during which Marcion was active, shows no interest in diversity or processes of change in Marcionism across time, and probably exaggerates the similarities between Marcionism and various gnostic-like groups active in Epiphanius' day. Yet an important facet of Epiphanius' portrayal is corroborated, much closer to Marcion's time, by Tertullian, who confirms that Paul's letter to the churches of Galatia did indeed perform a lot of the heavy lifting in the construction of Marcion's programme: 'Marcion has got hold of Paul's epistle to the Galatians', says Tertullian, 'and on this ground Marcion strives hard to overthrow the credit of those gospels which are the apostles' own . . . with the intention no doubt of conferring on his gospel the repute which he takes away from those others' (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.3.2). Having thus acceded the potential congeniality of Galatians to Marcion's perspective, Tertullian explains that potential partly by highlighting, shortly afterwards in the same treatise, that Galatians is 'the epistle . . . we allow to be the most decisive against Judaism' (5.2.1), a perception which, it is worth adding here, would have made that epistle a much better device for persuading gentiles (especially from within the wider church) than for converting Jews. Despite such allowances, however, Tertullian judges Marcion's interpretation of Galatians as a harmful sort of misreading; and one of Tertullian's main reasons for that judgement, though he never says so directly, is that the Marcionites do not read Galatians in dialogue with Tertullian's prescribed intertexts – namely, the story of Paul in the Acts of the Apostles, excluded from Marcion's canon and thereby fatefully separated from Luke's 'former treatise' (i.e. the Gospel of Luke, which Marcion revised and accepted in a form known to Tertullian), and Paul's so-called First Letter to the Corinthians, included in Marcionite collections of Paul's letters but placed after Galatians in the sequence and thus arguably given lesser importance.[25]

At least partly because Tertullian knows that the Marcionites rejected the Acts of the Apostles, a choice criticised by Tertullian as motivated by theological perversity (Against Marcion 5.2), the heresiographer describes his own riposte to Marcionism as consisting of 'evidence from the epistles of St. Paul himself' (5.1), a point foregrounded both by its repetition at the end of Tertullian's counter-reading of the apostle's letters (5.21) and by an inclusio structure completed by that same instance of recurrence. Furthermore, by starting his own treatment of the evidence with a reading of Galatians (5.1–4, before treating either 1–2 Corinthians 5.5–12, or Romans 5.13–14!), Tertullian confirms the special importance attached by the Marcionites to that particular letter. To his credit, in regard to no less than nine of the ten Pauline letters accepted by the Marcionites, Tertullian is as faithful to his claim about the Pauline character of his evidence as anyone could be while deal-ing with texts whose meanings are demonstrably and very richly intertextual (5.5–21); in that same context, the one epistolary sheep more prone than any of Paul's other letters to being led away from the proto-orthodox fold, more vulnerable to capture by the savage wolves of Marcionism in particular, is Galatians, for whose rescue Tertullian sends his trusty theological sheepdog, the Acts of the Apostles.

For that particular purpose, the Acts of the Apostles is significant both for its representation of Paul's interactions with the apostle Peter and the Jerusalem church as having been distinguished not

Marcion	Tertullian Ag.Marc. 5	Epiphanius
Galatians	Galatians	Romans
1 Corinthians	1 Corinthians	1 Corinthians
2 Corinthians	2 Corinthians	2 Corinthians
Romans	Romans	Galatians
1 Thes.	1 Thes.	Ephesians
2 Thes.	2 Thes.	Philippians
Ephesians	Ephesians	Colossians
Colossians	Colossians	1 Thes.
Philemon	Philippians	2 Thes.
Philippians	Philemon
	1 Timothy	1 Timothy
	2 Timothy	2 Timothy
Laodiceans	Titus	Titus
		Philemon
		Hebrews

Figure 7.7   The identity and order of Pauline letters in Marcionite collections (according to Epiphanius, Panarion 42.8, 11–12); Tertullian's commentary-riposte in Against Marcion 5.2–21; and Epiphanius, Panarion 42.11.8–9 and 42.12.3

by the kind of discord inferred in Marcionite interpretation of Galatians but rather by unity and concord (Against Marcion 5.3), and thus also for clearly identifying the god of Paul's Christ as the god of Peter, the other apostles and the writers of the Old Testament (5.2).[26] However, for the purposes of the present narrative, the significance attributed by Tertullian to the Book of Acts is less note-worthy than the absence of certain meanings he could have inferred from that text but concerning which he in fact shows no interest; namely, the potential of Acts to serve as a legitimation of the gentile mission, the spread of the gospel from Jew to gentile, and thus also the increasingly gentile constituency of the Christ cult. Not unlike the composer of Luke-Acts, the implied author of Against Marcion therefore shows less interest in producing evangelistic literature designed to win gentiles for Christ than in revising the image of Saint Paul in a manner that challenges emerging portrayals of the apostle as a precursor of some heretical teacher or another. But just as importantly, and notwithstanding the possibility that the Book of Acts was written by a former travelling-companion and missionary assistant of Paul's, neither that writer nor Tertullian is likely to have contributed as much as Marcion of Sinope did both to the expansion of the Christ movement and to its further gentilisation.

Conclusion

The historiography of early Christian missionary activity has never to my knowledge suggested that the Christ cult's first 125 to 150 years of success in converting non-Jews to faith in Christ was inseparably interwoven with early Christian processes of deviance-labelling and constructing the heretical other. In different ways, each of the main phases in that development suggests that such an interweaving deserves serious attention. The case of Marcion in that connection should by now be so obvious as to require no further discussion here; indeed, the main reason for Marcion's surprising absence in most accounts of the Christ cult's incorporation of gentiles during the second century probably consists in good measure of the effectiveness with which his movement was labelled as deviant and heretical by some of the major early Christian heresiographers and their theological allies.

The case of Paul, on the other hand, will undoubtedly seem to be, in the eyes of many, so dif-ferent from that of Marcion that the former may seem to be immune to any taint of deviance or heresy. After all, the thirteen letters attributed to Paul in the New Testament have long been an important source of norms in the development and maintenance of Christian orthodoxy. How then can Paul be compared to Marcion or be perceived as a potential heretic? The story of Paul in my narrative offers the rudiments of a potentially satisfactory answer to that question: namely, the Paul of Christian orthodoxy is very much a product of Luke's revisionist characterisation of him in Acts, the still later representation of Paul's thought in contexts such as Tertullian's, and the eventual placement of both the Acts of the Apostles and Paul's longest letters ahead of Galatians in the formation of the canon of the New Testament. The Paul of the undisputed letters, and especially of the biographical section of Galatians, on the other hand, is the proponent of a recent religious innovation – one to which he himself has significantly contributed, and which involves the crossing of well-established socioreligious boundaries – and thus a highly controversial figure accused by some of his Judean contemporaries of being apostate and thus deviant, a challenge later acknowledged by the author of Acts (e.g. 21:17–28), albeit only in order to answer it.

As for the Hellenists introduced in Acts 6 and treated at the beginning of the present account, it has been suggested above that the expulsion of that group from Jerusalem must have been a result of religious and theological tensions more serious than that explicitly mentioned in the Acts account. The story about the Hellenist Stephen, his speech and his martyrdom in a setting of ancient Judean vigilante violence was interpreted above as entailing that he and perhaps other members of the Hellenist element had come to be seen by outgroup Jerusalemite authorities as dangerous deviants, whose consequent migration to various parts of the Jewish diaspora not only coincided with a burst of evangelistic proclamation on their part among gentiles but might be best understood as a continuation of still earlier inter-ethnic outreach to gentiles in and around Jerusalem.

Given the especially group-orientated nature of nearly all ancient Mediterranean persons, what I have inferred above from Acts 6–8 about Stephen might well be applicable to the Hellenist contingent as a whole, with Stephen thus being interpreted as a typical representative of the movement. However, because other probable Hellenists such as Philip the evangelist, Nicolas and Apollos become links in their own larger interdiscursive chains, the evidence concerning each of those figures ought to be analysed just as that concerning Paul and Marcion has been above. That particular task cannot be undertaken properly in the space available here; but if it could, a guiding initiative assumption based on the account above would be that since the behavioural crossing of clearly demarcated boundaries between ethnic groups in Mediterranean antiquity had high potential to be perceived by interested observers as deviant, any pioneers who contributed to the early clearing of paths across the boundary between Jews and gentiles, by including the latter as full members of the Christ cult on the basis of trust in Christ rather than circumcision, would have been running a high risk of being branded a heretic.

Notes

1 Similar to the critique of Hill given here is the fuller discussion in Penner (2004: 40–4).
2 The importance of honour in the first-century Mediterranean world is discussed in Chapter 1 of this work.
3 Hill (1992) has been criticised by Esler (1995) for skating over the conflict apparent in Acts 6:1, a verse which, since F. C. Baur began this debate in the 1830s, has been the most significant item of data in the approach Hill attacks. Hill's subsequent restatement of his position (1996: 129–53), by mentioning Acts 6:1 only in passing, and focussing instead almost entirely on Acts 8:1 and 6:8–7:60, does little to rectify his vulnerability on this point.
4 Inquiry into the usage of the Greek word for 'Hebrews' (Hebraios) and its cognate forms strengthens the sense that, from Luke's point of view, more than language habits distinguished the Hebrews from the Hellenists. Although the noun used in Acts 6:1 occurs nowhere else in Luke-Acts, it does occur in 2 Cor. 11:22 and Phil. 3:5, where in both cases it clearly signifies Jewish descent and religious identity. Of course, one may wish to urge, as does Hill (1992: 47–8), that Pauline usage should not be invoked to solve an exegetical conundrum in Luke-Acts; but however fine this sentiment is in theoretical principle, it should not be allowed to obscure a potentially more important consideration – and one that Hill appears to ignore – namely, how the author of Luke-Acts uses the cognate term Hebrais. Most importantly, in each of this term's occurrences in Acts (21:40; 22:2; and 26:14) it not only refers to the most commonly used language in Palestine at this time (i.e. Aramaic), but also implies the existence of a special bond of social and cultural solidarity among those who speak this language. For interesting discussion of how a speaker's choice of language in this kind of multilingual environment can tacitly convey a wide range of social, political and ethnic alignments (and antagonisms), see P. Trudgill, Sociolinguistics: An Introduction to Language and Society, 2nd ed., London, Penguin Books, 1983, pp. 53–54, 149–50.
5 Admittedly, as Esler (1987: 122–25) observes, by 'defences as to law and jurisdiction' rather than by factual rebuttal.
6 On the phenomenon of escalation see the useful discussion in D. G. Pruitt and J. Z. Rubin, Social Conflict: Escalation, Stalemate, and Settlement, New York, Random House, 1986, pp. 62–87. Challenge-and-response in the Mediterranean context is dealt with generally by Malina (2001: 38–43) and in relation to Paul's relationships with the Jerusalem 'Hebrews' by Esler (1998: 117–40).
7 As the present essay is not intended to be an introduction either to Paul or to the field of Pauline studies but rather is offered as a larger story in which Paul is only one of several major characters, it does not provide a full bibliography on those areas. However, readers intending to go farther into the field of Pauline studies in particular will appreciate the following surveys of the issues, debates and major schools of interpretation: Wright 2015, Given 2010, Zetterholm 2009, Horrell 2006 and Witherington 1998.
8 On the similarity between Paul's pre-conversion motivations for harassing the early 'congregation of God' (Gal. 1:13) and his opponents' reasons for unsettling the Galatian churches, see Esler 1998: 122–4.
9 On the superiority of 'harass' to 'persecute' as the rendering of diōkō in this context, see Harvey (2016: 115–26).
10 For an original and impressively argued interpretation of Romans that understands the missionary-theological strategy of the letter, and indeed of Paul in general, as largely consonant with the Lukan story of Paul, see Nanos 1996: 242–47.
11 See e.g. Mark 4:1–3 (par. Luke 4:1–3); Acts 10:9–10, 13:2–3; Col. 2:16–20; and Papyri Graecae Magicae 4.733–39. For further discussion of the role of abstinence in ancient religious trance and ecstasy, see Craffert 2008: 151–55; Klutz 2004: 194–205; Ashton 2000: 68–69; Fowden 1986: 83–84; and Dodds 1951: 140–41.

12 The case for reading 2 Cor. 12:1–10 as an interpretation of shamanic initiation, or conversion/call, is stated particularly well by Ashton 2000: 116–23.

13 On Pharisaic beliefs see, e.g. Josephus, JA 18.12–15; and Acts 23:6–9.

14 Ashton 2000: 122.

15 I borrow the term here from Terence Donaldson 1997: ix, who uses it as shorthand for the process whereby the exclusively Jewish movement of Jesus' first followers became an increasingly distinct, non-Jewish religion.

16 Cf. Esler 1998: 203–4, who argues that in Gal. 5:14 Paul means that through (the Spirit's gift of) agapê Christ-believers have the best that the Law can provide but from an entirely different source.

17 For more recent treatment of issues surrounding Paul's collection(s) for the relief of impoverished Christ-followers in the Jerusalem church, see Downs 2008: 33–9, who argues that the collection implied in Gal. 2:9–10 was the first of two distinct relief funds organised by Paul.

18 See also Hopkins 1998: 214–15; and Gager 2000: 51, 77, 167–68 n. 38.

19 See Klutz 2003: 210–11 and Glad 1995: 43–45.

20 In addition to the studies cited below in connection with Marcion, see now especially Lieu 2015 and BeDuhn 2013, both for comprehensive treatment of important issues and for full bibliography.

21 A particularly fine introduction to the topic along with commentary on Marcion's use of Galatians is Riches 2007: 11–14 and passim.

22 A process understood by some scholars (e.g. Von Harnack 1990 [1924]; Knox 1942; Von Campenhausen 1972) as having been partly inspired by the prior existence of Marcion's canon; but cf. Bruce 1988: 144; Metzger 1987: 98–99; and Gamble 1985: 59–62.

23 See, e.g. Brakke 2010: 96–99 and passim; May 2006; Lampe 2003: 241–56; and Von Harnack 1990 [1924], none of whom consider the question, with Brakke's silence being the most noteworthy since ethnicity is highlighted as one of the key themes that define his approach to interpreting early Christian diversity (11–15).

24 See, e.g. Lampe 2003: 250–52 and Bauer 1971: 22.

25 My inferences here are based on Tertullian, Contra Marcionem 5.1–10 (esp. 5.1–3, 8), where Tertullian's reading of Galatians in particular is constrained more overtly by the Book of Acts and 1 Corinthians than is his interpretation of Paul's other letters. On the prime position of Galatians in Marcionite collections of Paul's letters as evidence of that writing's unique value as a source for Marcionite theology, see Bruce 1988: 139 and Metzger 1987: 94, a view briefly dismissed by Gamble 1985: 41, without stated reason. On the early contribution of the Book of Acts to arguments against Marcionite and similar readings of Paul (esp. Galatians), see Tyson 2006: 49, 68–69; Pervo 2006: 78, 96, 138.

26 Much closer than Tertullian (and probably also Marcion) to the time at which the Book of Acts was composed, broadly similar purposes were perhaps served by the Pastoral Epistles, James and 2 Peter, which in various ways imply situations in which the teachings or even collected writings of Paul were becoming a source of controversy; see especially 1 Tim. 4:1–5; 6:20–21; 2 Tim. 1:15; 2:16–18; James 2:14–26; and 2 Pet. 3:14–18.

Bibliography

Ashton, J. (2000) The Religion of Paul the Apostle. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Bakhtin, M. (1981) The Dialogic Imagination. Trans. C. Emerson and M. Holquist. Austin, TX: University of Texas Press.

Barrett, C. K. (1994) A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles. Vol. 1. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Bauer, W. (1971) Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity. Trans. G. Krodel et al. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Beattie, G. (2005) Women and Marriage in Paul and His Early Interpreters. Journal for the Study of the New Testament Supplement, 296. London and New York: T&T Clark.

BeDuhn, J. D. (2013) The First New Testament: Marcion's Scriptural Canon. Salem, OR: Polebridge.

Betz, H. D. (ed.) (1986) The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation. Vol. 1. Chicago, IL and London: University of Chicago Press.

Borgen, P. (1996) Early Christianity and Hellenistic Judaism. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Boyarin, D. (1994) A Radical Jew: Paul and the Politics of Identity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Brakke, D. (2010) The Gnostics: Myth, Ritual, and Diversity in Early Christianity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Brown, P. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Bruce, F. F. (1988) The Canon of Scripture. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

Carr, E. (1987) What Is History? 2nd ed. London: Penguin Books.

Conzelmann, H. (1973) History of Primitive Christianity. Trans. J. Steely. London: Darton, Longman & Todd.

Craffert, P. (2008) The Life of a Galilean Shaman: Jesus of Nazareth in Anthropological-Historical Perspective. Eugene, OR: Wipf and Stock.

Croy, N. C. (2000) 'Epicureanism', in C. A. Evans and S. E. Porter (eds) Dictionary of New Testament Background. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

Dodds, E. R. (1951) The Greeks and the Irrational. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Donaldson, T. (1997) Paul and the Gentiles: Remapping the Apostle's Convictional World. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Downs, D. J. (2008) The Offering of the Gentiles: Paul's Collection for Jerusalem in Its Chronological, Cultural, and Cultic Contexts. WUNT. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Dunn, J. D. G. (1993) The Theology of Paul's Letter to the Galatians: New Testament Theology. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Esler, P. F. (1987) Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lucan Theology. SNTS Monograph Series, 57. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Esler, P. F. (1994) The First Christians in Their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. London: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (1995) 'Review of Hill 1992', Biblical Interpretation 3: 119–23.

Esler, P. F. (1998) Galatians. London and New York: Routledge.

Fee, G. (1987) The First Epistle to the Corinthians: New International Commentary on the New Testament. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Fowden, G. (1986) The Egyptian Hermes: A Historical Approach to the Late Pagan Mind. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Gager, J. (ed.) (1992) Curse Tablets and Binding Spells from the Ancient World. New York and Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Gager, J. (2000) Reinventing Paul. New York and Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Gamble, H. Y. (1985) The New Testament Canon: Its Making and Meaning. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Given, M. D. (ed.) (2010) Paul Unbound: Other Perspectives on the Apostle. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Glad, C. E. (1995) Paul and Philodemus: Adaptability in Epicurean and Early Christian Psychagogy. Supplements to Novum Testamentum, 81. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Harrington, H. (1993) The Impurity Systems of Qumran and the Rabbis: Biblical Foundations. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Harvey, D. S. (2016) 'Face in Galatians: "Boasting in the Cross" as reconfigured honour in Paul's Letter', PhD thesis, University of Manchester.

Hill, C. (1992) Hellenists and Hebrews: Reappraising Division within the Earliest Church. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Hill, C. (1996) 'Acts 6.1–8.4: Division or diversity?', in B. Witherington (ed.) History, Literature, and Society in the Book of Acts. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Hopkins, K. (1998) 'Christian number and its implications', Journal of Early Christian Studies 6(2): 185–226.

Horrell, D. (1996) The Social Ethos of the Corinthian Correspondence: Interests and Ideology from 1 Corinthians to 1 Clement. Edinburgh, UK: T & T Clark.

Horrell, D. (2006) An Introduction to the Study of Paul. 2nd ed. London and New York: T&T Clark.

Jefford, C. N. (2006) The Apostolic Fathers and the New Testament. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Klutz, T. E. (2003) 'Re-reading 1 Corinthians after rethinking "Gnosticism"', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 26(2): 193–216.

Klutz, T. E. (2004) The Exorcism Stories in Luke-Acts: A Sociostylistic Reading. SNTS Monograph Series, 129. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Klutz, T. E. (2008) 'Christianos: Defining the self in the Acts of the Apostles', in N. Green and M. Searle-Chatterjee (eds) Religion, Language, and Power. London and New York: Routledge.

Knox, J. (1942) Marcion and the New Testament: An Essay in the Early History of the Canon. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Knox, J. (1989) Chapters in a Life of Paul. Revised edition of 1950 original by D. R. A. Hare. London: SCM Press Ltd.

Koester, H. (1982) Introduction to the New Testament. Vol. 2. Berlin and New York: Walter De Gruyter & Co.

Lampe, P. (2003) From Paul to Valentinus: Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries. Trans. M. Steinhauser. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Lieu, J. M. (2015) Marcion and the Making of a Heretic: God and Scripture in the Second Century. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Luck, G. (1985) Arcana Mundi: Magic and the Occult in the Greek and Roman Worlds. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins.

MacDonald, M. Y. (1996) Early Christian Women and Pagan Women: The Power of the Hysterical Woman. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Mack, B. (1995) Who Wrote the New Testament? The Making of the Christian Myth. San Francisco, CA: HarperCollins.

Malherbe, A. J. (1983) Social Aspects of Early Christianity. 2nd ed. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Malina, B. (2001) The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology. 3rd ed. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press.

Martin, D. (1995) The Corinthian Body. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Martin, T. (1992) 'Hellenists', in D. N. Freedman (ed.) The Anchor Bible Dictionary. New York: Doubleday.

Martyn, J. L. (1997) 'Galatians, an anti-Judaic document?', in Theological Issues in the Letters of Paul. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.

May, G. (2006) 'Marcion', in W. Hanegraaf et al. (eds) Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Metzger, B. M. (1987) The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Murphy-O'Connor, J. (1996) Paul: A Critical Life. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Nanos, M. (1996) The Mystery of Romans: The Jewish Context of Paul's Letter. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Penner, T. (2004) In Praise of Christian Origins: Stephen and the Hellenists in Lukan Apologetic Historiography. New York and London: T&T Clark.

Pervo, R. I. (2006) Dating Acts: Between the Evangelists and the Apologists. Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge Press.

Pruitt, D. and Rubin, J. (1986) Social Conflict: Escalation, Stalemate, and Settlement. New York: Random House.

Richard, E. (1978) Acts 6:1–8:4: The Author's Method of Composition. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press.

Riches, J. (2007) Galatians Through the Centuries. Wiley-Blackwell Commentaries. Chichester, UK: John Wiley & Sons.

Segal, A. (1990) Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Stark, R. (1996) The Rise of Christianity: A Sociologist Reconsiders History. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Stowers, S. (1994) A Rereading of Romans: Justice, Jews, and Gentiles. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Trocmé, É. (1997) The Childhood of Christianity. Trans. J. Bowden. London: SCM Press.

Trudgill, P. (1983) Sociolinguistics: An Introduction to Language and Society. London: Penguin Books.

Tyson, J. B. (2006) Marcion and Luke-Acts: A Defining Struggle. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press.

Von Campenhausen, H. (1972) The Formation of the Christian Bible. Trans. J. A. Baker. London: Adam and Charles Black.

Von Harnack, A. (1990 [1924]) Marcion: The Gospel of the Alien God. Trans. J. E. Steely and L. D. Bierma (of Marcion: Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott: Eine Monographe zur Geschichte der Grundlegung der katholischen Kirche. 2nd ed., 1924). Grand Rapids, MI: Baker.

Walsh, R. (1997) 'The psychological health of Shamans: A reevaluation', Journal of the American Academy of Religion 65(1): 101–24.

Welborn, L. (1997) Politics and Rhetoric in the Corinthian Epistles. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Witherington, B. (1995) Conflict and Community in Corinth: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Witherington, B. (1998) The Paul Quest: The Renewed Search for the Jew of Tarsus. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

Wright, N. T. (2015) Paul and His Recent Interpreters. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Zetterholm, M. (2009) Approaches to Paul: A Student's Guide to Recent Scholarship. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

8

THE JESUS TRADITION

The gospel writers' strategies of persuasion

Richard L. Rohrbaugh

The writers of the canonical gospels seek to persuade. They try to convince readers of the truth of the story of Jesus. Sometimes they write in order to elicit belief, at other times to confirm or solidify it. But in either case they seek to persuade, and it is primarily their strategies for persuasion that will be of interest to us in what follows. Yet given our cultural distance from the ancient Mediterranean world, not all of these strategies are obvious to readers in modern, western societies.

Analysis of the strategies used by gospel writers to craft persuasive stories has most often been done at the literary level. That is, scholars have identified a variety of literary devices through which ancient writers sought to capture readers' attention, hook them into the story, and gain their sympathy. Such literary studies are extremely valuable, especially when drawing on the instructions in the art of persuasive writing that developed in ancient rhetorical schools.[1]

Yet helpful as these (literary) rhetorical studies have been, they frequently overlook a key factor in the way language, including the language of persuasion, actually works. Sociolinguists have demonstrated that language ultimately derives its meaning from the social system shared by writer and reader (or speaker and hearer).[2] That is so because language is itself a form of social interaction. Apart from a shared social context, which leads both speaker and listener to bring similar expectations to a conversation, words, and sentences are meaningless. Indeed, without a shared social system, meanings are often significantly confused, as any cross-cultural conversation is likely to demonstrate. Recognizing the patterns of persuasion in ancient writing is therefore as much a matter of understanding the (shared) ancient social system as it is the literary conventions that were taught in the rhetorical schools.

Another way to make this same point derives from speech accommodation theory (Giles et al. 1987; Malina 1994). The basic idea is that speakers or writers tend to accommodate language to audience expectations in order to gain a hearing. Therefore, if the gospel writers are interested in persuading readers to believe the Jesus story, we should expect to find language-accommodation in their accounts. Obviously, however, language that accommodates to and thus attracts or persuades one reader (linguistic convergence) may simultaneously repel and dissuade another reader (linguistic divergence). Thus, as we will have occasion to see, the Jesus story told one way probably attracted non-literate, rural peasants. Yet told that same way it would likely have repelled members of the literate elite. By watching the way the gospel writers shape the Jesus traditions in order to accommodate and converge with their respective audiences, we can gain important clues to their persuasive power.

Figure 8.1   The Sea of Galilee, looking eastward toward Gergesa (Matt. 8:28) and the region of Gaulanitis.
        Photo: Richard Rohrbaugh

In what follows we shall concentrate on persuasive strategies which are dependent on the shared social system of the ancient Mediterranean world.[3] That is, we shall concentrate on social imperatives rather than literary form—not because the latter is unimportant but because it has been more often studied. Moreover, since space does not permit us to examine these matters comprehensively, we shall seek only to illustrate the phenomenon of social accommodation by looking briefly at one such rhetorical strategy in each of the canonical gospels.

We shall begin with the Gospel of Mark. We do so not only because it was the first of the canonical gospels written, but also because its social location provides a strong contrast to that of the later writers (Matthew and Luke) who used it.[4] Moreover, offering some detail on the social location of the Markan story will enable us to show the contrast in the Matthean and Lukan alternatives clearly. Our first objective then will be to determine what kind of story Mark tells. At what social group is it being pitched? With whom is solidarity being sought? Who might find it attractive or offensive? Whom does it hope to persuade? In short, what is this author's strategy in the social interaction he undertakes with his readers?

The social location of Mark's story

We begin with the 'social location' of the Jesus story in Mark. The notion of a social location is not difficult to grasp, though its importance has been little recognized in New Testament scholarship.[5] A social location is simply a position in a social system shared by a group of people. A generation, an occupational group or a social class might be an example. Such collections of people are not 'groups,' in the sense that they are personally acquainted, but rather they are persons who occupy a common position in the social system and therefore share certain kinds of lived experience. Moreover, such social locations are important because they provide the context in which meanings are shared. They do not cause certain ways of thinking, but they do make a limited range of ideas or values appear as plausible alternatives to most people. We need therefore to find a social location, a shared position in the social system, which offers a vantage point from which to think about the persuasive power of the Jesus traditions.

Social stratification

The overwhelming importance of social stratification in ancient Mediterranean societies makes the issue of stratification an ideal choice to meet our needs. It offers us one valuable vantage point (among many that are possible) from which to assess the rhetorical strategy of each Gospel writer.[6] The working assumption underlying this choice is that a Jesus story pitched to appeal to persons at one social level, rural peasants for example, would probably have a less positive impact on members of a very different one, such as the urban elite. Since Jesus was transparently a village artisan of very low social status, telling his story to village peasants might present a rather straightforward rhetori- cal challenge. But how would a gospel writer tell the Jesus story for an elite urban audience which considered village artisans unworthy of imitation? That is a key question we are trying to answer.

In order to make effective use of this particular social location we need first to be clear about the extent and scope of social stratification in antiquity. It is hard for people in the modern, industrial societies of the West to understand the pervasiveness of class conflict in ancient social relations. Yet it was a universal feature of the agrarian social system (Ste. Croix 1981) and impacted everyone in those societies all of the time. Moreover, when we take into account the fact that the gospels reflect the circumstances during (Mark) and shortly after (Matthew, Luke, John) the Jewish–Roman war (66–73 CE), social stratification becomes all the more important. As David Fiensy has shown, sharp ideological conflict over land ownership existed at the time the revolt broke out. The Israelite elite had come to see land as capital to be exploited, while peasants retained the older view that all the land was owned by Yahweh and given to Israelite families as inalienable plots meant to insure family subsistence (Oakman 1986: 38; Fiensy 1991: 1–20). Hostility was thus in large measure a rural–urban matter in which the zealot revolutionaries were closely identified with rural peasants. In Galilee especially, peasant hostility was aimed primarily at the cities (Horsley 1989: 87). The focus of the dispute was escalating debt and the subsequent loss of peasant land to the urban elite (Rostovzeff 1957; Brunt 1977: 151; Ste. Croix 1981: 7–19). Or as Richard Horsley and John Hanson put it, 'The Zealots, no matter how much their struggle was against the alien Roman oppressors, were first fighting a class war against their own Jewish nobility' (1985: 220–226).

Figure 8.2 Ancient grain mill found near Capernaum. Photo Richard Rohrbaugh

Stratification and the conflict it caused were thus an undeniable part of the social location of the gospels. It affected both authors and audiences. In order to understand this in more detail, however, it will be necessary to describe key social groups which would have been present in or had an impact on life in the area in which the first gospel (Mark) was produced: the villages and small towns of upper Galilee, southern Syria or Transjordan.[7] To structure our comments we will refer to the following diagrammatic description of social relationships in the Herodian period which is typical of advanced agrarian societies (Figure 8.3). It offers a good look at the socially stratified society in which Mark constructed his story of Jesus.

A brief description of five groups noted in Figure 8.3 will suffice to specify the respective positions in the social order that concern us. Each represents a different social location in a system of stratification. Each is likewise a potential audience for a gospel. As we go through the groups we shall carefully specify their presence in Mark's story in order to draw what conclusions we can about the rhetorical strategy he uses to persuade his readers. We will then go on to each of the other gospels in order to show the contrasts.

The urban elite

As Figure 8.3 makes clear, the urban elite made up about 2 percent of the total population. Along with the ruler, it included the highest ranking military officers, ranking priestly families, the Herodians, and other aristocratic families. Their wealth was based primarily on land ownership and taxation, which effectively drained the resources of the rural areas.[8] Being the only group with disposable income, they constituted the only real 'market' in the ancient economy.

This group maintained near total control of writing, coinage, taxation, the military, and judicial systems. Their control was aided by a religious and intellectual elite who typically became the keepers of what scholars call the 'Great Tradition.' Their mannerisms, vocabulary, speech patterns, and dress made the elite easily identifiable on the streets. While they remained physically, socially, and culturally isolated from the rest of the society, their behavior and lifestyle set the standard for the social aspirations of everyone else. The urban elite we can identify in Mark's Gospel are listed below (Figure 8.4).

Social conflict is prevalent in the Gospel of Mark, and much of it derives from the interaction between villagers and those listed in Figure 8.4 (note that all of Jesus' opponents come from this group or its retainers). Especially prominent on the list are the scribes. Evidence from ancient papyri suggests they often acted as agents of the urban aristocracy from whom they received rural appointments (Loeb, Select Papyri II: Non-Literary (Public Documents), IX.339: 393). Mark's readers, of course, are warned to:

> [b]eware of the scribes, who like to go about in long robes, and to have salutations in the market places and the best seats in the synagogues and the places of honour at feasts, who devour widow's houses and for a pretense make long prayers.

> (12:38–40)

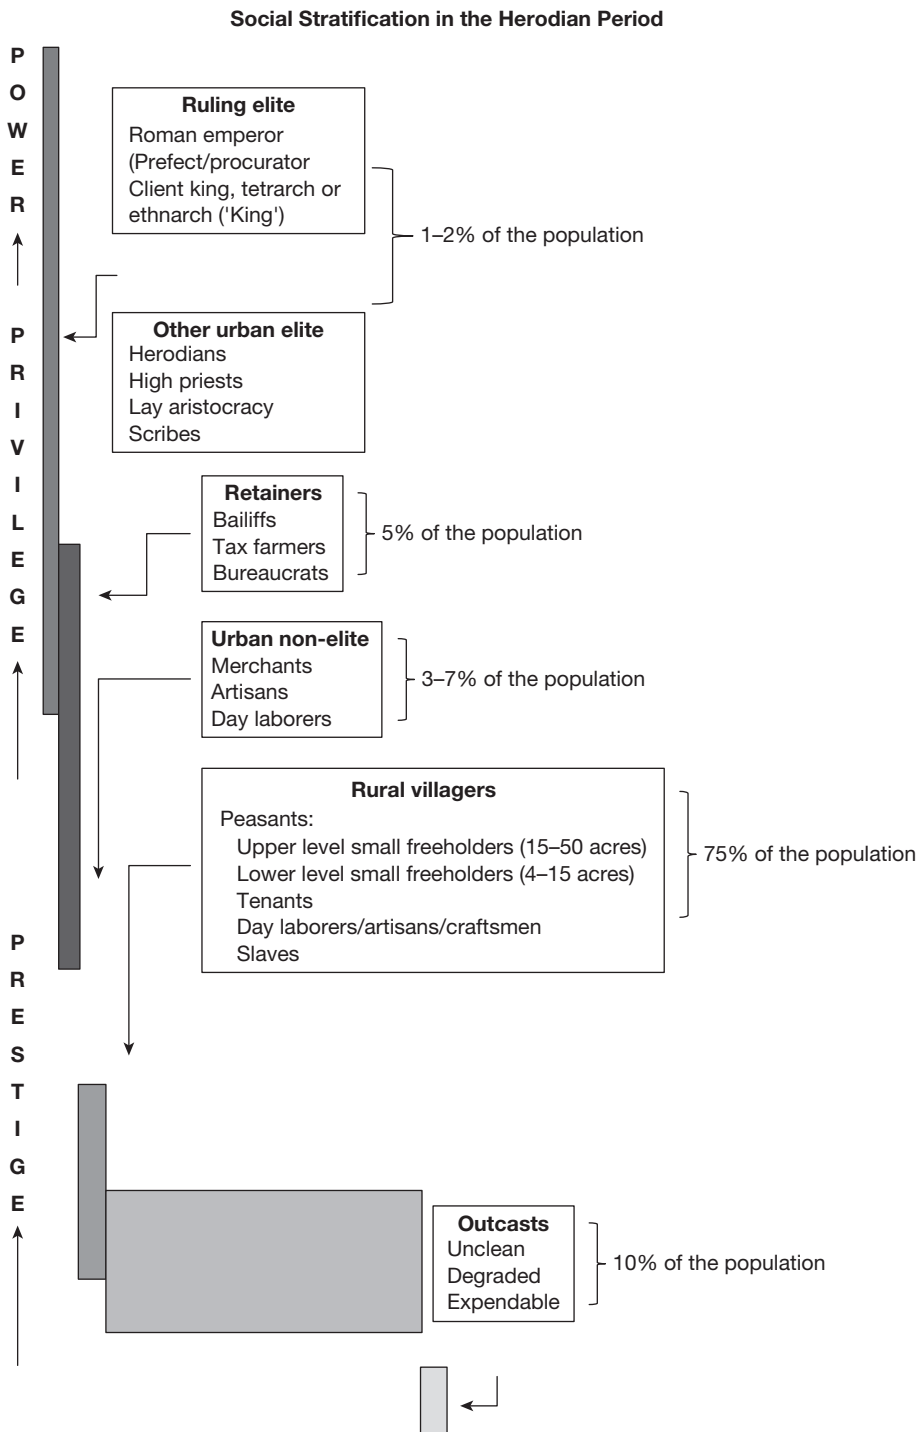
Social Stratification in the Herodian Period


Figure 8.3 Social stratification in the Herodian period. Diagram Richard Rohrbaugh

In Mark's Passion narrative, the scribes link up with Pharisees, elders (non-priestly aristocrats), and chief priests in opposition to Jesus. The Herodians and Sadducees join the opposition as well (3:1–6, 12:13–17, 18–27). Mark predicts that these groups will not only reject Jesus but destroy

The Urban Elite in Mark

Caesar 12:14, 17	Strong man 3:27
Pontius Pilate 15:2, 8, 15	Those who have 4:25
Rulers of the Gentiles 10:42	Elders 8:31; 11:27; 14:43, 53; 15:1
Herod 6:14; 8:15	Rich Man 10:22
Herodias 6:17	Wealthy 10:23, 25
Herodias' daughter 6:22	Vineyard Owner and Son 12:1, 6
Philip 6:17	Sadducees 12:18
Governors 13:9; 15:16	Family of seven brothers 12:20
High Priest 2:26; 14:47, 53, 54, 60, 61, 63, 66	Rich people 12:41
	Kings 13:9
Chief Priests 8:31, 10:33; 11:18, 27; 14:1, 10, 43, 53, 55; 15:1, 3, 10, 11, 31	Man going on a journey 13:34
	Owner of upper room 14:14
Scribes 1:22; 2:6, 16; 3:22; 7:1, 5; 8:31; 9:11, 14; 10:33; 11:18, 27; 12:28, 35, 38; 14:1, 43, 53; 15:1, 31	Joseph of Arimathea 15:43
	Jairus and his family 5:22, 23, 40

Figure 8.4   The urban elite in the Gospel of Mark him in the end (10:33). Nonetheless it should be noted that three persons listed in Figure 8.4 are exceptions to the near-universal opposition of the elite to Jesus: the scribe who is 'not far from the kingdom' (12:34), Joseph of Arimathea (15:43), and Jairus (5:21–43). These story-characters prevent us from excluding members of the elite from Jesus' following and may indicate that some such were part of the Markan community.

Retainers

At the lower levels of the elite group and ranging downward toward non-elite levels were those social scientists call retainers (Figure 8.5). This included lower level military officers, officials and bureaucrats such as clerks and bailiffs, personal retainers, household servants, scholars, legal experts, and lower level lay aristocracy. They worked primarily in the service of the elite and often acted as the brokers between the aristocracy and the rest of the population. What power they had depended on their relation to the urban elite.

Retainers in Mark

Pharisees 2:16, 18, 24; 3:6; 7:1, 3, 5; 8:11, 15; 10:2; 12:13	Physicians 2:17; 5:26
	Galilean priest 1:44
People from Jairus' house 5:35	Courtiers, officers 6:21
Men arresting John the Baptist 6:17	Judas Iscariot 14:11
Soldier of the guard 6:27	Tax collectors 2:15, 16
Levi 2:14	Moneychangers 11:15
Those selling in the temple 11:15	Doorkeeper 13:34
Servant-girl of High Priest 14:66	Soldiers 15:16
Crowd sent from Chief Priests, scribes and elders 14:43	Centurion 15:39
	Slave/servant 1:20; 9:35; 10:43, 44; 12:2, 4; 13:34; 14:47

Figure 8.5   Retainers in Mark

It is interesting that we see more people here who are followers of Jesus (the people from Jairus' house, Levi, tax collectors, and the centurion) than we found in the elite group. But the largest group on the list are the Pharisees and they stand in opposition. In Mark, they appear to be literate, local village leaders (in Mark, contra Josephus, the Pharisees are in Jerusalem only in 12:13) whom Anthony Saldarini characterizes as a group of retainers competing with the Jesus groups for influence among the non-elite (1988: 71).

In a controversy over ritual cleanliness (2:13–17; 7:1–23), Mark explains for his audience that Pharisees and Judeans (usually translated, incorrectly, 'Jews'; see the comments later on the Gospel of John) wash themselves and their eating vessels in keeping with the 'tradition of the elders.' This of course is the Great Tradition of the literate aristocracy that few peasants could afford to uphold. Note that in Mark's story, Jesus' disciples are clearly identified with this peasant inability (7:5) and that Mark's scribes show the typical aristocratic incomprehension of peasant attitudes or capabilities (Why do your disciples . . . ?). In his retort, Jesus not only defends the peasant attitude, but offers another example (7:9–13) in which he distances himself from the practices of the elite ('your' tradition).

Before leaving these two dominant groups, it is worth noting the sheer number of such people in Mark's story. That is surprising since little of Mark's story takes place in the cities where the elite and most of their retainers lived. Yet it must be remembered that it was by means of rural appointments given to retainers that the elite maintained their control in the rural areas.

Urban non-elite

A third group on our diagram (Figure 8.3), the urban non-elite or poor (Figure 8.6), plays a very minor role in Mark's story. It included small-scale merchants, artisans, day laborers, and a variety of service workers. In most agrarian societies this group represented about 3 to 7 percent of the total population. Their health and nutrition were often worse than in the villages, and life expectancies were shorter: a child born among the lower classes in the city of Rome during the first century had a life expectancy of only 20 years (Lenski and Lenski 1987: 249). Given the high death rates among the urban poor, the cities were able to absorb a constant stream of such persons from the rural areas with little or no gain in total population.

Because so little of Mark's story takes place in the urban areas, we are not surprised that this group plays an insignificant role in the overall story. In fact, there is only one such person here who can be clearly identified. The widow in 12:42 is being unwittingly victimized by the redistributive economic system of the temple (Wright 1982: 256–265).

Degraded, unclean, and expendables

Outside the walls of every ancient city lived the outcasts: beggars, prostitutes, itinerant day laborers, tanners, peddlers, bandits, sailors, gamblers, ass drivers, usurers, dung collectors, and even some merchants (Figure 8.7). They were present in both villages and cities, though much more numerous in the latter. All such persons were forced out of the cities at night when the gates were locked, but frequented the cities during the daytime to beg or find work. While not a large portion of the total population, one encountered these people everywhere. The living conditions and life chances of most of them were appalling.

Here we meet a surprise. Though outcasts were a relatively small percentage of the total population, there are 22 references to them in Mark's story. Eight times Mark gives us a summary of Jesus' interaction with them (1:28, 32–34, 45; 3:7–10; 6:31–34, 54–56; 7:36–37). Moreover, Mark wants us to know early on in his story that Jesus' healing activity among this group of people is a major reason for the reputation he develops (1:28). Two of those listed above, swineherds and porters, practiced despised occupations. The Syro-Phoenician woman may originally have been a person of higher status, though with a daughter afflicted by an unclean spirit villagers probably considered her a social deviant or perhaps even dangerous (Theissen 1984).

Urban Poor in Mark

Those buying in the temple (likely includes peasants) 11:15

Crowd/People 1:5; 11:18, 32; 12:12, 37, 41; 14:2, 43; 15:8, 11, 15

Widow 12:42

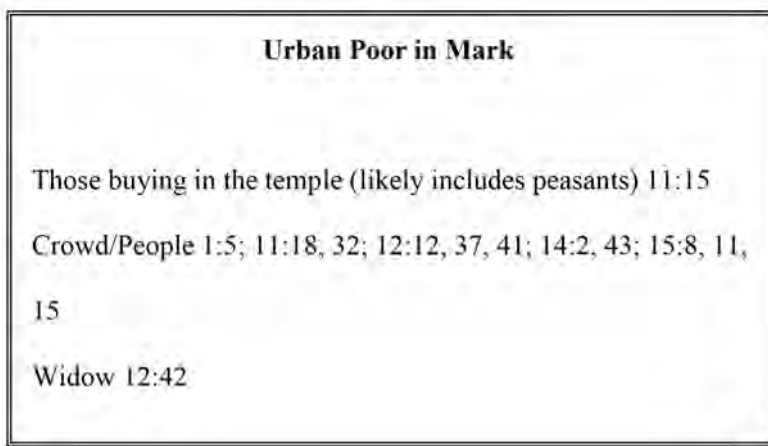

Figure 8.6 Urban poor in Mark

Outcasts Mentioned in Mark

Man with an unclean spirit 1:23	Syro-Phoneocian woman and daughter
The sick and demon possessed 1:32–34,	7:25, 26
39; 6:5, 13, 55; 9:38	Deaf man with speech impediment
Leper 1:40	Blind man 8:22
Paralytic 2:3	7:32
Man with withered hand 3:1	Boy with an unclean spirit 9:14
Those who have nothing 4:25	Blind Bartimaeus 10:46
Demoniac 5:2	Simon the Leper 14:3
Hemorrhaging woman 5:25	Swineherds 5:14
	Man carrying a jar 14:13

Figure 8.7 Outcasts in Mark

Rural peasants and other villagers

In agrarian societies 85 percent of the population lived in villages and were engaged in farming or extracting raw materials. They included freeholding peasants, tenant farmers, day laborers, slaves, and the various landless groups such as fishermen, artisans, and other craftsmen (Figure 8.8).

While estimating standards of living for freeholding peasants has proven a difficult task, there is little doubt that minimal survival levels were common. Yields were both low and unstable (Oakman 1986: 26), hence peasant debt leading to loss of land was widespread (Goodman 1982: 417–427; Oakman 1986: 57; Horsley 1989: 88–90; Fiensy 1991: 93). Aristocratic control of major portions of the arable land is well documented for the period following the revolt of 66 CE. On much of the land, therefore, absentee landowners were forced to employ tenant farmers, landless laborers, and slaves in producing their crops. (Fiensy 1991: 75–85). They often turned to cash-crops such as grapes rather than stick with subsistence crops like wheat and barley. Rents for tenants could go as high as two-thirds of a crop, though rabbinic sources more commonly mention figures ranging from one-fourth to one-half. While day laborers and slaves were often employed during the off season as cooks, messengers, scribes, manure gatherers, barbers, thorn gatherers, or building workers (Fiensy 1991: 86), they did much of the field work for large landowners during planting and harvest seasons. Of course, anyone without land of their own was near the bottom of the social–economic scale.

In addition to those already mentioned, most village and rural areas contained at least several other groups. Lower level retainers and lay aristocrats often provided village leadership. Artisans, craftsmen, fishermen, and herders were common as well, though few artisans or craftsmen could make a living in the smaller villages and thereby had to work in several locations. Because they lacked land or status, artisans usually had no means of making advantageous marriages, and family continuity was therefore somewhat precarious. It is of course among this last group that we must locate Jesus. The gospels call Jesus a tekton in Greek. It is usually translated 'carpenter,' but it could refer to any kind of worker in metal or wood. Legend has it that the family of Jesus made the yokes for oxen, which if true would place them among the poorest of the poor.

For all of these rural groups life was always at the margins of sustainability. In addition, fraud, robbery, forced imprisonment or labor, beatings, inheritance disputes, and forcible removal of rents were common. There are 15 reports or stories of violence in the Gospel of Mark alone (1:14, 45; 3:6, 27; 5:3; 6:16–28; 10:33–34; 12:1–8, 40, 41–44; 13:9–13; 14:1, 43–48; 15:7, 15–20). Widows, aged parents without children, or parents of abnormal children, the very young, the very old, those with diseases or deformities, and those without land were the most common victims. Suspicion of outsiders, fear and distrust of literate officials, and hatred of anyone who threatened subsistence were the social constants of ancient village life. In sum, poor housing, non-existent sanitation, constant violence, economically inaccessible medical care, and bad diet—as much as one-fourth of a male Palestinian peasant's calorie intake came from alcohol (Broshi 1989: 41–56)—leave us a long way from the world of the urban elite.

As one might expect, these various groups of rural persons, which were the overwhelming bulk of the population in ancient societies, are prominent throughout the story world of Mark.

Note the frequent mentions of the 'crowd' in the list below (Greek: ochlos; used 38 times in Mark, translated variously by the NRSV). It is Mark's equivalent for 'am ha' aretz: those poor uneducated peasants outside the law. It may also be an indicator of the social location of his own audience (Ahn Byung-mu 1981: 139 ff.; also Myers: 156). The rabbis of course taught that observant Jews should neither eat nor travel with the 'am ha' aretz though the Jesus of Mark did both (e.g., 2:13 ff.; 8:1 ff.). Those on the list from the Judean countryside (1:5), the sower (4:5), the tenants (12:1),

Peasants or Villagers in Mark
Those from the Judean countryside 1:5	Little ones 9:42
Peter, Andrew 1:16	Children 10:13
James, John, Zebedee 1:19–20	Bystanders in Bethphage 11:5
Simon's mother-in-law 1:30	Those buying in the temple (likely included
Jesus 6:3	urban poor as well) 11:15
Mary 6:3	Tenants 12:1
James, Joses, Judas, Simon and Jesus' sisters 6:3	Sower 4:3
Seed scatterer 4:26	Simon of Cyrene 15:21
Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James	Crowd 2:4, 13; 3:9, 20, 32; 4:1, 36; 5:21, 24, 27,
Joses, Salome 15:40	30, 31; 6:14, 17, 34, 39, 45; 7:14, 17, 33;
	8:1; 2, 6, 34; 9:14, 15, 17, 25; 10:1, 46

Figure 8.8   Peasants or villagers in Mark

the crowd (passim), and most of the other rural persons listed above were probably peasant farmers. As noted above, Jesus and his family were artisans. Though Mark does not mention the Bethlehem tradition, if Jesus' family was originally Judean we can assume that a predecessor there lost the land or they would not be trying to make a living in a tiny Galilean village.

Mark's story of Jesus

In looking over the five lists of characters in Mark cited above, we can safely say that his story world (which may or may not coincide with the real world) genuinely re-creates the sharply strati-fied agrarian society. Moreover, having described this world, we are now in a position to ask our primary questions. At whom is this story pitched? What would make it convincing? With whom is Mark intending linguistic convergence? With whom is linguistic divergence a likely possibility? And finally, from the vantage point of our chosen social location, stratification, what would make this story compelling?

It is not difficult to detect a certain defensiveness on Mark's part as he tells the story of Jesus' con-flicts with the elite. His Jesus repeatedly disregards the ritual standards to which the elite conformed as Israelites. He violates purity rules regarding persons (1:41; 2:13–14; 4:35–42; 5:24–28; 5:41; 7:24–30; 7:31) by coming in contact with the diseased, the dead, the malformed, and the possessed. He violates rules about the body (7:33; 8:23), about meal practice (6:37–44; 8:1–10), about times (2:24; 3:1–6), and about places (11:15–16; 12:33). Opponents admit Jesus' power, but (3:22–27) claim it has its origin in Satan. Demons, however, designate Jesus the 'Holy One of God' (1:24).

Mark's defense of Jesus is a spirited one. In both the baptism (1:10–11) and transfiguration (9:2–8) scenes, God acknowledges nothing less than kinship with Jesus. Mark also claims that the Scriptures offer justification (2:25–26; 7:6; 10:5; 11:17) for Jesus' actions—even though others judge them to be purity violations. He also quotes Jesus' saying that evil comes from inside the human heart rather than anything contacting the body from outside (7:18–23).

Of course, comments about such purity issues in Mark have long since become a scholarly com-monplace. Nonetheless, they frequently overlook a critical fact of peasant life: Jesus may have been seen as unholy and unwashed by the religious elite, and his behavior may have seemed to them iconoclastic or even perverse, but to a peasant it would have been nothing out of the ordinary at all. Most peasants could not maintain the Great Tradition even if they had wanted to. They came in constant contact with bodily secretions, dead animals, and unwashed food. Farming practices could not await Sabbaths and holy days: in dry-land farming with marginal or uneven rainfall, each day that passes between the first rains and plowing reduces the final yields. Neither could they always afford the prescribed sacrifices or guarantee the cleanliness of meal companions.

Figure 8.9   Ancient stone olive press. The name Gethsemane meant 'oil press' in Aramaic. Photo Richard
L. Rohrbaugh

We must point out therefore that the rules the Markan Jesus breaks having to do with dietary laws, washing, Sabbath observance, and temple sacrifice were most often those which peasants had the most difficulty keeping. Jesus' lifestyle would thus have been familiar to peasants in every respect. His defense of an internal purity rather than the externals of ritual practice might well have shocked them. But his lifestyle as such would not. Mark's argument is thus clear: purity before God is possible within the limits of a peasant way of life. And obviously a key point in relation to Mark's strategy is that in constructing his defense for Jesus, he is also defending his own community (Myers 1994: 35–36).

The conclusion we can draw from all this is that in telling the story of Jesus to rural villagers, Mark is telling them the story of one of their own kind. The story-Jesus and the readers come from the same social stratum. They occupy the same social location. As a rhetorical strategy this is a classic example of linguistic convergence. By locating his Jesus in the same social space as that occupied by the reader, Mark gains the reader's sympathy. He attracts and persuades. A story of this type might have had little appeal to a member of the urban elite (linguistic divergence), but it would have been both heartening and persuasive to villagers. They would learn from it that Jesus did what they usually could not do: resist the elite, practice incomplete observance of Torah, and yet claim the protection and care of God.

Alternative stories of Jesus

It is assumed by most New Testament scholars that Matthew and Luke are revisions of Mark; hence we can assume that in one way or another they found Mark inadequate for social interaction with their particular audiences. Yet surprisingly they do not change the fundamental nature or structure of the Markan story. In fact, if we were to list the characters in these two alternative gospels on our charts of the agrarian society, the results would not differ much from those for Mark. The story remains substantially one of Jesus' ministry to the poor of the rural areas along with his conflict with the urban elite or their retainers.

Both Matthew and Luke, however, have a problem. Their audiences are quite different than Mark's. Matthew's community, for example, has been described as a scribal brotherhood, and indeed many commentators have seen Matt. 13:52 ('a scribe who has been trained for the kingdom of heaven') as referring to the scribal status of the author himself (Overman 1990; Duling 1995).[9] If this is so, Matthew, and perhaps many of his readers, are in the retainer class. It is also clear that Luke writes for an audience higher on the scale than Mark's. He dedicates his Gospel to an elite patron, Theophilus (Robbins 1991; Alexander 1993). Moreover, his criticism of the rich makes clear that they are included in his audience (Karris 1978; Esler 1987: 164–200). In addition, Matthew and Luke were probably urbanites. As is often noted, Mark tells us that Jesus cannot go openly into a city [1:45], yet Matthew and Luke often locate him there.[10]

This means Matthew and Luke had different readers with whom to create linguistic and social convergence. It also means that they needed different rhetorical strategies if they were to persuade. Elite attitudes toward peasants in antiquity ranged from incomprehension and ignorance to suspicion and contempt. Village artisans, even admirable village artisans, were unlikely to inspire imitation. This meant that Mark's version of the Jesus story would have had little appeal to the audiences of Matthew and Luke; in fact, it would more likely have created linguistic divergence than sympathy and belief. We are not surprised, therefore, to find Matthew and Luke amending Mark's rhetorical strategy. A brief consideration of the core social value of Mediterranean antiquity makes clear why this was necessary.

Honor and shame

The core value of the Mediterranean society of the first century was honor. As Philo puts it, honor is that with which 'the majority of mankind are busy' (Det., 122). He claims that in Israel the title 'elder' goes not to the aged but to the honorable (Sob, 16). The body itself is protected by honor (Conf, 18), and people will sacrifice the well-being of their own children to gain it (Abr, 184). Aulus Gellius argues that serious punishment is justified in order to protect the honor of an offended party (Attic Nights 7.14.2–4). Plutarch acknowledges that the want of honor is deeply painful (Non Posse, 1100).

The language of honor is likewise pervasive in the New Testament: timē (John 4:44; Rom. 2:7; 2:10; 9:21; 12:10; 1 Cor. 12:23; 1 Thess. 4:4; 1 Tim. 1:17; 5:17; 6:1; 2 Tim. 2:20; Heb. 2:7; 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:7; 2 Pet. 1:17; Rev. 4:9; 4:11; 5:12; 19:1; 21:26), timāo (Matt. 15:8; John 5:23; Acts 28:10), entimos (Luke 14:8), doxa (John 5:41; 2 Cor. 6:8; Rev. 19:7), doxadzō (John 8:54; 1 Cor. 12:26), endoxos (1 Cor. 4:10), timios (Heb. 13:4); and for dishonor: atimos (Matt. 13:57; 1 Cor. 12:23).[11]

Very simply, honor was the status one claimed in the community, together with the all–important public recognition of that claim. Honor thus served as the key indicator of social standing and enabled persons to interact with social superiors, equals, and inferiors in socially approved fashion. Herodotus provides an interesting example:

> When they meet each other in the streets, you may know if the persons meeting are of equal rank by the following token: if they are, instead of speaking, they kiss each other on the lips. In the case where one is a little inferior to the other, the kiss is given on the cheek; where the difference of rank is great, the inferior prostrates himself upon the ground.
>
> (History, 1.134)

It is important to recognize that honor could be either ascribed or acquired. Ascribed honor derived from birth. Being born into an honorable family automatically made one honorable in the eyes of the entire community. The status thus gained was given or 'ascribed.' Because ascribed honor derived from birth, all members of the family, both male and female, were at roughly the same honor level.

By contrast, acquired honor was a matter of virtue. It was an achievement, a publicly acknowl–edged worthiness. Most of the gains or losses of honor were small and came as a result of normal daily interaction with others. Moreover, whatever gains one hoped to realize had to take place in public because the whole community had to acknowledge a gain in order to validate it. Above all, to claim honor the community did not recognize was to play the fool.

The honor of one's family had enormous consequences for daily living. It determined potential marriage partners, with whom one could do business, what functions could be attended, where one could live, and even the seating arrangements at a dinner party (Plutarch, Moralia, Table-Talk I, 2, VIII: 615D). Honor also legitimated authority, determining who talked and who listened. Moreover, since honor was a limited good, if one person gained honor, someone else always lost.[12] Envy was thus institutionalized and subjected anyone seeking to outdo his neighbors to hostile gossip and the pressure to share.

Moving Jesus up the scale

Concern for the honor of Jesus had significant implications for the rhetorical strategies of Matthew and Luke. In fact, Mark's village artisan Jesus (6:3) was so low on the honor scale (see the place of artisans in the diagram above), that in telling his story both Matthew and Luke needed to take dramatic action. How could they gain a sympathetic hearing for an illiterate village artisan among a literate, urban audience?[13] In their worlds, an artisan from a village like Nazareth was the kind of person who should be listening, not speaking.

The strategy both Matthew and Luke follow is to move Jesus as far up the honor scale as possible, thereby making him worthy of attention from those in their upscale audiences. Moreover, attempting to do this they had two basic options. One would be to address the ascribed honor status of Jesus, the other to address his acquired honor status. Elite audiences of course would expect ascribed and acquired honor to go hand in hand; hence in order to leave no doubt about the matter, Matthew and Luke actually make bold use of both options. Given the limits of space, however, we cannot describe these strategies comprehensively. Instead, we shall concentrate on illustrating one option with each author. We shall describe Matthew's arguments about Jesus' ascribed honor and Luke's regarding his acquired honor. Each is a key strategy in the respective author's strategy of persuasion.

Matthew

Let us look first at ascribed honor in the Gospel of Matthew. We have already suggested that this Gospel was written for people higher on the socio-economic scale than the readers of Mark and that both author and audience were probably urbanites (Wire 1991: 115–16).[14] Our argument is therefore that the level of Matthew's audience made it necessary for him to develop a different rhetorical strategy. But to catch the import of the particular strategy Matthew chooses we must pause for a brief look at the instructions offered in the ancient rhetorical schools for those who learned to write in Greek.

Greek handbooks called progymnasmata provided exercises in which students were taught to organize their remarks around a series of conventional topics (Kennedy 1994). For example, when writing an encomium (a speech or work in praise of someone), Hermogenes instructs his students to begin with the subject's origin and birth. They are to speak of 'race, as the Greek, a city, as Athens, a family as the Alcmaeonidae.' Next, they are told to describe 'what marvelous things befell at birth, as dreams or signs or the like' (cited by Malina and Neyrey 1996: 223, who quote Spengel, Rhetores Graeci, II.14.8–15.5).

This of course is exactly what Matthew does in his story of Jesus' origins. First, he gives Jesus a royal genealogy, harking back to the most honored ancestors of Israel: Abraham and David. Since ascribed honor comes from lineage, this is a brazen honor claim indeed. Moreover, it should be seen for exactly what it is in terms of social location: Matthew has just moved Jesus from one end of the social spectrum to the other. He has located him far above the status of village artisan. Note that in 13:55 when Jesus is challenged and insulted in his hometown of Nazareth, those who took offence at him did so by bringing up (1) his status as village artisan and (2) his genealogy. But having read the genealogy Matthew provides, the reader already knows differently.

The importance of genealogies is easy for modern readers to underestimate. In antiquity, lineage was not only a source of pride but also a device for self-aggrandizement (Rohrbaugh 2014). It was a claim to authority, to place, to political or civil rights, various social roles, or even the right to speak. Since genealogies justified privilege (office, inheritance, civil, political, and economic roles), they also were subject to considerable manipulation. Plutarch tells of a group of writers ingratiating themselves with noble Roman families by producing fictitious genealogies showing descent from Numa Pompilius (Numa. 21.2). To have a written pedigree, and especially a long one, was a mark of honor. It established social status (ascribed honor) and thereby provided the all-important map for proper social interaction (Rohrbaugh 2014: 315–323).

As recommended by Hermogenes, Matthew next tells of the 'marvelous things' which occurred at Jesus' birth. There are dreams (1:20; 2:12, 13, 19), astronomical phenomena (2:2, 10), angelic appearances (1:20), and even attending astrologers with wonderful gifts (2:1, 11). Quintilian also tells rhetorical students to note things that happened prior to the birth such as prophecies 'foretelling future greatness' (Inst. Orat. 3.7.10–18). Matthew provides these as well (1:23; 2:6).

According to the progymnasmata of Menander Rhetor, one of the first things the writer of an encomium should do is praise the city from which the subject comes, because honor is ascribed to those born in an honorable city (Treatise II 369.17–370.10). To pull this one off, however,

Figure 8.10   Loaves and fishes from the mosaic floor of the ancient church at Tabhga, near Capernaum
(Matt. 14:13–21). Photo Richard L. Rohrbaugh

Matthew had to resort to some deft literary gymnastics. When he quotes the prophet Micah regarding Bethlehem, he turns Micah's meaning around completely. Micah had called Bethlehem 'one of the little clans of Judah' (5:1). In Matthew that becomes:

> And you, Bethlehem, in the land of Judah, > are by no means least among the rulers of Judah;
> for from you shall come a ruler > who will govern my people Israel (Matt 5:6).[15]

In this way, Matthew tells of a Jesus who comes from a royal city, has royal ancestors, and is to be a ruler of Israel. For the Jesus who started as a village artisan in Mark, the entire social spectrum has been traversed.

Whether Matthew was acquainted with the instructions of the progymnasmata may be debated, but the impact of this strategy among those literate in Greek is beyond question. The retainer class especially was quick to take note of stories about royalty precisely because they were dependent upon this group for their place in the system. With stories of a royal Jesus, therefore, Matthew displays yet another classic example of linguistic convergence with a particular audience.

Luke

Our argument thus far has been that Matthew's social interaction with his audience made an honorific Jesus necessary. When we come to the Gospel of Luke, we are not surprised to see this same strategy at work. In the birth narrative Luke also moves Jesus up the social scale by means of an honorific genealogy, though here the claims are even more exaggerated.[16] To Luke, Jesus is not simply son of Abraham, son of David, he is son of God.

Yet in thinking about Luke's attempt to develop a persuasive argument, we shall not repeat the focus on ascribed honor. A different illustration is valuable in order to understand the broader issue of how gospel writers used rhetorical strategies which depend upon an understanding of the social system shared with readers. So this time let us address Luke's claims about Jesus' acquired honor.

In order to do this, we shall begin with comments on Luke's preface (1:1–4) precisely because it tells us so much about the location of Luke himself. If we know Luke's place, we can then answer the question about whether he is writing 'up' or 'down' to his particular audience. We will also be able to tell in what way the social location of the Jesus in his story would or would not be convincing.

A preface was a formal literary convention in antiquity, though Luke's preface is unique in the New Testament. In it he tells us about his decision to write, the reasons for it, and what he hopes to accomplish. Most importantly, he addresses the writing to an individual named Theophilus.

Such a beginning virtually begs comparison with other Greek writings of the time, and indeed recent research by Loveday Alexander has done just that. She has demonstrated a striking similarity between Luke's beginning and those of what she calls the 'technical writers' of the period. These were writers who composed works intended to be factually informative (Alexander 1986, 1993). Their writing is 'literate, but not literary.' It is not the classic prose of the literati, but neither is it the vernacular Koine of the papyri. It is 'middlebrow' writing ('Zwischenprosa') that is the work of someone who is not among the elite, but perhaps writes for them (Alexander 1993: 61).

Such writing typically comes from 'slaves or freedmen in great households, Greeks in Roman society, men obliged to support themselves by the exercise of their profession' (1993: 70). Unlike the literati, writers at this level do not evidence the typical elite Greek disdain for those who work with their hands, hence Alexander notes that Luke mentions Paul's tent-making 'in a totally matter-of-fact fashion in Acts 18:13' (1993: 70). Such writers in fact were very much like what Wayne Meeks calls the 'typical' urban Christian: a variety of free artisans and small traders (1982: 270, 1983: ch. 2). In the terms we have been using, such persons were located in the lower echelons of the retainer class and the upper levels of the urban non-elite.

Especially important in the preface is the fact that Luke addresses his Gospel to 'most excellent' Theophilus. Such addresses are common in literature produced for elite patrons. Josephus, for example, addresses his efforts to his patron, 'most excellent' Epaphroditus (preface to Antiquities 1.8; Life 430; Against Apion 1.1). Yet Josephus himself was hardly among the elite. Z. Yavetz locates him low in the royal entourage, 'in the same category as doctors, magicians, philosophers and buffoons' (1975: 432). Alexander places him at this same location (1986: 50). Both Josephus and Luke are thus writing for someone above them.[17]

Vernon Robbins has also characterized Luke as someone who is writing 'up' (1991: 323). That is, he writes as if to someone who is above him rather than in a position of equality (1991: 321). In fact, he addresses his patron the same way subordinates address superiors elsewhere in the book of Acts (23:26; 24:2, 24). The preface, therefore, tells us much about Luke's own social location and perhaps also about the social dynamics between author and addressee. The audience of Luke is perhaps the urban elite of which Theophilus would be typical.[18] The author himself is at neither end of the social spectrum. He is not among those who 'disdain the artisan class,' but neither does he think like 'the daily workers in the mines, fields, vineyards, or hillside grazing sheep and goats' (Robbins 1991: 320). Thus Luke may well have been a lower level retainer, perhaps even a slave or freedman in a great house, who wrote an orderly account for a patron above him.

If this is correct, we are in a position to ask: What does Luke do to make Jesus compelling to readers like Theophilus? How does he go about trying to create linguistic convergence? You will recall our comment earlier that honor claims had to be publicly acknowledged or the claimant had indeed played the fool. Thus when Luke offers a highly honorific genealogy for Jesus, he has made an honor claim which begged public recognition. That would be especially true for an audience like Theophilus, because people in his position paid attention only to publicly acknowledged honorific persons.

It is at this point that Luke offers the reader repeated assurances that Jesus is gaining the necessary public recognition. Acquired honor accrues to Jesus throughout the story. It also turns out to be a key element in Luke's persuasive strategy. No doubt the frequency with which Luke reports public acknowledgment of Jesus' honor seems unnecessary to modern readers who usually pass over such notices without a second glance. But these reports would have been the vitally important public confirmation ancient readers expected.

The number of times Luke reports public praise of Jesus is truly amazing.[19] Simeon praises the child in the temple (2:25–35). Anna does the same to all who will listen (2:38). His parents are amazed at his understanding (2:47). Luke tells us he increased in (divine and) human favor (2:52). John the Baptist publicly places Jesus higher than himself on the honor scale (3:16). A divine voice praises him and acknowledges his genealogy (3:22). The gossip network spreads his fame in the surrounding country and he is praised by everyone (4:14–15). All are amazed at him in the synagogue of Nazareth (4:22). In Capernaum they are astounded at his teaching (4:32) and his power over demons (4:36). Reports of him reach every place in the region (4:37). Word of his healing spreads abroad (5:15). He amazes onlookers by healing a paralytic and everyone is filled with awe (5:26). His reputation even reaches a high ranking Roman officer (7:3). After raising the son of the widow of Nain, Jesus is praised as a prophet (7:16), and his fame spreads throughout the region (7:17).

In 7:18, the reputation of Jesus reaches John the Baptist who sends disciples to inquire. They are asked to report what they have seen and heard (7:22). After Jesus forgives a woman of the city, those at the table with him are taken aback by what they have witnessed (7:49). His disciples acknowledge that he commands even the wind and water (8:25).

When Jesus heals a demoniac in the country of the Gerasenes, the swineherds tell everyone and the report spreads fear in the area (8:37). Jairus, a member of the elite, falls at Jesus' feet (a gesture of inferiority) to beg for his daughter's life. When she is healed, he is 'astounded' (8:56).

Figure 8.11 A Roman milestone on the Via Maris (Road to the Sea). One branch ran from Capernaum, south through Tiberius to the Plain of Esdraelon, and then west to the Mediterranean. Photo Richard L. Rohrbaugh

Luke reports that the reputation of Jesus even reaches the royal court (9:9). The crowds near Bethsaida also hear of him (9:11). Divine approval in the hearing of his disciples is again given to Jesus on the mountain (9:35). A great crowd is astounded at the healing of an epileptic boy, and indeed at everything he was doing (9:43). In 10:17, even demons submit to his name (honor, reputation). Later, when Jesus is casting a demon out of a mute person, the crowd is again amazed (11:14), though opponents look for an alternate explanation for what is happening (11:15). In 11:27, a woman publicly praises Jesus' mother (hence Jesus by implication) by calling her 'honored.'

Luke's hyperbole in 12:1 ('thousands,' 'trampled one another') implies a growing reputation as well. Later, in 13:17, we are told that Jesus' enemies have been 'put to shame' while the entire crowd rejoices at what he does. 'All' the people praise him when he heals a beggar in 18:43. When Jesus rides into Jerusalem to the praise of the disciples, Pharisees ask Jesus to quiet them. But Jesus replies that even the stones would cry out if the crowd did not (19:40). Later, when he teaches in the temple, we are told that the people were 'spellbound' by what they heard (19:48). Having decisively confounded those who publicly challenge him over payment of taxes, the narrator reports that even his opponents were amazed (20:26). And finally, in 21:38 we are told that people will even get up early in the morning just to listen to him in the temple.

Given the fact that all of these notices are constructed by the narrator, it is safe to say that concern for acquired honor, for public reputation, is critical to Luke's rhetorical strategy (of the 37 examples cited above, Luke has added 22 to Mark's story). Would a modern writer write this way? Unlikely. Would an ancient Mediterranean writer? Yes, indeed, if writing 'up'—that is, if writing for someone above himself in the social order, someone he knows will view public reputation as the justification for any claims the story makes.

Once again, therefore, we have seen a gospel writer relocate Jesus in order to make him palatable to the intended audience. By stressing the acquired honor of Jesus, Luke makes him worthy of Theophilus' attention. The social location of Jesus has once again been used as a strategy to create linguistic convergence.

Figure 8.12   Later synagogue at Capernaum, built over an earlier structure Jesus may have frequented (Luke 4:31–37). Photo Richard L. Rohrbaugh

John

When we come to the Gospel of John, we enter a different world. That is true not only in terms of the Gospel's content, but also in terms of its social location and rhetorical strategy. It does not emerge from the rural peasant world in the same way Mark does. Neither is it from the sophisticated urban worlds of Matthew and Luke. Jesus in the Gospel of John displays neither special identification with the poor nor the high level of honor worthy of elite urban readers. Something else drives John's unique portrait of Jesus.

John is almost certainly a Galilean gospel recounting the Jesus story for a mixed (Galilean, Samaritan, Gentile) community of Jesus' followers. Moreover, this community was likely what sociolinguist M. A. K. Halliday calls an 'anti-society,' that is, a group which exists within a dominant society but as a 'conscious alternative to it' (Halliday 1976: 570).[20] It was an alienated group which had been pushed (or withdrawn) to the social margins where it stood as a protest to the values of the larger society (Rohrbaugh 2004).

The scope and depth of this alienation is evident in the language of the Gospel itself. John's Jesus says to his disciples:

> If the world (the dominant society) hates you, be aware that it hated me before it hated you. If you belonged to the world, the world would love you as its own. Because you do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world—therefore the world hates you.
>
> (15:18–19; the same sentiment is repeated in the later > correspondence in the community in 1 John 3:13)

Figure 8.13 Jacob's Well, at a shrine near Schechem commemorating Jesus' encounter with the woman in John 4. Photo Richard L. Rohrbaugh

Later, Jesus repeats the sentiment. The disciples, he says, 'do not belong to the world, just as I do not belong to the world' (17:14; repeated in 17:16). They are in the world, but offer it no loyalty or love. 'In the world you will face persecution. But take courage; I have conquered the world!' (16:33).

This is tough talk. Yet it accurately conveys the temper of the group's relations with outsiders. As the story makes clear, the hostility of the group was especially aimed at Judeans. The Johannine group saw the larger Judean society as hostile to Jesus and therefore hostile to themselves. John's Jesus calls Judeans children of the devil (8:44), and they respond by claiming he is either a Samaritan or possessed by demons (8:48). Obviously, this is a group whose relations with the dominant society have gone sour.

It is in the midst of this social conflict that John locates Jesus. Like the Johannine community, Jesus is hated by the dominant society. Like Mark, John defends Jesus vigorously (attacking his opponents with equal vigor). But in doing so he makes a claim quite unlike anything in the Synoptics. There is no attempt here to locate Jesus next to the rural poor. Neither is there a move to push him up the scale of honor. Unashamedly, almost defiantly, John admits that Jesus is nothing.

The key issue in John is where Jesus is 'from.' We have already seen the importance of birth/origin because it determined honor, stature, public legitimacy, and authority. In the instructions of the progynasmata, we were told to pay great attention to birthplace because great people are born in great places. Obviously obscure Galilean villages like Nazareth would not qualify (John has no Bethlehem tradition). As Nathanael puts it, 'Can anything good come out of Nazareth?' (1:46; see also 7:52). Jesus cannot be counted as honorific on the basis of origin.

Jews/Judeans

In most English translations of John's Gospel we consistently encounter the unfortunate and incorrect translation 'Jews' (Greek: Ioudaioi). Contemporary meanings ascribed to the word 'Jew' come from much later medieval and even 20th century usage. Such modern connotations of 'Jew' or 'Jewishness' are absent from John's Gospel, hence it is simply inappropriate to project them into the text via faulty translation.

In John the Greek word Ioudaios means simply and only 'Judean.' Judea is precisely a place -- with its environs, air and water. 'Judean' thus designates a person from one segment of a larger ethnic group, 'Israel' (John 1:47,49), who comes from the place after which the segment is named, 'Judea' (Ioudaia). The correlatives of 'Judean' in John are 'Galilean' and 'Perean', and together they make up the whole of Israel. Israelites living in the homeland often made these finer distinctions, but outsiders usually did not. Thus in the parlance of the larger Greco-Roman world the whole region was simply known as 'Judea' and anyone with that homeland was called 'Judean' no matter where in the empire they might be living. The opposite of Israel is non-Israel, the nations other than Israel, or simply, 'the nations.'

The term Ioudaios (Judean) appears 70 times in John. It is used only 5 times in Matthew, 6 times in Mark and 5 times in Luke. This striking contrast between John and the Synoptics, makes understanding the term critically important.

Figure 8.14 Jew/Judean

John is aware of this. In John 7, while Jesus is at the Feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem, in the midst of a tense and potentially dangerous situation, a dispute arises in the crowd about whether Jesus might be the Messiah. Then someone in the crowd shouts, 'We know where this man is from.' Implication: he comes from a place of no account, hence could not be the Messiah. Another speaker puts it squarely: 'Surely the Messiah does not come from Galilee does he?' A third speaker reminds everyone that the Scripture foretells a Messiah from Bethlehem, from the house of David the king. The result is chaos and a near arrest.

It is right in the midst of all this that John's Jesus openly admits that his origin qualifies him for nothing. 'You know me, and you know where I am from' (7:28). But he then makes one of the central claims in all of the Gospel of John: 'I have not come on my own . . . but the one who sent me is true.' Granted Jesus' biological origins are nothing, but in John's eyes they are irrelevant because Jesus does not come in his own name.

Figure 8.15   Excavation at the Pool of Bethzatha. Jesus healed a man who had been there 38 years
(John 5:2–18). Photo Richard L. Rohrbaugh

Note that 43 times in John we are told that Jesus was 'sent' by God. This is language that appears only twice in Matthew (10:40; 15:24), once in Mark (9:37), four times in Luke (4:18, 43; 9:48; 10:16) and once in Paul (Rom. 8:3). But for John, this assertion that Jesus has been sent by someone higher (God) is the entire basis for his claim on people's attention. Jesus' place of origin is irrelevant because he claims absolutely nothing on his own. The relevant authority is the one who sent him.

The importance of this language about being 'sent' can be seen in another way. In antiquity, the 'sent' messenger was one who came from a patron, a person of unquestioned stature and authority. As broker, the messenger's only claim to fame was access to the patron, nothing more. He simply acted as an intermediary between the patron and those for whom the patron's message or largesse was intended. This broker role is the one Jesus plays throughout John's Gospel. Note that eight times we are reminded that Jesus will return to his patron (7:33; 13:1; 14:12, 28; 16:5, 10, 17, 28), suggesting that the broker has ready access to and from the patron who sent him.

Readers of John's Gospel will not find it difficult to sense a certain defensive tone about all this. The sheer repetition of the claim that Jesus was 'sent' is part of it. But so also are statements like:

> The Father who has sent me has himself testified on my behalf. You have never heard his voice or seen his form, and you do not have his word abiding in you, because you do not believe him whom he has sent.
>
> (5:37–38)

Later Jesus prays that 'the world may know that you have sent me' (17:23). Our argument is thus that John's claim that Jesus is 'sent' from God is intended as a defensive strategy meant to counteract the prevailing wisdom that one 'from' Nazareth could claim no public standing on his own. John agrees that Jesus has no standing, but he claims that as broker for God Jesus bears the authority of his patron.

One additional charge asserted by Jesus' Judean enemies may be added to all this. The typical instructions in the progynasmata remind a writer that after matters of origin and birth, the next conventional topic to be addressed when praising someone is the matter of nurture:

> Next comes 'nurture.' Was he reared in a palace? Were his swaddling clothes robes of purple? Was he from his first growth brought up in the lap of royalty? Or, instead, was he raised up to be emperor as a young man by some felicitous chance? If he does not have any distinguished nurture (as Achilles had with Chiron), discuss his education, observing here: 'In addition to what has been said, I wish to describe the quality of his mind.' Then you must speak of his love of learning, his quickness, his enthusiasm for study, his easy grasp of what is taught him. If he excels in literature, philosophy, and knowledge of letters, you must praise this.
>
> (Menander Rhetor Treatise II 371.17–372.2)

John's Jesus would not qualify on this score either. In 7:15, in the midst of the heated dispute in the temple, an early challenge is raised by someone in the crowd: 'How does this man have such learning, when he has never been taught?' Jesus had neither the proper origin nor the proper nurture/education. But once again Jesus' reply is typical of the strategy throughout the Gospel of John: 'My teaching is not mine but his who sent me' (7:16). It is as if the writer knows he can make no claims for Jesus that will stand up before either his Judean opponents or potential readers of the account. His recourse is thus to claim that Jesus was sent by God, speaks for God, speaks the words of God, and makes no claim of his own for either his origin or his teaching.

In sum, unlike Mark who simply recognizes Jesus as a rural peasant similar to his own audience, or Matthew and Luke who feel it necessary to move Jesus up the scale of honor to appeal to elite audiences, John's strategy is unique. He makes no claim for Jesus whatsoever. Everything ultimately comes from God; Jesus is simply the broker whom God has sent to speak on his behalf.

Later correspondence in the Johannine community

Before we leave the Johannine community, it is worth taking note of one additional feature of its language which will help us move beyond the Gospel and into the letters of 1, 2, and 3 John. Introversionist or anti-societal groups tend to produce language designed to foster close personal relationships among group insiders.[21] They do so as a means of reinforcing group solidarity in the face of hostility from the outside. It is thus no accident that the Gospel of John is filled with dialogues: the language of close, personal interaction. In other words, the many conversations of Jesus in John's Gospel are being used as part of his accommodation strategy. They help sustain close personal relations within the Johannine community itself.

This concern for close, personal relationships with Jesus and each other comes through clearly in Jesus' great prayer for his disciples: 'I ask . . . that they may all be one. As you, father, are in me and I am in you, may they also be in us' (17:20–21). It is also what makes the later correspondence in the Johannine community so fascinating. As fractures began to develop within the group, concern for group solidarity became increasingly intense. Readers of 1 John are reminded of the message they had heard from the beginning: 'that you should love one another' (3:11), and that 'he who loves God must love his brother also' (4:21). Those who break fellowship are excoriated in the most severe terms. 'Any one who hates a brother is a murderer.' 'If anyone says, "I love God", and hates his brother, he is a liar' (1 John 4:20; cf. John 17:21–23). The refusal of Diotrephes to receive group members and maintain group solidarity becomes especially painful (3 John 9–10).

The peculiar language of the Johannine community, then, with its concern for close personal relationships and group loyalty, together with its portrait of Jesus as the one the dominant society hated before it hated group members, all bespeak a social location of marginalization. From that precarious position, no attempt is made to finesse the lowly status of Jesus' origin or nurture. Jesus is nothing on his own. God is the source of all and God's honor is unassailable. Jesus has been 'sent' as God's broker and those who love him must follow him and stick together. That is not only the content of John's message, it is the character of his social interaction with his audience.

Conclusion

We started with the notion that language is a form of social interaction. It derives its meaning from a shared social system. We also argued that writers and speakers tend to accommodate language to their audiences in order to attain a specific social goal. They seek linguistic convergence that will gain a sympathetic hearing. Even the brief illustrations we have chosen demonstrate that to be true of the canonical gospels.

Mark accommodates his Jesus to the rural, village audience for which he writes. His Jesus story is a story in which the readers hear about themselves. Matthew and Luke accommodate their versions of the story to the urban elite. Among the many strategies they use (there are a number of others in addition to the ones we have chosen to illustrate here) is the attempt to move Jesus up the social ladder, to give him the honor status that would command attention from elite readers. John, by contrast, openly admits Jesus' lowly status and claims that any authority he has is derived from the one who sent him. Moreover, he uses the Jesus story to create and hold together the precarious personal relationships which always characterize anti-societal groups.

Each of these is a strategy to persuade. Each is an attempt at linguistic convergence. While additional rhetorical devices or persuasive strategies exist in each gospel, those we have chosen to illustrate are among the most important precisely because their persuasive power derives from one of the great realities of ancient social life: status stratification. Moreover, it should be clear to modern readers that for people like us, seeing these strategies at work is totally dependent on learning our way into the shared social system of antiquity.

Notes

1 Studies of classical rhetoric are numerous. See especially Kennedy. For its application to New Testament study, see the work by Ben Witherington 2002, 2009.

2 For a discussion of this in relation to the Gospel of John, see Malina 1994.

3 We thus intend to concentrate on what we might call a writer's 'rhetorical strategy.' By this we mean the social impact a text is designed to have upon its readers. As John Elliott has put it, 'I prefer the term "strategy" rather than "purpose" or "intention" because, as in the strategy of a game plan or the tactics of military warfare, strategy implies not simply the communication of ideas but the deliberate design of a document calculated to have a specific social effect on its intended hearers or readers' (1990: 10–11).

4 The long-standing scholarly debate about the origin of Mark's Gospel continues apace. Michael J. Kok (2015) has recently argued that in spite of the nearly unanimous patristic claim that Mark was the 'interpreter' of Peter, the Gospel gained a meagre and often mixed reception from patristic writers who thought it was too easily adapted to legitimate the claims of rival factions. He concludes that the association with Peter was a second-century move to claim ownership of the Gospel by an emergent orthodoxy.

5 A complete discussion of the concept and its usefulness to New Testament scholars can be found in my article on the topic (Rohrbaugh 1987). For its application to the Gospel of Mark, see Rohrbaugh 1993. The comments below are in large part a summary of that article.

6 There are many studies of social stratification in the agrarian societies of antiquity. Among the best are MacMullen 1974, Ste. Croix 1981, Lenski 1984, Stavenhagen 1975. On the anachronistic, but so-called scholarly 'consensus' that early Christians were middle class, see Rohrbaugh 1984. For the application of the issues involved to New Testament study, see Fiensy 1991, Oakman 2000, Hanson and Oakman 2008.

7 For the most recent and thorough case for this location see Marcus 2000.

8 As in most agrarian societies, between 1 and 3 percent of the population owned a near majority of the arable land. David Fiensy (1991) reports evidence of aristocratic estates varying from 50–2,500 acres. By contrast, he estimates the average peasant plot at six acres or less.

9 A review of the many recent studies on this matter, together with a full discussion of the Matthean community as a scribal brotherhood marginalized by those of their own social status, is offered by Duling 2012.

10 In fact, one half of the references to the city (polis) in the New Testament are in Luke and Acts. Matthew has the Galilean ministry in the cities (9:1; 10:5, 11, 15, 23; 11:1, 20). See Overman 1990; Rohrbaugh 1991.

11 Plutarch makes a modest attempt at exploring the semantic field of honor by commenting on Greek equivalents for the Latin term honor. He suggests doxa and timē as appropriate substitutes for his Greek readers (Moralia IV, 266). For a much more substantial semantic field, see Malina and Neyrey (1991: 46).

12 This was even true in respect to God: 'God's honour is set at naught by those who deify the mortal with honour that belongs to the imperishable' (Philo, Ebr, 110).

13 Whether Jesus was literate has been a matter of some debate. He is depicted as reading only in Luke (4:16), though that is likely a projection of Luke's own world onto Jesus. See Bar-Ilan (1991) contra the wildly overstated views of Shmuel Safrai (1976; also: Josephus Contra Apion, 2.204; Ant. 4.211; Philo Ad Gaium, 115, 210). Harris (1989) provides a comprehensive discussion of ancient literacy. See Hezer (2001) for Jewish literacy in Roman Palestine. As she makes clear, the probability that a village artisan in this period was literate is near zero.

14 A number of the chapters in Balch (1991) also deal with this matter at length.

15 Brown (1977: 184–187) provides a full discussion of the Matthew quotation. It matches neither the Hebrew (MT) nor the Greek (LXX) texts, both of which are making a point about the insignificance of Bethlehem. The few attempts to argue for textual variants rather than deliberate change are somewhat tortured and not widely accepted. What none of the discussions of this quotation to date have recognized is the social significance of the Matthean changes.

16 For a full discussion of this strategy in the opening chapters of Luke, see Rohrbaugh 1995.

17 In addition to Alexander, discussion of Theophilus as Luke's patron can be found in Robbins 1991.

18 Many scholars have argued this location for the audience of Luke. See Robbins 1991, Downing 1982, Kany (Braun 1986: 9, n. 5), and Rohrbaugh 1995. As far back as 1927, H. J. Cadbury argued that the Gospel of Luke represented an urban point of view.

19 Extended comment on the scope and function of gossip networks in honor-shame societies can be found in Rohrbaugh 2001.

20 For an extensive treatment of the Gospel of John as anti-language, see Petersen 1993. Unfortunately, Petersen treats anti-language as a largely literary phenomenon, leaving unacknowledged the relationship between anti-language and anti-society.

21 For a discussion of the Johannine group as an introversionist sect, see Esler 1994: 70–91.

Bibliography

Ahn, B. (1981) 'Jesus and the Minjung in the Gospel of Mark,' in CTC-CCA (eds) Minjung Theology: People as the Subjects of History. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis.

Alexander, L. (1986) 'Luke's Preface in the context of Greek preface-writing,' Novum Testamentum 28: 48–74.

Alexander, L. (1993) The Preface to Luke's Gospel. SNTS Monograph Series, 79. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Anderson, P. N. (2011) The Riddles of the Fourth Gospel: An Introduction to John. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Arnal, W. E. (2001) Jesus and the Village Scribes: Galilean Conflicts and the Setting of Q. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Aune, D. E. (ed.) (2001) The Gospel of Matthew in Current Study: Studies in Memory of William G. Thompson. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Balch, D. L. (ed.) (1991) Social History of the Matthean Community. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Bar-Ilan, M. (1991) 'Illiteracy in the land of Israel in the first centuries C.E.,' in S. Fishbane and S. Schoenfeld (eds) Essays in the Social Scientific Study of Judaism and Jewish Society. Hoboken, NJ: 46–61.

Barton, C. A. (2001) Roman Honor: The Fire in the Bones. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Blasi, A. (1996) The Sociology of Johannine Christianity. Lewiston, NY: Mellen.

Boring, E. M. (2006) Mark: A Commentary. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Braun, W. (1995) Feasting and Social Rhetoric in Luke 14. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Broshi, M. (1989) 'The diet of Palestine in the Roman period: Introductory notes,' The Israel Museum Journal 5: 41–56.

Brown, R. E. (1977) The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in Matthew and Luke. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Brown, R. E. (1979) The Community of the Beloved Disciple. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press.

Brunt, P. (1977) 'Josephus on social conflicts in Roman Judea,' Klio 59: 149–153.

Cadbury, H. J. (1927) The Making of Luke-Acts. 2nd ed., 1958. New York: Macmillan.

Carney, T. F. (1973) 'Prosopography: Pitfalls and payoffs,' Phoenix 27: 156–179.

Carney, T. F. (1975) The Shape of the Past: Models and Antiquity. Lawrence, KS: Coronado Press.

Craffert, P. F. (2008) The Life of a Galilean Shaman: Jesus of Nazareth in Anthropological-Historical Perspective. Eugene, OR: Cascade.

Crossan, J. D. (1991) The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant. San Francisco, CA: HarperSanFrancisco.

De Silva, D. A. (2000) Honor, Patronage, Kinship and Purity: Unlocking New Testament Culture. Downers Grove, IL: Intervarsity.

Downing, G. F. (1982) 'Common ground with paganism in Luke and Josephus,' New Testament Studies 28: 546–559.

Duling, D. C. (1995) 'The Matthean brotherhood and marginal scribal leadership,' in P. F. Esler (ed.) Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context. London: Routledge: 159–181

Duling, D. C. (2010) 'The Gospel of Matthew,' in D. E. Aune (ed.) The Blackwell Companion to the New Testament. Malden, MA: Wiley–Blackwell: 296–318.

Duling, D. C. (2012) A Marginal Scribe: Studies in the Gospel of Matthew in a Social-Scientific Perspective. Eugene, OR: Cascade.

Elliott, J. H. (1987) 'Patronage and clientelism in early Christian society,' Forum 3(4): 39–48.

Elliott, J. H. (1990) A Home for the Homeless: A Social Scientific Criticism of 1 Peter, Its Situation and Strategy, rev. edn. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Esler, P. F. (1987) Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivation for Lucan Theology. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Esler, P. F. (1994) The First Christians in Their Social Worlds. London: Routledge.

Fiensy, D. A. (1991) The Social History of Palestine in the Herodian Period: The Land Is Mine. Lewiston, ID: Mellen.

Fisher, N. R. E. (1992) Hybris: A Study in the Values of Honor and Shame in Ancient Greece. Warminster, UK: Aris & Phillips.

Garnsey, P. (1970) Social Status and Legal Privilege in the Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Georgi, D. (1972) 'The records of Jesus in light of ancient accounts of revered men,' in L. McGaughey (ed.) Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers, Vol. 2. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press: 527–542.

Giles, H. and Wiemann, J. M. (1987) 'Language, social comparison and power,' in C. R. Berger and S. H. Chaffee (eds) Handbook of Communication Science. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage Publications: 350–384.

Giles, H., Mulac, A., Bradac, J. J. and Johnson, P. (1987) 'Speech accommodation theory: The first decade and beyond,' in M. L. McLaughlin (ed.) Communication Yearbook 10. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage Publications: 13–48.

Gilmore, D. D. (ed.) (1987) Honor and Shame and the Unity of the Mediterranean. Special Publication of the American Anthropological Association 22. Washington, DC: American Anthropological Association.

Goodman, M. (1982) 'The first Jewish revolt: Social conflict and the problem of debt,' Journal of Jewish Studies 33: 417–427.

Guijarro Oporto, S. (2004) 'Domestic space, family relationships and the social location of the Q people,' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 271: 69–81.

Halliday, M. A. K. (1976) 'Antilanguages,' American Anthropologist 78: 570–584.

Halliday, M. A. K. (1978) Language as Social Semiotic: The Social Interpretation of Language and Meaning. London: Edward Arnold.

Hanson, K. C. and Oakman, D. E. (2008) Palestine in the Time of Jesus: Social Structures and Social Conflicts. 2nd ed. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Harris, W. V. (1989) Ancient Literacy. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Heen, E. M. (2006) 'Radical patronage in Luke-Acts,' Currents in Theology and Mission 33(6): 445–458.

Hezer, C. (2001) Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Hodge, R. and Kress, G. (1988) Social Semiotics. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Horsley, R. (1989) Sociology and the Jesus Movement. New York: Crossroad.

Horsley, R. and Hanson, J. (1985) Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs. Minneapolis, MN: Winston.

Kany, R. (1986) 'Der lukanische Bericht von Tod und Auferstehung Jesu aus der Gesicht eines hellenistischen Romanlesers,' Novum Testamentum 28: 75–90.

Karris, R. J. (1978) 'Poor and rich: The Lucan Sitz im Leben,' in C. H. Talbert (ed.) Perspectives on Luke-Acts. Danville, VA: Association of Baptist Professors of Religion.

Kennedy, G. A. (1994) A New History of Classical Rhetoric. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Kok, M. J. (2015) The Gospel on the Margins: The Reception of Mark in the Second Century. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Lenski, G. (1984) Power and Privilege: A Theory of Social Stratification. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press.

Lenski, G. and Lenski, J. (1987) Human Societies: An Introduction to Macrosociology. 5th ed. New York: McGraw-Hill.

MacMullen, R. (1974) Roman Social Relations 50 BC–AD 284. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Malina, B. J. (1994) 'John's: The maverick Christian group. Evidence from sociolinguistics,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 24: 167–184.

Malina, B. J. and Neyrey, J. H. (1991) 'Honor and shame in Luke-Acts: Pivotal values of the Mediterranean world,' in J. H. Neyrey (ed.) The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Malina, B. J. and Neyrey, J. H. (1996) Portraits of Paul: An Archaeology of Ancient Personality. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox.

Malina, B. J. and Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1998) Social Science Commentary on the Gospel of John. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Malina, B. J. and Rohrbaugh, R. L. (2003) Social Science Commentary on the Synoptic Gospels. 2nd ed. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Markus, J. (2000) Mark 1–8. A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. Anchor Bible 27, vol. 1. New York: Doubleday.

Meeks, W. A. (1982) 'The social context of Pauline theology,' Interpretation 36(3): 266–267.

Meeks, W. A. (1983) The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Meeks, W. A. (1986) The Moral World of the First Christians. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster.

Miller, A. C. (2014) Rumors of Resistance: Status Reversals and Hidden Transcripts in the Gospel of Luke. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Miller, A. C. (2015) 'Good sinners and exemplary heretics: The sociopolitical implications of love and acceptance in the Gospel of Luke,' Review and Expositor 112(3): 461–469.

Moxnes, H. (1988) The Economy of the Kingdom: Social Conflict and Economic Relations in Luke's Gospel. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Moxnes, H. (2003) Putting Jesus in His Place: A Radical Vision of Household and Kingdom. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press.

Myers, C. (1994) Binding the Strong Man: A Political Reading of Mark's Story of Jesus. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis.

Neusner, J., Borgen, P., Frerichs, E. S. and Horsley, R. (eds) (1988) The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Neyrey, J. H. (1994) 'Josephus' VITA and the encomium: A native model of personality,' Journal for the Study of Judaism 25: 177–206.

Neyrey, J. H. (1998) Honor and Shame in the Gospel of Matthew. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox.

Neyrey, J. H. (2009) The Gospel of John in Cultural and Rhetorical Perspective. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Neyrey, J. H. and Stewart, E. (2008) The Social World of the New Testament: Insights and Models. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Nolan, P. and Lenski, G. (2004) Human Societies: An Introduction to Macrosociology. 9th ed. Boston, MA: McGraw-Hill.

Oakman, D. E. (1986) Jesus and the Economic Questions of His Day. Lewiston, ID: Mellen.

Oakman, D. E. (2000) 'Economics of Palestine,' in C. A. Evans (ed.) Dictionary of New Testament Background. Downers Grove, IL: Intervarsity: 303–308.

Oakman, D. E. (2008) Jesus and the Peasants. Eugene, OR: Cascade.

Oakman, D. E. (2012) The Political Aims of Jesus. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Overman, J. A. (1990) Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: A Study of the Social World of the Matthean Community. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Petersen, N. R. (1993) The Gospel of John and the Sociology of Light: Language and Characterization in the Fourth Gospel. Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International.

Riches, J. K. (2005) 'Matthew's missionary strategy in colonial perspective,' in J. K. Riches and D. C. Sim (eds) The Gospel of Matthew in Its Roman Imperial Context. London: T&T Clark: 128–142.

Robbins, V. (1991) 'The social location of the implied author of Luke-Acts,' in J. H. Neyrey (ed.) The Social World of Luke Acts: Models for Biblical Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson: 305–332.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1984) 'Methodological considerations in the debate over the social class status of early Christians,' Journal of the American Academy of Religion 52: 519–546.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1987) '"Social location of thought" as a heuristic construct in New Testament study,' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 30: 103–119.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1991) 'The pre-industrial city in Luke-Acts: Urban social relations,' in J. H. Neyrey (ed.) The Social World of Luke Acts: Models for Biblical Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson: 121–151.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1993) 'The social location of the Markan audience,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 23(3): 114–127.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (1995) 'Legitimating sonship: A test of honor. A social science study of Luke 4:1–30,' in P. F. Esler (ed.) Modelling Early Christianity. London: Routledge: 183–197.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (2001) 'Gossip in the New Testament,' in J. J. Pilch (ed.) Social Scientific Models for Interpreting the Bible: Essays by The Context Group in Honor of Bruce J. Malina. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill: 239–259.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (2004) 'What's the matter with Nicodemus? A social science perspective on John 3:1–21,' in H. Hearon (ed.) Distant Voices Drawing Near: Essays in Honor of Antoinette Clark Wire. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press: 145–158.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (2007) The New Testament in Cross Cultural Perspective. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (2009) 'Honor: Core value of the Biblical world,' in R. DeMaris and D. Neufeld (eds) The Social Context of the New Testament. New York: Routledge: 109–125.

Rohrbaugh, R. L. (2014) 'The social function of genealogies in the New Testament and its world,' in S. K. Black (ed.) To Set at Liberty: Essays on Early Christianity and Its Social World in Honor of John H. Elliott. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Phoenix: 311–347.

Rostovzeff, M. (1957) Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Safrai, S. (1976) 'Education and the study of Torah,' in S. Safrai, and M. Stern (eds) The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions. CRINT 1/2. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press: 945–970.

Saldarini, A. J. (1988) 'The social class of the Pharisees in Mark,' in J. Neusner et al. (eds) The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism: Essays in Tribute to Howard Clark Kee. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press: 69–77.

Scott, J. C. (1985) Weapons of the Weak: Everyday Forms of Peasant Resistance. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Stavenhagen, R. (1975) Social Class in Agrarian Societies. New York: Anchor Books.

Ste. Croix, G. E. M. (1981) The Class Struggle in the Ancient Greek World: From the Archaic Age to the Arab Conquests. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Stegemann, E. W. and Stegemann, W. (1995) Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte. Berlin: Kohlhammer.

Theissen, G. (1984) 'Lokal- und Sozialkolorit in der Geschichte von der syrophönikischen Frau (Mk 7:24–30),' Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 75: 205–225.

Theissen, G. (1991) The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History of the Synoptic Tradition. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress.

Von Wahlde, U. C. (2010) The Gospel and Letters of John, Vol. 1, Introduction, Analysis, and Reference; Vol. 2, Commentary on the Gospel of John; Vol. 3, Commentary on the Three Johannine Letters. Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans.

Winn, A. (2014) 'Tyrant or servant? Political ideology and Mark 10.42–45,' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 36(4): 325–352.

Wire, A. C. (1991) 'Gender roles in a scribal community,' in D. L. Balch (ed.) Social History of the Matthean Community: Cross-Disciplinary Approaches. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press: 87–121.

Witherington, B. (2002) 'Rhetorically writing: The New Testament authors used every tool of the trade to influence their listening audiences,' Bible Review 18(6):14, 62.

Witherington, B. (2009) New Testament Rhetoric: An Introductory Guide to the Art of Persuasion in and of the New Testament. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Wright, A. (1982) 'The widow's mite: Praise or lament?,' Catholic Biblical Quaerterly 44: 256–265.

Yavetz, Z. (1975) 'Reflections on Titus and Josephus,' Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies 16: 431–432.

Yee, G. A. (2007) 'Recovering marginalized groups in Ancient Israel: Methodological considerations,' in R. B. Coote and N. K. Gottwald (eds) To Break Every Yoke. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Phoenix: 10–27.

9

THE SECOND AND THIRD CENTURIES

Jeffrey S. Siker

Introduction

Christianity in the second and third centuries was a time of both significant fluidity and consolidation of Christian identities all at the same time. This time period has traditionally been less studied than either the origins of Christianity in the first century or the patristic era of Christianity that reached its zenith in the fourth and fifth centuries. Indeed, the second and third centuries of Christianity are often referred to as 'post' and 'pre.' This time period is termed 'post-apostolic' or 'post-New Testament' since it comes after the formative period of first-century Christianity, after the first generation of Christians had died, after most of the New Testament writings had been composed. But second- and third-century Christianity is also termed 'pre-Constantinian' or 'ante-Nicene' since it comes before the rise to power of the emperor Constantine the Great in 306 CE and with him the beginnings of a state-established Christendom. It is referred to as 'ante-Nicene' because it comes before the first Council of Nicaea (325 CE), which was convened by Constantine and which was important in setting the course for the church thereafter.

But the second and third centuries are far more than just a muddle between the origins of Christianity in the first century and the maturing of Christianity into an imperially supported religion with developed structures and creedal statements in the fourth century and beyond. The developments of Christianity in the second and third centuries are of great significance in their own right, and should not be seen in any way as a series of blips between the time of Jesus and the apostles on the one side and the time of Constantine and Eusebius (the most eminent early church historian; c. 263–c. 339/40 CE) on the other. In part, the importance of this time period can be seen from the number of other chapters in this volume that touch directly on central developments in early Christianity that have to do principally with second- and third-century Christianity (see Chapters 12–14, 27–29, 38, 47–49).

One reason for the somewhat modest attention to Christianity in the second and third centuries has to do with the relative lack of primary sources for this period. In comparison with post-Nicene Christian writings, materials from the second and third centuries are less than abundant. For example, one widely used collection, The Ante-Nicene Fathers (published 1885–1896, and now widely available online), includes most second- and third-century Christian writings in nine volumes (with a tenth volume as an index). It includes the writings of the so-called Apostolic Fathers, the apologists (especially Justin Martyr), Clement of Alexandria, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Origen, Hippolytus, Cyprian, and the New Testament Apocrypha, among others. By contrast, the collection of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (NPNF, published 1886–1900, also available online) takes 28 volumes, consisting primarily of Augustine, Jerome, and Chrysostom (fourth- to sixth-century writings), with many other voices from the period not represented.

Another reason, perhaps, for the relative lack of attention to second- and third-century Christianity is because the developments in Christianity during this time are multidirectional and not readily mapped. It is messy. Whereas the first century of Christianity, despite significant diversity, had a basic cohesion apparent in the Gospel writings or the movement of the Pauline churches, and the fourth and fifth centuries had the pressures of imperial and conciliar organizational and unifying structures, second- and third-century Christianity was immensely diverse in character, more so in many ways than what came before or what followed. There are many ebbs and flows that defy neat categorization as different forms of Christian expression emerged and changed, all shaping and contributing in dynamic ways to the complex character of the Christianities within Christianity of this era.

Separation from Judaism

One of the significant scholarly debates over the last generation has revolved around how and when to locate the formation of 'Christianity' as a separate religious movement from 'Judaism,' recognizing that neither tradition has ever been monolithic (see Lieu 1996, 2002). Some scholars argue that even to use the terms 'Christians' and 'Jews' to describe the first-century phenomena is anachronistic and inaccurate. There are certainly markers for the separation of what came to be called 'Christianity' from its Jewish heritage, mostly having to do with the fundamental shift from a religious movement within Judaism (including Jesus as a Jewish messianic figure linked to Jewish scriptures) to a religious movement comprised increasingly of Gentile believers whose identity was no longer shaped by observance of Jewish law or ritual, but by their faith in Jesus as the crucified and risen messiah, the divine Son of God. While the influx of Gentile believers clearly began in earnest already with the work of the apostle Paul in the mid first century, there is little consensus about when the 'split' occurred between Christians and their elder Jewish siblings. To what degree did the disagreements about the identity of Jesus remain an intramural fight within the bounds of Judaism (see Saldarini 1994), and when did this dispute become fundamentally extramural? The situation is complicated by the simple observation that such separation took place at different times in different places over different factors. Thus, already in the first century, Paul can establish a house-church next door to the synagogue in Corinth (if Acts 18 is to be believed). And yet in the middle of the second century, Justin Martyr can acknowledge that there are some Christ-believers who continue to observe Jewish law (Dialogue 47). Even in the fourth century we find John Chrysostom preaching against Christian observance of Jewish ritual and festivals (Against the Jews). Scholars are thus divided about what has come to be called 'the parting of the ways,' to such an extent that one volume in the debate is entitled The Ways That Never Parted (Becker and Reed 2003). Was the Jewish War of 66–70 the most significant marker (so Dunn 1991)? Or the Bar Kochba Revolt of 132–135 (so Wilson 1995)? Or was there an ebb and flow that simply defies any simple rhetoric of separation (so Boyarin 2004)?

It is clear, however, that what had begun as a messianic movement within the first-century Jewish world had by the second and third centuries evolved into a largely Gentile religious movement rooted in Jewish scriptures, but increasingly divorced from the Jewish people and their faith practices. If Christians in the first century could see themselves still within the larger framework of Judaism (as apparently Paul and Matthew arguably could), Christians in the second century not only moved away from Judaism, but often did so in ways that sharply rejected and repudiated Judaism (e.g., Melito of Sardis, Justin Martyr, Tertullian), even more so than did Christian writings of the first century directly engaged in the heat of polemic (e.g., in the Gospel of John).

Christians claimed the ancient heritage of Judaism for themselves by virtue of the Jewish Scriptures (and so appealed to Roman respect for antiquity) and yet characterized the Judaism of its day as an inferior and now God-forsaken religious tradition. Christians typically saw themselves as a new genos, a new people, quite apart from Judaism (see New Testament antecedents in 1 Peter 2:9; 2 Cor 3:6; 5:17; and Gal 6:15). For example, the second-century Apology of Aristides argues that 'there are four classes of men in this world: Barbarians and Greeks, Jews and Christians . . . The Jews trace the origin of their race from Abraham . . . The Christians, then, trace the beginning of their religion from Jesus the Messiah' (ch. 2, ANF 9: 264–265). While Jews trace the genealogical origin of their people to Abraham, Aristides traces the religious origin of the Christian 'people' (genos) to Christ. A similar assertion can be found in the Epistle to Diognetus, where Christians are described as a kainon genos, a 'new people,' and in the apocryphal second-century writing of the Kerygma Petrou (the 'Preaching of Peter'), which states that 'we are Christians, who as a third race worship him [God] in a new way' (Hennecke and Schneemelcher 1990– 1992: vol. 2, 100; Elliott 1993: 22).

Portraying one's movement as 'new,' however, created problems with Roman sensibilities that valued old traditions and were suspicious of new religious groups. Even as Roman authorities initially saw the Christian movement as a sect within Judaism (e.g., Acts 18:12–17), second-century Roman authors could also view Christians as spreading a new superstition that should not be lightly tolerated. The Roman historian Tacitus characterized Christianity as 'a deadly superstition' which espoused 'hatred of the human race' (Annals xv.44.2–8), and Suetonius referred to Christians as 'a class of men given to a new and wicked superstition' (Life of Nero 16.2). It is against such charges that Christians like the apologist Justin Martyr responded as they sought respectability for Christianity in the middle of the second century. Justin's Apology sought to show precisely that Christianity had its basis in the ancient prophecies of the Jewish, now Christian, Scriptures (see, e.g., 1 Apol. 31–44), and indeed that even the ancient Greek philosophers were indebted to the wisdom of Moses (1 Apol. 44, echoing a claim already made by Jewish apologists such as Josephus before him).

Though a 'new race,' Christians also saw themselves as the true spiritual heirs of the ancient promises made through Israel's scriptures. The foundations of these claims, of course, can be traced back to the earliest Christian writings, where the fulfillment of prophecy motif permeates the Gospel accounts and the letters of Paul. Although not all Christians of the second and third centuries appealed to the Jewish scriptures with the same vigor (for example, Ignatius of Antioch in the early second century makes very little use of scripture), a basic motif that runs throughout this period is the proof of Christian truth claims against Judaism by invoking proof-texts from the Jewish scriptures themselves. Such appeals illustrate the Christological readings of the 'Old Testament' that became commonplace in the centuries to follow.

Towards the beginning of the second century, for example, the author of the Epistle of Barnabas, arguing against the Jewish practice of ritual circumcision, stated that true circumcision is the spiritual circumcision of the Christians and not the false physical circumcision of the Jews. To prove his point Barnabas appealed to the story of Abraham having his household circumcised from Genesis 17. According to Barnabas, Abraham 'did so looking forward in the spirit to Jesus, and had received the doctrines of the three letters.' The so-called 'doctrine of the three letters' refers to Barnabas' reading of a passage from the Septuagint version (Greek) of Genesis 17:23, which he cites: 'And Abraham circumcised from his household eighteen men and three hundred.' By means of the practice of gematria (seeing connections between letters and numbers, both represented by the Greek alphabet), Barnabas saw the significance of this passage in the number 318, which in Greek is represented by the three letters TIH. Barnabas proceeds:

> What then was the knowledge that was given to him? Notice that he first mentions the eighteen, and after a pause the three hundred. The eighteen is I (= 10) and H (= 8)—you have Jesus [IHSOUS]—and because the cross was destined to have grace in the T [300 in Greek] he says 'and three hundred.' So he indicates Jesus in the two letters and the cross in the other. He knows this who placed the gift of teaching in our hearts. No one has heard a more excellent lesson from me, but I know that you are worthy.
>
> (Barnabas 9: 7–9)

Such examples of early Christians finding Jesus present in the text of the Jewish scriptures are manifold. In the second century perhaps no one was more exhaustive in this regard than Justin Martyr in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, written sometime between 155 and 161 CE. Justin's Dialogue exemplifies the continuing presentation of Christianity as having superseded Judaism while at the same time claiming that Jewish scriptures first and foremost were Christian scriptures because they were understood as testifying to the advent and rejection of Christ among the Jews. In his discussion, for example, of the theophany to Abraham at Mamre found in Genesis 18, Justin argued that 'the Lord' who appeared to Abraham was Christ, accompanied by the two angels who went on to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah (Dial. 56).

Beyond the Christological readings of the Jewish scriptures, testimonies of Christianity's self-conscious displacement of Judaism as God's covenant people also pervade his Dialogue. In an address to Trypho the Jew, Justin's alleged disputant, Justin states (Dial. 119):

> After the Just One was put to death, we blossomed forth as another people, and sprang up like new and thriving corn . . . this is really the nation promised to Abraham by God . . . God promised Abraham a religious and righteous nation of like faith, and a delight to the Father; but it is not you, 'in whom there is no faith' (Deut. 32:20).

This kind of embrace of Jewish scripture while rejecting Judaism is commonplace in Christianity as it developed over the second and third centuries. Indeed, a whole adversus Judaeos ('against the Jews') literature developed during this time with stock features, accusing the Jews of rejecting Christ, which results in God's consequent rejection of the Jewish people (see the classic treatments by Williams 1935, Simon 1986, and Ruether 1979). There is a significant difference between second/third-century Christian theological attacks against Judaism and Christian polemics against Judaism represented in first-century Christian literature. The Christian movement at the end of the first century was just a generation removed from its historic Jewish Christian roots, with still a sizeable—if shrinking—proportion of Christians coming from a Jewish heritage. The tensions at this point still appear to be at least to some degree intramural fights over Jewish law, especially from the perspective of Roman rulers (see Acts 18:15). But in the second and third centuries with Gentile Christianity becoming far and away the dominant and virtually exclusive form of Christianity, Christian attacks on Judaism became increasingly extramural and the polemic not so much the self-definition of an emerging Christianity from its Jewish roots, but more Christian vilification of Judaism as a religion and a people renounced by God. Direct social engagement between Christians and Jews became less commonplace, with Christian attacks against Judaism quickly becoming more rhetorical fencing to defend the truth of Christian faith than actual representations of Christian interaction with real Jews.

Towards the end of the second century we come upon the Peri Pascha (Paschal Homily) by the Christian apologist Melito of Sardis. In it Melito rehearses the history of Israel with special focus on the Exodus and the Passover tradition, all of which he interprets from a Christological perspective. Melito is a good example of how Christians claimed the heritage of Israel with one hand, but with the other hand repudiated contemporary Judaism as rejected by God. Referring to Christ he writes:

> He is the Pascha [Passover] of our salvation. It is he who in many endured many things: it is he that was in Abel murdered, and in Isaac bound, and in Jacob exiled, and in Joseph sold, and in Moses exposed, and in the lamb slain, and in David persecuted, and in the prophets dishonoured.
>
> *(*Peri Pascha 69; Hall 1979: 51)

According to Melito, the Jews repaid God's graciousness with ungrateful acts: 'evil for good and affliction for joy and death for life; in recompense for that you had to die' (Peri Pascha 90; Hall 1979: 51).

The pattern of Christian attacks on and denigration of Judaism continued in the writings of several authors from the Latin west from the end of the second century through the third century and beyond. In his Against the Jews Tertullian claimed that the Jews were idolaters who had been justly punished by God for denying the clear references in the prophetic writings to the advent of Christ. Novation wrote a trilogy against different aspects of Jewish life and worship: On Circumcision, On the Sabbath, and On Jewish Foods (so Jerome, de Viris Illustribus ['On Illustrious Men'] 70). A sermon from c. 260 CE falsely ascribed to the third-century North African bishop Cyprian, Against the Jews, repeats the by now standard accusations against the Jews, and appears to borrow heavily in Latin translation from Melito's homily Peri Pascha. And a fragment of a homily attributed to Hippolytus, Against the Jews, blames the Jews for their transgressions against God: 'Why was the temple made desolate? . . . it was because they killed the Son of their Benefactor' (Against the Jews, 7; ANF 5:220). It must be said that in most cases these writings were not addressed to Jews at all, but were written to convince pagans of the superiority of Christianity to Judaism. The Jews here served more as rhetorical foils for Christian apologetics than as real disputants. Even though Christian polemic against Judaism was commonplace in the second and third centuries, there were still groups of Christians who identified with Judaism and Jewish practices to greater and lesser degrees (see Chapter 6). In his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew Justin is asked by Trypho if someone who confesses Jesus to be the Christ will be saved if that person also observes the Jewish law. Justin responds: 'I say such a man will be saved, unless he exerts every effort to influence other men to practice the same rites as himself, informing them that they cannot be saved unless they do so' (Dial. 47). Justin goes on to say that some Christians refuse to have fellowship with such 'Judaizing' Christians, but he disagrees and argues that Christians should associate with other Christians, even if they follow Jewish law.

Perhaps the most significant example of Jewish Christianity in the second century was a group known as the Ebionites. We first hear of the Ebionites from the late second-century Christian heresiologist Irenaeus in his Against Heresies, where he would seem to dispute Justin's approach to the question of relating to Jewish Christians. Irenaeus writes:

> Those who are called Ebionites . . . use only the Gospel according to Matthew and reject the apostle Paul, whom they call an apostate from the law . . . They practice circumcision and persevere in legal customs and the Jewish way of life, so that they pray toward Jerusalem as if it were the house of God.
>
> (1.26.2; Grant 1997: 95; see Schoeps 1969 and Daniélou 1964)

Irenaeus also states that, like the Cerinthians and Carpocratians, the Ebionites denied that Jesus was born of a virgin, and they argued that at his baptism Christ descended upon Jesus in the form of a dove, departing from him just before he died. In this view Jesus was a great prophet, but not the divine Son of God worshipped by Christians.

Another Jewish Christian group from the second century, the Elchasites, also apparently had gnostic leanings. In his early third-century work, Refutation of All Heresies (also called the Philosophumena), the Christian heresiologist Hippolytus criticized the Elchasites for teaching that 'believers ought to be circumcised and live according to the Law' and for their belief that Christ was not born of a virgin (9.9.1; ANF 5: 132). The founder of the group, Elchasai (variously spelled), claimed to have received a revelation from a 96-mile-high angel whom he identified as the Son of God (9.8.1; ANF 5: 132). According to Elchasai, Christ was born a man, not of a virgin. Further, Christ had been born before and would continue to be born into the world from time to time, having transferred his soul from body to body. This mixture of soul migration and Jewish law observance was not widespread in early Christianity, but it does show something of the diversity of Christian attitudes towards Jewish practices and the strong responses against such observances that various Christian leaders such as Irenaeus and Hippolytus (and later Tertullian and Epiphanius) felt obliged to register.

Scripture, canon, and authority

While Christians certainly took over the Jewish scriptures as their own (see e.g., 1 Tim. 3:16), at least in their Septuagint form, Christians in the second and third centuries were also busy crafting a new canon, a new collection of authoritative writings (Gamble 1985; Metzger 1987; McDonald 1995). Towards the end of the first century, the voices of the apostles had started to die out, and a strong interest developed in preserving the story of Jesus as testified by the apostles and their immediate followers (so Luke 1:1–4). At times this process of forming a new Christian canon involved conscious deliberation, but more often than not we find Christians reflecting in retrospect on writings that had emerged as authoritative in various Christian communities. The earliest evidence of a collection of authoritative Christian writings comes from the second-century work that later became part of the 'New Testament' itself, 2 Peter. In 2 Peter 3:15–17, the author (certainly not Peter) writes about the collection of Paul's letters. (Whether the collection 2 Peter knew is the same as ours is unknown.) The author of 2 Peter states:

> Regard the patience of our Lord as salvation. So also our beloved brother Paul wrote to you according to the wisdom given him, speaking of this as he does in all his letters. There are some things in them hard to understand, which the ignorant and unstable twist to their own destruction, as they do the other scriptures. You therefore, beloved, since you are forewarned, beware that you are not carried away with the error of the lawless and lose your own stability.

Instructive here is the acknowledgment of Paul's letters as 'scripture,' which suggests that by the time 2 Peter wrote, probably sometime in the first half of the second century, the letters of Paul have taken on significant authority. And yet their authority was not without problems. Indeed, one almost gets the sense that 2 Peter would have been just as happy had Paul's difficult and hard to understand letters not survived to gain the authority they did. We also learn from this passage of rival groups of Christians ('the ignorant and unstable') who used the authority of Paul's writings to advocate a rather different understanding of Christian faith and practice than that espoused by 2 Peter.

The Pauline heritage was embraced by various groups in second-century Christianity. The apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla, for example, presents an image of Paul extolling an ascetic life and radically challenging traditional Greco-Roman household codes. By contrast the Pastoral Epistles (1, 2 Timothy and Titus—widely acknowledged as deutero-Pauline writings from the end of the first or beginning of the second century), endorse these same traditional household codes and encourage women to marry, have children, and manage their homes in a traditional manner (1 Timothy 2, 5; see MacDonald 1983).

This 'battle for Paul' in the memory, canon, and practice of the churches was perhaps nowhere more significant than in the case of Marcion (see MacDonald 1983). Marcion was a Christian originally from Asia Minor, who became influential in the church at Rome in the 140s CE. What we know of Marcion comes principally from the several second- and third-century Christian authors who wrote so strongly against him, especially Tertullian, Justin Martyr, and Irenaeus (see, e.g., Tertullian, Against Marcion; Justin, 1 Apology 26, 58; Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.27; Clement of Alexandria, Stromateis, 3.3; Origen, Against Celsus 5.54; 6.53, 74; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, hereafter HE 4.9; 5.13). In short, Marcion was convinced that the good and loving God revealed in Jesus Christ was different from the vindictive God of the Jews who created and ruled this world. The inferior God of the Jews, to whom Jewish scriptures testify, is a jealous and vengeful God who requires sacrifices, commands the slaughter of entire peoples, and is inconsistent (see Lieu 2015). Marcion argues that the loving God of Jesus is essentially antithetical to the God of the Jewish scriptures. Indeed, Marcion wrote a book entitled Antitheses in which he listed what he saw as various contradictions between the Jewish Scriptures and Christian writings. Marcion thus rejected the Jewish scriptures as having no authority whatsoever, since they were the ramblings of a lesser God than the Father of Jesus.

Figure 9.1   Folio of manuscript from P46 containing 2 Corinthians 11:33–12:9 from the Chester Beatty collection. Photo Wikicommons, public domain

In Marcion's view the earliest Jewish Christians had misunderstood what Jesus had intended; they failed to see the radical break with Jewish tradition and scripture that Jesus inaugurated. Marcion saw himself as the one who would restore the original intentions of Jesus and his most important follower, Paul. This restoration included purging the earliest Christian writings of the corruptions that earlier misinformed Christians had introduced into them. Specifically, this meant that Marcion produced an edited, expurgated version of the Gospel and of Paul's letters. Since earlier Christians had corrupted these writings with references to the Jewish scriptures, Marcion felt it was his enlightened duty to literally cut such references out of the text. In this endeavor, Marcion saw himself aligned with Paul in his fight against 'Judaizing' Christians. Paul was Marcion's hero, and yet in Marcion's view even Paul's letters had been corrupted by Judaizing interpolations. Marcion thus rendered the first collection of 'New Testament' writings into his own version of the Christian canon: ten of Paul's letters (not including the Pastoral Epistles) and the Gospel of Luke (which Marcion thought Paul had also originally written in an earlier form). Marcion gained a following at Rome and was expelled by the Roman church in 144 CE. Marcionite churches sprang up in various places and endured for several centuries (see Von Harnack 1924; Hoffmann 1984; BeDuhn 2013; Lieu 2015).

By the end of the second century, the four canonical Gospels had gained authoritative stature. In the middle of the century Justin Martyr made many allusions to the Gospels and referred to them as the 'Memoirs of the Apostles' (Dial. 100, 104–105). Around 160 CE Justin's student, Tatian, compiled a harmony of the four Gospels, the Diatessaron, which circulated widely in eastern Christianity among Syriac-speaking churches. The Diatessaron was the standard text of the Gospels for these churches down through the fifth century, when it finally gave way to the four separate Gospels. The fourfold character of the Gospels provided Irenaeus with the opportunity to reflect on the number of the Gospels. He wrote:

> It is not possible that the Gospels can be either more or fewer in number than they are, since there are four directions of the world in which we are, and four principal winds . . . The four living creatures [of Rev. 4:9] symbolize the four Gospels . . . and there were four principal covenants made with humanity, through Noah, Abraham, Moses, and Christ.
>
> (Against Heresies 3.11.8; see Metzger 1987: 154–155)

It is worth noting that Irenaeus defended the fourfold character of the Gospel collection in his treatise against heretics, and especially against gnostic Christians, for whom other gospels had also gained some authority (e.g., the Gospel of Philip and the Gospel of Thomas).

Also important to our understanding of the formation of the New Testament are various canonical lists from the second and third centuries (see Theron 1957: 107–127). Most significant here are the Muratorian Canon and statements from Origen and Eusebius. The Muratorian Canon is a late second-century Latin fragment, 85 lines long, containing a list of Christian writings that were held to be canonical. The list reflects both early Christian consensus and debate about which writings were authoritative and which were not, as well as discussion of various degrees of authority. It includes all of the New Testament writings except for four, making no reference to Hebrews, James, or 1 and 2 Peter. But the list also refers to the Wisdom of Solomon and the Apocalypse of Peter, though it is acknowledged that 'some of us are not willing that the latter be read in church' (line 72). The author of the list further makes reference to the Shepherd of Hermas, which was written:

> [v]ery recently, in our times' (line 74), and which 'ought indeed to be read; but it cannot be read publicly to the people in church either among the prophets, whose number is complete, or among the apostles, for it is after [their] time.
>
> (lines 77–80)

Thus there appear to be three kinds of Christian writings: (1) canonical writings, for reading in the churches; (2) semi-canonical writings about which there is a dispute as to whether or not they can be read in church; and (3) writings worth reading, but of lesser authority and so inappropriate for public reading in church services. A fourth kind of writing also appears in the list, writings that should simply not be read because, presumably, they come from heterodox Christian groups. 'But we accept nothing whatever of Arsinous or Valentinus or Miltiades, who also composed a new book of psalms for Marcion, together with Basilides, the Asian founder of the Cataphrygians' (lines 81–85; see Metzger 1987: 305–307).

In his Ecclesiastical History (6.25.3–4) Eusebius relates that Origen wrote a commentary on the Gospel of Matthew, in which Origen defended the canon of scripture accepted by the church. Origen is aware of other gospels, which he approves, such as the Gospel of Peter and the Protoevangelium of James (Commentary on Matthew 10.17). He apparently also knew first-hand several gospels that he rejected as coming from false teachers. He names gospels of Thomas, Matthias, the Twelve Apostles, Basilides, and the Gospel according to the Egyptians. These, he says, were written 'without having the grace of the Holy Spirit' (Homily on Luke 1; see Metzger 1987: 135–141). In his Ecclesiastical History, Eusebius summarizes his understanding of the New Testament canon in ways similar to what we have seen in the Muratorian Canon and in Origen (see Grant 1980; Attridge and Hata 1992). He refers to recognized, disputed, and spurious books, and then lists examples of heretical writings (3.25.1–7).

In the second and third centuries, then, we find a general acceptance of the four Gospels and the letters of Paul as the most authoritative writings from the time of the apostles. But we also see the continued production of many pseudonymous and apocryphal works from different Christian groups seeking to articulate their vision of Christian faith (see Layton 1987; Elliott 1993). Though there was a general consensus regarding the Gospels and the letters of Paul (having been rescued from the grasp of Marcion), along with Acts, 1 John, and 1 Peter, it remains significant that church leaders assigned different degrees of authority to different early Christian writings. The edges of the New Testament canon, thus, remained in flux for some time. Indeed, while in 367 CE the bishop Athanasius wrote an Easter letter that included for the first time an exclusive list of all 27 New Testament 'books' that became commonplace, still the debate over the exact contours of the canon persisted well into the fifth and sixth centuries CE (Metzger 1987).

Geographic spread of Christianity

By the end of the first century, significant Christian communities had already spread from Palestine to various cities in Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and to Rome. In the middle of the first century in his letter to the Romans, the apostle Paul indicated his plans to preach the gospel in Spain, since 'from Jerusalem and as far around as Illyricum I have fully proclaimed the good news of Christ' (Rom 15:19) and found 'no further place for me in these regions' (15:23). Churches in such major urban centers as Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome provided the springboard for extensive Christian expansion in the second and third centuries. Extensive material remains of early Christianity in Rome can still be seen in the catacombs there, with some of the frescoes with which they are decorated dated to the latter part of the second century CE.

Christianity spread fairly quickly in Asia Minor, as indicated by the letters to the seven churches in the book of Revelation 1–3 and by the letters of Ignatius. In addition to Ephesus, Christian communities were located in Smyrna, Pergamum, Sardis, Philadelphia, Thyatira, Troas, Magnesia, and Tralles, among other places. Pliny's letter to the emperor Trajan (more on this below) and 1 Peter 1 show that significant numbers of Christians were to be found in Bithynia and Pontus as well.

Christianity in Syria spread from Antioch to Syriac-speaking Edessa, where the late second-century Christian Bardesanes was prominent. Bardesanes represented a kind of gnosticizing docetic Christianity later rejected by the church there. Third-century Edessene Christians claimed that Thaddaeus (Addai in Syriac tradition), whom they believed to be one of the 72 disciples sent out by Jesus, had founded the church there, and that King Abgar had even corresponded with Jesus (see Eusebius, HE 1.13). At Dura-Europos, a Roman fortress on the Euphrates, archaeologists have uncovered the earliest known house-church, dating to 232 CE, in which Greek fragments of Tatian's Diatessaron were found.

Figure 9.2   Fresco of a baptism from San Callisto catacomb. Photo Wilpert 1903, Tavola 27
Figure 9.3   Floor plan of house-church dating to 232 CE from Dura-Europos. Reproduced from Snyder (2013: 132), by permission of Mercer University Press

Even further to the East, the third-century apocryphal Acts of Thomas reports that Christians were to be found in Persia and India, though there are doubts about the veracity of this tradition (Elliott 1993: 439–511).

To the west, Christianity spread quickly in Italy and by the middle of the third century about 100 episcopal sees were to be found there, with Rome as the clear center. In Gaul and Spain, Christian communities spread more slowly, but were well established by the end of the second century in Lyons, where Irenaeus was bishop, and Vienne, where Christians suffered under the persecution of Marcus Aurelius in 177 CE. Irenaeus also reports churches in Germany and Iberia (Against Heresies 1.10.2). By the end of the third century, episcopal sees were to be found in Arles, Rouen, Paris, Bordeaux, Trier, and Rheims. Tertullian tells of churches in Spain (Apology 37), as does Cyprian, who mentions churches in Leon, Astorga, Merida, and Saragossa. Christianity also appears to have spread to Britain by the end of the third century, but probably not much before then (but see Chapter 17). British bishops from London and York are reported to have attended the Council of Arles in 314.

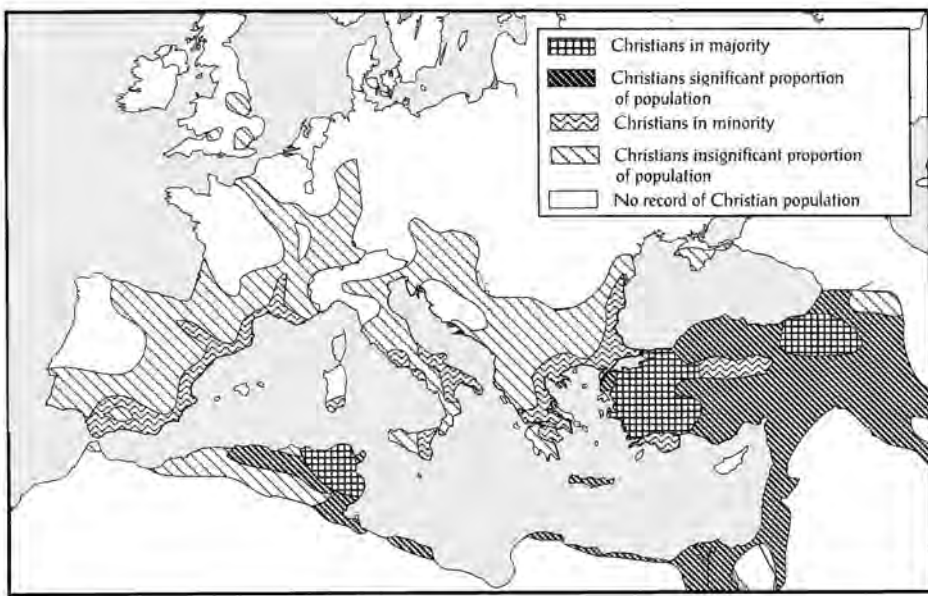
In North Africa, the city of Carthage was a major center for Christianity. Tertullian at the end of the second century and Cyprian in the middle of the third century give some indication of the vitality of the church in the region surrounding Carthage as well as in Numidia and Tunisia. African Christianity was also prominently found in Alexandria, as the Christian school headed by Clement and then Origen bears witness in the mid and late second century. Such writings as the apocryphal Gospel of the Egyptians, which denigrates marriage, indicate somewhat ascetic groups of Christians in Egypt.


Figure 9.4   Map showing spread of Christianity by 300 CE. Reproduced from Hinson (1996: 106), by permission of Abingdon Press

The presence of gnostic forms of Christianity in Egypt is also attested by the writings discovered at Nag Hammadi, though how early gnostic Christians can be dated in Egypt is disputed (see Bauer 1971; Pearson and Goehring 1986; Brakke 2012; Denzey Lewis 2012).

Christianity and the Roman empire

If direct social relations between Christians and Jews grew both more polarized and less frequent by the end of the third century, social relations between Christians and official Rome became increasingly difficult and inevitably complicated, as Roman magistrates came to view Christians as a group separate from the Jews. In an early and oft-cited second-century letter, Pliny, governor of Bithynia, seeks counsel from the emperor Trajan regarding how to deal with those who have been denounced as Christians. The letter shows how Roman officials were still very much in the process of formulating responses to the increasing presence of Christians, and Roman Christians at that, in society. Pliny expresses uncertainty about what factors should enter into his judgments about Christians, whether considerations are made, for example, for those who repent, for the age of the accused, or for the degree of recalcitrance. Should Christians be punished only for specific crimes or merely for their association with the name 'Christian'? Pliny writes:

> This is the course I have taken with those who were accused before me as Christians. I asked them whether they were Christians, and if they confessed, I asked them a second and third time with threats of punishment. If they kept to it, I ordered them for execution; for I held no question that whatever it was that they admitted, in any case obstinacy and unbending perversity deserves to be punished.
>
> (Pliny, Letters 10.96; in Stevenson 1957: 13–14)

Pliny continues by stating that if individuals denounced as Christians recited a prayer to the Roman gods, poured out a libation to the statue of the emperor, and cursed Christ, then they were free to go. Those who refused so to demonstrate their loyalty to Rome were punished. In response to Pliny's inquiry, the emperor Trajan agreed that Pliny had adopted the appropriate policy. Christians, he wrote:

> [a]re not to be sought out; but if they are accused and convicted, they must be punished—yet on this condition, that who so denies himself to be a Christian, and makes the fact plain by his action, that is, by worshipping our gods, shall obtain pardon on his repentance, however suspicious his past conduct may be.
>
> (Pliny, Letters 10.97; in Stevenson 1957: 16)

In general, Roman officials were suspicious of Christians for their stubborn refusal to pay homage to the emperor and to the gods of Rome, though some emperors were more concerned with the persistence and spread of Christianity than others. State-sponsored suppression of Christianity was occasional and largely regional in scope (Sordi 1994). It is significant that during the rule of Trajan (98–117 CE), the emperor's response to Pliny expressly states that Christians are not to be sought out for punishment and that anonymous accusations against Christians were not to be taken seriously. There were, to be sure, celebrated cases of Christian martyrdom, but these events were noteworthy for their infrequency (see Frend 1967; Fox 1987: 419–492; Moss 2012).

Perhaps the best-known Christian martyr in the first half of the second century was Ignatius of Antioch. Writing to the church at Rome around 110 CE, Ignatius basically asks the Christians at Rome not to intercede on his behalf, lest he be deprived of the glories of martyrdom:

> I long for the beasts that are prepared for me . . . I will even entice them to devour me promptly . . . Grant me this favour . . . Let there come on me fire, and cross, and struggles with wild beasts, cutting, and tearing asunder, rackings of bones, mangling of limbs, crushing of my whole body, cruel tortures of the devil, may I but attain to Jesus Christ!
>
> *(*Ignatius to the Romans 5.2–3)

It appears that popular outcry against Christians was more a problem than official state persecution. During the reign of Hadrian (117–138 CE), according to Eusebius, the emperor reaffirmed the policy of Trajan, but he does not take lightly false charges brought against Christians. In a rescript to Minucius Fundanus, the proconsul of Asia, Hadrian declares:

> If then anyone accuses them [Christians], and shows that they are acting illegally, decide the point according to the nature of the offence, but by Hercules, if anyone brings the matter forward for the purpose of blackmail, investigate strenuously and be careful to inflict penalties adequate to the crime [of blackmail].
>
> (Eusebius, HE 4.9.3)

The emperor Antonius Pius (138–161 CE) repeated the same policies as his predecessors. The most significant Christian martyr during this period was Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, who was put to death at the age of eighty-six in 155 CE. A famous account of the Martyrdom of Polycarp survives in the collection of Apostolic Fathers. Even more than the actual death of Polycarp, the account of his trial and his defiant response are remarkable. When asked to 'swear by the genius of Caesar,' Polycarp answered:

> If you vainly suppose that I will swear by the genius of Caesar, as you say, and pretend that you are ignorant who I am, listen plainly: I am a Christian. And if you wish to learn the doctrine of Christianity fix a day and listen.
>
> *(*Martyrdom of Polycarp 10.1)

Under the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180 CE), well-known as a Stoic philosopher, persecution of Christians intensified somewhat. During his rule Justin Martyr was put to death in Rome. Eusebius relates that in 177 CE, in Lyons and Vienne in the region of Gaul, a number of Christians were put to death after first suffering being robbed, imprisoned, excluded from the public baths, stoned, and tortured (Eusebius, HE 5.1.7–63). In the African city of Scilli, 12 Christians, both men and women, were martyred in 180 CE for refusing to swear by the genius of the emperor. By contrast, the reign of Commodus (180–193 CE) provided a time of relative calm for Christians.

The third century of Christianity was marked by alternating periods of official, and at times intense, persecution and mostly peaceful relations with imperial Rome. The stable and prosperous age of the Antonine rulers had come to a close, and with the Severan dynasty (192–235) a period of relative decline commenced for the Roman empire. This gave way in the 50 years that followed (235–284 CE) to a time of constant external threats on the empire's borders and internal threats from unstable rule and military unrest. A succession of nearly 20 emperors came and went before Diocletian and then Constantine came to power at the end of the third and beginning of the fourth centuries.

A significant persecution broke out under the emperor Septimius Severus (193–211 CE) in 202 CE, when he issued an edict banning new conversions to Judaism or Christianity. According to Eusebius (HE 6.1–3), Christians in Alexandria felt the pressure of this persecution to such a degree that Clement, the leader of the Christian school there, fled from the city. Origen's father, Leonides, was beheaded and many other Christians in Alexandria were martyred along with him. Origen himself, only 18 years old at this time, desired to be martyred with his father, but Origen's mother 'hid all his clothes, and so laid upon him the necessity of remaining at home' (HE 6.2.5). The persecution under Severus was also felt in Carthage, where, in 203 CE the famous martyrdom of Perpetua occurred. Some Christians fled, some were arrested, some renounced their faith, and some paid money to stave off arrest and possible martyrdom (so Tertullian, Concerning Flight in Persecution 13).

After Severus' death in 211 CE, his son M. Aurelius Antoninus (Caracalla; 211–217 CE) initially continued the policy of persecution, which was especially heavy under Scapula, Proconsul of Africa (211–213 CE), who had Christians exposed to wild beasts and burned. One of Tertullian's apologetic works is addressed 'To Scapula,' in which he seeks to demonstrate that Christians are no threat to the empire. He writes: 'To the emperor we render such reverential homage as is lawful for us and good for him; regarding him as the human being next to God who from God has received all his power, and is less than God alone' (To Scapula 2; ANF 3: 105–106). But in the same breath, Tertullian also issues a warning in no uncertain terms: 'it cannot but distress us that no state shall bear unpunished the guilt of shedding Christian blood' (To Scapula 3; ANF 3: 106).

Christians enjoyed significant rest from persecution under the rules of Elagabalus (218–222 CE) and Severus Alexander (222–235 CE), and appear to have flourished during the latter's reign (HE 6.21.3). There was a brief resurgence of local persecution under the emperor Maximin (235–238 CE), who was annoyed, so Eusebius writes, that 'the house of Alexander consisted for the most part of believers' (HE 6.28.1). The extent of the persecution is unclear, though it appears at least that the bishop of Rome, Pontianus, was exiled and martyred. It was during this outbreak of persecution that Origen composed his Exhortation to Martyrdom, in which he encouraged Ambrose and Protectus (the two addressees) to stand firm in their faith when they answered the summons to appear before the emperor.

After Maximin, the church experienced peace during the reign of Philip (244–249 CE), who was purported to be 'the first Christian emperor' (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 54), a sentiment shared by Eusebius (EH 6.34.1). Eusebius relates the story that Philip desired to share in the paschal vigil but was denied permission to enter the church by the bishop until he did penance for his sins. 'It is said that he obeyed readily, displaying by his actions how genuine and pious was his disposition towards the fear of God' (HE 6.34.1). Whether this is an accurate report or Eusebius' exaggeration of the emperor's piety, it seems clear that Philip was not disposed against Christians.

The relative peace and security of the church from 212–249 CE, even with the brief eruption of persecution in 235 CE, left Christians unprepared for the sharply negative turn in imperial attitudes towards Christianity that came with the rule of the emperors Decius (249–251 CE) and Valerian (253–260 CE). Whereas much of the animosity towards Christians to this point was popular in character with the occasional backing of sporadic imperial involvement, Decius was the first emperor to engage in a systematic effort to dissuade all citizens from participating in Christian practices. The emperor ordered all citizens, and not just Christians, to obtain a libellus (a certificate) showing that they had sacrificed to the gods before imperial officials. Many nominal Christians quickly acquiesced while others fled or purchased certificates. But several Christian leaders were steadfast and submitted to punishment instead of renouncing their faith. Fabian, the bishop of Rome, was martyred; Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, was imprisoned and died; in Antioch the church leader Babylas also perished in prison; others were martyred in Alexandria (HE 6.39.1–4; 6.40.1). Even the well-known Origen was imprisoned and tortured, hastening his eventual death a few years later (HE 6.39.5).

Cyprian, who became bishop of Carthage (248–258 CE) shortly before the persecution broke out, followed the counsel of his fellow clergy and went into hiding, from where he continued to attend to the affairs of the church through letters and personal envoys (see Epistles 5:1; ANF 5:282). Cyprian's own flight from probable arrest and martyrdom during the Decian persecution later became an issue, and was especially criticized by leaders of the church at Rome. After the persecution ended in 251 CE, Cyprian returned from hiding and faced the dilemma of how best to deal with lapsed Christians who had defiled their faith by giving in to imperial demands to offer sacrifices to the gods, but now sought repentance and reconciliation. The church was significantly divided over this issue. On one side of the debate were those, such as Novatus, who argued that lapsed Christians should be restored to fellowship immediately and that their momentary apostasy during the persecutions should be forgiven. On the other side were more rigorist Christians like Novatian, who (indebted perhaps to the teachings of their predecessors Tertullian and Hippolytus) argued that it was not within the church's power to restore to fellowship those who had once renounced their faith. Cyprian sought to provide a middle course between these two sides. In his treatise Concerning the Lapsed, written in 251 CE, Cyprian argued that all those who had sacrificed to the gods, and even those who had purchased certificates of sacrifice, must submit to appropriate penance and that the church could not grant easy pardon. Still, those who had given in only after suffering torture were to be shown greater leniency. Thus each individual case was to be evaluated on the basis of its own merits and the appropriate length of penance determined accordingly.

A few years after Decius, the emperor Valerian (253–260 CE) initiated renewed persecution of Christians in 257 CE. Eusebius describes Valerian as at first well disposed towards Christians: 'not a single one of the emperors before him was so kindly and favorably disposed towards them . . . indeed all his house had been filled with godly persons, and was a church of God' (HE 7.10.3). But Valerian changed his view of Christianity. In 257 CE he issued an edict seeking to restore traditional commitment to the gods of the empire through appropriate sacrifices. Perhaps such a return to the traditional Roman gods would help mend the troubles of the empire. He forbade Christian gatherings, arrested several bishops, and exiled others, including Cyprian. Valerian then ordered the execution of church leaders who would not set an example for other Christians by offering sacrifices to the gods. Among those martyred at this time was Cyprian, who was beheaded not far from Carthage.

Following Valerian's capture during battle in the eastern part of the empire (which the Christians interpreted as God's just retribution against him for his persecution of the church), his son Gallienus became emperor (260–268 CE). According to Eusebius, Gallienus 'immediately by means of edicts put an end to the persecution against us' and issued an ordinance granting 'free power to those who presided over the word to perform their accustomed duties' (HE 7.13.1). With this was inaugurated a more than forty-year period of relative peace between the empire and the church. There were sporadic local persecutions of Christians during this time, but nothing like those suffered under Decius and Valerian, and certainly nothing like what was to follow in the 'Great Persecution' under Diocletian.

Diocletian and the Great Persecution

Diocletian ruled from 284 to 304 CE and early on in his reign appeared to favor Christianity. Eusebius reports that there were many Christians in the imperial household (HE 8.6.1). But Diocletian's view of Christianity began to change. There were troubles with some Christians who did not wish to serve in the army. And at a sacrifice where Diocletian was present, the augurs were unable to read the typical signs from the livers of the sacrificial animals allegedly because of some Christians there who made the sign of the cross and so disrupted the sacrifice. The oracle of Apollo informed the emperor that Christians were responsible for false oracles being given. Thus Diocletian quickly decided that Christianity was interfering with significant matters of state, and in 303 CE he issued the first in a series of edicts against Christianity and began an intense attack upon Christians and their churches. Lactantius, an eyewitness to the persecution, reports in detail on the deaths of many Christians (On the Death of the Persecutors 15, a work written around 317 CE). Eusebius writes:

> [a]n imperial letter was everywhere promulgated, ordering the razing of the churches to the ground and the destruction by fire of the Scriptures . . . the order was given that the presidents of the churches should all, in every place, be first committed to prison, and then afterwards compelled by every kind of device to sacrifice.
>
> (HE 8.2.4)

But many church leaders refused to offer sacrifice, and so were put to death. 'Presbyters and other officers of the Church were seized . . . condemned, and together with their families led to execution' (Lactantius, On the Death of the Persecutors, 15; ANF 7: 306).

When Diocletian fell ill and retired from public life in 304 CE, imperial opposition to the church continued under Galerius, who took power in the eastern part of the empire. Galerius issued an edict in keeping with Diocletian's policy, commanding 'that all citizens in every country in each city offer sacrifices publicly and libations to the idols' (Eusebius, Martyrs of Palestine 3). In the western part of the empire, Constantius Chlorus (the father of Constantine) ruled with less intense animosity towards the Christians. After Constantius died in 306 CE, Constantine's soldiers proclaimed him emperor and he ruled in the west along with Licinius and Maxentius. Finally, after the death of Galerius and no little struggle over the consolidation of imperial rule, Constantine and Licinius in 313 CE jointly issued the famous Edict of Milan, which was a watershed in religious freedom especially for Christians. The emperors resolved 'to grant both to the Christians and to all others the full authority to follow whatever worship each man has desired; whereby whatsoever Divinity dwells in heaven may be benevolent and propitious to us' (so Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 48.2; see also Eusebius, HE 10.5.2–17). The edict also stipulated that church buildings that had been destroyed during the suppression under Diocletian should be restored along with other property.

Figure 9.5   Coin from reign of Diocletian. Photo Wikicommons, own work, author Sosius 11

Imperial reaction to Christianity during the second and third centuries, however, is only part of the story. Christians not only had to deal with sporadic opposition and hostility on the imperial front, they also faced significant popular opposition from Greco-Roman society at large on a regular basis (see Wilken 1984). Christian authors were on the defensive and were concerned to respond to popular caricatures of Christian faith and teaching. Various apologists such as Aristides, Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, and Theophilus of Antioch sought respectability for Christianity in the public square of the second century. In the middle of the third century, Origen wrote his famous Contra Celsum, a refutation of the pagan critic and Platonist Celsus whose ridicule of Christianity in the late second century apparently still warranted Christian response in the middle of the third century. Partly in response to Origen's defense against Celsus, the great third-century neo-Platonic writer Porphry (c. 232–303 CE) wrote one of the most significant critiques against Christians and their teachings, preserved in fragments of his Against the Christians (especially criticizing Christian biblical interpretation) and his Philosophy from Oracles. The refutation of his arguments would occupy several prominent Christian writers in the following centuries (e.g., Eusebius, Methodius, Apollinarius, Jerome, and Augustine; see Schoedel and Wilken 1979).

Movements and controversies

What remains in this chapter is to describe in broad strokes some of the more significant internal movements and controversies that shaped Christianity in the second and third centuries, many of which developments receive more attention in other chapters of this volume.

Figure 9.6 A graffito from the Palatine in Rome c. 200 CE, of an ass-headed Christ crucified, with the inscription, 'Alexamenos worships his God.' Reproduced from Matthews 1993. Copyright 1993 by Princeton University Press. Reprinted by permission of Princeton University Press

*Figure 9.*7   Tracing of the Alexamenos graffito (in Figure 9.6). By the author

Gnosticism

Scholarly discussion of gnostic movements in early Christianity (see Chapter 42 for more detail) has undergone significant debate and revision over the last 20 years revolving around issues of defini-tion, with significant challenges to earlier scholarly constructs of 'gnosticism' (see Williams 1999; King 2003; Brakke 2010; Denzey Lewis 2012). It is telling that even reference to the term or cat-egory of 'gnosticism' often appears in quotation marks to indicate its disputed status in scholarly discussion. Some scholars dispute that any monolithic form of what has been termed 'gnosticism' ever existed (Williams 1999; King 2003), while others adopt a more moderate approach to the question, arguing that from the Nag Hammadi Library discovered in 1945 it is possible to identify Sethian Gnosticism as a discrete religious movement (Layton 1987; Brakke 2010), and also to discuss Valentinian Christianity in the second century as significantly influenced by general gnostic ideas.

This more moderate approach seeks to treat the early Christian heresiological literature (especially Irenaeus' Against Heresies) both critically and seriously as reflecting proto-orthodox views of theological fault-lines within the diversity that was second- and third-century Christianities.

The heresiological perspective of early Christianity reflected in the works of Irenaeus and Hippolytus still provide important information as scholars seek to reconstruct what can be known about movements that emphasized secret and special gnosis ('knowledge'), whether as part of the Christian faith or not. From Irenaeus' Against Heresies we learn at least something about what various proto-orthodox leaders considered to be false teachings that depended upon an elaborate cosmology rooted in a generic gnostic myth about the origin of creation and the salvation of human beings from an evil and fallen physical world. Along these lines, gnostic doctrine taught that the world came about as a result of a catastrophic rupture in the pleroma, the fullness of God, through the fall of Sophia (wisdom). This fall resulted in various emanations from the primordial beginning, with various pairs of 'aeons' including the emanation of Christ and the Spirit who bring Sophia back into harmony with the fullness of God (so the Valentinians). The material universe came into existence through the activity of the demiurge (creator), a kind of lesser god whose creative actions have entrapped divine sparks in a fallen material world. These divine sparks can only be 'saved' by ascending to the pleroma, and so be united again with the fullness of God from whence they came. But such return is only possible with special knowledge of the secret teachings mediated by certain gnostic leaders, knowledge they believed had been revealed by the savior Christ. Christ was indeed a redeemer who came from God, but redemption was not to be found in his physical death and resurrection so much as in his secret teachings. The opening line of the Gospel of Thomas is illustrative: 'These are the secret words which the living Jesus spoke' (Elliott 1993: 135). In the view of such gnostic believers, Jesus was not really a flesh and blood human being, rather he was a docetic figure, one who appeared (the Greek dokei meaning 'he appears') to be fully human in order to fool the creator, but was in fact only a spirit. Objections to such docetic views of Christ can already be found in 1 John 4:2 and 2 John 7.

There were many different gnostic groups with a great variety of teachings, according to Irenaeus. In addition to the Valentinians, the Sethians, the Basilidians, the Cerinthians, and the Carpocrations were among the more significant forms of groups emphasizing special gnosis. The Valentinian gnostics produced such writings as the Gospel of Truth and Ptolemy's Letter to Flora, and made explicit claims to be Christians. The Sethian gnostics (named for their devotion to Seth, the third son of Adam and Eve, as a revealer figure) produced a different corpus, including the following Nag Hammadi documents: the Apocryphon of John, the Three Steles of Seth, the Apocalypse of Adam, and the Gospel of the Egyptians (see Layton 1987; Brakke 2010).

Despite the concern of many Christian leaders with (in their view) false gnostic teachings, other Christian leaders could use similar language about secret teachings to call Christians to deeper spiritual maturity. Clement of Alexandria (c. 160–216 CE), for example, made a distinction between the simple faith of Christians and 'true gnostics,' those few Christians who had a greater and more privileged 'gnosis.' These true Christian gnostics derived their deeper understanding from a combination of sources: allegorical interpretation of the scriptures, incorporation of Platonic ideas, and secret traditions (Stromateis 6.7; 7.3, 7–15; ANF 2: 493–494). Though Clement attacked a docetic Christology, he could use language similar to those emphasizing secret teaching. In a reflection on why Christ ate, for example, Clement reflects:

> He ate, not for the sake of the body, which was kept together by a holy energy, but in order that it might not enter into the minds of those who were with Him to entertain a different opinion of Him . . . He was entirely impassible, inaccessible to any movement of feeling—either pleasure or pain.
>
> (Stromateis 6.9; ANF 2: 496)

Origen, Clement's successor at Alexandria, likewise sought deeper spiritual understanding and hidden meanings in biblical texts. And although he did not advocate the return of divine sparks to the pleroma, he did argue for the doctrine of apokatastasis, a thoroughly spiritual eschatology in which all of the universe and all humanity would ultimately be restored to its original harmony with God (First Principles 2.3.1).

Montanism

At the same time that Christian unity was being challenged by so-called gnostic movements, another group, the Montanists, arose in the second half of the second century in the area of Phyrgia in Asia, though they spread quickly to Rome and to Christian communities in North Africa (see Chapter 43 for more details). Montanus, a convert to Christianity, declared that he was possessed by the Holy Spirit and so started speaking in tongues and prophesying. He was soon joined by two women, Priscilla and Maximilla, who likewise claimed to be inspired by the Spirit. Together they claimed to have a 'new prophecy,' a new revelation that had been given to them in keeping with the Christian faith they had received. This new revelation included an intense eschatological expectation of the sudden return of Christ, who they believed would inaugurate the new Jerusalem and with it God's kingdom in the town of Pepuza in Phyrgia (Montanus' home town). They advocated an ethical code of tremendous rigor that involved more frequent fasting and a greater emphasis on virginity. Montanists also refused to restore those who had fallen away during persecution, and they embraced martyrdom. Most of what we know about Montanism comes from its most famous and enthusiastic adherent, Tertullian, who joined the Montanist group around 206 CE (see Eusebius, HE 5.14–19).

Monarchianism

Another split along doctrinal lines arose in the latter half of the second century as Christians sought to clarify both the unity and yet the distinction between Christ the Son and God the Father. In Justin Martyr's view, Christ the divine Logos was 'another God' beside the Father (Osborn 1973). Justin's analogous description of the Logos as distinct from the Father in the same way that one torch derives its flame from another begged the charge of ditheism, threatening the single oneness, the monarchia, of God the creator. Thus, the 'alogoi,' those opposed to Justin's Logos theology, argued for the unity of the Father and the Son. At the beginning of the third century, a certain Sabellius, about whom we know little, apparently advocated that the Father and the Son were merely different aspects of the same being, the same one God. But this position led in turn to the accusation of 'patripassianism,' that to so closely identify the Son with the Father implied that the Father suffers with the Son. (This view has also been named 'modalism' since Father/Son/Spirit were seen as different modes of the same being.)

The debate broke out as a heated controversy in Rome under the episcopacy of Zephyrinus (198–217 CE). Sabellius led the Monarchian position, and Hippolytus defended the Logos theology that the Father and the Logos are two distinct prosōpa ('persons'). Callistus, a deacon at Rome, argued for a middle path between these two extremes. When Callistus succeeded Zephyrinus as bishop of Rome in 217 CE, Hippolytus led a split from the church, partly over the Monarchian dispute, partly over Callistus' lax approach to readmitting lapsed Christians, and also because of Hippolytus' apparent general disdain for Callistus as a person (see Refutation of All Heresies 9.6). The Monarchian controversy continued well into the third century. Tertullian wrote a strong tract against Praxeas (a Monarchian from Asia Minor who had opposed the Montanist movement), and proposed language that became very influential in the dispute. He held the Father and the Son in unity, but a unity in which there was a distinction. As Tertullian put it, God is 'one substance consisting in three persons.' This language was adopted in the middle of the third century by the Roman presbyter Novation in his On the Trinity and so set the pattern for Christian churches through the Trinitarian debates that would follow.

Other debates also erupted from time to time. For example, in 254 CE a vitriolic dispute arose over whether or not schismatic Christians needed to be rebaptized in order to demonstrate repentance. Cyprian in Carthage held that they did, while Stephen in Rome held that they did not (cf. Cyprian, Epistles 70, 75; Eusebius, HE 7.5.1–6). There were also a series of schisms resulting from rival claims to the episcopal see of Rome (Hippolytus versus Callistus in 217 CE; Novation versus Cornelius in 251 CE). The so-called Quartodeciman debate over the dating of Easter also caused a significant divide between the eastern and western parts of the church.

Unity in diversity and division

Amidst all these various disputes and controversies in second- and third-century Christianity, what held the churches together in relative unity? Several unifying factors can be identified. Certainly the authority attributed to the writings of the emerging New Testament canon were very significant, as the use in particular of the same Gospels and the letters of Paul forged a common bond between Christians of different theological stripes across large geographic and cultural divides. When Christians in different locales gathered for worship and read from the same new (and old) scriptures, even if they did not share a common lectionary, this practice allowed the formation of a common Christian identity. There were surely disputes about the contours of the canon, but the collective use of the four Gospels, along with the letters of Paul, 1 John and 1 Peter, was a powerful unifying force.

Another unifying factor was the institutional structure of the church, with its emphasis on local ruling bishops who gathered in times of crisis in an effort to shape a common direction for the diverse clusters of Christian churches. Especially important here were the Christian leaders and bishops from Rome, Alexandria, Carthage, and Antioch. Episcopal authority was seen as grounded in apostolic authority and eventually in apostolic succession (Von Campenhausen 1969). Already at the end of the first century, Clement of Rome thought it within the scope of his authority to write and admonish the church in Corinth for deposing various presbyters. Appealing to the authority of the apostles before him, Clement writes:

> Our apostles knew through our Lord Jesus Christ that there would be strife for the title of bishop. For this cause . . . they appointed those who have been already mentioned, and afterwards added the codicil that if they should fall asleep, other approved men should succeed to their ministry.
>
> *(*First Epistle to the Corinthians 44.1–2)

Among the so-called 'Apostolic Fathers' in the early second century (see Chapter 27), Ignatius of Antioch also appealed to the authority of bishops and elders, whom he saw as agents of Christ and the apostles over against rival teachers. Ignatius put it strongly: 'it is clear that we must regard the bishop as the Lord himself' (Ignatius to the Ephesians 6.1; also see 3.2). At the end of the second century in his treatise against gnostic heresies, Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, appealed to the authority of bishops that derived from apostolic succession. He wrote:

> This is the true Gnosis: the teaching of the apostles, and the ancient institution of the church, spread throughout the entire world, and the distinctive mark of the body of Christ in accordance with the successions of bishops, to whom the apostles entrusted each local church, and the unfeigned preservation, coming down to us, of the scriptures, with a complete collection allowing for neither addition nor subtraction.
>
> *(*Against Heresies 4.33.8; see also 3.3.1–4; Grant 1997: 161)

Finally, another unifying factor in second- and third-century Christianity was the emphasis of various bishops on basic creedal statements, most notably the 'rule of faith' that summarized central Christian beliefs. The 'rule of faith' found its more ardent advocates at the end of the second and beginning of the third centuries in the writings of Hippolytus, Tertullian, and Irenaeus. Church leaders saw the 'rule of faith' as having apostolic authority, and confirmed by the teachings of scripture. In his Apostolic Tradition, Hippolytus relates formulaic questions addressed to newly baptized members who were to be received into church membership: 'Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty? . . . Dost thou believe in Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who was born by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary?' (Apostolic Tradition 21–22; Stevenson 1957: 131). And Tertullian, writing for the faithful against heresies, states:

> Now, as to this rule of faith . . . it is, you must know, that which prescribes the belief that there is one only God, and that He is none other than the Creator of the world, who produced all things out of nothing through His own Word . . . that this Word is called His Son.
>
> *(*The Prescription of Heretics 13; ANF 3: 249)

Tertullian's 'rule of faith' goes on to include standard Christian notions regarding the virgin birth, the Spirit of God poured out in Jesus' ministry, the death and resurrection of Jesus, his ascension, the sending of the Spirit, and expectation of the second coming. He concludes: 'This rule, as it will be approved, was taught by Christ, and raises amongst ourselves no questions except those which heresies introduce, and which make men heretics.' Similarly, Irenaeus could write that the church 'has received from the apostles and their disciples this faith,' going on to describe the same kind of stock features of Christian belief found in Tertullian and Hippolytus. Irenaeus concludes:

> The church, having received this preaching, and this faith, although scattered throughout the whole world . . . believes these points of doctrine just as if she had but one soul, and one and the same heart, and she proclaims them, and teaches them, and hands them down, with perfect harmony, as if she possessed only one mouth.
>
> *(*Against Heresies 1.2–3; Stevenson 1957: 115)

Through use of a common set of scriptures, held together by a relatively unified group of bishops who advocated a generic rule of faith, Christians in the second and third centuries managed to maintain a sense of unity even amidst the significant diversity and the various debates that occupied Christians during this time. The sporadic persecutions suffered by Christians also served to forge a sense of unity and common purpose. These factors positioned Christian churches at the beginning of the fourth century to welcome the efforts of emperor Constantine to push for a unified Christian church that would aid in unifying the empire. The unity of tradition, of course, was in part the product of a revisionist memory, but a memory that second- and third-century Christian leaders sought collectively to hand on to those that followed.

Bibliography

Ancient Christian Writers (1946–) vols 1–66. New York: Paulist Press.

The Ante-Nicene Fathers (1885–96) Translations of the Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson (eds). 10 vols. Buffalo, NY: The Christian Literature Publishing Company.

Apostolic Fathers (2003) B. Ehrman, ed. and trans., 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Attridge, H. and Hata, G. (eds) (1992) Eusebius, Christianity, and Judaism. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.

Barnes, T. D. (1984) Early Christianity and the Roman Empire. London: Variorum Reprints.

Bauer, W. (1971) Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Becker, A. H. and Reed, A. Y. (eds) (2003) The Ways That Never Parted: Jews and Christians in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

BeDuhn, J. (2013) The First New Testament: Marcion's Scriptural Canon. Salem, OR: Polebridge Press.

Boyarin, D. (2004) Border Lines: The Partition of Judaeo-Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Brakke, D. (2010) The Gnostics: Myth, Ritual, and Diversity in Early Christianity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Cameron, A. (1991) Christianity and the Rhetoric of Empire: The Development of Christian Discourse. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Chadwick, H. (1993) The Early Church. London: Penguin Books.

Daniélou, J. (1964) The Theology of Jewish Christianity. London: Darton, Longman & Todd.

Denzey Lewis, N. (2012) Introduction to 'Gnosticism': Ancient Voices, Christian Worlds. New York: Oxford University Press.

Dunn, J. D. G. (1991) The Partings of the Ways: Between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity. London: SCM Press.

Ehrman, B. (ed.) (1999) After the New Testament: A Reader in Early Christianity. New York: Oxford University Press.

Elliott, J. K. (ed.) (1993) The Apocryphal New Testament. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Eusebius (1926) Ecclesiastical History. K. Lake, ed. and trans., 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

The Fathers of the Church (1947–) vols 1–132. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Ferguson, E. (ed.) (1993) Studies in Early Christianity, vols 1–18. New York: Garland Publishing, Inc.

Ferguson, E. (ed.) (1997) Encyclopedia of Early Christianity, 2nd ed. 2 vols. New York: Garland Publishing, Inc.

Fox, R. L. (1987) Pagans and Christians. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Freeman, C. (2009) A New History of Early Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1967) Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church. Garden City, NY: Anchor Books.

Frend, W. H. C. (1982) The Early Church. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1985) Saints and Sinners in the Early Church. Wilmington, DE: Glazier.

Gamble, H. (1985) The New Testament Canon. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Gonzalez, J. L (1987) A History of Christian Thought: Volume 1: From the Beginnings to the Council of Chalcedon. Nashville, TN: Abingdon.

Grant, R. M. (1980) Eusebius as Church Historian. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Grant, R. M. (1988) Greek Apologists of the Second Century. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press.

Grant, R. M. (1997) Irenaeus of Lyons. London: Routledge.

Hall, S. G. (1979) (trans. and ed.) Melito of Sardis on Pascha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Harvey, S. A. and Hunter, D. G. (eds) (2008) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Studies. New York: Oxford University Press.

Hennecke, E. and Schneemelcher, W. (eds) (1990–2) New Testament Apocrypha, 2 vols. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press.

Hinson, E. G. (1996) The Early Church: Origins to the Dawn of the Middle Ages. Nashville, TN: Abingdon.

Hoffmann, R. (1984) Marcion and the Restitution of Christianity. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1972) Early Christian Creeds, 3rd ed. New York: Longman.

King, K. (2003) What Is Gnosticism? Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Layton, B. (1987) The Gnostic Scriptures: A New Translation with Annotatiom and Introductions. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Lieu, J. (1996) Image and Reality: The Jews in the World of the Christians in the Second Century. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Lieu, J. (2002) Neither Jew nor Greek: Constructing Early Christianity. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Lieu, J. (2015) Marcion and the Making of a Heretic: God and Scripture in the Second Century. New York: Cambridge University Press.

MacDonald, D. R. (1983) The Legend and the Apostle: The Battle for Paul in Story and Canon. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press.

MacMullen, R. (1984) Christianizing the Roman Empire: (A.D. 100–400). New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Markus, R. A. (1974) Christianity in the Roman World. New York: Scribners.

Matthews, T. F. (1993) The Clash of Gods: A Reinterpretation of Early Christian Art. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

McDonald, L. M. (1995) The Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon, rev. and expanded. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers.

Metzger, B. (1987) The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance. New York: Oxford University Press.

Moss, C. (2012) Ancient Christian Martyrdom: Diverse Practices, Theologies, and Traditions. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Origen (1965) Contra Celsum. H. Chadwick, ed. and trans. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Osborn, E. F. (1973) Justin Martyr. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Osborn, E. F. (1997) Tertullian, First Theologian of the West. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Pearson, B. A. and Goehring, J. E. (eds) (1986) The Roots of Egyptian Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Pelikan, J. (1971) The Christian Tradition; A History of the Development of Doctrine. Vol. I: The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600). Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Quasten, J. (1950–86) Patrology. Vol. 1: The Beginnings of Patristic Literature; Vol. 2: The AnteNicene Literature After Irenaeus. Westminster, MD: Christian Classics, Inc.

Roberts, C. H. (1979) Manuscript, Society and Belief in Early Christian Egypt. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Rudolph, K. (1987) Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism. San Francisco, CA: Harper & Row.

Ruether, R. R. (1979) Faith and Fratricide: The Theological Roots of Anti-Semitism. New York: Seabury Press.

Saldarini, A (1994) Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Schoedel, W. and Wilken, R. (eds) (1979) Early Christian Literature and the Classical Intellectual Tradition. Paris: Editions Beauchesne.

Schoeps, H.-J. (1969) Jewish Christianity: Factional Disputes in the Early Church. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Simon, M. (1986) Verus Israel: A Study of the Relatiom between Christians and Jews in the Romans Empire (AD 135–425). New York: Oxford University Press.

Snyder, Graydon (2013) Ante Pacem: Archaeological Evidence of Church Life before Constantine. Revised edition. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Sordi, M. (1994) The Christians and the Roman Empire. Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press.

Stark, R. (1996) The Rise of Christianity: A Sociologist Reconsiders History. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Stevenson, J. (ed.) (1957) A New Eusebius: Documents Illustrative of the History of the Church to A.D. 337. London: SPCK.

Theron, D. J. (ed.) (1957) Evidence of Tradition. Reprinted 1980. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House.

Von Campenhausen, H. (1969) Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Von Harnack, A. (1924) Marcion: The Gospel of the Alien God. English trans. 1990. Durham, NC: Labyrinth Press.

Wagner, W. H. (1994) After the Apostles: Christianity in the Second Century. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Wilken, R. (1984) The Christians as the Romans Saw Them. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Williams, A. L. (1935) Adversus Judaeos. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Williams, M. (1999) Rethinking 'Gnosticism': An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Wilpert, J. (1903) Le pitture delle catacombe romane. Rome: Desclée, Lefebvre & Co.

Wilson, S. (1995) Related Strangers: Jews and Christians, 70–170 C.E. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

10

FROM CONSTANTINE TO THEODOSIUS (AND BEYOND)

Bill Leadbetter

The Great Persecution (303–311) and its consequences

Introduction

On 28 October 312, Constantine defeated his rival Maxentius just outside the city of Rome, across the Milvian Bridge (see Chapter 50). Constantine's troops bore an unusual emblem on their shields, probably the sign that we have come to know as the chi-rho, and before the battle they prayed together to the God of the Christians to grant them victory. Constantine entered Rome as victor on the field, but also as harbinger of an entirely new religious policy that would embrace Christianity as ferociously as Constantine's immediate predecessors had opposed it.

The Great Persecution began in 303 under Diocletian and his three fellow emperors (Maximian, Galerius and Constantius). It brought to an end a long peace in which the Church had both grown and prospered, alarming those most committed to the preservation of traditional values (De Labriolle 1942: 302–315; Barnes 1976; Judge 1983; Lane Fox 1986: 585–595; Leadbetter 2009: 119–127). Most prominent of these were the emperors themselves.

A series of edicts, each more severe than the last, demanded the submission of Christians to the imperial will (De Ste Croix 1954; Corcoran 1996: 179–182). These edicts were not enforced uniformly across the empire, but invited one of four responses from local Christian communities: compliance, defiance, flight and staying at home.

Popular Christianity exalted martyrdom (Brown 1981: 33–34; Lane Fox 1986: 434–450), and so some Christian communities found themselves violently divided amongst themselves, particularly in Rome, North Africa and Egypt. In the latter two, communal disagreements hardened into discrete schismatic communities. When Galerius brought persecution to an end in 311, he acknowledged the failure of repression in enforcing religious uniformity (Lactantius, De mortibus persecutorum 34.1). He did not note the unintended success of persecution in dividing Christian communities.

Rome

In Rome, Pope Marcellinus handed over the scriptures in obedience to the edict. Although he died late in 304, his successor Marcellus regarded this act as apostasy and he posthumously anathematized Marcellinus, removing his name from the official episcopal list. Many of the Christians in Rome were angered and violence broke out. As a consequence, Marcellus was exiled and Rome remained without a bishop until the election of Miltiades in July 311 (Barnes 1981: 38).

Egypt

In Egypt, Peter the Bishop of Alexandria fled the city, while a number of other bishops were imprisoned leaving the Church without ecclesiastical leadership. This vacuum was filled by Meletius, the Bishop of Lycopolis (modern Assiut), who performed a number of ordinations, but without warrant from Peter. Imprisoned bishops complained of this to Peter, whose authority Meletius ceased to recognize. Instead, Meletius expanded his activities into Alexandria (Williams 1987: 32–41). The result was a polarized Christian communion. According to Epiphanius' account, two distinct communities now emerged, the 'Catholic Church', in communion with Peter and his successor Alexander, and Meletius' 'Church of the Martyrs' (Panarion 68.3.8). Although the difference between the two communities was one of Church order, rather than one of doctrine, it engendered a schism that persisted long past the deaths of both Peter and Meletius.

North Africa

Donatism began in similar circumstances (Barnes 1975: 17–20; Frend and Clancy 1977). The issue which split the African Church for generations was the status of those who had, whether genuinely or only apparently, handed over (traditio) scriptures to the Roman authorities in accordance with the imperial edicts. Those who had done so (traditores) were regarded by the Donatists as apostate and ordinations by traditor bishops were held to be invalid. A detailed description of the origins, character and fate of Donatism appears under the hand of Jakob Engberg in Chapter 44 of this volume.

Christianity becomes a political issue

The uneven enforcement of the edicts was a consequence of substantial disagreement amongst members of the empire's governing élite about the merits of the persecution. The fourth edict, issued early in 304 and ordering universal sacrifice, was never enforced in the western provinces of the empire (De Ste Croix 1954: 84–96; Corcoran 1996: 182). This disagreement went as high as the imperial college itself, which became increasingly fragmented.

In 303, when the persecution commenced, the empire was governed by not one emperor but four, Diocletian, Maximian, Constantius and Galerius, all working together in an ordered and hierarchical imperial college, bound by mutual loyalty (see Figure 10.1). While the empire was not formally divided between the four emperors, each tended to concentrate their efforts in particular regions.

Nevertheless, it remained a unity, cohering by virtue of the harmony (concordia) between the emperors, and bound by their loyalty to Diocletian. When the victory by Galerius over the Sassanid Persians in 298 CE was commemorated in an arch in Thessaloniki dedicated in 303 CE (see Figure 10.2), one of the reliefs depicted a joint sacrifice by Diocletian and Maximian (see Figure 10.3).

In 305, Diocletian and his colleague, Maximian, abdicated. Constantius became the nominal senior Augustus and Galerius, his junior. Galerius, however, had strengthened his own position, insofar as the new nominees to the Caesarship, Severus and Maximinus Daia, were loyal to him. Accordingly, the empire was more obviously divided between the two Augusti, with clearly delineated spheres of authority. Constantius took direct responsibility for Britain, Gaul and Spain; Severus for Italy, Africa and the Upper Danube; Galerius for the Balkan provinces and Asia Minor; and Maximinus for Syria, Egypt and Libya.

The arrangement worked well enough until Constantius died in July 306 in York, England. By his side was his son, Constantine, who was immediately proclaimed as emperor by his father's army in that city. Anxious to avoid confrontation, Galerius compromised and accepted Constantine as his most junior colleague. Encouraged by Constantine's success in grafting himself into the imperial college, Maxentius, the son of Maximian, had himself proclaimed emperor in Rome. But there was no room for him; the college of four was full and Galerius declined to expand it. The concordia which had held Diocletian's empire together had vanished.

Figure 10.1   Statue of the Tetrarchs, now in Venice. Photo Bill Leadbetter

Christianity and imperial confrontation

Constantine seems to have been the first of the emperors to order a cessation of official hostilities and a restoration of property to the churches (Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 24.9). This has been taken by some to mean that Constantine was already a Christian (Alföldi 1948: 8–9; Elliot 1987, 1989). This is unlikely. What is more probable is that Constantine was making a clear distinction between himself and his colleagues in the matter of religious policy (Barnes 1981: 28). The favour which he showed towards Christianity and Christians was in sharp contrast to the hostility with which they met in the remainder of the empire. He also found them a useful resource. At least one bishop, Ossius of Cordova, soon became one of his senior advisers. I offer a detailed discussion of Constantine's attitude to Christianity in Chapter 50 of this volume.

Figure 10.2 The Arch of Galerius in Thessaloniki, photographed in July 2015 at the time of a referendum on whether Greece should accept the terms of a European bailout, with the banner on the right declaring 'No'. Photo Philip F. Esler

Figure 10.3 Relief showing a sacrifice by Diocletian and Maximian on the Arch of Galerius in Thessaloniki. This scene, from the early fourth century CE, is one of the last representations of pagan sacrifice in Roman art. Photo Bill Leadbetter

Galerius attempts to re-impose uniformity

In 308, Galerius sought to renegotiate power-sharing arrangements at a conference at the city of Carnuntum. The most important consequence of this conference was the appointment of Licinius, one of his oldest friends, as Augustus in place of Severus. Otherwise it failed: Constantine and Maximinus were offended and Maxentius was passed over.

When Galerius died in 311 (having ordered in 306 the construction of a rotunda in Thessaloniki possibly intended as his mausoleum; Figure 10.4), his immediate heritage was a divided empire. On his deathbed, he decreed toleration for all Christians. This represented a victory for policies of tolera-tion, but did nothing to unite his fractured realm. Galerius' death also ignited a struggle for mastery between the four remaining emperors: Maximinus in the east; Licinius in the Balkans; Maxentius in

Figure 10.4   The rotunda of Galerius in Thessaloniki. Photo Philip F. Esler

Italy and Africa; Constantine in Britain, Gaul and Spain. Constantine's victory over Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge was his first step in reuniting the empire.

The political consequences of the 'conversion' of Constantine

The question of whether Constantine really converted to Christianity, and if so when, has continued to excite controversy, as I set out in Chapter 50. What does matter for present purposes, however, is the way in which Constantine came to frame a religious policy with significant political implications that did more than merely tolerate Christianity.

Constantine and Licinius

Immediately following his defeat of Maxentius, Constantine confirmed his policy of toleration in an edict issued from Rome in which he ordered the cessation of persecution everywhere (Corcoran 1996: 187). This order was principally directed at Maximinus, who initially complied. Some months afterwards, Constantine met with Licinius in the city of Milan. There, the alliance between the two was sealed by the marriage of Licinius to Constantine's sister Constantia (Pohlsander 1993). They also produced a document The Edict of Milan, which was enforced in the provinces that they ruled directly. This granted universal toleration and the restitution of all Christian property.

In Chapter 50, I set out the details of the developing relationship between Constantine and Licinius and I need only summarize them here. Licinius soon engaged Maximinus in war, defeated and eliminated him, and took control of his lands. His relationship with the churches at this time was soured by political disputes with Constantine. In 316 CE, Licinius lost his European provinces to Constantine. In 324 he was finally defeated and deposed. All hostility to the churches came to an end. Constantine marked his victory by the foundation of the city that came to bear his name. From its commencement, Constantinople was intended as an entirely Christian city. Churches, not temples, were founded there, although they were enriched by the plundered wealth of the pagan past.

Martyrs and saints

The Great Persecution bequeathed to the Christian churches a rich martyrological heritage. Graves of martyrs had become holy places to Christians by the late third century (Brown 1981: 33–34) and the Great Persecution provided a context for martyr narratives. The traditions that these generated are rich and varied. St George, the patron saint of England, was slain at the order of Diocletian; St Demetrius, the saint of Thessaloniki, at the order of Maximian (probably meaning Galerius). Other military saints emerged, both real and fanciful: St Theagenes, St Theodore the slayer of a dragon, St Procopius (Delehaye 1909).

Moreover, while the Great Persecution did not occasion the invention of the genre of hagiography, it did provide an enormous amount of subject matter. The stories of martyrs were told and retold, written and rewritten (with advantages) to edify believers. To the compilers of such acta, historicity was far less an issue than moral value, although some stories may preserve valuable information (Barnes 1982: 176–180).

In essence, a new, and specifically Christian, mythology was being crafted. The Christian poet Prudentius recognized this quite explicitly in the late fourth century when he produced an epic poem On the Crowns of the Martyrs (Peristephanon Liber) which rewrote hagiography as Latin poetry (Palmer 1989; Roberts 1993). Four of the martyrs whom he commemorated in verse: St Eulalia, St Vincent, St Quirinus and St Romanus were victims of the Great Persecution.

In providing the Christian community with mythology of martyrdom, the Great Persecution also created a new sacred geography and a rich vocabulary of ordeal. The suffering of its victims (real or imagined) sanctified new places, which were, in turn, embellished and decorated by new generations of Christian patrons.

Constantine and the Church

In my profile of Constantine in Chapter 50 of this volume I expand in some detail upon his relationship with the churches. He became an active patron and benefactor of Christianity, although not in such a way as to offend pagan sentiment unduly. He subsidized the Church and exempted Christian clergy from civic duties, possibly as early as 313 CE. He also began involving himself in intra-Christian disputes such as Donatism and Arianism. In Chapter 50, I have set out details of the active interest which Constantine took in these controversies. He also began to strip the Jews of some of the privileges they had hitherto enjoyed and there is equivocal evidence that he banned sacrifice.

Above all, he began the construction of vast edifices for Christian worship, such as the churches of St John Lateran, St Peter's on the Vatican Hill (which involved a huge earth moving project), Santa Croce in Gerusalemme and St Lawrence-outside-the-walls.

Constantine's achievement

Although the question of the personal conversion of Constantine remains controversial, his public adoption of Christianity had profound effects. For the Church itself, the emperor became a new source of authority. Constantine's involvement with ecclesiastical matters intensified as the years went on. He established a role for himself as the arbiter and enforcer of doctrine, and also claimed the role of 'bishop of those outside the Church'. At the time of his death he was preparing for an expedition against Persia which featured the apparatus of a holy war (Barnes 1985).

To Christians such as Eusebius, he was the new Moses, who had led the Church from servitude into the promised land of established power and recognition. In an oration, he compared Constantine's court to that of God in Heaven, using the traditional language of mimesis to develop an extended simile of Constantine as the vicegerent of the Lord. Within the empire as a whole, moreover, Constantine intensified a process of change which can, in retrospect, be labelled 'christianization'.

The christianization of the empire

The new attractions of Christianity

The conversion of Constantine did not make Rome a Christian empire, nor could it. The emperor neither mandated Christianity for his subjects, nor abandoned the traditional pagan language and iconography of coin portraits. He retained the imperial cult and the title of pontifex maximus. After his death, he received apotheosis from the Roman Senate. Constantine's conversion does, nevertheless, show an intensification and acceleration of a process which had commenced with the apostles.

For three centuries, the Church had existed outside the continuum of ancient society. Becoming a Christian had meant an instinctual separation from the social world of classical culture. As a proscribed group, Christians lived within a subculture vulnerable to external attack and internal subversion through heresy. As such, they had existed at the mercy of neighbours who feared them, and blamed them when disaster fell.

Constantine's own generosity towards the Church sent an unambiguous signal to his people. The gulf between the Church and its social environment had been bridged: becoming a Christian ought no longer to invite fear, suspicion and rejection. It was a signal that was amplified by the stratagem that he employed to pay for this patronage: the pillage of the treasuries of the temples.

The attractions of wealth

Soon after Constantine had secured control of the east, and simultaneous with his intervention in the Arian controversy, trusted operatives were dispersed to inspect and confiscate the riches that had been accumulated by the gods. Works of art were remitted to Constantine's new city on the Bosporus. Deprived of their contexts, they served instead to advertise the scale of Constantine's victory over the past. Bullion, gilding, jewels, the thank-offerings of the gods' grateful clients, now provided the foundation for the historic wealth of the Church.

This redistribution of resources sent a powerful but unspoken message to contemporaries. The traditional religion of the empire had been cut loose from imperial patronage; its place in the social and political fabric of society was no longer integral. For its part, the newly wealthy Church was able to call upon vast sums in its work of charity. The Church had traditionally supported those of its members who were marginal within classical society: widows and orphans, the infirm and the destitute. The scale of support which the Church could now offer drew many new adherents.

Charity was not the only benefit that the Church could impart to its members. Constantine endowed the Church with legal privileges. The exemption of clergy from the performance of civic duties was a powerful enticement to men of the curial class. Every town in the Roman empire was regulated and administered by a council (curia) of local aristocrats, named after the Curia in Rome (see Figure 10.5), who formed a class, the curiales, which had long borne the weight of local patronage and civic duty. For decades, they had complained of this enforced burden. In the years of Diocletian and Constantine, this became even more onerous since the revenue bases of the cities themselves had collapsed as a consequence of the period of sustained inflation during the third century.

In exempting the clergy from curial duty, Constantine provided a powerful inducement for aristocrats to engage in the public life of the Church. Such an inducement was rendered all the more enticing by the legislation that recognized the juridical authority of a bishop. Such legislation encouraged curiales to pursue an ecclesiastic career since it provided status without making burdensome financial demands. Towards the end of Constantine's life, his biographer Eusebius complained of the numbers of people who had come into the Church for the wrong reasons, and who counterfeited a faith for the sake of convenience and advancement (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 4.54.2).

A new dynasty

Constantine also encouraged his immediate family to embrace Christianity. His mother Helena had become a Christian, possibly before Constantine himself (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.47); his eldest son, Crispus, received a Christian tutor (Jerome, De viris illustribus [On Famous Men] 80). At some point too, the elderly Eutropia, widow of Maximian, became a Christian (Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 2.4.6). Constantine's younger sons were all raised as Christians; his half-brothers and their families likewise. Constantine's half-brother, Julius Constantius was married to the Christian lady Basilina, and their sons, Gallus and Julian received a Christian education (Vogt 1963: 50f.). Of Constantine's half-sisters, Constantia was a pious lady who favoured the Arians, and apparently was a source of advice to them at Nicaea (Pohlsander 1993).

Figure 10.5   The Curia, or Senate House, in Rome. Photo Bill Leadbetter

The conversion of Constantine's family ensured that the faith would be passed on to the next generation. Constantine's sons were all faithful men who sought to play their parts in Church affairs; likewise the daughters of the next generation, Eusebia, Constantina and Helena. Of his surviving nephews, Gallus remained devout; Julian, who despised his family, rejected their faith.

A new aristocracy

The imperial family stood at the apex of the social pyramid of the empire. Immediately below them came the families of the senatorial aristocracy of Rome (and later of Constantinople), and the curial families of the empire's cities. The Roman aristocracy proved most resistant to religious change (Arnheim 1972: 50f.) Notable individuals certainly did convert to Christianity (Alföldi 1948: 118f.), although not in great numbers. If the men of the Roman aristocracy clung to their traditions, the women who bore and married them did not. There is good evidence that, at least from the beginning of the fourth century, Christianity gained a firm footing in the households of the aristocracy from the increasing adherence of aristocratic women (Brown 1961). They became the patrons and supporters of the Church. Moreover, such patronage and support was increasingly solicited by clergy. Pope Damasus (366–384) was nicknamed 'the ear-tickler' from his frequent attendance upon such potential donors (Collectio Avellana 1.10). Indeed, by 370, the emperors had written to Pope Damasus forbidding clerics to attend upon widows and female wards, and from privately receiving bequests from their estates (Theodosian Code 16.2.20).

The Roman aristocracy, however, were only briefly of more than symbolic importance in the political affairs of the late empire. The locus of power had shifted from Rome long before. In 330, Constantine dedicated a new city on the Bophorus. Called Constantinople after its founder, it became the regular residence of Roman emperors in the east. Constantine not only adorned it with stolen art treasures but also with a senatorial class of its own. It has been asserted that when this class was recruited, preference was given to Christian curiales (Alföldi 1948: 115). There is some evidence to support this. One of its first luminaries, Flavius Ablabius, was a Christian. Honoratus, the first Urban Prefect of Constantinople, was entrusted by Constantius II with the arbitration of ecclesiastical disputes (Socrates, Historia Ecclesiastica 2.4.1; Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 4.23.3). The Christianity of members of this class may not have run especially deep. Domitius Modestus, who succeeded Honoratus as urban prefect, was a Christian under Constantius, a pagan under Julian, and an Arian Christian under Valens (Jones et al. 1971: 608). It can, however, be stated with some confidence that by the end of the century the Constantinopolitan élite was largely Christian (Liebeschuetz 1990: 140–145).

Bishops, monks and nuns

A new élite was also emerging parallel to the senatorial class. In the world of traditional, polytheistic religion, official priestly tasks had always been performed by the city curiales. Only in rare cases did individual cults have a dedicated priesthood; otherwise the social and spiritual worlds of classical cities were profoundly integrated. The sectarian origins of Christianity, however, determined a different kind of priesthood: one that existed separate from and parallel to secular society. Accordingly, in its first three centuries, the churches were compelled to define and develop an authority structure as a consequence of internal conflict over doctrine.

Bishops exercised an authority that was divinely given and transmitted through the laying on of hands (Clement, First Epistle to the Corinthians 44.1–5). They acted as monarchs within their own community. When those communities were small and marginal, the realm of episcopal power was tiny indeed. As the power and the scope of the Church grew, so did that of its rulers. While it is impossible to quantify the number of people who identified as Christians after 312, the qualitative evidence suggests that increasing numbers of ordinary folk were joining the churches (Brown 1978: 57f.; Frend 1984: 434–452). Such people looked to their bishops and clergy as sources of more than ecclesiastical authority.

This was a process which was given impetus by the progressive privileging of the Church in the legislation of Constantine and Constantius II. An early law of Constantine's empowered bishops to superintend the manumission of slaves (Code of Justinian 1.13.1); another awarded legal competence to episcopal courts, even as courts of appeal on secular matters (Theodosian Code 1.27.1). Such a civic function could only enhance the role of the bishop as an ecclesiastical aristocrat. Great sees became the focus of intense competition between ambitious clergy (MacMullen 1990: 266f.). In 366, the rivalry between two claimants for the see of Rome led to violence and massacre (Ammianus Marcellinus 27.3.12–15). For most of Athanasius' tenure of the see of Alexandria, he had to contend with a rival bishop (Barnes 1993: 19). The prize was worth it. Bishops of great sees, like Athanasius and Ambrose, could dare to lecture emperors. On a less elevated level, such bishops controlled the purse-strings of charity. As patrons of the poor, they assumed a peculiar burden of euergetism that brought them an enhanced civic status (Brown 1992: 90–103).

Simultaneous with the privileging of the formal rulers of the Church, there arose the less formal, and more charismatic, spiritual élite of holy men and women. Even before the victory of Constantine, Christians had withdrawn into the desert to pursue an ascetic and individual holiness. In both Syria and Egypt in particular, the wildernesses became richly peopled with those who rejected the civic life for a rigorously applied pursuit of the divine (Chitty 1966). For local communities blessed with the propinquity of such a holy person, there was a ready-made arbiter of disputes. For obdurate pagans, here was a spiritual athlete to whom surrender was no disgrace (Brown 1971, 1995: 55–78).

A new army

From the eve of the battle of the Milvian Bridge, Constantine used the army as a vehicle for his new approach to religion. The prayers that Constantine ordered his soldiers to pray before battle turned his armies into instruments of divine will as well as imperial policy. He gave Christian officers preference in promotion (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 4.52), and ensured that his troops were provided with spiritual support. The field tent he set aside for his private devotions became a mobile chapel with a staff of clergy who functioned as military chaplains (Jones 1953; Helgeland 1978: 813f) and he ordered Sunday as a festal day for his soldiers (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 4.18–19).

The army, however, was not a particularly malleable institution (Jones 1963: 23f.; Macmullen 1984: 45–49). It had long been a place of religious diversity, but soldiers were nevertheless reminded of the religious convictions of the state whenever they received their pay. Soon after Constantine's victory over Licinius, the figure of the deity Sol Invictus disappeared from Constantine's coinage. With some minor exceptions, this ended the routine appearance of deities on the coinage and, thereafter, Christian motifs predominated (Bruun 1958, 1962, 1966: 61–64).

By the time Julian came to publicly abandon Christianity in 351 CE, the army was, at least superficially, Christian. While he claimed that most of the troops with him were faithful to the gods (Letter 38), such a claim might have been more rhetorical than real. There were certainly a great many Christians in the eastern legions that he inherited after the death of Constantius II, and some of these refused to heed his new religious policy (Jones 1963: 25). Two standard-bearers refused to remove the labarum from the standards of their legions or to perform sacrifices and were beheaded for their obstinacy (Bowersock 1978: 107).

Significantly, Julian did not purge the senior ranks of the army. A Christian tradition that the later emperor Valentinian was punished for clinging to his faith (see Jones et al. 1971: 933) must be dismissed as a pious fiction (Nixon 1997). Christian generals who had served under Constantius retained their rank and duties under Julian, most notably Arintheus and Victor, who actively participated in the conclave of generals after Julian's death (Ammianus Marcellinus 25.5.2).

After Julian's death in 363 CE, pagan officers and men continued to serve (Tomlin 1998), retaining rank and prominence. The household commander, Dagalaifus, held commands under Valentinian, and served a consulship in 366 (Jones et al. 1971: 239). One of Julian's closest advisers, Salutius Secundus, was both a prominent pagan and, following Julian's death, proposed as his successor by the conclave of officers (Ammianus Marcellinus 25.5.3). He refused, but continued to hold office under Jovian and Valentinian (Jones et al. 1971: 814–817). The Manichaean Sebastianus held commands under Constantius II, Julian, Valentinian and Valens (Tomlin 1998: 37). Perhaps the most famous military pagan was Ammianus Marcellinus who had served under both Constantius II and Julian. By the beginning of the fifth century, most of the army's senior officers were Christians, although with egregious exceptions like Arbogast and Fravitta (Jones 1963: 25; Tomlin 1998).

A new emperor

As priests and rulers, the emperors of Rome had always acted as guarantors of the relationship between the Romans and their gods. It was in service of this that such traditionalists as Decius, Valerian and Diocletian had assaulted the Church (Leadbetter 1996). The immediate impact upon the imperial office of Constantine's conversion was in his immediate exercise of religious authority on behalf of the churches, both in seeking to settle disputes and in promoting Christianity to the pagan world. This had its own consequences both for Constantine's perception of his own role as Christian emperor and also for Christian understandings of what the empire was, and its place in human history.

A new theology of power became essential. Eusebius of Caesarea provided an influential and coherent model. In a speech in praise of Constantine, Eusebius portrayed the emperor as the earthly counterpart of the divine logos, just as monarchy was the earthly counterpart of monotheism (In Praise of Constantine 2–5; Baynes 1934; Fowden 1993: 87–89). Eusebius was careful, using language that was acceptable both to Christian and non-Christian ears alike (Drake 1976: 57). If Constantine was content with this degree of ambiguity, his successors made the new theology of power overt and explicit.

An implication can readily be drawn here. In this model, the emperor must display an exemplary piety. Religious controversialists like Athanasius and political bishops like Ambrose exploited this in pursuit of their ecclesiastical objectives. Constantius II was reviled as antichrist and persecutor for his Arianism (Barnes 1993: 106); the impeccably Catholic Theodosius I suffered the censure of Ambrose for sanctioning atrocities (Ambrose, Epistle 41, 51; Matthews 1975: 232–236).

For Constantine, however, piety and policy combined. He famously claimed to be the 'bishop of those outside the Church'. That included those outside the empire as well, and in his later years Constantine developed links with the Christians of Persia while he prepared to launch what amounted to a holy war upon their Zoroastrian rulers (Barnes 1985; Fowden 1993: 93–98). While Constantine's successors did not necessarily share his zeal for missionary imperialism, they were all compelled to assume an egregious piety. None could ignore Christian controversy. The empire was now God's land.

A new landscape

One factor that enabled this new ideology to prosper was its incorporation into the rhythms of everyday life. By the end of the fourth century, Jerome could claim that Christian basilicas were richly peopled with worshippers, while the temples of the old gods provided shelter only for owls and spiders (Epistle 107; see Tomlin 1998: 21). While such a claim is rhetorical, it does underscore the fact that a new and profoundly Christian sense of place was emerging.

This is especially evident in the part played in civic life by the dead. In the classical city, the dead had been removed from the city. Cemeteries were outside the walls: the remains housed there contaminated those who touched them (Brown 1981: 1–22). To Christians, graves were holy places; the corpses of the martyrs conferred merit. Even before the legalization of Christianity, tombs of martyrs had become centres of worship, and their mortal remains had become sacred relics. Individual sites of devotion emerged, as a more generalized cult of the saints also developed. As the reach of Christianity grew, it even became necessary to export sanctity by translating relics to new Church communities (Markus 1990: 94f.).

When Constantine and his successors came to act as patrons of the Church, many of the new houses of worship that they constructed were over the tombs of such saints. In Rome, St Peter, St Paul and St Lawrence were honoured with great basilicas. These new cathedrals in Rome, and elsewhere, shifted the balance of civic life. Traditional religion had been incorporated into the physical heart of the city. Christianity shifted this focus to the urban fringes.

Beyond those fringes, the villages and towns of the countryside could boast the sanctity either of their own martyrs or the presence of holy people. It was not only the martyred dead whose touch and prayer could confer sanctity. Holy men and women, prayerful ascetics, whether in community or alone, provided a tangible mediation between sinful humanity and the eternal Kingdom of God. Where once hills and groves had been holy places, now it was islands, caves or even pillars.

Sacred history so tinged the province of Palestine, where Christianity began and where so many of the stories of the Bible are set, that it became terra sancta – 'the Holy Land'. Pilgrims now came from the highest echelons. Constantine's mother Helena and his mother-in-law, Eutropia, set the fashion, recovering the True Cross, founding churches (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.41) and complaining about the pagans of Mamre (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.51). Wealthy pilgrims came by ship and road from the ends of the empire, and even from outside it. They came to experience the land of the Bible (Hunt 1982: 50–82) and some, even, to stay. Jerome settled in Bethlehem while his arch-rival Rufinus made his home in Jerusalem.

This new geography of holiness formed a new and complex Christian map (Markus 1990: 151–155). Constantine's churches rose as defunded temples fell into decay. Below the Church altars lay the relics of the martyred heroes of Christian mythology whose sanctity was shared by local and pilgrim alike. The countryside too was populated with living martyrs – holy men and women – simultaneously in and outside the world. This embedded christianization does much to explain the strength of the Church's position when it came under challenge from a pagan revival.

The persistence of paganism

Introduction

Constantine did not make Rome Christian. Traditional religion could not be so easily discarded. While many eagerly embraced the new faith, others were energized to defend tradition and reassert ancient values. The strength of traditional religion in the army has already been discussed, but it was only one of several institutions in which paganism persisted with grim vigour. Likewise, in civilian society, philosophers, aristocrats, municipal élites and agricultural labourers maintained their traditions tenaciously, even in the face of overt government hostility. For a brief moment, the reign of Julian gave such folk hope that devastated temples might be restored, and traditional worship returned to the centre of the social and civic life of the empire.

Julian (c. 331–363 CE) and the survival of paganism

Julian's career (see Chapter 60) illustrates both the strength of pagan survival and also its weakness. Born in Constantinople into the Christian imperial family, Julian's father, eldest bother, uncles and cousins were slaughtered in the massacre which marked the accession of Constantine's sons. Julian and his brother Gallus were brought up at isolated properties in an atmosphere of superstition and fear. His rejection of his family's Christianity was a personal one, made fairly early in his life (Browning 1976: 40–47; MacMullen 1984: 71). It was, however, made possible by one of the ambiguities of christianization: the educational syllabus (paideia) that a young man was taught remained unchanged. Whatever the teacher's religion, the core texts remained Homer, Virgil and the classics of traditional literature. Julian had able teachers and access to a vast library. Moreover, as he grew older, he was also able to take advantage of the wisdom of the pagan Sophists of Athens.

Pagan intellectuals

Constantine and his successors did not dispense with the services of able men. There were prominent pagans at the courts of the emperors in senior, if vulnerable, positions. The pagan sophist Sopater enjoyed the patronage of Constantine until brought down by Ablabius, the Christian Praetorian Prefect (Eunapius, Lives of the Sophists 462–463). Constantius II employed the philosopher Eustathius on diplomatic missions (Eunapius, Lives of the Sophists 465–466) and the rhetorician Themistius prospered at his court, becoming the principal publicist of Constantius' rule (Vanderspoel 1995) and entrusted with the critical task of expanding the Constantinopolitan Senate from 300 to 2,000 members.

While some intellectuals converted to Christianity through genuine conviction, most notably Firmicus Maternus and Marius Victorinus (Leadbetter 1998a), others remained hostile to the Constantinian settlement and sought to reverse it. Eunapius, a recusant himself, whose vigorous loathing of Constantine is reflected in the pages of Zosimus' history, compiled a series of brief biographies of such people, all intellectuals (Momigliano 1963: 95–97; Blockley 1981: 1–26). The most noteworthy of these was Libanius, whose lectures in Nicomedia Julian had been forbidden to attend. A rhetorician and Antiochene aristocrat, he not only taught some of the best minds of his age – both Christian and pagan – but also published his correspondence and speeches. He was a warrior for tradition, on one occasion pleading the case for the toleration of traditional worship to Theodosius in the mid 380s. In this speech (Oration 30), Libanius pleaded that the temples be protected from Christian vigilantes. It was a brave speech, made to one who was a bitter foe of his faith.

The army and administration

Julian's ascent to power was through the army. The west had been ruled after Constantine's death by his son, Constans. In 350, he was dethroned and killed by a cabal of his officers and replaced with a general named Magnentius. Magnentius was generally tolerant of pagan practice (MacMullen 1984: 48; Barnes 1993: 102). He partially reversed the ban on sacrifice, permitting their performance at night (Theodosian Code 16.10.5). While this was the policy of a usurper trying to appeal for support to particular interest groups (he also attracted the support of Athanasius), it does indicate that he considered pagans to be worth courting.

After Constantius' defeat of Magnentius, he sent Julian to Gaul to guard the Rhine frontier. There, Julian found kindred spirits amongst the cadre of western officers and was encouraged by the number of pagans whom he found in the army. After he had been proclaimed emperor by his legions in 360 CE, he met many more who had worn their Christianity lightly: Pegasius, Bishop of Ilium, had kept the fires of sacrifice burning to the ancient heroes of the Trojan War (Chuvin 1990: 40–42); the aristocrat Domitius Modestus, who had held high office under Constantius, apostatized and was rewarded with the city prefecture of Constantinople; the sophist Hecebolius who had taught Julian likewise abandoned his faith. Both men returned to the Church after Julian's demise (Bowder 1978: 103).

The paganism of the countryside

Julian's religion was intellectual rather than popular, so he was unable to appeal to traditional paganism where it was strongest. Although temples had been robbed of their riches, they were still the centre of ritual (Libanius, Or. 30.6), and although sacrifice had been forbidden, people in the countryside continued to celebrate festivals by a communal feast of meat (Or. 30. 17–19). Christianity had made considerable impact in cities, but its influence in the countryside was patchy. It was strong in North Africa (Jones 1963: 18f.) and the Nile valley (Frankfurter 1998: 265–284), for example, but much of the countryside of Italy and Gaul was still resolutely pagan. So too was most of the population of Sardinia and, in Palestine, the inhabitants of Gaza (Jones 1963: 18–19; Macmullen 1984: 81; Chuvin 1990: 76–80). In Egypt, pagan names survived in some numbers amongst the liturgical class (Borkowski 1990). While Coptic was increasingly employed as a Christian liturgical language, the traditional cults still tenaciously persisted (Frankfurter 1998: 257–264).

These instances of paganism were not survivals, but continuities. Although Christianity offered a way to reframe belief patterns, many of the rural population did not see the point and the rhythms of rural life continued as they had for centuries. Such people were not warriors for paganism like Julian or Libanius, but they offered a resistance to Christianity that was more trenchant, more stolid and more enduring.

The failure of Julian

Julian's early death in 363 CE is only a symbolic marker of his failure. Far more revealing is the reception of the edict of 362 CE in which he forbade Christian rhetoricians from teaching the pagan classics. This drew criticism even from some of his pagan supporters (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.20.7; 25.4.20). The large number of Christian teachers who were now disbarred from practising their profession indicates the strength of Christianity amongst the empire's intellectuals (Jones 1963: 30–31). After his death, this was one of the first measures to be reversed (Markus 1974: 2–4).

The opposition to this measure indicates just how deeply Christianity had dug itself into the structures of the empire. Julian's own approach had been to confront this by making traditional cult socially indistinguishable from Christianity (Chuvin 1990: 46–48; Nicholson 1991). His failure may well have lain in that choice of strategy. Had he embraced the less austere paganism of the peasants, and emphasized festival over ritual, the outcome might have been very different.

Paganism in the Roman aristocracy

Julian's natural supporters were in the senatorial aristocracy of Rome. Here paganism was as much a matter of civic pride as conviction. Some prospered under Julian's rule: Vettius Agorius Praetextatus was appointed to the governorship of Achaea (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.7.6). Praetextatus held numerous priestly offices and was later depicted as an interlocutor in the pagan dinner party at the heart of Macrobius' Saturnalia. He might have prospered under any emperor. He retained his governorship under Valentinian, persuading him not to enforce in Achaea his edict prohibiting nocturnal sacrifices (Zosimus, New History 4.3.3). He restored the Portico of the 'Consenting Gods' (Dii Consentes (Figure 10.6)), the last piece of pagan construction in the Roman Forum and subsequently held office as Prefect of Rome and Praetorian Prefect of Illyricum, Italy and Africa.

Figure 10.6   The Portico of the Dii Consentes. Constructed in 367, it was the last pagan structure built in the Roman Forum. Photo Bill Leadbetter

Not all aristocratic families were so obstinate. The Anicii, famed for both ancestry and avarice, became Christian during the reign of Constantine (Novak 1979: 291). Others took a little longer, but in 382, it was plausibly claimed that Christian senators were in the majority (Ambrose, Epistles 17.10; 18.8ff). Many of these, however, barely attended meetings. Of those families that dominated the Senate in the late fourth century, most were pagan.

For Constantine's immediate successors, this hardly mattered. They left the senatorial aristocracy largely unmolested. Constantius, for example, explicitly preferred talent over religious conviction and, during his visit to Rome in 357, even nominated successors to the vacancies in a number of priestly colleges (Symmachus, Relatio 3.7; Cameron 1968: 98f.). Valentinian, who ruled in the west after the death of Julian, was famously tolerant (Ammianus Marcellinus 30.9.5).

Gratian, politics and the senate (375–383 CE)

In 375, however, Valentinian suddenly died and was succeeded by his teenage son, Gratian. Gratian's succession was guaranteed by his uncle, Valens, who ruled the eastern half of the empire, but was complicated by the nomination of his four-year-old half-brother, Valentinian II. Gratian accepted his brother's elevation and, by virtue of his age, he remained the senior emperor in the west (Matthews 1975: 64; Sivan 1993: 120).

Gratian's tutor was the Gallic rhetorician, Ausonius. Of aristocratic temperament, he was a correspondent of the great pagan senator Symmachus. At the time of Valentinian's death, relations between imperial office and Senate were at a low point. Valentinian had little time for aristocrats and had preferred to promote military men to high office (Alföldi 1952; Matthews 1975: 56–63). The accession of the 16-year-old Gratian brought to power a group of courtly Christians who resented this military caste. As aristocrats and intellectuals, they sought to defend the prerogatives of men of their own class. They sought rapprochement with the alienated Senate; senators dutifully praised the accession of Gratian as the dawn of a new age (Matthews 1975: 66–67, 1989: 273; Sivan 1993: 125f.).

During his first years, Gratian's court was based at distant Trier in the Mosel valley. Offices were held by allies and connections of Ausonius. In 378, however, things changed dramatically. Gratian's uncle Valens, emperor in the east, was slain in battle with the Goths at Adrianople along with two-thirds of his field army and most of his high command. It was a military calamity of epic proportions that required a firm response from Gratian. He returned to his father's military cadre, appointing Theodosius as the military commander to deal with the crisis, and then as emperor in the east (Matthews 1975: 93–98; see also Sivan 1993: 121f.).

In 381, the imperial court settled at Milan, in proximity to the city's forthright bishop, Ambrose (see Chapter 57 of this volume for a detailed profile of this remarkable man). Ambrose was a warrior for Nicene orthodoxy against the strong community of Arians in north Italy. In 378, he dedicated the first volume of his polemic against Arianism to Gratian, and sought to win him as a partisan. Like Ausonius, Ambrose was an aristocrat. His father had been Praetorian Prefect in Gaul under Constantine II who may have been executed after Constantine's defeat (Jones et al. 1971: 51, n. 1). Ambrose himself had followed a steady civil career, largely with the support of the great Christian senator, Petronius Probus, until he was suddenly and unexpectedly elected Bishop of Milan in 374 (Paulinus, Life of Ambrose 2, 3–5, 8).

Despite the similarity in their backgrounds, the approaches of Ambrose and Ausonius to religious matters were diametrically opposed. Ausonius' literary works show a Christian who was much at home in the classical world. Ambrose by contrast was a warrior engaged in spiritual and political combat with Arianism, and who consistently sought alliance with the emperor (Rousseau 1996).

Early in 380, Ambrose was invited to instruct Gratian in matters of faith. From this point on, the young emperor became increasingly inclined to intervene in religious matters. This intervention was initially in defence of Christian orthodoxy, but Gratian then turned his attention to the pagan symbols of Rome. In so doing, he launched the first determined assault on the paganism of the leaders of the aristocracy. Amongst his decisions were the removal of state subsidies for traditional priestly cults (including the Vestal Virgins, who now lost their government-funded allowances), the removal of the Statue of Victory in the Senate House, and (critically) his repudiation of the title of pontifex maximus which had been borne by all emperors since Augustus (Theodosian Code 16.10.20; Zosimus, New History 4.36; Cameron 1968).

In assuming this interventionist policy, Gratian was rejecting the broad policy of tolerance which had marked the reigns of Constantius II, Valentinian and his own earlier years. Other emperors had tampered with these symbols, but not permanently: Constantius II had removed the Altar of Victory from the Senate House (Symmachus, Relatio 3.4), but this had been reversed by Julian. Furthermore, Gratian was disinclined even to hear appeals from even distinguished pagan senators for a return to tolerance. On several occasions, Symmachus sought an audience with the emperor, but was refused (Symmachus, Relatio 3.2). The abandonment of the title of pontifex maximus was especially significant. The office had been a vestige of the pagan empire and once it had been rejected by a Christian emperor, it could not be employed again (Cameron 1968: 97). Moreover, the cessation of state subsidies for pagan religion (of more immediate concern to Symmachus) could never, for the same reason, be restored.

Theodosius and the triumph of Catholic orthodoxy

Introduction

Gratian was overthrown in 383 in a military conspiracy. His murderers were all Christians, and their nominee was the aggressively orthodox Magnus Maximus. An officer of Spanish origin, Maximus had served with Theodosius' father in Britain and in Africa (Ammianus Marcellinus 27.8.1ff; 29.5.6).

Gratian had appointed him to a senior military command in Britain (Jones et al. 1971: 588) and it was from here that he rebelled, seizing the British, Spanish and Gallic provinces while the 13-year-old Valentinian II held the Balkans, Italy and Africa.

Maximus' usurpation did not immediately split the empire. Theodosius tolerated it and Maximus gave no immediate indication of designs upon Valentinian II's lands. Remaining in the north with his court in Trier, he concentrated upon the imperial duty of guarding the Gallic provinces, a duty he performed well enough.

Emperors and heretics

The accession of Theodosius, together with the more interventionist polices of Gratian mark a new stage in the involvement of the emperor in ecclesiastical disputation. Although Constantius II and Valens had been partisan in the Arian controversy, neither emperor had actually moved to criminalize what they perceived to be heresy. Political bishops like Athanasius had suffered exile, but no law defined and made orthodoxy obligatory. Every emperor ruling in the generation after Adrianople was obliged to make a decision about the direction of religious policy and the relations between Church and State.

Magnus Maximus and the Priscillianists

In 379, Gratian had issued an edict in which he formally reiterated the prohibition on heresy, and expressed the pious wish that it would cease everywhere. Beyond this, however, he would not go (Theodosian Code 16.5.5). As such, Gratian was following a policy set by his predecessors. Magnus Maximus changed all this. When the Priscillianist controversy arose, his intervention went far beyond that of Gratian.

Priscillian was a Spanish aristocrat who became a Christian in the 370s. Independently minded, he formulated a theology much of which is still unclear. What is evident is that his views were egalitarian, ascetic and bore affinities to Gnosticism (Matthews 1975: 161–170; Chadwick 1976; Frend 1984: 711–713). These proved extremely popular amongst the aristocratic communities of Gaul and Spain, and thus provided the movement with a wealthy and literate laity. In 380, an ecclesiastical council in Saragossa condemned some Priscillianist teachings, but not the man himself. Priscillian was consecrated Bishop of Avila in 381, but, pursued by ecclesiastical enemies, he fled Spain and sought support in Gaul and northern Italy (Frend 1984: 712). Gratian responded by formally exiling all heretics (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.47.6; Matthews 1975: 163). Priscillian and his followers instead went on a missionary tour in southern Gaul and Italy. Although they were not received by either Pope Damasus or Ambrose, they were able to lobby Macedonius, the Master of Offices (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.48.5; 49.3). He procured official toleration for the Priscillianists, who returned to Spain in triumph. Their chief persecutors, in turn, fled from Spain.

At this point, however, the government changed. Gratian was overthrown; Magnus Maximus succeeded to the relevant provinces. Eager to proclaim his religious affiliation, he received baptism soon after his proclamation, a matter which he stressed in an extant letter to Pope Siricius (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 35.90–91; Matthews 1975: 165; Nixon 1987: 83). Priscillian's enemies hastened to Maximus' court to seek his support, which was duly given. Maximus called a council at Bordeaux which re-anathematized Priscillianism. Priscillian appealed directly to the emperor but failed at trial and was sentenced to death. Maximus did not intervene and, as a consequence, Priscillian and a number of his supporters were executed (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.50.7). Others were exiled.

The executions were not accomplished naively. Maximus was fully aware of what they portended. He defended himself to the Pope by asserting that he was a defender of the Church, and the executions had been performed in accordance with that duty; that the Priscillianists had not been Christians, but Manichaeans; and that his action had prevented schism (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 35.90–91). But the genie was out of the bottle; Christians had been executed by Christians for holding heterodox views.

Valentinian II and the Altar of Victory

After the death of Gratian, the 13-year-old Valentinian II had come to live in Milan. The principal figure at his court was his formidable, and Arian, mother Justina. In 384, not long after their arrival in the city, a despatch was received from the courtly and eloquent Aurelius Symmachus, Prefect of Rome. In it, Symmachus reported, and endorsed, a resolution of the Senate which had asked for the restoration of the Altar of Victory to the Senate House. The letter (Symmachus, Relatio 3) is an eloquent plea for pluralism, tolerance and a bold assertion of the historic value of traditional religion to the empire.

Symmachus' arguments were anticipated by Ambrose who wrote to the emperor (Ambrose, Epistle 17), reminding him that pagans had never been so tolerant and exhorted him to act as a Christian emperor should. Upon formal receipt of Symmachus' petition, Ambrose wrote again to Gratian (Epistle 18) in which he responded to Symmachus' arguments. Ambrose ridiculed traditional paganism and reminded his audience of the persecution of the Church. Moreover, asserted Ambrose, the meeting of the Senate which had passed the resolution supported by Symmachus had been packed with pagans; the majority of senators were in fact Christian.

The debate was a polite one. The polemic was no more than a rhetorical device that both combatants knew well. Valentinian rejected Symmachus' petition, heeding Ambrose's exhortations to be a 'Christian monarch', as Gratian had done before him.

Theodosius, the Catholic Church and the Cunctos populos decree of 380 CE

Theodosius was a devout Catholic Christian who had no doubt as to the merits of his faith. Almost as soon as he had taken power, he nailed his colours to the mast (Liebeschuetz 1990: 157; Williams and Friell 1994: 53). In February 380, he issued an edict known by its first two words as 'Cunctos populos' ('All peoples'; Theodosian Code 16.1.2). This law mandated Catholic Christianity (as defined by the Bishop of Rome) as the one true faith. The law ordered all Christians to hold to this orthodoxy, abandoning all other Christian groups which were adjudged mad and incoherent and forbidden to call themselves 'churches'.

This drastic intervention was not without risk. Arianism was far stronger than Nicene orthodoxy in the east. Theodosius had prepared carefully (Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 7.4; Liebeschuetz 1990: 158), and was satisfied that his opposition was sufficiently divided to be ineffectual. Nevertheless, the edict was not received well in Constantinople; there was rioting, and Theodosius was compelled to enter the city and expel the Arian clergy (Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 7.5–7). The installation of the fiercely Nicene Gregory Nazianzus as Patriarch of Constantinople could only be enforced through the deployment of soldiers.

Theodosius then tried a new strategy. On 10 January 381 he issued a law which named the heresies to be outlawed: the Photinians, the Arians and the Eunomians (Theodosian Code 16.5.6). Those who adhered to these assemblies were to be denied the name and privileges of Church; persistent offenders were to be driven from towns where their views had been made manifest. Theodosius was, inexorably, moving to a position where Catholic, or Nicene, Christianity, was enshrined in law and alternative doctrinal systems were banned.

Theodosius also saw the merits in reasserting the theology of Nicaea. A new ecumenical council was called to meet in Constantinople in May 381. This Council marked the formal victory of Trinitarianism over Arianism. An amended version of the Nicene Creed was adopted – the one substantially still in use today. The critical importance of the Council of Constantinople was that it enabled orthodoxy (as it became) to refine itself since, henceforth, the Creed which it produced became the touchstone of all that was doctrinally proper.

The Council marked the acceleration of the legislative campaign against heresy. Measures became harsher as the year progressed. In July, heretics (and Arians were here again named) were forbidden to build meeting-houses (Theodosian Code 16.5.8). Less than two weeks later, Theodosius ordered the expulsion of all non-catholic clergy and bishops, and their replacement by orthodox church-men (Theodosian Code 16.1.3). This law defined orthodoxy as the doctrines held by the Bishops of Constantinople, Alexandria, Laodicea, Tarsus, Iconium, Pisidian Antioch, Cappadocian Caesarea, Melitene, Nyssa, Scythia and Marcianopolis – all eastern sees. Theodosius had no intention of allowing the definition of orthodoxy to slip through his fingers.

Theodosius' proscription of Arianism had the desired effect. Deprived of the sustenance of its communities, and the ability of its leaders to organize, it withered. Theodosius saw no virtue in pluralism, had taken the initiative and imposed his views.

Theodosius and Ambrose

In 387, Magnus Maximus sought to extend his authority by driving Valentinian II out of Italy. The young emperor fled with his mother to Theodosius, who invaded the Roman west in the following year. It was a difficult war, but ultimately Theodosius captured and executed Maximus. That brought Theodosius to Milan by 10 October 388, where he made the acquaintance of Ambrose, whose views on empire and imperial authority were very similar to his own. Yet the two came into conflict very swiftly, as set out in detail in Chapter 57 of this volume.

Some Christians, with the encouragement of their bishop, had burned down a synagogue in the Mesopotamian town of Callinicum. Destruction of pagan monuments by the authorities was one thing: vigilantism, another. Theodosius' response was to order the rebuilding of the syna-gogue at the bishop's expense, a decision he later amended to make the entire congregation liable (Ambrose, Epistles 40, 41).

Ambrose protested the ruling, but to little effect. He therefore made his displeasure public in a sermon in which he compared Theodosius to King David and himself to the prophet Nathan (Ambrose, Epistle 41). The implication was plain. Ambrose claimed the right of moral guardian-ship of the emperor. He then refused to celebrate Mass until the emperor had reversed his policy. Theodosius accepted Ambrose's terms, and, by implication, his right to dictate them.

In the following year, another confrontation occurred over a far bloodier provocation (see Chapter 57 of this volume for further details). The assassination of a garrison commander in Thessalonica had been followed by a massacre of citizenry in retaliation (Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 7.25). On hearing the news, Ambrose had been stunned and sickened (Ambrose, Epistle 51). Usually aloof from court politics, Ambrose could not refrain from protest (Matthews 1975: 235). He wrote to Theodosius, stating that he would be unavailable to celebrate Mass if the emperor were in the congregation. This was not a formal excommunication, but it had the same result. Theodosius did public penance and satisfied Ambrose of his contrition. The emperor could not ignore Ambrose. Theodosius was a prisoner of his own orthodoxy, bound to heed episcopal authority. Ambrose, for his part, was not so much seeking power for its own sake as exercising the same theology of power as he had under Gratian and Valentinian II (Rousseau 1996).

Theodosius and paganism

Theodosius' approach to paganism was generally inclusive. Although he continued to oppose sacrifice (Theodosian Code 16.10.7), he extended a measure of generosity to traditional believers (Williams and Friell 1994: 57). In 384, Themistius was appointed Urban Prefect of Constantinople, entrusted with the care of Theodosius' young son Arcadius during Theodosius' absence (Jones et al. 1971: 892). Later, when Theodosius went to the west to deal with Magnus Maximus, he left two pagans, Tatianus and Proculus, in senior offices of responsibility (Matthews 1975: 224; Williams and Friell 1994: 62). This policy does not so much reflect a preference for pagans, but a general recognition that paganism was not a disqualification for imperial office. Like eunuchs, and like the court Jews of a later period, they could perform valuable and sensitive service for their masters without the apprehension of higher ambition. A famous relief from an obelisk in Constantinople shows Theodosius surrounded by his courtiers and soldiers (see Figure 10.7). In Rome itself, when he visited the city in 389, he honoured many of the pagan luminaries of the Senate who had made the mistake of supporting Magnus Maximus (Matthews 1975: 227–231).

Theodosius' court pagans, and the pagan senatorial aristocracy, were in a precarious position, however. Their security depended upon the emperor's pleasure, and that seems to have evaporated soon after the Thessalonica incident. In February 391, Theodosius issued a law formally banning all pagan practice, and prescribing monetary penalties for those of the administrative class and above (Theodosian Code 16.10.10). His new approach to paganism was marked by anti-pagan riots. In one of these, at Alexandria, the Serapaeum, one of the grandest and most venerable shrines of late antique paganism, and the home of a magnificent library, was destroyed by a Christian mob (Eunapius, Lives of the Philosophers 472).

In the face of this outright condemnation and intolerance, aristocratic pagans must have felt impotent. The only alternative to Theodosius was the young emperor Valentinian II, who was completely dominated by Arbogast, his Master of the Soldiers and a pagan (Jones et al. 1971: 96). In 392, Valentinian sought to assert himself and dismiss Arbogast from his post. Arbogast ignored the order (Zosimus, New History 4.53). Soon afterwards, Valentinian was discovered dead in his room, a victim more probably of his own hand than of murder (Matthews 1975: 239). Arbogast was nevertheless blamed by Theodosius, and so he responded by nominating a new emperor in the west, Flavius Eugenius.
Figure 10.7   Theodosius with his courtiers and soldiers, from an obelisk in Constantinople. Photo Bill Leadbetter

A rhetorician and a bureaucrat, his lack of military credentials made him the sort of candidate whom Arbogast could safely dominate (Jones et al. 1971: 293). Eugenius himself was a Christian, but of liberal and intellectual cast (Bloch 1963: 199). Theodosius' refusal to negotiate made conflict inevitable. Pagan aristocrats now saw the chance to assert themselves. An alliance was formed with Eugenius, who promptly restored funding to temples, although from his private resources rather than the public purse (Matthews 1975: 240). Oracles promised the victory of paganism over Christianity (Chadwick 1984). Nicomachus Flavianus, an eminent pagan who had held high office under Theodosius, was appointed Praetorian Prefect; his son became City Prefect of Rome. The gods were celebrated in public festivals in the city; temples were rebuilt (Matthews 1970: 478–479); games were celebrated (Matthews 1975: 243f.). Nicomachus Flavianus swept off to war, threatening Ambrose that, upon his return, Milan's basilica would be renovated as a stable (Paulinus of Nola, Life of Ambrose 31).

The confrontation occurred at the Battle of the Frigidus in July 394. Eugenius' army was defeated and Eugenius himself captured and executed. Both Nicomachus Flavianus and Arbogast committed suicide. Victory over Eugenius was also a victory over the pagan aristocracy. Although more forgiveness than savagery followed Theodosius' victory, they now knew that they existed at his mercy. The alliance with Eugenius had proven a costly folly, but, given Theodosius' attitude to paganism, they had little choice if they wished to retain their integrity.

Conclusion

The Battle of the Frigidus does not mark the final victory of Christianity over paganism. In 408, when the troops of Alaric were besieging Rome, the traditional cults were briefly restored (Zosimus, New History 5.41). Pagans continued to worship, quietly and clandestinely. Pagan intellectuals, like Zosimus, continued to mourn the victory of Christianity in their work. But it was a victory that could not be reversed. It is not merely that Constantine had so deeply ingrained Christianity. He had not. The change was already occurring under the surface of the Roman world of élites. Language and lifeways were slowly changing into the form which Christian culture took. By the time Theodosius came to declare Christianity the religion of the empire, such a pronouncement was neither a surprise nor a challenge to most people. Those who clung to their ancestral beliefs did so tenaciously, but all the more so in defiance of the inexorable tide of Christianity. It may not have been the Christianity of the Apostles, but it was the Roman Christianity that brought forth Christendom and provided the intellectual foundation for the European Middle Ages.

Bibliography

Alföldi, A. (1948) The Conversion of Constantine and Pagan Rome. Trans. H. Mattingly. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Alföldi, A. (1952) A Conflict of Ideas in the Late Roman Empire: The Clash Between the Senate and Valentinian I. Trans. H. Mattingly. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Arnheim, M. T. W. (1972) The Senatorial Aristocracy in the Later Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Barnes, T. D. (1975) 'The beginnings of Donatism', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 26: 13–22 (= T. D. Barnes, Early Christianity and the Roman Empire no. 8, London: Variorum).

Barnes, T. D. (1976) 'The emperor Constantine's Good Friday sermon', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 27: 414–423.

Barnes, T. D. (1981) Eusebius and Constantine. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Barnes, T. D. (1982) The New Empire of Diocletian and Constantine. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Barnes, T. D. (1985) 'Constantine and the Christians of Persia', Journal of Roman Studies 75: 126–136.

Barnes, T. D. (1993) Athanasius and Constantius: Theology and Politics in the Constantinian Empire. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Baynes, N. H. (1934) 'Eusebius and the Christian empire', Annuaire de l'Institut de Philologie et d'Histoire Orientales (Mélanges Bidez) 2: 13–18.

Baynes, N. H. (1972) Constantine the Great and the Christian Church. 2nd ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Bloch, H. (1963) 'The pagan revival in the west at the end of the fourth century', in Momigliano, A. (ed.) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 193–218.

Blockley, R. (1981) The Fragmentary Classicising Historians of the Later Roman Empire: Eunapius, Olympiodorus, Priscus and Malchus. Liverpool, UK: Fr0ancis Cairns.

Borkowski, Z. (1990) 'Local cults and resistance to Christianity', Journal of Juristic Papyrology 20: 25–30.

Bowder, D. (1978) The Age of Constantine and Julian. London: Paul Elek.

Bowersock, G. W. (1978) Julian the Apostate. London: Duckworth.

Bradbury, S. (1994) 'Constantine and pagan legislation in the fourth century', Classical Philology 89: 120–139.

Brown, P. (1961) 'Aspects of the Christianization of the Roman aristocracy', Journal of Roman Studies 51: 1–11.

Brown, P. (1971) 'The rise and function of the holy man in late antiquity', Journal of Roman Studies 61: 80–101.

Brown, P. (1978) The Making of Late Antiquity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Brown, P. (1981) The Cult of the Saints. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Brown, P. (1992) Power and Persuasion in Late Antiquity: Towards a Christian Empire. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press.

Brown, P. (1995) Authority and the Sacred: Aspects of the Christianisation of the Roman World. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Browning, R. (1976) The Emperor Julian. Berkeley and Los Angeles, CA: University of California Press.

Bruun, P. M. (1958) 'The disappearance of Sol from the coins of Constantine', Arctos 2: 15–37.

Bruun, P. M. (1962) 'The Christian signs on the coins of Constantine', Arctos 3: 5–35.

Bruun, P. M. (1966) The Roman Imperial Coinage Volume 7: Constantine and Licinius A.D. 313–337. London: Spink and Son Ltd.

Cameron, A. (1966) 'The date and identity of Macrobius', Journal of Roman Studies 56: 25–38.

Cameron, A. (1968) 'Gratian's repudiation of the pontifical robe', Journal of Roman Studies 58: 96–102.

Cameron, A. (1991) Christianity and the Rhetoric of Empire: The Development of Christian Discourse. Berkeley and Los Angeles, CA and London: University of California Press.

Chadwick, H. (1976) Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and Charismatic in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Chadwick, H. (1984) 'Oracles of the end in the conflict between paganism and Christianity', in Lucchesi, E. and Jeffrey, H. D. (eds) Mémorial André-Jean Festùgiere. Cahiers d'Orientailsme 10. Geneva: Patrick Cremer, 125–129.

Chitty, D. J. (1966) The Desert a City. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell and Mott.

Chuvin, P. (1990) A Chronicle of the Last Pagans. Trans. B. A. Archer. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Corcoran, S. (1996) Empire of the Tetrarchs: Imperial Pronouncements and Government AD 284–324. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Cullhed, M. (1994) Conservator Urbis Suae: Studies in the Politics and Propaganda of the Emperor Maxentius. Stockholm, Sweden: Acta Instituti Romani Regni Sueciae, Series in 8°, 20.

De Decker, D. (1968) 'La politique religieuse de Maxence', Byzantion 38: 472–562.

De Labriolle, P. (1942) La Réaction Païenne. Paris: L'artisan du Livre.

Delehaye, H. (1909) Les Legendes Greques des Saints Militaires. Paris: Librarie Alphonse Picard et Fils (reprinted by Arno Press, New York, 1975).

De Ste Croix, G. E. M. (1954) 'Aspects of the Great Persecution', Harvard Theological Review 47: 75–109.

Drake, H. A. (1976) In Praise of Constantine: A Historical Study and New Translation of Eusebius' Trecennial Orations. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Drake, H. A. (1983) 'Review of T. D. Barnes, "Constantine and Eusebius"', American Journal of Philology 103: 462–466.

Elliot, T. B. (1987) 'Constantine's conversion: Do we really need it?', Phoenix 41: 420–438.

Elliot, T. B. (1989) 'Constantine's early religious development', Journal of Religious History 15: 283–291.

Elliot, T. B. (1992) 'Constantine's explanation of his career', Byzantion 62: 212–234.

Errington, R. M. (1988) 'Constantine and the pagans', Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies 29: 309–318.

Fowden, G. (1993) Empire to Commonwealth: Consequences of Monotheism in Late Antiquity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Frankfurter, D. (1998) Religion in Roman Egypt: Assimilation and Resistance. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1952) The Donatist Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1965) Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Frend, W. H. C. (1984) The Rise of Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Frend, W. H. C. and Clancy, K (1977) 'When did the Donatist schism begin?', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 28: 104–109.

Helgeland, J. (1978) 'Christians and the Roman army', in Temporini, H. (ed.) Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt. Berlin: De Gruyter, 725–834.

Hunt, E. D. (1982) Holy Land and Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire AD 312–460. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hunt, E. D. (1993) 'Christianising the Roman empire: The evidence of the code', in Harries, J. and Wood, I. (eds) The Theodosian Code. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 143–158.

Jones, A. H. M. (1953) 'Military chaplains in the Roman army', Harvard Theological Review 46: 239–240.

Jones, A. H. M. (1963) 'The social background of the struggle between paganism and Christianity', in Momigliano, A. (ed.) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 17–37.

Jones, A. H. M. (1964) The Later Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Jones, A. H. M., Martindale, J. R. and Morris, J. (1971) The Prosopography of the Later Roman Empire I. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Judge, E. A. (1983) 'Christian innovation and its contemporary observers', in Croke, B. and Emmet, A. (eds) History and Historians in Late Antiquity. Sydney: Pergamon, 13–29.

Krautheimer, R. (1965) Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin.

Lane Fox, R. (1986) Pagans and Christians. Harmondsworth, UK: Viking.

Leadbetter, B. (1996) 'Imperial ideology and the Christians in the late third century', in Dillon, M. P. J. (ed.) Religion in the Ancient World. Amsterdam: Hakkert, 535–545.

Leadbetter, B. (1998a) 'Lactantius and Paideia in the Latin west', in Hillard, T. W., Kearsley, R. A., Nixon, C. E. V. and Nobbs, A. M. (eds) Ancient History in a Modern University Vol II. Grand Rapids, MI: Eeerdmans, 245–252.

Leadbetter, B. (1998b) 'The legitimacy of Constantine', in Lieu, S. N. C. and Montserrat, D. (eds) Constantine: History, Historiography and Legend. London: Routledge, 74–85.

Leadbetter, B. (1998c) 'Patrimonium Indivisum? The empire of Diocletian and Maximian 285–289', Chiron 28: 213–228.

Leadbetter, B. (2009) Galerius and the Will of Diocletian. London: Routledge.

Liebeschuetz, J. H. W. G. (1990) Barbarians and Bishops: Army, Church and State in the Age of Arcadius and Chrysostom. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Macmullen, R. (1984) Christianizing the Roman Empire. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Macmullen, R. (1990) Changes in the Roman Empire: Essays in the Ordinary. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Markus, R. (1974) 'Paganism, Christianity and the Latin classics', in Binns, J. W. (ed.) Latin Literature of the Fourth Century. London and Boston, MA: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

Markus, R. (1990) The End of Ancient Christianity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Matthews, J. (1970) 'The historical setting of the "Carmen Contra Paganos" (Cod. Par. Lat. 8084)', Historia 19: 464–479.

Matthews, J. (1973) 'Symmachus and the oriental cults', Journal of Roman Studies 73: 175–195.

Matthews, J. (1975) Western Aristocracies and the Imperial Court AD 364–425. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Matthews, J. (1989) The Roman Empire of Ammianus. London: Duckworth.

Momigliano, A. (1963) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Nicholson, O. (1991) 'The pagan churches of Maximinus Daia and Julian the Apostate', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 45: 1–10.

Nixon, C. E. V. (1987) Pacatus: Panegyric to the Emperor Theodosius. Liverpool Translated Texts for Historians. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Nixon, C. E. V. (1997) 'The early career of Valentinian I', in Hillard, T. W., Kearsley, R. A., Nixon, C. E. V. and Nobbs, A. M. (eds) Ancient History in a Modern University Vol II. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eeerdmans, 294–304.

Novak, D. M. (1979) 'Constantine and the senate: An early phase in the Christianization of the aristocracy', Ancient Society 10: 271–310.

Palmer, A.-M. (1989) Prudentius on the Martyrs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Pohlsander, H. A. (1993) 'Constantia', Ancient Society 24: 151–167.

Pohlsander, H. A. (1996) The Emperor Constantine. London and New York: Routledge.

Roberts, M. (1993) Poetry and the Cult of the Martyrs: The 'Liber Peristephanon' of Prudentius. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

Rousseau, P. (1996) 'Ambrose and the Christian empire', in Dillon, M. P. J. (ed.) Religion in the Ancient World. Amsterdam: Hakkert, 477–490.

Sivan, H. (1993) Ausonius of Bordeaux: Genesis of a Gallic Aristocracy. London and New York: Routledge.

Tomlin, R. S. O. (1998) 'Christianity and the late Roman army', in Lieu, S. N. C. and Montserrat, D. (eds) Constantine: History, Historiography and Legend. London: Routledge, 21–51.

Vanderspoel, J. (1995) Themistius and the Imperial Court: Oratory, Civic Duty and Paideia from Constantius to Theodosius. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

Vogt, J. (1963) 'Pagans and Christians in the family of Constantine the Great', in Momigliano, A. (ed.) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 38–55.

Wilken, R. L. (1992) The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Williams, R. (1987) Arius. London: Darton Longman and Todd.

Williams, S. and Friell, G. (1994) Theodosius: The Empire at Bay. London: Batsford.

11

JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN INTERACTION FROM THE FIRST TO THE FIFTH CENTURIES

Anders Runesson

Studying Jewish and Christian interaction: problems and procedure

Issues relating to the nature and extent of Jewish and Christian interaction in antiquity are as complex as the available evidence is problematic and difficult to interpret. Indeed, the very terms 'Jewish' and 'Christian' themselves are awkward on several levels, all of which threaten to undermine the project of historical reconstruction. Given that any use of terminology takes as point of departure how the words employed are understood in contemporary discourses, just as much as our historical questions necessarily proceed from the here and now, approaching the problem of Jewish and Christian interaction in antiquity necessarily begins with reflection on what is assumed by the question. In which ways does the question control the way we seek and find our answers? I shall offer here just a few observations before we proceed to discuss the issues at hand.

First, in conventional discourses today, 'Christianity' and 'Judaism' are commonly listed together with other phenomena, such as, e.g. 'Hinduism' and 'Buddhism', all of which are treated as if they were examples of several 'species' belonging to the genus 'religion'. This way of construing 'religion' as an overarching classification within which these traditions are organised has, however, been critiqued as an expression of a modern Western (ethnocentric) worldview; the category 'religion' may fit some socio-cultural and religio-political contexts, while being quite foreign to others (cf. Josephson 2012). For the historian of what is today called 'Judaism' and 'Christianity', this problem of categorisation also reaches back in time, diachronically, potentially forging anachronistic assumptions about the past based on our understanding of our (local) present.[1] If 'religion' as we commonly use the term today did not exist until late antiquity, as Daniel Boyarin and others have argued,[2] or even later (Nongbri 2013), that means that the very question about interaction between what we would understand as religious groups, Judaism and Christianity, needs to be reconfigured to accommodate the period antedating the 'religionising' of these traditions.[3] This is true even if we choose to still use the term 'religion'; we see certain developments between the first and fifth centuries in this regard, which need to be taken into consideration when interaction is analysed.

At the heart of this complex of problems lies the issue of ethnicity, as intertwined with a geographical area (land), certain god(s), and specific, culturally embedded laws and customs (Mason 2007: 457–512). If Judaism does not refer to a system of beliefs and practices abstracted from ethnic and cultural customs, but designates a way of life expressed in various spheres of society (domestic as well as public and the social space in-between, where we find the associations), we need to analyse any interaction between people belonging to this group and other similar groups taking into consideration ethnic identity as well as the nature of the interaction, as it takes place in various social loci where aspects of ethnicity are expressed.[4]

This brings us to a second problem, namely that 'Christianity' as a 'religion' comes into being sometime during the period targeted in this chapter. Originally, the movement that formed around Jesus, both before and after his death, was, as much as any other Jewish movements, such as the Pharisees or the Essenes, an integral part of what we call 'Judaism'. Indeed, the term 'Christianity' was used for the first time only in the second century.[5] Strictly speaking, then, it is not possible to study 'Jewish' and 'Christian' interaction in the early period, without distorting the evidence through aligning it terminologically, socio-religiously and politically with later historical periods. In brief, and in very generalised terms, what we see during the first five centuries is a gradual process, often ambiguous and never linear, in which the Jesus movement becomes ethno-culturally disembedded, losing central identity markers related to the Jewish ethnos, markers which emerging mainstream forms of Late-Antique Judaism maintained, nurtured and developed. Understanding of this process, which materialised in distinctive ways in different social, political and geographical loci, is of key interest to anyone engaged in studying interaction between members of the Jesus movement(s) and other Jews and non-Jews.

During the course of these developments, Christianity as we know it today as a tradition related to but separate from Judaism took form as a 'religion'. The creation of 'religion' as a system of beliefs and practices disentangled from aspects of ethnicity was thus contemporaneous with the emergence of Christianity (and, somewhat later, Islam).[6] Non-Jewish Christians forged this new type of 'religious' identity, but due to the Jewish ethno-religious roots clearly manifested in their holy scriptures, and the fact that many Christians seemed not to have been aware of any significant differences between Judaism and Christianity,[7] the entire project needed 'Judaism' as a negative comparative counterpart, a reversed 'religious' mirror image against which 'Christianity' would make religious sense as the only salvifically viable option. Christian supersessionism, i.e. the notion that Christianity and Judaism are mutually exclusive and that Christians have superseded Jews as the people of God, requires precisely two clearly identifiable and comparable religious categories to make theo-rhetorical sense. While Jews never internalised this image of their way of life as a 'religion' – most mainstream forms of Judaism still maintain the key connection between ethnos, land, law and God – Christian discourses on Judaism, even in our own days, often construe Judaism assuming a universal relevance of the basic parameters of religious boundary making that apply within Christian communities. What we have here, then, and what makes the task of analysing interaction in this specific case complicated, is an asymmetric historical relationship (an apples-and-oranges scenario, if you like) often terminologically concealed in the literature, but which is stretched out over centuries.

Even in cases of symmetrical relationships, however, it would be a mistake to understand interaction between individuals and groups, identified based on religious criteria, as motivated exclusively by religious concerns and identities. Identity is a complex phenomenon; actions rarely spring from concerns isolated to one aspect of human existence. What may seem to be religiously motivated interaction may, in reality, be better explained by other factors and interests. Further, one should also note that interaction may take different forms in different spheres of society, and that distinct types of source material will yield information about and help interpret contextually the evidence related to each. The major parameters to take into account when interaction is to be analysed may be summarised in a chart, on the basis that for primary sources, each source type (e.g. legal material, inscriptions, papyri, literary texts, archaeological remains) should be examined based on what type of information can be extracted from it as related to the three social levels (Figure 11.1).

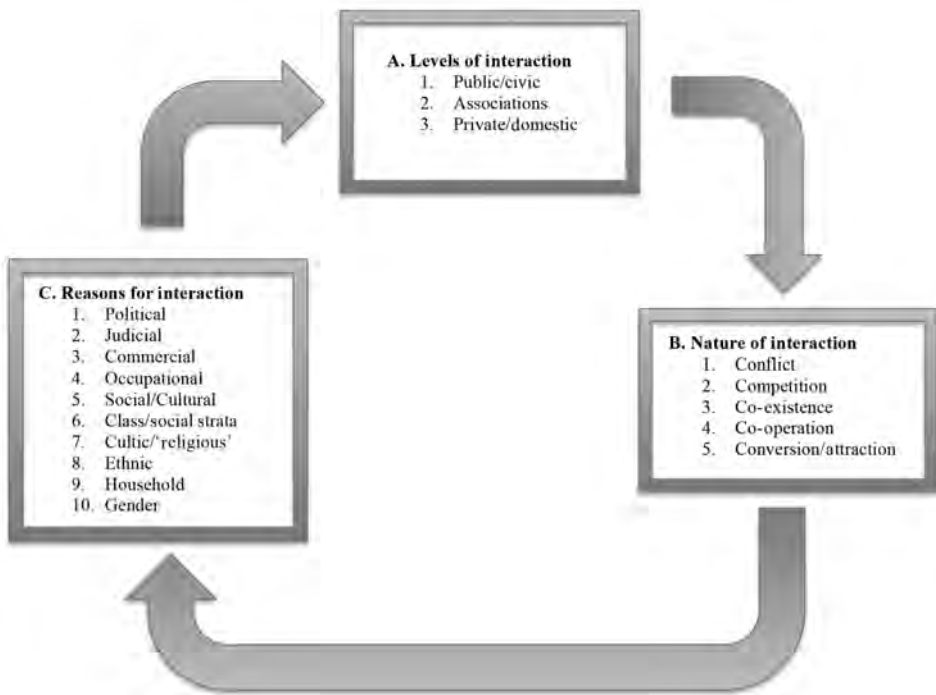
Finally, it is of some importance to keep in mind the larger Graeco-Roman socio-political (and therefore also cultic) context in which interaction took place between groups and individuals adhering to some sort of worship involving the Jesus figure, whether Jews or non-Jews, on the one hand, and Jews who chose not to follow this messiah, on the other. This overarching public imperial matrix, in which our interaction was embedded and moulded, gradually changed over the centuries,


Figure 11.1 Examples of parameters to take into account in analysis of Jewish/Christian interaction.
Copyright Anders Runesson

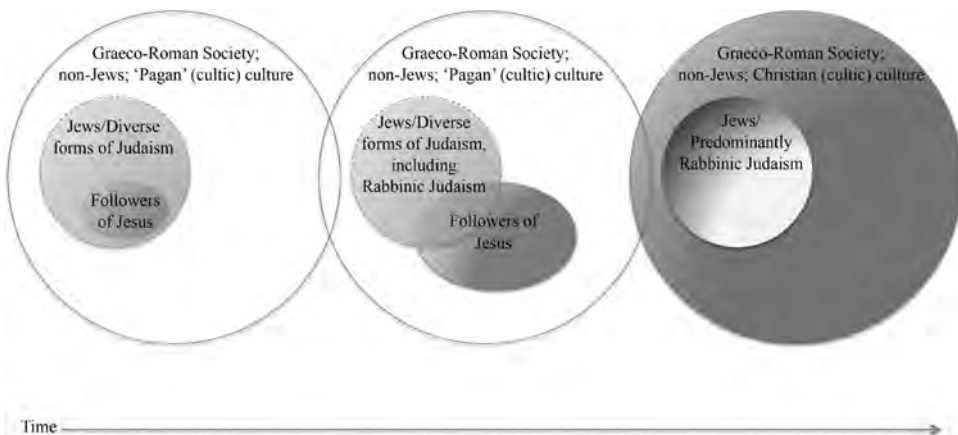
so that during the timespan we are interested in here, one form of (Nicaean) Christ-cult rose to politi-cal prominence as all Graeco-Roman cults were officially prohibited in 392 by Theodosius I. This, of course, did not mean that such worship of these gods disappeared; on the contrary, there is plenty of evidence that this process took several centuries to be implemented.[8] It does mean, however, that cer-tain state/civic dynamics changed, eventually leading to transformed relationships between Jewish and Christian groups. The overall general development may be described in a simple chart (Figure 11.2):


Figure 11.2 The transformation of the imperial socio-political and cultic context in which interaction between Christ-groups, whether Jewish or non-Jewish, and other Jews took place, from the first to the seventh centuries CE. Copyright Anders Runesson

At the same time as this form of politically empowered (non-Jewish) Christianity rose to promi-nence, we see in Jewish communities the rise of a particular form of Judaism, rabbinic Judaism, gradually defining for most Jews what it meant to be 'Jewish'. Again, this does not mean that other forms of Judaism had long since disappeared. Rather, in the struggle to (re-)define Judaism in a Late-Antique world where non-Jewish forms of Christianity claimed both Jewish holy scriptures and public political space, rabbinic Jews reacted against alternative forms of expressing Jewishness, includ-ing Jesus-centred forms of Judaism, as they narrowed down what they understood to be appropriate modes of being Jewish.[9]

With these reflections in mind, we shall now proceed chronologically as we consider aspects of interaction (conflict, competition, co-existence, co-operation and attraction/conversion, in various combinations) within the general context described above. The chronological sequence will, how-ever, be subordinated to a social criterion, so that developments are approached looking at different spheres of society in turn, beginning with public civic settings before moving on to associations and domestic contexts, respectively.

While literary texts will provide us with most of the source material, we shall also comment on other source types (e.g. archaeological remains). Doing so, we will pay special attention to institutional settings within which attitudes towards the other may have been shaped and enacted. Before concluding, we shall comment on the process often, and in my opinion problematically, called the parting of the ways between Judaism and Christianity. Throughout, the deceptively simple questions, 'Who is a Jew?' 'Who is a Christian?' and, importantly, 'Who decides?' will threaten to undermine, implicitly or explicitly, any overly neat categorisations, frustrating our desire for unambiguous answers.

Interaction in public civic settings: local, national, imperial

The historical Jesus and the group of people that formed around him were active and proclaimed their message in the public, (religio-)civic institutions of the land of Israel that our sources use various terms to describe (e.g. synagōgē, proseuchē, ekklēsia), but which in modern English are called synagogues (Runesson 2014: 265–297).[10]

The earliest evidence speaking of interaction between followers of Jesus (as well as Jesus himself) and other Jews in this type of public setting is found in the New Testament Gospels: Mark, Matthew, Luke and John. While based on interpreted oral traditions predating the fall of the temple in 70 CE, these texts were authored in the late first century and, at points, signal concerns relevant to that time. There is no evidence, though, of any institutional or structural changes in local public synagogues/civic assemblies during the first and early second centuries, a historical circumstance making our task somewhat easier with regard to the issue of possible anachronisms in the texts. The political developments that eventually led to the destruction of the Jerusalem temple, the key (religio-)civic institution in the earliest period, did affect, however, how the Jesus movement was perceived and treated by various leadership groups in Jewish society, both on what we may call a national level and in some local settings.[11] From the pen of a Jewish author outside of the Jesus movement commenting on our topic from a first-century perspective, we have only two brief passages, of which one has been edited by a later Christian scribe: Josephus' Antiquities (18:63–64; 20.200). What can we say about interaction between the Jesus movement and Jewish and other authorities in the land based on this evidence?

First, we need to distinguish between interaction in local synagogues in various parts of the land, on the one hand, and the institution of the temple, on the other; the latter was, in contrast to the local character of the former, the focal point for discourses on Jewish national identity. The tem-ple authorities had, moreover, until 70 CE, cultic, and therefore also political, responsibility for the otherwise administratively separate parts of the land, governed, respectively, by Rome directly and, with some interruption, Herodian rulers until around 100 CE when all areas were brought under Roman provincial rule.

Figure 11.3   The synagogue at Gamla on the Golan Heights, just northeast of Lake Tiberias; looking southwest. The building is dated to the first century BCE. Note the architectural design, especially the stepped benches, and what it implies about the nature of the public meetings and interaction that took place in this type of space. Photo copyright Anders Runesson

The evidence strongly suggests that the historical Jesus chose to interact with local Jewish communities primarily through their public institutions, the synagogues and that, doing so, he attracted negative attention from the local leaders in charge (Ryan 2016). The reasons for conflicts between Jesus and these local scribal leaders were likely complex, and are not easily generalised. As Chris Keith has argued, it is probable that the mere fact that Jesus took on a role in these institutions otherwise held by the scribes probably triggered, in and of itself, significant discontent, regardless of the message proclaimed (Keith 2014). One cannot ignore, however, that as local administrators in charge of, among other things, interpreting and teaching law based on local custom and tradition,[12] these scribes would have been sensitive to the political dimensions of a message focused on bringing about a kingdom, which precluded current figures of authority from retaining their positions of power. While there are plenty of traditions speaking of Jewish crowds supporting and following Jesus, and we have some evidence of members of another Jewish group, the Pharisees, trying to save Jesus' life when he is threatened by the ruler of Galilee (Luke 13:31[13]), we have no positive remarks preserved directed at Jewish political rulers. Herod the Great is accused of trying to kill Jesus (Matt. 2:13–17); Archelaos is a threat to Jesus' life (Matt. 2:22); Antipas executes Jesus' closest ally John (Matt. 14:1–12; cf. Luke 3:19), seeks to kill Jesus and is called a fox (Luke 13:31–32). Further, Jesus is revealed as the Messiah, the coming king, in Philip's territory, directly after which both Mark and Matthew have placed a section where Jesus discloses that he will be rejected by politically influential leaders and then killed (Mark 8:27–31; Matt. 16:16–21; cf. Luke 9:20–22).

Such traditions indicate to us memories of a Jesus who stirred political unrest. Since his message was often proclaimed publicly in civic institutions (synagogues), the leaders in charge of those institutions were faced with the choice of rejecting or supporting the religio-political critique of power inherent in the message. While Matthew's gospel does indicate that some local scribes in fact joined his movement (Matt. 13:52; 23:34; cf. 8:19), it seems improbable that many did, since such movements were likely seen as destabilising an already delicate situation under Roman imperial influence. As for the region where Jesus was primarily active, Galilee, we also know that Antipas was a comparatively effective ruler, as far as the balancing act between Rome's demands (taxation) and popular unrest was concerned.[14] This would hardly have been possible without some sort of co-operation, or at least not open hostility, between local and regional authorities.[15]

This general picture of tension between Jesus and his followers, on the one hand, and local and regional civic authorities, on the other, is reinforced and intensified when the scene shifts to the national level, i.e. when Jesus and his followers interact with various authorities in Jerusalem. There is a general tendency in all the gospels, although more so in the Synoptics than in John, to describe Jesus and his movement as successful among the people ('the crowds') both in Galilee and Jerusalem, so that the majority of the Jewish people is portrayed in sharp contrast to the civic authorities.[16] While the texts include a few critical comments related to the 'crowds' (and Jesus' own disciples), and Matthew's gospel in particular is fiercely critical towards the Pharisees and vice versa, it seems clear that the historical Jesus and the earliest movement around him targeted specifically the civic authorities,[17] both in Galilee and the surrounding areas and in Jerusalem.

Since in the ancient world human societies were understood as intertwined with and mirroring the cosmic realm, a 'religious' message about a coming kingdom, especially when paired with claims that current leaders were illegitimate, would inevitably be seen as inciting revolt, as a threat to the status quo. Civic leaders would react accordingly, especially in Jerusalem where awareness of the sensitive situation caused by Rome's imperial presence was acute. From the perspective of these leaders, they themselves were, of course, legitimate authorities. Serving the God of Israel, they had been charged with the difficult duty of performing cultic and political tasks balancing between the threat of Roman intervention and popular riots and insurrection (cf. John 11:48–50; Acts 5:27–28). From the perspective of Jesus and the people who joined him, the current conditions in the land – divided as it was into separate administrative units, ruled not by a Jewish king of the Davidic line but by Herodians and, even worse in the case of Judea and Samaria, by Rome directly – was evidence that God's anger had been provoked and judgement was about to be executed.

It would seem from a political and military perspective that the Jewish authorities had little choice but to let the Romans handle the situation in the manner they always did with similar movements, through executing leaders and most of the followers,[18] and so save the people from destruction, as John's gospel would also describe it (John 11:50). As we shall see below, it is likely that the Jesus movement continued to spread among Jews in the land long after the execution of Jesus, which in turn would explain the continued resistance against this group among many local leaders of civic institutions (synagogues), as noted by the gospels (Mark 13:9; Matt. 10:17–18; 23:34; Luke 21:12). Josephus also reports that, in Jerusalem, the high priest Ananus, using the Sanhedrin as a legal tool, saw to it that James the brother of Jesus and some others, presumably also members of the movement, were executed (Josephus, AJ 20:200).

If we summarise the interaction between members of the Jesus-group and Jewish civic authorities in the early period (first century), we may note the following. In terms of the nature of the interaction, the sources mention almost exclusively tension and conflict, which often led to punishment, presumably based on court proceedings. It is likely, however, that only such persons in the movement who were very vocal and were perceived as direct threats to social and political stability were targeted in such procedures; the majority of sympathisers would not have experienced this type of violence. We have no evidence of mass persecutions of followers of Jesus resulting in executions by Jewish authorities, but must assume a certain level of co-existence between members of this group and others in Jewish villages, towns and cities, especially in areas removed from political centres such as Jerusalem.[19]

Why, then, did Jesus and the movement that followed him trigger this type of reaction with civic authorities? As noted above, while the basic reasons for these negative developments were very likely related to social dynamics involved when role expectations associated with class were disrupted, perhaps especially in Galilee, it is impossible to ignore the political implications of the proclamation of a coming kingdom and how that would have been perceived by civic leaders as threatening to destabilise the status quo. This latter reason for the conflict provoked by the Jesus-group would have been especially acute on the national level in Jerusalem, as Roman imperial interests would have made themselves known precisely in relation to such a religio-political ideology (cf. John 11:48–50). As we see from passages in the gospels and in Josephus, the reaction of the Jewish authorities involved was to activate judicial proceedings and refer to law in order to remove what they saw as a threat to continued relatively peaceful interaction with Roman imperial interests, which in turn was in all likelihood understood as a measure taken to save the Jewish people from destruction. For those members of the Jesus movement who were most vocal and attracted the attention of the authorities, the result could be some sort of corporeal punishment, such as flogging, a punishment meted out in synagogues according to the Mishnah,[20] and, on rare occasions, death. It may be of some interest to note that these types of conflicts have nothing to do with ethnicity, which later becomes an issue in other settings, neither with what we would call religious teachings, understood as divorced from political concerns, and as such would also be a site for negative interaction in later centuries.

When we move into the second century, our sources on interaction involving civic authorities and legislation become meagre, only to re-emerge in the fourth to sixth centuries with Christian legislation on Jews and Judaism in an empire where leading political authorities now embraced (non-Jewish) Christianity as state religion.[21] While historically, as we know from Josephus,[22] the Jews were accepted and enjoyed protection from civic authorities in Mediterranean societies in the early centuries, things began to change slowly once Christianity had become politically empowered in the late fourth and fifth centuries. As Amnon Linder (1987: 87) writes:

> State intervention in typically 'religious' Jewish matters resulted, therefore, from the general tendency of the state to penetrate areas of life in which it had not previously been involved and from the growing hostility toward Judaism and its institutions which intensified in direct proportion to the Christianization of the state.

While in the first century conflicts between Christ-followers and other Jews could be brought to a non-Jewish court, only to be referred back to the Jewish community as a matter to be dealt with by the Jews themselves, later non-Jewish Christian imperial legislators produced laws aiming to circumscribe more generally Jewish interaction with others, especially Christians, in society, and Christians could not be judged by a court led by a Jew.[23]

To be sure, Christian imperial legislation on Jews and Judaism also contained positive aspects, a witness to the fact that legislators, understanding Judaism as a 'religion' and categorising it as such alongside Christianity, saw a close affinity between Judaism and Christianity, as opposed to 'pagan' traditions.[24] Importantly, Judaism was recognised as a 'permitted religion', protected as such in a law dated to 393 CE,[25] a legal tradition Christian legislators inherited from their 'pagan' predecessors. As in earlier periods, in a law from 412 CE, Jews were exempted from performing duties on sabbaths and holidays.[26] Further, a law from 398 CE rules that Jews and their synagogues must be protected from Christian attacks.[27]

With regard to synagogues, the centres of Jewish communal life, we see a declining pattern, however. As a locus religionis ('place of religion'), the synagogue enjoyed protection in several laws from the fourth century not only from attacks by Christians but also when local rulers prevented these buildings from being used. While this approach is distinguishable until as late as the early fifth century, more restrictive legislation began to emerge in 415 CE. At that time, Theodosius II, targeting Gamaliel VI, banned the building of new synagogues and ordered those in unpopulated areas to be destroyed; in 423 CE this was turned into general law.[28] With one atypical exception,[29] already existing synagogues were allowed to stand and, when needed, renovated. Other laws that restricted

Jewish life in Christian society related to ownership and conversion of Christian slaves, intermarriage (law promulgated in 388 CE), the autonomy of Jewish legal systems, the level of involvement of Jews in administration (Jews were prohibited from entering into 'state service' in 418 CE[30]), and the extent to which Jewish lawyers could practise law.

Several of these laws, such as those relating to synagogues and intermarriage, were clearly meant to prevent Judaism from expanding. This, in turn, indicates that the opposite was in fact happening at this time; it is a reasonable assumption that legislation aims at preventing from happening phenomena and behaviour that actually occur. We cannot, then, draw far-reaching conclusions about the general state of Jewish communities and Jewish–Christian relations based on a simplistic reading of legal sources only. After all, we know from archaeological remains that monumental synagogues were still being built at this time, and that there were a number of contemporary laws aimed at protecting Christianity from defamation and Christian rites from being profaned by Jews. Laws from 408 and 409 CE protect orthodox Christians from persecution by various 'heretics', Jews and pagans in North Africa, for example.[31] It appears, thus, that the Jews were not an entirely marginalised and fragile minority even as late as in the fifth century.[32] Rather, we find in Jewish communities vocal groups which received proselytes and, at least in some places, even worked to expand their membership.[33] It is also during this time, from the fourth century onwards, that we see rabbinic Judaism emerge as mainstream Judaism, both in the land and in the Diaspora. This does not mean that other forms of Judaism, including Jesus-centred Judaism, immediately disappeared. As recent research has found, these other forms of Judaism likely contributed to shaping rabbinic Judaism as the latter sought to clarify the boundaries of its communities. We shall return to this later in the chapter. Here we can note only that the success of the rabbis as they sought to promulgate a definition of Judaism that aligned with their own program may have attracted the attention of non-Jews as well, which would contribute to explaining laws issued against conversion and circumcision of non-Jews.

For a variety of different reasons, sources on interaction between followers of Jesus, whether Jews or non-Jews, and other Jews in the public, civic sphere of society, including judicial settings, speak mostly of conflict and partly of various levels of co-existence. It is of some interest to note that Christian legislation relating to Jews and Judaism understands Judaism as a 'religion', which means that the ethnic aspect, which is otherwise clearly visible in other sources as a matter of contention, is largely neutralised. This has both positive and negative effects. Among the former we find Jewish communities awarded privileges corresponding to those of Christian communities; among the latter, Jews may be, on occasion, placed together with others in the category 'heretics'. In any case, it is the restrictive legislation that eventually wins the day and prepares the way for the marginalised status of the Jewish people in medieval Europe. While this is an important conclusion in and of itself, we should not mistake these sources for the 'reality on the ground' in the period we are concerned with here. Even in restrictive and marginalising legislation one can detect under the surface significant interaction between groups and individuals in private and semi-public contexts, including not only co-existence but also co-operation and attraction/conversion. We turn now to these other social settings.

Interaction in and between associations and association-like institutions

The above discussion concerned the interpretation of sources revealing attitudes and interaction as they pertain to the elite, i.e. a small but powerful minority of any ancient society. Often, while judicial institutions were empowered to implement ideologies embedded in law on the ground, the attitudes, practices and habits of the vast majority of the population rarely aligned in any symmetrical way with those of the ruling classes. In order to reconstruct how people ordinarily related to one another, we need, consequently, to look beyond the elites. This leads us to not only consider evidence relating to individuals and the domestic sphere, but also to take into account sources that can tell us something about the social space in-between the private and the public, i.e. that space where we find what we may call voluntary associations.[34] These organisations provided contexts in which smaller groups of people could relate to one another in ways that benefitted them in their various roles in society in different stages of life – and death. Interaction between individuals within such settings could take forms that were not possible to enact in other spheres of society, for example with regard to the gender and social status of the members. While some associations were for men only, and others restricted access to women, many associations were mixed, containing members of both genders. As members, slaves and free interacted, too, in ways that were not possible in either public or domestic settings.

Categorising associations according to the networks they supported is a helpful strategy in terms of identifying their relevance for and effect on people's lives. Philip Harland has suggested a five-fold such division of these groups, differentiating between those with connections to household, ethnic or geographical location, neighbourhood, occupation and cult, respectively (Harland 2003: 28–52). There exists some overlap between these, and one should note, e.g. that while some associations were devoted exclusively to the cult of a certain deity, all associations included rituals expressing respect for and expecting benefits from the gods. Further, membership was not exclusive, so that a person could be a member of more than one association.

Jewish institutions, both in the Diaspora and in the land, building primarily on ethnic, and therefore also cultic connections, were designated by the same type of terms as we have seen above with regard to the public civic institutions in the land. Of these, synagōgē and proseuchē were the most common, but ekklēsia could also be used, especially, but not uniquely, by those Jews

Figure 11.4 The synagogue at Ostia, Rome's harbour; looking west north-west. The building was used, approximately, over the entire period covered in this chapter and so yields important evidence with regard to developments in art and architecture at this time. Synagogues in the Diaspora were understood as various forms of Jewish associations, all of which served a number of functions for their members, including providing a setting for the worship of the God of Israel. Photo copyright Anders Runesson and non-Jews who were members of Christ-groups. While in later centuries, ekklēsia came to be used exclusively by (non-Jewish) Christians as designating their religious institutions, and synagōgē became synonymous with a Jewish institution, we cannot in the early period make distinctions between 'synagogue' and 'church', or 'Jews' and 'Christians', based on the institutional terminology applied by these groups.[35]

The importance of the associations for our task can hardly be overestimated, since they provide us with a setting in which followers of Jesus, whether Jewish or not, and other Jews, for various reasons, gathered and interacted with one another.[36] As participants in ancient Mediterranean socio-institutional cultures, Christ-believers and other Jews would likely have had to be involved in various types of associations, in addition to those devoted exclusively to the cult of their deity, the God of Israel. For example, those involved in trades and industries would presumably associate with others in guilds supporting relevant networks. Thus, we cannot assume, in a manner somewhat analogical to modern day synagogues and churches, that all institutional settings in which we find Christ-believers and/or other Jews were devoted uniquely to various forms of worship of the God of Israel. Rather, the picture is complex and mixed, and it makes sociological sense to assume some frequency of positive interaction (not only co-existence but also co-operation) between Jews and Christ-believers in such settings, for purposes partly unrelated to their cultic identity and related beliefs.[37] For a movement with some level of missionary intent and habits, such as the Christ-believers, this type of shared space provided a platform for interaction with 'outsiders' aiming at attracting them to join their (sub-)group. This kind of setting may thus help explain the 'how' of the expansion of the Christ-movement both within and beyond the Jewish ethnos, depending on the membership profile of the relevant associations.

Neighbourhood associations provide another intriguing social space where we must assume that, in certain locations, interaction between believers in Jesus and other Jews and non-Jews took place. One example may suffice to show the reasonableness of such an assumption. Based on research on the nature of the group of Christ-believers in Corinth in light of other associations, Richard Last has recently proposed that Paul's use of idiōtēs in 1 Corinthians, a term designating a member of an association in other association contexts, may lead to the conclusion that there were members in the association into which Paul spoke who were not Christ-believers (cf. apistos,[38] 1 Cor 14:23, 24).[39] If one assumes the institutional setting to be a neighbourhood association, and understands the group to which the letter is addressed as constituting about ten or so members, as Last does (Last 2016b: 20), this means that Paul is writing to a group of Christ-followers existing within a somewhat larger association with which it shares meeting space. Indeed, the argument of 1 Cor 14:15–25 depends on the assumption not only of such shared space between those 'loyal' to the Christ and those 'disloyal', but even the presence of the 'disloyal' in gatherings where Paul's addressees give expression to their loyalty to Christ, i.e. in cultic settings.

Now, while the suggestion of a neighbourhood association setting for the Corinthian ekklēsia seems to me to be an attractive and socio-institutionally plausible hypothesis, solving as it does some of the difficulties in the text, we may go one step further and ask about the neighbourhood itself; more specifically about who the other members might have been, those who were not Christ-followers. Of course, we enter here to some degree the realm of speculation, but there are some arguments in favour of attempting to identify this group.

One possibility would be to assume these other members to be non-Jews, living in the same neighbourhood. Another solution may be to understand this to be a Jewish neighbourhood, and thus envisage a scenario in which some of the other members of the association are Jewish. There are several reasons why, in my opinion, the latter suggestion should be preferred.

First, as is the case in most societies today receiving immigrant populations, people from the same national or ethnic background tend, generally, to live in proximity to one another. The same pattern is found in relation to some Jewish Diaspora communities in antiquity, with explicit evidence from Alexandria and Rome.[40]

Second, we know from other sources that non-Jews attended Jewish assemblies and worshipped the God of Israel, before and apart from the arrival of the Jesus movement,[41] and we know that non-Jewish Christ-followers continued this type of practice for centuries (Fredriksen 2016: 30).[42] The boundaries between Jewish communities and 'others' were, socio-institutionally, porous. Having individuals or groups of Christ-followers, non-Jewish and/or Jewish, in Jewish neighbourhood associations, or other types of Jewish associations dedicated to the cult of the God of Israel, would, understood from the perspective of ancient Mediterranean societies, not be strange or unusual at all.

Third, as Rodney Stark has shown, it makes sociological sense to assume that Christ-groups spread first and foremost among Jews (Stark 1997).[43] Fourth, another ancient text, Acts, often points to specifically ethnic connections among players prominent in the spread of the movement, even in Corinth itself where we also find an occupational connection mentioned (Acts 18:1–3). If we, then, read the Corinthian synagōgē mentioned in Acts 18:4, identified as the place of intense interaction between Paul and other Jews and non-Jews, as a neighbourhood association dedicated to the cult of the God of Israel in a primarily but not exclusively Jewish neighbourhood, we have reconstructed a scenario which makes ancient socio-institutional sense.[44]

The relevance for our task of this example is to show that, overall, based on how ancient institutional patterns worked, interaction between Jews and believers in Jesus was likely frequent, much more so than is actually evident in the texts that have been preserved. Further, this interaction was probably more often than not positive, or collaborative, as is evidenced by the negative reactions it evoked for centuries among especially church leaders and legislators more concerned with establishing clearer boundaries between 'Jewish' and 'Christian' communities than the majority was prepared to accept.[45] This means that while interaction between Jewish and non-Jewish followers of Jesus and other Jews in the early period often took place within the same institutions (Jewish associations ['synagogues'] of various forms) interaction did not end with the establishment of separate institutional settings. Indeed, while we know of separate institutions attended predominantly or even exclusively by non-Jewish Christ-followers already in the early second century, as evidenced by Pliny the Younger,[46] Jewish followers of Jesus continued for centuries to be present in institutional contexts where other Jews also gathered, even in Palestine. Their likely influence on the way rabbinic Judaism was shaped as it rose to prominence further supports a historical reconstruction in which Jesus-centred forms of Judaism continued in existence long into late antiquity.[47] We shall return to say a few more words on this as we look briefly at interaction on the private/domestic level of society.

In sum, the sources on interaction between Jews and the Jesus movement in association settings reveal a complex picture, where co-existence, co-operation and attraction defined relationships for the majority, based on a number of factors, including neighbourhood and occupational connections, even if conflict was also part of the picture, as already Paul's letters, Acts and Celsus' Jew[48] show us. There is a clear tendency here, in light of the previous findings related to the public civic sphere, namely that the literate elite is struggling to achieve separate identities and institutional settings. In the process of doing so they create literature highlighting and marking the 'religious' otherness of people behaving in ways they deem cultically inappropriate. In Christian literature, this is taken to the extreme as the rhetoric, evidenced in writings of various genres, including biblical commentaries, turns violently anti-Jewish.[49] While, as several scholars have argued, much of this anti-Judaism was in fact generated by inner-Christian conflict and attempts at limiting the influence of 'heretics' – the Jews serving as a rhetorical tool – we see how such attitudes demanding separatedness and conflict evolve, in identity-formation processes, into subsequent anti-Jewish legislation addressing very real situations.[50] It would seem to me that, considering the workings of ancient societies, especially the associations, interaction between (a) Jewish and non-Jewish members of the Jesus movement, (b) Jewish members of the Jesus movement and other Jews, and (c) non-Jewish Christians and Jews who were not Christ-followers, was bound to be quite frequent and mostly positive in nature, based on various factors and connections both cultic and other. It was likely this type of general interaction on what is often called the grassroots level that generated a sense of urgency with the elite in these various groups, wishing, for political and other reasons, to establish and maintain uniform and separate social and religious identities and behaviour. This general picture is confirmed when we look at evidence relating to the private/domestic sphere of society.

Interaction in private/domestic settings

Proceeding to the private sphere of society, speaking of interaction between individuals is, to some degree, related to these individuals' interaction as members of the groups discussed above. The writings of the Church Fathers, for example, can be seen as representing leading voices in church institutions, although they give expression to views which are also their own, as individual Christians. I have chosen here to treat their writings primarily as representative of leadership attitudes within their respective communities, avoiding equating them with the people – the majority – they aim to influence. Apart from what may be said about interaction among individuals based on realities implied by the rhetoric and rulings in the public sphere and among association-like institutions, it is often difficult to identify attitudes and interaction between individuals, as individuals, especially in the domestic sphere and among people in general (the majority). Under this heading I shall give only a few brief examples where the evidence suggests certain attitudes and possible patterns of interaction. Before doing so, we should perhaps state the obvious: individuals with diverse 'religious' identities interacted – needed to interact – with one another in various ways in ancient societies, based on factors relating to aspects of identity other than those we call 'religious'. Thus, when we discuss interaction under this heading, while we shall focus on interaction which is explicitly related to 'religious' aspects of people's identities, this should not mislead us to think of people as if they were generally acting based solely on 'religious' convictions.

If we look first at literary evidence, Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho seems to be an obvious source of information on our topic. It is difficult, however, to assess to what degree the text relates to a historical event. Do we find here examples of a 'real' dialogue situation, a Jew and a Christian engaged in a polite discussion about issues like the 'true Israel', the status of Jewish law in Christian settings, and in what way, if at all, Jesus' status as the messiah is proved by the holy scriptures? Or should we rather treat the dialogue as fictive, a literary phenomenon? While the dialogue may indeed be fictive, it seems to me best to understand the text as representing concerns that were real as Christ-followers, whether Jewish or not, and other Jews interacted intellectually.[51] If we read the text in this way, two things stand out.

First, the statements by Justin and his dialogue partner that Jewish leaders prohibit the members of their communities from interacting with Christians mirror the sentiments of Christian leaders as they try to control their congregations.[52] Such rules are, of course, evidence of the widespread practice of precisely such interaction among ordinary Jews and Christians. It seems, thus, that leaders on both sides aimed at foregrounding certain 'religious' aspects of people's identities, and prescribed separateness as a tool to maintain distinct communities and practices. However, the very fact that Trypho and Justin are described as engaging in an extended conversation implies, like the rules of separation mentioned in the text do, that such attempts at isolation by the leaders were unsuccessful among ordinary people.

Second, in Dial. 47 Justin explains that while some (non-Jewish) Christians avoid any contact with Jews who believe in Jesus as the Christ and keep the Jewish law, he himself is of the opinion that these Jews, too, will be saved. He continues to argue that if these Jewish believers in Jesus:

> [c]hoose to live with the Christians and the faithful, as I said before, not inducing them either to be circumcised like themselves, or to keep the Sabbath, or to observe any other such ceremonies, then I hold that we ought to join ourselves to such, and associate with them in all things as kinsmen and brethren.

Indeed, Justin continues to affirm even the status of non-Jews who, as Christ-believers, have converted to Judaism and keep the law: 'But I believe that even those, who have been persuaded by them [i.e. Jewish believers in Jesus] to observe the legal dispensation along with their confession of God in Christ, shall probably be saved'.

This type of attitude may be interpreted as revealing a setting in which Jewish believers in Jesus shared, or wished to share, (institutional) space with non-Jewish Christians; Justin's suggestions seem indeed to speak to the issue of how to relate to them in predominantly mainstream Christian contexts. The text also indicates that conflicts existed based on these very issues. In any case, it is clear that the views expressed by Justin were not shared by most leaders in the emerging mainstream church. In the end, what we see here might be an individual's response to a (widespread) situation where mutual curiosity and willingness to engage in communication existed between Jews, including Jewish believers in Jesus, and non-Jewish Christians on the grassroots level, across what leaders understood as ('religious') boundaries. Such interaction would be precisely what would have caused leaders on both sides to issue guidelines and rules aimed at curbing it. There is further evidence supporting the suggestion that this type of situation was, indeed, more widespread than scholars have previously thought.

We know from Chrysostom's sermons that individuals continued to disregard rulings about behaviour expected in Christian group (association) settings into the fourth and fifth centuries, and persisted in their practice of attending Jewish synagogues and practice aspects of Jewish law and customs. In fact, the adoption of Jewish practices by Christian individuals seems to have been at a high around the fourth century, triggering responses from various leadership bodies. As several scholars have pointed out, among these practices that leaders felt a need to prohibit we find the keeping of the Sabbath (and if worship took place on the Sabbath, the practice of not reading the gospels together with scriptures); rabbis blessing first fruits as Christians were harvesting; eating with Jews during their festivals; the eating of unleavened bread during Easter; celebrating Passover with Jews; entering a synagogue. Indeed, even Christian religious leaders were prohibited from celebrating festivals with Jews, receiving unleavened bread from them, and, somewhat surprisingly, from wearing phylacteries.[53] Figure 11.5, a column fragment from Laodicea incised with a menorah and a cross, appears to reflect such practices, which disregard what later became boundary markers between religions.

It should be noted that the cross has not been superimposed over the entire menorah, and that the menorah has not been erased. Rather, the cross replaces only the seventh, central candle. Reading this menorah and cross against the background of the rulings of the Council of Laodicea in 363 CE, which aimed at prohibiting practices such as those mentioned above, merging what these leaders thought of as distinct 'Jewish' and 'Christian' identities, yields interesting questions with regard to Jewish and Christian interaction, as also pointed out by the excavator of the site where the column was found (Şimşek 2006).

Karin Zetterholm suggests, appropriately, that such legislation may not only reflect judaising tendencies among non-Jewish Christians, but, indeed, could be understood as indicating the presence of Jews in mainstream Christian communities, even in leading positions.[54] In other words, while scholars have often interpreted rules against judaising as a way to prevent non-Jewish Christians from taking up Jewish practices, along the lines of Paul's critique of such behaviour, we may need to rethink the picture and allow for the possibility that Jewish believers in Jesus to a much larger degree than previously thought were present in and influenced Christian communities.[55]

Now, it seems to me reasonable to assume a rather complex scenario arising from everyday interaction between people, in which we find on the grassroots level individuals that may be identified and categorised as follows: (a) gentile Christians who understood their 'religious' identity to exclude what they identified as Jewish law, practices and customs; (b) gentile Christians who adopted selectively various Jewish customs and laws, without much thought given to what their leading theologians would understand as religious boundary markers; (c) gentile Christians who converted to Judaism, understanding their 'religious' identity to include both adherence to Christ and the fulfilling

Figure 11.5   A column fragment from Laodicea incised with a menorah and a cross. The column on which the menorah and cross were carved belonged to the lower colonnade of the Composite order in the two-storied Nymphaeum A. The Nymphaeum was dedicated to Septimus Severus, repaired during Diocletian's rule, and finally destroyed in an earthquake in 494 CE (Şimşek 2006: 343). Image courtesy of www.HolyLandPhotos.org of the Jewish law; (d) Jewish believers in Jesus, who observed Jewish law, as they had done already before joining the movement; (e) Jews who, retaining their Jewish identity, were 'Christianising', i.e. Jewish individuals who adopted selectively some elements of Christian thought and symbols, without considering too carefully what their leading theologians and halakhic experts would understand as religious boundary markers; (f) Jews who understood their religio-ethnic identity to exclude what they identified as (non-Jewish) Christian beliefs and practices.

While categories (a)–(d) and (f) have received attention in scholarship, option (e), corresponding to option (b), has rarely been contemplated as far as I know. Still, not only would such behaviour make sociological sense, there is also some archaeological evidence that, although difficult to interpret, may support the existence of individuals behaving in precisely this way.

In Sardis, a row of shops, dated to around 400 CE and backing onto the monumental synagogue and the bath and gymnasium complex, have yielded finds which have been understood as revealing the shop owners' religious identity: Christian, Jewish or pagan (Crawford 1996: 38–47, 70, 1999: 168–177). What interests us here is John Crawford's interpretation of the realia found in the shops as evidence that Jews and Christians lived side by side in apparent harmony.[56] As Keir E. Hammer and Michele Murray have pointed out, there are some indications that may reveal a more complex situation (Hammer and Murray 2005: 175–194). Among the discoveries in a shop (E12–13) identified as Jewish based on the presence of two marble fragments incised with menorahs, we find also a weighing device which top is decorated with a cross. While Crawford assumes that the Jewish owner left the cross on his device instead of erasing it because it did not mean anything to him, Hammer and Murray have suggested what seem to me more probable explanations. Either the owner was a Jew who both knew and embraced what the cross meant, or he may have been a non-Jewish-Christian who was 'judaising'. Pointing to the various rulings against judaising tendencies in the region, they lean towards the latter suggestion. The two interpretations may not, however, be mutually exclusive, since what is termed 'judaising' in contexts within mainstream churches may in fact be caused by the presence of Jewish Christ-believers in those churches.[57] What seems unlikely, however, is the suggestion that a Jew in Sardis at this time, who owned a shop backing onto the synagogue, would not know or care about a symbol such as a cross, and therefore would not remove it.

Despite the inherent unlikelihood of a scenario in which a Jew in this time period would not recognise or care about Christian symbols, and so be happy to display them at home, this type of explanation has been common among archaeologists when Christian symbols have been found in spaces identified as Jewish. In En Gedi, for example, both Jewish and Christian symbols have been found on everyday items in Jewish homes, dated to the fifth or sixth century (Hirschfeld 2007). The excavator suggests that the Christian cross apparently had no significance for the Jewish owners of the house. Noting that there was a Christian settlement not far from the Jewish village, it seems more likely, however, that we may have here an example of our fifth category above: a Jew who adopted selectively some elements of Christian thought and symbols, without considering too carefully what their leading theologians and halakhic experts would understand as religious boundary markers; that is, a scenario mirroring what we find in mainstream Christian communities at other places, where leaders tried to curb judaising behaviour.

A further example concerns the existence of a ChiRho monogram on a third/fourth-century lamp found in a Jewish catacomb in Beth She'arim (Hammer and Murray 2005: 188). Again, the excavator suggests that the symbol was either not noticed or known by the Jewish person who bought the lamp (Avigad 1976: 188). While this is an interpretive option, of course, which, as Hammer and Murray note, may be more reasonable than in the later cases of the crosses, the cumulative effect of these findings should, at the very least, make us consider the sociologically likely scenario that Jewish individuals, just as much as non-Jewish Christian individuals, did not understand boundaries between religious options in the same way as their leaders did. The mosaic floor in the Beth Alpha synagogue may, further, indicate a similar disregard for boundaries between 'Judaism' and 'Christianity' enforced in later periods, even at the community level, and scholars are increasingly considering the likelihood that we find in rabbinic literature attempts at countering alternative visions of Judaism, including Jesus-centred forms of Judaism.[58]

Certainty with regard to the interpretation of the archaeological material cannot be had, of course. However, the almost consistent avoidance in the scholarly literature of the interpretations suggested here, indicating blurred boundaries not only for individual Christians but also for individual Jews, seems to indicate a certain bias in favour of distinct Jewish and Christian communities already in late antiquity, at least on the Jewish side of the equation. Such assumptions about clear-cut boundaries rather belong in the later medieval and modern periods, however, and supporting evidence for fixed (rabbinic-)Jewish identities among ordinary people already in the period we are concerned with here is, in fact, largely lacking.

Concluding reflections: the so-called parting of the ways between Judaism and Christianity

Many, or perhaps even most studies on Jewish and Christian interaction aim to say at least something on the issue of what is usually, and problematically, referred to as the parting of the ways between Judaism and Christianity.[59] Scholars often conclude, rightly in my view, that the process in which the distinct Jewish and Christian identities represented by mainstream forms of Judaism and Christianity today emerged was complex and extended over several centuries. We can no longer assume, as has been common, that rabbinic Judaism stood prepared to take over responsibility for and define Judaism already in the wake of the fall of the Jerusalem temple; that process, in which rabbinic Judaism was formed and became mainstream in Jewish societies, took centuries. Similarly, in a simultaneous process both parallel to and intertwined with the rise of rabbinic Judaism, the formation of non-Jewish Christianity, the first explicit signs of which we find in the writings of Ignatius of Antioch,[60] was quite protracted, lasting beyond Nicaea.

What complicates the picture is the simple fact that we have to deal with the evidence we have access to on different levels, as we have attempted to do here (public/civic, associations and private/domestic), and differentiate between how people (the majority) usually tended to interact, and the patterns of behaviour the leading figures (the minority) wished to enforce. Thus, institutional separation, which likely occurred quite early and represents a 'parting' of sorts, is not an indicator of the creation of separate 'religious' identities ('Jews' and 'Christians'). Rather, such separation occurred within Judaism as Jesus-oriented Jews established associations in which the cultic component consisted of Christ-focused worship of the God of Israel. As the non-Jewish Christ-believers rose in number in such settings, we find further institutional separation, this time between Jewish and non-Jewish members of the Jesus movement. While this separation was likely the decisive process which eventually led to what we today call 'Christianity', as we have seen above it was by no means a straightforward development, and many individuals, both Jewish and non-Jewish, continued to express, in practice, an identity which blurred the boundary between what later became distinct categories for all: 'Jew' and 'Christian'.

We should also reckon with the likely scenario that alongside Jesus-oriented Jewish groups, which may have included among them non-Jewish members, we find non-Jewish associations, which had little or nothing to do with Jewish communities, but whose worship was centred around the Jesus figure.[61] These non-Jewish groups, together with those non-Jews who separated themselves from Jewish Christ-followers, carried within them the seed which evolved into modern Christianity. In the process, Jesus-centred forms of Judaism were marginalised from two directions – emerging mainstream rabbinic Judaism on the one hand and non-Jewish Christianity on the other.[62]

Throughout the first five centuries, then, the period covered in this chapter, interaction between people identifying as Jewish, whether believers in Jesus or not, and non-Jewish individuals and groups identifying as Christ-followers, was varied and complex. In brief, what prevents us from speaking of Jewish and Christian interaction in generalised terms is precisely this diversity, and the existence of individuals and groups identifying as Jews, but who engaged in Christ-centred worship of the God of Israel. 'Jewish and Christian interaction' is, then, strictly speaking, from this perspective a medieval and modern, rather than a Late-Antique, phenomenon.

Notes

1 On the creation of the concept of 'religion' in the Western world, see most recently Nongbri (2013). On 'religion' and its effects on readings of Paul, see also Nongbri (2015: 1–26).
2 Boyarin (2004: 21–57).
3 Boyarin argues that significant developments took place between the fourth and the fifth centuries, i.e. around the upper time limit for the present chapter, which he identifies as the 'orthodox Christian invention of religion' (2004: 21).
4 This focus on ethnicity has led some scholars to suggest that we should speak about 'Judeans' rather than 'Jews' in this time period; see Esler (2003: 19–76); Mason (2007). For the view that the translation 'Jew' should be retained, see Runesson (2008: 59–92). The issue is discussed extensively in Jew and Judean: A Marginalia Forum on Politics and Historiography in the Translation of Ancient Texts (Los Angeles, CA: The Marginalia Review of Books, 26 August, 2014).
5 For discussion, see Runesson (2015: 53–77).
6 This does not mean that 'ethnicity' as a discursive category became obsolete in Christian writings; cf. discussion by Buell (2005).

7   As witnessed by Chrysostom and several other sources.

8   For discussion of the archaeological evidence for aspects of this process see, e.g. Sauer (2003).

9   Cf. K. Zetterholm (2014: 127–153). See also Reed (2003: 189–231); Fonrobert (2001: 483–509).

10 For extensive discussion of the implications of this institutional context for our understanding of Jesus' aims, see Ryan (2016). The same terms were also used to designate another type of institution, the Jewish associations. Contrary to Jewish associations, public synagogues existed only in villages, towns and cities where Jews were in charge of administration, and they belonged to the community, not to a specific Jewish interest group, such as, e.g. the Pharisees (cf. m. Ned. 5:5). These institutions were open to all, men and women alike, and there is no mention of any restrictions with regard to the participation in meetings of any specific groups and/or individuals. Public synagogues also housed law courts and archives, and it is likely that they also, as evidence from the Diaspora suggests, functioned as treasuries and were the place where slaves were manumitted. For source material and discussion thereof, see Runesson et al. (2008).

11 On the term 'nation' as applied to antiquity, see discussion in Goldblatt (2006: 1–27).

12 See discussion in Runesson (2016: 11–26).

13 Cf. Acts 5:33–39 where we find a prominent Pharisee saving the lives of Jesus' disciples as they are threatened by members of the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem.

14 On Antipas' long rule, see Jensen (2010).

15 Several other Messianic claimants and their followers, all of whom threatened the status quo in the land in the first century, are mentioned by Josephus; none of them were, however, successful in their aims. For sources and brief discussion, see Evans (2005: 431–443); cf. Stegemann and Stegemann (1999: 165–186).

16 E.g. Mark 2:2; 10:46; 11:18, 31–32; Matt. 7:28–8:1; 19:1–2; 22:45–46; 26:3–5; Luke 4:42–44; 14:25; 22:2; John 7:31–32; cf. Acts 5:12–18.

17 I include the chief priests, elders and scribes employed in the temple administration among these civic leaders, since the temple was a political institution as much as a religious one.

18 See above, n. 15.

19 Even in the case of Jerusalem, Josephus notes that when James was executed, other Jews, including king Agrippa, reacted negatively and rejected the whole procedure of assembling the Sanhedrin for this purpose (AJ 20.201–203). This indicates that this was an unusual measure taken against members of the movement.

20 m. Mak 3:12 (ASSB, No. 86); cf. Acts 22:19 (ASSB, No 73; cf. Nos. 19, 20).

21 For sources, see Linder (1987). The key texts are the Theodosian Code and the Justinian Corpus.

22 Roman decrees on Jewish rights are reproduced in Josephus' Antiquities; for texts, translations and comments, see ASSB, Nos. 93 (Delos), 108 (Ephesus), 109 (Halicarnassus), 110 (Miletus), 113 (Sardis), 114 (Sardis), 120 (by Augustus; unspecified locations) and 180 (Rome).

23 Cf. Acts 18:12–16, where the author recounts a story about a case involving Paul, in which the proconsul of Achaia, Gallio, refuses to be judge, implicitly acknowledging the Jesus movement as a Jewish group, and the Jewish community as having more autonomy than later centuries would allow them.

24 For example, regulations applied to officials in synagogues (referred to as 'priesthood') were treated in a way analogical to laws governing privileges of clergy in the church.

25 This law was re-affirmed in 397 (Linder [1987], No. 27).

26 Linder (1987) No. 40. (However, a law from 408 CE explicitly prohibited Jews from mocking Christians during the celebration of Purim.)

27 Linder (1987) No. 21. This law was followed up by Theodosius II in 423, where the wording of the text reveals that the legislator understood such behaviour not only to be unlawful but also to be un-Christian; Linder (1987: 86) and Nos. 47–49.

28 Linder (1987) No. 47.

29 In 535 CE, Justinian prohibited the maintenance of synagogues in North Africa, ordering these buildings to be converted into churches. See Linder (1987: 74).

30 Linder (1987) No. 45. Note that Jews could still serve in municipal offices and practise law, with some limitations.

31 Linder (1987) Nos. 37, 38.

32 Cf. Jacobs, (2004: 200–209).

33 On Jewish mission in the Talmudic period see, e.g. Goodman (1994). Goodman notes that the rabbis developed an increased interest in proselytism in the third and fourth centuries. See also Feldman (1993: 342–415). Partly drawing on legal material from Late Antiquity, Feldman concludes: 'Far from withdrawing into itself or restricting itself to a conflict built around the interpretation of sacred texts, Judaism boldly confronted the church' (1993: 414). See also Setzer (1994: 146), who argues that Jews and gentile Christ-followers competed for gentile converts.

34 For collections of sources relating to associations in the Graeco-Roman world, see Kloppenborg and Ascough (2011); Harland (2014). See also the website of Harland, 'Associations in the Greco-Roman world: An expanding collection of inscriptions, papyri, and other sources in translation' (http://philipharland.com/greco-roman-associations/).

35 For discussion of these terms, see Runesson (2015: 53–77). Of course, these same terms were employed in different settings also by other, Graeco-Roman, institutions, which further highlights the necessity of abandoning preconceived ideas about the nature of ancient institutions based on later applications of this terminology.

36 On the categorisation of (non-civic) synagogues as well as Christ-groups (remembering that the latter could be, in some cases, understood as sub-groups within the former) within the broader category of associations, themselves evidencing diversity within the category, see, e.g. Richardson (2004: 111–133, 207–221) and, most recently, Last (2016b).

37 Human interaction is, of course, related to and intertwined with aspects of individual and group identities, including what we would call religious identity. For our purposes here, it is of some importance to note that 'religious' identity is not the only factor involved when individuals and groups with specific religious identities interact. Cf. Rebillard (2015: 293–318). We need to consider, as Rebillard phrases it (2015: 293), how and when it matters in everyday life to express specific religious identities, or parts of those identities.

38 On the translation of pistis as referring to aspects of 'loyalty' rather than 'belief', see Morgan (2015). The meaning of apistoi thus carries a nuance of 'those who are disloyal'.

39 Last, 'The neighbourhoods of Christ-believers in Roman cities and towns', paper delivered at the Annual Meeting of the SNTS in Montreal, 2016, to be published in a forthcoming volume entitled Christ-Followers' Groups: Neighborhood Networks, Occupational Guilds, and Trans-Local Writers' Organizations. I am grateful to Dr Last for permission to refer to this work here. See also Last (2016b: 399–425).

40 In Rome, Jews lived primarily in the suburbs, first in Transtiberinum, and later in the Campus Martius and the Subura (see Richardson 2004: 114). According to Josephus, Jews in Alexandria lived mostly in the so-called Delta district (BJ 2.495). This does not mean, of course, that there were no Jews living in other parts of the city, as Philo reminds us of as he notes that Jewish 'prayer halls' (proseuchai) existed in each quarter of the city (Legat. 132). It is likely, then, that where such buildings were constructed, Jews lived close by, which in turn means that groups of Jews lived in each section of the city, likely in the same neighbourhoods.

41 On the existence of the so-called Godfearers, see most recently Fredriksen (2016: 25–33). As Fredriksen notes, contra Kraemer (2014: 61–87), 'the term is both useful and usable, its range of meanings fittingly elastic, its attestation in ancient evidence of various sorts as secure as our evidence usually gets' (2016: 25). Just as other associations could have 'strangers' among them as members – for example, not all members of the association of the purple-dyers may have been purple-dyers, but some individuals could have joined the group based on other connections, such as the network provided by the neighbourhood in which the association met, cf. Last (2016b: 24–25) – non-Jews could frequent the meetings of Jewish ethnic groups, which were based on neighbourhood or occupational connections.

42 For evidence, Fredriksen refers to Origen (Hom. Lev. 5.8; Sel. Exod. 12.46), and John Chrysostom. For discussion, see also Murray (2004).

43 While Stark may sometimes overstate his case, and some of his assumptions about the ancient material are problematic (cf., e.g. Reinhartz 2006: 197–212), the overall case made remains a challenge to historians writing on Christian origins, especially when considered from the perspective of ancient institutions, which likely provided the networks needed for the spread of the group.

44 On the connection between ethnicity and other identity markers as Jews gathered in 'synagogues', cf. the well-known passage in Tosefta, Sukkah 4.6, which describes 'the great synagogue' in Alexandria. In this building, a huge basilica-like structure, people sat according to their occupation, which, as the text notes, facilitated for newcomers to identify people in the same trade and so be able to find ways of making a living. As noted above, 'synagogue' should here be understood as incorporated under the genus association. This means that a Jewish synagogue institution could vary in its form, function and membership depending on the network it served. For example, a guild of Jewish weavers could be and was called a 'synagogue'; the cult of that guild would likely be connected with the ethnic identity of the members, and thus directed to the God of Israel. Such cult consisted primarily of, as we know from other sources, reading, expounding and discussing Torah on Sabbaths, as well as of a number of other rituals performed weekly and on festivals. Cf. Leviticus Rabbah 35.12, which mentions 'the mine workers synagogue' in Lydda (Lod). As the editors of the English translation of Midrash Rabbah notes, 'synagogues were often formed of members engaged in a particular craft', Freedman and Simon (1977: 453). Thus, for centuries, in Jewish settings the term 'synagogue' could refer to Jewish associations centred on ethnic, cultic and neighbourhood connections as well as those drawing membership from occupational networks; all of them, though, would involve worship of the God of Israel.

45 See n. 51 above. For Chrysostom, note Against the Jews 1.3, 4 (PG 48, 847, 848).

46 Pliny's reference to changes in temple attendance and the food market – increased sales of meat – when people identified as Christians left their Christian convictions behind, reveals that they were not Jews to begin with; see Letters 10.96. Cf. Ignatius of Antioch, who seems intent on bringing about precisely such a situation with regard to separate institutions, excluding Jewish modes of being a Christ-follower: Magn. 10.3. Justin Martyr, however, aims at overcoming enmity based on such different practices within the movement: Dial. 47.

47 See discussion by K. Zetterholm (2014, 2016: 102–120, especially 114–117).

48 See, e.g. discussion by Setzer (1994: 147–151).

49 Jerome would be one well-known example, Chrysostom another. Augustine, however, represents a different attitude; see Fredriksen (2010).

50 For discussion of rhetoric versus social realities, see Jacobs (2004). Cf. Shepardson (2015: 147–182).

51 So also Freyne (2014). While not all scholars agree, this is the majority view, as Wilson (1995: 260–261) points out.

52 Cf. discussion in Setzer (1994: 144–146). On Justin, see also Wilson (1995: 258–284) and Freyne (2014: 334–340).

53 On this, see K. Zetterholm (forthcoming: 5–6). I am grateful to Dr Zetterholm for sending me her article before publication, and for allowing me to refer to it here.

54 K. Zetterholm (forthcoming: 6), referring also to the author/redactor of the pseudo-Clementine literature as an example of Jesus-oriented Judaism intent on observing the Torah.

55 Cf. discussion of Justin Martyr above; see also Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 1.26.2 and Origen, C. Celsum 5.61, 2.1, both of whom mention Torah observant Christians; cf. K. Zetterholm (forthcoming: 6). See also Trebilco (forthcoming): 'We need to remind ourselves that many of the early Christ-believers were of course ethnically Jewish. When we consider what might be thought of as "Jewish ideas" among Christ-believers, we need to ask if they come from Jews or from Jewish Christians or from Gentile Christians who have adopted Jewish attitudes? Perhaps such ideas and practices came from Jewish Christians who of course continued to see themselves as Jews, rather than from non-Christian Jews' (Trebilco forthcoming: 8). I am grateful to Professor Trebilco for sending me his article before publication, and for allowing me to quote it here. This type of scenario would also match but take further the general approach of Rodney Stark, to the spread of the Jesus movement in the early centuries.

56 Contrasting, for example, the rhetorically violent anti-Judaism expressed in the second century by Melito in his Peri Pascha. On this text, see Cohick (2000).

57 Cf. nn. 53–55 above.

58 See discussion in K. Zetterholm (2014). On Beth Alpha, see K. Zetterholm (2016: 116–117).

59 For discussion and problematisation of various aspects of these processes, see the contributions to Becker and Reed (2003).

60 On separation processes in Antioch, see M. Zetterholm (2003).

61 As evidenced by Pliny the Younger, see above, n. 46.

62 For discussion of this process with a focus on archaeological remains, see Runesson (2007: 231–257).

Bibliography

Avigad, N. (1976) Beth She'arim: Report on Excavations During 1953–1958. Jerusalem: Masada Press.

Becker, A. H. and Reed, A. Y. (eds) (2003) The Ways that Never Parted: Jews and Christians in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Boyarin, D. (2004) 'The Christian invention of Judaism: The Theodosian Empire and the rabbinic refusal of religion', Representations 85: 21–57.

Buell, D. K. (2005) Why This New Race: Ethnic Reasoning in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Cohick, L. H. (2000) The Peri Pascha Attributed to Melito of Sardis: Setting, Purpose, and Sources. Providence, RI: Brown Judaic Studies.

Crawford, J. (1996) 'Multiculturalism at Sardis: Jews and Christians live, work, and worship side by side', Biblical Archaeology Review 22(5): 38–47, 70.

Crawford, J. (1999) 'Jews, Christians and polytheists in late-antique Sardis', in Fine, S. (ed.) Jews, Christians, and Polytheists in the Ancient Synagogue: Cultural Interaction During the Greco-Roman Period. London: Routledge: 168–177.

Esler, P. (2003) Conflict and Identity in Romans: The Social Setting of Paul's Letter. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Evans, C. A. (2005) Ancient Texts for New Testament Studies: A Guide to the Background Literature. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Feldman, L. H. (1993) Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World: Attitudes and Interactions from Alexander to Justinian. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Fonrobert, C. E. (2001) 'The Didascalia Apostolorum: A Mishnah for the disciples of Jesus', Journal of Early Christian Studies 9(4): 483–509.

Fredriksen, P. (2010) Augustine and the Jews: A Christian Defence of Jews and Judaism. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Fredriksen, P. (2016) '"If it looks like a duck, and quacks like a duck. . . ": On not giving up the Godfearers', in Ashbrook Harvey, S. et al. (eds) A Most Reliable Witness: Essays in Honor of Ross Shepard Kraemer. Providence, RI: Brown University Press: 25–33.

Freedman H. and Simon, M. (eds) (1977) The Midrash Rabbah: Translated into English with Notes, Glossary and Indices, 5 vols.; vol. 2: Exodus & Leviticus. London: The Soncino Press.

Freyne, S. (2014) The Jesus Movement and Its Expansion: Meaning and Mission. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Goldblatt, D. (2006) Elements of Jewish Nationalism. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Goodman, M. (1994) Mission and Expansion: Proselytizing in the Religious History of the Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hammer, K. E. and Murray, M. (2005) 'Acquaintances, supporters, and competitors: Evidence of inter-connectedness and rivalry among the religious groups in Sardis', in Ascough, R. S. (ed.) Religious Rivalries and Struggle for Success in Sardis and Smyrna. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press: 157–194.

Harland, P. A. (2003) Associations, Synagogues, and Congregations: Claiming a Place in Ancient Mediterranean Society. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Harland, P. A. (ed.) (2014) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. Vol. 2: North Coast of the Black Sea, Asia Minor. Berlin: De Gruyter.

Hirschfeld, Y. (2007) En-Gedi Excavations II: Final Report (1996–2002). Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society.

Jacobs, A. S. (2004) Remains of the Jews: The Holy Land and Christian Empire in Late Antiquity. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Jensen, M. H. (2010) Herod Antipas in Galilee: The Literary and Archaeological Sources on the Reign of Herod Antipas and Its Socio-Economic Impact on Galilee. Sec. ed.; WUNT 2.215. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Josephson, J. A. (2012) The Invention of Religion in Japan. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Keith, C. (2014) Jesus Against the Scribal Elite: The Origins of the Conflict. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

Kloppenborg, J. S. and Ascough, R. S. (eds) (2011) Greco-Roman Associations: Texts, Translations, and Commentary. Vol. 1: Attica, Central Greece, Macedonia, Thrace. Berlin: De Gruyter.

Kraemer, R. (2014) 'Giving up the Godfearers', Journal of Ancient Judaism 5: 61–87.

Last, R. (2016a) 'The neighborhood (vicus) of the Corinthian ekklēsia: Beyond family-based descriptions of the first urban Christ-believers', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 38: 4: 399–425.

Last, R. (2016b) The Pauline Church and the Corinthian Ekklēsia: Greco-Roman Associations in Comparative Context. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Last, R. (forthcoming) 'The neighbourhoods of Christ-believers in Roman cities and towns', Paper delivered at the Annual Meeting of the SNTS in Montreal, 2016, to be published in a forthcoming volume entitled Christ-Followers' Groups: Neighborhood Networks, Occupational Guilds, and Trans-Local Writers' Organizations.

Linder, A. (1987) The Jews in Roman Imperial Legislation. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.

Mason, S. (2007) 'Jews, Judaeans, Judaizing, Judaism: Problems of categorization in ancient history', Journal for the Study of Judaism 38: 457–512.

Morgan, T. (2015) Roman Faith and Christian Faith: Pistis and Fides in the Early Roman Empire and Early Churches. Oxford, UK: New York: Oxford University Press.

Murray, M. (2004) Playing a Jewish Game: Gentile Christian Judaizing in the First and Second Centuries CE. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press.

Nongbri, B. (2013) Before Religion: A History of a Modern Concept. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Nongbri, B. (2015) 'The concept of religion and the study of the Apostle Paul', Journal of the Jesus Movement in Its Jewish Setting 2: 1–26.

Rebillard, É. (2015) 'Late antique limits of Christianness: North Africa in the age of Augustine', in Rebillard, E. and Rüpke, J. (eds) Group Identity and Religious Individuality in Late Antiquity. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press: 293–318.

Reed, A. Y. (2003) '"Jewish Christianity" after the "Parting of the Ways": Approaches to historiography and self-definition in the Pseudo-Clementines', in Becker, A. H. and Reed, A, Y. (eds) The Ways that Never Parted: Jews and Christians in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck: 189–231.

Reinhartz, A. (2006) 'Rodney Stark and the "Mission to the Jews"', in Vaage, L. E. (ed.) Religious Rivalries in the Early Roman Empire and the Rise of Christianity. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press: 197–212.

Richardson, P. (2004) Building Jewish in the Roman East. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Runesson, A. (2007) 'Architecture, conflict, and identity formation: Jews and Christians in Capernaum from the 1st to the 6th century', in Zangenberg, J., Attridge, H. W. and Martin, D. (eds) Religion, Ethnicity, and Identity in Ancient Galilee. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck: 231–257.

Runesson, A. (2008) 'Inventing Christian identity: Paul, Ignatius, and Theodosius I', in Holmberg, B. (ed.) Exploring Early Christian Identity. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck: 59–92.

Runesson, A. (2014) 'The historical Jesus, the Gospels, and first-century Jewish society: The importance of the synagogue for understanding the New Testament', in Warner, D. and Binder, D. D. (eds) A City Set on a Hill: Essays in Honor of James F. Strange. Mountain Home, AR: Borderstone Press, LLC: 265–297.

Runesson, A. (2015) 'The question of terminology: The architecture of contemporary discussions on Paul', in Nanos, M. and Zetterholm, M. (eds) Paul Within Judaism: Restoring the First-Century Context to the Apostle. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press: 53–77.

Runesson, A. (2016) 'Entering a synagogue with Paul: First-century Torah observance', in Miller, D. M. and Wendel, S. J. (eds) Torah Ethics and Early Christian Identity. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans: 11–26.

Runesson, A., Binder, D. D. and Olsson, B. (2008) The Ancient Synagogue From Its Origins to 200 C.E.: A Source Book (Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity Series 72). Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill. (Abbreviated ASSB)

Ryan, J. (2016) 'The Kingdom of God and the Assembly of the People: The role of the synagogue in the aims of Jesus'. PhD thesis, McMaster University.

Sauer, E. (2003) The Archaeology of Religious Hatred in the Roman and Early Medieval World. Charleston, SC: Tempus.

Setzer, C. (1994) Jewish Responses to Early Christians: History and Polemics 30–150 CE. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Shepardson, C. (2015) 'Between polemic and propaganda: Evoking the Jews of fourth-century Antioch', Journal of the Jesus Movement in Its Jewish Setting 2: 147–182.

Şimşek, C. (2006) 'A menorah with a cross carved on a column of Nymphaeum A at Laodicea ad Lycum', Journal of Roman Archaeology 19(1): 343–346.

Stark, R. (1997) The Rise of Christianity: How the Obscure, Marginal Jesus Movement Became the Dominant Religious Force in the Western World in a Few Centuries. San Francisco, CA: HarperCollins.

Stegemann, E. W. and Stegemann, W. (1999) The Jesus Movement: A Social History of Its First Century. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Trebilco, P. (forthcoming) 'The Jewish community in Ephesus and its interaction with Christ-believers in the first century CE and beyond', in Harrison, J. R. and Welborn, L. L (eds) The First Urban Churches 3: Ephesus. Writings from the Greco-Roman World Supplement Series 7. Atlanta, GA: SBL Press.

Wilson, S. G. (1995) Related Strangers: Jews and Christians 70–170 C.E. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Zetterholm, K. H. (2014) 'Alternative visions of Judaism and their impact on the formation of rabbinic Judaism', Journal of the Jesus Movement in Its Jewish Setting 1: 127–153.

Zetterholm, K. H. (2016) 'Isaac and Jesus: A rabbinic reappropriation of a Christian motif?', Journal of Jewish Studies 67(1): 102–120.

Zetterholm, K. H. (forthcoming) 'Rabbis in conversation with Jesus-oriented groups: An ancient version of the "Who is a Jew" debate'.

Zetterholm, M. (2003) The Formation of Christianity in Antioch: A Sociological Approach to the Separation Between Judaism and Christianity. London: Routledge.

PART III

Community formation and maintenance

Taylor & Francis
Taylor & Francis Group
http://taylorandfrancis.com

12 MISSION AND EXPANSION

Thomas M. Finn

Some preliminaries

Of all the religious groups in the Greco-Roman world, why did an obscure group of Palestinian Jews spread to become the established religion of the Roman Empire in less than four centuries?

A ready answer is the conversion of the emperor Constantine (306–337) coupled with his 'edict of Milan' (313), which legalized and subsequently privileged Christianity. To be sure, without Constantine the Christian story would be very different. Yet even before Constantine, Christianity had already arrived as a force to be reckoned with. The puzzle that plagues students of antiquity is how and why?

For ancient and medieval Christians, the only important piece was the miracle of divine dispensation; yet early this century students of the ancient world have turned up a number of other important pieces. They range from early Christianity's ability to adapt to its surroundings (Harnack 1908b: 464), to Christianity as the road to revitalizing an unraveling Greco-Roman urban social world (Stark 1996). Although pieces abound, a vital piece has largely been taken for granted—conversion. But first, a sketch of the results of conversion.

Early Christian spread

The numbers

A thumbnail sketch of early Christian expansion might well start with numbers. The earliest source, the Acts of the Apostles, tracks the growth of Christianity from 120 converts gathered in Jerusalem just after Jesus' death (Acts 1:15) to many thousands (Acts 21:20) by the sixties of our era. Assuming a total population of sixty million in the Roman empire, a recent attempt to track Christian numerical growth suggests the following profile (Stark 1996: 7)[1]:

Year	Number of Christians	Percent of population
40	1,000	.0017
50	1,400	.0023
100	7,530	.0126

(continued)

Year	Number of Christians	Percent of population
150	40,496	.07
200	217,795	.36
250	1,171,356	1.9
300	6,299,832	10.5
350	33,882,008	56.6

The figures assume a growth rate of 40 percent per decade until 350, after which the percentage (though not the numbers) declines. Although the figures correlate well with the few facts that ancient literature and archeological remains have turned up, they are projections based on what is known about the empire's cities. Nonetheless, they are a framework within which to view the growth of Christianity. Yet empire-wide figures are only initially helpful, because early Christian literature, archeology, and contemporary social analysis confirm the fact that Christianity was an urban phenomenon. Consider two cities and two different periods.

First the Christians in Rome. Of the twenty-two Mediterranean cities that numbered 40,000 people or more, Rome was the largest, having a population of about 650,000 at the end of the first century. At the .0126 percent cited above, there were a few less than 1,400 Christians in the city at the end of the first century, whereas in the year 250, when Rome's population was some 700,000, there were about 14,000 (possibly as many as 20,000: Grant 1977: 7). The numbers tally with literary evidence cited by Eusebius that the Roman church had about 155 in ministerial positions (presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, lectors, exorcists and the like) and supported some 1,500 'widows with those in straightened circumstances' (Oulton and Lawlor 1973: 114–15; Eusebius, HE 6.43.3).

Yet population growth was not uniform. In the small (no more than 15,000) Palestinian city of Gaza at the end of the fourth century, for instance, there were 280 Christians, augmented by 163 converts, including men, women, boys, and girls (Grant 1977: 9–11; MacMullen 1984: 86–9). If the above profile were applied uniformly, one would expect 8,000 Gazan Christians, yet they numbered only 443, or 3 percent. The size of a city and its location were important variables, which cautions one about the application of projections. There were other variables as well, often ominous: persecution, plagues and epidemics, famine, warfare, abortion and birth control, and a 25-year life expectancy—in short, the fragility of ancient life. Clearly, some of the ominous variables were at work both favoring and restricting the growth of Christianity.

The geography

By the end of the first century the records show churches in forty-two cities of the empire (Vander Meer and Mohrmann 1958: 2–14).[2] Although the majority were in the Roman provinces that constitute modern Turkey, communities of Christians ranged from Rome in the Latin west to Edessa in the Syrian east, and from Philippi in Macedonia to Cyrene in Libya. By the end of the third century, Britain had at least 5 churches; Spain, close to 60; France and Germany, nearly 100; Roman North Africa, over 100; not to mention the extensive growth of churches in Italy and Egypt, and the remarkable expansion in Roman Turkey, which remained the most populous area of the early Christian world. They were almost all urban and so strongly entrenched that the emperor Diocletian (284–305) could look out on a Christian cathedral from his palace in Nicomedia (western Turkey). He ordered it razed in 303.

Although there were rural Christians, information about them is slender at best. The life of one celebrated Christian missionary, however, sheds some light on the matter, Gregory the Wonder-Worker (210–260). Born into a prominent family in Pontus, a backwater province bordering on the Black Sea, where great estates (like his family's) surrounded small towns and villages, Gregory went to Beirut (Lebanon) to study law and then to Caesarea in Palestine to study with the great Alexandrian Christian teacher (190–254), Origen. In the course of his five years in Caesarea, Gregory became a Christian. He returned to Pontus (about 240) to become the province's missionary bishop. We learn from his fourth-century biographer that when Gregory returned to Pontus there were only seventeen Christians, and when he died, there were only seventeen Pagans. Nonetheless, it was not until the Constantinian settlement that Christianity became a fairly widespread town, village, and countryside phenomenon. Only then, for instance, does the term 'Pagan' (paganus/country-dweller) become an adjective, usually pejorative, for the non-Jewish and non-Christian religions of the empire.

Regrettably, the historical sources confine their attention primarily to the Greco-Roman world. Christians, however, went east early. By the end of the second century they were well established in Persia (modern Iraq and Iran), centered themselves in two important eastern cities, Nisibis (Syria) and Edessa (Turkey), and spoke and wrote Syriac, an eastern dialect of the Aramaic spoken by Jesus. In the fourth and fifth centuries, Syriac Christianity flourished, producing a number of important figures and works. And if the Acts of Judas Thomas (Schneemelcher 1965: 426–531), which describes the conversion of the royal household in the early third century, can be credited, Syriac Christianity had penetrated all the way to what is now the modern Indian province of Kerala.

Christians did not just move east; they also moved across the northern borders of the empire—the Danube and the Rhine rivers—and not altogether voluntarily; often they were captives. From about 190 CE, as we will see, the empire slid gradually into helplessness and anarchy. Among the causes (and effects) was the incursion of the Germanic tribes into the shores of the Black Sea, the Balkans, and Greece. Indeed, in 251 the Goths defeated emperor Decius and his army at Beroea in Greece, killing the emperor and his son. Among prisoners of war, the Goths took Christians, who brought their religion with them. Although a later example, Ulphilas ('Wulfila,' 311–382) embodies this kind of encounter between Christianity and the barbarians. Born to a Christian family in Cappadocia (central Turkey), he was carried off with his family and raised among the Goths. Eventually he became a bishop (341), settled down in Moesia (Yugoslavia) and, in spite of every kind of hardship, converted many Goths to (Arian) Christianity with ever-increasing success. One key to his success was the fact that he translated the Bible into Gothic (up to that time not a written language).

While the Goths were crossing the Danube, Franks and Alamanni crossed the Rhine and broke into Gaul, some of them penetrating as far as Spain. In both countries a long-established Gallic and Iberian Christianity met them. Martin of Tours (316–397) embodies the effort to Christianize the barbarians in western Europe during this period (Brown 1996: 102–11). Born to Pagan parents in Swabia (Hungary), as an eighteen year-old he became a convert, soldier, and adventurer. Eventually he became a monk, founding in 360 (with Hilary of Poitiers) the first known monastery north of the Alps (Ligugé). Because of his reputation as a holy man and healer, he was elected bishop of Tours in 372. For the next twenty-five years he promoted Christianity and monasticism, giving himself wholeheartedly to evangelizing the rural (and Pagan) population of Gaul (France).

Social status

Growth was not just in numbers, neither was spread only geographically; Christians advanced socially. Some stood fairly high on the social scale, some low (Hopkins 1998: 207–13). We know the names of about 1,000 Christians of the first and second centuries and often their social standing, education, legal status, language, and ethnic and religious origin. Luke, to whom the Third Gospel and Acts are attributed, was a physician (Col. 4:14); Onesimus was a fugitive slave (Phlm. 16); Cornelius was a legionary line officer (centurion) of the Italian Cohort (Acts 10:1); Clement of Rome (c. 96), a freed-man member of the imperial civil service; Justin Martyr (100–165), a philosopher; Vibia Perpetua (d. 203), the daughter of a provincial Roman patrician from Carthage, and her fellow martyr, Felicity, a slave; Phoebe, a deacon from Corinth's Aegean seaport (Rom 16:1); Chloe, a householder from Corinth (1 Cor. 1:10).

Although Paul says about his Corinthian Christians 'not many of you were wise by human standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth' (1 Cor. 1:26), and the well-informed pagan critic, Celsus (late second century), claimed that Christians converted only women, children, slaves, and fools (Origen, Contra Celsum 3.55 [Chadwick 1965: 165]; Hoffmann 1987: 72–3), the evidence from the first three centuries suggests otherwise. Granted that the majority were low on the social ladder, the list of names just cited indicates that converts to Christianity came from several strata. Further, to be able to write (a fact to which early Christian literature attests with vigor) meant that a number of Christians were in the top 2 percent of Roman society (Hopkins 1998: 210). Finally, to be low did not mean that one had to stay low. One could move up; the trick was to acquire the valued criteria of birth, legal standing, wealth, learnt skills, ability, achievement, and style of life (Hopkins 1965: 239–48). In fact, upward mobility was widespread.

The primary avenues were careers in the Roman legions, education, and imperial civil service (Finn 1982: 31–7). When Augustus (r. 27 BCE–14 CE) established the empire, for instance, he set up an effective public administration. His creation, the 'Imperial Household' (familia Caesaris), depended on cadres of lesser officials whom he drew from his slaves and freedmen, trained and seasoned slave-born professionals—he could count on them because they were his men. Of the training schools, the most famous of the schools was in Rome itself, close to the imperial palace. A graduate could expect to enter the emperor's service at about twenty, accept a variety of administrative appointments, and expect to be manumitted at about age thirty, and, after that, to receive senior appointments. Such an administrator would retire solid in comfort and status.

Many slaves, Christians among them, travelled this route. Perhaps, more important, their offspring were freeborn with citizenship, permitting them to travel further and faster than their forebears on the avenue of upward mobility. Studies of status-change in the empire indicate that it generally took three generations to effect substantial change. An example of Christian mobility is Clement, reputed to be third bishop of Rome (88–97) and the author of a letter called First Clement (c. 96) addressed to, and at points chiding and correcting, the church at Corinth. Already in the fifties of our era, Paul mentioned that there were Christ-followers in civil service (Phil. 4:22). Clement was just such a one. He appears to have been assigned to the administrative department at Rome that might now be called the foreign office or state department. He would have been able to write good Greek, handle complex calculations, and exercise authority through correspondence with outside agencies, especially the provinces. As it turns out, Clement also owned a house in the city near the Forum, the center of Roman public life, which was a sign of considerable standing and substance. Not surprisingly, Clement was prominent in the Roman church. Not only did he handle the foreign affairs of the community (he had no hesitation in interfering in the affairs of the church at Corinth), his home may have been among the earliest of the house churches there.

Although space does not permit exploring the other avenues of upward mobility, suffice it to say that many Christians could be found in education and the military, not to mention trade and commerce. By the middle of the next century (250–260), when emperors Decius and Valerian initiated the first empire-wide attempt to root out Christianity, Christians at the top of the social pyramid, namely, senators and equestrians, were deprived of their rank, lost their property, and, if obdurate, were executed. Similarly, their counterparts, Christian wives (matronae) lost their property and were banished. As for those in imperial service, they were also subject to confiscation and to a return to slavery (Burns and Jensen 2014: 1–32).

Conversion

Christians had come a long way between 50 and 250. But how had they managed it? An answer requires a consideration of the hows and whys, namely, conversion. Religious conversion remains a subject of intense scholarly interest (Rambo and Farhadian 2014).

The lineage of a word

In the English-speaking world, the prevailing image of conversion is contained in a celebrated seventeenth-century hymn, 'Amazing Grace,' which limns conversion as a sudden and humanly inexplicable inner transformation. In the twentieth century, psychologists tended to reinforce this hymnic view. According to Harvard psychologist, William James (1902), it was a process by which the self, divided, guilt-ridden, and unhappy becomes unified, free of guilt, and happy because of religion.[3] Paul on the Damascus Road (Acts 9:1–9) and Augustine in the garden at Milan (Confessions 8.29 [O'Donnell 1992: 101–2]) rapidly became the models, underscoring conversion as the result of 'amazing grace.'

With the arrival of new eastern religions on American shores in the 1950s, however, the image changed. Social scientists took an interest in these new religions and conversion, establishing a broader model that delineates conversion as a gradual process, involving (1) the total life-setting of the potential convert; (2) an identity crisis; (3) an active search for a new identity, meaning, and purpose in life; (4) encounter with a new religious reality that engages a wide range of social and psychic needs; (5) continual and mutual interaction with the community that embodies the new religious reality; (6) a clear-cut choice between one's previous way of living and a new way that yields commitment; and (7) gradual transformation of attitudes and values mirrored in conduct (Rambo 1993: 16–18). In short, conversion is an extended and many-layered process, which does not necessarily entail crossing boundaries from one religion to another. The author of 'Amazing Grace,' John Newton, for instance, was a Christian who turned to a more intense and, as he thought, more authentic Christianity.

Conversion in antiquity exhibited these characteristics, including conversion to Christianity which blended two ancient traditions (Aubin 1962). The first was Greek and Roman, and emphasized 'turning' (from and to). For Plato and his many followers, conversion was a personal process of turning away from an old way of seeing and existing to a new way, one that put one in touch with reality itself. The second was biblical, emphasizing the personal. Conversion was a return to the one God, a turning which involved repentance, reconciliation with God, and rededication to his service. Recent research has continued to probe the dynamics of conversion to early Christianity. One approach builds on the insight that Graeco-Roman and Mediterranean religions, including Christianity, were framed in the language of patronage, benefaction, and loyalty, so that an understanding of ancient conversion must include these phenomena (Crook 2004). Another approach argues that the earliest Christian conversion occurred from a 'Judean' ethnic group rather than a 'Jewish' religion, with the two entities involving being different in nature and asymmetric to one another, and that this needs to be taken into account in understanding the process (Esler 2015).

Records of conversions

For the ancient Pagans, Jews, and Christians, conversion was a gradual process interlaced with ritual. To be sure, there was a decisive moment on which everything turned as if on an axis, but, as the ancients saw it, every conversion had a history. Although the process can be amply documented for Pagans and Jews as well as Christians (Finn 1997: 67–136), our immediate concern is with the latter. The documents that follow are snapshots of the process, which, of course, differed, though not significantly in structure or function, at different places and times during the years 150 through 450 of our era.

The first document is the diary account of the arrest and execution of a young Roman woman convert in North Africa in 202/203, The Passion of Perpetua and Felicity, two women who are profiled in Chapter 49 of this volume; similarly the second, a document from third-century Rome, the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (Cumming 1976: 8–31); and the third, a fourth-century set of instructions or homilies on baptism and the eucharist from Jerusalem and its bishop, Cyril, The Mystagogical Catecheses (Yarnold 1994: 67–97), coupled with an eyewitness account, The Diary of Egeria, a western pilgrim in the city about 380 (Gingras 1970: 49–128).

Perpetua's diary

Among the ominous variables that deeply affected Christian mission and expansion for 300 years was persecution (Burns and Jensen 2014: 86). The very possibility darkened many a door, reinforcing the tendency of Christian communities to keep very much to themselves and draw clear and well-protected boundaries between themselves and their world. Such is the data from the most influential account of martyrdom in antiquity (Salisbury 1997: 1–20). The heart of the work (chs. 3:1–10:15) is a diary by Perpetua, an educated, well brought up, and pious young Roman woman (twenty-two) from high society in Carthage (the family name was Vibius), a city of some 400,000, in the west second in distinction only to Rome. She was married and the mother of a two-year-old son (a matrona).

At some point, perhaps about the time she married, Perpetua and her brother (because he is unnamed, his surname, Vibius, is used hereafter) encountered Christianity in Carthage. Attracted, they became 'catechumens,' the technical name for committed inquirers. Rooted in the Greek word that gives us the English word 'echo,' it denotes one who hears oral instruction so attentively that it resounds in one's conduct.

What was the attraction for Perpetua and Vibius? Although she does not say, it doubtless had much to do with turmoil in the empire (Geffcken 1978: 1–113). From the years 96 to 180, there had been only five emperors; in the next 103, there were 29, almost all of whom would live and die violently. The army, which had been under civilian control, was now in control of civilian life. Even the civil service had become the preserve of the military, making it a heavy-handed and extortionist bureaucracy. The economy, the source of provincial prosperity, was racked with runaway inflation and escalating taxes. In short, the disintegration of an ancient civilization and the making of a new one seemed at hand (Brown 1978: 1–80).

Many in the empire of Perpetua's day, even those insulated from the disorder around them, sensed an inner disorder. They had grown up expecting easy access to their deities, to see and talk with them regularly, and to experience their protection. As the astronomer, Ptolemy, in the middle of the second century, put it:

> Mortal though I be, yea ephemeral, if but a moment I gaze up to the night's starry domain of heaven. Then no longer on earth I stand; I touch the Creator. And my lively spirit drinks immortality.
>
> (Hingham and Bowra 1938: 643, n.621)

Even for the pious of the empire, like the Vibius family, the divine world seemed to have spun away from the human, leaving a yawning gap. Moreover, the traditional rituals, the purpose of which was to keep the two worlds united, had lost their grip. The result was a moral, intellectual, and spiritual ferment evident from many inscriptions characterized by a longing for the divine. Some people coped with the longing by intensifying dedication to their ancient religious traditions; others embraced mysticism, magic, divination, oracles, or philosophy—or all five. Still others joined the rush hour of the gods from the east. Converts to these 'new religions'—and there were many—sought that lost intimacy with the divine by mounting quests for a new intimacy, accessibility, and assured protection. Robert Turcan's comment about the inhabitants of Rome is applicable across the ancient board, and surely to Carthaginians:

> Where the individual no longer plays an active, direct, and personal part in the running of [Rome], he inevitably loses interest and seeks responsibilities elsewhere, in other sodalities, other 'fraternities.' Religious micro-societies and 'mystery' sects assure him of a kind of reintegration and existence, when traditional frameworks and institutional authorities are in decline, failing in their mission.
>
> (Turcan 1997:17)

In short, the individual seeks to build a worldview or sacred world, that is, a new world of order, meaning, and purpose (Doran 1995: 1–7). As the conversion-criteria above suggest, the life-setting of many in the empire, including Perpetua and Vivius, occasioned a crisis of religious identity that prompted a search for a new way of ordering their sacred world. But how did they find it? Again, she does not say, but clues abound in their religious world. From the beginning, Christianity spread rapidly among largely ordinary people, who were responsive to demonstrations of power. The ancient world equated divinity and power; power was the essence of divinity for Jews and Gentiles, high and low, alike; and works of power authenticated the presence of divinity (MacMullen 1984: 10–42). Oracles, dreams, exorcisms, healings, to name a few, bore the stamp of true divinity, giving assurance of the presence and beneficence of the divine, an assurance essential in one's sacred world.

It is no surprise, then, that such events are highlighted in the New Testament and early Christian literature. The story-line in Luke and Acts is that God's Spirit empowers Jesus, the apostles, and early disciples, and miraculously accomplishes the rapid spread of Christianity in spite of every obstacle. The stimulus for this story-line was almost certainly the reality of charismatic phenomena experienced in the communities of Christ-followers from Pentecost onwards, for which 1 Corinthians 12–14 is our best evidence (Esler 1992). In emphasizing especially oracles, dreams, visions, and miraculous constancy, Perpetua's diary simply continues Luke's story-line. As for Carthaginian Christianity, the data from the first half of the third century indicate that the church there was 'Spirit-filled' (Robeck 1992:1–8), much as was the church at Corinth which Paul depicts in his correspondence with Corinth. For Perpetua, Vibius, and the other catechumens, God was not only near but in the Carthaginian church, a community knit by close personal bonds and attachments—Turcan's true 'sodality.'

Arrested with Perpetua were Felicity and Revocatus, slaves in the Vibius household. Perhaps they were the first members of the household to encounter the church, where they would have found a much gentler world of power than domestic slaves were accustomed to. If so, they may have been Perpetua's and Vibius' contacts, since the message generally went from bottom to top, and face-to-face encounters were close to the only kind of positive meeting points between Pagan and Christian (MacMullen 1984: 21). All four clearly found bonds and attachments which made possible that experience of the divine presence for which they longed. From the beginning of Christianity, extended networks of personal relationships and attachments were the primary means of the movement's spread, and the household was their embodiment.

But chance encounters with this new and different sacred world would not have secured understanding and commitment. Continual interaction was required, for which the training of catechumens (called 'catechumenate'), was designed, as we will shortly see. For Perpetua and the two slaves, hardly had their training begun when it took a sharp turn in an unanticipated direction. The emperor, himself an African (Septimius Severus), promulgated an edict (202) that outlawed conversion to both Judaism and Christianity. As converts-in-process, they were prime targets.

The edict prompted the arrest of a number of catechumens. From the diary we learn the names of at least six: 'Revocatus and his fellow slave Felicitas, Saturninus and Secundulus, and with them Vibia Perpetua' (Passiones sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis 3 [Musurillo 1972: 3/108]). Vibius, for reasons unknown, was not arrested, but one more Christian was added later, Saturus, a leader in the church, who voluntarily joined the five to shore them up. Hardly had Perpetua been arrested when she was baptized and taken to a holding prison, a foul basement. Two deacons from the community managed to bribe the jailers to give their charges respite. What had tried Perpetua more than anything at first was the fact that her infant son, starved of his mother's milk, was failing. The respite permitted her to nurse him, whom she then gave up to the care of her mother and brother.

Hard days followed. One of the catechumens, Secundulus, died in prison, and Perpetua's health broke. When she recovered, she got permission for her baby to stay with her, which, she says, made her cell a 'palace' (Passiones sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis 3 [Musurillo 1972: 3/110]). Even so, there was her father's almost violent anger at what he regarded as her unreasoning contumacy. Her mother seemed more supportive and her catechumen brother, Vibius, was an ally; unfortunately, we hear nothing about her other brother and her husband. Although Vibius visited her frequently, her conversion seems to have torn the family apart. What dominates the account, however, is the familial interaction between the catechumens and the faithful: continual visits, material support, including the two deacons and the bribe, Saturus' voluntary surrender, and the concern for Felicity, who was eight months pregnant when arrested. She had her baby in prison, a girl, whom one of the women in the church brought up as her own daughter.

When Perpetua's harried father heard that the hearing before the governor was set, he came to persuade his daughter to renounce her new faith and friends. To no avail, for she had made her choice and commitment. The hearing soon followed. Arraigned before the governor and a large crowd, Perpetua's companions admitted their Christianity. 'Then,' we read, 'when it came my turn, my father appeared with my son, dragged me from the step and said: "Have pity on your father's grey head; have pity on your infant son. Offer the sacrifice for the welfare of the emperors"' (Passiones sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis 6 [Musurillo 1972: 6/112–14]). She refused, and affirmed to the governor that she was indeed a Christian. All five were sentenced to violent death in a wild-beast hunt at the amphitheatre, and were returned in chains to prison. The day before the hunt, Perpetua and Saturus had striking visions (for her, one of many), which assured them that they would know victory in the morrow's test. Little remains of the amphitheatre at Carthage, but the ruins give us some idea of what it must have been like (Burns and Jensen 2014: figure 14), so also the Colosseum at Thrysdus (modern El Jem, Tunisia) southeast of Carthage (Figure 12.1) and the mosaic of a charioteer from the circus at Carthage now in the Bardo Museum in Tunis (Figure 12.2).

Figure 12.1　The Colosseum at Thysdrus (modern El Jem, Tunisia), south east of Carthage. Photo T. M. Finn

Figure 12.2 Mosaic of a charioteer from the circus at Carthage. Photo T. M. Finn

An eyewitness, the Christian to whom Perpetua confided her diary, recounts the deaths of the five. Further, it appears that more than one of the spectators, even one of the soldiers (Prudens), who participated in the execution of Saturus, were moved to become converts. Paradoxically, persecution, designed to stamp out Christianity, was an instrument of spread. Tertullian (160–240), Perpetua's contemporary and the most influential Latin thinker and writer before Augustine, wrote the governor, Scapula, several years (212) after Perpetua's death:

> Yet this community will be undying, for be assured that just at the time of its seeming demise it is built up all the stronger. For all who witness the noble patience of its martyrs, are struck with misgivings and inflamed with the desire to examine into the matter in question; and as soon as they come to know the truth, they straightway enroll themselves as its disciples.
>
> (To Scapula 5 [Arbesmann 1962: 5/161])

Catechumenate in Carthage

The normal conversion process for Perpetua and her steadfast companions was cut short; thus, the diary does not speak of the catechumenate. But her brother's was not. For a sketch of what it was like, however, we can turn to Tertullian, who published the earliest treatise on baptism about 200 (Tertullian, De baptismo 1–20 [Evans 1964: 5–43]), and to an invaluable contemporary document from Rome, called the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (2–21 [Botte 1963: 1–103; Cumming 1976: 8–31]). Since Roman and North African practices were similar, Hippolytus permits us to fill in the blanks (also, Burns and Jensen 2014: 165–85).

If Felicity and Revocatus had been the initial contacts who interested Perpetua and Vibius in the church, at some point they would have brought them to the church building and the teachers early in the morning before the faithful arrived. They would have been asked a battery of questions about personal status (slave? free? married? etc.), and, for Vibius, also occupational questions to determine whether he was engaged in any forbidden or immoral activities. Were he, he would have either promised to desist or be rejected out of hand. As sponsors, Felicity and Revocatus had to go surety for the truth of their answers.

Clearly Perpetua and Vibius passed muster, successfully completing the rite of enrollment. From that point on they were 'hearers,' that is, catechumens under instruction, which appears to have been a blend of biblical readings and commentary, creedal (doctrinal), liturgical, moral instruction, interlaced with rites of worship, especially exorcism. Although belief and its content were vital, reformation of life was the litmus test conversion and that could be assured only with continual ritual interaction. With the other catechumens, they would have attended frequent, perhaps daily, instruction and prayer early in the morning together with the faithful. At dismissal, the teacher (perhaps, it was Tertullian himself) placed his hand over them, prayed, and sent them on their way. As hearers, Perpetua and Vibius were subject to frequent exorcism, a powerful and effective event and the sign of their marginal condition of betwixt and between being Christians. They would remain hearers normally for several years, but the time could be shortened if character and conduct showed the evidence of conversion at work. For Perpetua and her companions the evidence was unmistakable. For Vibius and the rest of the catechumens it continued to term.

At the end of their probation and instruction, there was another interrogation. The first, enrollment, began what turned out to be an intense screening, as well as formative, process. The second, later called 'scrutiny,' ended it. This time conduct rather than status was the issue. Had Vibius lived honestly? Honored widows? Visited the sick and the imprisoned? Done every good work? In short, had his values, way of life, and conduct demonstrably changed? Again, his sponsor—since Perpetua and companions were dead, perhaps the woman who was bringing up Felicity's daughter—would have to go surety for his answers.

Granted that he passed scrutiny, he was now one chosen for baptism and set apart from the other catechumens. Whereas he had been a hearer (auditor), now he was a chosen one (electus). The curriculum of instruction changed. He could now 'hear the Gospel' (Hippolytus, Apostolic Constitution 20 [Botte 1963: 42; Cumming 1976: 26]), and at the end of instruction he was exorcised. As the day of baptism approached (a Sunday, normally Easter), the bishop performed a solemn exorcism to determine whether he was 'free of every alien spirit' (Hippolytus, Apostolic Constitution 20 [Botte 1963: 42; Cumming 1976: 26]). Anyone who, in his judgment, had not heard the instructions 'with faith, for it is impossible that the Alien [Satan] should hide himself forever' (Cumming 1976: 26) was set aside. The scrutiny was to determine the extent to which Vibius' spirit had really changed.

After several weeks, on a Thursday (before Easter) Vibius and his fellow electi were instructed to bathe, and on Friday and Saturday to fast (presumably from both food and water). On Saturday night they assembled for a final solemn exorcism by the bishop. They then spent the entire night in vigil hearing the scriptures and commentaries (called 'homilies') on the readings.

At cockcrow on Sunday (Easter), solemn baptism began. Vibius formally renounced Satan and all he stood for, and the bishop anointed him with the oil of exorcism. A deacon descended with Vibius into the water as he professed an early version of the Apostles' Creed. The deacon then imposed his hand on his head, and asked him three questions, the first about his belief in God the Father, the second about the Son, and the third about the Holy Spirit. To each question Vibius answered, 'I believe'; after each answer he was immersed in the water, then anointed with the perfumed 'oil of thanksgiving.' When he had dried, he put on a white garment, and, when all the newly baptized were assembled, the bishop imposed his hand over them and offered a prayer that spelled out the meaning of baptism:

> Lord God, you who have made them worthy to receive remission of sins through the bath of regeneration by the holy Spirit, send into them your grace that they may serve you according to your will; for to you is glory, to the Father and the Son with the holy Spirit, both now and to the ages of ages. Amen.
>
> (Hippolytus, Apostolic Constitution 21 [Botte 1963: 52; Cumming 1976: 20])

The bishop then imposed his hand on the head of each, pouring oil on their heads, anointing with the sign of the cross on their foreheads, and offering each a kiss of peace and welcome.

But the rite of initiation (as it came to be called) was not over. They processed to the assembly room with a table for their first celebration of the eucharist, which included bread and three cups: one of water to symbolize the interior cleansing accomplished by baptism, one of milk and honey to symbolize their entry into the Promised Land, and a cup of wine to symbolize the blood of Christ who redeemed them. Finally, they were the cynosure of special celebrations during the week following, which centered around the eucharist and homilies that underscored the meaning of baptism and their experience of the catechumenate.

In retrospect, Vibius gradually turned from the sacred world of his Roman upbringing (he would bring much of it with him) and was initiated into the new sacred world of Christianity. The heart of the process, the catechumenate, was the long oral course of biblical, creedal, and moral instruction embedded in communal rites of worship, especially prayer and exorcism. Finally, he was ritually born into a new family, renouncing an old network of kinship relations and acquiring a new one. His rebirth climaxed three weeks of increasingly complex, dramatic, and demanding rites.

Such was the early Christian catechumenate. The ancients found such 'mysteries' immensely attractive. The data from the mystery religions reveal that such ritual processes excited and aroused the senses of those left cold by the more formalistic worship of the Roman gods (Finn 1997: 68–89). The sound and rhythms, color and visual contrasts, sanctuaries, gestures, ritual enactments, evocation of death and resurrection, deprivations, and personal attention all conspired to open a new sacred world and give body and soul to deep-buried aspirations.

Vibius and the other electi, however, were not only drawn to the Christian mystery, they were refashioned by it. Their interaction with the Carthaginian church had a clear pattern in which instruction and ritual were inextricably bound together. The process was cognitive—a new cultural, social, and religious world was built. At the same time it was performative—the new world was embraced and entered (Turner 1986). Conversion was enacted in a deeply symbolic drama, one that resists reduction to its psychological, social, or religious components. For the ancients, at least, it was a drama in which the divine and human intersected, resulting in transformation.

Why did some choose Christianity, when other eastern religions beckoned? They do not say, but the question is not beyond answering. Intelligent and articulate Pagans and Christians faced off with each other in the early centuries. Pagans accused Christians of plagiarizing doctrines and rites from them, and Christians, who considered the Pagan deities demons, replied in kind. The result? An apologetical standoff.

But the entire encounter between Paganism and Christianity was not a standoff. Paganism was pluralist, disparate, and often plagued with contradictions. During the third century, these emigrating religions from the east, or, rather, their deities, individually tended to acquire supremacy. The Egyptian Isis, for instance, gradually came to embody deity itself; she was the 'Queen of Heaven' and the 'Lady of the Waves.' This movement toward one supreme deity among the many, called 'henotheism,' was but a symptom of the problem in Paganism: the profusion of deities led to confusion in people's minds and insecurity in their hearts. They met the longing for the divine and the demand for supernatural assurance, to be sure, but as one Pagan philosopher, Plutarch, put it: 'Their good fame flourished only a short time, and then, convicted of false glory and imposture . . . like smoke arising, they flew off' (Plutarch, Moralia 364E [MacMullen 1981: 96]). The record shows that in their search for what they considered 'true divinity,' the ancients expected a deity which authenticated itself by 'wide and long-lasting impact' on one's life (Turcan 1997: 333–4). For Vibius, and catechumens generally, the encounter with Christianity effected that deep and long-lasting impact. Martyrdom, like Perpetua's, was the ultimate test of the impact, but there were other tests which arrested the attention of even the most pious Pagans. The court physician and philosopher, Galen (d. 200), observed:

> For their contempt for death . . . is patent to us every day, and likewise their restraint in cohabitation . . . and they also number individuals who, in self-discipline and self-control in matters of food and drink, and in their keen pursuit of justice, have attained a pitch not inferior to that of genuine philosophers.
>
> (Galen, Plato Arabus 1.99 [Ferguson 1993: 564])[4]

But behind these demonstrable changes stood the conviction expressed in the Christian 'rule of faith' that an almighty God is in Christ reconciling the world to himself, forgiving sins, and offering them risen and eternal life (see 2 Cor. 5:19). The pre-Constantinian catechumenate proved to be a profoundly effective means of conversion and, as such, a principal organ of the mission and expansion of Christianity.

Conversion in Jerusalem

As the population statistics above suggest, the fourth century changed everything. Baptism in blood disappeared and the church moved out of the catacombs into the Forum, a move that came from three emperors: Galerius (305–312) and Constantine (285–337), who enacted the edicts of toleration (311 and 313), and Theodosius I (379–396), who established Christianity as the religion of the empire.

Predictably, the move had enormous consequences. From a cult to be shunned, the church became an institution to be embraced. Whereas social and legal jeopardy had forced the church to guard its gates sedulously for 300 years, social and legal toleration threatened to open the gates to a flood of people who, for a hundred different reasons, wanted to enter. The problem was how to keep the floodgates in place and prevent the flood from washing away the tenacious faith of the early centuries. The solution turned on the catechumenate, which prompts a trip from Carthage to Jerusalem, where the solution first comes to light (Finn 1997: 188–211).

With toleration, Christian eyes and feet turned to the holiest of holy places, Jerusalem. Constantine and his mother, Helena, were among the first pilgrims, she to find there the cross of Christ and he to build two striking basilicas at the sites of Christ's death and resurrection: the Martyrium to commemorate his death, and the Anastasis to commemorate his resurrection. In between the two churches he built a garden court, where a cross stood to mark the place of Christ's death. Israel's Holy City, which had become a Pagan city 200 years earlier (132 CE), was transformed into the city of the death and resurrection of Jesus. People streamed to Jerusalem precisely to be there where Jesus had lived, taught, died, and risen, and whose power and presence remained. That longing for the divine, coupled with the ancient association of divinity and space, simply intensified with the coming of Constantine.

How many people there were in fourth-century Jerusalem is unknown, but the projections charted at the outset indicate that by mid-century the majority (56 percent) were Christians. But even if we do not know numbers, we know about the structure of the church in Jerusalem. Chief was the bishop, Cyril (315–387). Gathered around him as his councilors were the presbyters. They preached and taught, read the scriptures, led much of the worship, registered catechumens, exorcised, and ministered in the surrounding villages. In addition, there were exorcists and deacons. And among the faithful, three ranks existed: numerous ascetics (monks and nuns), the baptized, and the catechumens. It was a Greek-speaking community, though Palestinian Aramaic and some Latin could be heard on the streets and in church. Catechumens were numerous and of two kinds: those who had been enrolled and those who had been accepted for baptism (the auditors and the electi, respectively, in Carthage). Given the favored position of the church, it was an obvious advantage to be a catechumen. As in Carthage, catechumens were considered Christians by aspiration and anticipation, if not by initiation. Almost all were Gentiles and Pagans (for over 200 years Jews had been forbidden entry into the city under pain of death). Some were simply curious hearers; some were courting a potential Christian spouse; some were trying to please someone or win favor; some were Christian children and young adults; some sought social advantage and economic gain; some simply wanted to belong somewhere; but all had personal contact with Christians.

Whatever reason brought them to enrolment, the work of the catechumenate was to change the faithless into the faithful, however long that might take. The advantage of having this first class of catechumens, the hearers, was that it gave people a threshold status in the church without opening the floodgates. They would be hearers until they were ready for baptism. In fact, many delayed for years. Most of those raised in Christian households as catechumens, for instance, were baptized as adults. Even Pagans like Constantine (who considered himself the 'bishop of those outside') was baptized practically on his deathbed, and Augustine of Hippo was a catechumen for thirty-three years (354–387).

Some catechumens, however, actively sought baptism. For those, the Jerusalem church adapted an institution already in place by the year 330: the forty-day fast in preparation for Easter. The 'forty days' quickly became the technical term for the pre-Easter season ('Lent' in English). Cyril seems to have been the one who united the preparation of catechumens chosen for baptism and the 'forty-days' of ascetic preparation for Easter. They coincided admirably, because the function of both was to renew the community; ascetic preparation to replenish the community's fervor, and baptismal preparation to replenish its numbers and vigor. Social scientists have long realized that rituals, especially rites of initiation, are remarkably effective in replenishing the bonds that knit a community together (Turner 1969: 94–130). The kind of devout and closely knit community that attracted and nourished Perpetua, Vibius, and companions continued its sway in fourth-century Jerusalem and elsewhere.

Those who had made the decision for baptism assembled in the Martyrium at the beginning of Lent. Enrollment was like the rite in Carthage, save that Bishop Cyril did the interrogating. If nothing turned up, the candidate was accepted; if the result were otherwise, he or she was rejected, with the demand for amendment of life.

The 'chosen' now embarked on an eight-week odyssey. Fasting was enjoined (a bland meal of gruel and water once a day was customary) and bathing was out. Prayer and instruction coupled with exorcism was the daily fare for the first seven weeks; the daily rite lasted from 6:00 to 9:00 am. Exorcism, which came toward the end of the service, was intense and designed to shatter the ill-disposed: the chosen lay prone with faces veiled, while the exorcists (each of the chosen had one) harassed them to force the evil spirit in the subject to give way to the Holy Spirit. The intent was therapeutic: gradual withdrawal from the power of one's religious culture and past life and habits.

Once exorcised, the chosen, both men and women, sat in a circle around Cyril, surrounded by their sponsors and the faithful. He devoted the first four weeks to biblical reading and commentary (an eyewitness calls the commentary 'catechesis'); in his commentary he emphasized the applicability of the Bible to his hearers' moral lives.

On Monday of the fifth week, Cyril changed the curriculum to the creed, and for the next three weeks explained each of the articles of the Jerusalem creed (the creed of Nicaea). Coached by sponsors, family, and friends, the chosen sought to understand the creed better and commit it to memory.

On Sunday of the eighth week (called 'Great Week' then, and now, 'Holy Week'), the last stage of the odyssey began. Monday through Wednesday were crammed with dramatic liturgy generally at the appropriate biblical site. Excitement intensified with the approach of Thursday evening. The chosen broke their fast at a meal in honor of the Last Supper and bathed, to commemorate Jesus' washing of his disciples' feet.

The crucifixion was the focus on Friday. The rites consisted of the veneration of the cross (Helena's find?), which lay on the altar of the Martyrium, and at three in the afternoon, faithful and candidates assembled before the Constantinian cross in the garden court. Cyril sat before the monument, and the Gospel account of Christ's Passion was read, followed by other New Testament readings interspersed with appropriate psalms.

The moment for which the candidates had long and rigorously prepared began Saturday evening; the vigil for Easter had arrived. Faithful, godparents, friends, family, and candidates assembled in the Martyrium. The vigil consisted of twelve readings from the Bible on carefully chosen themes to illuminate the meaning of baptism; psalms and meditations were interspersed.

With the last psalm, the candidates were led out of the Martyrium, across the garden court, to the baptistery. As in Carthage, the candidates were ritually stripped and anointed. Then, one by one, they faced west, stretched out a hand, and in words of renunciation, broke their ancient pact with Satan. They then faced east, where the baptismal font stood and paradise was believed to lie. A new pact was made, the terms of which were a simplified form of the creed Cyril had taught them. They were then anointed.

Newly anointed and naked, they processed to the baptismal font. Each candidate entered the pool and, as at Carthage, was immersed three times in the font. Cyril made dramatically clear the significance of the immersion:

> What a strange and astonishing situation! We did not really die, we were not really buried, we did not really hang from the cross and rise again. All this he did gratuitously for us [on this very site], so that we might share his sufferings by imitating them, and gain salvation in actuality.
>
> (Cyril, Catecheses Mystagogicae 2.5 [Yarnold 1994: 76–7])

After they came up from the font, the newly baptized were anointed with aromatic oil on the forehead, ears, nostrils, and, finally, on the chest. The imposition of hands immediately followed, signifying the descent of the Holy Spirit.

Baptismal candidates no longer, the newly baptized now could affirm, 'I am a Christian.' Each one put on a white garment, received a candle to signify enlightenment, and processed to the Church of the Resurrection to symbolize their own resurrection. After that, at the Martyrium, they were welcomed into their new family and celebrated their first eucharistic meal. The week following—Easter Week—was marked with special celebrations of their new birth.

Conclusion

Christianity continued to spread from generation to generation and place to place in late antiquity and the early Middle Ages. Its mission remained consistent: to initiate people, Christians and non-Christians alike, into a sacred world centered, as one of the earliest missionaries put it, on 'God in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not counting their trespasses against them, and entrusting the message of reconciliation to us' (2 Cor. 5:19).

Our primary concern, however, has been with the spread of that early Christian sacred world within the world of Greece and Rome and beyond. From 120 Palestinian Jews in the year 30 CE, Christians grew to number over thirty million in 350. Located largely in cities from Britain to India and the Balkans to the Sahara, they came to be the established majority. Conversion was the key. Conversions in antiquity—Christian, Jewish, and Pagan—involved an extended process, comprising cognitive and performative elements inextricably bound together, instruction and ritual. The goal was transformation.

A profound change in the sacred world of Greco-Roman Paganism in the first three centuries of our era occasioned numerous conversions to both Judaism and the new religions from the east, including Christianity. The close bonds between the human and divine worlds of the traditional religions had begun to unravel, leaving many with a longing for a secure and lasting intimacy with the divine. The spinning apart of the human and divine worlds provoked an identity crisis for many, which, in turn, provoked a quest for a new and more secure sacred world. Above all, the religions that attracted the searchers offered what was missing, or at least diminished, in their old way of piety: a redolent sense of divine accessibility and intimacy. Even more important, the searcher perceived that the religion embodied the divine in a community where a wide range of reassuring bonds and personal networks linked them to the divine.

The question for both searcher and community was how to accomplish initiation into the new religion. The answer of the early church was the catechumenate, which involved the three stages which we have considered in Carthage and Jerusalem: (1) rites of separation from the old way of life and piety (enrolment); (2) an in-between stage where one is part neither of the old nor the new way (the long period of instruction); and (3) incorporation into the new (election and baptism in Carthage, and Lent and baptism in Jerusalem). The second stage was critical in the spread of early Christianity. Anthropologist Victor Turner calls it the 'liminal' stage, about which he says:

> The attributes of liminality or liminal personae ('threshold people') > are necessarily ambiguous, since this condition and these persons > elude or slip through the network of classification that normally locates states and positions > in cultural space. Liminal entities are neither here nor there; they are betwixt and between > the positions assigned and arrayed by law, convention and ceremonial.
>
> (Turner 1969: 85)

The catechumens were just such 'threshold people.' Precisely as 'liminals,' they were gradually refashioned for their baptismal transformation. What is remarkable about this liminal stage is that liminality is a fertile source of rituals and symbols, not to mention myths, philosophical systems, and works of art. The abundance of rituals in the catechumenate enabled the catechumens to enact their conversion; it was a process of becoming, the ancient image for which was death and rebirth. In addition, as Turner notes, the rites of the liminal stage refashion the community, burning away the failings of lax devotion and life, and revitalizing the members' own conversions.

We have considered the Carthaginian church as a case study of conversions to Christianity before Constantine. The initial encounter was the result of personal contact and example, as in the case of the Vibius household. Thereafter, as the catechumenate demonstrates (Judaism and the Mysteries had counterparts), the encounter was continual and mutual, extending over several years before conversion was established and full membership given. In the process, the catechumen was prepared for and faced a clear-cut choice between an old way and a new one that demanded commitment, even if (as Perpetua and companions reminded Carthaginian Christians) it cost one's life. The litmus test was the transformation of attitudes and values mirrored in conduct.

Because of the Constantinian settlement, the social world of the fourth century changed remarkably. Although longing for the divine remained, motives that prompted the quest differed widely. The Jerusalem church provides a window on fourth-century conversion. Children raised in Christian households were customarily enrolled as catechumens in infancy; opportunism prompted some adults to seek catechumen status; for others marriage was the motive; and for still others, it was simply expected in a predominantly Christian society. Lest the flood of potential converts wash away the faith and piety of the first three centuries, the Jerusalem church, while retaining aspects of the hearer-stage of the catechumenate, developed the Lenten catechumenate for those chosen for baptism. Centered around the biblical sites of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, the catechumenate in Jerusalem sought to attract and initiate candidates into the Christian sacred world by identifying them with the life, death, and resurrection of Christ through an extended symbolic drama in sacred sites. The effect of that drama on the entire population was palpable. Egeria, who witnessed the drama in about 380, comments in her diary about the people's response. On (Holy) Thursday night, for instance, when the account of Jesus' arrest was read in Gethsemane just outside the east wall of the city, the ululations of the people could be heard throughout the city, and at the center of the city

'all without exception were ready at hand, the old, the young, the rich, the poor, everyone' (Egeria, Itinerarium Aetheriae 36.5 [Pétré 1948: 232; Gingras 1970: 109]). Egeria leaves one with the impression that all of Jerusalem participated in a week-long symbolic Passion Play.

Although there is little question about the overall effectiveness of the catechumenate in the mission and spread of Christianity during the first four centuries, the differences in the Christian situation in the Constantinian and pre-Constantinian worlds are sufficiently striking to make any detailed comparative assessment hazardous. Eventually, the catechumenate would recede, largely in the face of the predominance of infant baptism, the massive barbarian conversions in the early Middle Ages, and a sacred and social world strikingly different from that of the Greco-Roman world.

Notes

1 The earliest serious attempt is that of Harnack 1908b: 1–32; but see also Grant 1977: 1–12, and MacMullen 1984: 102–19, who thinks that there were about five million at 300. As of this writing, the most recent attempt is Hopkins 1998: 192–6, in which his scale, though positing a growth rate of 3.5 percent compounded per year, is similar.
2 But see Hopkins 1998: 198–207.
3 The Jamesian view (James 1902: 189) prevailed for decades, influencing the scholar who wrote the earliest seminal study on conversion in antiquity, Arthur Darby Nock (Nock 1933: 1–16). Nock distinguished between 'adhesion' and 'conversion.' By the former he meant participation in one's traditional religion; by the latter, a deliberate turning from indifference or an earlier form of piety to another—crossing from former religious boundaries to new ones (Nock 1933: 7). He concluded that only prophetic religions (Judaism and Christianity) required conversion, while the other Greco-Roman religions required only adhesion.
4 The passage is preserved only in Arabic, which Waltzer sets out (1979: 15) and discusses (1979: 89ff.).

Bibliography

Arbesmann, R. (1962) Tertullian: Apologetical Works and Minucius Felix, Octavius. The Fathers of the Church, 10. Washington, DC: The Catholic University Press of America.

Aubin, P. (1962) Le problème de la 'conversion': Étude sur un terme commun à l'hellenisme et au de trois premiers siècles. Paris: Beauchesne.

Botte, B. (1963) La Tradition Apostolique de Saint Hippolyte. Münster, Germany: Aschendorffsche Verlagsbuchhandlung.

Brown, P. (1978) The Making of Late Antiquity. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Brown, P. (1996) The Rise of Christendom. Oxford, UK: Blackwell Publishers.

Burns, J. P. and Jensen, R. M. (2014) Christianity in North Africa: The Development of Its Practices and Beliefs. Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: William B. Eerdmans Publishers.

Chadwick, H. (1965) Contra Celsum. Oxford Classical and Philosophical Monographs. London: Oxford University Press.

Crook, Z. (2004) Reconceptualising Conversion: Patronage, Loyalty and Conversion in the Religions of the Ancient Mediterranean. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und did Kunde der älteren Kirche, 130. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Cross, F. L. (1977) St. Cyril of Jerusalem's Lectures on the Christian Sacraments: The Procatechesis and the Five Mystagogical Catecheses. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press (original publication: London: SPCK, 1951).

Cumming, G. (1976) Hippolytus: A Text for Students. Grove Liturgical Study, 8. Cambridge, UK: Grove Books.

Doran, R. (1995) Birth of a Worldview: Early Christianity in Its Jewish and Pagan Context. Boulder, CO; San Francisco, CA; and Oxford, UK: Westview Press.

Esler, P. F. (1992) 'Glossolalia and the admission of Gentiles into the early Christian community,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 22: 136–42.

Esler, P. F. (2015) 'Intergroup conflict and Matthew 23: Towards responsible historical interpretation of a challenging text,' Biblical Theology Bulletin 45: 38–59.

Evans, E. (ed.) (1964) Tertullian's Homily on Baptism. London: SPCK.

Ferguson, E. (1993) Backgrounds of Early Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publishing.

Finn, T. M. (1982) 'Social mobility, imperial civil service, and the spread of Christianity,' Studia Patristica 18: 31–7.

Finn, T. M. (1989) 'Ritual process and the survival of early Christianity: A study of the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus,' The Journal of Ritual Studies 3: 69–89.

Finn, T. M. (1997) From Death to Rebirth: Ritual and Conversion in Antiquity. Mahwah, NJ: The Paulist Press.

Finn, T. M. (2004) Quodvultdeus of Carthage: The Creedal Homilies. Ancient Christian Writers, 60. New York: Newman Press.

Gager, J. G. (1975) Kingdom and Community: The Social World of Early Christianity. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Geffcken, J. (1978) The Last Days of Greco-Roman Paganism. Trans. S. MacCormack. Amsterdam/New York/ Oxford, UK: North–Holland Publishing Company.

Gingras, G. E. (1970) Egeria: Diary of a Pilgrimage. Ancient Christian Writers, 38. New York: The Newman Press.

Grant, R. M. (1977) Early Christianity and Society. San Francisco, CA: Harper and Row Publishers.

Harnack, A. (1908a) The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries. Vol I. 2nd ed. Translated and edited by J. Moffatt. New York: G. P. Putnams Sons.

Harnack, A. (1908b) The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries. Vol II. 2nd ed. Translated and edited by J. Moffatt. New York: G. P. Putnams Sons.

Hingham, T. F. and Bowra, C. F. (trans.) (1938) The Oxford Book of Greek Verse in Translation. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hoffmann, R. J. (1987) Celsus, On the True Doctrine: A Discourse Against the Christians. New York/Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hopkins, M. K. (1965) 'Social mobility in the later empire,' Classical Quarterly n.s. 11: 239–48.

Hopkins, M. K. (1998) 'Christian number and its implications,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 6: 185–226.

James, W. (1902) Varieties of Religious Experience. New York: Longmans Green.

MacMullen, R. (1981) Paganism in the Roman Empire. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

MacMullen, R. (1984) Christianizing the Roman Empire. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Musurillo, H. (1972) The Acts of the Christian Martyrs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Nock, A. D. (1933) Conversion: The Old and New in Religion from Alexander to Augustine of Hippo. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

O'Donnell, J. L. (1992) Augustine, Confessions, II: Commentary on Books 1–7. New York: Oxford University Press.

Oulton, J. E. L. and Lawlor, H. J. (1973) Eusebius: the Ecclesiastical History, vol. 2. Loeb Classical Library. London and Cambridge, MA: William Heinemann Ltd./Harvard University.

Pétré, H. (1948) Éthérie: Journal de Voyage. Sources Chrétiennes. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Rambo, L. (1993) Understanding Religious Conversion. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Rambo, L. R. and Farhadian, C. E. (eds) (2014) Oxford Handbook of Religious Conversion. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press.

Robeck, C. M. (trans.) (1992) Prophecy in Carthage: Perpetua, Tertullian, and Cyprian. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press.

Salisbury, J. E. (1997) Perpetua's Passion: The Death and Memory of a Young Woman. New York/London: Routledge.

Schneemelcher, W. (ed.) (1965) Edgar Henneche: New Testament Apocrypha, vol. 2. Wilson, R. McL., trans. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Stark, R. (1996) The Rise of Christianity: A Sociologist Reconsiders History. Princeton, NJ: The Princeton University Press.

Turcan, R. (1997) The Cults of the Roman Empire. Nevill, A. trans. Oxford, UK: Blackwell Publishers.

Turner, V. (1969) The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure. Chicago, IL: Aldine Pub. Co.

Turner, V. (1986) The Anthropology of Performance. New York: PAJ Publications.

Vander Meer, F. and Mohrmann, C. (eds) (1958) The Atlas of the Early Christian World. Hedlund, M. and Rowley, H. H., trans. London: Thomas Nelson & Sons.

Waltzer, R. (1979) Galen on Christians and Jews. Ann Arbor, MI: University Microfilms (original publication: London: Oxford University Press, 1949).

Weaver, P. R. C. (1972) Familia Caesaris: A Social Study of the Emperor's Freedmen and Slaves. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Yarnold, E. J. (1994) The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation: The Origins of the R. C. I. A. 2nd. ed. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press.

13

THE DEVELOPMENT OF OFFICE IN THE EARLY CHURCH

Mark Edwards

If we follow Weber in his division of authority into three types – charismatic, rational, or legal and traditional – the third has little relevance to ecclesiastical ministry in the early Christian era. Priesthoods were not inherited, and though property was, we can only guess at the influence that was exercised over primitive congregations by the owners of the houses in which they gathered. For Weber, the mark of Catholic Christianity is a bureaucratic priesthood whose authority is of the rational or legal type, and he follows Rudolf Sohm (1892–1923) in the belief that this had quickly supervened on an earlier phase in which the leaders of the new movement had no legal or traditional credentials and therefore owed their following entirely to their own gifts (Weber 1927: 124; cf. Haley 1980). In response, historians of all denominations have denied that the evidence lends itself to such a clear antithesis. The truth appears to be that the restraint of charismatic gifts began with the apostles, that the exercise of them never implied a negation of authority, and that some at least were indulged, or even encouraged, by the emerging magisterium. The most judicious narrative will be one that, in the words of Edouard Schweizer (1961: 230), finds a way 'between Rome and Sohm'.

The issue is too often addressed without noting that there are quite distinct phenomena which might all be termed charismatic on Weber's principles, but which need not coexist in the same religious personality. The most evident sign of holiness is the possession of supernatural abilities, which in the early church included prophecy, glossolalia and the power of healing. It was often the erudite laity, not the clerics, who denied these; Augustine, for example, saw contemporary miracles only when he became a bishop (City of God 18). A second grace conferred by merit rather than position is a virtuous life, especially one enhanced by willing abstinence from food, sleep, sexual intercourse or lucrative employment. Such austerities, often characteristic of the clergy, may also be practised by lay imitators. Charismatic status can be obtained in a third, more questionable manner by conspicuous tribulation, and above all by imprisonment or martyrdom. The Christian hierarchy was at pains to show that such events might give a man the status of a confessor, but would not suffice to invest him with the prerogatives conferred by ordination. Nevertheless, we shall see that it was only in the fourth century – and then in opposition to schismatics, not confessors – that the episcopate could hope to disarm its rivals with the 'institutional' argument that sanctity resided in the office, not the man.

The charismata and the threefold ministry

The letters which are most securely attributed to Paul have nothing to say about the functions of ecclesiastical ministers. We do not know if there was an appointed celebrant for the eucharist in Corinth; we do not know who was charged with reading out the Apostle's letters in the churches of Thessalonika, Corinth, Galatia or Rome. The Epistle to the Philippians (1:1) addresses their episkopoi or overseers, and diakonoi or servitors, and the latter term is also applied to Phoebe in the greetings attached to Romans (16:1); what the duties of these orders were we cannot say. In Acts, the church at Jerusalem is administered by a council of presbuteroi or elders (Acts 21:18), Paul is credited with a valedictory speech to the presbuteroi of Ephesus (Acts 19:17ff.), and he and Barnabas are represented as establishing presbuteroi in the churches that they founded (Acts 14:23). The inception of the later threefold hierarchy is sometimes traced to the Apostolic Decree of Acts 15:23, which was issued in the name of the apostles, presbyters and other brethren. But if we take the apostles to be a permanent class of ministers, we must explain how Paul can claim this title for himself (1 Cor. 9:1) when his only calling is that of an itinerant evangelist. Only in the Pastoral Epistles (often dated to the early second century) do we meet the word episkopos as a companion, not an alternative, to presbuteros. Even then the moral traits required of both are similar, and distinct responsibilities are not prescribed, unless it be that the function of an episkopos is to ordain the presbyters (Tit. 1:5). The main purpose of the author is not to sketch an ecclesiastical taxonomy but to warn his readers that if the man failed to dignify the office, the office would not justify the man (1Tim. 3:1; Tit. 1:5–7).

The thesis that the first Christians inherited the administrative structures of the synagogue (whatever these were) is likely to be true of those communities in which the majority were of Jewish descent (Burtchaell 2004). When, however, we read the word episkopoi (overseers) in Paul's epistle to the Gentile church at Philippi, we must remember that this term was applied not only to the political shepherds of Israel but to the treasurers of many ancient cities. The so-called middle recension of the letters ascribed to Ignatius, a Gentile bishop and martyr of the early second century, gives definitive form to the threefold order of ministry. Although familiar arguments against its authenticity are resuscitated from time to time (e.g. by Barnes 2008), this correspondence cannot be a product of the late second century, as its theology does not sit well with the rule of faith upheld by the episcopate in that era. If not Ignatius himself, then, it is some early disciple who tells the church of Tralles in Asia Minor to acknowledge 'the bishop as a type of the Father, the presbyters as a council of God and a bond of the apostles and the deacons as Jesus Christ' (Trallians 3.1). In the light of later ecclesiology, it is striking that it is the presbyters, not the bishop, who have the sanction of the apostles; more striking still that Ignatius, though he is not a member of the congregation, has the authority to underwrite the primacy of its bishop. Does he possess this in a metropolitan capacity as Bishop of Antioch (as in Von Harnack 1908: 1, 463), or in his personal character as a martyr-in-waiting? The first seems most unlikely at this epoch, so it is reasonable to surmise, with Walter Bauer (1971: 60–94), that the new concept of a monarchical episcopate was not yet so well established as to prevail without a charismatic sponsor. Since Ignatius thinks it necessary to defend the bishop's character from detraction in some localities, there is no divorce between ministerial status and the attributes of the minister. Neither is there any sure sign that the head of the congregation is regarded as a priest. The demand that he or a surrogate should preside at the eucharist (Smyrnaeans 8.1) guarantees the unity of the flock, not the efficacy of the sacrament. It is teaching, not a word of consecration – possibly then the ministry of presbyters, not the bishop – that will make the rite a 'medicine of immortality' to the people, for whom heresy is a 'medicine of death' (Ephesians 20.2; Trallians 6.2).

Denunciation of heretics is loudest in the literature and anecdotes that gathered around the memory of John. In two of the Johannine letters a single presbyter, and in the Apocalypse a single angel, are responsible for the direction of whole churches. Polycarp, the long-lived bishop of Smyrna, was supposedly John's disciple, while in a letter by Bishop Polycrates of Ephesus we read that the evangelist was a 'sacrificing priest who wore the mitre' (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 3.31.3). Around 180, Irenaeus, presbyter or bishop of Lyons, professed to quote from John's own lips by way of Polycarp, as well as citing the latter's curse on Marcion (Adversus Haereses [Against Heresies] 3.3). He thus invokes on his own behalf the principle of succession or diadochē which, as Von Campenhausen (1919: 160) notes, was first employed to validate the teaching of philosophers in pagan schools, and then by Gnostic groups to support their claim to the possession of secret gospels. Purity of doctrine could be verified, according to Irenaeus, by reference to the great centres of Christianity, any one of which could boast a line of presidents reaching back to the apostles. Such pedigrees would not suffice, however, without the consensus of the faithful, and the two converge in an enigmatic passage in which Irenaeus urges the principalitas, or pre-eminence, of Rome (Against Heresies 3.2). He is urging something less than Papal primacy, as Molland (1950) and Abramowski (1977) demonstrate. Neither are catholicity and apostolicity of any weight without good conduct in the minister: that Polycarp and Ignatius suffered martyrdom is a fact of some importance to Irenaeus, who expects that clerical rank will be united with the second and third of the charismatic types defined above.

It is often said that the first, or supernatural, type was repressed when the magisterial church was seized by a 'fear of freedom' (cf. Greer 1989). The Didache (a manual of uncertain date and perhaps of Syrian provenance on which Audet (1958) remains authoritative), a Greek manuscript of which was discovered in 1873, has been adduced as evidence because it contains directions for assessing the truth of prophecy and curtailing the abuse of that vocation. But of course it is where true prophets are most respected that the false ones seek disciples, and the Didache is so far from disparaging the prophets as a class that it declares them to be the high-priests of the congregation (13.3), and grants them the right to celebrate as much of the liturgy as they desire (10.7). A prophet may betray himself by avarice, but to test him while he is speaking is the unforgivable sin (11.7). Both in the Old Testament and in the New there are admonitions against false spirits, and this document adds little to these but the axiomatic principle that a prophet ought to use his gifts for edification rather than for gain. It would be equally tendentious to maintain that the ecstatic movement now called Montanism (see Chapter 43 in this volume) was opposed because the episcopate was bent on expelling prophecy. Montanus, whose apostles received a salary (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 5.18), can hardly have been intending a return to primitive Christian society. Trevett (1996 and in Chapter 43 of this volume) has stressed the role of women in the movement, but if they had set up a female clergy their detractors would have made it a charge against them, as they did against Gnostic groups. In fact, the indictments state that Montanus and his followers gave easy absolution to malefactors, disseminated the cult of a spurious martyr and took money for their labours in defiance of the apostolic teaching (Eusebius, ibid.). Whether any of this is true is not the present question; it is more germane to note that we do not hear that the veneration of martyrs is unlawful, or that prophets cannot absolve.

The heresy of the Montanists (such as it was) consisted in the imposition of fasting, chastity and novel penances on the ordinary Christian. Tertullian, the apologist of the 'new prophecy' in the early third century, argued that the world had reached its last days in which God would pour his spirit on all humanity. Everyone was now called to lead the spiritual or 'pneumatic' life in contrast to the 'psychics', or mere natural men, as he rudely termed the representatives of the catholic church. A similar dichotomy between psychics and pneumatics had already been drawn by Gnostics, who thus agreed in one thing with Tertullian – that there cannot be common ground between Christian rectitude and ordinary standards of proficiency or merit. In his later years, Tertullian was a stranger in the 'psychic' congregations, but, as Rankin (1995) reminds us, he seems never to have renounced his old conviction that the whole church is the keeper of the apostolic faith. He is certainly no free churchman in his writings, for while he believes, with scripture, that every Christian is a priest, he styles the bishop the 'highest priest', and while he appeals to prophetesses, he does not believe that women can be ordained (De baptismo [On Baptism] 17.5, etc.). At times, he shows an extravagant respect for the office, even while he stigmatizes the conduct of the most distinguished prelates. One of his targets, guilty of attempting to forgive the unforgivable, is still the 'Bishop of Bishops' (De pudicitia [On Modesty] 1.6–7); another, Bishop Zephyrinus of Rome, could have healed the schism of the Asiatic churches if he had only endorsed the preaching of Montanus (Adversus Praxean [Against Praxeas] 1). This comment shows, not only that an African could attribute some authority to Rome but that the episcopate in Asia was by no means so united against the 'new prophecy' as ancient and modern writers have supposed.

Popes and councils

Rome itself, it seems, had only lately perceived the value of the monarchical episcopate. Paul and Ignatius do not know of any, and the letter ascribed to Clement, which was written from the city in the late first century, does not tell us either the name or the status of its author. He seems to use the terms presbyter and bishop interchangeably (First Epistle to the Corinthians 44.4–5; cf 42.5), and while he alludes to the priests and Levites of the Jewish Temple (32.2), he does not equate these with the Christian orders. Unlike their Jewish counterparts, Roman leaders were not averse to new revelations, for they treasured that of Hermas, part of which was addressed to Clement (The Shepherd of Hermas, Vision 2.4.3). The Muratorian Fragment, perhaps the earliest canon of the New Testament (pace Hahnemann 1992), acknowledges both this and an Apocalypse of Peter as well as John's. Hegesippus and Irenaeus both had lists of presbyters or bishops dating back to Paul and Peter (see Von Campenhausen 1919: 163–8), but only around 190 do we meet with an exertion of episcopal supremacy, making law for the sake of law. This was the decree of Bishop Victor that the Roman date for Easter should be observed by Asiatics in the capital. Those who withstood him – even Bishop Polycrates of Ephesus – were excommunicated; Irenaues, who kept the Roman calendar, felt obliged to remonstrate with Victor's ruling, since the Asiatic date had been observed by the martyr-bishop Polycarp (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 5.23–5).

Some scholars (e.g. Brent 2011) have denied that there was a monarchical episcopate in Rome before the third century, though none has taken pains to reconcile this view with a letter from Irenaeus to Bishop Victor, which assumes not only that Victor is the sole head of the Roman communion but that Soter and Eleutherius held the same position before him (Against Heresies 5.24). Much is taken for granted in Peter Lampe's argument that the Clement who is addressed as a public amanuensis in The Shepherd of Hermas is the same Clement who was (wrongly) described as a bishop in the later pontifical lists (Lampe 2003: 400–2). Certainly, we should not refer to these second-century prelates as 'Popes', for this title, which means 'father', was bestowed as an honour on occupants of various sees before it became a regular designation for Roman bishops. So far as is known, it was not given to Callistus, who is alleged by some modern scholars to have transformed the synodical government of the Roman church into a despotism. The evidence is drawn from the Refutation of all Heresies, a third-century polemic which accuses him of countenancing heresy and of departing from ancient practice in a number of ways, not least by annulling penalties which the author himself had imposed on members of his congregation. Commonly held to have been the theologian Hippolytus or a disciple, this malcontent has been variously characterized as an antipope, a suffragan and a peripatetic bishop. Allen Brent (1995, 2011) contends that he is speaking for a dispossessed oligarchy which now found itself serving one master for the first time. It can be argued, however, that the conflict is not so much between republican and monarchical forms of government as between constitutional and absolute monarchy; for all its strictures, the Refutation never denies that Callistus is the acknowledged president of the Roman church.

Hippolytus is the putative author of the liturgical handbook known as the Apostolic Tradition. It is the first text to distinguish between those officers whom the church appoints by regular ordination, and others, such as virgins and confessors, who need no ceremony as they owe their standing to the choice of God (Chadwick and Dix 1992: 18–22). This symbiosis of the institutional and the charismatic is reinforced by the precept that a bishop should have led an exemplary life and been elected by the laity before he is consecrated by the clergy of his own rank. Thanks to his own contumacy, however, Hippolytus was regarded in late antiquity as a forerunner of the schism that resulted from the election of Cornelius in the Decian persecution of 251. The party of Novatian, another aspirant, denounced Cornelius' willingness to readmit lapsed Christians and set up Novatian as an antipope. The laity always had a part to play in such disputes, for, while the initiative in clerical appointments lay with bishops, they were obliged to seek the approval of the flock. If we believe the enemies of Novatian, an unpopular schismatic would resort to desperate measures to retain his popular following,

First, he plied three bishops with strong liquor and induced them to participate in a charade of ordination; then, when he found that priests and congregation still refused any rank but that of presbyter, he introduced new and blasphemous formalities into the eucharistic service:

> Clasping the recipient's hands, he did not let go until he had sworn the following (yes, I shall give his very words):
> 'Swear to me on the body and the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ that you will never abandon me and turn to Cornelius'.
>
> (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 6.43.18)

Cornelius, our one source for this anecdote, insinuates that Novatian led a negligible troupe, yet he also claims to have witnessed an assembly at which 'large numbers' of the laity deserted the pretender (Historia Ecclesiastica 6.43.6). It is difficult to say whether either candidate relied on the support of a particular ethnic group or social category.

The African Church, more vigorous and more Latin than the Roman one at this time, sent delegates who ratified the election of Cornelius. In the eyes of its leader Cyprian, who had struggled to maintain his own position against five dissident presbyters in Carthage, the opponents of a duly elected bishop were as bad as any heretic. In contrast to the successors of Cornelius (who no doubt found it prudent to conciliate the schismatics in their own locality), Cyprian denied that Novatian's clergy had the right to administer any of the sacraments. For the first time we find a great churchman arguing that the difference between a true and a spurious ministry can lie simply in their adherence to different principles of succession. He does not, however, hold the view of later times, that if a man has been validly ordained, we take no further account of his merits or his sins. On the contrary, he avers that those who sacrifice to pagan gods have forfeited their title; that the suffrage of the people is a precondition of episcopal tenure; and even the incumbent must be free of sin if his prayers are to be heard (Epistles 42.1, 44.3, 65.2. 67.2, 67.5, cited by Hanson 1985: 142). The Bishop of Carthage saw that enforcement of morality, lay and clerical, required a strong executive, nowhere more so than in the populous churches of North Africa. It was therefore zeal, not jealousy, that led him to put a curb on the bestowal of absolution by confessors, some of whom, with only their incarceration to show as a mark of sanctity, had won an unhealthy following by their readiness to comply with all petitions.

In contrast to Cyprian, Stephen of Rome maintained that if the sacrament were administered in the name of the Holy Trinity, it was valid even when the one who performed it was a schismatic. During the resultant altercation, Stephen of Rome assumed a plenary right of arbitration as the successor of St Peter, and the doctrine of Roman primacy was born. Cyprian's admirers have been apt to regard him as the more conservative of the two disputants, though Allen Brent argues in a recent monograph that Stephen is the one upholding the received, if discordant traditions of the church against an innovative notion of uniformity which is grounded in secular practice (Brent 2010: 296ff.). Certainly, Rome was growing in authority: a few years after Stephen's death, a suit for heresy against Dionysius of Alexandria was referred to his successor (Athanasius, On the Opinion of Dionysius). Even the pagan government found it expedient to promote this innovation, entrusting Rome in 271 with the choice of an incumbent to the debated see of Antioch (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 7.30.19). The occasion was the deposition of Paul of Samosata, who refused to quit his house until imperial force was joined to ecclesiastical reprobation. We should not be too quick, however, to draw the inference that the church itself claimed ownership of the house (Cooper 2011: 338–40).

The analogy between secular and ecclesiastical monarchy was strengthened by the accession of Constantine in 312 as the Christian emperor of the west. In the following year, Miltiades, Bishop of Rome, announced that a council under his presidency had acquitted the Bishop of Carthage of the charges laid against him by his enemies, the 'party of Donatus'. The Donatists appealed against this 'transmarine' conspiracy, and Constantine, at their request, convened the Council of Arles in 314 (translated in Edwards 1997: 185–8). This proved to be a synod of the type that has already become a usual means of settling controversy in the church (Tertullian, On Modesty 10.2; Eusebius, Vita Constantini [Life of Constantine] 1.51). The documents from this and other councils of the period suggest that the principal object was to establish uniformity of discipline in adjacent provinces. The session at Arles set two additional precedents for the ecumenical councils, in that the emperor was present and the Bishop of Rome was not.

Apart from upholding the Roman date for Easter, the prelates at Arles determined that the use of the right form, even by schismatics, was sufficient to constitute a valid baptism. Even the African catholics endorsed this regulation when they saw that members of their own communion who migrated to the Donatists were being rebaptized. Unlike the Novatianists in Italy, the Donatists of Africa raised legions of supporters; some will have been attracted by their claims to stringent purity, others by their resistance to a government that appeared to favour Romans above the native population (see Frend 1952). We have the account of an interested bystander at the riotous election of a future Donatist to the see of Cirta. According to the grammarian Victor, speaking on his oath before a magistrate, the better part of the people had resisted the election of Silvanus on the grounds that he was both a collaborator and a disturber of the peace. The mob, however, demanded him, and a retinue of gladiators and prostitutes escorted him in his triumph. Both these occupations were forbidden by the Council of Arles and many previous rulings, but the citizens could do nothing to restrain them, as they were all shut up in the Great Lodge which the church had set aside for the veneration of its martyrs (Optatus, Against the Donatists, Appendix 1.16; Edwards 1997: 165–6). Faced with this secession of the populace, the catholic polemicists confined the right of teaching and of presiding at the liturgy to bishops. The first of them, Optatus of Milevis (376 or 385) seems to doubt that even presbyters can be spokesmen for the church (De schismate Donatistarum [Against the Donatists] 7.5). His argument that schism is a greater sin than heresy is endorsed in expanded versions of the Didache in Syriac, Greek and Latin, the longest of which is known as the Apostolic Constitutions (Didache 4.3; Constitutions 6.1; Didascalia 23). Here the threefold ministry is equated with the sacerdotal system of the Old Testament:

> For these [bishops] are your high-priests, as the presbyters are your priests and your present deacons instead of your levites; so also are your readers, your scribes, your porters, your deaconesses, your widows, your virgins, your orphans; but he who is above all these is your High Priest.
>
> (Apostolic Constitutions 2.25, tr. Donaldson 1870: 58)

This is not pure formalism: the writer must have been aware that orphans or not ordained, that vows alone cannot make a virgin and that the altar of Christ is older than his church. Nevertheless, the currency of such writings shows that Christians of the fourth century had redefined the apostolate as a priesthood, not only to emancipate the clergy from the laity but also to justify an alliance with the secular authorities that was frequently invoked against both heresy and schism. Too many modern readers see here nothing but the 'rhetoric of power', yet it was the catholics who urged that the church must be an ark for everyone, even sinners. For Augustine, the catholic champion, power and love were indissoluble in the church because they were both inseparable from divine omnipotence; anyone who takes him for a mere formalist should meditate on his saying that we can have a church without bishops, but not a church without Christ (Contra Cresconium [Against Cresconius] 2.13).

We have seen that Alexandria and Carthage were prepared to submit intractable disputes to a Roman arbiter; it was quite another thing for him to intervene unasked or to pronounce upon a case that others thought themselves more competent to resolve. The other eastern provinces were incensed by Rome's behaviour after the Council of Nicaea, which was convened by Constantine in 325. Its chief aims were to fix a date for Easter, to reconcile the Melitian schismatics of Alexandria to their bishop Alexander and to judge the orthodoxy of an Alexandrian presbyter called Arius, who refused to acknowledge Christ as God in the same sense as the Father. Attaching more importance to the last issue than their sovereign, the participants drew up a creed to exclude the position of Arius, and bishops who could not sign it were deposed. Within a few years, they were reconciled to the emperor, who was ready to waive the Nicene definition. This compromise was rejected by Alexander of Alexandria and his successor Athanasius, who seems also to have exacerbated the quarrel with the Melitians (Williams 1986). His methods were tyrannical (see discussion in Chapter 53 of this volume), and after repeated trials on a series of grave indictments, he was banished by Constantius, the heir of Constantine, in 339. The easterners took advantage of his absence to devise new creedal statements which admitted a greater latitude of opinion than the synod of 325.

Were they Arians? Not so, they retorted: 'We are not followers of Arius, for how could we, being bishops, follow a presbyter?' (Jonkers 1954: 57). Were they an ecumenical assembly? They were acting without the westerners, but after all the Bishop of Rome had elected not to be present at Nicaea except through his silent representatives. Rome at this stage seems to have espoused no creed but the one that she professed to have received from the apostles; persuaded by Athanasius that the easterners were now heretics, she became his protector for the next two decades, in contempt of the ancient custom which forbade the interference of one province in affairs already decided by another. An attempt to bring the east and the west together at Serdica in 343 resulted only in the creation of two antagonistic councils (Hess 1958). The dominant voice in the west was that of Hosius of Cordova, yet the principle that he spoke for was the unlimited right of Rome to hear appeals against the decrees of other bishops (Jonkers 1954: 67).

Even when Athanasius returned in triumph to Alexandria, he could not pacify a schism which had erupted in Antioch. When easterners of impeccable orthodoxy favoured a candidate who was not the choice of Rome, the length and intricacy of the subsequent wranglings moved at least one pious layman to throw himself on the unconditional verdict of the Apostolic see:

> I know nothing of Vitalis, I repudiate Melitius, Paulinus is a stranger to me. Anyone who does not gather with you scatters; that is to say, whoever is not of Christ is of Antichrist.
>
> (Jerome, Epistle 15.2)

Jerome, as the proponent of a new asceticism, was no natural friend to priests, and his letters abound in satire on the lazy and vicious clergy of the capital. Neither is it probable that he had discovered higher qualities in Damasus, whose pontificate commenced with a fatal riot and was overshadowed by a number of 'charismatic' figures, Jerome himself not least among them. His testimony reminds us that the call for a Papal monarchy is as likely to proceed from the zealous laity, who aspire to nothing but unity of fellowship, as from the embattled clergy, who have privileges to lose. Naturally, a different form of monarchy was envisaged by the emperor Theodosius I, who in 381 convened a second ecumenical council at Constantinople. The occasion was disastrous, as the first president, Meletius of Antioch, died in office, and when Gregory of Nazianzus, Bishop of Constantinople, took the chair, he was rapidly deposed on a technicality, then avenged himself in exile by inveighing against the futility of councils. Rome agreed, maintaining that the Council had installed the wrong candidate in the see of Antioch. Moreover, as Greenslade (1953: 82) points out, it had insinuated that the heir of Peter owed his primacy to the metropolitan status of his city when it accorded second place to Constantinople as 'New Rome'.

Rome held her ground by annexing the decrees of Sardica to the Nicene canons. Pope Zosimus appealed to them in 418 as proof of his right to scrutinize the verdict of the African episcopate in the case of the dissolute presbyter Apiarius (Merdinger 1997: 111–35). His error was soon exposed by consultation of eastern archives, but no such unanimity between the two halves of Christendom prevailed with regard to the teaching of the British monk Pelagius, who maintained that everyone is as free as Adam to accept or reject the saving grace of God. Zosimus acquitted him of heresy in 417, swayed perhaps by aristocrats in Italy who espoused his high moral standards, and by the Bishop of Jerusalem who pronounced his doctrine sound in 415. The African clergy, guided by Augustine, quickly brought him to his senses: what, they asked, becomes of infant baptism if we have no doctrine of original sin? No doubt it was the baptismal controversy with the Donatists that commended such an argument to the catholics of Africa, though the precedent had been set by Athanasius when he pointed out that Arians have no right to join in the church's prayers to Christ. In Africa (and indeed in Athanasius), the appeal to common piety is accompanied by the typical indifference of the western church to outsiders, secular or ecclesiastical; it was all to the advantage of the Papacy that the ecumenical spirit was as moribund in Carthage as in Rome.

In general, the prelates of this era carried their people with them. The right of election was jealously cherished by the Roman populace, and fatal riots ensued when support was divided between Ursacius and Damasus in 366 (Ammianus Marcellinus, Histories 27.3.11–120). There is evidence that lay suffrage remained the norm elsewhere (Norton 2007), and we read that Cyprian, Ambrose and Augustine were all thrust into office by popular acclamation. After his elevation, the Roman bishop was an autocrat to an army of subalterns and secretaries; at the same time, according to one modern scholar (Sessa 2012), he imitated the arts of mediation that were typically practised by the father of a Roman household. The patriarch was equally secure in Alexandria, where the laity was accustomed to ratify the incumbent's choice of his own lieutenant (who might also be his nephew); by contrast, the advantages of a democratic election were denied to the Bishop of Constantinople, who was always an imperial nominee. A decade after Zosimus, Pope Celestine of Rome became a willing referee in a duel between eastern primates. Alexandria could not but resent the honours that had been conferred upon the new city of Constantinople, and the ancient see sustained a further affront in 428 when its Bishop Cyril learned that a group of monks whom he had disciplined had taken refuge in Constantinople under its patriarch Nestorius. This infringement of the Nicene canons added flame to the theological dispute that had been kindled when Nestorius preached a sermon against the use of the term Theotokos, or 'Mother of God', for Mary. Both combatants wrote to Celestine, who might have been less hostile to Nestorius if the latter had not extended the asylum of his city to Pelagian refugees. The ensuing controversy cannot be said to have run its course before the Fifth Ecumenical Council of 553.

Monks and priests

As is evident from the last few paragraphs, the clergy of the fourth century had to reckon with the powerful ferment of asceticism that had spread to every level of the church. Not that asceticism was a new thing, in Christianity or in the history of religions. Christ sent out his messengers with neither staff nor wallet (and in the second century the scholar Tatian, author of the first harmony of the gospels, formed a community of 'encratites' in Syria, whose object was to liberate the spirit from the flesh by sexual continence and fasting). Invidious comparisons with the Cynics were suggested by contemporaries as well as by Gerd Theissen (1978) and a host of modern followers; we must not forget, however, that Cynics were free itinerants without a creed or social organization, while the encratites, like all Christians, were avowedly the people of a book. Some diffidence with regard to created goods is visible even in the church of Irenaeus, where vegetarianism was practised (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 5.1.26); a century later, Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, tendentiously proposed that the contemplative and celibate Therapeutae described by Philo were the first Christian ascetics (Historia Ecclesiastica 2.17.2). He also held up Origen, the most copious theologian of the third century, as a paragon of Christian self-denial (Historia Ecclesiastica 6.19); though Origen's writings do not wholly corroborate this account, they do undoubtedly recommend the atrophy of the senses and the gradual deliverance of the soul from its gross integument through moral rigour, intellectual discipline and continuous meditation on the scriptures. Origen does not reject the clergy, but he implies that it is possible to be a saint without them; and, notwithstanding the questionable validity of his own orders, he was bold enough to rebuke unfaithful clerics. His posterity after Constantine included both the layman Jerome and the monk Pelagius. The former, as a spiritual gymnast to the rich women of the capital, wrote fierce tracts against opponents of virginity and fasting; followers of the latter went so far as to imply that only the celibate can possess the kingdom of God (Rees 1991: 71–87).

This cultivation of private spirituality annoyed the ministers more than it compromised the ministry. To accuse a priest or bishop of venality is not to say that we need no priests or bishops, and similar reproaches can be found in the works of great ecclesiastics of the fourth century. Origen is said to have been condemned by synods in Rome and Alexandria, but not to have revenged himself by schism; Pelagius was a heretic, but not an antipope. Neither was there any danger to the balance of society, for the movement shed its lustre only on members of the wealthy and leisured classes. Self-denial would be a ruinous luxury for those who are born to labour and who otherwise cannot command so much as the mere necessities of life. The patrons of these Christian ascetics differed only in religion from the philosophic pagans who were turning private houses into schools of mortification. To another group of Christians, however, even such high-minded worldliness appeared to be inconsistent with the gospel. Around the year 290, a certain Antony, an Egyptian of good family but little education, sold his goods to feed the poor as the Word commanded, and embraced a life of solitary prayer and meditation in the desert (see Chapter 51 of this volume). His visitors were numerous, a few remained, and very soon 'they had made the desert a city' (Athanasius, Life of Antony 14). Its denizens – chiefly men, but also women, at least in legend – received the name of monachoi, meaning 'those who live alone'.

They came to pray, to chastise the flesh and to wrestle with the daemons. At the same time, in a world where the poor were serfs and the rich were prisoners to their civic obligations, the hermit had won a right to the free disposal of his person that was granted to few inhabitants of the empire. Even a little power beguiles the powerless, and as the imperial tyranny eclipsed all lesser sources of authority, the populace would sometimes turn away from the village headman, the native magistrate and even the local priests to beg a judgement or a miracle from these athletes of the spirit. Brown (1971) and Lane Fox (1997) draw formidable pictures of the most conspicuous type, the Syrian Stylites, who built pillars and lived on top of them to endure the flagellation of the elements. In posthumously written lives we find them stilling heresy, receiving the tributes of ecclesiastics and establishing their own line of succession. For all that, it is not safe to conclude that holy men had supplanted priests in the estimation of the public. Biography was a literary form with its own conventions, and, just as Greek philosophers seldom boasted of the influence that their pupils constantly attributed to them, so the monks and Stylites may have cut a humbler figure in the world than in hagiography. Of course, Susanna Elm (1994: 363–5) is right to extend the same scepticism to the Life of Antony, ascribed to Athanasius, in which the monks appear on the side of the episcopate. Antony displays a remarkable knowledge of the errors that have infected Egypt during his seclusion and descends to Alexandria to denounce the Arian party at the height of its success.

If this visit took place at all, it may have been at the invitation of urban monks who supported Athanasius. It is certainly not hard to prove that bishops of strong character had assumed the task of regulating the conduct and opinions of the monks in their vicinity. In 329, the first year of his tenure, Athanasius had visited one of the monasteries of Pachomius, new foundations in which monks, both male and female, were brought together to read the scriptures and engage in manual labour under the supervision of a single abbot. These monasteries were the watchtower of Egyptian orthodoxy throughout the life of Athanasius, and through the Lausiac History of Palladius became the pattern for many other 'cenobitic' or communal institutions. Bishops such as Basil of Caesarea in Cappadocia extolled the cenobitic life as more conducive to fraternal love and fruitful labour, though his own experience proved that even fellowship was no guarantee of purity in doctrine (see further, Rousseau 1994: 190–232). Some, known to their judges as Messalians, were said to despise the sacraments, the body and even the God who had created them; the Eustathians, it was feared, had lent an ear to female cries for ordination and equality with men. In 343 the Council of Gangra drew up an inventory of their misdemeanours:

> If any woman professing an ascetic regimen changes her attire and assumes that of a man in place of the customary female covering . . . if any woman abandons her husband and chooses the life of an anchorite, spurning marriage . . . if any woman professing an ascetic regimen cuts off her hair which God vouchsafed to her as a reminder of her subordination, as though to flout the command of subordination, let her be anathema.
>
> (canons 13, 14 and 17 at Jonkers 1954: 83–4)

The virgin being a paradigm of Christian submission, it was only to be expected that the most vehement demands upon the obedience of the laity should occur in patriarchal admonitions to this long-established order of the church (Brakke 1995: 57–89). It is fair to remark that curbs were applied to male ascetics also, and that if the admonitions of the clergy had not been welcomed by a majority, they would not have been obeyed. The church as a whole believed that it was following Pauline precept, and if this was interpreted according to the 'classic Weberian model' of coercion, that was not because of a natural or generic opposition between ascetic and institutional Christianity. First of all, many clergy were ascetics and many ascetics favoured institutions. Second, the clergy were so divided in the fourth century that a conflict between a monk and a bishop seldom failed to widen into a controversy between two rival prelates. Third, it was frequently the monks who sought the intervention of the rival bishop, thus confessing that they had no power to withstand the local bishop by themselves. We must beware of quoting private feuds as palmary instances of more wide-spread phenomena. Thus we hear that Arsenius, an abbot who lived not far from Alexandria, detested Bishop Theophilus; but after his own generation, it seems that everyone detested Bishop Theophilus, and the fact that he was at loggerheads even with the good Arsenius is simply one more proof of his ill dessert. His persecution of the monks of Nitria is perhaps the most infamous episode of his life, but here again we are told that it arose from personal rancour, not from zeal for his episcopate; only when the Nitrians appealed to John Chrysostom in Constantinople did it become an affair of precedence, and by then the monks were almost out of view. Readers of Elizabeth Clark's fine study (1992: 43–84, etc.) will perceive that this was more an affair of monks against monks than of monks against the episcopate: Theophilus made his friends among the so-called Anthropomorphites and his foes among their theological adversaries, the Origenists of Nitria. Athanasius, Cyril and Dioscorus are the other famous occupants of the Alexandrian see between 350 and 450, and none of them found it difficult to rally the monks of Egypt on demand.

Did the ascetic life provide a haven for the charismatic figures whom the rise of the episcopate had driven from the church? Certainly, the desert saints worked miracles and saw visions that were not vouchsafed to clerics. Nevertheless, it was for the willing laity, not for protesting supermen, that Basil and Augustine framed their rules and Epiphanius wrote his handbook of orthodoxy, the Ancoratus, in 373 CE. Neither was it impossible for a monk to become a bishop, like Theodoret of Cyrrhus, or for bishops to emulate the feats of monks. The Life of Epiphanius is a catalogue of miracles, notwithstanding his long tenure of the episcopate of Salamis in Cyprus (cf. Rapp 2005: 258–60). It reminds us that the bishops of this era yielded to none in their ability to draw a crowd, to generate hagiography and to overawe the mighty; if that is what it means to be charismatic, then it is not the monks but Ambrose, Basil, Chrysostom, Epiphanius and Augustine who are the charismatic spokesmen of their age.

Bibliography

Abramowski, L. (1977) 'Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 3.2', Journal of Theological Studies 28: 101–4.
Audet, J. P. (1958) Le Didache. Instruction des Apôtres. Paris: Gabalda.
Barnes, T. D. (2008) 'The date of Ignatius', Expository Times 120: 119–30.
Bauer, W. (1971) Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.
Brakke, D. (1995) Athanasius and the Politics of Asceticism. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
Brent, A. (1995) Hippolytus and the Church of Rome in the Third Century. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Brent, A. (2010) Cyprian and Roman Carthage. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Brent, A. (2011) 'The Elenchos and the identification of Christian communities in second-early third century Rome', in Aragione, G. and Norelli, E. (eds) Des éveques, des écoles et des hérétiques. Geneva: Zèbre, 275–314.

Brown, P. (1971) 'The rise and function of the holy man in late antiquity', Journal of Roman Studies 61: 80–101.

Burtchaell, J. T. (2004) From Synagogue to Church: Public Services and Offices in the Earliest Christian Communities. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Chadwick, H. and Dix, G. (1992) The Treatise on the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus of Rome. London: Albany Press.

Clark, E. (1992) The Origenist Controversy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Connolly, R. H. (1929) Didascalia Apostolorum. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Cooper, K. (2011) 'Christianity, private power and the law from Decius to Constantine: The minimalist view', Journal of Early Christian Studies 19: 327–43.

Donaldson, J. (1870) The Apostolic Constitutions. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Draper, J. (1998) 'Weber, Theissen and the wandering ascetic in the Didache', Journal of Early Christian Studies 6: 541–76.

Edwards, M. (1997) Optatus, Against the Donatists. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Elm, S. (1994) Virgins of God. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1952) The Donatist Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Greenslade, S. H. (1953) Schism in the Early Church. London: SPCK.

Greer, R. (1989) The Fear of Freedom: A Study of Miracles in the Roman Imperial Church. Pennsylvania, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press.

Haley, P. (1980) 'Rudolf Sohm on charisma', Journal of Religion 80: 185–97.

Hahnemann, G. (1992) The Muratorian Fragment and the Development of the Canon. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hanson, R. (1985) 'Office and the concept of office in the early church', in his Studies in Christian Antiquity. Edinburgh: T& T Clark, 117–43.

Hess, H. (1958) The Canons of the Council of Sardica. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Jonkers, E. D. (1954) Acta et Symbola Conciliorum quae Saeculo Quarto habita sunt. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill.

Lampe, P. (2003) From Paul to Valentinus: Christian at Rome in the First Two Centuries. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Lane Fox, R. (1997) 'The life of Daniel', in Edwards, M. and Swain, S. (eds) Portraits. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 175–226.

Merdinger, J. (1997) Rome and the African Church in the Time of Augustine. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Molland, E. (1950) 'Irenaeus of Lugdunum and the apostolic succession', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 1: 12–28.

Norton, P. (2007) Episcopal Elections 250–600: Hierarchy and Popular Will in Late Antiquity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Rankin, D. (1995) Tertullian and the Church. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Rapp, C. (2005) Holy Bishops in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Rees, B. (1991) The Letters of Pelagius and His Followers. Woodbridge, UK: Boydell and Brewer.

Rousseau, P. (1994) Basil of Caesarea. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Schweizer, E. (1961) Church Order in the New Testament. London: SCM Press.

Sessa, K. (2012) The Formation of Papal Authority in Late Antique Italy: Roman Bishops and the Domestic Sphere. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Sohm, R. (1892–1923) Kirchenrecht, 2 vols. Munich/Leipzig, Germany: Duncker and Humblot.

Stewart, C. (1991) Working the Earth of the Heart. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Theissen, G. (1978) The First Followers of Jesus. London: SCM Press.

Trevett, C. (1996) Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Von Campenhausen, H. (1919) Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power. London: SCM Press.

Von Harnack, A. (1908) The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries. London: Williams and Norgate.

Weber, M. (1927) Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Williams, R. (1986) 'Arius and the Melitian schism', Journal of Theological Studies 37: 35–52.

14
CHRISTIAN REGIONAL DIVERSITY

David G. K. Taylor

Introduction

For much of the world's population, regardless of confession, Christianity is self-evidently a European religion. In some accounts, Christ's birth in the Middle East appears almost to be an aberration, for his gospel was promulgated in Greek, 'a European language', and the formulation and development of Christian doctrine and practice was apparently the work of European – Latin or Greek-speaking – theologians. The expansion of Christianity beyond its European heartlands is usually thought to be the consequence of European missionary activity or colonialism, or a combination of the two, and it is often presumed that this occurred in recent centuries. The agents of this expansion, the Orthodox, Catholic and Protestant churches, are all portrayed as Christian denominations of European origins, and Christianity is often considered to be restricted to these groups. Thus in recent years numerous Christians in the Middle East have been accused of being 'crusaders' and have been martyred for their faith, and Christians in India are frequently accused of being the converts of colonialist Europeans.

The truth however, is far more complex and far more interesting. The first monarch to convert to Christianity was not the Roman emperor Constantine (in 312) but the Armenian king Trdat (Tiridates III, converted in 301). Bardaisan of Edessa, a second-century Christian philosopher, albeit of dubious orthodoxy, could contrast the true Christian philosophy practised in Syria with the barbaric customs of the pagan Gauls, Britons and Germans. By the late fourth century, Christianity was flourishing in Syria, Asia Minor, Armenia, Georgia, Iran, Arabia, Egypt and North Africa, Ethiopia, and South India, and by the seventh century, when Christianity was being re-established in Britain (and had not yet reached large areas of northern Europe), the Christians of Iran had already expanded through Central Asia and consecrated their first monastery in the imperial capital of China.

Little of this, however, will be found in the standard handbooks to early Christianity, regardless of denominational origin, for they nearly all take a Eurocentric view of early Christianity that considers churches located at the periphery of the Roman empire to be historically and theologically marginal. Influential theologians from outlying provinces, such as the Africans Origen, Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine, Cyril, and the Coptic-speaking Athanasius, and those from Asia Minor and the Middle East, such as the Cappadocians Basil the Great and the two Gregories, as well as Irenaeus and Eusebius, have all been given European identities, implicitly or explicitly, although many of them grew up according to local customs, speaking local languages and only subsequently acquired their Greek or Latin through education. To these must be added the major theologians and thinkers who wrote in their native tongues and so have simply been ignored: Ephrem, Aphrahat, Jacob of Serug, Narsai, Babai, Shenoute, Yovhannes Mandakouni, Eznik of Kolb, and many more. In recent years, this deplorable situation has slowly begun to improve, and some figures (most notably the Syriac poet and theologian Ephrem – see Chapter 59 of this volume) are more frequently mentioned, but there is still much work to be done before it will be generally thought odd that so much of early Christianity should be passed over in silence or given very restricted attention.

In what follows, I have attempted to provide some account of the geographical expansion of Christianity beyond the regions bordering on the Mediterranean, and then to suggest some ways in which these Christian groups and their practices and beliefs challenge our own understanding of Christianity, both ancient and contemporary.

Christian geographical diversity

The early history of the expansion of Christianity is rarely well documented, and this is certainly the case when one turns to examine its progress at the furthest limits of the Roman empire and beyond. In the New Testament Acts of the Apostles and the Pauline epistles we learn of the missionary journeys of the early disciples throughout the Mediterranean lands, and of their rapid successes in the east. Although the numbers of converts to Christianity were no doubt rather limited at first, it is clear that two major missionary centres were quickly established: Antioch, where the followers of Jesus first received the name 'Christians' (Acts 11.26), in the north of ancient Syria (now Antakya, southern Turkey), and Alexandria in Egypt in the south. It is from these bases that missionaries set out to convert much of the ancient world.

Antioch and the east

Syria

According to tradition, the first bishop of Antioch was Peter who remained there for seven years, 33–40 CE, before moving on to Rome where he was martyred. Peter was succeeded by a series of key theologians and church leaders (e.g. Ignatius, Serapion, John Chrysostom) under whom Christianity, over a period of centuries, slowly but steadily spread from the great metropolis into neighbouring cities, towns and countryside. One of the most influential of these cities, and a major missionary centre in its own right, was Edessa (modern Urfa in SE Turkey). The majority language in Edessa was Syriac (a dialect of Aramaic), the language spoken throughout the rural areas of the Middle East, and by many in the 'hellenistic' cities, and the use of this eastern 'lingua franca' gave Edessene missionaries a distinct advantage.

The origins of Christianity in Edessa itself are less than clear, however. A much discussed legendary account of the first conversions in Edessa, the Doctrina Addai, tells of the Edessene king, Abgar, receiving reports of Christ's persecution in Jerusalem and offering him sanctuary in his palace in Edessa. Christ writes a gracious reply thanking Abgar but declining his offer – since his duty was to remain in Jerusalem and fulfil his Father's will – and promising to send one of his apostles after his death. In due course Addai arrived, preached the gospel, healed the king of an affliction, and converted many to Christ. There is, however, no historical evidence for the conversion of Abgar (a figure around whom other legends collected; see Figure 14.1), and it is now thought that this text in fact dates to the fourth or early fifth century, and that it was composed by Christians in Edessa at that time to disguise the fact that for many centuries the Orthodox Christians had been only a minority (nicknamed the 'Palutians' after an early bishop, Palut) amongst many competing Christian groups, such as the followers of Marcion, Mani and Bardaisan (all later condemned as heretics). This was certainly still the case in the fourth century, as Ephrem attests, but by then the balance was clearly changing in favour of the Orthodox. Factors that contributed to this growth were veneration of three local martyrs (Shmona, Gurya and Habbib) from the late third and early fourth century; the arrival of refugees, including Ephrem, from the city of Nisibis (east of Edessa) in 363 when it was ceded by the Romans to the Iranians; Ephrem's own efforts to win people over to orthodoxy through his charitable activities and his hugely influential and popular hymns; the organisational and political skills of tough bishops such as Rabbula (d. 435); the quality of the preachers and theologians produced by the theological school, and the energy and commitment of the great numbers of local monks and ascetics. For centuries to come, Edessa produced some of the greatest theologians of the eastern Christian world (and so left us an enormously rich body of theological literature) and, because it was a major centre for translation (Cyril of Alexandria, d. 444, sent a copy of his De recte fide there for immediate translation and distribution), it achieved great influence as a city where east and west could meet and exchange ideas. In the fifth and sixth centuries, Edessa became a centre of resistance to the Christology advocated by the Council of Chalcedon (451), and it was one of its sixth-century bishops, Jacob Baradaeus (d. 578), that preserved the Syrian Orthodox church from extinction through Chalcedonian persecution. (Not surprisingly, many Syrian Christians welcomed the seventh-century Arab Muslim invaders as liberators from the rulers of Constantinople.) Missionaries from Edessa were active both in the villages and towns of western Syria, and in the east in the Iranian empire and in Armenia.

Iranian empire

The Acts of the Apostles (2.9) mentions the presence of 'Parthians, Medes, and Elamites' at the miraculous Pentecost in Jerusalem, and from these small beginnings the church in the Iranian empire had grown by 235 CE to include approximately 20 bishops and 18 dioceses. This may have been the result of conversions amongst the Jews of the western province of Adiabene, or a consequence of Christians crossing international borders in order to seek refuge from Roman persecution,

Figure 14.1   A tenth-century icon (St Catherine's Monastery on Mount Sinai) of King Abgar of Edessa holding the mandylion, the image of Christ thought to have been implanted on a cloth when he wiped his face with it; Wikicommons but their numbers were further boosted by the transportation to Iran in 256 and 260 of Roman citizens from Antioch and its surrounding provinces who had been taken captive by Shah Shapur I during his military campaigns. These included many Christian laypeople and clergy (one of whom was the bishop of Antioch, Demetrius) and they contributed to the growing confidence and organisation of the Iranian church. Unfortunately, Constantine's espousal of Christianity in 312 left Iranian Christians open to the charge that they owed greater allegiance to their co-religionist the Roman Caesar rather than to their lawful Shah. This was quickly exploited by the Zoroastrian clergy, and after a series of short-lived persecutions of Christians in the early decades of the fourth century, there was a prolonged persecution from 340–379 under Shah Shapur II. At least 16,000 Christians are thought to have died, and the martyr acts celebrating their faith and courage achieved a wide circulation not only in the east but throughout Europe. In this time of crisis, the Iranian church managed to produce one of the greatest theologians of early Christianity, Aphrahat 'the Persian sage'. An ascetic and bishop he composed 23 homilies which reflect a profound spirituality and a biblically based theology, whose value and significance is slowly coming to be appreciated in the west. Further short periods of persecution were to occur in the fifth and sixth centuries, but the church in Iran steadily grew in size and confidence. In 424, a local synod asserted the autonomy of the Iranian Catholicos and although the title 'Patriarch of the East' was not formally adopted by the Catholicos until 498, it is clear that the Iranian Christians no longer accepted the authority of the Patriarch of Antioch. This split from their western co-religionists was widened after 489 when the Roman authorities closed the great theological school of Edessa because of its pronounced sympathies for the theology of Theodore of Mopsuestia. (Theodore, whose brilliant writings – the basis of much Syrian biblical exegesis – were formally condemned at the Council of Constantinople in 553, was held responsible for the Christology of his far less gifted pupil Nestorius, who had been condemned at the Council of Ephesus in 431.) The former students and staff simply slipped across the border into the Iranian empire and refounded the school in Nisibis. Although their church was not labelled 'Nestorian' by Roman Christians until the seventh century, these events marked a break with the Christian churches of the Roman empire, and whilst theologically driven, it must have had real political advantages. It is worth noting that when Shah Khusrau launched his devastating attack on the Roman empire in 603 he was accompanied by the Patriarch of the East, Sabrisho I, who daily beseeched Christ for an Iranian victory over the Romans.

The Iranian church was one of the most successful missionary churches in history. (It is now usually called the 'Church of the East', and its modern members name themselves Assyrians, or Chaldeans if they belong to the separated church in communion with Rome.) Before their separation from the Syrian Orthodox, they were responsible for planting Christianity in Arabia, and by the fourth century there appear to have been bishoprics in Basra, Kufa, Qatar, and throughout Oman and Yemen. With the rise of Islam, Christianity began to recede in Arabia, but as late as 676 there is known to have been a church synod in the south. Syriac-speaking Christianity reached Kerala in southern India at a very early date. According to traditions preserved in the apocryphal Acts and in local songs, it was first taken there by the Apostle Thomas in 52 CE. In any case, it was firmly established within the next two centuries, and is still flourishing in India today (where at least half of the 27 million Christians have Thomas Christian origins). About 530, the famous traveller Cosmas Indicopleustes (a member of the Iranian church) reports having met bishops in Bombay, Kerala and Ceylon, and other members of his church along the coast of Bangladesh, Thailand and South China. Further north, the Iranian church had major successes amongst the Turks and Huns of Central Asia by the fifth century. Travelling east by the Silk Road and other routes, they reached central China, and, in the early seventh century, they were given permission by the emperor Tai-Tsung to build monasteries and preach throughout his empire. Early Chinese Christian texts incorporated Daoist and Buddhist concepts and imagery, and so provide a remarkable example of early theological inculturation.

Armenia and Georgia

Apostolic origins have also been claimed for Christianity in Armenia – whether Addai who is said to have travelled here from Edessa, or Bartholomew who is a later addition to the tradition – but in any case, Christians were sufficiently numerous in Armenia by c. 200 for their reputation to have reached Tertullian in Africa. The presence of numerous theological words of Syriac origin in Armenian and the early use of Syriac biblical texts in the region strongly suggests that some of the earliest missionaries came from Edessa and Mesopotamia, although Greek-speakers from Asia Minor and Syria were also clearly active. (Syriac influence later declined, although in the early period a variety of patristic texts were translated from Syriac, and the activities of monks such as 'Daniel the Syrian' were celebrated.) The turning point for Christianity in Armenia, however, came with the conversion of King Trdat III, and its declaration (between 301 and 314) as being the official state religion. Trdat was converted by Gregory 'the Illuminator', an Armenian noble who had been converted in Cappadocia, and then (c. 288) returned to preach the gospel. After 13 years in gaol, he healed Trdat from a bout of insanity and was subsequently freed. In 314 he was consecrated Catholicos of the Armenians in the city of Caesarea, Cappadocia, and so began a steady process of 'hellenisation' of Armenian Christianity. The division of Armenia in 387 into a large region within the Iranian empire and a far smaller area within the Roman empire led to de facto independence for the Armenian church. Soon after, c. 400, a former state official turned ascetic named Mashtots created a new alphabet allowing the Armenian language to be written down for the first time. He travelled in the eastern provinces of the Roman empire with students versed in Syriac and Greek, and they produced numerous Armenian translations of theological texts, and the new alphabet plus these translations provided the stimulus for the creation of a rich native literature. Noteworthy amongst the earliest examples of this literature are the Stromateis attributed to St Gregory, the homilies of John Mandakouni, the Refutation of Sects of Eznik of Kolb, and a series of invaluable chronicles attributed to Agathangelos, Moses Chorenatsi and Elishe amongst others. Although the Armenian church had accepted the first three Ecumenical Councils, they were at war with their Iranian overlords in 451 and so did not attend Chalcedon. At the first Council of Dvin in 506 they rejected the Christological formula of Chalcedon and accepted the Henotikon of the Emperor Zeno, and at the second Council of Dvin in 555 they formally condemned the imperial church and allied themselves with the Syrian Orthodox and other non-Chalcedonian 'monophysites'. (These churches – the Syrian Orthodox and its larger offshoots in India, the Armenian Orthodox, the Coptic, Ethiopian and Eritrean Orthodox – all survive to the present, and are now known as the 'Oriental Orthodox' churches.)

The Georgians, Caucasian neighbours of the Armenians, began to convert to Christianity in the second and third centuries, and again it was the conversion of their monarch, King Mirian, in either 326 (so church tradition) or 337 (so many historians) that marked the acceleration of the process. Because of its location on the Black Sea, Georgia was influenced by contacts with churches in Armenia (Mashtots, fresh from creating the Armenian alphabet, created a Georgian alphabet in c. 410); Iran (Georgian bishops attended a synod in Seleucia in 419); and Constantinople itself (in western Georgia the liturgy was conducted in Greek). Although the Georgians agreed to the condemnation of Chalcedon at the first Council of Dvin in 506, by the end of the sixth century they had begun to assert their independence of the Armenian church, and under Catholicos Kyrion (585–610) they finally returned to communion with Constantinople and the Chalcedonian Orthodox. Georgian monks and scholars were later to play a major role in the history of monasticism throughout the Holy Land and on Mount Sinai.

The Caucasian Albanian kingdom also converted to Christianity in the fourth century, and had its own language and script, of which a single sixth-century palimpsest now survives. It came under growing Armenian influence, and finally disappeared as an independent kingdom and church during the early centuries of Islamic rule.

Alexandria and the south

Egypt

The Coptic Church (its name is ultimately derived from the Greek name for Egypt, Aigyptos) traces its origins to the preaching of the evangelist Mark who was traditionally martyred in Alexandria in 68 CE, although it also treasures the memory of the Holy family seeking refuge in Egypt from King Herod. From papyri and other manuscripts it is clear that Christianity was well established in Egypt by the early second century, chiefly amongst the Greek-speaking residents of the cities and large towns, rather than amongst the Egyptian (Coptic) speaking peasants. Given Alexandria's intellectual reputation in the ancient world, it is not surprising that in the late second century the famous Didascalium (or catechetical school) was founded there and was associated with such intellectual giants of the early church as Clement and Origen (or that Egypt also became associated with such rival groups as the gnostics and Manicheans). By the end of the third century, Egypt had about 100 bishoprics, but this number greatly expanded in the following centuries as Christianity expanded rapidly amongst the rural Coptic population. This was probably due to several factors, such as Constantine's edict of toleration in 313; the creation of a simple Coptic alphabet, based on the Greek alphabet, in the mid third century that allowed Egyptian translations of the scriptures to circulate; and above all the popular enthusiasm (amongst both men and women) for asceticism and monasticism – both eremitism, associated with Anthony (see Chapter 51 this work), who was born c. 250, and communal cenobitism, founded by Pachomius in c. 320. Almost all Egyptian centres of population were within reach of a monastery, and so the monks, through their emphasis on spirituality and profound mysticism, exercised an extraordinary influence on the ordinary people from whom they were themselves drawn. In the fifth century, the Egyptian church produced a series of major theologians who played a major role internationally, namely Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria and Dioscoros, as well as the great monastic writer Shenoute of Atripe. The Copts, particularly in the monasteries, fiercely rejected the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon in 451, and this led to a major power struggle with the imperial church and its supporters in Alexandria. The non-Chalcedonian party was finally able to claim victory only with the Arab invasion of Egypt in 641 that severed all Byzantine influence in their country.

Coptic (and Greek) missionaries travelled up the Nile to Nubia (modern Sudan), an ancient civilisation with strong links to Egypt, and by the fifth century there was already a significant Christian presence there. It was from the sixth and seventh centuries, however, that Christian Nubian culture really flourished, and the translation of texts into Nubian and the building of monasteries and churches increased. Native Nubian Christianity survived until the early sixteenth century when the last Christian kingdom passed into Muslim control.

Ethiopia

Now the largest of the Oriental Orthodox churches (with more than 40 million members), the origins of Christianity in Ethiopia date back to the mid fourth century when two Syrian brothers from Tyre, Frumentius and Edesius, were shipwrecked in the Red Sea and enslaved in the ancient Ethiopian kingdom of Aksum. At this time, Aksum was the major political power in the Red Sea region, and under the leadership of its greatest king, Ezana, it not only had substantial African territories but also ruled parts of Southern Arabia. (Over many centuries, Ethiopia had received waves of immigrants from Arabia who had intermarried with the local people and produced a distinctive new nation that drew upon its African and Arabian heritage, and also maintained strong contacts with the Greek-speaking cultures of the Mediterranean. Thus Ezana erected an extraordinary series of obelisks, some more than 100 feet high, engraved with inscriptions in Ethiopic, South Arabian and Greek.) The two Syrian captives became tutors to the royal family and used the opportunity to preach the gospel. King Ezana converted to Christianity (as can be seen from the new inscriptions he placed on his coins) and sent Frumentius to Alexandria where the great Athanasius consecrated him bishop of Aksum, and sent him back to continue his work. It seems likely that further missionaries followed him for, amongst others, the Ethiopian church venerates the 'nine saints', monks from the Roman empire and often said to be Syrians, who according to tradition came to Ethiopia in the fifth century and founded new monasteries. In 525 the Ethiopian king, Ella Asbeha, invaded Arabia to avenge a massacre of Christians at Najran, and from quotations from the psalms found in his victorious inscriptions it is clear that at least parts of the Bible had been translated into Ethiopic by this time. The Ethiopian church, because of the pervasive and enduring influence from Coptic Egypt, rejected the teachings of the Council of Chalcedon, but little else is known of its early (pre-medieval) history. In part, this is due to a catastrophic invasion by Muslim Somali armies in the first half of the sixteenth century which, although eventually defeated, led to the destruction of innumerable monasteries and churches and the loss of much of Ethiopian literary heritage and historical records.

Christian theological diversity

It is impossible to do justice to the extraordinarily rich theological traditions produced by these numerous churches stretched across the Eurasian landmass, India and Africa, but in what follows I have selected a few limited areas of interest. Readers should not forget, however, that whilst I have concentrated on what is distinctive and original in their theology, these churches also share fully in the textual and theological heritage of early Mediterranean Christianity.

Biblical diversity

Because those churches which flourished in Europe, before expanding elsewhere, agree almost entirely on the identity of the books contained within the Bible (the only minor disagreement concerns the authority of certain texts found in the Greek but not in the Hebrew Old Testament, which Catholics refer to as Deuterocanonical and Protestants as Apocryphal writings), it is often forgotten that for most of the period of the early church the concept of a canon of authoritative scriptural texts, and the listing of those texts, was only slowly developing. Not surprisingly, then, there was much regional variation in the texts which were authorised for reading in church, and some of these alternative canons have been preserved in certain churches until the present. Churches beyond the Greek-speaking cities of the east, or the Latin west, were also quick to translate biblical texts into their own local languages – often on multiple occasions, producing a variety of local versions. These two factors, canon and translation, exercised a profound influence on both the development of dogmatic theology and Christian spirituality.

Perhaps the most dramatic example of an extended biblical canon is to be found in Ethiopia, where there are generally stated to be 81 books in the biblical canon. Rather confusingly, however, these are variously calculated. One canon has 46 Old Testament books and 35 (as opposed to the European 27) New Testament books, whereas another reckons these figures to be 54 and 27 respectively. Amongst the additional Old Testament texts are the books of Enoch and Jubilees – translations of ancient Jewish texts once popular amongst Jews and Christians alike (indeed Enoch is cited in Jude 14–15) but which now survive in their entirety only in Ethiopic. The expanded New Testament canon includes all the books accepted in Europe, plus the 'Shepherd of Hermas'; the four-part 'Sinodos', a collection of prayers and instructions relating to church order which is attributed to Clement of Rome; 'Clement', a collection of texts not known outside of Ethiopia which are said to have been passed to Clement by the Apostle Peter; the two-part 'Book of the Covenant', which is divided into a collection of materials relating to church order and a post-resurrection address by Christ to his disciples; and finally the Ethiopic 'Didascalia'.

Although less dramatic, Syria also possesses a different canon, and it is also significant because it was one of the first regions to produce local Bible versions: the Old Testament was translated into Syriac, possibly by heterodox Jews, although the version was quickly adopted by the local Christians by the end of the second century and came to be known as the Peshitta. It is the local New Testament canon that is particularly of interest, however. In an early fifth-century text, the Doctrina Addai, which presents a legendary account of the local origins of Christianity but nevertheless embodies many early traditions, the Apostle Addai instructs his followers about the texts which they may read:

> The Law and the Prophets and the Gospel from which you read every day before the people, and the Epistles of Paul which Simon Cephas sent us from the city of Rome, and the Acts of the Twelve Apostles which John the son of Zebedee sent us from Ephesus – from these writings you shall read in the Churches of the Messiah, and besides them nothing else shall you read.

From this list, it will be noticed that the catholic epistles (both the major epistles James, 1 Peter and 1 John, plus the minor epistles 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude) as well as the book of Revelation are missing. By the time the New Testament Peshitta version was produced (by the early fifth century, at the latest), the major catholic epistles had been included, but the minor catholic epistles and Revelation continued to be omitted, and are still not included in the canon of the Church of the East which was geographically (and from the late fifth century doctrinally) isolated in the Iranian empire. In the western Syrian Orthodox church the minor catholic epistles and Revelation were first translated into Syriac in the sixth century, but their usage still remained very limited. (Revelation was translated into Armenian by the fifth century, but only became part of the New Testament canon at the end of the twelfth century, and was not translated into Georgian until the tenth century.) From the writings of fourth-century theologians such as Ephrem, it would appear that in his time the epistle to Philemon was not considered canonical, unlike the third epistle of Paul to the Corinthians (part of the apocryphal Acts of Paul) which was included in his commentary on the Pauline epistles, and which remained very popular in Armenia where it was printed as an appendix to the standard critical edition of the Armenian Bible.

From the citation of the Doctrina Addai given above, it will also be noticed that only one 'gospel' is referred to. This is not merely shorthand for the Gospel of Christ preserved in the four books of the Evangelists, but reflects the fact that in much of Syria and Armenia the earliest gospel in circulation in the local languages was the Diatessaron, or gospel-harmony, of Tatian (a native of Syria who had been educated in Rome as a student of Justin Martyr, but returned home c. 172). The Diatessaron became very popular amongst missionaries spreading the Christian faith throughout the east, and so was the obvious choice of gospel text for Ephrem's commentary. Even after the fifth century, when bishops such as Theodoret of Cyrrhus and Rabbula of Edessa sought out and destroyed hundreds of copies in their sees – replacing them with copies of the separate gospels – other copies of the Diatessaron remained in use and became the basis of translations into Persian and Arabic which still survive today.

These alternative canons and texts had a profound effect on the development of local theology. To note just one example, in Tatian's Diatessaron John the Baptist's diet (cf. Matt. 4:4) is said to consist not of 'locusts and wild honey' but of 'milk and honey'. Not only does this remove the difficulty for some early Christians of the great proto-ascetic eating meat, but by replacing it with the food promised to the children of Israel Tatian has underlined the typological link – found in various early Christian sources – between entry into the promised land and Christian baptism. A small detail became the stimulus for theological reflection. On a larger scale, imagine Christianity without the book of Revelation – whose real authorship has long been debated – which, it could be argued, has encouraged an unhealthy interest in millennialism and an obsession with the eschatological last things, or imagine the theological impact (not to mention the practical advantages for evangelists) of having a single unified gospel without any internal contradictions or discrepancies.

Christian diversity and Judaism

The relationship of nascent and early Christianity to contemporary Judaism is a complex question that still taxes scholarship. In recent years, particularly since the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, historians have become increasingly aware of the variety of 'Judaisms' that existed in the early centuries of the common era, and the significance of this for our understanding of the factors that led to the rise and growth of Christianity. Very few, however, have stopped to consider the implications of the existence of a large variety of 'Christianities', each enriched by different legacies from their Jewish forebears. Some of these Jewish traditions and practices are very striking to those who are only familiar with western Christianity, and have led many Europeans either to regard them with contempt or to suggest that they are relics of 'primitive Christianity' (with both the positive and negative connotations that the phrase carries). Again, neither approach is truly satisfactory. Nor should it be forgotten that whilst there are some examples of peaceful Christian co-existence with local Jewish communities in the period and regions being discussed (as perhaps in Georgia), Judaism was more usually, as in the rest of the Christian world, the target of vicious polemic and diatribes. Ever so saintly and gentle a figure as the Syrian Ephrem – often cited as the key representative of 'Semitic Christianity' – reveals a dark side to his character when discussing the Jews.

The origins of Jewish influence on local forms of Christianity are variously explained. Some look to the various semi-legendary accounts of the origins of Christianity in these regions. Just as the apostle Paul is recorded as having travelled and preached to the Jewish communities in the major cities of the Roman Empire, so too many of the early missionaries who travelled beyond the imperial frontiers are said to have been assisted by local Jewish communities. In Syriac legends, the Apostle Addai is said to have made his base in Edessa in the home of a local Jewish merchant, Tobiah, and according to the Life of St Nino the first disciples of this evangelist of Georgia, a prophetess from Cappadocia, were eight Jewish women, and the first Christian priest in Georgia was Abiathar, a local Jewish kohen. The great Ethiopic Kebra Nagast, 'the Glory of the Kings', goes even further and tells how the Queen of Sheba visited King Solomon in Jerusalem and became pregnant with her son Menelik. On their return to Ethiopia, they are said to have carried the Ark of the Covenant with them, and thus to have prepared the ground for the much later evangelisation of their empire.

Whatever the historical value of these stories, the reality and influence of traditions communicated by Jewish converts to Christianity, or by early theological contact between Jewish and Christian communities, is clearly evident. Consider the case of early Syriac Christianity. Here the influence of Jewish exegetical traditions is widespread. At the simplest level this is manifested in the text of Gen. 8:4 in both the Syriac Peshitta and the Jewish Targumim where the name of the mountain upon which Noah's ark came to rest is not Mount Ararat (in eastern Turkey) but Mount Qardu (i.e. Judi Dagh in northern Iraq) – which should perhaps give pause for thought to the numerous pseudo-archaeological expeditions that so regularly go prospecting for the ark on Ararat! Some exegetical traditions appear to have been communicated outside the biblical text. For example, the book of Genesis (4:4) does not state how Cain and Abel knew that only the latter's sacrifice had been accepted by God. Aphrahat 'the Persian Sage', however, writing in the fourth century, and various Jewish writers of different periods, have preserved a tradition that they both saw fire descend from heaven and consume Abel's offering. Of far greater theological significance in Syriac Christianity is the belief that Adam and Eve were clothed in robes of light or robes of glory when in Paradise, and that these were then stripped off as a consequence of the Fall. The origin of this tradition is to be found in Rabbinic exegesis of Gen. 3:21 where a minority opinion holds that the reference is to their pre-expulsion clothing. Furthermore, one Rabbi is reported to have owned a copy of the Torah which read 'garments of light' instead of 'garments of skin/leather' (a difference of one letter in Hebrew). This apparently innocuous textual variant became the basis of an entire soteriological system in Syriac thought. Since humanity had lost its original robes of glory at the Fall, the Son of God became incarnate in order to return them. At his baptism, Christ placed them in the waters of the Jordan (which according to the Diatessaron was immediately covered with a blaze of fire or dazzling light) so that all Christians might put them on again at their own baptism (for in Syriac thought at baptism all Christians share in Christ's original baptism in the Jordan). Although invisible to our eyes here on earth, they will be revealed in their full splendour once their recipients are deemed worthy to enter heaven.

Jewish traditions and even practices are not restricted to the Syrian Christians, but in some instances it is not clear whether these are due to a direct inheritance from Jewish forebears, or are in fact the harmonisation of pre-Christian practices with Old Testament models. The Armenian Christians, for example, continued the practice of offering both cereal and animal sacrifices (bulls, sheep and fowl) to God, particularly at Easter (the Christian alternative to Pesah/Passover), at the great festivals, and in commemoration of the souls of the deceased. Armenian tradition traces this practice back to the injunctions of Gregory the Illuminator who is said to have given permission for sacrifices as a dispensation for the many pagan priests who had been led to Christianity but were concerned about providing for their families if the sacrificial system were to be abolished. Most subsequent Armenian commentators have been keen to emphasise that these sacrifices continue the sacrificial tradition of Abel, Noah and Abraham, but at the same time deny either that they are still following the Old Covenant that has been superseded by the New or that they have been 'corrupted' by Jewish customs. Instead, they are adhering to a biblical practice endorsed by the apostle of Armenia. As a twelfth-century writer (Nerses Shnorhali) put it, 'if other Christian peoples are not accustomed to follow the same usage, that is no reason why any one should abuse ours'.

In Ethiopia, the variety of practices with clear Jewish parallels is even more striking. From the earliest times the Ethiopians have practised male circumcision on the eighth day after birth; they strictly observed the Sabbath, refraining from all work (as well as celebrating on the following day the Christian 'great Sabbath'); they kept many of the rules relating to ritual cleanliness, and did not eat any of the forbidden foods such as hares, camels, fish without fins and scales, or even the sinew of the thigh (Gen. 32:33). There was a particular horror for pork, as is made clear in an Ethiopic saying: 'Pork taints not only him who eats it, but also him who hears about it'. Although some of these practices were played down in official church documents in recent centuries when they became the cause of bitter attacks and criticisms by ignorant European missionaries, they continued to play a central role in Ethiopian Christian life. Particularly fascinating is the central role of replicas of the Ark of the Covenant (Ethiopic tabot, plural tabotat) in church worship. As was mentioned above, tradition states that the original Ark of the Covenant was stolen from Jerusalem by the Queen of Sheba and taken to Ethiopia where it was treasured throughout the ages and rests now, some say, at Aksum. In every church in Ethiopia, at its very heart, the holy of holies, lay a copy of the original Ark (or copies in wood or stone of the tablets of the law which the original Ark contained) and these tabotat were (and are) solemnly led in procession around the church, accompanied by singing and dancing dabtara (the Ethiopian equivalent of the Levites who are an essential part of the liturgy, with a particular responsibility for chanting hymns and psalms, but are not ordained). There are clear echoes here of 2 Sam. 6:5, 14–16 where King David and the people of Israel dance and make merry around the Ark. This again raises the difficult issue of whether these practices are due to early Jewish influence or are a consequence of the veneration accorded to the Old Testament by the Ethiopians not only in word – as in European Christianity, which has so often seemed embarrassed by and neglectful of these ancient texts – but also by imitation and adherence.

Theological diversity

Whereas modern scholarship has divided itself into self-contained sub-disciplines, with classically trained scholars focusing on Greek and Latin patristic texts and a small band of 'orientalists' attempting to tackle the rest, in the ancient world there was a constant stream of texts and ideas flowing from one region to another, with, for example, Syrians influencing Greeks, Armenians and Indians, and Greeks influencing Syrians, Georgians and Ethiopians. Not surprisingly, then, there is a great body of theological literature which is common to many of the different church traditions and literatures, and more which whilst particular to a specific regional literature draws upon common approaches and principles. Nevertheless, a study of early Christian literatures reveals much that is not only intrinsically of great value and aesthetically pleasing, but which challenges our preconceived paradigms of theological discourse. Indeed, some texts challenge our very understanding of orthodoxy – and I am not simply referring to the fact that many of the non-Greek- and Latin-speaking churches were condemned as heterodox by theologians in the west. Take, for example, the second- or third-century Odes of Solomon, which circulated in Syriac and Greek, and which have both attracted and repelled scholars since their rediscovery in the early twentieth century. The oft-quoted nineteenth Ode begins as follows:

> A cup of milk was offered to me, > and I drank it in the sweetness of the kindness of the Lord.
> The Son is the cup,
> and he who was milked is the Father,
> and she who milked him is the Holy Spirit.
> Because his breasts were full, and it was undesirable that > his milk should be spilt to no purpose, > the Holy Spirit opened her bosom, > and mingled the milk of the two breasts of the Father . . .
> The womb of the Virgin took it, > and she received conception and gave birth.

Although critics have argued that such lines must have been the product of gnostics, it is now generally accepted that the Odes were produced by Orthodox Syrian Christians, who made creative use of biblical imagery and their own theological traditions. In early Syriac thought, for example, the Holy Spirit was feminine (as here), and there was also clearly an awareness that in several Old Testament passages God was given feminine as well as masculine attributes. The result is a text that would seems radical even to modern theologians and by challenging gendered theological language has much to teach us.

In the use of poetry as a vehicle for theological expression is a striking feature of the Odes, and it is in fact characteristic of some of the most powerful examples of early Syriac literature. The most famous Syriac poet is without doubt Ephrem, c. 306–373 (about whom more can be read in Chapter 59 of this work). Ephrem organised choirs of women to sing his compositions as a practical means of disseminating Orthodox teachings and combatting heresy, but this was not the main reason for his choice of poetry as the primary vehicle for theology. Ephrem believed that God so far surpassed human comprehension that he could not conceivably be approached or restricted by the philosophical formulae and definitions so beloved of Greek-speaking theologians. Neither could religious truth, by nature dynamic and multi-layered, be fully expressed in prose with its many limitations. Only poetry, with its multivalent images and its ability to communicate differently to each reader on each reading (since readers as well as writers are inspired by the Spirit), was capable of hinting at these realities. It was also the perfect genre for articulating Ephrem's sacramental understanding of creation, according to which God, by placing his symbols and types throughout nature and the Bible, had revealed aspects of the divine to those who approached them with the eye of faith.

In recent years, Ephrem's theology has come to be widely appreciated by western readers, although 100 years ago it was still being rubbished. That same process is only now beginning with the greatest of Coptic writers, Shenoute of Atripe (late fourth to mid fifth century), many of whose works are yet to be fully edited. In the past, he has often been attacked as possessing no Christology, but more recent studies show quite the reverse, that he is profoundly Christ-centred and that in his theological and spiritual texts he strove to emphasise the reality and glory of Christ's humanity against those who denied it entirely, or sought to ignore it by concentrating exclusively on Christ as nous or logos, the divine Christ. Intimately involved with this was his encouragement of the faithful to utter the simple prayer 'Jesus' at all significant moments of life, whether in response to joyful or sad events, moments of testing or triumph. Because Ephrem and Shenoute do not conform to European patterns of theological expression, they have both been denigrated for too long, and it is western readers who have been the losers. It is time for Christians world–wide to acknowledge that whilst European Christianity represents one theologically rich offshoot of the early church, it does not have a monopoly in the interpretation of the divine self–revelation. In a time of great change, we may have much to learn from other branches of Christianity that have successfully preserved and taught their faith through long centuries and within diverse cultures.

Bibliography

Atiya, A. S. (ed.) (1991) The Coptic Encyclopedia. New York: Macmillan.

Bausi, A. (2012) Languages and Cultures of Eastern Christianity: Ethiopian. Farnham, UK: Ashgate.

Brock, S. P. (1992) The Luminous Eye: The Spiritual World Vision of St. Ephrem. Cistercian Studies 124. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.

Brock, S. P., Butts, A., Kiraz, G. and Van Rompay, L. (eds) (2011) Gorgias Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Syriac Heritage. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Gillman, I. and Klimkeit, H.-J. (1999) Christians in Asia Before 1500. Richmond, UK: Curzon Press.

Krawiec, R. (2002) Shenoute and the Women of the White Monastery: Egyptian Monasticism in Late Antiquity. New York: OUP.

McCullough, W. S. (1982) A Short History of Syriac Christianity to the Rise of Islam. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.

Metzger, B. M. (1977) The Early Versions of the New Testament: Their Origin, Transmission, and Limitations. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Moffett, S. H. (1992) A History of Christianity in Asia: I. Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco, CA: HarperSanFrancisco.

Rapp, S. H. (2012) Languages and Cultures of Eastern Christianity: Georgian. Farnham, UK: Ashgate.

Tang, L. (2002) A Study of the History of Nestorian Christianity in China and Its Literature in Chinese. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang.

Trimingham, J. S. (1979) Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times. London: Longman.

15

MONASTICISM

Columba Stewart OSB

Ways of approach

Early monastic Christians are largely inaccessible to us. A few of them wrote or were written about, and some lived in places accessible to modern archaeological excavation. Their greatest monument is the living monastic tradition that claims their insights to be its foundation. The search for early monastic traces is hindered by the apologetics and polemics that have often distorted the study of early Christian monasticism. Until very recently, historical investigations typically were coloured by the religious intentions of writers who sought to vindicate, to criticize or to dismiss monastic traditions. Ascetics were portrayed as heroic non-conformists, as deluded fanatics (most famously by Gibbon), as social misfits, or as docile loyalists. Both Martin Luther's rejection of monastic vows and the Roman defence of them turned on evidence alleged from early monastic texts.

Figure 15.1 A sixteen-century illustrator's fantasy of early Egyptian monasticism, looking rather more like his native Low Countries than late antique Egypt. From Solitudo, sive vitae eremicolarum ('Solitude, or the lives of the hermits'), engraved by Jan and Raphael Sadeler after figures by Maarten de Vos, c. 1590

In the nineteenth century, monastic literature began to be subjected to the same critical analysis as the Bible, and scepticism about authorship and reliability of texts abounded (Heussi 1936: 1–10). More recently, the religious agenda of earlier scholarship has yielded to social and cultural analysis since 'asceticism', a category including monastic figures and movements, has become a surprisingly lively subject for intellectual dissection (Wimbush and Valantasis 1995; Stewart 1996, 1997). Monasticism has come to be seen, for example, as an ecclesiastically tamed form of an early charismatic asceticism, as one area of late antique life where women could have some control over their destiny, and as a Christian expression of the desire for a life dedicated to philosophy.

Two major breakthroughs have transformed our view of the early monastic landscape. The first has been an enormous increase in archaeological and literary data. Egyptian papyri have given us insight into the vocabulary and daily life of early monastic men and women (Goehring 1992b). The publication of neglected as well as 'heterodox' texts has provided a broader context for understanding the traditional monastic canon. Literature in ancient Christian languages such as Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Ge'ez (Ethiopic), Georgian and others is taking its place alongside the more familiar Greek and Latin texts. Excavation of monastic sites, especially in Egypt and in the Judean desert of Palestine, has alerted us to the complexities of monastic society and to its interactions with others (e.g. Goehring 1986; Guillaumont et al. 1991; Hirschfeld 1992).

The second breakthrough has been one of perspective. What we now call monasticism was part of a diverse social and religious landscape. However, until recently, few historians questioned the traditional focus on those reckoned to be monastic 'founders'. These were almost without exception male, they were often bishops, and the best-known monastic literature was either by or about them. A vaguer category of 'desert fathers' acknowledged a more fluid form of monastic life but perpetuated the assumptions that every form of Christian asceticism could be categorized and that female monasticism was simply an auxiliary enterprise. Much of the terrain lay in shadow or was simply unmapped (Goehring 1992a). Using tools of social history, literary criticism and feminist theory, as well as the scientific discoveries noted earlier, scholars are challenging the traditional understanding of monasticism as a process of lineal descent from the founding (male) figures (Cain 2009; Stewart 2014). Efforts to recover neglected aspects of early monasticism have close ties to recent critiques of traditional categories such as 'orthodoxy' and 'heresy', and of the power structures that determined and enforced them (e.g. Clark 1986; Elm 1994: 1–18; Brakke 1995).

However one approaches the subject, it is clear that 'monasticism' did not emerge from early Christian asceticism as the result of a single cause or a deliberate action. For a variety of theological, social and ecclesiastical reasons, asceticism attained a critical mass and a crucial stage of self-understanding in several different places during the fourth century. To understand the lives of monastic women and men, we must understand their particular circumstances. Local ecclesiastical factors, artistic and literary traditions, geography, language and social conditions all contributed to expressions of Christian faith in monastic life. Monastic cultures are best approached in situ, as they will be here. Even where the inspiration of a particular monastic group came from elsewhere, local conditions coloured and shaped its growth. We must also remember that people and ideas travelled widely in the ancient world (see Chapter 22 of this work). These men and women visited each other, wrote letters, read one another's writings and translated them for the benefit of others.

Amidst the variety of local forms there is a discernible monastic profile. It is recognized in the first place by adherence to a rule or discipline of life, though rarely in this period in the form of a written charter like the later Rule of Benedict. Direction came from oral tradition, the common experience of a particular group, a spiritual elder or the growing body of monastic literature. The devotional and ascetic practices of the monastic life cultivated awareness of God while addressing hindrances or distractions. The normative practices were celibacy, formalized prayer at certain hours of the day and night, memorization of biblical texts for the sake of personal prayer, fasting (both of kind and amount of food), manual labour for sustenance and almsgiving, and consultation with others experienced in the life. Although participation in the Eucharist was presumed, actual practice is not always clear. Groups and communities were normally single-sex, though there are examples of 'double monasteries' where groups of men and women lived in close proximity. Generally there was some form of distinctive dress, differing from common apparel more by sombre colour or poorer quality than by style. Monastic women wore a head covering, which was normally reserved to married women in traditional cultures. With these basic elements, monasticism in each region developed its own spirituality and practices, as well as the structures and vocabulary to support and express them.

Syrian asceticism

Christian monasticism has traditionally been viewed as an Egyptian phenomenon of the fourth century that soon spread to other regions. Its real origins, however, lay in ascetic tendencies and movements that existed from the time of the earliest Christian communities. The most fertile ground for early Christian asceticism was Syria, an inclusive geographical label covering several regions of various ascetic traditions (Stewart 2013). The Syriac language, a Christian dialect of Aramaic, was spoken throughout Mesopotamia and the Levant. Syriac was the literary language of a flourishing Semitic Christian culture centred on the city of Edessa in Mesopotamia. Mediterranean Syria, with large Greek-speaking cities like Antioch, was more directly influenced by the Hellenistic culture of the Roman empire. Between them was Syria's limestone massif, where monasticism flourished in the fifth to seventh centuries. There the culture was mixed Syriac and Greek, and the monasticism of the region reflected the joint heritage.

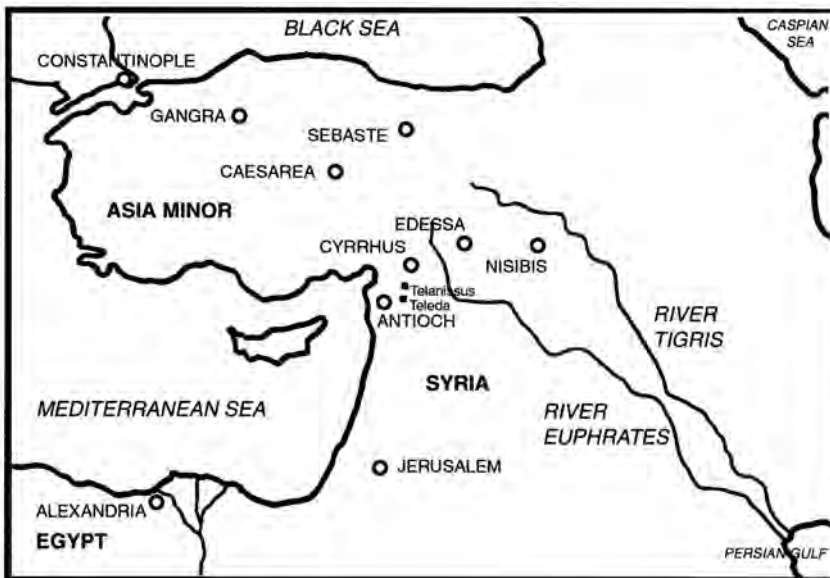
Syriac Christianity in Mesopotamia was probably Jewish–Christian in origin (Murray 2004: 3–19). More Semitic and biblical than it was Greek and philosophical – though by no means unaffected by Hellenism – this Christian culture viewed ascetic discipline and Christian commitment as inseparable.


Figure 15.2   Monastic Syria, Cappadocia and Palestine

The ascetic orientation of earliest Syriac Christianity was so strong that before the fourth century celibacy may have been required of those admitted to baptism. Aphrahat (c. 270–c. 345 CE) and Ephrem of Nisibis (c. 306–73 CE), the greatest writers of the early Syriac tradition, placed a vividly eschatological emphasis on leading the 'angelic' life after being clothed with the glory of Christ in baptism. Joined to Christ, the only begotten, the baptized become like him: the term used for 'ascetic', ihidaya, can mean 'only begotten', 'single' or 'alone'. Both write of the 'Sons and Daughters of the Covenant' (bnai/bnat qyama) who lived as virgins, or celibately after marriage (Brock 1992: 133–9; Griffith 1995).

The teaching of Aphrahat or Ephrem, however, was not separatist or elitist. They worked within church communities that accepted the equation of Christianity with asceticism. Much of Ephrem's poetic hymnody has an explicitly sacramental context, while his prose sermons and biblical commentaries are catechetical. The ascetic pattern for Christianity that they presumed was ultimately hard to sustain as a norm for all, and asceticism became but one expression of baptismal commitment. In time, understandings of monastic life akin to those common in Egypt and Palestine overlaid the earlier, native, ascetic movements in Mesopotamia. Traditional Syriac ascetic vocabulary such as ihidaya was reinterpreted to suit those models of monastic life and supplemented by new terms such as dayraya, 'monastery-dweller' (Stewart 2014: 215–20). In the early Islamic period, the legend arose that Mar Augen (Eugenios), instructed by monks in Egypt, had founded monasticism in Mesopotamia in the fourth century. Meanwhile, the sayings of the Egyptian monks and the works of writers such as Evagrius Ponticus had become enormously popular and were quickly translated into Syriac.

The earlier Syriac tradition was not entirely lost. Ephrem's hymnody continued to be a staple of the Syriac liturgy and a pattern for later Syriac writers such as Jacob of Serugh. It was both translated and imitated in Greek, becoming the basis for the later Byzantine liturgy through the Syrian Romanos the Melodist (early sixth century). Attitudes and imagery central to early Syrian asceticism deeply influenced the late fourth-century author of the Greek Macarian Homilies. Their author is unknown, but the Homilies were later attributed to an Egyptian monk, Macarius the Great. The Homilies, luminous texts full of vivid imagery and a Spirit-centred theology, illustrate the influence of Syrian asceticism on the larger church. The Homilies circulated widely in various collections. A major text from the Macarian corpus was adapted by the Cappadocian ascetic theologian Gregory of Nyssa for one of his own treatises (Staats 1984), and their influence on later Byzantine spirituality was profound (Plested 2004). The Homilies became a focus of the Messalian controversy of the late fourth and early fifth centuries, a controversy explainable at least in part as a collision of Greek and Syriac theological idioms (Stewart 1991).

Figure 15.3   The late fifth-century basilica of Saint Symeon (Qalaat Semaan) built around the stylite's pillar. The boulder in the centre of the photograph is all that remains of the pillar once 12–18 metres tall. Photo Columba Stewart OSB

In western Syria, the fifth-century evidence of the History of the Monks of Syria by Theodoret, bishop of Cyrrhus (393–466), and other hagiographical texts depict an astonishing variety of monastic forms of life. There were cenobia (communities) as well as native expressions of solitary (anchoritic) monasticism such as stylites (pillar-dwellers) and recluses, who lived in towers or similar structures. The dozens of abandoned cities on the limestone massif of northwestern Syria bear abundant archaeological witness to monastic settlement of all kinds. Although the period of greatest expansion was the sixth century, monastic activity was already lively in the late fourth and early fifth centuries (Peña et al. 1975, 1978, 1983). We know from the Life of Symeon (c. 385–459) that the famous stylite began his monastic career in the company of ascetics at a local shrine before entering the famous cenobium at Teleda. Only later did he climb the pillar at Telanissus that made him famous throughout the Christian world. Theodoret, whose collection of stories about monastic men and women provides a panorama of Syrian monasticism, grew up in close contact with local monks and entered a cenobium when his parents died.

Figure 15.4 Sixth-century CE ex-voto silver plaque depicting St Symeon Stylites threatened by a snake; originally part of the treasure of the church of Ma'arrat an Numan in Syria and now in the Louvre. Photo Wikimedia Commons (note they dispute the copyright claim of Insecula.com)

Monastic Egypt

Even if Egypt was not the fountainhead of all Christian monasticism, it became its imaginative centre. Fourth- and fifth-century Egyptian monastic texts like the Life of Anthony and the thousands of apophthegmata, the sayings of the monastic elders, gave the early Christian world the themes and figures that reshaped its understanding of asceticism. Foremost among them was the idea of monasticism as a life of withdrawal into the desert. Although only a partial representation even of Egyptian monasticism, the concept of the monastic desert has been reimagined again and again to include life on rocky outcroppings off the Irish coasts, in the silent vastness of Russian forests and amidst the desolation of modern urban centres.

The key to understanding monastic Egypt and its emphasis on the desert is geography. Human society in Egypt clung to the lifeline of the Nile. The river creates a narrow ribbon of green as it runs south to north before diffusing through the lush fields of the Delta and draining into the Mediterranean. In most of Egypt the desert is no farther away than an easy walk. Always in view, the desert begins at exactly the point where human ingenuity or sheer physical power can no longer bring water up from the river.

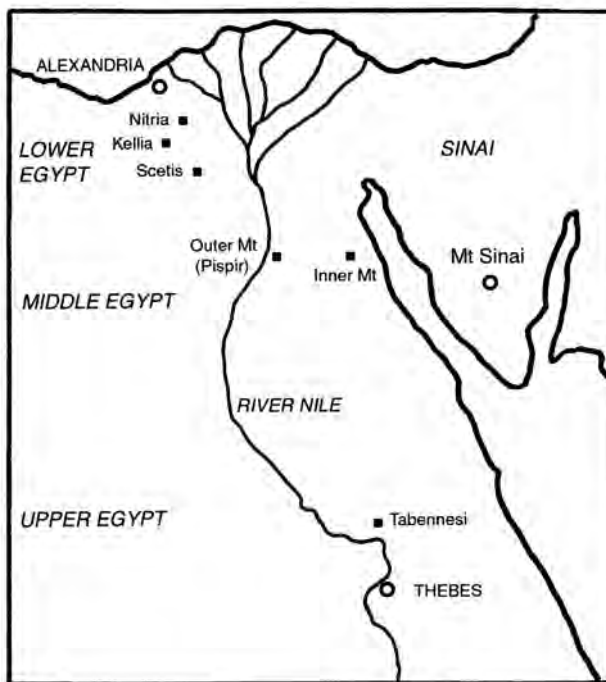
The evidence we have of much Egyptian monasticism suggests easy access to both solitude and society. We know that there were ascetic Christians in Egyptian cities and towns from at least the third century. Around 270, Anthony the Great (251–356) renounced his inheritance and left his sister in the care of virgins who trained her in their way of life (Elm 1994; Brakke 1995). Anthony then apprenticed himself to a nearby male ascetic. The edge of the village, where Anthony lived before he sought the great desert and where Pachomius (c. 292–346) built his monasteries, placed Egyptian ascetics on the border between the realm of the living and the abode of the dead. Some ventured far into the desert seeking a more absolute solitude but most did not: the desert lay at hand when needed, as did the village. Ascetics supported themselves by handicrafts or by working as seasonal labourers, depending on others to buy their services and to sell them food and other necessities. Two idealizing depictions of Egyptian monastic life from the early fifth century, Palladius' Lausiac History and the anonymous History of the Monks in Egypt, illustrate both the forms ascetic life had assumed and the links between monastic Christians and their secular neighbours.


Figure 15.5 Monastic Egypt

Anthony was the first Egyptian monk to attract widespread notice (see Chapter 51 of this volume). His fame spread quickly throughout the eastern and western churches, helped greatly by the biography written by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, just after Anthony's death in 356. The Life of Anthony even managed to disturb the ambitious careerist Augustine in Milan, precipitating his conversion. Anthony modelled both the solitary life of the desert and an impressive engagement with others. He was a teacher to monks, an advisor to politicians, a healer of the sick and counsellor of the troubled. Despite Athanasius' portrayal of him as illiterate, he was theologically educated and wrote letters of great spiritual depth (Rubenson 1995).

Anthony's teaching, with its emphasis on analysis of the forces ('demons') resistant to Christian and monastic progress, was the basis for elaboration by his successors, especially Evagrius of Pontus. Discernment of the work of these demonic counter-forces was central to the ascetic life, for in recognition of truth lay the beginnings of freedom. Anthony's psychological subtlety remains impressive. Anthony exemplified a form of monastic life that was also flourishing during his lifetime in Lower Egyptian monastic settlements at Nitria and Scetis. At both sites, monks lived a partial solitude. Groups formed around spiritual elders and met periodically for common prayer and mutual encouragement. These monastic settlements and others like them generated the distinctive literature known as the apophthegmata ('sayings') as monastic men and women preserved in writing the teachings of their elders. The sayings were meant to awaken the hearer to new insight, though like parables their meaning is not always immediately apparent. Despite the editing and normalizing involved in the transition to written collections, and the evident influence from philosophical pedagogical texts, the apophthegmata preserve an array of Egyptian monastic lifestyles, solitary and communal, male and female, that are both attractive and unsettling (Burton-Christie 1993; Gould 1993).

At the rigorous outpost of Nitria known as Kellia, 'The Cells', the great Egyptian monastic theologian Evagrius Ponticus (d. 399) produced ascetical theology, biblical commentaries and esoteric speculations. Evagrius received a superb theological education in Cappadocia and Constantinople from Gregory of Nazianzus and other teachers. In the imperial capital, he was a rising ecclesiastical star until the personal crisis created by his romantic interest in a married woman drove him from the city. Broken in spirit and in health he found his way to the monastery of Melania and Rufinus in Jerusalem and then with Melania's encouragement went on to Egypt. Like Anthony, Evagrius became famous for his psychological insight, joining his sophisticated theological training to the practical wisdom of the monastic desert.

Evagrius provides the first extant analysis of the passions under the eight headings of gluttony, lust, avarice, anger, sadness, listlessness, vainglory and pride (Stewart 2005). His theology of 'pure' or 'imageless' prayer was to be of great significance for later spirituality (Stewart 2001). The more speculative aspects of Evagrius' teaching and that of others like him particularly devoted to the thought of the brilliant third-century Alexandrian theologian, Origen, created a devastating crisis in Egyptian and Palestinian monasticism at the very end of the fourth century. Scetis and Nitria were split, and some of the most prominent monks fled to Sinai, Gaza, Palestine and Constantinople (Guillaumont 1962; Clark 1992). Despite the Origenist controversy, Evagrius' basic teaching on the ascetical life and on prayer was enormously important for subsequent monastic tradition and his works enjoyed wide circulation both in their original Greek and in translation. His impact was especially great in Syria, and several Syriac translations of his writings still exist. In the west, his disciple John Cassian (c. 365–c. 430) propagated the basic elements of Evagrius' teaching with a diplomatic silence about their controversial author.

The figure traditionally associated with the origins of cenobitic, or communal, monasticism is Pachomius (c. 292–346; see Chapter 52 this volume). The extant literature of Pachomian monasticism dates from a period of restoration and consolidation, and the founder's biography enshrined the guiding myths of the Koinonia (Goehring 1986: 236–40). Born a pagan in Upper (Southern) Egypt, Pachomius was converted to Christianity by the kindness of local Christians who fed him while he was in prison awaiting the draft. After his release, he was baptized and spent some time leading an ascetic life in a village, just as Anthony had done before moving into the desert. Pachomius then resolved to become an anchorite and apprenticed himself to an elder named Palamon; the story of his formation as a hermit is a classic vignette of that form of monastic life. After some years with Palamon, Pachomius discerned a call to develop another form of monastic life at Tabennesi with a more explicit emphasis on community.

Figure 15.6   Monastery of Deir al Suryani in the desert of Scetis. Photo Columba Stewart OSB

The surviving documents suggest that Pachomius' first attempts at creating a cenobium (a Latin word from the Greek koinobion, 'common life') were disastrous (Veilleux 1980: 427–38). He faced resistance from his brother, who had come to be a monk with him but preferred the anchoritic model. The first members of the new community took advantage of Pachomius' patience and his preference for teaching by example rather than regulation, a pronounced emphasis in the classic method of teaching. Eventually, Pachomius insisted that his followers give up all claims to individual property or preferences, and he established common policies equally applicable to all and susceptible to formulation in oral and written rules. Taking his inspiration from the early church of Jerusalem as described in Acts 2, Pachomius called his group the Koinonia, the 'community' or 'fellowship'. The combination of organized communal life and strong leadership by the superior, especially in a teaching role, proved attractive. Pachomius' model seems to have spread quickly as both male and female communities formed under his guidance. His movement could not have been isolated from other efforts to find ascetical perfection, though the exact links between Pachomian monasticism and, e.g., Gnostic groups, remain disputed (Veilleux 1986).

The sister whom Anthony left in the care of virgins later became a spiritual guide for other women. Pachomius' sister Mary was the superior of one of the female communities of the Koinonia. Neither emerges in her own right from the scanty references in this literature directed mainly toward men. Indeed, we are never even told the name of Anthony's sister. We know there were groups of ascetic women in the cities. Palladius included stories about a number of women in his ascetical com‐ pendium, the Lausiac History, and a handful of women are among the revered elders of the surviving apophthegmata (Elm 1994: 253–82, 311–30). Among them is Amma Syncletica, whose sayings are extracted from a compelling but mysterious text composed sometime in the early fifth century. The anonymous Life and Regimen of Blessed Syncletica (see quotation below) bears several literary parallels with the Life of Anthony, and contains clear allusions to Evagrian spiritual theology. Syncletica is presented as the beautiful daughter of a prominent Alexandrian family who resolved to live as an ascetic in a family tomb outside of the city. She collected disciples and formed the community to whom she delivers the instructions found in her Life. Her teaching on poverty and chastity shows a distinctive approach to these conventional themes and possibly allows a glimpse into how women interpreted and applied fundamental ascetic motifs (Forman 1993; Bongie 1997).

> When her parents died, she was inspired by a divine impulse to even more. She left her parents' home, taking her sister – who was blind – with her. They went out to a tomb that belonged to one of her relatives some distance from the city. She sold all the property that had been left to her, distributed the proceeds to the poor, called for one of the priests, and cut off her own hair. Thus she laid aside all adornment, for it is the custom among women to refer to hair as adornment. It was symbolic of her soul's becoming frugal and pure. Then, for the first time, she was worthy of the title 'virgin'. When she had distributed all of her property to the poor, she said: 'I have been made worthy of a great title: since I have nothing, what of significance can I offer in return to the one who has given it to me? For in external affairs, people throw away everything they have to gain ephemeral honour: how much more should I, made worthy of such a gift, not hand over even my body along with these things esteemed as possessions? For the Lord's is the earth and its fullness'. Clothing herself in humility by these words, she undertook the solitary life.
>
> (Life and Regimen of the Blessed Syncletica 11–12)

Monasticism in Egypt, riven already by the Origenist controversy, was further divided by the theological controversies of the fifth century that would fray and then break the ecclesiastical ties between Alexandria and Constantinople. Monasticism became more definitively Coptic and developed along new lines, as evident in the life and work of Shenoute of Atripe (348–465!), a monastic leader in Upper Egypt whose White Monastery rose in importance as the Pachomian Koinonia declined. Almost entirely absent in traditional accounts of monastic history, Shenoute has re-emerged in recent scholarship as a figure of fascination and some consternation for his fiery prophetic writings and insistence on the strictest discipline in the communities under his control (Emmel 2004; Schroeder 2007; Layton 2014).

International monasticism in Palestine

When imperial patronage of Christianity began under Constantine in the early fourth century, Palestine became a centre of pilgrimage and ecclesiastical development. The identification of holy places led to massive building projects and an influx of visitors, clergy and monastic men and women. Many came as pilgrims and stayed as monks and nuns.

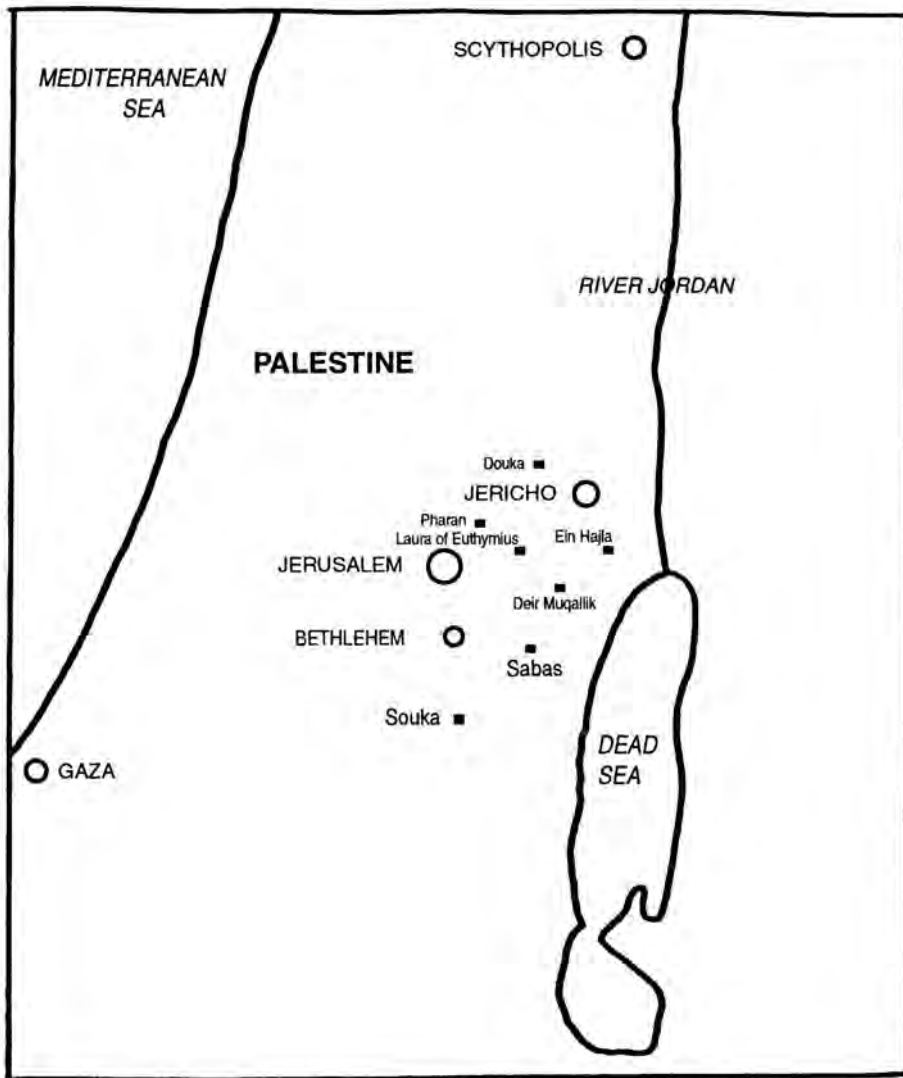
Monasticism in Byzantine Palestine had several inter-related elements. On the coast in Gaza both hermits and monastic communities could be found beginning in the fourth century, although their greatest fame would come two centuries later (Neyt and Angelis-Noah 1997: 13–22; Bitton-Ashkelony and Kofsky 2004). There were monastic communities associated with urban holy places, most notably in Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Closely linked to these as sites of pilgrimage were the monasteries of the Jordan Plain near Jericho. Most gripping to the imagination was the monasticism of the hilly Judean desert east of Jerusalem. The dramatic difference in rainfall between the Holy City atop the rocky spine of central Palestine, and the Judean hills and valleys plunging toward the Dead Sea, created a unique ambience for monastic life. Though the desert was visible from the Mount of Olives, the peculiar geography of Palestine – not unlike Egypt in effect, though not in form – made the monasticism of the desert environmentally and psychologically quite distinct from that of the towns or the river plain (Hirschfeld 1992: 6–10).


Figure 15.7   Monastic Palestine

We know that there were Greek communities in both Jerusalem and Bethlehem in the late fourth century. Writing in the early 380s, the indefatigable Spanish pilgrim Egeria, herself a nun, mentions both male and female monastic residents in both places. It would seem from Egeria's account that she found monks at virtually every pilgrimage site she visited from Sinai to the Galilee. The young John Cassian came to Bethlehem in the early 380s and became a monk in a Greek-speaking cenobium there. There were also non-Greek monasteries in Jerusalem as Armenians, Copts, Georgians and others established churches and hostels for their own pilgrims. Monasteries grew up around these establishments to care for the pilgrims who frequented them.

Among the famous Latin Christians who made their way to the Holy Land in the 380s were Melania and Rufinus, who established a community remarkable for its learning on the Mount of Olives across from Jerusalem (Clark 1992). Both were scholars and noted Origenists, and it was to them that the distraught Evagrius came after fleeing Constantinople. In Bethlehem, Jerome and Paula lived next to the Cave of the Nativity, and Jerome undertook his massive project of translating the Bible from its original Hebrew and Greek into Latin (Cain 2009). In each case, the women financed the enterprise and underwrote the literary projects of their male colleagues. Both Rufinus and Jerome translated Greek monastic texts, considerably enriching Latin monastic literature at a crucial time.

The monasticism of the Jordan plain developed in an area attractive to pilgrims eager to visit the famous biblical town of Jericho and to bathe in the waters of the river where Jesus himself was baptized. Indeed, the first mention of monks in Palestine is of hermits at 'Ain Hajla, a spring near the Jordan just north of the Dead Sea. The site was known as Calamon, 'reed-bed', from the vegetation around the spring. This and nearby sites were extensively developed in the fifth and sixth centuries during the principal growth period for Judean monasticism. A modern archaeological survey counted more than 25 sites in the small area (25 km²) between Jericho and the river (Hirschfeld 1992).

The Judean desert south of Jericho is a compact region of stark hills cut by deep canyons. The landscape created more monastic living space than a flat area of comparable size could provide. The canyons provided both natural caves for monastic dwellings and a measure of privacy. Consequently, large numbers of monastic settlements were possible in a narrow strip of land ranging about 60 km from north to south and 20 km from west to east. Archaeologists have identified at least 45 monastic sites tucked away in this rugged terrain, some of considerable size (Hirschfeld 1992). Survival was possible by locating monasteries near springs and/or collecting winter rainfall into cisterns through catchment techniques. The landscape helps to explain one of the ascetic practices characteristic of this tradition, that of Lenten wandering in the desert. Because Lent came at the end of the rainy season, a time of natural provision of both water and of edible plants, one could live off the land in a manner impossible during the rest of the year.

As far as we know, the monasticism of the Judean desert was exclusively male. The major figures associated with its three principal phases all came from Asia Minor on pilgrimage to the holy places and never left. The first of them, Chariton, survived persecution in Lycaonia (southern Asia Minor) and came to Jerusalem in the early fourth century. He staked out a series of monastic settlements from the north to the south of the Judean desert, beginning around 330 at Pharan ('Ain Fara), east of Jericho. A few years later he moved to Douka, above Jericho on the traditional Mount of Temptation, and finally ended up at Souka (Khirbet Khareitun), near Bethlehem. It was Chariton who developed the distinctive form of Judean desert monasticism, a semi-eremitic way of life known as the laura. A laura consisted of a central complex (church, refectory, etc.) and individual monastic cells arrayed at some distance from the centre. The cells were often dotted along a canyon ridge, perhaps explaining the name: one meaning of the Greek word laura is 'lane'. The monks spent the weekdays alone in their cells and assembled at the main complex for Sunday liturgy and a common meal.

The history of the next two phases of Judean desert monasticism is known to us from the extraordinary series of monastic biographies written by Cyril (c. 525–558?), a native of Scythopolis (Beth-Shean) who came to Jerusalem as a monk in the 540s (Flusin 1983; Binns 1994). Cyril lived in monasteries associated with Euthymius (377–473) and Sabas (439–532), whose lives he would write. Both Jerusalem and the desert were highly politicized throughout this period and beyond, and Cyril's accounts of Euthymius and Sabas are dominated by ecclesiastical and doctrinal controversies.

Euthymius was a priest from Armenia who came to Palestine already a monk. He entered the laura at Pharan which had been founded some 70 years earlier by Chariton, and there he met his future colleague Theoctistus, with whom he established the first cenobium in the Judaean desert (Deir Muqallik) around 411. Euthymius established the principle that monks should ordinarily begin their monastic life in a cenobium and then proceed to the laura. The laura he himself founded (Khan al-Ahmar) was converted into a cenobium shortly after his death, a decision credited to Euthymius himself via an apparition. Euthymius was spiritual guide to the Empress Eudokia (d. 460), the great builder of fifth-century Jerusalem, and converted her to the Chalcedonian view of Christology. He also began Christian pastoral outreach to the nomadic Arab tribes of the desert.

Figure 15.8   Wadi Chariton in Palestine; looking north from the site of Souka, the laura of Chariton. The Herodion is in the centre. Photo Columba Stewart OSB

Expansion and development continued throughout the fifth and sixth centuries, particularly under Sabas' leadership, though the monasteries were terribly divided by a rekindling of the Origenist controversy in the sixth century. The Persian invasion of 614, followed in less than 25 years by the conquest of Palestine by the Arab armies, shrank the monastic population and began the process of abandonment of the monastic sites in the desert.

Cappadocian domestic and communal asceticism

Paul the apostle, himself a native of Tarsus on the southern coast of Asia Minor, visited Cappadocia in central Asia Minor (modern-day Turkey) on his third missionary journey. The church in Cappadocia was strongly influenced by Syrian Christianity through Armenia, which lay just to the east. Apocryphal gospels and acts, with their emphasis on asceticism and especially on virginity and celibacy, circulated widely. Ascetic communities were forming in the first half of the fourth century under the guidance of Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste in Armenia. The so-called Macarian Homilies circulated in Cappadocia shortly after their composition in the 370s. Cappadocia was home to three of the greatest theologians of the early Christian world. Two were brothers, Basil, bishop of Caesarea

(c. 330–379) and Gregory, bishop of Nyssa (c. 330–c. 395), and the third, another Gregory, known by his hometown of Nazianzus (329–389), was a close friend. All had received a fine education, were sympathetic to the Alexandrian theological tradition exemplified by Origen, and became major figures in the development of post-Nicene Trinitarian orthodoxy. All three were also inclined toward asceticism, which was a strong theme in Origen's writings and of course increasingly prominent in the fourth century. Basil became involved in the guidance of monastic communities, and Gregory of Nyssa was a mystical and ascetical writer of great depth. Cappadocia was thus a confluence of eastern ascetic currents and Hellenistic theology.

In the family of Basil and Gregory of Nyssa, the women were the ascetic leaders (Elm 1994: 78–105; Rousseau 1994: 61–76; Silvas 2008). Their sister, known as Macrina the Younger, persuaded their mother Emmelia to establish communal ascetic life on a family estate near Caesarea in the late 350s. Macrina had been converted to asceticism sometime earlier when the family still lived in Caesarea, perhaps through acquaintance with texts such as the Acts of Paul and Thecla. Her brother, Naucratius, lived on the estate as a semi-hermit. It was to this home environment that Basil returned after completion of his studies and a brief career in teaching. Newly baptized, Basil resolved to live as an ascetic across the river from the family villa, and there he wrote his first ascetic treatise, the Moral Rules.

Basil was not destined for retirement and soon went back to Caesarea to work for the bishop whom he later succeeded. Meanwhile, the family ascetic community grew under Macrina's leadership, attracting new members and developing along more structured lines. By the time of her death in 380, the domestic asceticism led by family and servants in the 350s had become a monastery for both women and men. The description left to us in Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Macrina, written immediately after her death, shows us Cappadocian monasticism led by women.

The family were not the only influence on Basil's asceticism. After his baptism he visited Syria, Mesopotamia, Palestine and Egypt, though we know little about his tour beyond the fact of it. More significant was his encounter in eastern Asia Minor with Eustathius (c. 300–c. 370). Eustathius was a controversial figure trying to negotiate the tension between the sectarian tendencies of asceticism and the imperative of ecclesial integration. A native of Sebaste in Armenia, where his father was bishop, he studied in Alexandria under the great presbyter and teacher Arius. Consequently he had hesitations about the Council of Nicaea, a fact that would later cause problems with Basil. The ascetic communities organized by Eustathius may have been influenced by the developments in Egypt, but were surely also based on local traditions shaped by Syrian asceticism (Gribomont 1984: 3–116).

Many bishops were troubled by the behaviour of ascetic groups, as we learn from the canons of a council held at Gangra sometime in the 340s or 350s that sought to define correct asceticism. Asceticism was not new, but as it became more prominent and institutionalized, it began to seem a social and financial threat to other ecclesiastical institutions. Eustathius set about toning down ascetic non-conformity, and after his own election as bishop of Sebaste in 357, he worked to reconcile ascetic communities with the institutional church by having them provide charitable services such as a large hospice in Sebaste. This is just what Basil would later do as bishop in Caesarea.

Basil's interest in ecclesiastical order and organization made him sensitive to issues of accountability and nomenclature. His Asketikon (the name was given to various editions of a commentary on basic points of ascetic spirituality and governance) established a teaching role for the bishop and outlined a clear sense of how ascetic communities fit into the life of the larger church (Rousseau 1994: 190–228; Silvas 2005). Basil took pains to minimize distinctions between the Christian and monastic vocations. He avoided specifically monastic terminology, preferring euphemisms like 'the devout life'. The spirituality is explicitly biblical, based on living out the two commandments of love of God and neighbour. The tone and discipline are moderate. As one reads through the first few sections of the Long Rules, the principal component of the Asketikon, Basil's effort to maintain a distinctive identity for the communities while avoiding separatist, sectarian rhetoric is notable even if not always successful. In different editions and sections of the Asketikon the reader sees the evolution of structures and policies; over time, the communities inevitably became increasingly 'monastic' in identity.

The work of Macrina and Basil illustrates how asceticism moved to centre stage in one region of the Christian world. Assessments of this development vary. Some see it as a regrettable co-opting of asceticism by church leaders, while others note the significance of establishing a clear place for monasticism in the larger church. Basil's work has been of great importance for the development of Byzantine monasticism, and Rufinus of Aquileia translated an early edition of the Asketikon into Latin. A copy of that translation found its way into the hands of Benedict of Nursia, who mentions Basil by name in the closing lines of his Rule.

Italian asceticism and monasticism

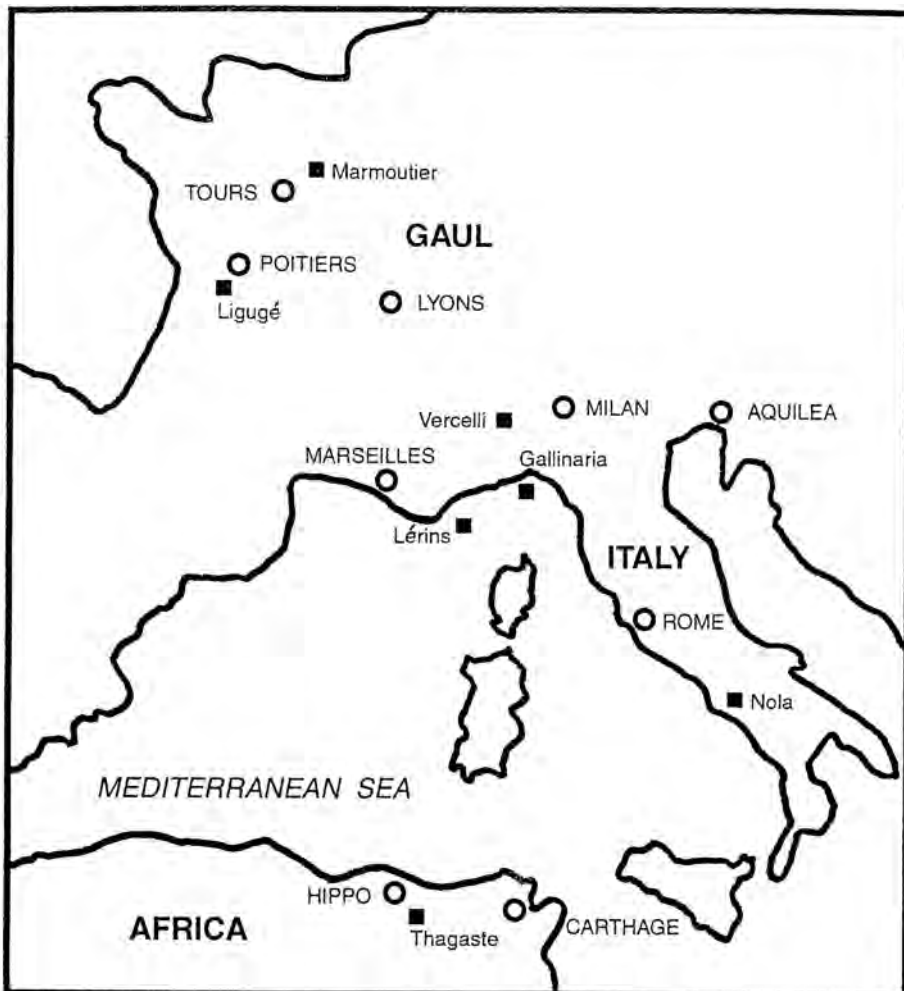
In fourth-century Italy, asceticism was most apparent among propertied widows and the young women they and ascetically minded bishops encouraged to choose a life of consecrated virginity (Jenal 1995). An early adherent to ascetic ideals in the 350s was Marcella, who was inspired by a Latin translation of the Life of Anthony and by her conversations in the 370s with the exiled Nicene bishop of Alexandria, Peter. Paula and Melania were Roman matrons who eventually founded monasteries in Palestine, where their advanced notions of asceticism had a warmer reception than in the more conventional circles of Rome. These were educated women who enjoyed the intellectual and spiritual companionship of like-minded men, to the fascination and distress of their peers.


Figure 15.9 Latin monasticism

Asceticism could be a disruptive social force anywhere it became popular, but the controversy was particularly fierce in Italy. Early in his episcopate in Milan, Ambrose (c. 339–397; bishop 374–397; see Chapter 57 of this volume) urged the young girls of the city to follow inclinations to consecrated virginity even over their parents' objections. His own sister, Marcellina, had taken a formal vow of virginity in Rome some 20 years before, receiving the virgin's veil from the Pope at the Christmas liturgy. Ambrose hoped to introduce such Roman ideas (and the public veiling ceremonies that accompanied them) to Milan, where asceticism previously had a low profile (Brown 1988: 341–65; McLynn 1994: 60–8).

Shortly after Ambrose's campaign began in Milan, Jerome spent a few years in Rome arguing the case for asceticism, and especially virginity. His opponents were people such as Helvidius, an advocate for traditional family life. Jerome's famous Letter 22 to Eustochium (c. 384) was a strident and even inflammatory exhortation to Paula's daughter, encouraging her to stand firm in her resolve to live as virgin and ascetic. Although Jerome managed to trounce Helvidius in argument, his typically caustic and occasionally vicious manner was offensive to many and eroded his popularity. The death of Jerome's patron, Pope Damasus, in late 384, and a rumour campaign about his relationship with Paula, led them to leave Italy the following year for Bethlehem.

Both Ambrose and Jerome related their arguments in favour of virginity to a theological anthropology linking sexuality to the fallen state of humankind (Hunter 2007). They saw sexual renunciation, and especially virginity, as a way to reclaim the intended human condition. Both of them were strong advocates of the doctrine of the perpetual virginity of Mary, mother of Jesus. They extended their argument to include a celibate clergy. The consecrated virgins of Milan and Rome were the forerunners; the ordained men were to follow their example.

The evidence for male asceticism in Italy is less abundant than for the women. Ambrose, however, in a letter to the church of Vercelli (Epistle 63), a town not far from Milan, praised the example of their former bishop, Eusebius (bishop 334–371), who had lived 'like a monk'. Eusebius had spent time in Egypt during a period of exile from 355–363 and doubtless encountered monasticism there. At Vercelli he established a monastery for himself and his clergy. Augustine writes in the Confessions of the monastery of men at Milan under Ambrose's care and of encounters a friend had with ascetics who were reading the Life of Anthony.

The significant figure for Italian monasticism of the early fifth century is Paulinus (355–431), later bishop of Nola. Born in Bordeaux, son of a Roman senator, himself a provincial governor, Paulinus knew Ambrose and met Martin of Tours when he returned to Gaul. He married a wealthy Spanish woman, Theresia, but after the death of their only child in 389 they left Gaul and went to Spain where they soon began to sell off their property and to pursue their shared interest in the ascetic life. After Paulinus was ordained a priest they returned to Italy, settling south of Rome in Nola where they established a monastery for men and women. Probably after the death of Theresia, around 410, he was ordained bishop of Nola. Paulinus' descriptions of their monastic life and archaeological excavation in Nola suggest a monastery in which men lived on one side of the hallway and women on the other, with paintings of holy men and women of the Bible marking the respective sides. There was a church and a guesthouse with three sets of rooms for the wealthy, the poor and the sick. The members of the community wore distinctive dress, with trimmed hair for the men and veils for the women (Lienhard 1977).

The tradition of wealthy Roman female ascetics continued with the richest of them all, Melania the Younger (385–439; Clark 1984). Named for her famous grandmother, she had ascetic leanings but was compelled to marry. After the death of her two children, she persuaded her husband Pinian to live celibately. Leaving Rome, they began to dispose of their massive wealth, a process lovingly chronicled in her Life. After spending some time on their estates in Sicily, they visited Augustine in North Africa and saw monks in Egypt. Along the way, they made a point of meeting famous ascetics and tried to unload their gold wherever they could; one monk threw it in the Nile. They settled in Jerusalem, where Melania built a cell and eventually a monastery on the Mount of Olives where she remained the dominant figure (though not the official superior) until her death.

Gaul: native and imported monastic cultures

Christianity came to Gaul, a region including modern France, the Low Countries and parts of Germany, at least by the early second century CE. At that time there was a persecuted Greek-speaking community of Christian settlers in Lyons that was soon to be led by one of the greatest early theologians, Irenaeus of Lyons (c. 130–200). The story of monasticism in Gaul, however, pertains to the Latin church which developed in the region throughout the third and fourth centuries.

There were two major centres from which monasticism spread, though of course there were ascetic individuals and groups in many areas. We can identify a first wave of monastic influence moving east from Tours in the Aquitaine, inspired by Martin (c. 316–397) and his successors. A second movement spread north from the island monastery of Lérins off the southern coast of Gaul, producing numerous church leaders and a number of monastic rules. At the close of our period, a widely travelled and wise monk named John Cassian (c. 365–c. 430), to whom I will return later, wrote up his monastic experiences in a compendium of traditional teaching and creative analysis that would be of tremendous importance for later western monasticism.

Martin's asceticism was decidedly western. His own teaching, as conveyed by his biographer, Sulpitius Severus (c. 360–c. 430), contains no reference to Egyptian or other eastern Christian models. According to Sulpitius, it was only after Martin's death that members of his circle visited the monasteries of the Orient. Martin was born in Pannonia (modern Austria and Hungary) into a military family and was raised in Italy not far from Milan. Destined from birth to a career in the army, he became a soldier at age 15. He was baptized a few years later, after his famous encounter with a beggar who later appeared to him in a vision as Christ clothed in the cloak Martin had sliced in two and shared. Sulpitius indicates a brief interval between baptism and leaving the army to pursue the ascetic life; history suggests a much longer period, as much as 30 years.

Martin had probably encountered monasticism in northern Italy like that of his older contemporary, Eusebius of Vercelli. It is also possible that in the course of his army service Martin visited monasteries in the east as Eusebius did during a period of exile from 355–363. After leaving the army, he lived in Poitiers with its bishop Hilary until the latter was expelled from his see because of his Nicene views. Martin then went to Milan and lived as a hermit. Expelled by an Arian bishop, Martin lived as a hermit on the island of Gallinaria, off the northwestern Italian coast near Genoa. When it became possible to return to Gaul, Martin settled near Poitiers in a place named Ligugé. Again he lived as a hermit but disciples came and settled around him and he established the kind of monasticism for which he became known: relatively unstructured, semi-eremitic and centred upon a teacher. After being named bishop of Tours in 371, Martin established a similar retreat at Marmoutier. The community that formed there was more structured than at Ligugé, though the basic emphasis on contemplation and obedience to the master was the same. Marmoutier became Martin's base for vigorous missionary work of fighting demons, converting pagans, building churches and monasteries on the sites of pagan shrines, and raising the dead (a point on which Sulpitius compares Martin to Egyptian anchorites and cenobites, to the disadvantage of the latter).

The second major monastic movement in Gaul was in Provence, radiating north from the small, rocky island of Lérins, which is located east of Marseilles. There, Honoratus (d. 430), a Gaul who had visited Palestine and Egypt after his conversion to asceticism, organized the existing anchorites into a cenobium and provided them with a written monastic rule around the year 400 (Pricoco 1978; Vogüé 1982). In doing so, Honoratus established a monastic centre that would have great influence along the Mediterranean coast to the west and north along the Rhone valley. Lérins has been called the cradle of the episcopate for southern Gaul since many of its monks became bishops, fostering monastic foundations in their dioceses.

Honoratus and Sulpitius were contemporaries, but the monasticism of Lérins owed much more to Egyptian models than did Martin's. Both Honoratus' travels and the position of Lérins near trade routes explain the look to the east. The first Lérinian rule (known as the Rule of the Four Fathers from its format as a conversation among four monks) shows Egyptian influence in its strong emphasis on obedience to the superior and a daily fast until the ninth hour, i.e. 3 pm. The horarium allowed for three hours of personal prayer at the beginning of the day followed by work until the meal. The series of Lérinian texts shows the development of the Latin literary genre of the monastic rule (regula), though there is no sense that a rule was an unalterable text: such a notion would arise only in the ninth-century canonization of the Rule of Benedict.

In the early fifth century, during Honoratus' tenure at Lérins, a monk named John Cassian arrived in Marseilles. A native of the bilingual (Latin and Greek) region of Scythia Minor, Cassian became a monk in Bethlehem in the Greek cenobium known to have existed before Jerome established his community. Inspired by tales of monastic Egypt, Cassian and his friend Germanus left their monastery in order to visit communities and individuals in Lower Egypt. They settled at Scetis for several years, leaving Egypt most likely because of the Origenist controversy of 399. After a few years in Constantinople under the patronage of the monk and bishop John Chrysostom, Cassian probably lived in Rome before moving on to Marseilles (then known as Massilia) in the 410s. During the last two decades of his life, he wrote his influential Institutes and Conferences (Stewart 1998; Goodrich 2007).

Cassian's own life is the key to appreciating his contribution to monastic literature. Firmly persuaded of the value of Egyptian monastic spirituality and customs for the emerging monasticism of the west, he summarized his experiences in monasteries of the east and provided a creative synthesis and practical application of particularly Evagrian monastic thought. Cassian claimed to bring the elders of the Egyptian desert to his Latin readership. He admitted to adjusting the Egyptian traditions according to his own idea of what monks in Gaul needed to know, hoping to influence their monastic development along lines quite different from those of Martin and his followers. In that he succeeded, perhaps beyond his dreams, for Benedict of Nursia enshrined Cassian's writings among the texts named in his Rule.

> When all our love, all desire, all effort, all inclination, all thought, all that we live, that we speak, that we breathe, will be God, and that unity which is now the Father's with the Son and the Son's with the Father will be poured into our perception and our mind, so that just as God loves us with a sincere, pure, and indissoluble love, we may be bound to God with perpetual and inseparable love, joined in such a way that whatever we breathe, whatever we know, whatever we speak, would be God.
>
> (John Cassian, Conference 10.7.2)

Augustine

The Christianity of Roman Africa was famous for its emphasis on discipline. Torn since the second century by disputes about ideological and moral purity, the Christian community had strong advocates of asceticism. Tertullian (c. 160–c. 225), the first prominent Latin Christian theologian (see Chapter 48 of this volume), wrote a treatise on virginity and was involved in some manner with the Montanists, a group which combined sexual and dietary asceticism with an emphasis on prophecy (see Chapter 43). Tertullian's adherence to a rigourist view of Christian life was typical of the African church, which suffered fierce persecution and had to decide where to draw the boundaries of the community.

The links between asceticism and other ideological forces are not always clear even though the favourable attitude of the African church toward celibacy, fasting and poverty is manifest. Cyprian (d. 258), the famous bishop of Carthage, followed Tertullian's lead in writing about virginity.

Their dim view of human sexuality was part of the theological legacy later inherited by the young Augustine, an African by birth and education who went to Italy. There he fell under the spell of Ambrose in Milan (see Chapter 57) and first encountered monasticism. The story of Augustine is well known and told elsewhere in this volume (see Chapter 58). It is Augustine the monk and founder of monasteries who concerns us here.

Augustine himself tells us in Book 8 of the Confessions of the impact of hearing from his friend Pontitianus about Anthony the Great and those in Milan who had imitated his example. To Augustine, a sensitive and perhaps overly complex social climber and careerist, Anthony's direct response to God's call was a marvel. The fact that young men like himself had imitated Anthony came as an indictment. Augustine presents this incident as the immediate cause of his final crisis of decision, in which the issue of sexuality figured prominently. For Augustine, baptism meant asceticism. He could postulate the notion that marriage is an honourable Christian choice, but for him baptism meant a total break with everything that had gone before, which for him had included a common-law wife. Augustine's ambivalence toward human sexuality has been the subject of much recent study (e.g. Brown 1988: 387–427). It is important to remember that his theology had antecedents in both Africa and Milan.

Augustine returned to Africa after baptism, styling himself a servus Dei ('servant of God') and intent on establishing a monastic community. He was a deeply social being who needed companionship. It is no surprise that the Praeceptum ('Instruction'), the basic charter for his monastery at Hippo, emphasizes fraternal charity above all else and shows a remarkable sensitivity to the issues which might impede it, such as differences in social class, access to common goods and quarrels. Written about 397, just as Augustine became bishop of Hippo, this text circulated widely and has been used as (or as part of) a monastic rule to the present day (Lawless 1987). It was a major influence on the developing Lérinian tradition in Gaul and also on Benedict of Nursia, who borrowed from Augustine some of the tenderest lines found in his Rule. Augustine, or his immediate circle, also produced a brief set of instructions on monastic liturgical prayer, the Ordo monasterii, and an exhortation to sisterly charity sent to a monastery of women at Hippo (Obiurgatio). Used in combination with a feminine version of the Praeceptum, these made for a female monastic rule (preserved as Augustine's Letter 211). Augustine also addressed a major treatise on the necessity of monastic work to monks of Carthage around the year 400 (De opere monachorum).

In Augustine we see the monk-bishop met previously in Basil the Great. Both were concerned with the internal life of monastic communities and with ecclesiastical good order. Eager to integrate monasticism into the larger church, they were equally aware of the need to call monastic communities to social responsibility. They were harbingers of the Byzantine and Latin medieval ecclesiastical landscapes in which bishops and monastic communities were sometimes rivals, often friends, and always intertwined. The eventual extension of mandatory celibacy to all major clerical orders in the Latin church, and the Byzantine requirement that all bishops be in monastic vows, are but one sign of the influence of monasticism on the life of the church. Monastic women, despite their canonical subjection to male authority, found a freedom and self-direction that was unobtainable in other ways of life. In assessing the legacy of early Christian monasticism, it can simply be noted that for the vast majority of Christians during the last 1,500 years, a church without monasticism would have been unimaginable.

Bibliography

Binns, J. (1994) Ascetics and Ambassadors of Christ: The Monasteries of Palestine, 314–631. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Bitton-Ashkelony, B. and Kofsky, A. (2004) Christian Gaza in Late Antiquity. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Bongie, E. B. (1997) The Life of Blessed Syncletica. Peregrina Translations Series 21. Toronto, ON: Peregrina Publishing Company.

Brakke, D. (1995) Athanasius and the Politics of Asceticism. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Brock, S. P. (1992) The Luminous Eye: The Spiritual World Vision of Saint Ephrem. Cistercian Studies Series 124. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications Inc.

Brown, P. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Burton-Christie, D. (1993) The Word in the Desert: Scripture and the Quest for Holiness in Early Christian Monasticism. New York: Oxford University Press.

Cain, A. (2009) The Letters of Jerome: Asceticism, Biblical Exegesis, and the Construction of Christian Authority in Late Antiquity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Chitty, D. J. (1966) The Desert a City. Oxford, UK: Blackwell. Rpt Crestwood, NJ: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Clark, E. A. (1984) The Life of Melania the Younger: Introduction, Translation, and Commentary. New York: E. Mellen Press.

Clark, E. A. (1986) Ascetic Piety and Women's Faith: Essays on Late Ancient Christianity. Lewiston, NY: E. Mellen Press.

Clark, E. A. (1992) The Origenist Controversy: The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

De Vogüé, A. (1982) Les Règles des saints Pères. Sources chrétiennes. Paris: Cerf, 297–8.

Elm, S. (1994) 'Virgins of God': The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Emmel, S. (2004) Shenoute's Literary Corpus. CSCO 599–600. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters Publishers.

Flusin, B. (1983) Miracle et histoire dans l'oeuvre de Cyrille de Scythopolis. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

Forman, M. (1993) 'Amma Syncletica: A spirituality of experience', Vox Benedictina 10: 199–237.

Goehring, J. E. (1986) 'New frontiers in Pachomian studies', in Pearson, B. A. and Goehring, J. E. (eds) The Roots of Egyptian Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 236–57.

Goehring, J. E. (1992a) 'The origins of Monasticism', in Attridge, H. W. and Hata, G. (eds) Eusebius, Christianity, and Judaism. Leiden, The Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 235–55.

Goehring, J. E. (1992b) 'Through a glass darkly: Diverse images of the Apotaktikoi(ai) of early Egyptian Monasticism', Semeia 58: 25–45.

Goodrich, R. (2007) Contextualizing Cassian: Aristocrats, Asceticism, and Reformation in Fifth-Century Gaul. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Gould, G. (1993) The Desert Fathers on Monastic Community. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Gribomont, J. (1984) Saint Basile: Évangile et Église. Mélanges. Vol. 1. Spiritualité orientale 36. Bégrolles-en-Mauges, France: Abbaye de Bellefontaine.

Griffith, S. H. (1995) 'Asceticism in the church of Syria: The hermeneutics of early Syrian Monasticism', in Wimbush, V. and Valantasis, R. (eds) Asceticism. New York: Oxford University Press, 220–46.

Guillaumont, A. (1962) Les 'Kephalaia gnostica' d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'0rigenisme chez les grecs et chez les Syriens. Patristica Sorbonensia 5. Paris: Editions du Seuil.

Guillaumont, A., Coquin, R.-G., Weidmann, D., Grossman, P., Partyka, J. S. and Rassart-Debergh, M. (1991) 'Kellia'. Coptic Encyclopedia: 1396–410.

Heussi, K. (1936) Der Ursprung des Mönchtums. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr.

Hirschfeld, Y. (1992) The Judean Desert Monasteries in the Byzantine Period. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Hunter, D. G. (2007) Marriage, Celibacy, and Heresy in Ancient Christianity: The Jovinianist Controversy. Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Jenal, G. (1995) Italia ascetica atque monastica: das Asketen- und Monchtum in Italien von den Anfangen bis zur Zeit der Langobarden (ca. 150/250–604). Monographien zur Geschichte des Mittelalters 39. Stuttgart, Germany: A. Hiersemann.

Lawless, G. (1987) Augustine of Hippo and His Monastic Rule. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Layton, B. (2014) The Canons of Our Fathers: Monastic Rules of Shenoute. Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Lienhard, J. (1977) Paulinus of Nola and Early Western Monasticism. Cologne, Germany: P. Hanstein.

McLynn, N. B. (1994) Ambrose of Milan. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Murray, R. (2004) Symbols of Church and Kingdom. Rev. ed. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Neyt, F. and Angelis-Noah, P., De (1997) Barsanuphe et Jean de Gaza: Correspondance I:1. Sources chrétiennes 426. Paris: Cerf.

Peña, I., Castellana, P. and Fernandez, R. (1975) Les Stylites syriens. Studium Biblicum Franciscanum Collectio Minor 16. Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press.

Peña, I., Castellana, P. and Fernandez, R. (1978) Les Reclus syriens. Studium Biblicum Franciscanum Collectio Minor 23. Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press.

Peña, I., Castellana, P. and Fernandez, R. (1983) Les Cenobites syriens. Studium Biblicum Franciscanum Collectio Minor 28. Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press.

Plested, M. (2004) The Macarian Legacy: The Place of Macarius-Symeon in the Eastern Christian Tradition. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Pricoco, S. (1978) L'isola dei santi: Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico. Rome: Edizioni dell'Ateneo/Bizzarri.

Rousseau, P. (1994) Basil of Caesarea. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Rubenson, S. (1995) The Letters of St. Antony: Monasticism and the Making of a Saint. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Schroeder, C. T. (2007) Monastic Bodies: Discipline and Salvation in Shenoute of Atripe. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Silvas, A. (2005) The Asketikon of St Basil the Great. Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Silvas, A. (2008) Macrina the Younger, Philosopher of God. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Staats, R. (1984) Makarios-Symeon: Epistola Magna. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Stewart, C. (1991) Working the Earth of the Heart: The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts and Language to A.D. 431. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Stewart, C. (1996) 'Asceticism and spirituality in late antiquity: New vision, impasse or hiatus?', Christian Spirituality Bulletin 4(1): 11–15; reprinted American Benedictine Review 48: 254–65.

Stewart, C. (1997) 'Reimagining early monastic spirituality', Christian Spirituality Bulletin 5(1): 22–5.

Stewart, C. (1998) Cassian the Monk. New York: Oxford University Press.

Stewart, C. (2001) 'Imageless prayer and the theological vision of Evagrius Ponticus', Journal of Early Christian Studies 9: 173–204.

Stewart, C. (2005) 'Evagrius Ponticus and the "Eight Generic Logismoi"', in Newhauser, R. (ed.) In the Garden of Evil: The Vices and Culture in the Middle Ages. Toronto, ON: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 3–34.

Stewart, C. (2013) 'The ascetic taxonomy of Antioch and Edessa at the emergence of Monasticism', Adamantius 19: 207–21.

Stewart, C. (2014) 'Rethinking the history of Monasticism east and west: A modest tour d'horizon', in Bhattacharji, S., Williams, R. and Mattos, D. (eds) Prayer and Thought in Monastic Tradition: Essays in Honour of Benedicta Ward, SLG. London: Bloomsbury T&T Clark.

Veilleux, A. (1980) Pachomian Koinonia I: The Life of Saint Pachomius. Cistercian Studies Series 45. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications Inc.

Veilleux, A. (1986) 'Monasticism and gnosis in Egypt', in Pearson, B. A. and Goehring, J. E. (eds) The Roots of Egyptian Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 271–306.

Wimbush, V. and Valantasis, R. (1995) Asceticism. New York: Oxford University Press.

PART IV

Everyday Christian experience

Taylor & Francis
Taylor & Francis Group
http://taylorandfrancis.com

16

READING THE NEW TESTAMENT IN ROMAN BRITAIN

Richard Cleaves

On 8 January 57 CE, Tibullus wrote in his own hand a promise to pay Gratus, a fellow freedman, the outstanding debt on merchandise sold. The waxed wooden tablet on which the note was written was discarded only to be discovered in excavations in the heart of the city of London and published in June 2016. This and the 406 other Bloomberg tablets contain the earliest pieces of writing to be discovered in Roman Britain. They 'introduce us to some of the first inhabitants of this new city . . . a diverse mix of businessmen, slaves and freedmen, with Celtic and Roman names, and soldiers from Gaul and the Rhineland' (Tomlin 2016: xv). For the first time we can hear in Britain the voices of people who were alive at the time Paul and his companions were travelling the New Testament world.

One of the biggest problems faced by anyone reading the New Testament today is that its world is quite different from our own and so we miss much that the first writers assumed their readers would be aware of. We are not attuned to the nuances of a highly stratified culture based on honour and shame, and patron–client relations, on kinship and slavery, and so on. Much has been done to open up the world of the New Testament.[1] While attention has been focused on the Eastern Mediterranean, it has not been limited to the lands of the Bible. It is possible 'to understand Paul's world not so much by going where he actually was as by going where, in the vagaries of time and place, his world is still preserved most fully and can still be seen most clearly' (Crossan and Reed 2009: 317).

That is what prompted Peter Oakes to read Romans in Pompeii (Oakes 2009) and Philip Esler to read Matthew 8:5–13 beside the Dead Sea (Esler 2014). Oakes does not claim that Romans was actually read in Pompeii: instead he suggests that the people of Pompeii were just like the people named in Romans 16. What was important for him was 'not so much the details of the Pompeian evidence. It was the experiencing of Pompeii' (Oakes 2009: xi). Neither does Esler claim that Matthew 8:5–13 was actually read beside the Dead Sea: instead, he claims that:

> The archive of the Judean woman Babatha, with its 35 legal papyri in Aramaic and Greek (P.Yadin 1–35), which was hidden by her in a cave on the western side of the Dead Sea in 135 and rediscovered in 1961, offers unique insights into the social world of the region from 94–132.
>
> (Esler 2014: 1)

That is what prompted him to conduct 'a thought experiment' imagining how a group of people beside the Dead Sea at that time might have read Matthew's gospel.

Might it not be possible to imagine how people from beyond the Mediterranean world might have read the New Testament? After all, since 2005 there have been moves to make the frontiers of the Roman empire 'a single transnational world heritage site' in the spirit of second–century CE Aelius Aristides who spoke of them 'enclosing the civilised world in a ring' (Breeze 2013: 8, 14). The world of the New Testament and the world of Roman Britain are enclosed within that ring: from Corinth to Colchester, people shared elements of a common culture (see Figure 16.1).

The story of Roman Britain begins with Julius Caesar's two failed invasions of 55 and 54 BCE, followed by a century of trade and commerce.[2] Ever closer links with client kingdoms among the Celtic peoples of southern Britain were nurtured by visits of key figures to Rome. In a sense the story of the New Testament world begins at the same time as Herod Antipater comes to power under Julius Caesar and the Herodian dynasty is subsequently established by Herod the Great and his sons, all of whom spent time in Rome. Theirs was a client kingdom nurtured in Rome, built on trade and commerce and great building projects. They thought nothing of dedicating temples to Augustus and the cult of the emperor even as they rebuilt the Jewish temple in Jerusalem as one of the great wonders of the world.

Figure 16.1   Reading a scroll looked the same in Corinth and Colchester: terracotta figurine, 50s or early 60s CE from the child's grave, Colchester, England. By permission of Colchester and Ipswich Museums

The Roman conquest of Britain began with the invasion of Claudius in 43 CE and was led by Vespasian, a young commander who made his name in the conquest. By the death of Claudius in 54, new towns had sprung up and his capital, Colchester, had been designated as a colonia, complete with a monumental temple in the classical style dedicated to Claudius and the cult of the emperor. It was the very same network of roads that now connected those new cities with the coast and so with Rome that enabled the Church to grow so rapidly at the other end of the empire. By the time Tibullus wrote to Gratus, there had been a lull in campaigning in Britain and Paul's travels were almost over: they had taken him repeatedly through Pisidian Antioch, a colonia which might have been the model for Colchester and had drawn him to Corinth. Writing his letter to the Romans, he outlined his plans to press on through Rome to the western frontier of the empire in Spain. It was not to be and later that year Paul was held under arrest in Caesarea where he faced questioning from among others Agrippa II, great grandson of Herod the Great. By the time he was detained in Rome and writing his letters from prison to the Colossians (if the letter is authentically Pauline) and Philemon, something momentous happened in Britain.

Prasutagus, client king of the Iceni people had died and been succeeded by his daughter Boudica. The Romans took the opportunity to integrate the kingdom into the province under Nero in a move not unlike the rejection of Archelaus in 6 CE and the imposition of direct rule on Judea and Samaria. Boudica was brutally attacked and her daughters raped. Paullinus, the Roman governor had pushed north and west through Wales to take the druidical stronghold of Mona (Ynys Môn, Anglesey). Boudica led her people in rebellion against Rome (c. 60/61 CE) taking the new towns of Colchester, St Albans and London and razed them to the ground. The legions quickly marched south, Boudica was defeated, 70,000 Celtic people were killed and very quickly the towns were rebuilt. The infrastructure restored, Rome's hold over Britain was stronger than ever.

There was unrest on the eastern frontier too as the Jewish rebellion gained ground. In 66 CE, Agrippa II addressed the people of Jerusalem and urged them to heed the lessons of the Boudica revolt:

> Consider the defences of the Britons, you who feel so sure of the defences of Jerusalem. They are surrounded by the Ocean and inhabit an island as big as the land which we inhabit; yet the Romans crossed the sea and enslaved them, and four legions keep that huge island quiet.
>
> (Josephus, Jewish War 2.378;
> ET Williamson and Smallwood 1981: 160)

The rebels did not heed his warning and took control of Jerusalem. Nero turned to the commander who had made his mark with the II Legio Augusta in Britain and Vespasian led the legions south from Syria to capture Jerusalem. Civil war broke out in Rome, however, prompting Vespasian to return. With the support of the British legions and many others, he became emperor in 69. His son Titus took Jerusalem and by 74 had routed the last of the rebels at Masada.

One of Vespasian's first priorities in Britain was to complete the conquest, and so with Agricola as governor from 77–84, the frontier was pushed to the western coast of mainland Britain and north into Scotland. Under Titus (79–81), Domitian (81–96), Nerva (96–98) and Trajan (98–117), the pacification of Britain was completed and Pax Romana achieved. It was also a period of peace in the lands of the Bible, though the manner of that pacification meant that relationships between the followers of the Way of Jesus and the Roman authorities were not always easy. This was the period when the Gospels, Acts and Revelation came to be written and the letters began to be collected and circulated more widely. The visit of Hadrian (reigned 117–138) to the eastern provinces (129–131) and his decision to rebuild Jerusalem as the Roman city Aelia Capitolina and erect a temple to Jupiter on the site of the Jewish temple, provoked a second Jewish revolt under Bar Kokhba (132–135), which Hadrian brutally put down. Documents in Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek and Latin found in caves beside the Dead Sea are poignant reminders of the everyday life of ordinary people like the widow Babatha before the rebellion. Troubles in Britain had prompted a visit by Hadrian in 122 when construction started on Hadrian's Wall. His finest general, Iulius Severus, was posted to Britain c. 130 to quell further rebellion only to be transferred to Judea in 132 to put an end to the Bar Kokhba revolt.

The late date and scant manuscript evidence for the works of Tacitus, Agricola (98), the Histories (109) and the Annals (117); Suetonius' Lives of the Caesars (c. 119–122); and Cassius Dio's the History of Rome (c. 150–235) on which all narrative history of Roman Britain depends, contrasts markedly with the comparatively early date and prolific manuscript evidence for the books of the New Testament (c. 48 to c. 100). Recent claims that the Gospels are authentic 'lives' from the ancient world stem from a detailed comparison of Tacitus' biography of his father-in-law, Agricola, with its focus on the seven years he was governor of Britain and the Gospels with their focus on the three last years of Jesus of Nazareth (Burridge 2004: ch. 7; Carter 2008: 133–41). The different perspectives and strong views of the three Roman historians colour their account of Roman Britain and have to be taken into account as modern historians draw on evidence from archaeological research, stone inscriptions, coinage and three sets of handwritten waxed, pen-and-ink and lead tablets. Likewise, the different perspectives and strong views of the writers of the New Testament colour their account of the New Testament world and have to be taken into account as modern historians draw on evidence from archaeological research, stone inscriptions, coinage and a mass of handwritten papyri. They are, however, at an advantage in that the Jewish and Gentile peoples of the New Testament world were literate and left a large body of work the context of which can be illuminated from classical literature and contemporary documents such as the Dead Sea Scrolls and the works of the Jewish Roman historian Josephus.

The debate among historians of Roman Britain over the impact of the empire is mirrored among historians of the New Testament world. Peter Salway speaks of 'Romanisation' and 'the assimilation of Britain' wherein 'anyone, or almost anyone, could absorb Roman culture and manners' (Salway 1981: 505). In contrast, David Mattingly speaks of replacing 'the simplistic paradigm of Romanisation with the idea of "discrepant experiences" of empire' (Mattingly 2007: 491) and regards Roman Britain as an Imperial Possession. Just as 'opinion on the balance-sheet of Roman rule in Britain is sometimes polarised between those who extol the empire and the social and cultural benefits it brought and those who want to denigrate it', so too a similar tension is found among historians of the New Testament world. Some[3] would recognise his post-colonial reading of Roman Britain in the world of the New Testament where 'the power dynamics of imperial rule are dramatically unequal and the globalising influence of the coloniser should not be underestimated' (2007: 525). Others take a more nuanced approach.[4]

Mattingly's conclusion can be echoed in the study of the New Testament world. 'The discrepant identities' of those who live in Britain under Roman occupation 'reflect a broad range of responses to Rome, from close integration to resistance, without privileging any one over the others' (2007: 525). The New Testament is witness to the 'discrepant identities' of the first Christians and their 'discrepant experiences' of the Roman Empire. As James D. G. Dunn says in his enquiry into the character of earliest Christianity, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament:

> Diversity is not some secondary feature of Christianity, not just a sequence of temporal husks which can be peeled away to leave a virgin, pure, unchanging core. Diversity is fundamental to Christianity. As fundamental as the unity and the tension. Christianity can only exist in concrete expressions and these concrete expressions are inescapably different from each other.
>
> (Dunn 2006: 451f.)

Josephus identifies the different responses of Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes and also speaks of the 'fourth philosophy' of the zealots (Josephus 1981: 133). Indeed, as John Barclay says in his study of Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora, there has in recent years been 'an emphasis on plurality' that speaks of Judaisms rather than Judaism in studies of the second temple period and the period of the New Testament (Barclay 1996: 4).

As one visits archaeological sites throughout Roman Britain (Wilson 2002), aspects of the world of the New Testament come to life: the palace of a client king in Fishbourne; everyday life in a small town with its line of shops, a courtyard house, a forum and a temple at Caerwent; stratification of Roman society in the villa at Chedworth; the colonia of Colchester, so like Pisidian Antioch with its temple to Claudius, colonnaded arcade and a monumental gateway with perhaps an account of Claudius's achievements in the conquest of Britain; the temple to Sulis Minerva in Bath, with its many altars and inscriptions, worthy of Rome itself; inscriptions to deified emperors, milestones on a network of roads still in use and all leading to Rome. The world of Roman Britain is the world of the New Testament.

It is, however, in the rough and ready handwriting of letters, financial and legal documents, shopping lists, curses and even prayers that one touches the lives of real people just like the people who were the very first readers of the Bible. It is not so much the details of the evidence they present, interesting though they are. It is in the experiencing of the people whose writings are so remarkably well preserved that one glimpses 'the affinities which imposed themselves on the inward eye of the biblical writers' (Caird 1980: 145).

Reading the New Testament in Roman London: the Bloomberg tablets[5]

A total of 405 waxed stylus writing tablets, together with 2 stylus tags and 2 ink writing tablets were discovered during excavations carried out by the Museum of London Archaeology on the site of the new European headquarters for Bloomberg LP between 2010 and 2014. Fifteen are more or less complete, 80 carry legible traces of text and 185 are catalogued in Roman London's First Voices – Writing Tablets from the Bloomberg Excavations, 2010–14 (Tomlin 2016). Many of the tablets were written in and around the market square that was later to become London's forum, discarded and then used as landfill beside the Walbrook stream, a tributary of the Thames. Some were found in a room that could well have served as an office.

The great majority of the tablets are plain on one side and have a recess for beeswax on the other. They are manufactured locally to an empire-wide standard design using non-native silver fir probably recycled from imported casks. With a landscape orientation, they are on average 140mm wide and 110mm high. Most would have been fastened together in pairs with twine threaded through two holes, with the writing on the recessed wax face inside. A notch between the holes was used to tie the two tablets together and so keep the content concealed (see Figure 16.2). Some were tied together in threes. A small number conform to a second standard type: both internal faces are recessed but one is divided into two panels by a groove 24mm wide. Twine used would go down the middle of the groove and be secured by seals between a name on the left and an identifier on the right. <WT (i.e. 'Wooden Tablet') 62> dating to 80–90/5 has the names of Longinus, Agrippa and Verecundus to the left and the cavalry troop they belonged to on the right – those names are to be found among 'the imperial mounted guards who were seconded from cavalry units in the provincial armies' (Tomlin 2016: 200), echoing links between Rome and Caesarea in Acts 10:1 and 23:23. A similar earlier tablet, <WT65> (see Figure 16.3) includes among the witnesses one Paullus, which is a reminder that Paul was a common Roman name. Usually with seven signatures and seals, the anticipation of the breaking of the seventh seal in Revelation 6–8:1, albeit on a scroll, and the disclosure of the content would be an experience recognised by Paullus, Marius, Saccus, Verecundus and the other signatories.

The tablets were written using a stylus, a number of which were found at the Bloomberg site. On the plain outer face the address and the addressee were inscribed direct on to the wood: three include the earliest references to the name London, <WT6, 18, 24> coupled with the recipient, a letter writing convention seen in the New Testament. The wax has been lost, but the stylus penetrated through to the wood leaving traces that are in many cases legible. Wax tablets were designed to be reused and many have been. The writing on the tablets is quite different from writing found on stone inscriptions and to the untrained eye appears very strange. It is, however, the ordinary everyday writing of the old Roman script found with some differences in the Vindolanda tablets, in the so-called curse tablets and on papyri around the Mediterranean world in the first two centuries CE. Twelve come from the period before the Boudican revolt (60/1) and so are the first pieces of writing in Roman Britain to be contemporary with the New Testament, most of the remainder are pre-80. Of the legible tablets, 50 mm
Figure 16.2   Schematic reconstruction of a diptych – a pair of standard type wooden writing tablets hinged together (after Seidel 1996: 23, figure 8, adapted for the Bloomberg tablets). Photograph by Andy Chopping. ©Museum of London Archaeology

Figures 16.3a and b Photo and sketch of stylus tablet <WT65> (grooved face), witnesses . . . Marius (perhaps Marus) . . . Paullus . . . Saccus . . . Verecundus. 137.5mm × 114.6mm. Photograph by Andy Chopping. Transcription by R. S. O. Tomlin ©Museum of London Archaeology <WT1–43> are letters or parts of letters. <WT44–68> are financial or legal documents. <WT69–76> are accounts. <WT77–90> are a miscellany including what appear to be number and letter writing exercises. Ninety-two persons are named: slaves and freedmen, citizens and non-citizens, military and civilian, householders and tradesmen, including a number with Celtic names who may have been expatriates from other Celtic-speaking provinces. Reading these tablets, we touch the lives of ordinary people very much like those who first read the New Testament and notice aspects of the New Testament world we might otherwise miss.

On 8 January 57, at approximately the time Paul was probably in Corinth, writing to the Romans telling them of his intention to visit Rome and travel on to the western extremity of the empire in Spain, Tibullus, a freedman, wrote to another freedman, Gratus, using dating conventions familiar to readers of Luke and Acts:

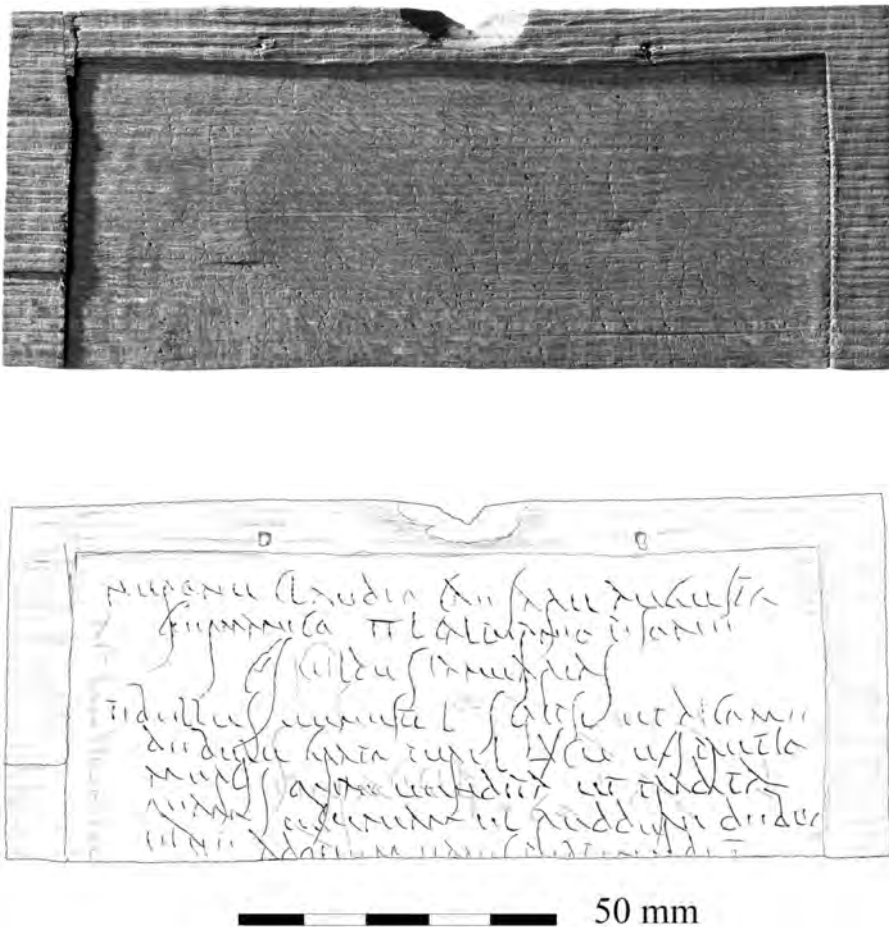
> In the consulship of Nero Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus for the second time and of Lucius Calpurnius Piso, on the 6th day before the Ides of January [8 January 57 CE]. I, Tibullus the freedman of Venustus, have written and say that I owe Gratus the freedman of Spurius 105 denarii from the price of the merchandise which has been sold and delivered. This money I am due to repay him or the person whom the matter will concern <WT44> (see Figure 16.4a and 16.4b).

Tibullus writes in his own hand using a formulaic convention found in <WT53> and elsewhere, 'I have written and say that I owe' (scripsi et dico me | debere). Tomlin suggests that Tibullus and Gratus, 'the two freedmen may have been independent businessmen, but it is quite likely that they were acting as agents or partners of their patrons (and former masters)', Venustus, a non-citizen, and Spurius, a citizen of Rome. Tibullus acknowledges his debt to Gratus for part of the price of 'merchandise' (mercis) which has been 'sold and passed on' (uendita et tradita) set at 105 denarii. Not only does Tibullus say of the money owed, 'I am due to repay him' ei reddere debeo but he also recognises that the debt might have been sold on.

Within fourteen years after the invasion of Britain, the Romans have not only built a town at this key crossing of the Thames, but they have also introduced an infrastructure based on trade and commerce sustained by money, debt and promissory notes, a culture based on honour and patronage that is typical of the whole of the Roman empire. As Tacitus observed, it had already become 'an important centre for business-men and merchandise' (Annals xiv.33).

The denarii referred to here are the denarii of the New Testament. Richard Reece calculates the value of a denarius found in Britain with reference to Matt. 20:1–2, where in Jesus' parable a day's wage is said to be one denarius (Reece 2002: ch. 5), approximately £60 on the basis of the value of the official UK living wage in 2016. Tibullus and Gratus are involved in big business with a debt of approximately £6,300 at today's value. What might the merchandise be? Although from the fourth and fifth century, the Vulgate is useful in indicating how the Greek of the New Testament might have been understood in the Latin world. The word used for merchandise, merx, mercis is used in Rev. 18:11 of the merchants (negotiatores) of the world when their merchandise is no longer purchased – the merchandise envisaged in Rev. 18:12f. gives an interesting insight into what Tibullus and Gratus might possibly have been dealing in. Merchandise:

> of gold, silver, jewels and pearls, fine linen, purple, silk and scarlet, all kinds of scented wood, all articles of ivory, all articles of costly wood, bronze, iron, and marble, cinnamon, spice, incense, myrrh, frankincense, wine, olive oil, choice flour and wheat, cattle and sheep, horses and chariots, slaves and human lives.

Optatus is another merchant who possibly deals in foodstuffs <WT7>. It is to such merchants as the ones we meet in London that Jesus likens the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13:45).


Figures 16.4a and b   Photo and sketch of the inner face of stylus tablet <WT44> written by one Tibullus, the freedman of Venustus to Gratus, the freedman of Spurius promising to pay 105 denarii. 137.3mm × 56.2mm. Photograph by Andy Chopping. ©Museum of London Archaeology

To read <WT44> is to get to know Philemon and Onesimus. The opening of Paul's letter to Philemon is like so many of the London letters <WT1–43>: the name 'Paul' is qualified by an identifier that indicates he is 'a prisoner' quite possibly in Rome c. 60/61; it is followed by the name of the addressee, Philemon. It is clear from the letter that Philemon is a slave-owning householder, perhaps like Catullus of <WT14> whose house is opposite Junius, the cooper. Paul, Aquila and Priscilla were also known by their trade as tentmakers (Acts 18:2). One of Philemon's slaves, Onesimus, has run away to Rome where he has been an immense help to Paul who now asks Philemon to take him back into his household. Paul assumes Philemon to be a man of honour and acknowledges that he could command Philemon 'to do his duty'. Tibullus and Gratus are freedmen and yet they still work for their former masters, Venustus and Spurius, as agents under their patronage. For Philemon to 'do his duty', it would be possible for him to take Onesimus back into his household no longer as a slave but as a freedman under his patronage. In matters of ownership, whether of goods, slaves or money, honour is all important. A debt-based economy depends on the honour of all concerned. Tibullus assumes Gratus will regard him as a man of honour and likewise 'the person whom the matter will concern', a possible future assignee of the debt. That phrase occurs in two other tablets.

<WT55> dates to the time Paul was probably writing to Philemon: 60/1–62. It is a financial document to do with a loan that is to be repaid with interest, one of those points of tension between the Roman and Jewish worlds:

> and the principal and the interest on them which he shall have owed . . . to be properly managed in good (coin) whenever he shall have requested . . .
> To Narcissus (the slave) of Rogatus the Lingonian, Atticus . . . has properly, truly, faithfully promised (it is) to be given, to Ingenuus . . . or to him to whom the matter will pertain. And in the presence of those who have been written in (their own) hand above, Atticus has said that he owes and holds and has received before this day . . . <WT55>.

The language of honour figures large: the arrangement will be 'properly managed in good (coin)' as Atticus, the debtor, 'has properly, truly, faithfully promised' Ingenuus and whoever the loan has been sold on to, ad quem ea res pertinebit. The Latin translation of Philemon 8, rendered by the NRSV as 'to command you to do your duty' uses this same phrase: imperandi tibi quod ad rem pertinet. Honour marks the relationship between Narcissus and Atticus and between Tibullus and Gratus. Honour and patronage mark the relationship between Tibullus and his one-time master Venustus. Tomlin notes that Narcissus, although clearly a slave, might also be acting as agent for his master, Rogatus. One of the financial documents is a receipt, dating to 64 CE when 'Florentinus, the slave of Sextus Cassius [. . .]tus' writes in his own hand, 'by order of his master that he has received the two payments from the . . . farm . . . ' <WT50>. It begs the question whether the dependence of the new town on the surrounding countryside is equitable, a question that is also raised in Galilee (Neyrey and Stewart 2008: chs. 7, 8). It is not only literacy that extends to slaves but also the honour involved in making legally binding agreements. Is this the relationship based on honour that Paul envisages between slave and master in Col 3:22–4:1 on the basis of which Philemon is to do his duty?

Such words from Paul are necessary because an honour code can be broken. One of the earliest of the tablets <WT30> dating between 43 and 53 is addressed to someone called Titus who is in danger of getting a bad name for himself precisely because he has broken the honour code. The address is written on the plain face, 'You will give (this) to Titus . . . ' and the seven lines are on what remains of the recessed side:

> because they are boasting through the whole market that you have lent them money. Therefore I ask you in your own interest not to appear shabby (turpis) . . . you will not thus favour your own affairs . . . <WT30>.

A more telling translation of turpis would be 'shameful' or 'dishonourable'. It is the word used in the Latin translation of Daniel 13:63 (Sus. 1:63) when Susanna 'was found innocent of a shameful deed' (non esset inventa in ea res turpis) and frequently in the New Testament to speak of shameful behaviour and the misuse of money. The way Titus has lent money is in danger of bringing shame and dishonour to his name. By a curious coincidence, one use of the word in the New Testament is in the letter addressed to another Titus. When Paul warns of 'deceivers' who are 'upsetting whole families by teaching for sordid gain' (turpis lucri gratia) he may have in mind those who, like London's Titus, extort money for gain in a way that is dishonourable or shameful and so in William Tyndale's translation of the word turn it into 'filthy lucre' (Titus 1:11; cf. 1 Tim 3:8, Titus 1:7, 1 Peter 5:2).

In his letter to Philemon, Paul could have commanded Philemon simply to do his duty in accord with this honour code. Paul, however, goes further suggesting that Philemon should welcome Onesimus back as 'more than a slave, a beloved brother' (16). For as he says in Col. 3:1 and 11, the message of Jesus becomes good news for people like Tibullus and Gratus and Narcissus and Atticus and Titus because it involves being 'raised with Christ' to a new order where 'there is no longer Greek and Jew, circumcised and uncircumcised, barbarian, Scythian, slave and free; but Christ is all and in all'.

It is at this point in his letter to Philemon that Paul realises that what he asks has big implications for Philemon. Paul recognises the possible financial implications of what Onesimus has done and so Paul makes a commitment to settle any outstanding debt. Paul uses language we encounter in <WT44> and elsewhere in the Bloomberg tablets. 'If he owes you anything', says Paul, 'charge that to my account'. Any debt owed by Onesimus can be assigned, passed on, as it were, to Paul who shows that it is perfectly proper to have things on account. To seal the commitment, he uses the very same formulaic words we encounter in <WT44 and 55> and elsewhere. 'I, Paul, have written this with my own hand: I will repay it' ego Paulus scripsi mea manu ego reddam (Phil. 19).

Of the 80 legible tablets, no fewer than 25 are loan-notes or have to do with the management of debt and payment by account (Tomlin 2016: 57). This is the world Paul knows: 'Pay to all what is due them – taxes to whom taxes are due, revenue to whom revenue is due, respect to whom respect is due, honour to whom honour is due' (Rom. 13:7). It was, however, a world where debt could be pernicious. Jesus envisaged a different order in the prayer he taught his disciples: 'forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors' (Matt. 6:12). One of Jesus' larger-than-life parables is rooted in this world of commerce and debt. One slave owes another slave 100 denarii, virtually the sum Tibullus owed Gratus and therefore a true-to-life amount. If a talent is equivalent to 6,000 denarii, the other slave owes the king the princely sum of £60,000,000. It is the sheer unimaginable scale of the sum forgiven by the king and the ordinariness of the sum that slave is not prepared to forgive that give the story its force as Jesus maps out a new order based on the forgiveness of debt (Matt. 18:23–35).

In other letters, Paul writes in his own hand to emphasise the importance of personal greetings (1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; Col. 4:18; 2 Thes. 3:17). In Philemon he is doing more than that: by writing in his own hand he is stating emphatically that he will honour the debt he owes. On another occasion, Marcus Salvius uses a particularly strong word that, as it is a transliteration from the Greek, undoubtedly comes from the Eastern Mediterranean to emphasise such a commitment:

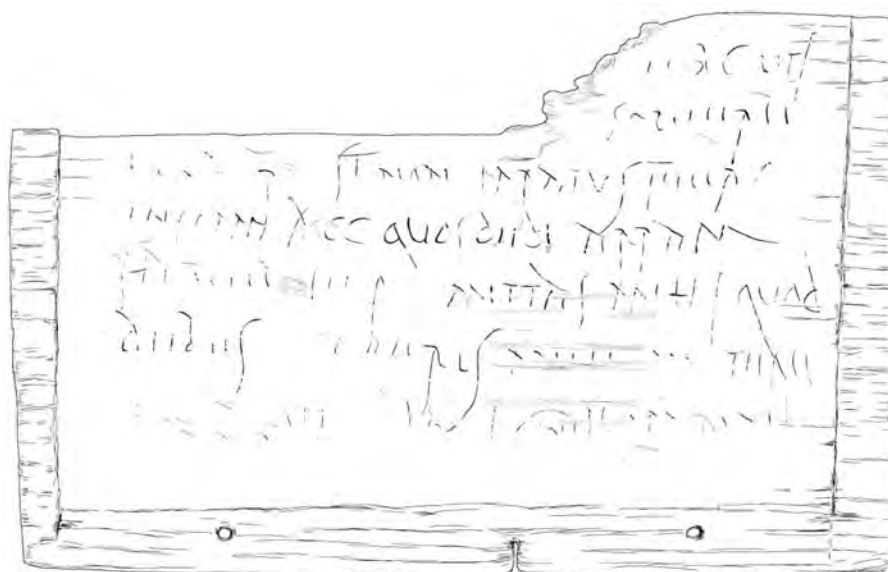
> To Vialicus, the freedman of Secundio, greetings. Would you receive the note of hand of the slave of ?Marcus Salvius M[. . .] <WT27>.

The Greek term, translated here 'note of hand' is the word c<h>irographum and refers to a document acknowledging debt or promising payment. It is used by Paul in Col. 2:14 as an illustration to bring home to his readers the transformation brought by Jesus on the cross. The 'note of hand' in which we accept responsibility for all that we owe is nailed to the cross as we are forgiven:

> And when you were dead in trespasses and the uncircumcision of your flesh, God made you alive together with him, when he forgave us all our trespasses, erasing the record that stood against us with its legal demands. He set this aside, nailing it to the cross.

Many of the writing tablets show evidence of being used repeatedly. It is the nature of the wax tablet that the writing can be erased. It is the very nature of a wooden tablet that it can then be 'nailed to the cross'. Set in the context of the personal letter to Philemon and the letter to the church that meets in his house, these words are vibrant with meaning that Marcus Silvius, Tibullus and so many others from the London of that time would immediately recognise, meaning that is largely lost to us.

Large sums of money are involved in many of the transactions taking place in London in this period. There is a note of urgency in what remains of <WT35> (65/70–80):

> . . . to pay . . . ?he was not surprised to watch over . . . for it 200 denarii which I have given (as) deposit . . . would you send me what you owe . . . you will . . . <WT35> (see Figure 16.5).


Figures 16.5a and b Stylus tablet <WT35> (ungrooved face), requesting money owed. 140.7mm × 90.3mm. Photograph by Andy Chopping. Transcription by R. S. O. Tomlin. ©Museum of London Archaeology

Honour makes it possible to put down the significant sum of £12,000 as a deposit. The word trans-lated 'deposit' is the feminine word arra, alternatively spelt arrha and arrhabo (see Figure 16.5, line 4, last word). According to Lewis and Short, it is based on the word 'ērabon that they suggest comes from the Hebrew (Lewis and Short 1879: 165). Yet it is much more likely to come from the closely related language of Phoenician, as used by Punic traders around the Mediterranean, and refers to money given as part of the purchase money to ratify a contract. The Greeks adopted 'ērabon virtually unchanged as arrabōn, while the Romans adopted either the Phoenician or Greek word as arrhabo, as well as producing the shortened forms of arrha and arra. Pliny used arra ironically when speaking of the money given to physicians as a down payment in anticipation of death (Pliny 29.1.8 § 21).

An even greater sum is involved in a transaction recorded in a letter from Vindolanda: Octavius has bought a considerable amount of grain and so is in need of cash. There is a note of desperation in what he writes to Candidus (here we again find the word arra):

> Unless you send me some cash, at least five hundred denarii (c. £30,000), the result will be that I shall lose what I have laid out as a deposit (arre), about three hundred denarii, (£18,000) and I shall be embarrassed. So, I ask you, send me some cash as soon as possible.
>
> (Tab. Vindol. 343)

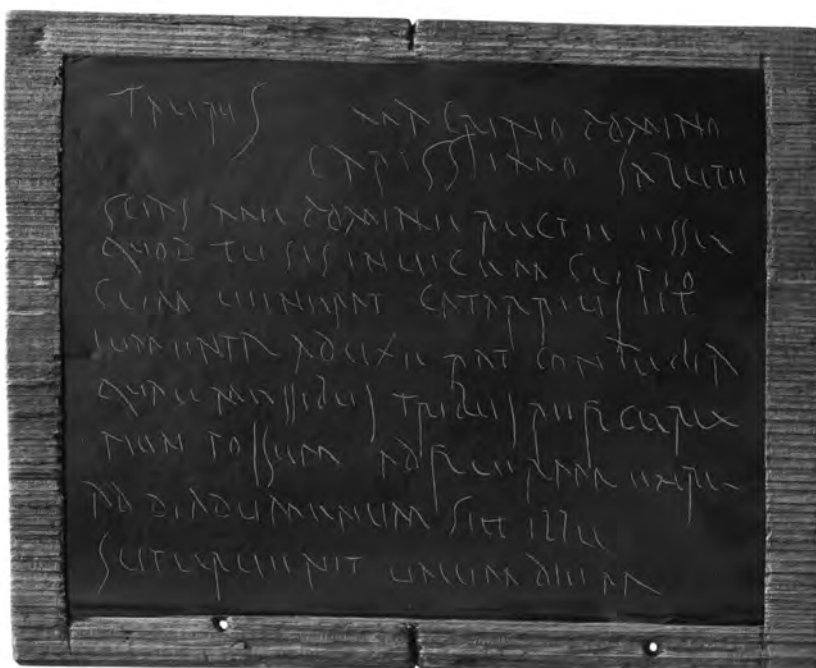
Accordingly, as early as the 60s or 70s in London and the end of the century in Vindolanda, the term arra is being used in financial dealings in the way it is later described by Gaius in his commentary on the Institutes of Civil Law: 'what is given by way of earnest money is only a proof of the conclusion


Figure 16.6 Stylus tablet <WT29> as it may have originally appeared; traces of earlier (and/or corrected) text have been removed and lost text conjecturally reconstructed. 139.4mm × 113.7mm. Photographic reconstruction by Andy Chopping. Text by R. S. O. Tomlin. ©Museum of London Archaeology of a contract of purchase and a sale' (Gaius 3:139). Similarly, the Greek version, arrabōn, is used three times by Paul in 2 Corinthians 1:22, 5:5 and Ephesians 1:13b–14. It is the Holy Spirit that is regarded as 'a deposit guaranteeing our inheritance' (NIV). When seen through the eyes of this anonymous writer in London or Octavius in Vindolanda, seemingly technical theological jargon is recognised for what it is: metaphorical language as familiar in the business dealings of London and Vindolanda as in the commercial transactions of the Eastern Mediterranean.

Gaius Valerius Proculus might have recognised a lowly trader with whom he contracted in the Samaritan of Jesus' parable. Gaius Valerius Proculus needed someone with a wagon or a beast of burden, iumentum, like the one stolen by Catallus from Taurus <WT29> (see Figure 16.6) to fulfil a contract drawn up by Marcus Rennius Venustus on 21 October 62.

Reconstructed text of <WT29>:	Translation of reconstructed text:
taurus macrino domino	Taurus to Macrinus his dearest lord,
carissimo salute	greetings.
scias me domine recte esse	Know that I am in good health,
quod tu sis inuicem cupio	which I desire that you are too.
cum unerat catarrius et	When Catarrius had come and iumenta aduxerat conpedia	had taken the beasts of burden away, quae messibus tribus reficere	investments which I cannot non possum adfueram ehre	replace in three months, ad diadumenum set ille	I was (at the house of) Diadumenus yesterday superuenit unum diem	but he (Catarrius) arrived unexpectedly for a single day . . .

Marcus would pay one quarter of a denarius, a quadrans or four asses, for each load (probably on a donkey or ass), a miniscule payment possibly reflecting the exploitation of local traders. From that small sum one quarter would be kept back only to be paid on completion of the contract:

> In the consulship of Publius Marius Celsus and Lucius Afinius Gallus, on the 12th day before the Kalends of November [21 October 62]. I, Marcus Rennius Venustus, (have written and say that) I have contracted with Gaius Valerius Proculus that he bring from Verulamium by the Ides of November [13 November] 20 loads of provisions at a transport charge of one-quarter denarius for each, on condition that . . . one as . . . to London; but if . . . the whole . . . <WT45>.

Like the Samaritan, that local trader walked the same route regularly with his iumentum. There is nothing special about the arrangement the Samaritan makes when he hands over the two denarii (£120 or three nights at a Premier Inn) and says, 'I will repay you [reddam tibi] whatever more you spend' (Luke 10:35): it is exactly the business culture of money and debt within a framework of honour and trust that we see on the road from London to St Albans as those cities are being rebuilt immediately after the Boudica revolt.

The law underpins financial transactions as well as honour. In one of the later tablets <WT57> (80–90/5), it would appear that someone has been given permission to go to law, having made a legal undertaking (sponsionem facere iudicio certare). Litugenus and Magunus may have been living on the north-western fringe of the empire, but they had access to a legal system rooted in Rome and recognisable across the empire:

> In the consulship of the Emperor Caesar Vespasian for the seventh time (and) of Titus for the fifth time, on the 11th day before the Kalends of November [22 October 76]. Responsibility [for the case] between Litugenus and Magunus on the 5th day before the Ides of November [9 November] having been given by the emperor, my preliminary judgment is . . . <WT51>.

Formally appointed by the emperor, in practice the judge was probably appointed by the governor or his deputy in the absence of magistrates in London. The case is what we would today call a directions hearing. This is the justice Paul encountered on his travels in Acts from Philippi to Caesarea and Rome. We do not know how just or unjust the judge was: the world Jesus knew had its share of unjust judges (Luke 18:1–8).

The people of London lived 'by bread and salt' <WT31> and would know instinctively the importance of 'daily bread' (Matt. 6:11) and the challenge to be 'the salt of the earth' (Matt. 5:13). The money they dealt in was the money we encounter in the New Testament, even down to the debt of 26 denarii that was to be settled in 52 victoriati, a coin related to the drachma lost by the woman of Jesus' parable in Luke 15:8. They would have recognised it was not simply a tradition that Paul received and then delivered when he spoke of the Lord's Supper and of the life, death and resurrection of Jesus (1 Cor. 11:23 and 15:3); it was something that had the same substance as the merchandise Tibullus and Gratus were trading in <WT44>. Theirs was the same world of honour, shame, patronage and debt.

Reading the New Testament in a frontier fort: the Vindolanda Tablets[6]

The conquest of Britain reached its furthest extent with the defeat of the Caledonian tribes at Mons Grautius in 82/83. Tacitus bemoaned the fact that with Agricola's subsequent return to Rome and the cessation of campaigning, it meant that the opportunity to take the whole island of Britain was lost. A line of forts, linked by a road since medieval times known as the Stanegate, was established at the narrowest point across the mainland from Carlisle to Corbridge. The fort of Vindolanda, half way along the road a mile south of the later Hadrian's Wall, depended on prolific record keeping and extensive letter writing. Discarded in damp soil and later covered by clay as the fort was redeveloped, that archive, along with fabrics, leather goods and a great number of shoes, was remarkably well preserved in anaerobic conditions. Since 1973, in excavations led by Alan Bowman, more than 1,000 pen–and–ink writing tablets comprising letters, accounts, inventories and legal documents written between 85 and 130 have been excavated, photographed and preserved. Post–card size, about 150mm x 100mm and often folded with the address on one side, the wooden tablets give a remarkable insight into the everyday life of soldiers and civilians, women and men, slaves and free, living in a Roman fort at the end of the first century. They show that the economic and social life of the empire was clearly built on:

> the widespread writing of good Latin, with common formats, methods and patterns among the officer class in northern Britain, extending to their wives and their slaves, to their correspondents (whoever they were), into the non–officer class, perhaps even the ranks and the traders with military connection.
>
> (Bowman 2003: 92; cf. Bowman and Thomas 1994)

Written in the old Roman cursive script familiar on papyri, with slight differences from the Bloomberg tablets due to the use of pen and ink, they demonstrate 'that it is overwhelmingly likely that at the time pen–and–ink cursive Latin was being written in the same way all over the empire' (Bowman 2003: 86). Indeed, an identical wooden writing tablet, but written in Aramaic, was discovered in the Cave of Letters beside the Dead Sea in 1960 by Y. Yadin. Concealed in a leather water skin and protected against the 'evil eye' by herbs and stones tied in a handkerchief, the four 'thin inscribed slats of wood' were found in the bundle of papyri still bound together by cord that turned out to be the Bar Kokhba letters. From 'Shim'on Bar Kosiba, the Prince over Israel' (and leader of the second Jewish revolt), it was a letter dealing with the confiscation and transfer of a quantity of wheat, a threat of punishment and an arrest order. 'The practice of writing on wood was widespread throughout the Orient', comments Yadin, 'and is often mentioned in rabbinical literature' (Yadin 1961: 40–2; Bowman and Thomas 1983).

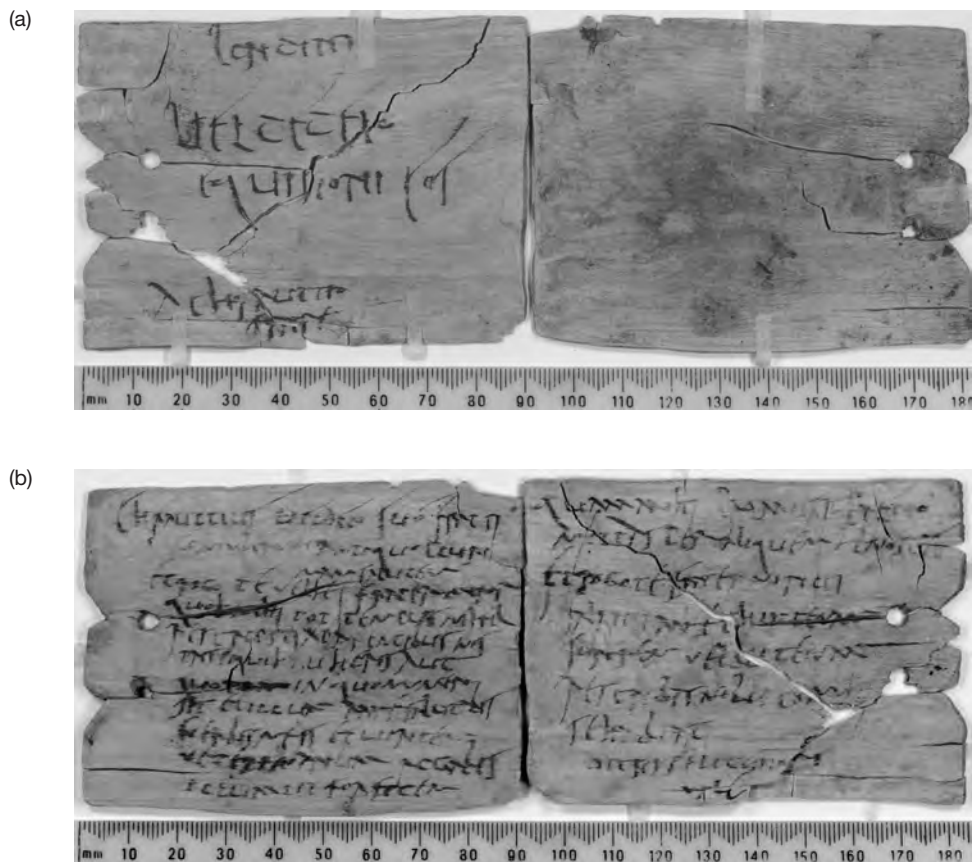
Learning to read and write involved in London writing exercises using numerals <WT77, 78> and the alphabet <WT79> and in Vindolanda copying from Vergil's Aeneid (Tab. Vindol. 118, 121) in exactly the way someone in a garrison on Herod's fort at Masada had done on papyrus in the early 70s CE (Bowman 2003: 88f.). This is the literate world of the soldiers and passers-by at the foot of the cross who read the inscription, quite possibly on a wooden tablet in the same old Roman cursive script in Hebrew, Latin and Greek (John 19:19).

Chrauttius and many other Vindolanda correspondents would recognise the formality and intimacy of the opening and closing of Paul's letters (see Figures 16.7a and 16.7b).

Just as Paul writes intimately of brothers and sisters and speaks of Epaphroditus and Archippus as fellow-soldiers (Phil. 2:25 and Philemon 2) and often adds a greeting in his own hand (1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; 2 Thes. 3:17; Col. 2:14; Philemon 19), so too does Chrauttius when he writes to Veldeius,

(a)

(b)


Figures 16.7a and b   Back and front of a letter from Chrauttius in Vindolanda to Veldeius in London. 189mm × 70mm. Tab. Vindol. 310. Photograph ©The Centre for the Study of Ancient Documents and the British Museum his brother and messmate mentioning his sister Thuttena. He is able to send his letter the approximately 350 miles to London on the network of roads Paul depended on in his letter writing too:

> Chrauttius to Veldeius his brother and old messmate, very many greetings. And I ask you, brother Veldeius – I am surprised that you have written nothing back to me for such a long time – whether you have heard anything from our elders, or about . . . in which unit he is; and greet him from me in my words and Virilis the veterinary doctor. Ask him (sc. Virilis) whether you may send through one of our friends the pair of shears which he promised me in exchange for money. And I ask you, brother Virilis, to greet from me our sister Thuttena. Write back to us how Velbuteius is (?). (2nd hand?) It is my wish that you enjoy the best of fortune. Farewell.
>
> (Back)
>
> (Deliver) at London. To Veldedeius, groom of the governor, from his brother Chrauttius.
>
> (Tab. Vindol. 310; see Figure 16.7)

If Chrauttius were to read that 5,000 sat in companies (contubernia) (Mark 6:39), he would be quick to see a force the size of a legion and not be surprised to read in John 6:15 that 'they were about to come and take him by force to make him king'. Perhaps he would have been intrigued by Jesus' refusal to take up arms.

The women correspondents of Vindolanda include Sulpicia Lepidina, wife of Flavius Cerialis, commander of the fort c. 100. When Claudia Severa, wife of another commander, invited Lepidina to her birthday party, she too added a personal greeting in her own hand, 'I shall expect you, sister. Farewell, sister, my dearest soul, as I hope to prosper, and hail' (Tab. Vindol. 291; see Figure 16.8).

From the Vindolanda tablets it is clear that women not only have a part to play in the life of a fort but also that through their literacy they can bring pressure to bear on those in authority. (Allason-Jones 2005: 46f., 191f.) There was an expectation that Lepidina could influence her husband as Valatta knew when she wrote to Cerialis:

> Valatta to her Cerialis, greetings. I ask my lord that you relax your severity (?) and through Lepidina that you grant me what I ask (?) . . .
>
> (Tab. Vindol. 257)

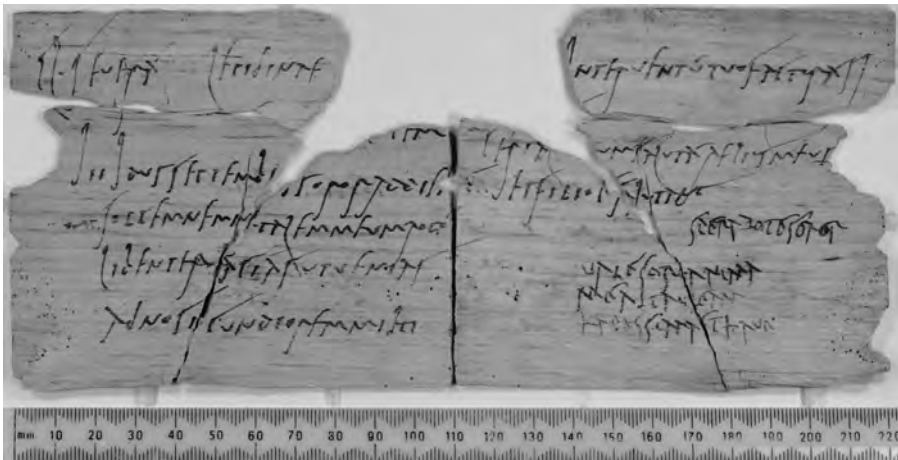
Valatta and Lepidina would not be surprised at the influence Pilate's wife hoped to exert in Matthew 27:19.

If literacy extended to the wives of officers in the fort at Vindolanda, it would not be unreasonable to expect it of Joanna, the wife of Herod's steward Chuza, and possibly the other women who 'provided for' Jesus and the twelve 'out of their resources' (Luke 8:1–3). The resources needed for the garrison are detailed in administrative documents. Tab. Vindol. 180 details the amount of wheat required for making bread for the 'oxherds at the wood', it speaks of 'Amabilis at the shrine', and a request 'to Felicius Victor for twisted loaves' and what was needed for 'the legionary soldiers on the order of Firmus'. 'Lucco, in charge of the pigs', is provided for as is the person 'in charge of the oxen'. Those in the fort knew what it took to resource a garrison. People such as these accustomed to feasting and fish sauce (Tab. Vindol. 190, 191, 202, 302, 594) might well have recognised the banqueting Jesus spoke of so often and assumed that Zebedee and his hired men (Mark 1:20) fished not only for their families but also for the Roman banqueting table in the new city of Tiberias (Crossan and Reed 2001: 123–5). In the exclusion and reinstatement of Legion, they would have recognised the culture of honour and shame and may have wondered whether in his name and the plight of the pigs there was reference to them and their way of life in a fort (Myers 1988: 198f.). The fact that it is possible to compare commodities and prices in Vindolanda with records on papyri and ostraca in Egypt (Bowman 2003: 64f., 68f.) shows that military life was recognisable from one frontier to the

(a)
(b)


Figures 16.8a and b Back and front of a letter from Claudia Severa to Sulpicia Lepidina. 223mm × 96mm. Tab. Vindol. 291. Photograph ©The Centre for the Study of Ancient Documents and the British Museum other. The dependence of the fort on local farmers for produce in large quantities and its implications for relationships with the local population raise the kind of questions that are raised on the eastern frontier too (Neyrey and Stewart 2008: chs 7, 8; Mattingly 2011: 160–5, 353f.). Those in the fort at Vindolanda might have expected bread for 5,000 to be on sale in the villages of Galilee (Luke 9:13).

It is not only foodstuffs that the Romans need: it is leather for their shoes, fabrics for their clothes, timber and stone for their buildings. Purchasers of the 'purple curtains' priced at a costly 99 5/8 denarii (Tab. Vindol. 596) would have understood that Lydia could run a business trading in that kind of material (Acts 16:14). Vocontios, a centurion, is clearly in charge of building, but seems to be reluctant to sort out the necessary orders prompting an anonymous writer to enquire about the 'quantity of wagons' that will be required to carry the stone (Tab. Vindol. 316). As the strength report of the First Cohort of Tungrians (Tab. Vindol. 154) indicates, centurions and their men were not all resident in the fort all the time. Some are stationed in nearby Corbridge, one is in London and another in York. These arrangements may help account for the presence of a centurion in Capernaum building for the local community (Luke 7:5), another in Jerusalem at the foot of the cross (Mark 15:39) and another in Caesarea (Acts 10:1). When Paul asks Timothy to 'bring the cloak (paenulam) I left with Carpus at Troas' it is exactly the same item as the 'cloak', paenula, listed in an inventory for the household of Flavius Cerialis obtained from Tranquillus (Tab. Vindol. 196). The 'books and parchments' he asks for are equivalent to the manufactured writing tablets that would be needed in Vindolanda, perhaps referred to in Tab. Vindol. 283.

The Vindolanda tablets reflect the same money-based economy built on debt and honour. In correspondence between Maior, an imperial administrator who was possibly a freedman of Nerva, and Cocceius Maritimus, arrangements are made to settle a debt in the familiar language of the Bloomberg tablets. A note in the margin seems to plan the transference of a slave, puer, which will require a 'note of hand':

> If you intend to send a boy to me(?), send a note of hand (chir[o-] > [grafum]) with him so that I may be the more reassured.
>
> (Tab. Vindol. 645)

The vibrant metaphorical language of Col 2:14 with its reference to 'erasing the record that stood against us with its legal demands' would have been as recognisable in the military world of Vindolanda as in the business world of London <WT27>. It is that personal note of hand, chirografum, that provides the guarantee to seal the arrangement.

Such transactions are set within a clear legal framework. The writer of Tab. Vindol. 344 seems to have been a local trader who cannot get satisfaction from within the fort. He appeals to the maiestas, referring probably to the emperor's representative, the provincial governor, rather than the emperor himself:

> he beat (?) me all the more . . . goods . . . or pour them down the drain (?). As befits an honest man (?) I implore your majesty not to allow me, an innocent man, to have been beaten with rods and, my lord, inasmuch as (?) I was unable to complain to the prefect because he was detained by ill-health I have complained in vain (?) to the beneficiarius and the rest (?) of the centurions of his (?) unit. Accordingly (?) I implore your mercifulness not to allow me, a man from overseas and an innocent one, about whose good faith you may inquire, to have been bloodied by rods as if I had committed some crime.
>
> (Tab. Vindol. 344)

This writer from Vindolanda, together with the London writer of <WT51>, would have recognised the justice or lack of it Paul experienced in Philippi, in Caesarea and in Rome (Acts 16:21–28); they would not have been surprised to read of the beatings Jesus (Mark 14:65) and Paul experienced (2 Cor. 6:1–12 and 11:16–33). Within the ring enclosed by the frontiers was a brutality they knew only too well. The world of the frontier fort, no less than the world of London, was the world of kinship and comradeliness, of money and debt, of honour and shame that the first readers of the New Testament took for granted.

Reading the New Testament in the temples of Roman Britain: the so-called curse tablets[7]

A handful of so-called curse tablets had been found prior to 1976 in Britain since the beginning of the nineteenth century. Referred to as defixiones and written with a stylus on lead in old, and from the late third century, new Roman cursive, they are 'inscribed pieces of lead, usually in the form of small, thin sheets, intended to influence, by supernatural means, the actions or welfare of persons or animals against their will' (Jordan 1985: 151) and are rarely more than 120mm x 80mm. One discovered in London in 1934 is a curse on Tretia Maria and has been pierced by nails:

I curse (defico) Tretia Maria and her life and mind and memory and liver and lungs mixed up together, and her words, thoughts and memory, thus may she be unable to speak what things are concealed, nor be able . . . nor . . . 2 RIB 7.

(Collingwood et al. 1995)

The cursing Paul rejects in Romans 12:14 would be recognisable in the Roman world of the curse tablets: 'Bless those who persecute you; bless and do not curse them' (Rom. 12:14).

In 1976–9, 140 similar lead tablets were discovered at a temple to Mercury in Uley on the Cotswold escarpment and a further 90 at the temple to Sulis Minerva in Bath in 1978–83. Since then, more discoveries have brought the number in Britain to more than 300, all but one of which have been found in non-military locations and all south of Nottingham (Mattingly 2007: 310–14, 2011: 227). Most have been transcribed and translated by Roger Tomlin (Cunliffe et al. 1985; Woodward and Leach 1993). Tomlin, importantly, noticed that the newly discovered tablets were not straightforward curses, since they were addressed to Mercury in Uley and to the Celtic Sulis or the Roman equivalent Minerva in Bath, not to the gods of the underworld as so many of the defixiones proper were addressed. They did not use the word defigere; indeed RIB 6, 7 and 221 remained in 1988 the only tablets to include that word. The tablets discovered in Bath had a different feel to them. 'If asked to define what they were composing', Tomlin suggests, 'the authors of tablets from Bath might well have used the word "devotion" (cf Tab. Sulis 10.5), ex(s)ecratio (cf. Tab. Sulis 99.1) or "donation" (cf. Tab. Sulis 8.1)' (Tomlin 1988: 59). He later notes that the appearance, the content and the language of the tablets discovered in Uley are 'broadly similar' (Woodward and Leach 1993: 114). Noting that one of the Uley tablets describes itself as a 'memorandum', Tomlin suggests 'donatio' as the most likely term, given the frequent references to giving stolen property or indeed the thief himself to Sulis.

Independently, H. S. Versnel came to the same conclusion, namely, that along with many of the so-called curse tablets in the Graeco-Roman world of the Mediterranean, the newly discovered British tablets are better described as 'judicial prayers' (Versnel 1991b) or 'prayers for justice' (Versnel 2010). A much earlier assessment of a tablet from Ratcliffe-on-Soar as 'in a sense a prayer for justice' (Turner 1963: 121) had been vindicated!

David Mattingly emphasises the distinctiveness of the British tablets and suggests that 'they can be read as a transcript about the workings of Roman imperialism – with divine help being recruited to help subjects address some of its shortcomings'. Unlike the writers of <WT51> and Tab. Vindol. 344, these people, many of whom had Celtic names, did not have access to the Roman legal system. That accounts, perhaps, for them not being found in military locations.

Versnel suggests there is more in common between the British tablets and those found elsewhere in the empire. He defines 'prayers for justice' as:

pleas addressed to a god or gods to punish a (mostly unknown) person who has wronged the author (by theft, slander, false accusations or magical action), often with the additional request to redress the harm suffered by the author (e.g. by forcing a thief to return a stolen object, or to publicly confess guilt).

(Versnel 2010: 278)

In the light of this re-assessment of the British tablets, he offered his own translation of the very first tablet to be discovered in Britain in 1805 at the Lydney temple on the opposite side of the Severn to Uley and suggested it has the feeling of a prayer:

To Divus Nodens. Silvanus is missing his ring. He has given half (of its worth) to Nodens. Let no one in the group to which Senicianus belongs live in good health until he brings (the object) to the temple of Nodens.

(Versnel 1991a: 84)

With a much larger bank of words to draw on, Versnel also suggested in the tablet found in the amphitheatre in Caerleon that tulit be translated 'stolen' not 'worn' and redimat 'may he atone' or 'redeem' not 'get back', arguing 'this text is another example of juridical prayer' (Versnel 1991a: 85). His suggested translation reads:

> Mistress Nemesis, I give you (my!) cloak and shoes. Whoever has stolen them will not atone for it unless with his life, with his blood.
>
> (Versnel 1991a: 85)

He also suggested that the Kelvedon tablet was much closer to these prayers for justice and that the phrase sanguine suo 'can only mean "with his own blood", that is "with his health" or "with his life"' and so he suggested translating as follows:

> Whoever stole the property of Varenus, whether man or woman, let him pay for it with his own blood. [not 'pay in person' as had previously been suggested]. From the money that he or she (the thief) will pay back, half is given to Mercurius and Virtus.
>
> (Versnel 1991a: 84)

Like the Greek texts from first century BCE discovered in Cnidus, in south-western Asia Minor, these Latin texts follow the pattern of 'prayers for justice' (Versnel 1991a: 87–90; Versnel 2010: 323).

Many of the tablets in Britain date from the second to fourth centuries and are like similar tablets found around the Mediterranean world, not least those deposited in a well in Herod's palace in Caesarea Maritima (Gleason 1998; Burrell 2016) and in Jerusalem (Daniel and Sulimani 2009). As Roger Tomlin comments:

> There is thus a remarkable similarity of atmosphere, one might almost call it, in these texts found in the Aegean, on the Danube and in Italy, in southern Spain and in southern Britain . . . the petitioner resorted to his local deity, albeit in a way which would not have been unfamiliar to another petitioner hundreds of miles – and even hundreds of years – distant.
>
> (Tomlin 1988: 62f.)

Writing his prayer in an old Roman cursive script in 150–275 CE, Solinus honours the divinity and majesty of the goddess and, like so many others, displays an awareness of the strata of Roman society, men and women, slaves and free:

> Solinus to the goddess Sulis Minerva, I give to your divinity (and) majesty (my) bathing tunic and cloak. Do not allow sleep or health to him who has done me wrong, whether man or woman, whether slave or free, unless he reveals himself and brings those goods to your temple . . . his children or his . . . and (?) who . . . to him also . . . sleep or [health] . . . cloak and the rest, unless they bring those things to your temple.
>
> (Tab. Sulis 32)

For Paul, this is the very stratification in Roman society that the good news of Jesus subverts: 'There is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male and female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus' (Gal. 3:28; cf. 1 Cor. 12:13 and Col. 3:11).

Another person depositing their prayer in the sacred spring at the temple to Sulis Minerva in Bath is sure that the thief can only redeem the situation by giving their blood:

> To Minerva the goddess Sulis I have given the thief who has stolen my hooded cloak, whether slave or free, whether man or woman. He is not to buy back this gift unless with his own blood.
>
> (Tab. Sulis 65)

Docilinus takes much the same kind of prayer to Mercury in the Temple at Uley (see Figures 16.9a and 16.9b):

> To the god Mercury (from) Docilinus . . . Varianus and Peregrina and Sabinianus who have brought evil harm on my beast (iumentum) and are . . . I ask you that you drive them to the greatest death, and do not allow them health or sleep unless they redeem from you what they have administered to me.
>
> (Uley 43)

What is remarkable about all these tablets is the way they give a glimpse into what ordinary everyday people were thinking as they brought their prayers to their gods. The altars in the temple precinct around the sacred well at Bath and the hundreds of animal bones from the sacrifices at the temple to Mercury in Uley are a reminder that these prayers were shared in a context of sacrifice. Solinus and the writer of Tab. Sulis 65 would have recognised that when Paul uses the language of redemption and speaks of the blood of Christ, he is not using theological jargon. His language would have been familiar to them, as it would have been throughout the empire:

> For there is no distinction, since all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God; they are now justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forward as a sacrifice of atonement by his blood, effective through faith.
>
> (Rom. 3:22–25)

A retributive justice is sought in these prayers. The wrong-doer is in debt and owes not just the goods they have stolen but their life and health and blood. When Jesus teaches his disciples about prayer, he quite explicitly distances himself from the way the Romans pray. Perhaps it was this kind of vindictive prayer with its formulaic phrases oft repeated that Jesus had in mind:

> When you are praying, do not heap up empty phrases as the Gentiles [Romans] do; for they think that they will be heard because of their many words. Do not be like them, for your Father knows what you need before you ask him. 'Pray then in this way: . . . forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors'.
>
> (Matt. 6:7–8 and 12)

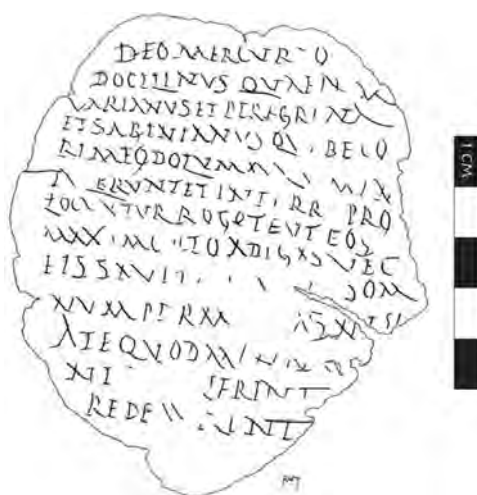
As if that is not enough, he presses the point home: 'For if you forgive others their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you; but if you do not forgive others, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses' (Matt. 14–15). Docilinus and so many others who prayed prayers for justice in Uley, Bath, Caerleon and elsewhere would recognise the very different way taught by Jesus when he said, 'when someone takes your coat (tunicam tuam), you should give your cloak (pallium as in the Caerleon prayer for justice) as well' (Matt. 5:40). To read the New Testament through their eyes is to realise how much Jesus and his followers challenged the world they were used to, offering a different understanding of prayer and redemption.

(a)
(b)


Figures 16.9a and b Photo and sketch of a lead tablet in which Docilinus prays to the god Mercury at Uley. Oval 84mm × 98mm. Uley 43. Photograph ©The Centre for the Study of Ancient Documents and the British Museum

Conclusion

The story of Roman Britain from Julius Caesar to the Pax Romana of Trajan and Hadrian unfolds as the Herodian dynasty takes power, the events narrated in the New Testament take place and the books of the New Testament come to be written. The issues of empire and occupation are much the same on the north-western as on the eastern frontier. To visit archaeological sites in Roman Britain is to touch the social and political world of the lands of the Bible. It is in reading the prayers of those who prayed simple, powerful yet vindictive prayers for justice that it is possible to imagine the impact Jesus' teaching on prayer and forgiveness had on people just like them. It is in reading of everyday life in a fort on the north-western frontier that it is possible to touch the lives of the very Roman soldiers, centurions and their families who appear in the pages of the New Testament and of those who were among the first readers of the New Testament. It is in reading what slaves and freedmen, soldiers and civilians, traders and merchants wrote in their letters, and their legal and financial documents that it is possible for the very first time to experience in Roman Britain the contemporaries of Paul. In London we encounter the full force of a Roman economy and social order founded on honour and patronage, trade and commerce, money and debt that the first readers of the New Testament knew so well. It is not just the detail, it is the experiencing of what they wrote with their own hand that enables us to undertake a 'thought experiment' and read the New Testament in Roman Britain.

Notes

1 Bailey 2008, 2011; Barclay 1996; Carter 2008; Crossan and Reed 2001, 2009; Esler 1994; Horsley 1997; Malina 1993, 2001; Neyrey and Stewart 2008; Oakes 2002; Pritchard and Page 2008; Reed 2007; Theissen 1993; Vermes 2010; Walker 2009, 2014; Wright 1992.
2 I have drawn on David Mattingly's chronology of Roman Britain (Jones and Mattingly 1990: 73f.; Mattingly 2007: 97f.) which is entirely dependent on Tacitus, Suetonius and Cassio Dio; I have drawn on chronologies that give a similar credence to the New Testament documents, while recognising that all dates given are necessarily approximate (Bruce 1990: 92–5; Pritchard and Page 2008: 170–3).
3 Myers 1988; Theissen 1993, 2007; Horsley 1997, 2012; Crossan and Reed 2001, 2009; Crossan 2007; Carter 2006; Portier-Young 2011.
4 Gager 1975; Malina 1993, 2001; Esler 1994, 2000, 2014; Elliott 1995; Neyrey and Stewart 2008; Oakes 2002, 2009; Bailey 2008, 2011; Evans 2012.
5 The following description of and references to the Bloomberg tablets are based on Tomlin 2016. Excavated by the Museum of London Archaeology, they will go on display at the Bloomberg LP European headquarters. Tablets are identified using the publication catalogue reference number <W(riting)T(ablet) number>.
6 The following description of and references to the Vindolanda tablets are based on Vindolanda Tablets Online; Vindolanda Tablets Online II; and Bowman 2003. On display at Vindolanda and in the British Museum, 735 of the texts are in the public domain. Tablets are identified using the convention in Vindolanda Tablets Online II (accessed 25 July 2016) Tab(ellae) Vind(olanda) number.
7 The following description of and references to the so-called curse tablets are based on Tomlin 1988; Woodward and Leach 1993; and 'Curse Tablets from Roman Britain' 2002. They are on display in Bath, the British museum and in various Roman museums south of Nottingham. They are identified using the convention in Tomlin 1988: 'Tab(ellae) Sulis number' and with reference to their place of origin and appropriate number as in Curse Tablets of Roman Britain http://curses.csad.ox.ac.uk/ (accessed 25 July 2016).

Bibliography

The world of Roman Britain

Allason-Jones, L. (2005) Women in Roman Britain. 2nd ed. York, UK: Council for British Archaeology.
Bowman, A. (2003) Life and Letters on the Roman Frontier: Vindolanda and Its People. London: British Museum.
Bowman, A and Thomas, D. (1983) Vindolanda: The Latin Writing Tablets. London: Society for the Promotion of Roman Studies, online at: vindolanda.csad.ox.ac.uk/. Accessed 31 January 2017.
Bowman, A and Thomas, D. (1984) The Vindolanda Writing Tablets (Tabulae Vindolandenses II). London: British Museum Press, online at: vindolanda.csad.ox.ac.uk/tablets/TVII.shtml. Accessed 31 January 2017.

Breeze, D. J. (2013) Frontiers of the Roman Empire. Edinburgh, UK: Society for Libyan Studies.

Collingwood, R. G., Wright, R. P. and Tomlin, R. S. O. (1995) 'RIB 7. Curse upon Tretia Maria'. Inscription, online at: romaninscriptionsofbritain.org/inscriptions/7. Accessed 9 July 2016.

Cunliffe, B. W., Davenport, P., Care, V. and Tomlin, R. (1985) The Temple of Sulis Minerva at Bath. Monograph. University of Oxford. Committee for Archaeology, 7 and 16 Y. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Committee for Archaeology.

Curse Tablets from Roman Britain, online at: curses.csad.ox.ac.uk/index.shtml. Accessed 9 July 2016.

Gaius, c. 170. The Institutes, online at: thelatinlibrary.com/law/gaius3.html. Accessed 26 July 2016.

Jones, B. and Mattingly, D. (1990) An Atlas of Roman Britain. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Jordan, D. R. (1985) 'A survey of Greek defixiones not included in the special corpora'. Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies 26(2): 151–97.

Mattingly, D. J. (2007) An Imperial Possession: Britain in the Roman Empire, 54 BC–AD 409. Penguin History of Britain. London: Penguin.

Mattingly, D. J. (2011) Imperialism, Power, and Identity: Experiencing the Roman Empire. New ed. Miriam S. Balmuth Lectures in Ancient History and Archaeology. Princeton, NJ and Oxford, UK: Princeton University Press.

Reece, R. (2002) The Coinage of Roman Britain. Stroud, UK: Tempus.

Salway, P. (1981) Roman Britain: Oxford History of England. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Tomlin, R. (1988) Tabellae Sulis: Roman Inscribed Tablets of Tin and Lead from the Sacred Spring at Bath. Monograph. University of Oxford. Committee for Archaeology), No. 16, Fasc. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Committee for Archaeology.

Tomlin, R. (2016) Roman London's First Voices: Writing Tablets from the Bloomberg Excavations, 2010–14. London: Museum of London Archaeology.

Turner, E. G. (1963) 'A curse tablet from Nottinghamshire'. The Journal of Roman Studies 53(January): 122–4.

Versnel, H. S. (1991a) 'Beyond cursing: The appeal to justice in judicial prayers'. In Faraone, C. A. and Obbink, D. (eds) Magika Hiera: Ancient Greek Magic and Religioni. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Versnel, H. S. (1991b) 'Some reflections on the relationship magic–religion'. Numen 38(2): 177–97.

Versnel, H. S. (2010) 'Prayers for justice, east and west: New finds and publications since 1990'. In Gordon, R. L. and Simon, F. M. (eds) Magical Practice in the Latin West. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 275–334.

Vindolanda Tablets, online at: vindolanda.csad.ox.ac.uk/. Accessed 9 July 2016.

Vindolanda Tablets, online at: II vto2.csad.ox.ac.uk/. Accessed 9 July 2016.

Wilson, R. J. A. (2002) A Guide to the Roman Remains in Britain. London: Constable.

Woodward, A. and Leach, P. E. (1993) The Uley Shrines: Excavation of a Ritual Complex on West Hill, Uley, Gloucestershire 1977–9. Archaeological Report (English Heritage). London: English Heritage in association with British Museum Press.

The world of the New Testament

Bailey, K. E. (2008) Jesus through Middle Eastern Eyes: Cultural Studies in the Gospels. London: SPCK Publishing.

Bailey, K. E. (2011) Paul through Mediterranean Eyes: Cultural Studies in 1 Corinthians. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

Barclay, J. M. G. (1996) Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora: From Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE–117 CE). Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Bruce, F. F. (1990) The Acts of the Apostles. 3rd revd and enlarged ed. Leicester, UK: Apollos.

Burrell, B. (2016) 'Caersarea Maritima excavations at the well', online at: www.caesarea.landscape.cornell.edu/maps_pages/well.html. Accessed 9 July 2016.

Burridge, R. A. (2004) What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography. 2nd ed. Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans Publishing.

Caird, G. B. (1980) The Language and Imagery of the Bible. London: Duckworth.

Carter, W. (2006) The Roman Empire and the New Testament: An Essential Guide. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press.

Carter, W. (2008) John and Empire: Initial Explorations. New York: T&T Clark.

Crossan, J. D. (2007) God and Empire: Jesus Against Rome, Then and Now. San Francisco, CA: HarperCollins.

Crossan, J. D. and Reed, J. L. (2001) Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts: Revised and Updated. San Francisco, CA: HarperOne.

Crossan, J. D. and Reed, J. L. (2009) In Search of Paul. London: SPCK.

Daniel, R. W. and Sulimani, G. (2009) 'A new curse tablet from Jerusalem'. Zeitschrift Für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 171: 123–8.

Dunn, J. D. G. (2006) Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: An Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity. 3rd ed. London: SCM.

Elliott, J. H. (1995) Social Scientific Criticism of the New Testament. London: SPCK.

Esler, P. F. (1994) The First Christians in Their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. London: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (ed.) (2000) The Early Christian World Volumes I–II. Taylor & Francis e-Library, 2002. London: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (2014) 'Reading Matthew by the Dead Sea: Matthew 8:5–13 in light of P. Yadin 11'. HTS Teologiese Studies/Theological Studies 70(1), online at: www.hts.org.za/index.php/HTS/article/view/2773. Accessed 31 January 2017.

Evans, C. A. (2012) Jesus and His World: The Archaeological Evidence. London: SPCK.

Gager, J. G. (1975) Kingdom and Community: The Social World of Early Christianity. Prentice-Hall Studies in Religion Series Y. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall.

Gleason, K. L. (1998) 'The promontory palace at Caesarea Maritima: Preliminary evidence for Herod's praetorium'. Journal of Roman Archaeology 11: 23–52.

Horsley, R. A. (1997) Paul and Empire: Religion and Power in Roman Imperial Society. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.

Horsley, R.A. (2012) The Prophet Jesus and the Renewal of Israel: Moving Beyond a Diversionary Debate. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publishing.

Lewis, C. T. and Short, C. (1879) A Latin Dictionary. Oxford, UK: The Clarendon Press.

Malina, B. J. (1993) Windows on the World of Jesus: Time Travel to Ancient Judea. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Malina, B. J. (2001) The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology. 3rd ed., rev. and exp. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press.

Myers, C. (1988) Binding the Strong Man: A Political Reading of Mark's Story of Jesus. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.

Neyrey, J. H. and Stewart, E. C. (eds) (2008) The Social World of the New Testament, Insights and Models. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers.

Oakes, P. (2002) Rome in the Bible and the Early Church. Carlisle, UK: Paternoster Press.

Oakes, P. (2009) Reading Romans in Pompeii, Paul's Letter at Ground Level. London: SPCK.

Portier-Young, A. (2011) Apocalypse against Empire: Theologies of Resistance in Early Judaism. Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans Publishing.

Pritchard, J. B. and Page, N. (2008) Collins Atlas of Bible History. London: Collins.

Reed, J. L. (2007) The HarperCollins Visual Guide to the New Testament: What Archaeology Reveals about the First Christians. San Francisco, CA: HarperCollins.

Theissen, G. (1993) Social Reality and the Early Christians: Theology, Ethics, and the World of the New Testament. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Theissen, G. (2007) The Shadow of the Galilean: The Quest of the Historical Jesus in Narrative Form. Updated ed. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Vermes, G. (2010) Jesus in the Jewish World. London: SCM Press.

Walker, P. W. L. (2009) In the Steps of Jesus. London: Lion.

Walker, P. W. L. (2014) In the Steps of Saint Paul: An Illustrated Guide to Paul's Journeys. London: Lion.

Williamson, G. and Smallwood, E. M. (1981) Josephus: The Jewish War. London: Penguin.

Wright, N. T. (1992) Christian Origins and the Question of God: The New Testament and the People of God. London: SPCK.

Yadin, Y. (1961) 'Expedition D'. Israel Exploration Journal 11(1/2): 36–52.

17

SEX AND SEXUAL RENUNCIATION I

Teresa M. Shaw

Overview

Recent scholarly assessments of sexuality, sexual relations, and sexual renunciation in early Christianity are part of a larger and very lively interdisciplinary discussion that is currently shaping research in classical studies, religion, anthropology, cultural studies, and other fields. The key methodological and topical questions in this discussion arise from contemporary scholarship in gender studies and the history of the body, as well as feminist, social, and critical theory. Broadly speaking, one could say that current research related to sexuality and focusing on ancient Christianity is characterized by an interest in both historical/social reconstructions as well as the examination of ideology and rhetoric, and how these relate to issues of authority and power. Christian argumentation and practices can-not be understood apart from the broader cultural contexts of the late ancient Mediterranean. It is not enough simply to summarize contemporary Jewish or pagan moral teaching as 'background' for Christianity. Rather, Christian texts, their authors, and their subjects embody and express cultural contexts and social expectations that are not limited to one religious tradition. Thus scholars are interested not only in explicating the overt theological argument or practical instructions of a text but also in accounting for the logic of its context in, for example, contemporary moral theory, medical models, systems of authority, and gender constructions.

In this chapter I will first highlight some of the theoretical and methodological concerns that have distinguished recent scholarly analyses, and then briefly describe current discussions of sexuality in late ancient medical theory and moral philosophy. Next I will turn to the textual evidence for late ancient Judaism and earliest Christianity in order to identify and characterize some of the ancient concerns related to sexual behavior as well as some of the questions of modern research. The remainder of the chapter will trace aspects of early Christian discourses of sexuality to the beginning of the fifth century, focusing in particular on debates about perfectionism and rigorism, the goodness of creation and the ideal body as these relate to gender and sexual desire, the value and role of marriage, the construction and use of categories of gender deviance and conformity, and the developing ideology of virginity.

Issues of theory and method

Much recent historical and critical analysis of issues relating to sexuality shares an important assumption with the broader study of the 'history of the body': that the human body, and therefore its behaviors and the disciplines applied to it, is inextricably part of culture and society. Susan Bordo has written:

> Over the past hundred and fifty years, under the influence of a variety of cultural forces, the body has been forced to vacate its long-term residence on the nature side of the nature/culture duality and encouraged to take up residence, along with everything else that is human, within culture.
>
> (Bordo 1993: 33)

This simple assertion has far-reaching implications for the way one approaches historical and theological texts. If we accept that the body is not a thing with models and meanings that are both knowable and universally applicable, and if we assert that rather 'the body we experience and conceptualize is always mediated by constructs, associations, images of a cultural nature' (Bordo 1993: 35), then as historians we must avoid claims and pronouncements that remove bodily experience and behaviors from the web of culture, ideology, and social identity.

These considerations characterize contemporary scholarship on sexuality in various historical periods, including the late ancient Mediterranean and early Christianity. A study of sexual behavior in antiquity would be suspect if it isolated the biological and physiological processes, the legal pronouncements concerning marriage and acceptable or forbidden sexual relationships, the social roles of male and female, or the ethical and theological discourses that claimed and prescribed morality. Even the reproductive processes and the biological aspects of sex—for example the biological differences between male and female—cannot be taken as fixed, neutral, or natural categories untouched by cultural factors. As much research on ancient medicine and in particular its representation of the female body (Rousselle 1983; Gourevitch 1984; Hanson 1990, 1991; Laqueur 1990; Dean-Jones 1991, 1994; King 1997) has shown, the biological differences between male and female, even if recognized as somehow based in nature, are 'culturally mediated and historical,' as biology itself is a 'socially mediated . . . classificatory system by which experiences are organized' (Turner 1984: 28). Thus sexuality is not simply a matter of bodily erotic expression and response; it is also 'inscribed on persons . . . by the exterior discourse of sexual ideology' (Turner 1984: 227, 1992: 41).

As others have noted, these assertions, and indeed the growth of body history as a distinct field, owe much to the influence of feminist analysis and criticism. In particular, twentieth-century feminists early on pointed out the relationship between the gendered body, dominance, and social power. They argued as well that cultural, political, and social forces were responsible for the sexual roles that are presented as 'natural' categories within dominant ideologies and institutions (Stanton 1992b: 16; Bordo 1993: 17; Richlin 1997: 18; Skinner 1997: 13). The insistence on the interrelationship of power, ideology, culture, and sexual roles is related to what has become since the 1970s a common terminological distinction between 'sex' and 'gender.' Stated simply, 'sex' refers to the biological or physiological categories while 'gender' refers to the cultural or social categories by which 'maleness' and 'femaleness' are constructed and interpreted. The distinction between sex and gender is useful for thinking about the relationship between bodies and culture, and especially for calling into question the reductionist equation of biological sex with sexual roles and hierarchy as 'natural' facts. It makes the point that there is no sexual 'identity' constituted outside the realm of culture, social relations, power, and hierarchies. But many scholars have seen the inadequacy and limits of an analysis built on these two categories. For one thing, it leaves 'biology' as an unexamined or natural 'given,' rather than itself a product of cultural and historical forces (Turner 1984: 28; Laqueur 1990: 11–13). Moreover, as Moira Gatens argues, the distinction between sex and gender allows the body to stand as a neutral category, thus masking the fundamentally 'sexed' status of the human body (Gatens 1996: 3–20). Finally, some theorists have noted a tendency for 'gender' to become a substitute for 'women' or 'female,' thus perpetuating the categories feminists and other theorists seek to dismantle (e.g., B. Martin 1994: 104–110).

The writings of French philosopher Michel Foucault and others in his school have had a riveting and controversial impact on the study of sex and sexual renunciation in late antiquity since the mid 1990s. While Foucault's ethical theories and writing on the relationship between power, knowledge, and subjectivity were important enough, it is due to a seeming detour in his work that the spotlight shifted to ancient sexuality. As Foucault himself explains it, he realized after writing the first volume of his History of Sexuality in 1976 that in order to continue with his project of studying 'the modes according to which individuals are given to recognize themselves as sexual subjects,' he needed to turn to the ancient western world, to the period between classical Greece and early Christianity, asking the question, 'how, why, and in what forms was sexuality constituted as a moral domain?' (Foucault 1985: 5, 10).

Let me describe briefly just three aspects of Foucault's influence, as well as some of the criticisms of his work, that have been particularly important among historians of antiquity. In doing so, I do not mean to suggest that Foucault is the only thinker fueling scholarship and theory on ancient sexuality, but I hope to tease out several key topics in the current scholarly discussion while outlining Foucault's approach. First, Foucault provides a vocabulary for analyzing ethics and the ethical discourse of ancient texts, especially as related to 'the care of the self' or ascetic techniques. Foucault distinguishes between four aspects of ethics: the ethical substance (what is worked on), the mode of subjection (what motivates people), asceticism ('the self-forming activity'), and the telos or goal (Foucault 1983: 238–239). Using this schema, he argues for a dramatic difference between pagan and Christian ethics. Although Foucault died before publishing a substantial treatment of his thesis, he suggested the direction of his theory in different contexts. For instance, Foucault argued in The Care of the Self that in the pagan writers of the first two centuries CE (such as Musonius Rufus and Plutarch) one detects a greater problematization of sexual behavior, a more negative judgment of pederasty, and a higher valuation of the marriage relationship than in earlier Greek sources (Foucault 1986).

Beyond that, Foucault suggested that Christianity and the Christian moral code represented 'a profoundly altered ethics,' with its emphasis on sex as evil and its glorification of self-examination (the asceticsm), obedience (the mode of subjection), and purity (the telos) gained through self-renunciation (Foucault 1986: 235–240, 1983: 241–243). The desire to identify neatly, to put a finger on what is different about Christianity, what separates Christian practice and thought from its pagan (or, we should add—as Foucault did not—Jewish) neighbors is not, of course, unique to Foucault. Especially in the area of sexual practice and sexual morality, the urge to set off Christianity has a long history, both among its apologists and its detractors, ancient and modern. Regarding Foucault, many scholars, even those acknowledging his influence, have found his pronouncements to be a little too neat. David Cohen and Richard Saller, for example, have shown that when Foucault identifies a difference between classical Greek and second-century Roman cultures on the value attached to marital union, he ignores the long history of both condemnation and valorization of marriage. They show that he misreads Musonius, Plutarch, and Pliny whose praise of marriage and of wives leaves sexual hierarchy and traditional subjugation of women, even blatant misogyny, intact and operative (Cohen and Saller 1994: 36, 44–55). Others have argued for at least a modification of Foucault's assessment of the impact of Christianity, with consideration of other historical factors or texts (e.g., Clark 1988; Brown 1990: 480). While Foucault's terminology and his attention both to the problem of desire and the 'technologies of the self' in ancient philosophy and medicine have manifestly shaped the way scholars approach the topic of sex and sexual renunciation in antiquity, his historical method and conclusions have not gone without serious challenge.

This leads to a second area of discussion surrounding Foucault's work. As numerous critics have noted, Foucault gave almost no attention to the lives, desires, and ethical strategies of women in his History. Indeed, in a telling fashion, Foucault identifies the four 'axes' of experience, in which the ethical subject is shaped, as: the relation to one's body, one's wife, boys, and truth (Foucault 1985: 32, 1986). Discussing this passage, Page Du Bois (who otherwise finds much to praise in Foucault's 'defamiliarizing' of the past) observes that Foucault's analysis of classical Greek culture 'takes for granted the subordination and subjection of women,' and assumes 'that women, like boys, diet, and philosophy, were always merely occasions for the philosophical subject's mastery of himself' (DuBois 1998: 86–87, 90). Amy Richlin states bluntly that the History of Sexuality 'presents us with a vision of ancient sexual systems that is even more male-centered than what his sources present' (Richlin 1998: 148, 1997: 25). Others have argued that Foucault's denial of women's subjectivity amounts to more than the kind of 'oversight' that is all too familiar in historical scholarship. Rather, his failure to consider gender relations in spite of his long interest in power and knowledge is not only an inexcusable and unredeemable flaw (Cohen and Saller 1994; Richlin 1998), it in fact exposes a fundamental problematic of his notion of power. Catharine MacKinnon writes, 'when he misses gender, he misses how power is organized sexually, hence socially' (MacKinnon 1992: 128).

Finally, Foucault's claim that 'sexuality' is a modern construct, a notion of a separate, knowable, and decipherable sexual identity that developed in discourses and institutions particular to the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries (Foucault 1978), has generated both affirmation and critique (e.g., Halperin et al. 1990b; Laqueur 1990; Halperin 1994; Boyarin 1995a; Brooten 1996; Richlin 1998). The companion argument, developed particularly by David Halperin, is that the ancient Greeks had no 'sexuality' in the modern sense, so that the modern categories of heterosexual and homosexual are applied anachronistically to the ancient world, where social categories of active and passive were more important (Halperin et al. 1990b: 5; Halperin 1994). The far-reaching implication here, of course, is that categories of sexual identity are 'denaturalized,' that the past is 'defamiliarized,' and the present is 'demystified' (Stanton 1992b: 4; DuBois 1998: 90; Larmour et al. 1998b: 13).
Figure 17.1   Mosaic dated c. 350 CE. Piazza Armerina, the Villa Casale, Sicily. Women Doing Sports: Exercising with Weights. Copyright: Marie-Anne Lapadu/Roger-Viollet/The Image Works

This is the language of a constructionist or historicist approach which looks to differences, contingencies, change, and discontinuities in history and culture, emphasizing that sexuality, desire, even gender are the constructions of social, institutional, and cultural norms and discourses. Such a vision may free up the future by freeing the past (Halperin 1994: 34; DuBois 1998: 96–102). In contrast, others have looked for continuities, shared experience, common identities. Thus MacKinnon and Richlin point to the historical stability of misogyny and sexual hierarchy, and Gatens notes that appeals to the 'construction' of gender and hierarchy ahistorically mask the 'historical fact' of the social hierarchy based on sex (MacKinnon 1992: 123; Gatens 1996: 11; Richlin 1997: 26–33). On the one hand, these territorial claims and seemingly theoretical contrasts are important, even crucial, for careful analysis of the body in history. On the other, as many have noted, they create what may be artificial boundaries and scholarly impasses by seeming to force a choice between the old dualistic categories of culture and nature, social forces or biology (Porter 1991: 220–221; Turner 1992: 49, 61; Richlin 1993: 280–281; Boyarin 1994: 236–237).

These theoretical and methodological considerations have shaped current research on early Christianity in relation to the kinds of questions we ask, the vocabulary we use, and the way we negotiate texts and their representations, as will be evident in the remainder of this discussion. Thus important recent studies have tried to decipher the rhetoric surrounding and evidence for same-sex relationships (Boswell 1980; Satlow 1994; Boyarin 1995a; Brooten 1996; Hallett 1997) and the construction of masculinity and femininity (e.g., Gleason 1990, 1995; Laqueur 1990). Other scholars have shown how gender categories are used rhetorically to praise or condemn by associating an individual, regardless of his or her sex, with gender deviance, passivity, and hence femininity (Burrus 1991, 1995). Examinations of the problem of desire in Christian discourse (Brown 1990; Miller 1993; Brakke 1995), the role of body and theology (Brown 1985, 1988; Clark 1986; Bynum 1995; Shaw 1997), the historical reconstruction of female piety and the rhetoric of virginity (Clark 1981; Cameron 1989; Elm 1994; Cooper 1996; Shaw 1998), and the collection of texts and cross-cultural analysis of bodily behaviors (Wimbush 1990; Wimbush and Valantasis 1995) have characterized contemporary scholarship.

Sexuality in the Graeco-Roman world

When we turn to the evidence from the Mediterranean world in the first and second centuries, the world in which Christianity developed and was to flourish, there are features of the social and cultural landscape that help to orient us to the assumptions, models, and concerns surrounding sexual behavior and renunciation. Before focusing on Christian discussions, it is important to consider, for example, the contemporary and influential philosophical instructions and musings as well as the physiological or medical constructs of the human body and sexual processes, both of which gave undeniable shape to Christian practice and discourse. Several recent studies have taken this approach (e.g., Rousselle 1983; Foucault 1985, 1986; Brown 1987, 1988; D. Martin 1995; Shaw 1998).[1] A fundamental characteristic of late ancient philosophy and medicine is the extent to which the two disciplines are intertwined in their shared concerns with regimen, health, and happiness, as the second-century philosopher and moralist Plutarch observed (Moralia 122c–e). This intertwining of concerns points to what I and others have argued is a second fundamental characteristic, namely, that in spite of much dualistic language about soul and body, and a tendency among modern interpreters to take dualistic thinking as a historical 'given,' the relationship between body and soul in philosophy, medicine, and ascetic practice is complex and inextricably interdependent (Brown 1988: 26–27, 222–240; D. Martin 1995: 3–37; Shaw 1998: 27–78). For example, the prominent physician Galen (c. 129–200 CE), whose writings had lasting influence through late ancient, Byzantine, and Islamic medical traditions, wrote that the character of the soul is affected by diet, exercise, and habits, and the constitution of the body (which is dependent to some extent on regimen) leads to either intelligence or foolishness (de sanitate tuenda 1.8; Quod animi 4).

While the philosophical and medical literature of the period is by no means uniform, one can detect general or common themes and concerns related to both gender and sex roles as well as the nature and value of sexual relations. These are important in no small measure because they help to brighten the shadowy corners of the 'logic' of Christian teaching and debates. Although the current body of scholarship is large and varied, I will briefly summarize two issues: the medical representation of male and female bodies and its effect on gender differentiation, and the question of the benefits or dangers of sexual activity. As should be clear from the earlier discussion of some of the theoretical issues in the history of the body, medical representations and description cannot be taken at face value. Rather, medicine and medical models reflect cultural categories and social institutions. This is dramatically evident in the ways in which ancient medicine depicts male and female bodies. Recent studies have shown that ancient medicine, like any other part of ancient culture, is in the service of ideology (e.g., Lloyd 1964, 1983; Hanson 1990; Dean-Jones 1991). For example, one commonplace found in literature and philosophy as well as in medical discourse (particularly Galen) is that male bodies possess more innate heat than female bodies, heat and cold being two of the four basic qualities of bodies in the Galenic scheme, along with wetness and dryness. Of course heat is the superior quality and that which allows male bodies to develop to perfection, while the colder female body languishes in a kind of defective and inverted state, in incomplete imitation of the male.[2]

Thomas Laqueur has used this image to support his argument that 'sex' in antiquity was more a fluid continuum from feminine to masculine genders than the modern concept of two distinct and permanent biological sexes. Thus he argues that what mattered was gender roles and social hierarchies (Laqueur 1990). While Laqueur's thesis may be rightly challenged as 'reductionist' (King 1997: 621; Richlin 1997: 29), his 'one sex model' does point to the sense of fluidity between masculine and feminine types that informs rhetoric and physiognomy, both of which regularly use classifications of masculine and feminine irrespective of the maleness or femaleness of their subject (Gleason 1990, 1995). Further, this sense of fluidity helps us to think about the Christian ascetic texts that urge the female to employ physical techniques such as fasting and modifying her appearance in order to become 'manly' or 'male' (Shaw 1997, 1998: 220–253). In any case, it should be clear that the valuation of heat and cold, masculine and feminine, works to support gender hierarchy and the subordination of women.

Another feature of the medico-philosophical discourse on sexual relations is what scholars have identified as a kind of problematizing in terms of both desire itself as well as the effects of sexual activity on the body (e.g., Rousselle 1983; Foucault 1986; Brown 1988; Pinault 1992; D. Martin 1995). Thus too much sex or having sex when the condition of the body is not optimal can bring disease or exhaustion, and sex deprives the body of vital spirit or pneuma. On the other hand, intercourse is a remedy for some diseases or conditions, and most writers seem to assume that the healthy male or female will be sexually active.

There is evidence, however, of at least a debate on the value of sexual activity, and some have argued that these debates hint at growing pagan interest in the practice of sexual abstinence. Here the physician Soranus' Gynecology provides important details. Although Soranus gives information and instructions concerning proper techniques for conception, healthful pregnancy and childbirth, and the care of infants—and thus writes to some extent in the service of standard sex roles (Rousselle 1983: 35)—he also argues that permanent virginity is a healthy state and that while menstruation and pregnancy are of course essential for conception and the continuation of generation, they are not in themselves healthy for the female body (Soranus, Gynaikeia 1.27–32; 42). This position is in striking contrast to the previous tradition in Greek medicine, which assumed that the healthy woman was the sexually active and, perhaps more important, the procreative woman (Gourevitch 1984: 96; Hanson 1990: 330–334; Pinault 1992: 129). It is also significant that Soranus refers to a debate on the topic, and says that some argue that the body actually becomes ill through desire (Gynaikeia 1.30), and many understood the excretion of seed to be harmful to health. Further, although Soranus makes the case for the value of permanent virginity, he concedes that intercourse is necessary for procreation (Gynaikeia 1.32). Jody Rubin Pinault and Aline Rousselle have both observed that these passages in Soranus indicate the possibility that Roman pagans were practicing sexual abstinence in this period, though Pinault doubts that it is likely Roman girls were taking up lifelong virginity. Rousselle is more

Figure 17.2   Terracotta relief of a childbirth scene from Ostia, c. second century CE. Copyright Cologne Digital Archaeology Laboratory. See permalink: http://arachne.unikoeln.de/item/
marbilder/687464. Photo B. Malter willing to draw out the connections between the pagan interest in semen retention and the health benefits of abstinence, and the Christian praise of celibacy (Rousselle 1983: 95–102; Pinault 1992).

The medical debate on sexual activity and abstinence is connected to discussions in moral philosophy on the same topic. One of the best examples is found in Musonius Rufus (c. 30–c. 101 CE), who writes that excessive indulgence in sexual pleasures is shameful and shows a lack of the self-control so prized among Stoic philosophers (such as Musonius) and others. He argues that husbands as well as wives should practice intercourse only within marriage, and even then only for the purpose of procreation, not merely for pleasure (Discourse 12). Several recent studies have emphasized that in this period desire itself was problematized. While desire is a natural and physiological process that impels humans to procreate (e.g., Musonius, Discourse 14; Galen, de usu partium 14), it also threatens the human body and soul with weakness, distraction, and disease (Rousselle 1983: 13–63; Foucault 1986: 104–144; Nussbaum 1994; D. Martin 1997).

Not the smallest part of wantoness exists in the sexual pleasures, as those who are wanton need various little darlings, not only lawful ones but also unlawful, and not only female but also male—chasing one love or another, and not being satisfied with those who are available but aiming at those who are exotic, demanding shameful embraces—all of which is a great indictment against humans. Those who are not wanton or evil should consider sexual pleasures justified only within marriage and when accomplished for the purpose of procreation of children, because this is lawful. But mere pleasure hunting is unjust and unlawful, even if it is within marriage.

(Musonius Rufus, Discourse 12; trans. T. Shaw)

Jewish and New Testament perspectives on sexuality

Jewish perspectives

Another important characteristic of the current research on sexual behavior and ideology in the early Christian period is the consideration of Jewish teaching and practice, and especially the question of Jewish asceticism.

Against those who would separate Jewish piety from 'asceticism,' defined negatively as body-hating dualism, Steven Fraade has argued that an 'ascetic tension' exists within pre-rabbinic and rabbinic Judaism. This is exemplified in certain pseudepigraphal works, by Philo's advocacy of ascetic self-discipline and glowing descriptions of the ascetic Therapeutae community, by the evidence for the ascetic lifestyle and worldview of the Essenes, and the practice of Nazirite vows (Fraade 1986). Fraade advocates a broader and less pejorative approach to ascetic practices in Christianity, Judaism, and Hellenistic philosophy and religion, one that would recognize that all of these 'are interconnected and not simply isolated and heretical embarrassments' (Fraade 1986: 261). Regarding sexual asceticism specifically, Daniel Boyarin has made the case that, while many scholars including Peter Brown picture Judaism in the first century as affirming of sexual expression and pleasure within marriage, both Paul and Philo show vividly that in first-century Judaism 'sexuality had become . . . problematic.' He argues that Paul and Philo should be considered together as part of a 'pessimistic' strain within Hellenistic Judaism which, in the second century, the rabbis sought to control with a more optimistic affirmation of sexuality, procreation, and marriage (Boyarin 1992, 1995b). The implications of Fraade's and Boyarin's work for the study of early Christian ideas and practices is that they challenge long-held dichotomies between 'Christian' and 'Jewish,' dichotomies that often are maintained on the basis of historical generalizations about whole groups. As Boyarin points out, it makes more sense to consider Paul and Philo together as representatives of 'Hellenistic Judaisms' than to divide them anachronistically as 'Christian' and 'Jewish' (Boyarin 1992: 28–29, 1994: 13–15). This is not to suggest that differences between religious traditions are unimportant either now or in the past. But differences within one tradition may point to broader cultural tensions and points of contact, as Fraade's and Boyarin's work has shown.

New Testament perspectives

These considerations are of crucial importance as scholars confront the New Testament writings, which on the topic of sex are filled with tension, ambivalence, and evidence of outright debate. Because the scholarly literature is so vast, I will highlight only some of the New Testament passages dealing with sexual issues and then discuss two studies that are representative of recent scholarship in the field. The words attributed to Jesus in the canonical gospels represent in general a relativizing of family relationships that seems to fit with Jesus' teachings on detachment from worldly concerns and possessions. Jesus calls for his followers to recognize that their discipleship will bring division within families, that they must not love their parents, spouses, and children more than him (Matt. 10:35–37). Indeed, in the gospel of Luke, Jesus' words are quite strong, 'If anyone comes to me and does not hate his own father and mother and wife and children and brothers and sisters, yes, and even his own life, he cannot be my disciple' (Luke 14:26–27; see also Matt. 12:46–49, 19:16–30; Mark 3:31–35, 10:17–31; Luke 8:19–21, 11:27–28, 18:18–30). At the same time, he does not advocate the abolition of marriage but rather limits the grounds for legitimate divorce to porneia (fornication or sexual immorality) (Matt. 5:31–32; cf. Mark 10:10–12; Luke 16:18).

Besides the sayings in which Jesus seems to group familial relationships with wealth and material possessions as worldly distractions from discipleship, some sayings go further to suggest that freedom from marriage and sexual relationships either characterizes the kingdom of God or makes one ready for the kingdom. In Matt. 19:10–12, in response to the question of whether it is better not to marry in order to avoid the moral problems attached to divorce and remarriage, Jesus makes rather enigmatic reference to those who are able 'to receive this saying' because they 'have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven.' Even more dramatic are Jesus' words recorded in Luke 20:34–36:

> The children of this age marry and are given in marriage; but those who are accounted worthy to attain to that age and to the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage, for they cannot die anymore, because they are equal to angels and are children of God, being children of the resurrection.
>
> (cf. Matt. 22:30; Mark 12:25)

While these sayings may reflect a radically eschatological orientation, they became normative for the lifestyle of groups of Christians who sought to actualize or speed the coming of the kingdom by their own sexual abstinence. As we shall see, disagreement over the necessity of marriage or abstinence continued from the first century through the early Christian centuries.

This is clear in the authentic letters of Paul as well as the pseudo-Pauline writings. Chapter 7 of the first letter to the Corinthians preserves an extended and controversial discussion of sexual issues, and is a key text for considering both Paul's concerns and the issues confronting early Christian communities. In it, Paul is responding to the sexual abstinence already being practiced in the Corinthian community and to the anxieties raised over issues such as the marriage or celibacy of those struggling against youthful sexual desire, conjugal rights, and the possibility of divorce. Several of the verses continue to be the subject of debate (see the sources cited in D. Martin 1995: 209–228). Paul seems to agree with his correspondents in Corinth that 'it is good for a man not to touch a woman,' but he cautions that because of porneia, that is, because of the temptations to sexual immorality, it is better to marry. Further, he argues that the husband and wife should not renounce sexual intercourse except if they agree to do so for a limited time devoted to prayer. Otherwise, sexual abstinence may lead to temptation. In the same way, Paul observes, it is good for those who are unmarried to remain so. Yet if they cannot control themselves, they should marry, for 'it is better to marry than to burn [i.e., with desire]' (1 Cor. 7:8–9). Paul also urges that in consideration of the 'present distress' and the short-ness of time, married persons should remain married and not seek divorce, while unmarried persons should remain unmarried. Although he insists that this is not a commandment and that to marry is not sinful, his own opinion is that the unmarried state is better, more free from worldly anxieties (1 Cor. 7:10–40). While some have argued that Paul in these verses affirms marriage and marital sexual relations (D. Martin 1995: 209), Paul only affirms marriage as a protection against lust and burning desire for those who lack self-control. In fact, Paul does not here or anywhere even praise procreation as good (Boyarin 1995b: 473). These observations not only locate Paul in relation to trends within the cultures of the Mediterranean which we have discussed in moral philosophy and Judaism, they also suggest the ways in which later advocates of sexual abstinence may readily have appealed to the words of Paul (Boyarin 1995b; cf. Brown 1988: 53–57).

Figure 17.3   Image of a Christian family group. Gold and glass inset on cross, fourth century CE. Copyright Museo della Citta in Santa Giulia, Brescia

If the sayings attributed to Jesus and the letters of Paul witness to their ambivalence or aversion to marriage and sexual relations, in the pseudo-Pauline letters written decades after Paul's death the institution of marriage seems securely in place. Thus the assumption is that bishops and deacons would be married (1 Tim. 3:1–13) and households stable and hierarchically ordered (Eph. 5:21–33; Col. 3:18–4:1; Tit. 2:1–10). In contrast to Paul, the author of 1 Timothy insists that although women bear in some way the condemnation of Eve's deception and sin, they will be saved through the bearing of children (1 Tim. 2:11–14). Young widows should not remain single, as Paul may have preferred, but should remarry (1 Tim. 5:1–6). Moreover, the author warns against demon-inspired 'liars' who will come in the later times commanding abstinence from certain foods and condemning marriage. In anticipated rebuttal to such deceivers, the author affirms that everything created by God is good (1 Tim. 4.1–4). These letters thus point not only to a 'domestication' of Pauline teaching, but more importantly to a contentious debate about the value of marriage, certain types of food, and material creation itself.

Two recently published studies may serve as examples of the ways in which scholars have elucidated elements of the New Testament literature concerning sexuality by considering the larger cultural context and ideology. Bernadette Brooten, in Love Between Women, sets Paul's condemna-tion of female homoeroticism (Rom. 1:26–27) squarely in historical and cultural perspective first by elaborating the evidence for female same-sex relationships in antiquity using medical, astrologi-cal, and philosophical texts as well as erotic love spells and Jewish and Roman law. She argues not only that the ancients recognized female homoerotic relationships, but also (against Foucault's and Halperin's theses) that such relationships were categorized and medicalized as reflecting permanent sexual identities (Brooten 1996: 160–162). Moreover, Brooten writes convincingly against scholarly claims (e.g., Boswell 1980) that homosexual relationships in themselves were not condemned in the late ancient Roman world or in the Christian church (Brooten 1996: 11), demonstrating that the hostility to both female and male same-sex relationships was based on the pervasive and fundamen-tally gendered categories of active/passive and natural/unnatural. She thus demonstrates that when Paul categorizes sexual relations as either natural or unnatural, he does so 'based on the assumption widely shared within the Roman world that nature calls for men to be superordinate and active and for women to be subordinate and passive' (Brooten 1996: 192).[3]

In his study The Corinthian Body (1995), Dale Martin argues that within the Corinthian communal body we can detect two prominent ideologies of the human body. One group (including Paul) saw the body primarily in terms of its vulnerability to pollution, penetration, and defilement; this group thus expressed fears about eating food offered to idols and having sexual relations with outsiders.

The other group, which Martin identifies with 'the Strong,' represents in general a higher social status and holds a fundamentally hierarchical understanding of the body, expressing less concern with issues of pollution. Martin elucidates the spectrum of meanings attached to 'spirit,' 'flesh,' and 'body,' as he examines medical and philosophical literature concerning desire, sexual physiology, and diet in order to identify ancient constructions of the human body that lay behind community discord. He also makes good use of contemporary feminist and ideological criticism in his conclusions. Martin argues finally that Paul chooses to reinforce the social hierarchy between male and female rather than to call for the kinds of social restructuring he advocates elsewhere (D. Martin 1995: 198, 248). Paul's conservatism rests in large part, Martin shows, on his conception of a fundamental difference between the 'stuff' of male and female bodies and his assumption not only that the male stuff was superior, but also that the female body was naturally more vulnerable to invasions and pollutions (thus explaining the arguments over veiling) (D. Martin 1995: 229–248).

Martin and Brooten exemplify the ways in which recent studies related to sexual behavior and Christian identity in antiquity not only must take into account factors within the broader cultures and discourses that help explain Christian formulations, but also use contemporary methodologies and are engaged in contemporary discussions of theoretical issues related to sexuality, gender constructions, hierarchy, and deviance. These studies are also important because in setting particular historical problems within their context, they avoid a simple teleological approach that employs aspects of pagan and Jewish culture and learning merely as the warm-up act or backdrop for Christian teaching and practice.

In the space remaining in this chapter, I would like to trace two broad features that distinguish the Christian discourse of sexuality in the literature from the second to the early fifth centuries. Both have already been mentioned in the previous discussion. First, there is constant tension between 'radical' Christian interpreters who understood sexual abstinence (along with other types of renunciation such as fasting) to be the distinguishing feature of the Christian life or even a requirement for the kingdom, and those who sought to defend the institution of marriage and (controlled) sexual relations against their detractors. Second, by the fourth century, an entire genre of literature and an accompanying theological framework grew up around the ideal of female virginity, as the practice of male and female monasticism became more institutionalized. In some ways, the second feature represents an uneasy compromise to the first.

Early Christian discourses of sexuality

Marriage or abstinence in early Christianity

The argument recorded in 1 Timothy 4 over the value of marriage was not a localized or limited debate. While it is obvious that most Christians continued to marry and raise families, it is also clear that some smaller groups of Christians distinguished themselves by their dedication to abstinence or enkrateia. These various groups are thus commonly called 'encratites,' although important distinctions in time, place, and teaching exist and need to be kept in mind (Chadwick 1960; Brown 1988: 83–102; Sfameni Gasparro 1991, 1995: 129). In general, the basic features of encratite Christianity include a rejection of marriage (more specifically procreation) as well as meat and wine in the diet, justified by an eschatological and protological orientation that links procreation and meat eating with the fall from paradise and with death, and thus links abstinence with a return to paradise and a regaining of the angelic condition of original creation. Scholars have noted that in this vision God as creator and indeed material creation itself are not evil. The dualistic aspect is not anthropological but eschatological (Van Eijk 1972: 212–219).

These general characteristics, then, appear in descriptions of Christian groups from the New Testament through the end of the late ancient period. In second- and third-century texts such as the Acts of Thomas and the Acts of Paul and Thecla, for example, the links between sexual purity and the kingdom are striking. In the Acts of Thomas, the apostle interrupts a newly married couple on their bridal bed and persuades them to 'abandon this filthy intercourse,' to raise spiritual children rather than worldly offspring. Convinced, the young bride announces that she now sits unveiled and unashamed (as Eve stood naked and unashamed in the garden before the fall). In a prayer that captures the ancient longing for the lost wholeness and shamelessness of first creation, the bridegroom declares his gratitude and hope 'that I may become again what I was' (11–15). Similarly, in the Acts of Paul and Thecla, the young Thecla rejects worldly marriage and faces the threat of execution after being converted by Paul, who preached 'Blessed are the bodies of virgins, for they shall be well pleasing to God, and shall not lose the reward of their purity' (Acts of Paul and Thecla 6). Paul's opponents criticize him for teaching that there is no resurrection unless one remains chaste and keeps the flesh pure (Acts of Paul and Thecla 12).

One of the reasons that the encratite position was so challenging is, of course, that it appealed to the ideals preached to all Christians: ideals of self-control, detachment from worldly pleasures and concerns, and dedication to the kingdom of God before any earthly commitment. These ideals, moreover, could be confidently argued from scripture, e.g., Luke 20:34–36 and 1 Corinthians 7 (Sfameni Gasparro 1991, 1995; Boyarin 1995b), and were the basis for the apologists' presentation of the superior morality of Christians (e.g., Justin Martyr, Apology 1.15, 1.28). The perceived threat came not only from the radical interpreters of Christian enkrateia, but also from some gnostic, Marcionite, and Manichaean observers who presented a more formidable critique of material creation itself (Van Eijk 1972: 217–219; Brown 1988: 87–121, 197–202). Thus the writings of the most prominent authors in the early period, in their discussions related to sexuality, exhibit a struggle to define the Christian life so as both to affirm marriage and creation and at the same time to praise sexual abstinence. They did so on the basis of two primary factors: the rhetorical distinction between marriage and virginity as 'the good' and 'the better' (Bailey 1959: 21–24) and the institutionalization and domestication of a Christian ascetic elite in the fourth century.

In the third book of his Stomateis, Clement of Alexandria (c. 160–c. 215) gives an early and lengthy defense of marriage against libertine and encratite detractors, in which he insists that the decision whether to marry or to remain in chastity must be a free choice. He claims that marriage is cooperation with creation and an opportunity for service, but notes that the purpose of marriage is procreation alone and that marriage still requires chastity and self-control. Nevertheless, Clement acknowledges that enkrateia is a powerful Christian ideal, not merely to struggle against desire, but 'not to experience desire at all,' a gift that is attainable only by the grace of God (Stromateis, 3.57–58, 66–79).

Virginity and paradise

Clement's relatively positive words concerning marriage are rarely matched in the fourth century, when the literature devoted to the praise and regulation of the disciplined ascetic life intensifies. Particularly in the many sources concerning female virginity,[4] the authors seem to pay only lip service to the value of marriage, noting that while it is a good, virginity is better. In fact, a standard topos in these texts is the 'woes of marriage,' the dramatic detailing of all the physical and emotional hardships of a life with husband and children. Still, underlying the language of 'good' and 'better' is the same tension identified in the New Testament texts, between ascetic rigorists and elite groups and the majority of married Christians, as well as the same questions concerning the goodness of creation and the value of procreation. The insistence on the goodness of marriage as a creation of God seems to have been a kind of litmus test for 'orthodoxy' in ascetic ideology, although some of the 'fathers' seem barely to have passed the test. Most notorious, perhaps, is Jerome (c. 342–420), whose meager praise for marriage rested in the fact that marriage might produce more virgins (Epistle 22.20), and whose vehement rigorism in advocating sexual abstinence and fasting led to a very public and very nasty debate with the Roman monk Jovinian. Jovinian condemned Jerome's elitism as Manichaean and his hierarchical view of heavenly rewards as fundamentally against the gospel (Jerome, Adversus Jovinianum; Brown 1988: 366–386; Shaw 1998: 96–112, 234).

It is clear that at the end of the early Christian era, many of the thorny issues surrounding sexuality, particularly those at the heart of the theology of creation and paradise, remained. Although the contours of what might be condemned as 'heretical' views are visible, and the ideology of virginity allowed for both the glorification of angelic purity and the confirmation of material creation and God's approval of marriage, nevertheless the difficult issues remain. In closing, we might consider two grand visions of creation, the fall, sexuality, and paradise, one eastern and one western, that offer 'uneasy' solutions to the problem of embodiment.

In the east, Gregory of Nyssa (c. 335–394) understood virginity to be the first step on a freely chosen path from the corruption of the present life back toward the restoration of life in original creation: a genderless, passionless, marriageless, and immortal state in the image of God. While marriage and procreation were good gifts of a compassionate God with the purpose of continuing the human race, the promise of virginity became evident with the coming of Christ.[5]

> [Virginity] should be preferred by those who have intelligence, because it is stronger than the power of death. Bodily procreation—let no one be disgusted by this argument—is the origin not of life but of death for humans. For corruption has its beginning in birth, and those who have made an end of it (birth) have established in themselves through virginity the end point of death, by preventing it from advancing further through them. And, by setting themselves up as a boundary stone between death and life, they hinder its movement forward. If, then, death is unable to get past virginity, but reaches its end and dissolves in it, then it is clearly shown that virginity is stronger than death, and the body is rightly called incorruptible which is not working in the service of the life of corruption and which has not allowed itself to become an instrument of mortal succession. So in this the continuous sequence of corruption and dying is interrupted, which has existed in the interval from the first-formed human until the life of the one practicing virginity [Christ].
>
> (Gregory of Nyssa, On Virginity 14.1; trans. T. Shaw)

In the west, Augustine (354–430), responding in part to Jerome's debates with Jovinian and to his own arguments with the Pelagians over free will and perfectionism, praised the married life in strong terms as a sacramental bond while acknowledging the superiority of virginity. In the concept of 'original sin' as Augustine was to formulate it, the original creation consisted of male and female bodies that would have performed sexual intercourse but without any accompanying lust or compulsion. After sin and the fall, however, humans lost free will, and the sexual act is unavoidably tainted with sinful concupiscence; moreover, sinfulness is passed from generation to generation. Augustine nevertheless refused to condemn procreation, and argued instead that the married couple would be forgiven the lustful sin attached to legitimate marital intercourse.[6]

Gregory and Augustine offer windows into the drama of early Christian theology and ascetic identity. Their visions of human perfection and corruption likewise crystalize for ancient Christianity the issues that we as contemporary historians and readers continue to fret about: the place of the body in culture and society; sexuality and identity; male and female bodies; and the nature of gender itself.

Figure 17.4 Fresco of Adam and Eve from the Catacomb of St Peter and St Marcellinus in Rome, chamber 13, from the fourth century CE. Photo of the Pontifical Commission of Sacred Archaeology

Notes

1 Others have examined astrological and 'magical' sources, as well as literary sources such as fiction or poetry, in order to draw out evidence for the cultural climate around sexual behavior. See, for example, Brooten 1996; Goldhill 1995.
2 The scholarship on this topic is substantial, and it should be noted that not all ancient writers agree on the relative heat of male and female bodies. See the discussion in Shaw 1998: 54, 64–68; Lloyd 1964; Galen, de usu partium 14.6.
3 For related studies of ancient sexual types based on the distinction between active and passive, see Boyarin 1995a; Satlow 1994; Gleason 1990; Halperin 1994; Foucault 1985, 1986.
4 For references and discussion, see Shaw 1998, 1997; Copper 1996; Elm 1994; Brown 1988, 1985; Reuther 1974; Clark 1977, 1995; Van Eijk 1972; Camelot 1952.
5 See the texts cited in Shaw 1998: 187–196.
6 See the texts conveniently collected in Clark 1996.

Bibliography

Bailey, D. S. (1959) Sexual Relation in Christian Thought. New York: Harper and Brothers.
Bordo, S. (1993) Unbearable Weight: Feminism, Western Culture, and the Body. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Boswell, J. (1980) Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality: Gay People in Western Europe from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Fourteenth Century. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Boyarin, D. (1992) 'Behold Israel according to the flesh: On anthropology and sexuality in late antique Judaisms,' Yale Journal of Criticism 5(2): 27–57.

Boyarin, D. (1994) A Radical Jew: Paul and the Politics of Jewish Identity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Boyarin, D. (1995a) 'Are there any Jews in "The History of Sexuality"?' Journal of the History of Sexuality 5: 333–355.

Boyarin, D. (1995b) 'Body politic among the brides of Christ: Paul and the origins of Christian sexual renunciation,' in Wimbush and Valantasis 1995: 459–478.

Brakke, D. (1995) 'The problematization of nocturnal emissions in early Christian Syria, Egypt, and Gaul,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 3: 419–460.

Brooten, B. J. (1996) Love between Women: Early Christian Responses to Female Homoeroticism. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Brown, P. (1985) 'The notion of virginity in the early Church,' in McGinn, B., Meyendorff, J. and Leclercq, J. (eds) Christian Spirituality: Origins to the Twelfth Century. World Spirituality, vol. 16. New York: Crossroad, 427–443.

Brown, P. (1987) 'Late Antiquity,' in Veyne, P. (ed.) A History of Private Life; Volume One: From Pagan Rome to Byzantium. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, Belknap Press, 117–311.

Brown, P. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. Lectures on the History of Religions, no. 13. New York: Columbia University Press.

Brown, P. (1990) 'Bodies and minds: Sexuality and renunciation in early Christianity,' in Halperin et al. 1990a: 479–493.

Burrus, V. (1991) 'The heretical woman as symbol in Alexander, Athanasius, Epiphanius, and Jerome,' Harvard Theological Review 84: 229–248.

Burrus, V. (1995) The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Bynum, C. W. (1995) The Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity, 200–1336. Lectures on the History of Religions, new series, no. 15. New York: Columbia University Press.

Camelot, P. T. (1952) 'Les traités "de virginitate" au IVe siècle,' in Mystique et Continence: Travaux scientifiques du VIIe Congrès international d'Avon. Études Carmélitaines. Brugge: Desclée de Brouwer, 273–292.

Cameron, A. (1989) 'Virginity as metaphor: Women and the rhetoric of early Christianity,' in Cameron, A. (ed.) History as Text: The Writing of Ancient History. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 181–205.

Chadwick, H. (1960) 'Enkrateia,' Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum 5: 343–365.

Clark, E. A. (1981) 'Ascetic renunciation and feminine advancement: A paradox of late ancient Christianity,' Anglican Theological Review 63: 240–257.

Clark, E. A. (1986) 'Heresy, asceticism, Adam, and Eve: Interpretation of Genesis 1–3 in the later Latin fathers,' in Ascetic Piety and Women's Faith: Essays on Late Ancient Christianity. Studies in Women and Religion, vol. 20. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 353–385.

Clark, E. A. (1988) 'Foucault, the fathers, and sex,' Journal of the American Academy of Religion 56: 619–641.

Clark, E. A. (1995) 'Antifamilial tendencies in ancient Christianity,' Journal of the History of Sexuality 5: 356–380.

Clark, E. A. (ed.) (1996) St. Augustine on Marriage and Sexuality. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Cohen, D. and Saller, R. (1994) 'Foucault on sexuality in Greco-Roman Antiquity,' in Goldstein 1994: 35–59.

Cooper, K. (1996) The Virgin and the Bride: Idealized Womanhood in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Dean-Jones, L. (1991) 'The cultural construct of the female body in classical Greek science,' in Pomeroy 1991: 111–137.

Dean-Jones, L. (1994) Women's Bodies in Classical Greek Science. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

DuBois, P. (1998) 'The subject in antiquity after Foucault,' in Larmour et al. 1998a: 85–103.

Elm, S. (1994) 'Virgins of God': The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity. Oxford Classical Monographs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Foucault, M. (1978) The History of Sexuality; Volume One: An Introduction. Trans. R. Hurley. New York: Random House.

Foucault, M. (1983) 'On the genealogy of ethics: An overview of work in progress,' in Dreyfus, H. L. and Rabinow, P. (eds) Michel Foucault: Beyond Structuralism and Hermeneutics. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 229–252.

Foucault, M. (1985) The History of Sexuality; Volume Two: The Use of Pleasures. Trans. R. Hurley. New York: Random House.

Foucault, M. (1986) The History of Sexuality; Volume Three: The Care of the Self. Trans. R. Hurley. New York: Random House.

Fraade, S. D. (1986) 'Ascetical aspects of ancient Judaism,' in Green, A. (ed.) Jewish Spirituality: From the Bible Through the Middle Ages. World Spirituality, vol. 13. New York: Crossroad, 253–288.

Gatens, M. (1996) Imaginary Bodies: Ethics, Power and Corporeality. London and New York: Routledge.

Gleason, M. W. (1990) 'The semiotics of gender: Physiognomy and self-fashioning in the second century C.E.,' in Halperin et al. 1990a: 389–415.

Gleason, M. W. (1995) Making Men: Sophists and Self-Presentation in Ancient Rome. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Goldhill, S. (1995) Foucault's Virginity: Ancient Erotic Fiction and the History of Sexuality. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Goldstein, J. (ed.) (1994) Foucault and the Writing of History. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Gourevitch, D. (1984) Le mal d'être femme: La femme et la médecine dans la Rome antique. Realia. Paris: Les Belles Lettres.

Hallett, J. P. (1997) Female homoeroticism and the denial of Roman reality in Latin literature,' in Hallett and Skinner 1997: 255–273.

Hallett, J. P. and Skinner, M. B. (eds) (1997) Roman Sexualities. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Halperin, D. M. (1994) 'Historicizing the subject of desire: Sexual preferences and erotic identities in the pseudo-Lucianic erotes,' in Goldstein 1994: 19–34.

Halperin, D. M., Winkler, J. J. and Zeitlin, F. I. (eds) (1990a) Before Sexuality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Halperin, D. M., Winkler, J. J. and Zeitlin, F. I. (1990b) 'Introduction,' in Halperin et al. 1990a: 3–20.

Hanson, A. E. (1990) 'The medical writers' woman,' in Halperin et al. 1990a: 303–337.

Hanson, A. E. (1991) 'Continuity and change: Three case studies in Hippocratic gynecological therapy and theory,' in Pomeroy 1991: 73–110.

King, H. (1997) 'Reading the female body,' Gender & History 9: 620–624.

Laqueur, T. (1990) Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Larmour, D. H. J., Miller, P. A. and Platter, C. (eds) (1998a) Rethinking Sexuality: Foucault and Classical Antiquity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Larmour, D. H. J., Miller, P. A. and Platter, C. (1998b) 'Introduction,' in Larmour et al. 1998a: 3–41.

Lloyd, G. E. R. (1964) 'The hot and the cold, the dry and the wet in Greek philosophy,' Journal of Hellenic Studies 84: 92–106.

Lloyd, G. E. R. (1983) Science, Folklore and Ideology: Studies in the Life Sciences in Ancient Greece. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.

MacKinnon, C. A. (1992) 'Does sexuality have a history?' in Stanton 1992a: 117–136.

Martin, B. (1994) 'Sexualities without genders and other queer utopias,' Diacritics 24(2/3): 104–121.

Martin, D. B. (1995) The Corinthian Body. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Martin, D. B. (1997) 'Paul without passion: On Paul's rejection of desire in sex and marriage,' in Moxnes, H. (ed.) Constructing Early Christian Families: Family as Social Reality and Metaphor. London and New York: Routledge, 201–215.

Miller, P. C. (1993) 'The blazing body: Ascetic desire in Jerome's letter to Eustochium,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 1: 21–45.

Nussbaum, M. C. (1994) The Therapy of Desire: Theory and Practice in Hellenistic Ethics. Martin Classical Lectures, new series, vol. 2. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Pinault, J. R. (1992) 'The medical case for virginity in the early second century C.E.: Soranus of Ephesus, Gynecology 1.32,' Helios 19(1/2): 123–139.

Pomeroy, S. (ed.) (1991) Women's History and Ancient History. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press.

Porter, R. (1991) 'History of the body,' in Burke, P. (ed.) New Perspectives on Historical Writing. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press, 206–232.

Richlin, A. (1993) 'The ethnographer's dilemma and the dream of a lost golden age,' in Rabinowitz, N. S. and Richlin, A. (eds) Feminist Theory and the Classics. New York and London: Routledge, 272–303.

Richlin, A. (1997) 'Towards a history of body history,' in Golden, M. and Toohey, P. (eds) Inventing Ancient Culture: Historicism, Periodization, and the Ancient World. London and New York: Routledge, 16–35.

Richlin, A. (1998) 'Foucault's History of Sexuality: A useful theory for women?' in Larmour et al. 1998a: 138–170.

Rousselle, A. (1983) Porneia: De la maîtrise du corps à la privation sensorielle IIe–Ive siècle de l'ère chrétienne. Les chemins de l'Histoire. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.

Ruether, R. R. (1974) 'Misogynism and virginal feminism in the Fathers of the church,' in Ruether, R. R. (ed.) Religion and Sexism: Images of Women in the Jewish and Christian Traditions. New York: Simon and Schuster, 150–183.

Satlow, M. L. (1994) '"They abused him like a woman": Homoeroticism, gender blurring, and the rabbis in late antiquity,' Journal of the History of Sexuality 5: 1–25.

Sfameni Gasparro, G. (1991) 'Image of God and sexual differentiation in the tradition of Enkrateia: Protological motivations,' in Borresen, K. E. (ed.) Image of God and Gender Models in Judaeo-Christian Tradition. Oslo, Norway: Solum Forlag, 138–171.

Sfameni Gasparro, G. (1995) 'Asceticism and anthropology: Enkrateia and "double creation" in early Christianity,' in Wimbush and Valantasis 1995: 127–146.

Shaw, T. M. (1997) 'Creation, virginity, and diet in fourth-century Christianity: Basil of Ancyra's On the True Purity of Virginity,' Gender and History 9: 579–596.

Shaw, T. M. (1998) The Burden of the Flesh: Fasting and Sexuality in Early Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Skinner, M. B. (1997) 'Introduction,' in Hallet and Skinner 1997: 3–25.

Stanton, D. A. (ed.) (1992a) Discourses of Sexuality. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

Stanton, D. A. (1992b) 'Introduction: The subject of sexuality,' in Stanton 1992a: 1–46.

Turner, B. S. (1984) The Body and Society: Explorations in Social Theory. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Turner, B. S. (1992) 'The body question: Recent developments in social theory,' in Turner, B. S. (ed.) Regulating Bodies: Essays in Medical Sociology. London and New York: Routledge, 31–66.

Van Eijk, T. H. C. (1972) 'Marriage and virginity, death and immortality,' in Fontaine, J. and Kannengiesser, C. (eds) Epektasis: Mélanges patristiques offerts au Cardinal Jean Daniélou. Paris: Beauchesne, 209–235.

Wimbush, V. L. (ed.) (1990) Ascetic Behavior in Greco-Roman Antiquity: A Sourcebook. Studies in Antiquity and Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Wimbush, V. L. and Valantasis, R. (eds) (1995) Asceticism. New York: Oxford University Press.

18

SEX AND SEXUAL RENUNCIATION II

Developments in research since 2000[1]

Elizabeth A. Castelli

In the last few decades, the history of sexuality has flourished as a field, and there now exists a robust archive of scholarly writing spanning a vast array of geographical and cultural locations, historical periods, and theoretical frameworks (for a survey of antiquity, see, for example, Masterson et al. 2015). The study of sexuality in early and late ancient Christianity is no exception, and the last fifteen years or so have been especially generative of thoughtful investigations into the construction of sex and sexuality in the first several centuries of the common era.

One cannot explore the history of sexuality in antiquity without also engaging with a series of other histories—the history of the body (Miller 2009; Castelli 2013; Kuefler 2015), the history of gender ideologies (Gaca 2003; Cuffel 2007; Petrey 2016), and the competing histories of ascendant and declining religious communities and practices. This chapter begins with a supplementary discussion of the theoretical frames that have shaped the history of sexuality (especially the work of Michel Foucault and Thomas Laqueur) and the addition of queer theory to the conversation. It then seeks to point the reader toward topics and themes in recent scholarship that broaden our understanding of the history of sexuality and sexual renunciation in the first centuries of the common era. These include new scholarship on the history of sexuality in late ancient Judaism; newly available (English translations of) sources in Syriac and Coptic that broaden the archive for the study of late ancient Christianity; emerging themes in the study of masculinity; and sex in the context of the institution of slavery.

Theoretical framings revisited and revised

The historical study of sexuality has, for the last several decades, been framed by debates over Michel Foucault's arguments in the first volume of his now-canonical History of Sexuality, which appeared in the late 1970s. In this slim volume, Foucault argued that sexuality should be understood as a modern category linked to a post-Enlightenment concept of the autonomous subject. That is, Foucault argued, prior to the nineteenth century (or so), no one had a sexuality in the sense that sexuality was part of one's identity. People did sexual things, of course, but these acts did not coalesce into a distinctive expression of who people were. Whereas a modern person might well routinely speak of his or her sexuality as an element of their social and personal identity—often as part of a litany of gender, race, class, etc.—this practice, Foucault argued, both has a history and should not be facilely projected onto other times and places, as though it were a natural and transhistorical way of understanding human experience tout court. In short, for Foucault, sexuality is not something that one has but a discourse that speaks one into being.

Volumes two and three of the History of Sexuality appeared in print just shortly before Foucault's death in 1984; they were translated a year or two later. The fourth volume of the series, Les Aveux de la chair ['The Confessions of the Flesh'], the one that promised to present Foucault's treatment of early Christianity, was never published though appeared fragmentarily in Jeremy Carrette's curated collection from the archive (Foucault 1999) and in Foucault's Collège de France lectures from 1981 and 1982, which were published in English more than two decades later (Foucault 2005). A special issue of The Journal of the History of Sexuality published in 2001 (Boyarin and Castelli 2001) curated a collection of articles that did not seek to reconstruct Foucault's unpublished volume but rather invited contributors to flesh out various histories of sexuality using late ancient Jewish and Christian sources as the archive. (For a brief engagement with Foucault's influence on the study of spiritual practice and renunciation in Jewish antiquity, by way of Pierre Hadot's work—Hadot, one of Foucault's teachers and interlocutors about antiquity—see Schofer 2003.)

Foucault's legacy extends beyond its own explicit transmission and reception history, and it had a clear influence over a book whose influence cannot be overestimated: Thomas Laqueur's 1990 book, Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud, which posited a radical change in the understanding of the body—from the one-sex body to the two-sex body—toward the end of the seventeenth century. Laqueur is a medieval historian, but Making Sex provided a compelling and sweeping historical narrative stretching across centuries, disciplines, and archives. Produced in the wake of Foucault's History of Sexuality, with its insistence upon the radical break between past and present, which Foucault situated in the nineteenth century, Laqueur's Making Sex was received enthusiastically by scholars across a broad interdisciplinary terrain, including among scholars of Christianity in late antiquity.

The book deserves a revisiting largely because Helen King, a historian of ancient medicine, has recently published a powerful critique of Laqueur's thesis in a monograph entitled, The One-Sex Body on Trial: The Classical and Early Modern Evidence (2013). King is far from the only scholar who has critiqued or challenged Laqueur's thesis, though as she notes, these other critiques generally follow a similar rhetorical pattern. As she puts it:

> The pattern of attacks on Making Sex is normally to say that, while the author accepts the overall validity of Laqueur's model, she wishes to challenge the particular sub-section on which she is an expert; thus the model as a whole manages to survive, despite multiple, and cumulative, challenges.
>
> (King 2013: 15; see also 15 n. 61)

Her own conclusion is more sweeping: '"Never" is a strong word but, as this book will show, I have found it difficult to identify any historical period in which a "one-sex" model dominated' (King 2013: 7). The substance of King's monograph offers not only a rather devastating critique of Laqueur's method and conclusions but also an alternative historical account that illuminates a more complex account of the medical, literary, and philosophical texts from antiquity.

Laqueur's one-sex theory may have been sidelined by the critique of King and others, but another work of theory published the same year—Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick's Epistemology of the Closet—helped to launch the field of queer theory, a theoretical field that some scholars of sexuality and sexual renunciation in classical and late antiquity have used to construct a new theoretical scaffolding for their work. For example, Virginia Burrus's The Sex Lives of Saints (2004) offers a transgressive reading of early Christian saints' lives, arguing that these texts are 'the site of an exuberant eroticism' and 'that sanctity can be restyled as an erotic art, that the holy Life carries us to the extremities of human desire,' calling these ideas 'admittedly queer notions' (Burrus 2004: 1). She defines her terms in this way:

> Here as elsewhere, I use the term queer to designate erotic practices that actively resist and/or put into question the very categories of the 'normal,' the 'conventional,' or the 'natural,' particularly in contexts in which resistance exposes, critiques, and subverts the violence of both domus and dominus. The 'queer' overlaps at some points (but by no means at all points) with the 'homoerotic,' e.g., where homoerotic practices resist the conventions of either marriage or pederasty.
>
> (Burrus 2004: 168 n. 66)

More recently, historian of Christian asceticism David Hunter has argued for interpreting early Christian celibacy as a 'queer' practice. Adopting Patrick Cheng's definition of 'queer' as 'a transgressive form of religious life, especially one that is "transgressive or opposed to societal norms, particularly with respect to sexuality and gender identity"' (Hunter 2015: 13, quoting Cheng 2011: 5), Hunter argues that early Christian celibacy successfully challenged dominant social institutions like marriage and the family, disrupted and sometimes overturned the received gender norms and categories that governed late ancient society, and created an opening for new forms of homosociality and modes of living in monastic and other living arrangements (Hunter 2015: 21–22). 'If it is "queer" to question the hegemony of traditional ideals of marriage, to destabilize gender distinctions, and to create alternative lifestyles and new forms of community, then early Christian celibacy was decidedly "queer"' (Hunter 2015: 22).

Hunter builds on the work of feminist scholars who have emphasized the 'gender-bending' nature of many ancient Christian sources, especially those that represent spiritual virtuosity in terms of the transcendence of femininity or the transformation of the (inferior) feminine into the (superior) masculine. Less well explored has been the ways in which some authors flip the terms of the gender-bending when it comes to ascetical virtuosity, though a recent article by Ellen Muehlberger (2015) offers a salutary reading of Theodoret's Religious History highlighting Theodoret's frequent descriptions of ascetical men who were spiritual exemplars in terms that seem to have derived from ancient medical sources discussing female bodies. Muehlberger argues that through the use of these images, 'Theodoret conveyed the excellence and sheer strangeness—the "otherworldly nature"—of the ascetics he portrayed' (Muehlberger 2015: 585). The medical corpus reaches back centuries, but as Muehlberger points out, medical writers and practitioners in late antiquity were curators and conservators of knowledge, dependent to a very high degree upon their predecessors. As a consequence, the Hippocratic corpus' critical account of sexual difference as a difference predicated on the relative capacity to produce fluid from one's body—women being more highly fluid than men, as it were—functions as a scientific resource for much later writers and theorists, including a writer like Theodoret, who cultivated a vision of gender parity with respect to the ethical constitution of men and women subjects. Yet, as Muehlberger shows, Theodoret portrays ascetical men as possessed of feminine physical characteristics—specifically, the tendency toward the emission of fluids: tears and sweat, notably, but also blood. She goes on to read two particularly graphic episodes in the life of Simeon the Stylite in Theodoret's History, scenes in which other monks examine Simeon's body and discover 'something unexpected' in the wounds they probe. Muehlberger concludes by challenging scholars not to presume too much about the fixity of gender in the ancient Christian context but rather to remain open to local, shifting ideas about bodies, sexualities, and genders.

But there are other sorts of narratives too, including narratives that reflect on unexpected bodily pairings, homosocial bonds, and institutional responses to them as they emerge in stories about saintly lives and monastic communities. For example, Derek Krueger (2011) explores the theme of monastic companionship in a survey of Byzantine hagiographical sources, showing how narratives about the close bonds between two monks simultaneously mobilize and sublimate desire, offer aspirational models for those seeking to live the angelic life of asceticism, and suggest a complex dynamic of homosociality among monks—one that could (and likely did) provide a social form that supported celibate commitments but that might also inspire temptation (a frequent and urgent topic in monastic handbooks) and also suspicion and envy on the part of those who witnessed these intimate bonds of friendship and affinity. Like Muehlberger, Krueger emphasizes the critical demand for attention to historical differences over the deployment of a general transhistorical and transportable notion of 'sexuality' across time and cultural context.

Future work might consider moving beyond the literary archive and into material culture and archaeology. See, for example, archaeologist Barbara Voss, who argues that 'queer theory provides a methodological bridge between archaeological research on sexuality and research on other aspects of social identity' (Voss 2008: 317).

Supplementing the archive: Coptic and Syriac sources

Recent scholarship on early Christian asceticism has sought to expand the research archive beyond the Greek and Latin sources that have dominated the field, and with the publication of new English translations of Coptic and Syriac sources—especially works by the fourth- to fifth-century Egyptian bishop Shenoute (Layton 2014; Brakke and Crislip 2015; see Emmel 2004) and the fourth-century Persian sage Aphrahat (Lehto 2010)—students and non-specialists can now have ready access to this rich body of literature.

The corpus of Shenoute's ascetical writings is still in the process of critical editing and translation by an international team of scholars. Following on from the codicological work of Stephen Emmel, scholars now customarily divide the corpus into two bodies of text: nine volumes of texts addressed to the members of his monastic community, both men and women (the Canons), and the eight volumes of collected writings for more public audiences—letters, sermons, and various other writings (the Discourses). Excerpts from these two collections have recently appeared in relatively easily available English translations: Bentley Layton's excerpts from the Canons (2014) and David Brakke's and Andrew Crislip's partial anthology from the Discourses (2015).

As Layton has edited and arranged the contents of the Canons, one encounters in the text a series of prohibitions and curses alongside more general statements about the life of the community (on form, see Layton 2014: 42–45; see Schroeder 2015 for a review of Layton's anthology and editorial decisions). The Canons offer ample material for reconstructing Shenoute's concerns over 'crushing carnal longing' (Shenoute Canon 3 [Codex YB 69–70 = FR-BN 130^2 f. 59r.–v.]; Layton 2014: 101, no. 27), cursing 'all who kiss or embrace one another with desirous passion, whether young or old, whether parent or child, whether male of female' (Shenoute Canon 1 [Codex XC 7 = AT-NB K9201 (1)r]; Layton 2014: 93, no. 5), yet there is a particular focus on prohibitions of behaviors and practices that might result in homoerotic encounters. (The gender segregation of the monasteries under Shenoute's governance rendered heterosexual encounters less likely.)

Scholarship on Egyptian monasticism, focusing on Shenoute's community and corpus, is still emerging and will develop further as the critical editions and translations produced by the international team under Emmel's leadership appear in print. Meanwhile, Brakke's and Crislip's introductory chapters provide a good overview of scholarship. Moreover, the work of Rebecca Krawiec on the women monastics of Shenoute's White Monastery (2002) and Caroline Schroeder on Shenoute's ascetic ideology (2006, 2007) are required reading.

Aphrahat's Demonstrations address the question of sex and sexual renunciation in Demonstration 6 ('On Covenanters'), where Aphrahat gives precise instruction about the ascetical life and its eschatological importance, and in Demonstration 18 ('Against the Jews, concerning virginity and holiness'), where he uses Christian sexual renunciation as a key rhetorical counterpoint to the Judaism of his time (Lehto 2006; Koltun-Fromm 2010; for a more general study of early Christian vituperative rhetoric, see Knust 2006). The rhetoric of Demonstration 6 suggests that Aphrahat views his audience as always potentially on the verge of abandoning the ascetic, renunciatory life; he bolsters his arguments on its behalf by emphasizing the dangers of women for ascetic men:

[w]e know and have seen that from the beginning women have been a way for the Adversary to gain access to people, and until the end he will [continue to] accomplish this. For [women] are the weapon of Satan, and through them he fights against the [spiritual] athletes.

*(*Demonstration 6.6)

He also insists upon the superiority of the single life, commitment to which requires constant vigilance (see Demonstrations 6.5).

In Demonstration 18, meanwhile, Aphrahat reads the history of Israel in order to argue that the biblical narrative shows repeatedly how reproduction produces corruption and destruction, culminating in the argument, 'There are many similar [cases], in which it would have been better for [certain people] not to have fathered [children] or to have been born' (Demonstration 18.6). Allegorizing the Genesis 2:24, 'A man must leave his father and his mother and be united with his wife, and they will become one flesh,' Aphrahat interprets this passage as a defense of and exhortation toward asceticism:

This is the meaning: when a man has not yet taken a wife, he loves and honors God, his Father, and the Holy Spirit, his Mother, and for him there is no other love. But when a man takes a wife, he forsakes his father and his mother (those which were just mentioned), and his mind is captivated by this world. His mind and his heart and his reasoning are dragged away from God into the midst of the world, and he loves and delights in it as a man loves the wife of his youth. His love for her is different than [his love] for his father and his mother . . . For it is true that just as a man and a woman become one flesh and one mind, and [a man's] thoughts and reasoning become separate from his father and mother, so too a man who has not yet taken a wife and who remains alone is in one spirit and one mind with his father.

*(*Demonstrations 18.10–11)

Sex and sexual renunciation in ancient and late ancient Jewish sources

In 2005, in a review essay published in the Jewish Quarterly Review, rabbinics scholar Charlotte Elisheva Fonrobert diagnosed a 'relatively minor delay' in Jewish Studies entering into the theoretical conversations about the body and sexuality (Fonrobert 2005: 462–463). This short delay notwithstanding, scholars in the field of Judaism in antiquity have been quite productive in recent years, generating a compelling body of work that should be read in close concert with scholarship on early Christianity. This work cannot be fully represented here, but a few exemplars will be illustrative.

With sexual renunciation occupying such a prominent position in the early Christian imaginary and with Foucault's foundational account of the history of sexuality tracing historical lineages from Greece and Rome to Christianity with barely a mention of Judaism, biblical scholar Lawrence Wills raised an important critique in a 2006 article, 'Ascetic Theology Before Asceticism?,' where he offered a supplementary narrative that traced the ascetic imperative back to pre-Christian Jewish narratives. Drawing upon Carol Newsom's earlier theoretical framing of asceticism in the Qumran material as an occasion of the 'decentering of the self' (2005), Wills reads the novelistic accounts of Esther, Aseneth, and Judith, and the pseudepigraphical testaments of Joseph and Job to argue for the existence of a significant 'narrative asceticism' in Jewish literature by the turn of the first century before the common era (Wills 2006). Positioning his own discussion in light of other recent scholarship on the nature and relative prevalence of Jewish asceticism, especially that of Michael Satlow (2003) and Eliezer Diamond (2004), Wills suggests that the literary models he analyzes expand the imaginative horizon through which self-decentering practices might have developed among Jewish writers and their audiences, well in advance of early Christian ascetical projects.

While these scholars can locate a tradition of asceticism within late ancient Judaism that resonates with that of late ancient Christianity, others have suggested a more oblique (if also more expansive) rabbinic relationship to askesis in the mishnaic system of purity. Mira Balberg's book, Purity, Body, and Self in Early Rabbinic Literature (2014), explores how biblical notions of purity translated into a new form of embodied living and social life in a different cultural and historical framework. Balberg focuses on theorizations of the body and practices of self-examination and self-scrutiny—that is, askesis—placing the idealizations of rabbinic prescriptions in heuristic comparison with Greco-Roman precursors, especially the moral philosophers. Sexual renunciation per se, so central for Christian ascetics and their efforts to reconstitute the self and society through the management of desire, is not at the core of rabbinic theorizations of asceticism, whereas the more expansive capacity for self-management and self-control (achieved through self-scrutiny) is. Balberg puts it this way toward the end of her study:

> The ability to control oneself, mentally and physically, is the main trait that distinguishes the idealized mishnaic subject from his oppositional counterparts . . . The life of the mishnaic subject . . . is underwritten by regimented self-examination that, as Seneca observed, yields self-mastery since one learns to shape one's behavior so as to avoid the exhortation of one's internalized overseer. To this end, the pursuit of purity (as well as, one might argue, adherence to Jewish law in general) not only depends on one's capacity for self-control, but also actively enhances this capacity.

She further states:

> [s]elf-control is intertwined in the mishnaic discourse of purity and impurity with self-knowledge . . . by portraying these two inextricable qualities as what enables the pursuit of purity, the rabbis gave the quest for ritual purity a new ethical substance, which allowed it to resonate with the cultural values that dominated their world.
>
> (Balberg 2014: 165; for a comparative study of purity in rabbinic and early Christian sources, see Fonrobert 2000)

Other feminist scholars working on Jewish sources have focused on narratives and metaphors of sexual violence and availability to make broader points about the status of the community in the wake of challenge or domination. Julia Watts Belser, for example, analyzes narratives from b. Gittin where the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem by the Romans in 70 CE and the later Roman defeat of the Bar Kochba revolt in the early second century are narrated metaphorically as occasions of rape (b. Gittin 56; Belser 2014: 11–12; b. Gittin 58a; Belser 2014: 20–21) and sexual violence coupled with the humiliation and domination of enslavement (b. Gittin 57b; Belser 2014: 18–19). Close readings of the three narratives uncover a pattern of metaphorization that uses sexual violence and enslavement to signify political domination and lament, turning attention away from the ideologically charged instrumentalist use of women's bodies toward a story about the resilience of the community. 'Through narratives of sexual subjugation and rape, Bavli Gittin's account of the destruction of Jerusalem gives poignant voice to rabbinic grief and violation at the hands of Rome,' Belser writes. 'Through subversive mimicry that highlights the brutality of imperial conquest through sexual domination, these rabbinic narratives stigmatize Roman savagery and galvanize moral outrage at the brutality of the conqueror' (Belser 2014: 24). The writers of these narratives deploy graphic metaphors of sexual violence in order to scandalize, but in the process—by using sexual violence to think with, to borrow, and adapt a well-worn notion from Lévi-Strauss—they 'reinscribe the vulnerability and invisibility of women and enslaved people in both rabbinic and Roman cultures' (Belser 2014: 5).

Gail Labovitz, a feminist scholar of rabbinic texts, has also focused on the Babylonian Talmud, but undertakes a slightly different approach by looking at legal and narrative texts together, in order to understand the work that these two genres perform in relation to each other. In a 2008 article, 'Of Proper and Unrestrained Men,' she examines the dense narratives in Qiddušin 80b–81b, which offer a commentary on the legal text m. Qidd. 4:12 (containing rules governing the private contact between men and women); because of the law's content, Labovitz argues that the narrative sugya provides its readers insights into rabbinic ideas about gender and sexuality. The narratives thematize the erotics of sight, the confusions and deceptions of impersonation, the vagaries and humiliations of sexual temptation, and the attractions of the forbidden. In reading the text closely, Labovitz argues that the narrative opens itself to multiple potentially contradictory readings of the text's position on gender and sexuality. Emphasizing a readerly, rhetorical, and literary approach to the text, Labovitz suggests that the multivalence of the narrative opens the text up and positions it as a space for reflection and questioning—perhaps, in the first instance, in the homosocial space of the rabbinic study house where men organized their learning and their social selves in relationship to the text and one another; but secondarily, for all readers, who might find in the text an ambiguity worthy of their engagement (Labovitz 2008: 66–68).

For rabbinic scholar Rachel Neis, the sense of sight itself can offer a window onto the rabbinic world's ideas about divinity, sexuality and gender, and rabbinic subjectivity itself. In a chapter devoted to 'visual eros,' Neis explores several key passages in which the rabbis, both Palestinian and Babylonian, argued about sexuality and its relationship to the gaze. Like Christian ascetical theorists, the rabbis understood that the gaze was inexorably linked to desire, and their efforts to police and regulate the gaze sought to rein in masculine desire in particular and to reshape masculine subjectivity. Neis finds in her texts an ambiguity that echoes Labovitz's:

> By constructing their own masculinity in terms of a restrained gaze, and by conceiving of themselves as erotic objects of vision, the rabbis end up confounding a straightforward account of the male gaze or of masculinity. At the same time, prohibition itself is productive of the forbidden. Especially as visual restraint or abstinence, it serves to form an idealized, 'holy' rabbinic subject.
>
> (Neis 2013: 168–169)

Again, like their Christian counterparts whose lives are preserved in hagiographic literature (see Krueger 2011; Burrus 2004 in particular), the rabbis' relationship to bodies, subjectivities, and sexuality can be understood to extend beyond strict normative, ascetical framings and into a different domain, that of the homosocial and the homoerotic—here, configured precisely through becoming the object of the gaze of another (see Schroeder 2009).

Masculinity

Much of the study of gender and sexuality in the religions of late antiquity emerged coincident with feminist historiography and feminist studies of religion. Insofar as 'gender' so often functions as a stand-in for 'women,' and because the critical and recuperative work of feminist studies was often initially focused on supplementing the dominant historiographical narrative (with its privilege of men's experiences), the critical engagement with the construction of masculinity took a bit longer to take hold in much scholarship on early Christianity. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, numerous New Testament scholars turned their critical skills to the task of analyzing masculinity as a gendered ideology in biblical sources and the effects of that ideology on writing about sexuality and sexual renunciation (Moore and Anderson 2003; Martin 2006; Conway 2008; for Roman sources, see Masterson 2014). A few years earlier and with characteristic theoretical acumen, Virginia Burrus explored how ideologies of masculinity intersected with and were transformed through the theological debates over the Trinity and the persons of the divine. Reading the writings of Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, and Ambrose—ascetics, all—Burrus showed how the ascetic impulse, as Geoffrey Harpham named it some years earlier, and its reimagining of the body and subjectivity helped to shape a reformulated idea of 'manhood,' of paternity, and of generation, one detached from traditional notions of embodiment and social roles (Burrus 2000).

A year later, historian Mathew Kuefler published his groundbreaking monograph, The Manly Eunuch, a detailed and sweeping history of the remaking of notions of masculinity from the beginning of the third century CE through the middle of the fifth in the western Roman empire, a remaking shaped by the direct engagement of Christian ideology with dominant 'pagan' Roman models of manliness (Kuefler 2001). For Kuefler, the figure of the eunuch—a historical figure whose uncanny presence disrupted simple binaries of sexual difference and opened up the possibility for thinking masculinity differently, but also a robust metaphor for Christian thinkers whose ascetical commitments required an alternative model to the domestic patriarch/householder—provides a critical aperture for capturing the ideological shifts that took place around sex and gender in the period of the Christianization of the empire. The book culminates in a critical reading of the figure of the monk, 'the manly eunuch' of the book's title, a figure who managed to craft subjectivity out of a potentially contradictory set of associations and tropes—as soldier of Christ, as bride of Christ, and as eunuch for the kingdom of heaven (Kuefler 2001: 273–282). For both Burrus and Kuefler, the ideological innovations they trace for the notions of 'manhood' and 'masculinity' are paradoxical: a critique and abandonment of certain traditional notions, but a reinscription of authority and even (spiritual) paternity in new terms.

Whereas Kuefler and Burrus attend to the ideological construction of masculinity in theological and hagiographical sources as a matter of consolidation and reframing, Caroline Schroeder reminds us of the practical concerns over masculinity and sexuality in monastic communities in an essay with a whimsically anachronistic title, 'Queer Eye for the Ascetic Guy?' (2009). Schroeder opens by quoting a famous dictum from the Apophthegmata Patrum/Sayings of the Desert Fathers: 'Do not bring young boys here. Four churches in Scetis are deserted because of boys' (PG 65:225, quoted in Schroeder 2009: 333–334). Schroeder explores the broader literary and historical context for this prohibition, focusing on stories in the AP and the rules and letters of Shenoute, noting that such prohibitions exist in tandem with many literary references to the presence of boys and adolescent men within narratives about monks and monastic life. 'Despite the sources' overt disavowal of sexual contact between men and boys,' Schroeder writes, 'the circulation, retelling and rereading of these texts, containing their stories and rules about sex with children, keeps homoeroticism and the representation of boys as sexually desirable objects alive in the ascetic imagination' (Schroeder 2009: 334).

In the case of the scholarship on changing notions of masculinity, as with so many other topics taken up in this chapter, the source material is overwhelmingly literary and therefore vulnerable to the critique of its partiality and elitism. Hagiographical literature seeks to create ethical models, even as it presents itself narratively as historical chronicle. Treatises on the virtues of asceticism, rulebooks for monastic communities, even letters from ascetical leaders to communities and disciples all require a careful rhetorical engagement in order to extract plausible historical details—which remain fragmentary and open to multiple possible readings. Further research will need to take up more fully other available evidence—artistic, archaeological, epigraphic, and documentary—that offers the promise of a fuller portrait of the ascetical past. One suggestive example of the potential fruitfulness of this shift in source material may be found in Christian Laes's study of Latin funeral inscriptions in Rome, in which there is a vocabulary shift—the adoption of the Latin words virginius and, more commonly and surprisingly, virgo to describe a number of young men whose deaths are commemorated in early Christian epitaphs (Laes 2013).

Sex and the limits of renunciation: the example of slavery

Slavery was part of the social and economic fabric of the ancient world, taken for granted by most ancient sources (Bradley and Cartledge 2011). By both law and custom, slaves occupied a distinct subject position in ancient Mediterranean societies, subject to severe corporal punishment by their owners and torture by the judicial authorities—and sexual use and abuse by their masters. Arguments against slavery are exceptionally rare in ancient texts, with the vast majority of sources either taking for granted slavery and the systems of domination that kept it in place (including the use of metaphors of slavery and freedom in theological and ethical contexts), or devoting themselves to discussions of the nature and management of enslaved people (Garnsey 1996; for non-textual, artistic sources, see Rose 2008). Until recently, scholarship on early Christianity has been reticent to engage with the question of slavery in the ancient Christian world, though the tide has turned in the twenty-first century (Clark 1998; Glancy 2002, 2010, 2011, 2015; Harrill 2005; Briggs 2010; Marchal 2011; De Wet 2015; for Judaism, see Hezser 2005, 2011; Labovitz 2012).

The work of Jennifer Glancy is exemplary for changing the terms of scholarly analysis and debate. Glancy has charted an unflinching course for scholarship to reconstruct a more complete portrait of the early Christian world—with respect to slavery in general, but also with respect to the sexual use of slaves by Christian masters. In a particularly trenchant summary of the historical situation, Glancy writes:

> Every generation of Christians in antiquity included slaveholders. The persistence of slave-holding as a practice among geographically scattered Christians over a period of centuries testifies to the enduring power of the institution of slavery in antiquity. With rare and limited exceptions, Christian authors expressed no opprobrium towards Christian slaveholders. Slaveholding was not considered a sin. Accommodation to slavery coloured ecclesiastical policy when the Church assumed political prominence in the fourth century. Even theologians who expressed antipathy towards the institution or the behaviour endemic to slaveholding produced no systematic critiques of slavery, nor did they advocate its abolition. Some bishops, priests, deacons and monasteries were slaveholders. Although individual theologians spoke against particular aspects of characteristic slaveholder behaviour, including brutal corporal punishment and the sexual use of slaves, we can adduce little evidence to distinguish the behaviour of ordinary Christian slaveholders from that of other Jewish, Greek or Roman slaveholders in locales as geographically and chronologically diverse as first-century Jerusalem, second-century Alexandria and fourth-century Milan.
>
> (Glancy 2011: 461–462)

Glancy focuses particular attention on what she calls 'a contentious area in the study of Christian slaveholding' (Glancy 2011: 466), Christian responses to the ubiquitous and routine sexual use of slaves by their masters. The evidence is fragmentary, to be sure, but even small references in ancient sources suggest at most efforts to manage an ongoing situation in which slaveholding was part of the fabric of society rather than opposing the widespread system of slavery itself. A third-century church manual (Apostolic Tradition 16:14–16) articulates the terms under which concubines of Christian men could be baptized into the church and Christian men could maintain their relationships with these enslaved women. Fourth-century bishops like Basil of Caesarea and John Chrysostom at several points admonished slaveholders over their sexual use and abuse of female slaves, and Basil also addressed the question of the moral status of a female slave forced into sexual activity. Glancy interprets this evidence as follows:

> [b]y late antiquity, a number of Christian authors explicitly addressed and condemned the sexual use of slaves by their owners, yet the impression created by their texts is that they spoke bravely against a practice deeply entrenched among Christians . . . From the east to the west of the empire, Christian theologians wrestled with a situation they confronted in their own communities, the socially sanctioned sexual use of slaves by slaveholders, including Christian slaveholders. Despite the objections of theologians, Christian slaveholders conformed to the universally attested ancient practice of relying on slaves as sexual outlets.
>
> (Glancy 2011:467–468)

Glancy's analysis, which is echoed by others (e.g., Marchal 2011; De Wet 2015), is important both as a corrective to the historical narrative and a trenchant reminder about the challenges and limitations of the sources themselves. Focused as we are primarily on written, literary sources that provide scholars with the social and moral perspectives of literate church elites, we remain always at a remove from Christians on the ground, as it were—the many who saw no contradiction between membership in the church and full participation in the social and economic life of the society at large. By reading the idealizing and aspirational admonitions of some church leaders against the grain, one encounters a more complicated portrait of the lived reality of Christian sex and sexual renunciation in antiquity.

Future work

As I have noted in relation to several of the themes and topics outlined here, the archive of primary sources for reconstructing the history of the body and sexuality in early Christianity and late antiquity is overwhelmingly contained in literary sources that reflect the perspectives and interests of literate elites whose framing of the questions is often beholden to philosophical and rhetorical models more well-suited to offering their readers a window onto an idealized or ideologically steeped world. I have offered a few modest suggestions for ways to expand the archive to include archaeology, epigraphy, and art within the body of ancient sources scholars and students might draw upon for their research. I would add to this list documentary papyri, limited insofar as most of it comes to us from Egypt (whose climate has allowed for its preservation) but nonetheless potentially enriching of our understanding of the lives and experiences of ordinary people whose interests and commitments may have been rather different from those of bishops, teachers, and other social elites. The recently published anthology by papyrologist Erica A. Mathieson (2014) supplements the scholarship of AnneMarie Luijendijk (2008) by focusing specifically on women in the Greek papyri.

Note

1 Editor's note: The first edition of the Early Christian World included an excellent review essay by Teresa M. Shaw on sex and sexual renunciation in early Christianity, which provides both a thoughtful engagement with the relevant theoretical issues and a survey of the historical archive. This chapter has been retained in its original form in this edition. The current essay focuses on the scholarly field since the publication of that first edition and so refers almost exclusively to work published since 2000 in this very lively field and offers a coda to Shaw's work.

Bibliography

Balberg, M. (2014) Purity, Body, and Self in Early Rabbinic Literature. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Belser, J. W. (2014) 'Sex in the shadow of Rome: Sexual violence and theological lament in Talmudic disaster tales,' Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion 30(1): 5–24.

Boyarin, D. and Castelli, E. A. (eds) (2001) Sexuality in Late Antiquity. Special Issue of The Journal of the History of Sexuality 10(3/4): 355–622.

Bradley, K. and Cartledge, P. (eds) (2011) Cambridge World History of Slavery, Vol 1: The Ancient Mediterranean World. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Brakke, D. and Crislip, A. (trans) (2015) Selected Discourses of the Shenoute the Great: Community, Theology, and Social Conflict in Late Antique Egypt. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Briggs, S. (2010) 'Gender, slavery, and technology: The shape of the early Christian moral imagination,' in Brooten, B. J. (ed.) with editorial assistance of Hazelton, J. L. Beyond Slavery: Overcoming Its Religious and Sexual Legacies. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 159–176.

Burrus, V. (2000) 'Begotten, Not Made': Conceiving Manhood in Late Antiquity. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Burrus, V. (2004) The Sex Lives of Saints: An Erotics of Ancient Hagiography. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Carrette, J. R. (2000) Foucault and Religion: Spiritual Corporality and Political Spirituality. New York: Routledge.

Castelli, E. A. (2013) 'The body,' in Spaeth, B. (ed.) The Cambridge Companion to Ancient Mediterranean Religions. New York: Cambridge University Press, 252–280.

Cheng, P. S. (2011) Radical Love: An Introduction to Queer Theology. New York: Seabury.

Chin, C. M. and Schroeder, C. T. (eds) (2017) Melania: Early Christianity through the Life of One Family. Oakland, CA: University of California Press.

Clark, P. (1998) 'Women, slaves, and the hierarchies of domestic violence: The family of St Augustine,' in Joshel, S. R. and Murnaghan, S. (eds) Women and Slaves in Greco-Roman Culture. London and New York: Routledge, 112–133.

Conway, C. M. (2008) Behold the Man: Jesus and Greco-Roman Masculinity. New York: Oxford University Press.

Corbeill, A. (2015) Sexing the World: Grammatical Gender and Biological Sex in Ancient Rome. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Cuffel, A. (2007) Gendering Disgust in Medieval Religious Polemic. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

De Wet, C. L. (2015) Preaching Bondage: John Chrysostom and the Discourse of Slavery in Early Christianity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Diamond, E. (2004) Holy Men and Hunger Artists: Fasting and Asceticism in Rabbinic Culture. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Drake, S. (2013) Slandering the Jew: Sexuality and Difference in Early Christian Texts. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Emmel, S. (2004) Shenoute's Literary Corpus, 2 vols, CSCO 599–600. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Falcasantos, R. S. (2017) 'Wandering wombs, inspired intellects: Christian religious travel in late Antiquity,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 25: 89–117.

Fonrobert, C. (2000) Menstrual Purity: Rabbinic and Christian Reconstructions of Biblical Gender. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Fonrobert, C. (2005) 'On "Carnal Israel" and the consequences: Talmudic studies since Foucault,' Jewish Quarterly Review 95: 462–469.

Foucault, M. (1999) Religion and Culture, Jeremy R. Carrette (ed.). New York: Routledge.

Foucault, M. (2005) The Hermeneutics of the Subject: Lectures at the Collège de France 1981–1982, Gros, F. (ed.) and Burchell, G. (trans.). New York: Picador.

Foucault, M. (2014) Wrong-Doing, Truth-Telling: The Function of Avowal in Justice, Brion, F. and Harcourt, B. E. (eds) and Sawyer, S. W. (trans). Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Gaca, K. (2003) The Making of Fornication: Eros, Ethics, and Political Reform in Greek Philosophy and Early Christianity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Garnsey, P. (1996) Ideas of Slavery from Aristotle to Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Glancy, J. A. (2002) Slavery in Early Christianity. New York: Oxford University Press.

Glancy, J. A. (2010) 'Early Christianity, slavery, and women's bodies,' in Brooten, B. J. (ed.) with ed. assist. of Hazelton., J. L. Beyond Slavery: Overcoming Its Religious and Sexual Legacies. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 143–158.

Glancy, J. A. (2011) 'Slavery and the rise of Christianity,' in Bradley and Cartledge 2011: 456–481.

Glancy, J. A. (2015) 'The sexual use of slaves: A response to Kyle Harper on Jewish and Christian Porneia,' Journal of Biblical Literature 134: 215–229.

Harrill, J. A. (2005) Slaves in the New Testament: Literary, Social, and Moral Dimensions. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Hezser, C. (2005) Jewish Slavery in Antiquity. New York: Oxford University Press.

Hezser, C. (2011) 'Slavery and the Jews,' in Bradley and Cartledge 2011: 438–455.

Hunter, D. G. (2015) 'Celibacy was queer: Rethinking early Christianity,' in Talvacchia, K. T., Pettinger, M. F. and Larrimore, M. (eds) Queer Christianities: Lived Religion in Transgressive Forms. New York: New York University Press.

Hunter, D. G. (2017) Marriage and Sexuality in the Early Church. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Jacobs, A. S. (2003) '"Let him guard pietas": Early Christian exegesis and the ascetic family,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 11: 265–281.

King, H. (2013) The One-Sex Body on Trial: The Classical and Early Modern Evidence. Farnham, UK: Ashgate.

Knust, J. W. (2006) Abandoned to Lust: Sexual Slander and Ancient Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Koltun–Fromm, N. (2010) Hermeneutics of Holiness: Ancient Jewish and Christian Notions of Sexuality and Religious Community. New York: Oxford University Press.

Krawiec, R. (2002) Shenoute and the Women of the White Monastery: Egyptian Monasticism in Late Antiquity. New York: Oxford University Press.

Krawiec, R. (2003) '"From the womb of the church": Monastic families,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 11: 283–307.

Krawiec, R. (2008) 'Asceticism,' in Harvey, S. A. and Hunter, D. G. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 764–785.

Krawiec, R. (2009) '"Garments of Salvation": Representations of monastic clothing in late antiquity,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 17: 125–150.

Krueger, D. (2011) 'Between monks: Tales of monastic companionship in early Byzantium,' Journal of the History of Sexuality 20: 28–61.

Kuefler, M. (2001) The Manly Eunuch: Masculinity, Gender Ambiguity, and Christian Ideology in Late Antiquity. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Kuefler, M. (2015) 'Desire and the body in the patristic period,' in Thatcher, A. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Theology, Sexuality, and Gender. New York: Oxford University Press, 241–254.

Labovitz, G. (2008) 'Of proper and unrestrained men: Reading law, narrative, and desire in the Babylonian Talmud,' Hebrew Union College Annual 79: 43–68.

Labovitz, G. (2012) 'More slave women, more lewdness: Freedom and honor in rabbinic constructions of female sexuality,' Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion 28(2): 69–87.

Laes, C. (2013) 'Male virgins in Latin inscriptions from Rome,' in Katajala-Peltomaa, S. and Vuolanto, V. (eds) Religious Participation in Ancient and Medieval Societies: Rituals, Interaction, and Identity. Rome: Institutum Romanum Finlandiae, 105–119.

Laqueur, T. (1990) Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Layton, B. (2014) The Canons of Our Fathers: Monastic Rules of Shenoute. New York: Oxford University Press.

Lehto, A. (2006) 'Moral, ascetic, and ritual dimensions to law-observance in Aphrahat's demonstrations,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 14: 157–181.

Lehto, A. (2010) The Demonstrations of Aphrahat, Persian Sage, Gorgias Eastern Christian Studies 27. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Luijendijk, A. (2008) Greetings in the Lord: Early Christians and the Oxyrhynchus Papyri. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Marchal, J. A. (2011) 'The usefulness of an Onesimus: The sexual use of slaves and Paul's letter to Philemon,' Journal of Biblical Literature 130: 749–770.

Martin, D. B. (2006) Sex and the Single Savior: Gender and Sexuality in Biblical Interpretation. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Martin, D. B. and Miller, P. M. (eds) (2005) The Cultural Turn in Late Ancient Studies: Gender, Asceticism, and Historiography. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Masterson, M. (2014) Man to Man: Desire, Homosociality, and Authority in Late-Roman Manhood. Columbus, OH: Ohio State University Press.

Masterson, M., Rabinowitz, N. S. and Robson, J. (eds) (2015) Sex in Antiquity: Exploring Gender and Sexuality in the Ancient World. New York: Routledge.

Mathieson, E. A. (2014) Christian Women in the Greek Papyri of Egypt to 400 CE. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Miller, P. C. (2009) The Corporeal Imagination: Signifying the Holy in Late Ancient Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Moore, S. D. and Anderson, J. C. (eds) (2003) New Testament Masculinities. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Muehlberger, E. (2008) 'Ambivalence about the angelic life: The promise and perils of an early Christian discourse of asceticism,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 16: 447–478.

Muehlberger, E. (2015) 'Simeon and other women in Theodoret's religious history: Gender and the representation of late ancient Christian asceticism,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 23: 583–606.

Neis, R. (2013) The Sense of Sight in Rabbinic Culture: Jewish Ways of Seeing in Late Antiquity. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Newsom, C. (2005) The Self as Symbolic Space: Constructing Identity and Community at Qumran. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Petrey, T. (2016) Resurrecting Parts: Early Christians on Desire, Reproduction, and Sexual Difference. London and New York: Routledge.

Richlin, A. (2014) Arguments from Silence: Writing the History of Roman Women. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

Rose, M. E. (2008) 'The construction of mistress and slave relationships in late antique art,' Woman's Art Journal 29(2): 41–49.

Satlow, M. L. (2003) '"And on the Earth you shall sleep": "Talmud Torah" and rabbinic asceticism,' Journal of Religion 83: 204–225.

Schofer, J. (2003) 'Spiritual exercises in rabbinic culture,' Association of Jewish Studies Review 27: 203–225.

Schroeder, C. T. (2006) 'Prophecy and porneia in Shenoute's letters: The rhetoric of sexuality in a late antique Egyptian monastery,' Journal of Near Eastern Studies 65(2): 81–97.

Schroeder, C. T. (2006), 'The erotic asceticism of the Passion of Andrew: The Apocryphal Acts of Andrew, the Greek novel, and Platonic philosophy,' in Levine, A. J. with Robbins, M. M. (eds) The Feminist Companion to New Testament Apocrypha. Sheffield, UK: T & T Clark, 47–59.

Schroeder, C. T. (2007) Monastic Bodies: Discipline and Salvation in Shenoute of Atripe. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Schroeder, C. (2009) 'Queer eye for the ascetic guy? Homoeroticism, children, and the making of monks in late antique Egypt,' Journal of the American Academy of Religion 77: 333–347.

Schroeder, C. T. (2012) 'Child sacrifice in Egyptian monastic culture: From familial renunciation to Jephthah's lost daughter,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 20: 269–302.

Schroeder, C. (2015) 'In the footsteps of Shenoute,' Marginalia Review of Books, October 13, http://marginalia.lareviewofbooks.org/in-the-footsteps-of-shenoute-caroline-t-schroeder/.

Sedgwick, E. K. (1990) Epistemology of the Closet. Berkeley and Los Angeles, CA: University of California Press.

Voss, B. L. (2008) 'Sexuality studies in archaeology,' Annual Review of Anthropology 37: 317–336.

Wheeler–Reed, D. (2017) Regulating Sex in the Roman Empire: Ideology, the Bible, and the Early Christians. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Wills, Lawrence M. (2006) 'Ascetic theology before asceticism? Jewish narratives and the decentering of the self,' Journal of the American Academy of Religion 74: 902–925.

19

WOMEN, CHILDREN AND HOUSE CHURCHES

Mona Tokarek LaFosse

In private houses also we see wool-workers, cobblers, laundry-workers, and the most illiterate and bucolic yokels, who would not dare to say anything at all in front of their elders and more intelligent masters. But whenever they get hold of children in private and some stupid women with them, they let out some astounding statements as, for example, that they must not pay any attention to their fathers and school-teachers, but must obey them; they say that these talk nonsense and have no understanding, and that in reality they neither know nor are able to do anything good, but are taken up with mere empty chatter. But they alone, they say, know the right way to live, and if the children would believe them, they would become happy and make their home happy as well . . . [and] they should leave their fathers and their schoolmasters, and go along with the women and little children who are their playfellows to the wooldresser's shop, or to the cobbler's or the washerwoman's shop, that they may learn perfection. And by saying this they persuade them.

(Celsus in Origen, Against Celsus*, 3.55; Chadwick 1965: 165–66)*

As a critic of the early Christians, Celsus had many objections, but it is notable that his disapproval included the strategic presence of women, children and 'private' spaces. Celsus was drawing on a generalization in the ancient Mediterranean that women and children were susceptible to superstition and easily duped. This second-century critique is meant to discredit the teachings of the Christians[1] that Celsus saw as destabilizing social order. It is striking that women and children are highlighted, and implies that they were present in a way and with such numbers that outside observers took notice. Celsus refers to instruction not in public, but in closed and secret places, including places associated with women and children such as 'private houses'.

Celsus' critique brings together three important topics in the early Christian world that form the basis for this chapter: women, children and house churches. Though each could easily be justified as a chapter of its own, it is in the intersection of the three that we get a sense of how the movement of Jesus followers in the first and second centuries flourished in an urban environment. While the most prominent and visible people in the early Christian texts are men – Jesus, his twelve disciples, Paul and most of his co-workers – the centrality of the household for women's networks and children's upbringing provided stability for the community within the house church arrangement. Because their roles in society were integral to familial honour, women and children were perceived as being able to uphold – or undermine – that stability. Thus, women and children, both idealized and real, were critical to the development of house churches in early Christianity.

Gendered rhetoric, modern readers and a cross-cultural endeavour

The vast majority of ancient texts were written by adult men[2] and thus represent male perspectives on women, children and households, that is, perspectives of literate men with some wealth or status (as opposed to slaves or those of lower status). As a result of the development of feminist[3] and post-modern approaches, scholars have debated to what extent these texts can help us, as modern readers, access the lives of 'real' women and children in history. Some suggest we only access (male) perceptions of the ancient reality, shrouded in a cultural and ideological context that is accessible only through these same texts (Clark 2001: 425–6). In other words, 'real' women and children's voices are rarely, if ever, heard directly from the ancient evidence. Others, however, are confident we can sift through the evidence to find these voices, even if at times we can only hope to see a shadow of their experience (Osiek and MacDonald 2006; Cohick 2009).

An important starting place is a recognition that the author's rhetoric, the choice of words, themes, characteristics and emphases, reflects not only the perspective of the author but also his attempt to persuade his audience. Thus, the 'representation' of household, women and children may align more with an ideological notion of 'household', 'woman' and 'child' than with the real lives and experiences of women and children who populated the early Christian world (Clark 2001: 425–6). For example, how much a prescriptive text can tell us about real women's experiences is limited. A statement like, 'I permit no woman to speak or have authority over a man; she is to keep silent' (1 Tim. 2:12; NRSV) does not tell us that women were all silent. Rather, in the opinion of the author of 1 Timothy, at least some women were speaking up inappropriately and usurping what he saw as the proper authority of men. Whether the women he implicitly addresses understood themselves as challenging the status quo or acting inappropriately is unknown. Though the text suggests that some women were flaunting wealth and appearing immodest (2:9–10), we cannot access the real activities, attitudes or behaviours of these women from this description. We can only access the author's ideas about proper female behaviour and identity.[4]

Similarly, narratives are crafted with a purpose. The author's use of character may reflect an idealized or demonized image or a more realistic portrayal of the lives and experiences of women and children. The author's portrayal may tell us about little more than his own male perspectives. On the other hand, we may glean details about activities, social networks and responsibilities of women and children with careful and informed reading of narratives. These stories likely resonated with their early audiences, so that women and children saw themselves somehow reflected in these tales.

It is also helpful to consider the social construction of gender in the ancient world (Clark 2001, 413–14). Beyond 'women' and 'men' in a biological sense, 'gender' refers to how what was considered properly masculine and feminine (in a cultural sense) informed the ancient world view, regardless of sex. In Roman thinking, masculinity and femininity were always connected to one another, usually denoting polar opposites, such as male as active and female as passive. All other things being equal, male had precedence and authority over female. These conceptions of gender and gendered behaviour permeated Roman social life (Kraemer 2011: 15–16) and help us see nuances of the rhetoric of gender in text.

Another consideration, highlighted especially by feminist and post-colonialist scholars (Fiorenza 1984; Segovia and Tolbert 1995; Sugirtharajah 1995), is about us as modern readers and how close we can actually come to accessing the ancient author's intent and assumptions. We each bring our own assumptions and questions to the texts, so that we can never escape our own subjectivity and identity in our reading.

By realizing our own position and assumptions as readers and by considering the rhetorical message, conception of gender and patriarchal cultural world view of the male authors of ancient texts, we can search for clues about real women, children and households. They can be glimpsed with a two-pronged approach, which involves careful study and comparative work using insights from social history and social-scientific inquiry.

First, this approach involves comparing the language, characters and ideas of the text to findings of historians of the Greek and Roman world who work on text and artefact (Dixon 1988, 1992, 2001; Treggiari 1991; Balch and Osiek 2003; Rawson 2003; Saller 2004), including elite Roman texts and non-elite sources like papyri (e.g. wills, letters) and inscriptions (e.g. memorials, rules for voluntary associations). Second, this approach utilizes appropriately analogous context from modern Mediterranean ethnographies (observations and analysis of cultural anthropologists who have lived and participated in modern, traditional communities) to help to sketch out cultural patterns similar to the ancient Romans. Some ethnographies have access to women's worlds in a way that texts do not (e.g. Dubisch 1986; Fernea 1989; Abu-Lughod 1993). Such analogies from modern, traditional Mediterranean cultures, when corroborated by ancient evidence, help to provide a framework for studying texts about women and children in early Christian sources. It is important to note that modern, traditional ethnographies come with their own biases (no observer can be objective), adding another layer to sift through, even if what remains in the sieve is valuable! Again, that which is worthwhile in these observations needs to be corroborated with ancient evidence if it is to be useful in glimpsing real women and children in the ancient text.

Readers with modern, Western sensibilities tend to find some early Christian texts about women, children and house churches rather distasteful or offensive. Historical and cultural context, as outlined above, helps us to make sense of where these texts originated. As readers from a different time and culture than our own, it is important to recognize the gap between our modern experiences and values and those of the early Christian world. This is particularly important in a modern Western context when, for example, women have fought so hard to be able to count as persons in public discourse and activity, and when parents can usually assume their children will outlive them. The realities of the ancient Mediterranean were radically different, for men had social precedence, many children died before reaching adulthood and slavery was part of the fabric of society. Slaves of both sexes had no rights to personhood and no personal honour. Understanding women, children and house churches in the early Christian world means imagining a world that challenges modern Western assumptions about gender, age, individual motivation and cosmology. It means imagining a world on the basis of textual and visual evidence, striving to conceive of the realities of demography and social expectations of those living in the Roman empire. Early Christians both reflected and challenged the cultural values that informed the varying experiences of men, women and children.

In sum, the investigation toward teasing out the context of cultural norms and attitudes, of checking our own cultural and religious assumptions and of continuing dialogue and critique of scholars' investigations helps us to understand the perceptions of women, children and households, but also moves us toward seeing at least a little of the lives of real women and children, even if how close we come will continue to be debated.

Households and house churches

Celsus accuses Christians of sequestering their unsuspecting target in 'private' spaces. Early Christians often did meet in houses and eventually used household language and metaphor to characterize the relationships and sense of belonging for those in the group.

In Greek, the word oikos was used for 'house' (a physical dwelling) as well as for 'household' (those who lived within the house). Those who lived within the household, depending on the wealth and size of the household, included a husband and wife, their children and slaves, slave children, lodgers and perhaps extended family. A typical household was headed by the paterfamilias, a legal Latin word that referred to the man of house. The daily routine of the household was managed by his wife.[5] Various members of the household grew up and grew old; others joined and left through marriage, death, divorce, remarriage, needing care in sickness or old age, and the buying or selling of slaves.

Freed slaves would often remain in the employ of their former master. In some ways, the household was always in flux, yet it was also a place of stability, both physically and ideologically.

We might be tempted to think of oikos as one's 'family,' but, as the description above should demonstrate, this would be inaccurate. The definition of 'family' varies from culture to culture, which makes it a rather slippery term (Osiek 2011: 1). Some find the Latin words domus and familia helpful in conceptualizing what one might have meant by 'family'. Domus is roughly equivalent to the Greek oikos (both a dwelling and those who inhabit it) and familia refers to biologically related (or adopted) kin who may or may not live in the domus together (Bradley 1991; Dixon 1992). Familia was an important part of identity, but a person functioned on a daily basis and belonged to his or her domus or oikos. In ancient Greek times and in the time of the Roman Republic, when women married, they left their natal family and became part of the familia of their husband. However, by the first century CE, most women married sine manu (without manus, 'hand'), meaning that they were part of their husband's household, but still a member of their father's familia, which included the right to inherit from them. This shift promoted a new level of economic independence for some women, but also strong ties to both her natal family and her household (Winter 2003: 21). There were other shifts for women, such as Caesar Augustus' law, the Lex Papia Poppaea, which waived the requirement for a woman to have a male guardian for legal transactions, but only if she had three children, or four if she was a freedwoman. Augustus also promoted the concept of the household as central for the stability of the Roman empire, using it as a metaphor for the empire as a whole, with the emperor himself as the paterfamilias (legal head) of the family of the Roman empire (Rawson 2003: 38).

The two meanings of oikos correlate with two aspects of stability for the early Christian movement: the physical meeting space and a sense of belonging.

The story of Jesus and his disciples often featured scenes in houses (e.g. Mark 1:29, 33; 2:1; 3: 19–20; Gehring 2004: 18–118). Jesus followers met together on a regular basis perhaps often around a meal (1 Cor. 11:20–33) with worship, singing, reading sacred text and teaching (e.g. 1 Cor. 14:26; 2 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 10:25). Pliny the Younger's letter to the emperor Trajan (c. 117 CE) describes Christians meeting for worship and teaching and later for a meal (Letters 10.96–97). As Paul's letters and Acts indicate, these communities flourished in urban centres in house churches (Gehring 2004: 119–228).

In this urban environment there were many spaces in which Christians may have gathered, such as shops, barns, rented dining halls or inns (Adams 2013), but houses are attested early on as an important venue for meeting together in community or ekklēsia (usually translated as 'church'; 1 Cor. 16:19; Rom. 16:3–5; Phlm 2; Col. 4:15). Participants who were not slaves or lodgers in someone else's house mostly resided in insulae, or apartment buildings. Some insulae, like the House of Diana in Ostia, were large buildings, with shops at street level and apartments stacked two or three storeys high surrounding a shared courtyard. Others were more like Casette Tipo, a set of apartments with built-in latrines, also excavated at Ostia. Figure 19.1 features four ground-level apartments with two sets of central stairways that led to a second storey of apartments. One can imagine the close quarters meant neighbours knew one another well, and perhaps women worked together in their tasks of cooking, cleaning, caring for children and preparing for ritual. They were likely too cramped for any significant gathering, but may have been suitable at times.[6]

House churches may have met in Roman-style villas. It is unlikely many, if any, early Christians were from the elite class, but a relatively wealthy, non-elite person could own such a house. The House of the Vetti in Pompeii was owned by two brothers who were non-elite freedmen, for example (Ellis 2000: 1). The Pompeiian house of L. Caecilius Iucundus, a banker, is illustrative of possible use of space of such a house (Figure 19.2). The entrance of this house was flanked by two shops. The atrium was where one found oneself upon entering the house from the street (the perspective of Figure 19.2), probably used to receive guests. This could be the sort of space in which early Christians gathered, accessible and visible from the street. Further back in the house, less visible to outsiders, one finds the peristyle (garden) and adjoining triclinium (dining room), which may have been the kind of spaces used for meals and/or meeting.

Figure 19.1   Casette Tippo, Ostia. Photo by Carolyn Osiek

Figure 19.2   Atrium in the house of L. Caecilius Iucundus, Pompeii. Photo by Carolyn Osiek

As these descriptions should make clear, houses were not entirely private spaces. Houses may have been connected to shops; owners conducted business in the front space (atrium) of the house, which was accessible to all, including women and children, even if some deeper recesses of the house were considered more private. In fact, the house was a space that functioned between the private and the public. House churches functioned in this in-between space (Osiek and MacDonald 2006: 3–4). Women and children were integral to this in-between space. Many women were likely 'behind the scenes', with various roles that depended on social status, age, ability and other responsibilities, like child-minding. The house church would have been a bustling space, filled with children playing, infants nursing, women birthing in a back room, slave caregivers hushing their wards or herding them to alternative spaces, people coming and going (Osiek and MacDonald 2006: 67).

The owner of a house in which the church met may have functioned as a patron to the group (e.g. Stephanus, 1 Cor. 1:16, 16:15; Gaius, Rom. 16:23; Philemon, Phlm. 2; 1 Tim. 3:4), which included women (e.g. Col. 3:15). The patron–client relationship, often associated with men, formed the backbone of financial exchange and political power in the Roman world. It was an informal, long-term relationship that involved reciprocity: the patron provided support, usually in the form of resources (economic or otherwise), and in return the client offered loyalty and support, usually in the form of public praise. Whether patronage translated into other kinds of leadership responsibilities (teaching, presiding at the meal) is uncertain, though house owners normally presided as hosts at banquets in their own homes.

If the household provided a stability of physical space and patronage for early Christians, the second aspect of the oikos, the group of people who lived in the household, provided a metaphor for the stability of belonging. The household symbolized continuity, concord and loyalty, but also the stability associated with hierarchy. While equality and equal rights are valued in the modern West, social hierarchy was the reality of the ancient Roman world. One's gender, age, class, wealth, marital status and whether one was freeborn, slave, or freed (that is, no longer a slave) were all indicators of where one sat on the spectrum of the social hierarchy and thus how one would behave with others. Hierarchy was evident both outside of and within household relationships.

Early Christian texts from the first century CE reveal a certain ambivalence about the household that may reflect the experience of those who experienced conflict within unbelieving households (Moxnes 1997). Conflict with biological kin was not everyone's experience, as suggested by greetings to households (e.g. household of Gaius, Rom. 16:23; the church that met in Philemon's house, Phlm. 2) and the portrayal of the baptism of the entire households of Cornelius (Acts 10:2, 48) and Lydia (Acts 10:15). However, the rejection of household relationships is reflected in the Gospels (e.g. Mark 3:33, 13:12; Matt. 8:22; Luke 9:60). In Corinth, some believers have unbelieving spouses (1 Cor. 7:12–16), and women with unbelieving husbands are addressed in 1 Pet. 3:1–3. Paul's use of fictive kin language for fellow members of this new community suggests a new conception of household relationships: Jesus followers now belonged to a new household. He addresses members as adelphoi (rightly translated in the NRSV as 'brothers and sisters'), emphasizing concord, unity and love for one another. The language is similar to that of voluntary associations, which also promoted cooperation and comradery (Kloppenborg 2012).

It is worthy of note, however, that this terminology was not meant to imply egalitarianism, as even siblings functioned according to age hierarchy (Aasgaard 2004). Though some scholars have argued for gender equality among the earliest Jesus followers, with a basis in Jesus' teachings and Gal. 3:28 (e.g. Fiorenza 1984), others are more convinced that within the cultural context of the time hierarchy continued to be the social norm, even if some, including early Christians, pushed the boundaries (Kloppenborg 1996).

By the end of the first century, the image of household came to symbolize stability and belonging in proto-orthodox circles, as exemplified by the use of household codes (also known by the German term, Haustafeln). These codes were derived from ancient Greek thought (e.g. Aristotle, Politics 1.1253b–1260b) and adapted by many writers in Roman times (Balch 1981). The household codes involve three pairs of relationships with reciprocal duties: husband–wife, parent–child, master–slave. The codes are uniquely adapted in early Christian texts[7] in that they address the subordinate party directly, for the letters were meant to be heard by all in the community, not the just the leading men. The codes are prescriptive, promoting an idealized stability, so they cannot directly tell us anything about women and children beyond their expected roles from a male perspective, but they do suggest the value and activity of all members, including women, children and slaves. The household codes also simplify the reality of household life since death, divorce, remarriage and the involvement of slaves in parenting complicated real life (MacDonald 2014). The rhetorical use of household codes coincides with the post-Pauline era, a time when the oral connections to those who had been eyewitnesses to Jesus and the apostles were almost gone, those with a 'living and abiding voice'.[8] It was a time of transition, instability and social persecution. In this way, the household codes can be understood as apologetic in nature, that is, meant to demonstrate to suspicious outsiders (like Celsus) that Christians were upright, principled and even model members of society, as demonstrated by their behaviour toward each other (Crouch 1972).

The household also became the metaphor of the community as a whole: the 'household of God' (Eph. 2:19; 1 Tim. 3:15; 1 Pet. 4:17). This metaphor suggests the value of the variety of people in the group that reflected those in a typical household, but also the value of the functional hierarchy present in the household: older over younger, men over women, masters over slaves. The author of 1 Timothy uses a variation of the code that emphasizes gender and age (5:1–2) and advocates proper behaviour as a way to combat rivals and their teachings as well as promote concord in the 'household of God' (3:15; Verner 1983).

Figure 19.3 Grave stele of Herophanta and Posideos. Smyrna, about 150 BCE. 71.AA.288. Digital image courtesy of the Getty's Open Content Program

Household codes and the 'household of God' metaphor suggest an ideal, stable, hierarchical community, but also suggest that women and children were valued in the community to such an extent that they were addressed directly. The household as an analogy of the community along with the physical space of a house promoted stability, but this would not have happened without the presence of women and children.

Roles of women: real and ideal

Women were integral members of the household. They were also clearly part of the early Christian movement from the beginning, from characters in the earliest Jesus stories to being named and addressed in Paul's letters. Though depictions of women in the early Christian texts reflect perception rather than reality, with an informed imagination we can glimpse the lives of real women. Representations of women demonstrate their promotion or potential threat to the stability of the community (as exemplified by Celsus). But real women simply provided stability to the early Christian movement through their domestic roles, patronage, networks, ritual and leadership.

Figure 19.4   Wall fragment (fresco) with two women. Roman empire, 1–75 CE. 96.AG.302. Digital image courtesy of the Getty's Open Content Program

The cultural value of honour is the backdrop to much of the rhetoric around women's behaviour and representation of women in early Christian texts. Honour was a public recognition of worth conferred by public opinion. The group to which one belonged, especially one's family, was the centre of a person's honour, and it dictated nearly every social interaction outside of one's household. One's social status determined a certain amount of honour, but in some respects honour could be earned. In public discourse or activity, a group's honour could be challenged and needed to be defended. Women were pivotal for maintaining group honour, for in their behaviour and appearance they embodied the reputation of their group with 'shame'. Shame meant sensitivity to the group's reputation (honour) and manifested in modest behaviour. Women were often associated with positive shame, though younger family members were also considered to have shame, displayed in modest behaviour. Immodest behaviour would bring negative shame (disgrace or dishonour) to the group, the opposite of honour. One's behaviour and conduct could either bring honour or shame to all. Women, whose bodies (and thus sexuality) were to be protected by men, were especially vulnerable to accusations of dishonourable behaviour which would bring shame to the entire group (Torjesen 1993; MacDonald 1996). This is evident in statements about women whose behaviour did not conform to this value. In 1 Cor. 11:1–16, for example, Paul exhorts women to cover their heads when they pray or prophecy as a sign of their husbands' authority. The main issue is one of shame: Paul reflects his own cultural ideas about women behaving modestly in order to maintain the honour of the group. Veiling protected their sexuality and demonstrated modesty.

Because of the public face of honour and women's integral role in maintaining honour, women were perceived as being able to weave or unravel the social fabric of a family, a group, or even society. Children, especially sons, could enhance a family's status and provide stability of the family over time. As the locus of familial honour, the household played a crucial role in the stability of early Christian communities.

Highlighting women's bodies was perhaps exacerbated in the face of a movement toward asceticism (Col. 2:20–23; 1 Tim. 4:3). In the second century, Priscilla and Maximilla, two of the founders of the New Prophecy (later known as Montanism, named for the third founder, a man named Montanus; Trevett 1996) were condemned for leaving their husbands and displaying ecstatic behaviour in public. Similarly, Tertullian condemns the stories of Thecla (On Baptism, 17), a woman who, under the influence of an ascetic version of Paul, refuses to marry, dons male clothing and goes off teaching and baptizing (Acts of Paul and Thecla). These women were portrayed as challenging the stability of the household (cf. MacDonald 1983).

Exhortations and comments about women's behaviour (such as the household codes) represented traditional values that had a basis in the household and especially on marriage. The words used for a woman's identity were dependent on her marital status: virgin (parthenos), wife (gynē, which was also the word for 'woman'), and widow (chēra), a woman who is no longer married because of the death of her husband or divorce. Chastity (protecting the sexuality of a woman either in her virginity or marriage) and self-control (sophrosunē) were the most important virtues a woman could have (1 Tim. 2:9, 15). Both virgins and wives who were of childbearing age were at stages of life during which women's sexuality was to be guarded for the sake of reputation and legitimate heirs. Motherhood was highly praised, and memorials for young girls often lamented that they would be unable to marry and bear children.

Women of childbearing age were particularly vulnerable to accusations of immodest behaviour. For example, the young widows in 1 Tim. 5:11–15 who are going about from household to household are acting outside of the parameters of modest behaviour. Inappropriate behaviour could compromise the reputation of the group. Widows were liminal women – neither a virgin

Figure 19.5   Kline Monument with a reclining girl. Roman empire, 120–140 CE. 73.AA.11. The inscription reads: 'Here reposes the most beautiful girl, what a pity in such a young age, and the image [of] . . .'. Digital image courtesy of the Getty's Open Content Program

nor in a sanctioned sexual relationship. Young widows were more prone to be criticized because they were still of childbearing age, and any inappropriate behaviour could be seen as having a sexual connotation. This does not mean that she was being sexually promiscuous necessarily (pace Winter 2003: 123–40), but that her actions are perceived as sexualized because they compromised her modesty and thus the reputation of the group (MacDonald 1996).

Stereotypes of older women have remnants of sexuality: older women were depicted as either ideal matrons (especially as a univira, a woman only married once) or drunk, gossiping hags, possibly inappropriately obsessed with sex (Cokayne 2003). The positive stereotype is reflected in 1 Tim. 5:9–10, with a description of an ideal matron who has spent her life doing good works for the benefit of others, and in Tit. 2:3–5, where older women teach younger women to be good wives.
We also see the negative stereotype in Tit. 2:3, exhorting women not to be 'slanderers or slaves to drink' (NRSV).

Metaphorical images of women demonstrate the same kinds of stereotypes (Miller 2005: 287–321).
For instance, on the one hand, a woman represented the church as the submissive and pure bride of Christ (Eph. 5:23–32; Rev. 21:2).[9] In Shepherd of Hermas, the church is depicted as a wise old woman (Visions 2) who is progressively younger (Visions 23). In Revelation, a woman bears a child who is the Messiah (Rev. 12:1–6). On the other hand, a woman could represent corruption and deception, such as Jezebel (Rev 2:19–23; an allusion to the idolatrous wife of King Ahab in 1 Kings 16:31) and the whore of Babylon (Rev. 17:1–18).

These stereotypes tell us a great deal about perceptions of women and the potential for their behaviour to be perceived as threatening stability, but little about the women themselves, their exercise of power and their roles in the early Christian world that provided stability in real and tangible ways. Yet, with some work, we can glimpse real, lived experiences and some of the complexities of the lives of women in the early Christian world. The fact that men saw themselves as having to protect women's modesty and exhort them to behave 'properly' suggests that women had the power, albeit not legitimate authority (MacDonald 1996), to provide or erode stability in early Christian communities. Women's domestic roles were crucial for household stability, and likely the stability of the Christian community as it developed, including roles as wife and mother and as part of networks of women involved with rituals associated with birth, marriage and death.

In order to consider real women behind the texts, we should assume women are included unless there is a compelling reason to believe otherwise (Osiek and MacDonald 2006: 6–7). In addition to 'brothers and sisters' (adelphoi), women should be assumed to be among the apostles, prophets, teachers and healers in Paul's community at Corinth (1 Cor. 12:28), for instance. We have clear evidence of women who prophesied (e.g. 1 Cor. 11:5; Acts 21:9) and taught (e.g. Acts 18:26; Tit. 2:3–5), despite the prohibition in 1 Tim. 2:12. In Rom. 16:7, Junia is considered an apostle.[10]

Figure 19.6 Drunk old woman clutching a jar of wine, statue in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. Photo by
John S. Kloppenborg

Women's real social and economic responsibilities and experiences in daily life were much broader than traditional ideals would suggest (Dixon 1988, 2001; Osiek and MacDonald 2006; Cohick 2009). We should envision a broad array of categories for women of varying social class and life circumstances and at various ages,[11] including older and younger married women; older and younger widows; women with children, women without children; women with parents or parents-in-law to please or to care for; women with young children in their care, perhaps their own, but perhaps also including surrogate children, slave children or foundlings; women with adult children; women as mothers-in-law; women with grandchildren, nieces, nephews and other kin; women who owned slaves and women who did not; women married to believers; women married to non-believers; women who themselves were not believers married to a believer (even though a wife was ideally expected to follow her husband's religious traditions). Some women were wealthy; some were poor; some worked in a trade or shop, such as vending food; others were employed (or served as slaves) as wet-nurses, child minders or midwives. We also need to consider female slaves, who were not considered 'women' (slaves had no gender), but may have a slave-husband and children (who were also slaves). This nuclear family could be separated from her at a master's whim. As a younger slave, she would be sexually available to a male master.[12] Some women may have been freed from slavery, but likely still worked for their former male or female masters; some may have married their former male masters. Early Christian women may have fit into any of these categories, likely several over their life course.

Marriage was expected for women. Non-elite women probably married in their late teens, usually to men five to ten years older than they were. Marriage was typically formally arranged by fathers with mothers' involvement. Little is said in the ancient literature about dowries, presumably because the nature of dowries was assumed and of little note (Treggiari 1991: 323–64). With modern analogy, we might think of dowry as wealth of some kind and/or goods and items that would help a young woman set up or contribute to her new household. There is scattered evidence for whether the new bride would live with her husband's family (and thus be subject to her mother-in-law, known as patrilocal marriage) or whether the new couple set up house in their own space (neolocal marriage). For early Christian women who lived in crowded urban areas, the neolocal pattern was more likely. Papyri and legal rulings suggest that women had regular contact with their mothers as well as their mothers-in-law (LaFosse 2017).

Concomitant with the role of wife is that of mother. Some women died as a result of complications related to childbirth. Many infants and children died. On average, a woman experienced the death of siblings and playmates as a child and youth, the death of parents as well as infants and children in their twenties or thirties, and in later life the death of her husband (Saller 2004). A woman might also lose her children due to divorce or the death of her husband because the children belonged to their father's familia or kin, and might be raised among his kin unless they were very young. On the other hand, there is evidence that some women raised their children themselves, as is suggested by the reference to Timothy's mother and grandmother (2 Tim. 1:5) or their natal family, as suggested by Perpetua handing over her son to her father (Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas). If a woman was still in her childbearing years, remarriage was culturally expected and probably often financially necessary. Remarriage could produce complex families that included half-siblings, step-siblings and children (Dixon 1988; MacDonald 2014).

Marriage could be even more complex among the earliest Christians, especially when women were married to unbelievers (Remus 1999). Early on in the movement, Paul recommends a woman remain married to an unbeliever if he is willing (1 Cor. 7:13). A later situation seems to call for more caution, as the author of 1 Peter exhorts such women to conform to the ideal wifely behaviour of modesty and submission, with hopes of quelling suspicion but also of evangelism (1 Pet. 3:1–2). Interestingly, however, her submission does not extend to forfeiting her faith. This suggests a level of autonomy and choice (and perhaps courage!) for women in their social and religious lives.

Women married to believers can be assumed in the households of Stephanus (1 Cor. 1:16, 16:15), Gaius (Rom. 16:23), Onesiphorus (2 Tim. 4:19) and the overseer of 1 Tim. 3:4. The gospel stories suggest that Peter had a wife, since Jesus healed his mother-in-law (Mark 1:29–31 and parallels). Wives (or possibly deaconesses) are explicitly highlighted in the description of deacons (1 Tim. 3:12). Apphia (Phlm 2) is either Philemon's wife or another integral woman in the house church. Prisca (also known as Priscilla) was married to Aquila; both were co-workers of Paul (1 Cor. 16:9; Rom. 16:3–5; 2 Tim. 4:19; Acts 18:2). In two instances (Rom. 16:3; 2 Tim. 4:19), Prisca is listed before Aquila, perhaps suggesting she was a free woman married to a freedman (a former slave), or if both were former slaves, perhaps Prisca was freed first. Alternatively, she may have simply had a higher status in the community because of her natal family's place in society. Prisca and Aquila set up house churches in several locations, including somewhere in Asia Minor (1 Cor. 16:19), perhaps Ephesus (16:7), and in Rome (Rom. 16:4–5). One wonders if Prisca travelled with children in tow, or if it is more likely that she had no children or had grown children.

Most married women probably did not travel much or far, and so resembled most non-elite wives in the Roman empire. They managed their households and raised their children – tasks which would give them a certain amount of authority in the household. Their work included mundane daily activities and/or providing direction to slaves and servants within the household, including meal preparation (e.g. Mark 1:31 and parallels; Luke 10:38–42). While these activities might have mattered for the reputation of the Christian community (1 Tim. 5:14; Tit. 2:5), they also provided daily stability within the household. In other words, women had the ability to provide or threaten stability for the community in their regular domestic roles (MacDonald 2014: 144–6, 158–62).

It would be erroneous to think of wives spending all day sequestered in their houses. Analogies from modern Mediterranean ethnographies (e.g. Fernea 1989; Abu-Lughod 1993), suggest that women had strong social networks, probably a combination of kin and neighbours, which functioned beyond the usual view of men or the public eye. We may glimpse these networks in the expectations for women to teach and care for other women (Tit. 2:3–5; 1 Tim. 5:16) and in the condemnation of gossip and storytelling (1 Tim. 4:7, 5:13). These lines of communication, though viewed as problematic by male authors, were probably crucial for the flow of news, including information dissemination in Christian communities (Kartzow 2009). In the fictional tale of Thecla, a network of women seems to be in view when a group of women sit together, shout, lament and throw flowers into the arena to save Thecla from the lion (Acts of Paul 4.7, 8, 10).[13] Groups of women depicted in biblical narratives may suggest female networks, such as Luke's depiction of Mary visiting Elizabeth (Luke 1:39–45) or the group of women supporting Jesus and the disciples in their ministry (Luke 8:2–3). In Acts 9:36–42, a group of widows mourn for a woman named Tabitha who died and was raised as a result of Peter's prayer (9:40–41). She is described as 'devoted to good works and acts of charity' (9:36, NRSV), supporting a group of widows in need by providing them with clothing (9:39). Several women come to anoint Jesus' body but find the empty tomb (Mark 16:1; Luke 23:55–24:1; Matt. 28:1 has only two women, and John 20:1 has only Mary Magdalene). These last two stories suggest an important function of women's networks: ritual.

Women likely functioned together to prepare for and implement rituals tied to the women's work within the household, such as the related rituals around birth, marriage and death (Lamoreaux 2013: 68–74). Childbirth occurred in the home, attended by a midwife and other women, likely a woman's kin (Lamoreaux 2013: 112). Although funerals were attended by all, women were associated with funerary rituals and caring for the ancestors, including laments, visiting tombs, holding feasts at home or at the tomb and telling stories about the deceased. This was universal for all classes in the ancient Mediterranean (Corley 2010: 22, 30). Some women may have suffered ridicule in their female networks for rejecting particular cultic features of rituals when they became believers. This may be the case in Philippi, where the cult of Artemis was strongly connected to birth and death rituals (Lamoreaux 2013: 114–17).

*Figure 19.*7   Marble plaque depicting positive experience of birthing with three women attending the birthing mother, Ostia. Science Museum, London, Wellcome Images

These networks of cooperation were not devoid of hierarchy, however. Older women would have had precedence over younger women, but also responsibility for them (Tit. 2:3–5). Women of higher social status and/or wealth would have precedence over their social inferiors. Some women were marginalized. An older widowed or divorced woman with little wealth or status and no children, for example, would have been especially socially and economically vulnerable. Support from the Christian community may have been particularly attractive to widows in these circumstances. Widows are visible to critics of the movement (like Celsus above). Lucian of Samosata's satirical tale of a swindler named Peregrinus features Christian widows and orphans visiting him in prison (The Passing of Peregrinus, 12–13). The widows' great grief over Tabitha's death (Acts 9:36–42) suggests she provided them with more than material support. We gain an even clearer picture of the plight of widows from 1 Tim. 5:3–16. A 'real' widow is an older woman (contrasted with younger widows, 5:11) who is alone (5:5), with no husband and no grown children or grandchildren to support her (5:4, 8).[14] Her economic support apparently came from the community (ekklēsia; 5:16), suggesting that without this support, she would be destitute.

In addition to wealth and social status, a woman's age determined her level of authority and responsibility since women gained authority as they progressed through the life course (Harlow and Laurence 2002: 127–30). Women whose children reached adulthood experienced elevated status, especially if they had sons. In fact, the stage of life in which a woman had grown children was the most powerful of her life. Not only did she have influence over grown sons and daughters, but she also helped to arrange marriages, thus becoming a mother-in-law and, in an urban environment, was probably involved in raising her grandchildren.

Another role that involved authority and influence was that of patron. Many imperial women offered patronage, but patronage was not reserved for the elite only. Women who had some wealth were frequently patrons, and could have female or male clients.[15] Paul identifies Phoebe, a woman from the church in Cenchrae, as a prostatis (patron or benefactor) of him and others (Rom. 16:1–2).

She is a woman of some wealth since she has provided patronage for Paul. This may have involved hospitality in her home or other financial support. The women said to have supported Jesus and his disciples financially according to Luke (8:2–3) would have represented a form of patronage. Whether or not this is historically true, it does confirm patronage as an acceptable and honourable role for women.

Some women were the heads of their households. In the story of Acts, Lydia, an independent woman with a notable profession dyeing expensive, purple cloth, was the head of her household.

Figure 19.8   Priestess burning incense. Roman imperial period, c. 125–130 CE. Marble, from the Greek Island of Paros. Francis Bartlett Donation of 1912, 34.113. Photograph ©2016 Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

Her whole household was baptized along with her as a result of Paul's teachings (Acts 16:14–15). She offered him hospitality as a gesture of reciprocity (Acts 16:15, 40). Tavia (Ign. Smyr. 13:2) is the head of her household (no husband is mentioned), as is Chloe (who is perhaps not a believer herself; 1 Cor. 1:11). Mary, the mother of John Mark (Acts 12:12) and Nympha (Col. 4:15) headed households in which believers met together.[16] As hosts of house churches, they would have been treated with the respect due to patrons (Osiek and MacDonald 2006: 214).

Even through a male lens, we see some specific responsibilities and leadership roles for women. In addition to her patronage, Phoebe is called a diakonos (literally 'servant'; Rom. 16:1). This term probably denotes a representative from one church to another (Osiek and MacDonald 2006: 215), suggesting she travelled a great distance, carrying the letter to Rome on Paul's behalf and with his commendation. She also probably read the letter to the community at Rome, having been instructed by Paul to act on his behalf (Esler 2003: 117–18). In Philippians, Euodia and Syntyche (4:2–3) do not have clear roles but they are important to Paul, for they struggled alongside Paul in his work. Even in the later pseudepigraphical letter of 1 Timothy, where women were directed not to teach or have authority over a man (or husband; 2:12), women named as either deaconesses or the wives of deacons (the Greek is ambiguous; 1 Tim. 3:11) had an important role, for the author's desired characteristics are listed in parallel with those of the deacons.

Much more could be said about these and other women in the gospel stories and Acts, in apocryphal stories and later Christian writers like Tertullian. The aim here was to illuminate the representation of women in male-authored texts as figures who could strengthen or threaten the stability of the community by how their behaviour was perceived. More than this, we catch some important glimpses of the experience of real women in early Christian communities and the ways that domestic roles, women's networks, ritual and patronage provided real stability for the growing movement.

Children in context

If it is challenging to search out the lives of women in the early Christian world, it is even more challenging to explore the world of children. Children have recently become a topic of sustained study by Roman historians (Rawson 2003) and early Christian scholars (Balla 2003; Bunge et al. 2008; MacDonald 2014). Like women, children represented family stability, but the delight and hope they brought was frequently tempered by the experience of grief over early death.

From the time of Caesar Augustus in the first century CE, children were especially used in imperial propaganda to symbolize family stability, and by extension the stability of the empire (Rawson 2003: 31–4, 51–4). Children were also represented as vulnerable and in need of guidance and protection, such as laws of tutelage (Rawson 2003: 71), which were also in place for women for a similar reason. The reason for a tutor was that if a child's inheritance or property was not properly guarded, it could threaten the continuation of the family's economic stability.

In modern Western cultures of the global north, parents expect their children to grow into adulthood. In the ancient world, parents could only hope their children would reach adulthood, because many children died in infancy or early childhood. Only about two-thirds of all children survived past the age of ten (Harlow and Laurence 2002: 10; Parkin 2003: 48–9, 280). Even so, or perhaps especially so, Rawson convincingly argues for the value and visibility of children in the Roman family (2003), who nevertheless outnumbered those aged sixty and over by five to one (Parkin 2003: 51). Legitimate children who survived to adulthood continued the family line; as they grew older, children cared for their aging parents. Children symbolized 'stability and continuity', as exemplified in the grief of hopes lost in memorials of deceased children (Rawson 2003: 31). Freed parents celebrated the joy of family stability not always enjoyed by slave families with monuments highlighting their free born child (MacDonald 2014: 150).

Untimely death and divorce contributed to mixed families, but also the many varieties of people who would be part of children's daily experiences. Children of both sexes were cared for and trained by mothers and other female kin, and/or nurses, who were frequently slaves – a possible opportunity for evangelism if they were Christians. Free children and slave children, especially of the same household, were often raised together. In fact, slave children in households with some wealth or status may have experienced little difference from free born children within the household. Slaves may have played roles as pseudo-kin in lieu of absent or deceased parents (MacDonald 2014). The parent–child relationship was ideally at the core of the household, but given the demography of the time, the network of relationships in the household filled in when need be.

The early Christian texts suggest that despite some early evidence of movement toward ascetic practices (Col. 2:20–23; 1 Tim. 4:3; Ign. Smyr. 13:1; Acts of Paul and Thecla), most early Christians would have followed the social convention of marrying and having children. Jesus welcomed and healed children in the gospel stories (e.g. Mark 5:21–24, 35–43; 10:13–16 and parallels). Paul considered children of at least one believing parent to be 'holy' and 'clean' (1 Cor. 7:14; MacDonald and Vaage 2011). As noted above, the household codes and conception of the community as the 'household of God' highlighted children as valued members.

The education of children was the primary activity critiqued by Celsus, who portrays children as vulnerable and easily duped. Indeed, teaching children was important. Ephesians 6:4 states: 'fathers, do not provoke your children to anger, but bring them up in the discipline and instruction of the Lord' (NRSV; cf. 1 Tim. 3:4–5; 1 Clem. 21:6, 8; Did. 4:9). In the Roman world, education was an important part of childhood, both absorbed and taught directly. Children learned from watching and experiencing their surroundings, at home, in public and during festivals, but may also have more formal education (Rawson 2003: 148–209), for non-elite often in the form of apprenticeship in a trade (Rawson 2003: 191–6). In addition to fathers' instruction, children in house churches would have been present during worship, ritual and teaching. The storytelling of mothers, nurses and caregivers was likely the beginning of their education. Enforcing honourable behaviour, including deference to elders,[17] as part of moral training would also have been important (cf. Shepherd of Hermas, Visions 3.1–2, 6.2–4).

Figure 19.9   Bust of a boy named Martial. Roman empire, dated c. 98–117 CE. 85.AA.352. The inscription reads: 'To the dearest Martial, a slave child, who lived two years, ten months and eight days. [For him] well deserving, Tiberius Claudius Vitalis provided [this monument]'. Digital image courtesy of the Getty's Open Content Program

Figure 19.10   Woman and girl. Cameo set in a modern ring. First century CE, Roman empire. 2001.28.10.
Digital image courtesy of the Getty's Open Content Program

Mothers were thought to have a special role in teaching children, including moral and religious instruction (1 Tim. 2:15; Polycarp Phil. 4:2). Eunice and Lois, named as Timothy's mother and grandmother, exemplify this role of religious instruction (2 Tim. 1:5, 3:15). Perhaps certain women had special teaching responsibilities, such as Grapte in the Shepherd of Hermas, who is commissioned to teach the 'widows and orphans' (Visions, 9.3).[18]

Even though childhood was rather precarious, children's presence would have been ubiquitous in house churches. Children represented the continuity and stability of the household, but in the house church children themselves were valued as members of the community who would maintain the tradition and knowledge of the movement.

Conclusion

Given the nature of our textual sources, it is often difficult to separate the representation of women, children and households from the reality – that is the real, lived experiences – of women and children in the context of house churches. It was largely within house churches that the early Christian movement developed, struggled and grew. We can ascertain that women and children had a significant presence in the early Christian communities, some with noteworthy or significant roles or activities, but many about whom the texts are silent. They were integral to the stability and continuity of the movement. Because their roles in society were central for familial honour, women could undermine that stability, and though many children did not survive to adulthood, children represented continuity. Household codes prescribed roles, but also demonstrated the value all members, including children and slaves, as did later authors who described the community as a 'household of God'.

In sum, house churches provided meeting places that secured a stability of place in the early Christian world, a place in which women and children were always present. Women promoted, threatened or simply provided stability. Children enabled the stability of a next generation.

Notes

1 Although use of the term 'Christian' is anachronistic for the earliest Jesus followers, this chapter focuses on the proto-orthodox Jesus movement from Paul to the second century. By the end of this period, the use of the term 'Christian' is justified, so it is used throughout for the sake of convenience.

2 The Pythagorean texts are one possible exception, though this is debated; Perpetua's diary appears to be written by her, though this also has been debated. Inscriptions such as memorials or epitaphs were commissioned by women at times, and some papyri letters are a source of female writing.

3 Two great strengths of feminist scholarship have been alerting readers to the presence of women in the text and challenging our assumptions about the roles of women. Elizabeth Schüssler Fiorenza's seminal work In Memory of Her (1983) was one of the first to shine light on the many women present in the early Christian texts.

4 Letters with disputed authorship, like 1 Timothy, have further methodological issues. If a letter is deemed pseudepigraphical (written by someone other than the stated author), there are at least two layers to be aware of: the fictional layer of the letter in which the author crafts the fictional voice of his letter writer speaking to his fictional audience, and the recipient layer in which the author addresses the issues relevant to him and his real audience. Even in places when we can detect the 'real' audience, the author's perspective and rhetoric colour his ideas about women and children.

5 Among the elite, the paterfamilias received clients in the morning within his house, then headed out to perform his political or civic duties, leaving his wife to manage the household during the day. Patronage was an informal but integral part of the social and economic structure of Roman society and was not reserved for the elite alone. Anyone of some wealth could be a patron; patrons were not only men.

6 On the archaeology of house churches, see Osiek and Balch 1997.

7 Col. 3:18–25 is usually considered the earliest, followed by Ephesians 5:22–6:1; 1 Peter 2:18–3:7; 1 Tim. 5:1–2 and Tit. 2:2–10. 1 Clem. 21.6–8; Did. 4.9–11 and Polycarp, Philippians, 4.2 suggest further developments around the end of the first and into the second century.

8 Papias, as cited in Eusebius Eccl Hist 3.39; translation by Ehrman 2003, II: 97.

9 This is reminiscent of depictions in the Hebrew Bible of Israel, the people of God, which are not always so pure or idealized (e.g. Hosea).

10 Though the Greek form (accusative case) could be male or female, the former translation of the masculine 'Junias' is no longer considered valid. The feminine name 'Junia' was likely seen by translators as problematic because Paul associates with her the role of 'apostle', a role that is otherwise connected to men.

11 I follow here the ancient Roman binary categories of gender: masculine and feminine. Although modern notions of gender are more diverse, we have far less evidence of diverse gender identity than we have for women or children in the extant evidence.

12 Christian texts do not speak about this issue directly, but Col. 3:22 does direct slaves to unquestioning obedience to masters (Osiek and MacDonald 2006: 111). MacDonald suggests that Christian sexual ethics may have helped to protect such women (2014: 153).

13 A new system of numbering the Acts of Paul is now standard (Pervo 2014). In the older system of numbering for the Acts of Paul and Thecla, these would be sections 32, 33 and 35.

14 Cultural norms across the Roman empire dictated that children care for their parents into old age (Parkin 2003: 205–26).

15 For example, an inscription in Corinth features the accolades of a generous patron and benefactor named Junia Theodora (SEG 18, 143). The so-called Laudatio Turiae (CIL 6.1527), an inscription praising the dedicator's wife, includes a description of how she provided dowries for her younger female kin as an act of patronage (she herself had no children).

16 It is possible they are married to unbelievers (like the unnamed wife of Epitropus [or wife of a steward], Ign. Poly. 8.2), but more likely they are widows, and probably older widows. Widows of childbearing age were more likely to remarry (cf. 1 Tim. 5:12).

17 The word for this is pietas (roughly equivalent to the Greek eusebeia, often translated as 'godliness'; e.g. 1 Tim. 2:2; 3:16; 4:7, 8; 6:3, 5, 6, 11). This was a core virtue in Greek and Roman thought that meant behaving in ways suitable to one's position in the world, including submission to one's superiors, being a loyal citizen and family member, and honouring parents and God (or the gods).

18 'Orphans' may be fatherless (and thus accompanying their widowed mothers), parentless or abandoned and in need of care.

Bibliography

Aasgaard, R. (2004) My Beloved Brothers and Sisters! Christian Siblingship in Paul. London and New York: T&T Clark International.

Abu-Lughod, L. (1993) Writing Women's Worlds: Bedouin Stories. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Adams, E. (2013) The Earliest Christian Meeting Places: Almost Exclusively Houses? London and New York: Bloomsbury T&T Clark International.

Balch, D. L. (1981) Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.

Balch, D. L. and Osiek, C. (eds) (2003) Early Christian Families in Context: An Interdisciplinary Dialogue. Grand Rapids, MI: W. B. Eerdmans.

Balla, P. (2003) The Child-Parent Relationship in the New Testament and Its Environment. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Bradley, K. R. (1991) Discovering the Roman Family: Studies in Roman Social History. New York: Oxford University Press.

Bunge, M. J., Fretheim, T. E. and Roberts Gaventa, B. (eds) (2008) The Child in the Bible. Grand Rapids, MI: W. B. Eerdmans.

Chadwick, H. (trans.) (1965) Origen: Contra Celsum. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Clark, E. A. (2001) 'Women, gender, and the study of Christian history', Church History 70(3): 395–426.

Cohick, L. H. (2009) Women in the World of the Earliest Christians: Illuminating Ancient Ways of Life. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

Cokayne, K. (2003) Experiencing Old Age in Ancient Rome. London and New York: Routledge.

Corley, K. E. (2010) Maranatha: Women's Funerary Rituals and Christian Origins. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Crouch, J. E. (1972) The Origin and Intention of the Colossian Haustafel. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Dixon, S. (1988) The Roman Mother. Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press.

Dixon, S. (1992) The Roman Family. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Dixon, S. (2001) Reading Roman Women: Sources, Genres, and Real Life. London: Duckworth.

Dubisch, J. (1986) Gender & Power in Rural Greece. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Ehrman, B. D. (2003) The Apostolic Fathers, 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Ellis, S. P. (2000) Roman Housing. London: Duckworth.

Esler, P. F. (2003) Conflict and Identity in Romans: The Social Setting of Paul's Letter. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Fernea, E. W. (1989) Guests of the Sheik: An Ethnography of an Iraqi Village. New York: Doubleday.

Fiorenza, E. S. (1983) In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins. New York: Crossroad.

Fiorenza, E. S. (1984) Bread Not Stone: The Challenge of Feminist Biblical Interpretation. Boston, MA: Beacon Press.

Gehring, R. W. (2004) House Church and Mission: The Importance of Household Structures in Early Christianity. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Harlow, M. and Laurence, R. (2002) Growing Up and Growing Old in Ancient Rome: A Life Course Approach. London and New York: Routledge.

Kartzow, M. B. (2009) Gossip and Gender Othering of Speech in the Pastoral Epistles. Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (1996) 'Egalitarianism in the myth and rhetoric of Pauline churches', in Mack, B. L., Castelli, E. A. and Taussig, H. (eds) Reimagining Christian Origins: A Colloquium Honoring Burton L Mack. Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 247–63.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (2012) Voluntary Associations in the Graeco-Roman World. London: Routledge.

Kraemer, R. S. (2011) Unreliable Witnesses: Religion, Gender and History in the Greco-Roman Mediterranean. New York: Oxford University Press.

LaFosse, M. T. (2017) 'Age hierarchy and social networks among urban women in the Roman east', in Huebner, S. R. and Nathan, G. (eds) Mediterranean Families in Antiquity: Households, Extended Families, and Domestic Space. Chichester, UK: John Wiley & Sons, 204–20.

Lamoreaux, J. T. (2013) Ritual, Women, and Philippi: Reimagining the Early Philippian Community. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

MacDonald, D. R. (1983) The Legend and the Apostle: The Battle for Paul in Story and Canon. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster.

MacDonald, M. Y. (1996) Early Christian Women and Pagan Opinion: The Power of the Hysterical Woman. Cambridge, UK and New York: Cambridge University Press.

MacDonald, M. Y. (2014) The Power of Children: The Construction of Christian Families in the Greco-Roman World. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

MacDonald, M. Y. and Vaage, L. E. (2011) 'Unclean but holy children: Paul's everyday quandary in 1 Corinthians 7:14c', The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 73(3): 526–46.

Miller, P. C. (2005) Women in Early Christianity: Translations from Greek Texts. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Moxnes, H. (ed.) (1997) Constructing Early Christian Families: Family as Social Reality and Metaphor. London and New York: Routledge.

Osiek, C. (2011) 'How much do we really know about the lives of early Christ followers?', HTS Teologiese Studies/Theological Studies 67(1): 1–5.

Osiek, C. and MacDonald, M. Y. (2006) A Woman's Place: House Churches in Earliest Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Parkin, T. G. (2003) Old Age in the Roman World: A Cultural and Social History. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Pervo, R. I. (2014) Acts of Paul: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. Cambridge, UK: James Clark & Co.

Rawson, B. (2003) Children and Childhood in Roman Italy. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press.

Remus, H. (1999) '"Unknown and yet well-known": The multiform formation of early Christianity', in Wright, B. G. (ed.) Multiform Heritage: Studies on Early Judaism and Christianity in Honor of Robert A Kraft. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 79–93.

Saller, R. P. (2004) Patriarchy, Property and Death in the Roman Family. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Segovia, F. F. and Tolbert, M. A. (eds) (1995) Reading from this Place. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Sugirtharajah, R. S. (ed.) (1995) Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis/SPCK.

Torjesen, K. J. (1993) When Women Were Priests: Women's Leadership in the Early Church and the Scandal of Their Subordination in the Rise of Christianity. San Francisco, CA: HarperSanFrancisco.

Treggiari, S. (1991) Roman Marriage: Iusti Coniuges from the Time of Cicero to the Time of Ulpian. Oxford, UK and New York: Clarendon Press and Oxford University Press.

Trevett, C. (1996) Montanism: Gender, Authority, and the New Prophecy. Cambridge, UK and New York: Cambridge University Press.

Verner, D. C. (1983) The Household of God: The Social World of the Pastoral Epistles. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.

Winter, B. W. (2003) Roman Wives, Roman Widows: The Appearance of New Women and the Pauline Communities. Grand Rapids, MI: W. B. Eerdmans.

20

WORSHIP, PRACTICE, AND BELIEF

Maxwell E. Johnson

Early Christian worship, practice and belief—as contemporary liturgical scholarship has come to realize—is a topic of enormous complexity: it is diverse in its origins, multi-linear in its development, and closely related to the several cultural, linguistic, geographical, and theological expressions and orientations of distinct churches throughout the early Christian world (Bradshaw 2002; McGowan 2014; see Figure 20.1). Hence, the practices and interpretations of worship throughout the first centuries of the common era were quite different depending upon where specific practices are to be located. Similarly, these early differences would result, especially during the great formative period of the fourth and fifth centuries, in the distinct liturgical 'rites' of East and West, distinct 'styles of Christian living' (Kavanagh 1984: 100), which still characterize the make-up of Christianity today (see Figure 20.2). Very recently, researchers have begun to analyze aspects of Christian worship considered in this chapter using cognitive science approaches to ritual (as in Uro 2016 and Chapter 21 of this volume), and this is likely to be a growing field of interest in the future.

   This chapter focuses on the principal liturgical acts of and occasions for worship where such diversity in practice and theological interpretation was most apparent, namely, in the rites of Christian initiation, the Eucharist, daily prayer, and the liturgical year. Because of important changes in liturgical practice after the Council of Nicea (325 CE), this chapter is organized into two major sections: first, 'Worship, practice and belief before the Council of Nicea,' where what evidence there is for these rites is surveyed; and, second, 'Worship, practice and belief from the Council of Nicea to the death of Augustine of Hippo,' where the further evolution and interpretation of these practices are discussed.

Worship, practice and belief before the Council of Nicea

Initiation

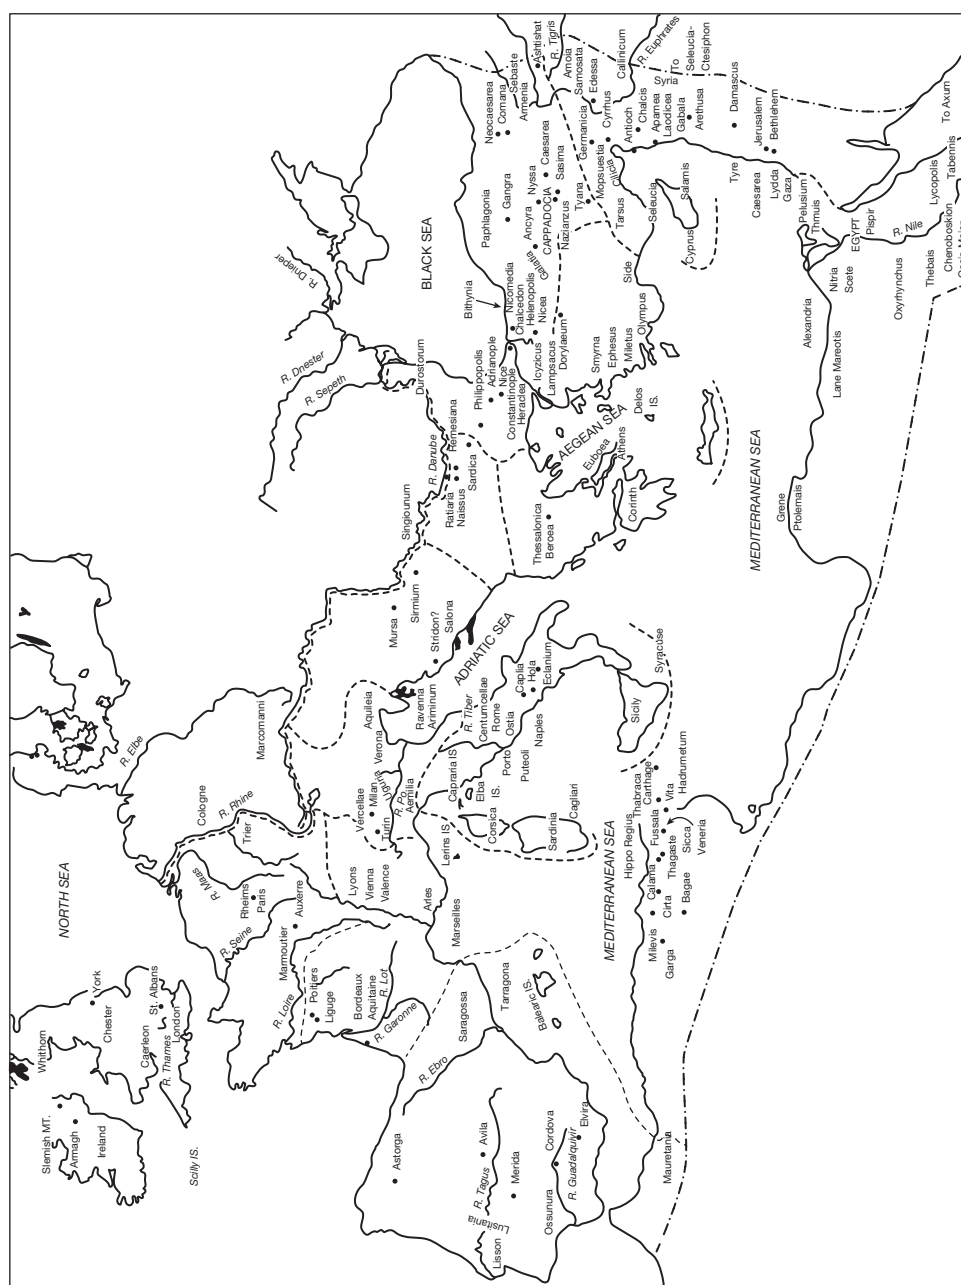
Based on Jesus' baptism by John (Matt. 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–11; Luke 3:21–22; John 1:31–34), possibly on Jesus' own baptismal practice (John 3:22, 26, and 4:1), and in general continuity with the overall context of ritual washings and bathing customs within first-century Judaism (Lathrop 1994: 23–31; Collins 1995: 35–47; Johnson 2007), new converts to Christianity, at least from Pentecost for the Christ-movement onwards (Acts 2:38–42), were initiated into Christ and the Church by a ritual process which included some form of 'baptism' with water, a process that eventually would be based on the command of the risen Jesus (Matt. 28:19). Unfortunately, the New Testament itself records


Figure 20.1 The Christian world in the fourth century CE. Copyright SPCK

Rites of the Eastern Churches *

Byzantine Armenian West Syrian Maronite East Syrian Coptic Ethiopic

Rites of the Western Churches †

Roman   North African   Ambrosian   Gallican   Mozarabic (includes Celtic)

* All seven eastern rites remain living liturgical traditions today among Eastern Orthodox and Eastern Catholic churches.
† Along with the Roman rite, the Ambrosian (Archdiocese of Milan, Italy) and Mozarabic (Toledo, Spain) remain living liturgical traditions today.

Figure 20.2   Classical liturgical rites of east and west

little detail about this baptismal practice or what additional ceremonies may have been included. While we might assume that some kind of profession of faith in Jesus as Lord was present, we do not know, for example, if any particular 'formula,' for example, 'I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit' from the dominical command for baptism in Matt. 28:19 or, 'in the name of Jesus' (Acts 3:6), was employed. Neither do we know precisely how baptisms were regularly conferred—by immersion, complete submersion, or pouring (Stauffer 1994: 57–66), whether infants were ever candidates for baptism in the New Testament period, what kind of preparation may have preceded adult baptism, whether anointings were already part of the process, or if occasional references to the apostolic conferral of the post-baptismal gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 8 and 19) were regular features of baptismal practice in some early communities or exceptional cases due to particular situations. For that matter, in a recent study of foot-washing in the Gospel of John, it has even been suggested that among some early 'Johannine' communities it was not baptism at all but a foot-washing ceremony that constituted the 'rite' of Christian initiation (Connell 1996: 20–30).

What the New Testament does provide is a rich mosaic of baptismal images,[1] two of which will stand out with particular emphasis: Christian initiation as new birth through water and the Holy Spirit (John 3:5ff.), and Christian initiation as being united with Christ in his death, burial, and resurrection (Rom. 6:3–11). Around these, several of the other New Testament images will eventually cluster as specific baptismal 'ceremonies.'

Our earliest extra-biblical sources for the rites of Christian initiation provide only a few more, albeit important, details. Chapter 7 of the (probably Syrian) late first- or early second-century proto-church order called the Didache directs that, after instruction (presumably the kind of ethical formation supplied by chapters 1–6 of the document) and one or two days of fasting on the part of the candidates, baptizers, and community alike, baptism is to be conferred in cold running (i.e., 'living') water. The Didache instructs that if neither cold nor warm running water is available, then other water is to be poured over the head of the candidate, accompanied by the trinitarian formula of Matt. 28:19. Only the baptized, we are instructed further in chapter 9, are to receive the Eucharist.

In the middle of the second century at Rome, chapters 61 and 65 of the First Apology of Justin Martyr not only corroborate the information provided by the Didache but add some other elements:

> (Chapter 61): . . . those who believe in the truth of our teachings and discourses promise that they can live in accordance with it. Then they are taught to pray and, while fasting, to ask God for the forgiveness of their past sins. We, for our part, pray and fast with them . . . Next, we bring them to a place where there is water, and they are reborn in the same way as we ourselves were reborn before them. That is to say, they are cleansed with water in the name of God the Father and Master of the universe, and of our Savior Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit. For Christ said: 'Unless you are born again, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven' . . . Upon the person who wishes to be reborn and who repents of his sins, we invoke the name of God the Father and Master of the universe . . . We call this washing an 'enlightenment,' because those who are taught as we have described have their minds enlightened . . . (We also invoke) upon the person who is enlightened and cleansed the name of Jesus Christ, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and the name of the Holy Spirit, who through the prophets foretold the entire story of Jesus.

(Chapter 65): After we have thus cleansed the person who believes and has joined our ranks, we lead him in to where those we call 'brothers' are assembled. We offer prayers in common for ourselves, for him who has just been enlightened, and for all . . . everywhere . . . When we finish praying, we greet one another with a kiss. Then bread and a cup of wine mixed with water are brought to him who presides over the brethren.

(Deiss 1979: 91–2)

Because Justin refers in the above description to what may be called 'creedal' language, it is not clear if a baptismal formula is intended or if he is alluding to an early example of the western three-fold profession of faith as constituting the 'formula' of baptism. At the same time, while it is often assumed that Justin describes Roman liturgical practice, his theology of baptism as 'new birth' and his reference to baptism as 'enlightenment,' characteristic emphases in the Christian east, may reflect an eastern Christian tradition (Justin, after all, was from Flavia Neapolis in Syria) or, possibly, a Syrian community at Rome. Nevertheless, the overall ritual pattern described by him underscores that some kind of pre-baptismal 'catechesis' (instruction) preceded baptism and that this entire process of becoming a Christian culminated in the sharing in the prayers, kiss, and Eucharist of the community.

It is only in the early third century that a more complete picture of the variant processes of early Christian initiation begins to emerge. Here, we begin to see detailed evidence of several additional ritual elements. But the extent to which any of these elements is present will vary according to liturgical tradition.

In early Syrian documents—the Didascalia Apostolorum and the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles—a pattern of initiation appears to exist wherein the baptism of Jesus is seen as the primary paradigm for Christian baptism and the theology of baptism flows from the 'new birth' focus of John 3. While these documents place minimal stress on catechesis, there is a strong emphasis on a pre-baptismal anointing of the head (and, eventually, the whole body), interpreted as a 'royal' anointing by which the Holy Spirit assimilates the candidate to the kingship and priesthood of Christ, baptism accompanied by the Matthean trinitarian formula, and the concluding reception of the Eucharist (Winkler 1982, 1995). It is also possible, but by no means proven, that one of the principal occasions for initiation in the early Syrian tradition was January 6, the Feast of the Epiphany, interpreted, primarily, as the Feast of Jesus' baptism (Winkler 1994a). Several scholars have also suggested that early Egyptian initiation practice provides a close parallel to that of Syria in this time period (Kretschmar 1963; Bradshaw 1988: 5–17; Johnson 1995a: 5–16), although in Egypt it appears that candidates for baptism were enrolled on Epiphany and then baptized forty days later, with catechetical instruction given during a fast associated with Jesus' own forty-day fast in the wilderness (Talley 1986: 194–213; Johnson 2007: 201–18; Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 99–108).

Western sources of the third century provide alternative patterns to the early Syrian, and possibly Egyptian, practice. In North Africa, Tertullian's De baptismo (c. 200) describes a ritual process which included 'frequent' pre-baptismal vigils and fasts, a renunciation of Satan, a three-fold creedal profession of faith in the context of the conferral of baptism, a post-baptismal 'christic' anointing related to priesthood, a hand-laying 'blessing' associated with the gift of the Holy Spirit, and participation in the Eucharist, which also included the reception of milk and honey, as symbols of entering into the 'promised land' (Whitaker and Johnson 2003: 8–11). Tertullian's description is corroborated generally a little later in North Africa by Cyprian of Carthage (Whitaker and Johnson 2003: 8–11), and for Rome, presumably, in the so-called Apostolic Tradition, traditionally dated c. 215 and ascribed to Hippolytus of Rome, although authorship, dating, and provenance of this document have been challenged by recent scholarship (Bradshaw et al. 2002: 82–135).

According to the so-called Apostolic Tradition, pre-baptismal catechesis was to last for 'three years' and included frequent prayer, fasting, and exorcism, with entrance into the 'catechumenate' itself accompanied by a detailed interrogation of the motives and life-styles of those seeking admittance. For those eventually 'elected' to baptism, the rites themselves took place at a Saturday night vigil, and consisted of a renunciation of Satan, a full body anointing with the 'oil of exorcism,' a three-fold, creedal interrogation accompanied by the three immersions of baptism itself, a post-baptismal anoint-ing by a presbyter with the 'oil of thanksgiving,' an entrance into the assembly, where the bishop performed a hand-laying with prayer and a second anointing, and, after the kiss, the sharing of the Eucharist, including the cup(s) of milk and honey referred to by Tertullian. Since authorship, date, provenance, and influence of this church order are all subject to intense scholarly debate today, the details provided by it must be received with due caution. It is possible that several of these elements, e.g., the 'three-year catechumenate' and the episcopal anointing, reflect later (fourth-century) addi-tions or interpolations (Bradshaw et al. 2002). Nevertheless, although the earliest extant text of the Apostolic Tradition (mid fifth century in Latin) does not interpret the bishop's hand-laying prayer and anointing as 'giving' the Holy Spirit but as requesting 'grace,' subsequent versions of the document will do precisely that and, at least at Rome, the association of these episcopal acts with the conferral of the Holy Spirit will become a characteristic emphasis.

Along with these specific ritual details, third-century sources also show that infant baptism, including infant communion, was being practiced widely. Tertullian strongly cautions against it (De baptismo 18). Origen calls it an 'apostolic custom' (Commentary on Romans 5, 9). The so-called Apostolic Tradition makes provision for those 'who cannot answer for themselves.' And Cyprian gives a theological defense based on the inheritance of the 'disease of death' from Adam (Epistle 64). Similarly, Tertullian is the first author to express a preference for initiation taking place either at Easter or during the fifty days of Easter ('for then was accomplished our Lord's passion, and into it we are baptized', Whitaker and Johnson 2003: 10). It may be that something similar is intended in the so-called Apostolic Tradition, but since this document only refers to initiation at a Saturday (or, alternatively, even a Friday night vigil, there is no compelling reason to assume that it is the Easter vigil which is meant.

Eucharist

Stemming from Jesus' table companionship with 'tax collectors and sinners' as the celebration of the in-breaking of the eschatological 'reign' or 'kingdom of God,' his several feeding miracles, the Synoptic (Matt. 26:26–29; Mark 14: 22–25; Luke 22:14–20) and Pauline (1 Cor. 11:23–26) accounts of his 'Last Supper,' the meal contexts of his post-resurrection appearances (cf. Luke 24 and John 21), and the continued meal customs of the apostolic Church (Acts 2:42, 46), the central practice of early Christian worship was the 'breaking of bread,' 'Lord's Supper,' or 'Eucharist' celebrated in obedi-ence to Jesus' command to 'do this' table ritual as his 'memorial.' Whatever may have constituted the diverse culinary contents of such 'Eucharistic' gatherings early on (bread, wine (or water!), cheese, milk, honey, fruits, and/or fish), or whatever the precise order may have been (McGowan 1995: 551–5), our earliest documents (1 Corinthians 11 and Didache 9 and 10) confirm that the 'Eucharist' was, initially, a literal meal, held most likely in the evening within a domestic, i.e., 'house church,' setting (Peppard 2016), with the contents of the meal provided by members of the assembly them-selves (McGowan 2014: 19–64). There is little doubt but that early Christianity came into existence and continued to spread 'as a meal fellowship' (Bradshaw and Johnson 2012: 1–24; Lathrop 2012: 41; O'Loughlin 2015; see Figures 20.3 and 20.4).
Figure 20.3   Illustration by Armando Garzon-Blanco of the house church at Dura-Europos, Syria, c. 235 CE (from Chiat and Mauck 1991: 101; reproduced with permission from Marchita Mauck and the University of Notre Dame Press)

Figure 20.4   Fresco of Eucharistic scene from the Catacomb of Saint Callistus, late second century CE. From Wilpert 1903: Plate 41.4

By the middle of the second century, the 'meal' itself had become an occasional evening service called the agape (portrayed in Roman catacomb paintings dated to the second half of the second century CE, as seen in Figure 20.4), with only the specific ritual sharing of bread and cup in the context of praise and thanksgiving increasingly transferred to Sunday morning and remaining as the central focus of worship. Again, it is Justin Martyr in chapter 67 of his First Apology, who provides our earliest overall description of what constituted this Sunday morning worship. According to him, this celebration consisted of:

> Assembly
> Reading (from the writings of the prophets and 'memoirs' of the apostles, as long as time permitted)
> Exhortation (or Homily) by the 'president' (proestos)
> Prayers offered in common
> Kiss
> Presentation of Bread and Mixed Cup (wine and water)
> Thanksgiving Prayer over the Bread and Cup (prayed extemporaneously by the president (or proestos) to God, through Christ, in the Holy Spirit)
> 'Amen' by the assembly
> Sharing the Meal
> ('Deacons' take the eucharistic gifts to the absent)
> Collection (for the poor, orphans, and widows)

Whether the 'Reading' and 'Exhortation' stem from the fusion of a Jewish synagogue-type service with the Eucharistic action, or were included as part of the meal setting from the very beginning, remains debated. Nevertheless, the ritual skeleton provided by Justin is discernible in every Christian Eucharistic tradition thereafter.

Although Justin is clear that the 'Eucharistic Prayer' or 'anaphora' (prayer of offering) was extemporized by the presider, some models for this prayer are provided in other documents of the first three centuries. Just as Jewish meal prayers (i.e., the Birkat ha-Mazon) 'remembered' God's saving acts in history and 'invoked' God's continued presence and the fulfillment of those saving acts, so anamnesis (remembrance of Christ) and epiclesis (invocation) would come to characterize early Christian Eucharistic praying in texts such as the meal prayers in Didache 9 and 10 (Syria), the Strasbourg Papyrus (Egypt), that of Addai and Mari (Syria), and the anaphora of the Apostolic Tradition (for texts, see Jasper and Cuming 1987: 23–4, 53–4, 42–4, 34–6). The anaphora of the Apostolic Tradition already includes both a brief 'narrative of institution' (i.e., the words of Jesus at the Last Supper) and an explicit epiclesis of the Holy Spirit in relationship to the reception of the 'fruits' of communion, but other extant anaphoral texts and fragments display no evidence that these elements were a regular feature of early Eucharistic praying. Since it is usually assumed that such elements were not incorporated into the anaphora until the fourth century, it is possible that their presence in the anaphora of the Apostolic Tradition are fourth-century additions. Within the first three centuries, then, the institution narrative itself may have functioned as a 'distribution formula' at the sharing of communion, or, alternatively, as part of catechesis on the Eucharist (Kilmartin 1974: 268–87; Bradshaw and Johnson 2012: 25–59).

Whatever the liturgical use of the 'institution narrative' may have been, it did not function as a 'consecration formula' for the setting apart of the bread and cup. What 'consecrated' the bread and wine was the prayer of thanksgiving (eucharistia) itself. Nevertheless, that Christians of the first three centuries understood the Eucharistic bread and wine to be identified in a rather realistic manner with the 'body' and 'blood' of Christ is also clear. So Ignatius of Antioch (c. 98–117 CE) can refer to the Eucharist as the 'medicine of immortality' (To the Ephesians 20.2) and can draw a Christological parallel between the incarnation of Christ and the Eucharist, indicating that certain 'Docetists,' who denied the reality of the incarnation, also abstained from the Eucharist because 'they do not acknowledge the Eucharist to be the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ' (To the Smyrnaeans 7.1). What is unclear is whether Ignatius is referring directly to the Eucharistic bread or to the Eucharistic act as a whole in this context (Klawiter 2007). Justin Martyr appears to be the first to note that the bread and cup of the Eucharist is not 'common bread or common drink' but the 'flesh and blood of [the] incarnate Jesus' (Deiss 1979: 92), and Irenaeus of Lyons (c. 180) asserts that 'the bread . . . when it receives the invocation of God is no longer common bread, but the Eucharist, consisting of two realities, the earthly and the heavenly' (Power 1991: 15). If a short time later, Tertullian can refer to the bread or wine as the 'figura' (figure) of the body or blood of Christ (Adversus Marcionem 4.40), this should not be interpreted as a repudiation of realistic in favor of symbolic language, but within an overall philosophical context where 'symbol' participates in the reality being signified.

Related to this is the early Christian notion of the Eucharistic action as the Church's 'sacrifice' or 'offering,' an association made as early as Didache 14. Viewed as the fulfillment of the 'pure sacrifice' of Mal. 1:11, the earliest interpretation of this 'sacrifice' appears to have been the 'offering' of prayer and thanksgiving as the Church's 'bloodless' offering of praise in contradistinction to the 'blood' sacrifices of Judaism and the religions of the Greco-Roman world. Its relationship to the Eucharist thus had to do with the great 'eucharistia,' the prayer 'offered' over the bread and cup.

Suggested by the fact that early Christians themselves still brought gifts of bread, wine, and other food to the Eucharist both for Eucharistic use and distribution to the poor, and by a response to Gnostic dualism and denial of the overall importance of the material world, the 'Eucharistic sacrifice' came to be seen as somehow embodied in these material 'gifts.' Hence, the anaphora of the Apostolic Tradition can refer to the bread and cup as the 'oblations' that the Church now 'offers.' At the same time, Cyprian of Carthage draws a parallel between Christ's own sacrifice and that which is offered in the Eucharist by the 'priest' (i.e., bishop), 'who discharges the office of Christ,' and states that the latter is done 'in commemoration' of the former (Epistle 63.14).

With regard to this, one must proceed cautiously. Recent scholarship has argued that early Eucharistic use of sacrificial terminology was a deliberate attempt to subvert the religious meaning of sacrifice altogether and to assert that the Christian sacrifice is no cultic sacrifice at all but the 'offering' of praise and thanksgiving leading to and expressing the priestly life of the community in its ethical service to the poor and in grateful response for God's own gifts (Daly 1978; Lathrop 1993: 139–58). What is 'offered' in the Eucharist, then, 'is what the New Testament has Jesus order us to offer: the memorial of his own self offering' (Taft 1996: 45), that is, the liturgical doing of the Eucharist in obedience to his command.

Apart from its common celebration on Sundays, it is not clear how often during the week the Eucharist may have been celebrated throughout the first three centuries (Taft 1984: 62). Practice undoubtedly varied from place to place. In some places the Christian fasting days of Wednesdays and Fridays (Didache 8) may have concluded with a public service of the Word and the reception of communion from the reserved Eucharist (Alexandria) or become occasions for the celebration of the Eucharistic liturgy itself (North Africa). Occasional celebrations in cemeteries, at the tombs of the martyrs, in homes, prisons, and elsewhere are known to have become so common in North Africa that by the middle of the third century Cyprian can refer to a 'daily' celebration at Carthage. And local expansions of liturgical calendars from the end of the second century on to include the 'anniversary' days of martyrs' deaths also contributed to a growing Eucharistic frequency in the early churches. There is also concrete evidence (Tertullian, Ad uxorem 2.5) that Christians regularly took enough of the Eucharistic elements home with them each Sunday in order to be able to receive communion at other times during the week, a practice that would persist for several centuries both among the laity and within monastic circles.

Daily prayer

Christians of the first three centuries, whether in private, with family members, or in small gatherings, also knew a regular pattern of prayer at several intervals throughout the day. Again, however, there is no single pattern that can be taken as universally normative. Rather, the New Testament mandates to 'pray always' (1 Thess. 5:17) and to 'sing psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs to God' (Col. 3:17), resulted in various patterns within the early Christian communities. Didache 8, for example, directs that Christians are to pray the 'Our Father' three times each day. Other sources (Clement of Alexandria and Origen) also know a three-fold daily pattern (morning, noon, and evening, with an additional period during the night), others (Tertullian) emphasize a two-fold pattern of morning and evening as 'official' or 'statutory' prayers ('legitimae orationes'), and still others (e.g., the Apostolic Tradition) know an 'horarium' which consists of a five-fold pattern: morning, third hour, sixth hour (noon), ninth hour, and evening, with an additional period during the night. In addition to this, the so-called Apostolic Tradition also refers to morning assemblies for 'instruction' and evening gatherings for the communal agape.

Traditional scholarship sought to demonstrate that daily morning and evening prayer were 'public' liturgical gatherings in direct continuity with Jewish synagogue practice, with prayer at the third, sixth, and ninth hours added as 'private' occasions (Dugmore 1964). Recent research, however, has shown that Jewish patterns of prayer were themselves also quite diverse and that the most that can be said of the relationship is that both Jews and Christians prayed at fixed times (Taft 1986a: 3–11). If any pattern is the 'original' Christian practice, it is probably the three-fold one, but this was organized differently within the early communities. In some places, the pattern was correlated with the natural divisions of the day (morning, noon, and evening) and in others in relationship to the divisions of the work-day throughout the Roman empire (i.e., at the third, sixth (noon), and ninth hours). What sources like the Apostolic Tradition demonstrate, therefore, is probably a conflation or synthesis of these two three-fold patterns to form the 'classic' horarium known as the 'liturgy of the hours' (Bradshaw 2010: 77–8).

Unfortunately, we know very little about the contents of daily prayer in the first three centuries, though we can certainly assume that psalms, readings from Scripture, and hymns were frequently used. It is possible that Psalm 141, with its reference to the 'evening sacrifice' (Ps. 141:2) was already a regular feature of evening prayer (at least in Egypt), but this is not known with certainty (Johnson 1995a: 40–2). Rather than emphasizing specific contents, from early on the principal focus of prayer at these fixed intervals was seen as an expression of eschatological watchfulness and readiness (cf. Col. 4:2 and Eph. 6:18), an expectant and continual 'vigil' (cf. Matt. 25:1–13; Mark 14:32–37; Luke 12:35–48) for the imminent return of the Lord (Taft 1986a: 15ff.). Together with this, and ultimately replacing it in overall emphasis, daily prayer, like the Eucharist itself, came to be seen as part of the spiritual 'sacrifice of praise' expressing the self-offering of Christians in their lives of service to God. Perhaps the way in which Christians are depicted in the Roman catacombs, standing with their arms extended (see Figure 20.5) expresses something of this self-offering.

Liturgical year

Sunday is often called the original Christian feast, although the precise relationship between Sunday and the Jewish Sabbath remains a subject of scholarly debate for the New Testament and earliest periods of history (Bacchiocchi 1977; Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 3–39). It seems likely that among the earliest Jewish Christians the Sabbath meal on Friday nights began to take on Eucharistic overtones, with other Eucharistic meal patterns elsewhere taking place on Saturday evenings, the beginning of Sunday in Jewish reckoning after the Sabbath was over (Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 3–24). By the middle of the second century, Sunday is increasingly becoming the Christian day for the liturgical assembly. Several New Testament terms and other designations become closely attached to it: the 'Lord's Day'; the day of 'resurrection'; the day of 'encounter' with the risen Lord through Word and meal; the 'day of light' (as the first day of creation now associated with the 'light' of Christ); the 'eighth day' (i.e., the day of new creation beyond the seven-day cycle); and the day of the 'epiphany'

Figure 20.5   A fresco of a veiled woman in an act of prayer, from the Catacomb of Saint Callistus, second half of the third century CE. Photo: Wilpert (1903: Plate 88) or manifestation of the Church. As neither the Christian Sabbath nor a 'little Easter,' Sunday becomes not the commemoration of a past event, such as the resurrection, but the icon of ongoing and present

'communion' with the risen Lord.

Christians of the first three centuries also knew an annual feast called Pascha as the celebration of Jesus' death and resurrection. Recent scholarship has argued that the most primitive celebration of Pascha (possibly reflected already in the New Testament itself) was an all–night vigil held by Christians in Asia Minor on 14 Nisan, the day of Passover in the Jewish calendar and the day of Jesus' death according to the New Testament (and the equivalent of either March 25 or April 6, according to some early calendars), which culminated in the celebration of the Eucharist at 3:00 am (Talley 1986: 1–32; Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 39–74). Eschatological in orientation as a vigil awaiting the return of the Lord, the overall emphasis of this 'Quartodeciman' ('fourteen') Pascha, assuming that Pascha had been derived from paschein ('to suffer'), was the death of Christ, the true Paschal Lamb, and there is no record of baptisms ever having been part of the celebration. The fourth-century historian Eusebius describes a second-century 'paschal controversy' between these 'Quartodecimans' and Rome over whether or not the Pascha was to be celebrated on a calendrical date or at a Saturday to Sunday vigil after the Jewish Passover, a practice presumably followed by churches elsewhere (Egypt and Jerusalem). Although this question was not completely resolved until the Council of Nicea (325 CE), the Sunday celebration of Pascha, preceded by one, two, or even six days of fasting, would become normative practice by the end of the second century. Along with this, a Sunday Paschal celebration, with its natural associations of Jesus' resurrection, and Egyptian theology (Clement and Origen), which interpreted Pascha as 'passage,' would suggest eventually that the celebration of Pascha itself was not only about the 'passage' of Christ from death to life but Christian participation in this 'passage' through baptism and Eucharist. Hence, in some places (North Africa and Rome), the Paschal Vigil would soon become the prime time for baptism (Bradshaw 1995: 137–47). A nascent 'paschal triduum' (primarily fasting from Friday through the end of the vigil), Holy Week (the association of specific days with events in Jesus' last week), Lenten season (at least at Rome and possibly only three weeks in duration), and a fifty-day Paschal season called 'Pentecost' (from pentēkostē [hēmera] or 'fiftieth day'), in which, like Sundays themselves, both fasting and kneeling were forbidden, are also discernible in this time period, although they are not yet fully liturgicized according to any particular scheme (Talley 1986: 33–7; Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 69–74).

Traditional scholarship assumed that the other annual feasts of Epiphany (January 6) and Christmas (December 25) were fourth-century innovations brought about by Christian adaptation of various pagan solar festivals, with Epiphany developing as the feast of incarnation in the east and Christmas in the west. Thomas Talley, however, argued that the origins of both are to be located in this pre-Nicene time period (Talley 1986: 79–134), though the case is easier to make for Epiphany than for Christmas, since Clement of Alexandria in the second century (Stromateis 1.21) already knows of a celebration of Jesus' 'birth' and/or 'baptism' occurring among some on January 6 (Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 123–57). Their dates, according to Talley, are based on a deliberate calculation which sought to correlate the date of Jesus' death (March 25 or April 6) with his conception leading to a celebration of his 'birth' nine months later on December 25 (possibly celebrated already in third-century North Africa) or January 6 (the date chosen throughout the east). Such calculation, Talley argued, corresponds to an ancient practice that related the death days of illustrious people, including even the Patriarchs of the Hebrew Bible, with their birth days since their lives were thought to have had an exact number of years. While it is probably true that the principal focus of such feasts was a unitive celebration of Jesus' 'beginnings,' i.e., his birth and/or baptism (Winkler 1994a), Talley suggested that these dates may have been selected for the beginning of an annual course reading of particular Gospels. As such, reading Matthew 1–2 in Jerusalem on January 6, according to the fifth-century Armenian Lectionary, would suggest a focus on Jesus' nativity and the visit of the Magi.

The final type of feast to be noted in this period is that of the martyrs, celebrated on the anniversary of their deaths, i.e., their natalis, or 'heavenly birthday' (Brown 1981). Intensely local in character, these feasts were tied inseparably to a community's possession of a martyr's tomb, remains, or relics around which the community would assemble. Only later, as relics were 'transferred' to other churches, would the martyr cult spread. As those who had given the ultimate 'witness' in the face of persecution, the martyrs became concrete signs of Christ's own passion and were regularly believed to have been accorded immediate entrance into heaven. Hence, the veneration of the martyrs as faithful disciples of Christ and prayers asking for their intercession also became characteristic emphases.

Worship, practice and belief from the Council of Nicea to the death of Augustine of Hippo

Initiation

As a result of 'mass conversions' in the wake of Constantine's own conversion, the subsequent legalization and eventual adoption of Christianity as the official religion of the Roman empire by the emperor Theodosius, and the trinitarian and Christological decisions of the first ecumenical councils, several changes in the practice of Christian initiation occur during the fourth and fifth centuries. Thanks to the extant catechetical homilies of the great 'mystagogues' (e.g., Cyril (or John) of Jerusalem, John Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia for the east, and Ambrose of Milan for the west), the practices of Christian initiation in this period are easily reconstructed (Spinks 2006: 38–71, 109–33; Johnson 2007: 115–200; Ferguson 2009: 455ff.). While some local diversity continued to exist, the following came to characterize the overall pattern in the Christian east: (1) the adoption of Paschal baptism and the now forty-day season of Lent as the time of pre-baptismal (daily) catechesis on Scripture, Christian life, and the Creed for the photizomenoi (those to be 'enlightened'), although Epiphany, Pentecost, Christmas, and feasts of some saints remained baptismal occasions as well in various churches (Bradshaw 1995); (2) the use of scrutinies (examinations) and daily exorcisms throughout the period of final baptismal preparation; (3) the development of specific rites called apotaxis (renunciation) and syntaxis (adherence) as demonstrating a 'change of ownership' for the candidates; (4) the development of ceremonies like the solemn traditio and redditio symboli (the presentation and 'giving back' of the Nicene Creed); (5) the reinterpretation of the once pneumatic pre-baptismal anointing as a rite of exorcism, purification, and/or preparation for combat against Satan; (6) the rediscovery and use of Romans 6 as the dominant paradigm for interpreting the baptismal immersion as entrance into the 'tomb' with Christ; (7) the introduction of a post-baptismal anointing associated with the gift and 'seal' of the Holy Spirit; and (8) the use of Easter week as a time for 'mystagogical catechesis' (an explanation of the sacramental 'mysteries' the newly initiated had experienced).

Although a similar overall pattern also existed in the west, western sources display some significant differences. Ambrose of Milan, for example, witnesses to a post-baptismal rite of foot-washing (pedilavium) as an integral component of baptism (Whitaker and Johnson 2003: 180–1). Some sources from Rome (e.g., the Letter of John the Deacon to Senarius; Whitaker and Johnson 2003: 208–9) and North Africa (Augustine; Whitaker and Johnson 2003: 145) indicate the presence of three public scrutinies (including even physical examinations, Johnson 2007: 187) held on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent. And, thanks to an important fifth-century letter from Pope Innocent I to Decentius of Gubbio (Whitaker and Johnson 2003: 206), it is clear that in Rome itself the pattern of episcopal hand-laying with prayer and second post-baptismal anointing, noted already in the Apostolic Tradition, was understood as an essential aspect and was associated explicitly with the bishop's prerogative in 'giving' the Holy Spirit.

The adoption of several of these ceremonies for the preparation and initiation of candidates was, undoubtedly, the result of the Church seeking to ensure that its sacramental life would continue to have some kind of integrity when, in a changed social and cultural context, where Christianity was now favored by the emperor, authentic conversion and properly motivated desire to enter the Christian community could no longer be assumed. Indeed, as the experience of Augustine himself demonstrates (Confessions 1.11), it became common in some places to enroll infants in the catechumenate and then postpone their baptism until much later in life, if ever. Similarly, as the rites themselves take on numerous elements that heightened dramatically the experience of those being initiated, the overall intent was surely to impress upon them the seriousness of the step they were taking (Yarnold 1994: 59–66).

It is not, however, only the baptismal candidates who regularly experienced this process. Egeria, the late fourth-century Spanish pilgrim to Jerusalem, records in her travel diary that, along with the candidates and their sponsors, members of the faithful also filled the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem (Figure 20.6) for the daily catechetical lectures of the bishop. 'At ordinary services when the bishop sits and preaches,' she writes, 'the faithful utter exclamations, but when they come and hear him explaining the catechesis, their exclamations are louder . . . and . . . they ask questions on each point.' Further, during the week of mystagogy she notes that the applause of

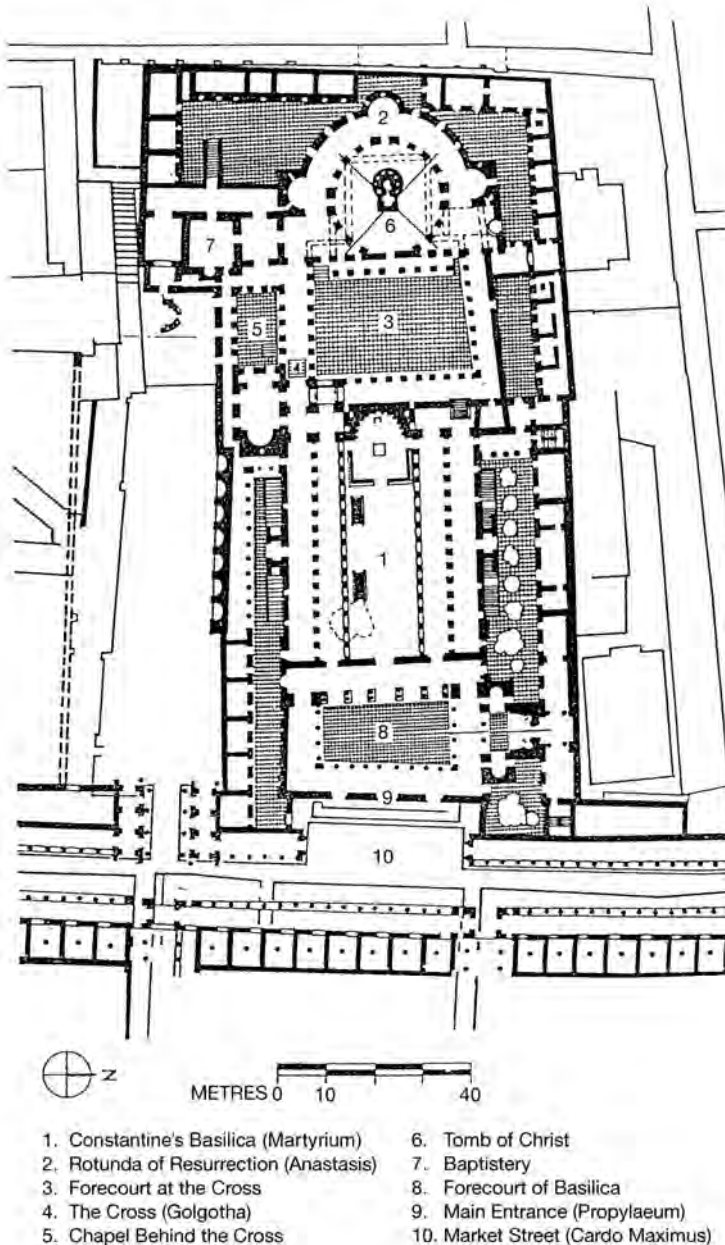
1. Constantine's Basilica (Martyrium)
2. Rotunda of Resurrection (Anastasis)
3. Forecourt at the Cross
4. The Cross (Golgotha)
5. Chapel Behind the Cross
6. Tomb of Christ
7. Baptistery
8. Forecourt of Basilica
9. Main Entrance (Propylaeum)
10. Market Street (Cardo Maximus)


Figure 20.6   The Holy Sepulchre Complex, Jerusalem, in the fourth and fifth centuries CE. From Baldovin 1989; reproduced by permission of the author the newly baptized and faithful 'is so loud that it can be heard outside the church.' Because of this, she states that 'all the people in these parts are able to follow the Scriptures when they are read in church' (Wilkinson 2006: 162–3).

Designed for adult converts, the ritual process of Christian initiation in these several sources was to be short-lived, due, in part, to its success in 'converting' the masses. The North African controversy between 'Pelagianism' and Augustine over the long-standing practice of infant initiation, and Augustine's theological rationale for infant initiation based on a theology of 'original sin,' however, will lead to the catechumenate's further decline. At the same time, Augustine's lengthy battle with 'Donatism,' over the Donatist practice of 'rebaptizing' Catholics and their insistence on the moral character of the baptizer in assuring the valid administration of baptism (see Chapters 44 and 58 of this volume), will lead also to an 'orthodox' sacramental theology based on the use of proper elements and words with Christ himself underscored as the true sacramental minister. If Augustine himself knew an initiation rite similar to those summarized above (Harmless 2014), his own theological emphases, born in the heat of controversy, would set the agenda for a later western–medieval sacramental minimalism focused on 'matter' and 'form,' the 'quamprimum' ('as soon as possible') baptism of infants, and an objective sacramental validity ensured by an 'ex opere operato' understanding.

Eucharist

'Nowhere did the post-Constantinian transformation of the scale of worship have a greater impact than on the eucharist' (Baldovin 1991: 168). The shift from domestic to public space, signified by the adaptation of existing, and the imperial funding of, basilicas and shrines (Figure 20.7), made possible the accommodation of large 'crowds' within Christian liturgical assemblies. So also the rites themselves expanded precisely at those points where greater order in the assembly was needed (i.e., at the entrance of clergy and community, at the presentation or transfer of the Eucharistic gifts to the altar, and at the distribution of communion) with the result that diaconal directions (e.g., 'let us stand,' 'let us kneel,' etc.), litanies, psalmody, chants, and prayers become regular elements. Documents (Apostolic Constitutions 8 and Egeria) also show that various categories of non-communing people, for example, catechumens, photizomenoi, and penitents preparing for reconciliation, were regularly dismissed from the assembly with rites that included hand-laying and prayer before the Eucharist proper began. In one of his homilies, John Chrysostom laments not only Figure 20.7 Illustration of Trajan's Forum and Old St. Peter's, Vatican City, by Armando Garzon-Blanco, from Chiat and Mauck 1991: 102. Reproduced with the permission of Marchita Mauck and the University of Notre Dame Press that the liturgical assemblies are now filled with gossipers, revelers, and pickpockets but that even several of the faithful are leaving before the Eucharist, and, as a result, various dismissal rites for them are also added (Taft 1986b: 29–60; Bradshaw and Johnson 2012: 64–7). In the west, such missa or dismissal rites would eventually suggest the term missa or 'mass' for the Eucharist itself.

If Eucharistic liturgies expanded at these points, however, they tended to contract at others. In the liturgy of the Word, for example, the number of biblical readings would gradually be limited to two in most traditions, and, generally, both would be from the New Testament. Nevertheless, preaching itself was anything but neglected. Eastern sources for this period indicate that several homilies would regularly be given at the Sunday Eucharist, with any presbyters present preaching first and the bishop last (Bradshaw 1983: 17).

By far, one of the most significant developments in this period was the standardization of written texts of the anaphora, a process closely related to the need for liturgical texts to express orthodox teaching against trinitarian and Christological heresy, and, undoubtedly, to the increasing lack of proficient and prayerful extemporizers (Bouley 1981). Along with this, although the precise origins of their anaphoral use remains debated, the sanctus hymn of Isaiah 6 (Spinks 1991; Taft 1991/1992; Winkler 1994b, 1996), the institution narrative and its accompanying anamnetic offering language (Cutrone 1990: 105–14), even 'consecratory' epicleses of the Holy Spirit, and numerous intercessions now become fixed structural components of these anaphoral prayers resulting from a process of 'cross-fertilization,' i.e., the borrowing of elements across ecclesial boundaries (Fenwick 1986). The integration of these elements into specific anaphoras results in the classic anaphoral patterns of different traditions called, for example, 'west Syrian,' 'Antiochene,' or 'Syro–Byzantine' (e.g., the anaphoras known as 'St. Basil' and 'St. John Chrysostom'), 'Alexandrian' ('St. Mark'), and 'Roman' (the 'Roman Canon') (see Figure 20.8).

Together with this anaphoral development, a theological concern for 'consecration' of the bread and wine into the typos, antitypos, figura, or homoioma of the body and blood of Christ develops further as well. Cyril (John) of Jerusalem attributes this to the activity of the Holy Spirit in the epiclesis (Yarnold 1994: 92), and Ambrose of Milan, the first witness to the 'Roman canon,' to the recitation of the words of Christ (the institution narrative) by the priest (Yarnold 1994: 132–3). From this point on east and west will approach the question of Eucharistic 'consecration' from these differing points of view.

Mystagogical teaching on the 'awesome' and 'fearful' nature of Eucharistic participation, as well as non-communing attendance on the part of a now largely 'nominal' Christian assembly, will lead to, and be fostered by, allegorical interpretation of the liturgy itself as a kind of dramatic re-enactment of the life of Christ. Here various liturgical elements (e.g., the transfer of the gifts to the altar and the anaphoral epiclesis) become interpreted in relationship to moments in Christ's passion and resurrection (Yarnold 1994: 216). Along with an increased theological emphasis on the sacrificial nature of the Eucharist, a split develops between the liturgy and communion reception to such an extent that the Eucharist becomes almost exclusively a clerical affair and Eucharistic participation becomes focused on individual contemplation of the 'meaning' of the ceremonies and symbols of the rite itself. Aided by the increase of anaphoral intercessions for a variety of different categories of people (living and dead) and other needs, the Eucharist was thus seen increasingly as being 'offered' for those 'needs.' But, to be fair, theology still stressed the 'commemorative' or 'memorial of Christ' aspect of the Eucharistic 'sacrifice' (Bradshaw and Johnson 2012: 129–36), and for that matter, in spite of the preponderance of offering language in the 'Roman canon' the principal understanding even there is that of the Eucharist as the Church's great 'sacrifice of praise' (Jasper and Cuming 1987: 164).

Daily prayer

During this period, the patterns for daily prayer within the first three centuries evolve into different types of daily, public, communal prayer at morning and evening. Thanks to the seminal work of Anton Baumstark (1958), two types stand out with great clarity: cathedral and monastic. 'Cathedral

Antiochene/West Syrian/ Syro-Byzantine	Alexandrian	Roman
('St Basil/St John Chrysostom')	('St Mark')	('Roman Canon')
Dialogue	Dialogue	Dialogue
Preface (invariable)	Preface (invariable)	Preface (variable by feast and/or season)
	Intercessions
Sanctus/Benedictus	Sanctus	Sanctus/Benedictus
Post-Sanctus		Post-Sanctus (Te igitur, Memento Domine, Communicantes, Hanc igitur)
	Epiclesis I	Quam oblationem
Institution narrative	Institution narrative	Qui pridie (Institution narrative)
Anamnesis (memorial)	Anamnesis (memorial)	Anamnesis (Unde et memores, Supra quae)
Epiclesis	Epiclesis II	Supplices te
Intercessions		Intercessions (Memento etiam, Nobis quoque, Per quem)
Final doxology	Final doxology	Final doxology

Figure 20.8   Anaphoral structures in east and west[2]

prayer,' so named because of the variety of ministries employed in its performance and on account of its interpretation as the priestly prayer of the whole Church in praise and intercession, made use of a number of 'select' elements and 'popular' ceremonies. The core of morning prayer was the daily use of Psalms 148–150 and either Psalm 63 or 51, and evening prayer regularly used the hymn Phōs Hilaron to accompany an evening ritual of lamp-lighting (lucernarium)—the ultimate origins also of the candle lighting and Exsultet of the Easter Vigil liturgy—as well as Ps. 141 (east) and Ps. 105 (west). Various litanies and lengthy prayers of intercession were regular components of both 'offices' and neither the reading of Scripture nor homilies were generally included. By the end of the fifth century, daily offerings of incense also become characteristic (Taft 1986a: 31–56).

The 'monastic' type of daily prayer had its origins among the growing ascetical communities in the deserts of Egypt and Syria. If praise and intercession characterized the cathedral office, the emphasis in the monastic office was on meditation and contemplation geared toward spiritual perfection in the monastic life. Whether prayed alone in cells or in community, the content of the monastic office was the psalms, recited (or sung by a soloist with some communal response) in their biblical order, alternating with periods of silence, prostrations, and concluding prayers (John Cassian, Institutes 2 and 3), and lengthy Scripture readings oriented toward the goal of 'ceaseless' contemplative prayer (Taft 1986a: 57–73).

The influence of monasticism on ecclesial life in general during this period has profound consequences for the cathedral office. Not only were many of the leading bishops of this period monks themselves, but the development of 'urban' monasteries closely connected with local churches will lead to a 'mixed office' that combined both cathedral and monastic elements as well as the retention of the early pattern of prayer at the third, sixth, and ninth hours and at various intervals during the night (Taft 1986a: 75–140). One of the best examples of this 'mixed office' in the west, is the influential Rule of St. Benedict, where morning prayer (lauds) is essentially a 'cathedral office,' with much of the same psalmody assigned to every morning (e.g., Psalms 67, 51, 148–150), and evening prayer (vespers) a 'monastic office,' with Psalms 110–147 constituting a recurring weekly cursus recited in order, with four of these psalms assigned to each evening (Fry 1982: 42–6). In addition, while some non-biblical hymns make their appearance in the Eucharistic liturgy during these centuries in the east, the majority of early Christian hymns, including even the Gloria in Excelsis (Apostolic Constitutions 7), have their origins in this context of daily prayer. When, for example, Augustine describes the corporate singing at Ambrose's cathedral in Milan (Confessions 10), it is quite likely that what he refers to is some form of the 'Ambrosian' office hymns.[3]

Liturgical year

If these other rites achieve their 'classic' forms in these centuries, so too does the liturgical year become organized into its traditional fixed pattern. Together with the Nicene decision on the date for Pascha (i.e., the first Sunday after the first full moon after the vernal equinox) and the widespread adoption of Paschal baptism, so also a forty-day 'Lent,' probably as a synthesis of the Alexandrian post-Epiphany, forty-day period of baptismal preparation and fast with other pre-paschal and/or pre-baptismal preparation periods elsewhere (Johnson 1995b: 118–36; Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 99–113), makes its universal appearance as a time for the final preparation of baptismal candidates and penitents, and ascetical preparation for the faithful. Here as well, a fully developed Holy Week and 'Paschal Triduum' is to be noted, with Egeria witnessing to a 'Palm Sunday' procession of palms and a Good Friday rite which included both the reading of John 18–19 and the veneration (kissing) of a relic of the cross, a relic closely guarded by deacons to ensure that none of the 'faithful' would bite off a portion and steal it (Wilkinson 2006: 155). Both celebrations would move from Jerusalem to the west, although at Rome 'Palm' Sunday would remain the day for the reading of the Matthean Passion (Matt. 26–27) and only in the Middle Ages would it acquire the palms procession. In none of the early traditions did Holy (Maundy) Thursday evening or Good Friday include a celebration of the Eucharistic liturgy. Rather, the Paschal fast itself began on Thursday evening and the celebration of the Eucharist was seen as incompatible with fasting.

The 'fifty days' of the Easter celebration also become fully liturgicized during these centuries, corresponding to the chronology of Luke-Acts. Although Pentecost Sunday was, originally, a unitive celebration of Jesus' Ascension and the gift of the Holy Spirit, by the beginning of the fifth century, the fortieth day of Easter has become the feast of the Ascension and Pentecost the feast of the Holy Spirit. In spite of an earlier tradition that forbade fasting and kneeling during the 'fifty days,' some western churches resumed both practices in the time between Ascension and Pentecost (Cabié 1965).

The western celebration of Christmas on December 25 and the eastern celebration of Epiphany on January 6 are adopted universally during these centuries. Whatever the ultimate origin of the dates for these feasts, influenced, undoubtedly, by the continuing popularity of the pagan solar cults and a concern for Christological orthodoxy, Christmas becomes the universal feast of the incarnation par excellence and, at least in the east, Epiphany becomes limited to the celebration of Jesus' baptism. Although Jesus' baptism forms the content of Epiphany in some western traditions as well, at Rome Epiphany focused on the visit of the Magi as the manifestation of salvation to the Gentiles. A season of preparation for these feasts also begins to make its appearance in some sources, but the full development of 'Advent' itself is a later phenomenon (Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 123–68).

The filling out and universalizing of the 'sanctoral' cycle is also a characteristic of this period as relics of the martyrs and their cult now become increasingly 'transferred' to other churches. Together with martyr feasts, this period also witnesses to the inclusion on local liturgical calendars of influential bishops and ascetics as exemplary models of faith. Biblical saints, especially the Virgin Mary, after the proclamation of the Theotokos doctrine at the Council of Ephesus (431 CE), make their appearance as well. Often connected to the building and dedication of churches in her honor, the feasts of 'Mary Theotokos,' later her 'Dormition' (August 15), her 'Nativity' (September 8), the 'Annunciation' (March 25), and the 'Presentation' of Christ to Simeon and Anna (February 2) are well in place by the fifth century in the east. All four would be adopted subsequently by Rome, and, with the addition of a Roman feast on January 1, commemorating the Theotokos decree of Ephesus, would remain the only Roman 'Marian' feasts until the fourteenth century (Cabié 1986: 130–8; Bradshaw and Johnson 2011: 171–214).

Traditional scholarship argued that the concern for dates, the multiplication of feasts, and the development of Holy Week in this period is the result of a new 'historicizing' mentality which replaced an earlier eschatological orientation (Dix 1945: 303–96). But, in underscoring the concern for dates even in the pre-Nicene period (e.g., the 'Quartodeciman' Pascha and the dates of March 25 and April 6), recent research has suggested that there is no necessary contradiction between 'history' and 'eschatology' and, thus, there is no reason to posit a new mentality to account for these developments (Taft 1984: 15–30; Talley 1986: 1–32; Baldovin 1987: 102–4). Rather, in places like Jerusalem, it would be natural to expect that Christians would want to visit the holy places and to celebrate there the events associated in Scripture with Christ's life. Especially with the imperial funding and building of basilicas at those places, such development was inevitable.

Conclusion

The story of Christian worship, practice, and belief in the first five centuries of the common era is one of development, change, accommodation, and adaptation. From diverse and multiple origins and theologies, the Church emerged at the end of this period with a rather homogenous liturgical structure, style, and theological interpretation. If some important and distinctive elements still remained within the various traditions, the challenges of doctrinal heresy and the changed socio-political climate of the immediate post-Constantian era resulted, nevertheless, in relatively similar rites for initiation, Eucharist, daily prayer, and the liturgical year, as well as common perceptions about the meaning of those rites.

At the same time, it should be noted, especially with regard to the challenges of doctrinal heresy, that worship was not only formed by but also helped in forming orthodox Christian teaching. Orthodox trinitarian and Christological doctrine developed, in part, at least, from the Church at prayer, as the baptismal-creedal profession of faith gave rise to the 'official' creeds themselves, as prayer to Christ contributed to understanding his being 'homoousios' with the Father, as the Holy Spirit's 'divine' role in baptism shaped the theology of the Spirit's divinity, and as early devotion to Mary as Theotokos gave rise to the decree of Ephesus. While 'orthodoxy' means 'right thinking,' such 'right thinking' often developed from the doxology of the Church, where several of these doctrines were prayed liturgically long before they were formalized dogmatically (Johnson 2013).

So it has been ever since. The practice of Christian worship forms the belief of the Church ('ut legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi'). In turn, worship itself is formed further by that belief, and, further still, continues to form people into believers and disciples of the crucified and risen Lord.

Notes

1 These images and metaphors include: forgiveness of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38); new birth through water and the Holy Spirit (John 3:5; Tit. 3:5–7); putting off the 'old man' and 'putting on the new,' that is, 'being clothed in the righteousness of Christ' (Gal. 3:27; Col. 3:9–10); initiation into the 'one body' of the Christian community (1 Cor. 12:13; see also Acts 2:42); washing, sanctification, and justification in Christ and the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:11); enlightenment (Heb. 6:4; 10:32; 1 Pet. 2:9); being 'anointed' and/or 'sealed' by the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 1:21–22; 1 John 2:20, 27); being 'sealed' or 'marked' as belonging to God and God's people (2 Cor. 1:21–22; Eph. 1:13–14; 4:30; Rev. 7:3); and, of course, being joined to Christ through participation in His death, burial, and resurrection (Rom. 6:3–11; Col. 2:12–15).

2 For texts, see Jasper and Cuming 1987: 114–23 ('St. Basil'); 129–34 ('St. John Chrysostom'); 57–66 ('St. Mark'); and 159–67 ('Roman Canon').

3 On music, see Chapter 36 of this volume and Quasten 1983. For the important contribution which Ambrose made to Christian hymnody, see Chapter 57 of this work.

Bibliography

Bacchiocchi, S. (1977) From Sabbath to Sunday: A Historical Investigation of the Rise of Sunday Observance in Early Christianity. Rome: The Pontifical Gregorian University Press.

Baldovin, J. (1987) The Urban Character of Christian Worship: The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy. Orientalia Christiana Analecta 228. Rome: Pontifical Oriental Institute.

Baldovin, J. (1989) The Liturgy of Ancient Jerusalem. Alcuin/GROW Liturgical Study 57. Cambridge, UK: Grove Books, Ltd.

Baldovin, J. (1991) 'Christian worship to the eve of the Reformation,' in Bradshaw, P. and Hoffman, L. (eds) The Making of Jewish and Christian Worship. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 156–83.

Baumstark, A. (1958) Comparative Liturgy. London: SPCK.

Bouley, A. (1981) From Freedom to Formula: The Evolution of the Eucharistic Prayer from Oral Improvisation to Written Texts. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Bradshaw, P. F. (1981) Daily Prayer in the Early Church. New York: Oxford University Press.

Bradshaw, P. F. (1983) Liturgical Presidency in the Early Church. Grove Liturgical Study 36. Bramcote/Nottingham, UK: Grove Books Ltd.

Bradshaw, P. F. (1988) 'Baptismal practice in the Alexandrian tradition, eastern or western?' in Bradshaw, P. F. (ed.) Essays in Early Eastern Initiation. Alcuin/GROW Liturgical Study 8. Bramcote/Nottingham, UK: Grove Books, Ltd, 5–17.

Bradshaw, P. F. (1995) '"Diem baptismo sollemniorem": Initiation and Easter in Christian antiquity,' in Johnson, M. (ed.) Living Water, Sealing Spirit: Readings on Christian Initiation. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo: 137–47.

Bradshaw, P. F. (2002) The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship. Sources and Studies for the Study of Early Liturgy. London: SPCK.

Bradshaw, P. F. (2010) Early Christian Worship: A Basic Introduction to Ideas and Practice. 2nd ed. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press.

Bradshaw, P. F. and Johnson, M. E. (2011) The Origins of Feasts, Fasts and Seasons in Early Christianity. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Bradshaw, P. F. and Johnson, M. E. (2012) The Eucharistic Liturgies: Their Evolution and Interpretation. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Bradshaw, P. F., Johnson, M. E. and Phillips, L. E. (2002) The Apostolic Tradition: A Commentary. Hermeneia. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Brown, P. (1981) The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Cabié, R. (1965) La Pentecôte. Paris: Desclée.

Cabié, R. (1986) 'The veneration of Mary,' in Martimort, A. G. et al. (eds) The Church at Prayer, vol. IV: The Liturgy and Time. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 130–8.

Chiat, M. and Mauck, M. (1991), 'Using archeological sources,' in Bradshaw, P. and Hoffman, L. (eds) The Making of Jewish and Christian Worship. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Collins, A. (1995) 'The origin of Christian baptism,' in Johnson, M. (ed.) Living Water, Sealing Spirit: Readings on Christian Initiation. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo, 35–57.

Connell, M. (1996) '"Nisi Pedes" except for the feet: Footwashing in the community of John's Gospel,' Worship 70(4): 20–30.

Cuming, G. (1976) Hippolytus: A Text for Students. Grove Liturgical Study 8. Bramcote/Nottingham, UK: Grove Books, Ltd.

Cutrone, E. (1990) 'The liturgical setting of the institution narrative in the early Syrian tradition,' in Alexander, J. N. (ed.) Time and Community: In Honor of Thomas Julian Talley. Washington, DC: The Pastoral Press, 105–14.

Daly, R. (1978) The Origins of the Christian Doctrine of Sacrifice. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Deiss, L. (1979) Springtime of the Liturgy: Liturgical Texts of the First Four Centuries. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press.

Dix, G. (1945) The Shape of the Liturgy. London: Dacre Press.

Dugmore, C. W. (1964) The Influence of the Synagogue upon the Divine Office. Alcuin Club Collections 45. Westminster, UK: The Faith Press.

Fenwick, J. (1986) Fourth Century Anaphoral Construction Techniques. Grove Liturgical Study 45. Bramcote/ Nottingham, UK: Grove Books, Ltd.

Ferguson, E. (2009) Baptism in the Early Church: History, Theology, and Liturgy in the First Five Centuries. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Fry, T. (ed.) (1982) The Rule of St. Benedict in English. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press.

Harmless, W. (2014) Augustine and the Catechumenate. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Jasper, R. and Cuming, G. (1987) Prayers of the Eucharist: Early and Reformed. 3rd ed. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Johnson, M. (1995a) Liturgy in Early Christian Egypt. Alcuin/GROW Liturgical Study 33. Bramcote/Nottingham, UK: Grove Books, Ltd.

Johnson, M. (1995b) 'From three weeks to forty days: Baptismal preparation and the origins of Lent,' in Johnson, M. (ed.) Living Water, Sealing Spirit: Readings on Christian Initiation. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Johnson, M. (2007) The Rites of Christian Initiation: Their Evolution and Interpretation. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Johnson, M. (2013) Praying and Believing in Early Christianity: The Interplay between Christian Worship and Doctrine. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Michael Glazier.

Kavanagh, A. (1984) On Liturgical Theology. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Kilmartin, E. (1974) 'Sacrificium Laudis: Content and function of early eucharistic prayers,' Theological Studies 35: 268–87.

Klawiter, F. (2007) 'The Eucharist and sacramental realism in the thought of St. Ignatius of Antioch,' Studia Liturgica 37: 129–63.

Kretschmar, G. (1963) 'Beiträge zur Geschichte der Liturgie, insbesondere der Taufliturgie in Ägypten,' Jahrbuch für Liturgik und Hymnologie 8: 1–54.

Lathrop, G. (1993) Holy Things: A Liturgical Theology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Lathrop, G. (1994) 'Baptism in the New Testament and its cultural settings,' in Stauffer, S. A. (ed.) Worship and Culture in Dialogue. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, 17–38.

Lathrop, G. (2012) The Four Gospels on Sunday: The New Testament and the Reform of Christian Worship. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

McGowan, A. (1995) '"First regarding the cup . . . ": Papias and the diversity of early eucharistic practice,' Journal of Theological Studies 46: 551–5.

McGowan, A. (2014) Ancient Christian Worship: Early Church Practices in Social, Historical, and Theological Perspective. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books.

O'Loughlin, T. (2015) The Eucharist: Origins and Contemporary Understanding. London and New York: T&T Clark.

Peppard, M. (2016) The World's Oldest Church: Bible, Art, and Ritual at Dura-Europos, Syria. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Power, D. (1991) Irenaeus of Lyons on Baptism and Eucharist. Alcuin/GROW Liturgical Study 65. Bramcote/ Nottingham, UK: Grove Books, Ltd.

Quasten, J. (1983) Music & Worship in Pagan & Christian Antiquity. Washington, DC: The Pastoral Press.

Spinks, B. (1991) The Sanctus in the Eucharistic Prayer. Cambridge, UK: University of Cambridge Press.

Spinks, B. (2006) Early and Medieval Rituals and Theologies of Baptism: From the New Testament to the Council of Trent. Burlington, MA: Ashgate.

Stauffer, S. A. (1994) 'Cultural settings of architecture for baptism in the early church,' in Stauffer, S. A. (ed.) Worship and Culture in Dialogue. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, 57–65.

Taft, R. (1984) Beyond East and West: Problems in Liturgical Understanding. Washington, DC: The Pastoral Press.

Taft, R. (1986a) The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West: The Origins of the Divine Office and Its Meaning for Today. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press.

Taft, R. (1986b) 'The inclination prayer before communion in the Byzantine liturgy of St. John Chrysostom: A study in comparative liturgy,' Ecclesia Orans 3: 29–60.

Taft, R. (1991/1992) 'The interpolation of the sanctus into the anaphora: When and where? A review of the dossier,' Part I, Orientalia Christiana Periodica 57: 281–308; Part II, Orientalia Christiana Periodica 58: 83–121.

Taft, R. (1996) 'Understanding the Byzantine anaphoral oblation,' in Mitchell, N. and Baldovin, J. (eds) Rule of Prayer, Rule of Faith: Essays in Honor of Aidan Kavanagh, O.S.B. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo: 32–55.

Talley, T. (1986) The Origins of the Liturgical Year. 2nd ed. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo.

Uro, R. (2016) Ritual and Christian Beginnings: A Socio-Cognitive Analysis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Whitaker, E. C. and Johnson, M. E. (2003) Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy. Revised and expanded edition. London: SPCK.

Wilkinson, J. (2006) Egeria's Travels. Oxford, UK: Aris and Phillips.

Wilpert, G. (1903) Roma Sotterranea: Le Pitture delle Catacombe Romane. Two volumes: Volume One (text) and Volume Two (plates). Rome: Desclèe Lefebure & Co.

Winkler, G. (1982) Das armenische Initiationsrituale: Entwicklungsgeschichtliche und liturgievergleichende Untersuchung der Quellen des 3. bis 10. Jahrhunderts. Orientalia Christiana Analecta. Rome: Pontifical Oriental Institute.

Winkler, G. (1994a) 'Die Licht-Erscheinung bei der Taufe Jesu und der Ursprung des Epiphanie-festes' ('The appearance of the light at the baptism of Jesus and the origins of the Feast of Epiphany'), Oriens Christianus 78: 177–229, in Johnson, M. E. (ed.) Between Memory and Hope: Readings on the Liturgical Year. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press. Pueblo, 2000.

Winkler, G. (1994b) 'Nochmals zu den Anfängen der Epiklese und des Sanctus im Eucharistischen Hochgebet,' Theologisches Quartalschrift 74(3): 214–31.

Winkler, G. (1995) 'The original meaning of the prebaptismal anointing and its implications,' in Johnson, M. (ed.) Living Water, Sealing Spirit: Readings on Christian Initiation. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, Pueblo, 58–81.

Winkler, G. (1996) 'Further observations in connection with the early form of the epiklesis,' in Le Sacrement de l'Initiation: Origines et Prospectives, Patrimoine Syriaque Actes du colloque III. Lebanon: Antelias, 66–80.

Yarnold, E. (1994) The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation: The Origins of the R.C.I.A. 2nd ed. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press.

21

RITUAL AND THE RISE OF THE EARLY CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT

Risto Uro

Introduction[1]

Ritual has been an understudied theme in the study of Christian beginnings. The early stages of Christianity have been studied intensively from a wide variety of perspectives, but ritual, either as part of any particular method or as a theoretical perspective in its own right, has been a marginal topic in New Testament studies and in the broader field of early Christian studies. The neglect of ritual is striking given the important role the study of ritual has played in some other fields that have often been employed by early Christian scholars, such as Religious Studies/Comparative Religion and social/cultural anthropology. During recent years, however, a number of New Testament and early Christian scholars have begun to draw on the emerging interdisciplinary field of Ritual Studies to shed new light on the history and the world of the early Christian movement (DeMaris 2008; Taussig 2009; Lamoreaux 2013; Turley 2015; Uro 2016; Uro et al. forthcoming). This increased interest in the ritual world of early Christianity among early Christian scholars was preceded by pioneering works by a number of Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near Eastern scholars who engaged themselves in analysing biblical traditions from the perspective of ritual (Gorman 1995; Gruenwald 2003; Klingbeil 2007).

Ritual was ubiquitous in the world in which Christianity was born, as it is in the world in which we live. No human society or culture, past or present, has ever been identified in which rituals are not practised and people could escape them. The analysis of the early Christian world from the perspective of ritual is thus at least as important as the study of literature, social institutions, politics, philosophy, sexuality and many other aspects of early Christian life which have been studied extensively by earlier scholars. Recent advances in the field of Ritual Studies make such a project particularly timely and relevant.

In this chapter, I provide a few examples of how ritual theory can enrich the study of earliest Christianity. Due to the initial stage of research, no systematic account of Christian beginnings from the perspective of ritual can be given. Such an analysis is still probably years away from now (cf. also DeMaris 2008: 5).

Before going into my examples, I provide a survey of how ritual has been studied in previous schol-arship on Christian beginnings. This is necessary for understanding what ritual theory 'does' in the study of the ancient world. What difference does it make for our historical analyses? I also introduce insights and theories from a subfield of the study of religion dubbed the Cognitive Science of Religion (CSR), which has contributed significantly to the development of ritual theory since the mid 1990s.

Ritual theory and early Christian studies

Although ritual has been – in the grand scheme of things – a marginal topic in the study of ancient Christianity, it has not been totally ignored. Two traditional domains in the study of early Christianity have held interest in ritual. One, the History of Religions School, belongs to a limited time and a specific group of scholars in the history of the discipline, although the School's legacy has exerted influence over many areas of more recent scholarship. The other domain is the study of early Christian liturgy; this in turn is part of the larger field of Liturgical Studies, studying the forms of Christian worship from historical and contemporary perspectives. In addition to these two domains, New Testament scholars applying social-scientific approaches in their work have occasionally taken interest in issues related to ritual, although such analyses have been surprisingly few as compared to other themes discussed by the practitioners of social-scientific interpretation.

History of Religion School

The History of Religion School (HRS) is the name attached to a group of biblical scholars and theologians who studied and taught at the University of Göttingen in the 1880s and 1890s, and who during the decades around the turn of the twentieth century championed a thoroughly historical approach to the study of biblical traditions (Lüdemann and Schröder 1987; Räisänen 2000: 21–41; Baird 2003: 222–53). William Baird summarizes the main emphases and results of the School succinctly:

> [a] focus on religion rather than theology, a concern to view the history of Christianity with the course of the larger history of religion, an emphasis on the history of tradition rather than literary criticism, and a conviction that Christianity was decisively shaped by the impact of foreign religions.
>
> (Baird 2003: 222)

The focus on religion rather than on theological doctrine involved an interest in the ritual life of early Christians and its connections with the other cults of the Hellenistic world. The theologians belonging to the History of Religion movement argued for the priority of ritual or 'cult' over philosophical and theological articulations of faith (Lehmkühler 1996: 207–8).

A good example of the appreciation of ritual among the members of HRS is Wilhelm Bousset's celebrated Kyrios Christos (Bousset 1970; orig. Bousset 1921). In the preface of the book, Bousset pointed out that 'the present work . . . attempts to take its point of departure from the practice of the cultus and of the community's worship and to understand the way things developed from this perspective' (1970: 11). For Bousset, the confession of Jesus as 'Lord' (Kyrios) represented a major Christological innovation among gentile Christians, who supposedly derived the title from pagan cults. Importantly, he argues that the source of this doctrinal development is not to be found in the theological reflections of the earliest Christian leaders, but in the 'Christ cult' of the Hellenistic Christian communities. Bousset described the devotional life of these communities in vivid terms (1970: 134–5), which strikingly remind of the 'effervescence' that according to Durkheim invigorated the collective rituals of the Australian aborigines (Durkheim 2001; cf. Uro 2016: 10–11).

A central tenet of HRS was that early Christianity was decisively shaped by the impact of pagan religions. It was a 'syncretistic' religion. The members of the School were convinced that the genesis of Christianity was influenced by various ideas from Hellenistic and oriental religions. When it came to the 'sacraments' of the early church, they identified the impact of syncretistic Gnosticism, of the Greek mysteries and of Hellenistic religions in both baptism and the Lord's Supper (Eichorn 1898; Heitmüller 1903). Issues of foreign influence or 'syncretism' were theologically sensitive, and the debates around them had a long-standing impact on the study of the religious world of early Christianity and the study of religion more generally.

The keen interest of HRS in the ritual life of the early church was not carried on by the next generation of New Testament and early Christian scholars. In the situation after the First World War, the bold programme of the School was overshadowed by the 'massive rhetoric of dialectical theology' (Räisänen 2000: 41). Bousset's and other advocates of HRS's attempts to study early Christianity from the perspective of ritual is highly commendable, but, in hindsight, we can also see serious shortcomings in the approach of HRS to ritual. To mention but a few, HRS was mainly concerned with the history of one religion, Christianity, or, as Hermann Gunkel puts it, 'the history of religion of the Bible' (Gunkel 1927). The School did really promote 'comparative religion', which was in any case at its infancy in the heyday of HRS. Moreover, the School focused on analysing early Christianity as a 'syncretistic' religion, which easily evokes such theological ideas as 'authentic' or 'pure' origins. Today 'syncretism' is largely deemed a useless concept in the study of early Christianity and religion in general (Rudolph 1991; Martin 2000).

History of early liturgy

In his authoritative textbook, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship, Paul Bradshaw distinguishes between three traditional methods or approaches applied in the study of early liturgy: the philological, the 'structural' and the 'organic' (Bradshaw 2002: 1–20). By a philological approach, Bradshaw refers to the work of the earliest pioneers of liturgical scholarship who employed 'philological rather than historical methods in their work'. 'They treated liturgical texts like other ancient manuscripts, comparing variant readings and trying to arrive at the original that lay beneath them all' (2002: 3). This original would then represent the most authentic and authoritative form of the liturgical practice under discussion.

The 'structural approach' was advanced by Gregory Dix (1901–52) in his influential book, The Shape of the Liturgy (Dix 2005 [orig. 1945]). Dix criticized attempts by earlier scholars to identify a single original Eucharistic rite. According to Dix, 'the genuinely apostolic tradition' behind the centuries of development and widely scattered churches lies in the fourfold 'shape' of the Eucharistic liturgy: the dominical acts of taking, giving thanks, breaking and distributing. Although Dix's work has been largely regarded as a milestone of liturgical history, recent scholarship has emphasized diversity rather than an original common shape of the Eucharistic traditions (see Bradshaw 2002: x, 6, 140). As McGowan puts it, 'an original diversity of Eucharistic practice was inevitable' (McGowan 2010: 183).

The third approach distinguished by Bradshaw is a School in Liturgical Studies that was prompted by Anton Baumstark's Comparative Liturgy (Baumstark 1953, 1958). Baumstark's comparative approach was an ambitious attempt to analyse the history of liturgy as a matter of 'organic' development, by carrying out systematic comparison and classification, and by identifying the universal principles or 'laws' that governed the process of the historical evolution of liturgical traditions. Comparative Liturgy has exerted a continuing influence on the philological and historical study of liturgical sources (Taft and Winkler 2001). In spite of its early roots in the comparative methodologies of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the comparative approach has not led scholars of liturgy to consider insights from ritual theory or to develop their work toward genuinely cross-cultural approaches. Comparative liturgists have mainly focused on the various forms of the Christian liturgy (or its assumed roots in Jewish synagogue worship), understood as an organic whole.

More recent developments in the study of early liturgy have been characterized by increasing historical criticism, emphasis on diversity of practices and a more cautious attitude toward making inferences from liturgical sources as to actual practices (Bradshaw 2002: 14–20; McGowan 2010). In the first two decades of the new millennium, many historians of liturgy have shifted from mere textual comparisons toward an analysis of the cultural and social contexts of early Christian rituals. This trend is in line with approaches in mainstream New Testament and early Christian Studies, in which the importance of studying the 'social world' of early Christianity (its social institutions, social structures, cultural norms, economy, etc.) is widely recognized. This shift has also brought liturgical scholars into closer interaction with early Christian scholars and social historians of early Christianity. A particularly fruitful area has been the study of the early Christian ritual meal in the light of Greco-Roman banquet customs and the culture of food in antiquity.

The shift away from an emphasis on mere texts toward the cultural and social context has led liturgical scholars to incorporate research and insights from archaeology, art history, social theory and other fields outside the traditional theological and philological disciplines. Robin Jensen, for example, has developed an innovative approach to baptism, in which she integrates the analysis of early Christian literature with evidence from the visual arts and from the design and decoration of ritual spaces, to understand how the Christian initiation was experienced by early Christians (Jensen 2012). Martin Stringer, a liturgical scholar with a background in social anthropology, has advocated a sociological approach to the history of Christian worship, drawing on Foucauldian discursive analysis and on the theory of practice articulated by Pierre Bourdieu (Stringer 2005). Stringer's work clearly opens up new avenues for the history of Christian liturgy, but it is notable that it does not make any explicit reference to ritual theory.

In recent years, the study of early Christian liturgy has become more pluralistic and interdisciplinary, adopting approaches derived from social history and to some degree from the social sciences, but insights and theories from Ritual Studies have so far been utilized surprisingly little.[2] This is remarkable, considering the conceptual overlap of the key terms 'liturgy' and 'ritual' defining these fields. One explanation for this hesitation to incorporate ritual theory in the history of early liturgy is that Liturgical Studies has been intimately connected to theology, especially practical theology and homiletics (Taft 2001: 228). As Stringer notes, histories of Christian worship have often been written 'from within the tradition itself, for purposes that are closely related to the needs of the church' (Stringer 2005: 5). Ritual theorists, in contrast, often emphasize cross-cultural and anthropological approaches in their work (Post 2015).

Social-science approaches and the emergence of Ritual Studies

Social-scientific theories and approaches have been widely applied to the study of early Christianity since the 1970s and 1980s, but ritual has not been among the major themes and topics investigated by the proponents of the social-scientific methodology. Typical topics examined by the practitioners of social-science approaches have been cultural values, economic systems, group formations, leadership roles, gender, purity, ethnic categories and social identity (see, for example, Esler 1995; Rohrbaugh 1996; Blasi et al. 2002; Neyrey and Stewart 2008). Except for the study of purity issues, which usually relies heavily on the work of Mary Douglas (Williams 2010), themes related to ritual and the use of ritual theory have been relatively rare.

Important exceptions for this general bias away from ritual in social-scientific interpretation were The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul by Wayne Meeks (1983) and A Theory of Primitive Christian Religion by Gerd Theissen (1999). In both works, ritual was part of a larger theoretical framework for an analysis of the 'social world' of the Pauline Christians (Meeks 1983) or the 'semiotic cathedral', i.e. the cultural sign system constructed by early Christians (Theissen 1999).

Another example running against the general tendency to downplay ritual in the social-scientific study of early Christianity relates to a group of scholars committed to 'redescribing' Christian origins and relying particularly on the work of the theorist of religion, Jonathan Z. Smith. Scholars associated with the group challenge the traditional histories of Christian origins, based on the canonical gospels and the 'mythmaking' of the early communities, and propose that the beginnings of early Christianity can be understood as 'reflexive social experiments' (Cameron and Miller 2004; for an application of the latter idea to early Christian meal practices, see Taussig 2009). Although the emphasis of the 'redescribers' has often been more on the side of myth than on that of ritual, the use of theories of religion gives their approach a special inflection (see, for example, Mack 1996).

A crucial stimulus for adding ritual theory to the toolbox of New Testament/early Christian studies came from the emergence of Ritual Studies as a nameable and interdisciplinary field during the last decades of the twentieth century and onwards (Grimes 1985, 1995, 2014; Post 2015; Stephenson 2015). The identity of Ritual Studies as an independent field or a 'platform' (Post 2015) for the academic study of ritual is at least partly based on the recognition of ritual as an autonomous expression of the human mind, comparable to other domains such as music or arts (Gruenwald 2003: 13–19). Ritual Studies is thus a field that focuses on a sufficiently autonomous domain of human behaviour and culture, incorporating knowledge and methods from various disciplines in the humanities and the sciences; just as, for example, Musical Studies (musicology) investigates music from a host of different perspectives, including the historical, the cultural, the psychological and the performance-related. Before the emergence of Ritual Studies as a recognized interdisciplinary discipline, ritual was studied and theorized under a number of different disciplines, such as anthropology, Comparative Religion, theology, psychology and biology.

Cognitive theories of ritual

The emergence of CSR was a partly parallel phenomenon with the rise of Ritual Studies as an independent field of research. CSR grew out of the collaboration among religion scholars, anthropologists, philosophers and psychologists in the 1990s (Barrett 2011; Pyysiäinen 2012). Today, the movement spans a host of different research areas, approaches and disciplines, in which the evolutionary and cognitive roots of religious thinking and behaviour have become foci of interest. The cognitive approach has gained currency among historians of religion and archaeologists (Whitehouse and Martin 2004; Martin and Sørensen 2011). Biblical scholars have also been active in developing cognitive approaches to the study of biblical texts and their religio-cultural contexts (Luomanen et al. 2007; Shantz 2009; Kazen 2011; Roitto 2011; Czachesz and Uro 2013; Czachesz 2017).

Ritual theories have been an important part of the emerging cognitive movement within Religious Studies. Several theories of ritual have been advanced and subjected to empirical testing. These theories represent different schools and currents in the cognitive programme (Uro 2016: 41–70) and deal with a variety of questions: for example, how religious rituals are mentally represented in the minds of the participants, why people universally engage in seemingly counterproductive ritual behaviours, and how rituals support the transmission of religious traditions (for an introduction to the cognitive theories of ritual, see Uro 2016: 31–9, 64–9). Scholars of early Judaism and early Christianity have begun to develop these theories and insights into tools for the study of their own materials (Uro 2007, 2011, 2016; Biró 2013; Jokiranta 2013; Czachesz 2017). It can be argued that the cognitive approach is one driving force that is impelling ritual from the margin toward a more central place in the agenda of biblical scholarship.

A cognitive approach to early Christian ritual is interesting because it goes beyond the 'surface' level of ritual on which its diverse socio-cultural functions and interpretations can be observed, and focuses on the deeper level of cognition and, thus, helps us to analyse early Christian practice as human behaviour conditioned by the general architecture of the mind. Adopting a cognitive approach does not, however, mean that one denies the significance of social and cultural factors in the study of early Christian rituals (for an argument for a 'socio–cognitive approach', see Uro 2016).

Ritual and the rise of Christianity: examples

The latter part of this chapter discusses two examples which illustrate the relevance of ritual approach to understanding the earliest developments of the Christian movement. The examples deal with (1) the role of John the Baptist as a ritual entrepreneur, and (2) the meal as a context of early Christian ritual life, especially in the light of the evidence in 1 Corinthians. These case studies aim to demonstrate that ritual theory and cognitive theories of ritual in particular shed new light on issues discussed by early Christian scholars as well bring new questions to the fore.

John the Baptist's ritual invention

John, a contemporary of Jesus of Nazareth, was remembered for his performance of a rite (baptisma) in which a ritual patient was immersed in water. This practice produced his epithet 'Baptist' or 'Baptizer' (baptistēs), used by the first three Evangelists and by the Jewish historian Josephus (Ant. 18.116). John's reputation as a promulgator of a special rite that became associated with his name prompts a question of what role his ritual practice played in the formation of his movement, and consequently in its offshoot, the Jesus movement. For one thing, John and early Christians attached varied theological meanings to the rite. For example, Paul addressed the meaning of baptism theologically in Rom. 6:3–5:

> Do you not know that all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life. For if we have been united with him in a death like his, we shall certainly be united with him in a resurrection like his (RSV).

This passage led to the construction of cruciform baptismal fonts across the Christian world, so that the baptizand literally descended into the cross as he or she entered the water (see Figure 21.1).

Although scholars of early Judaism and early Christianity have written a number of detailed analyses of the meaning and function of John's rite in its religious-cultural setting (Ernst 1989: 320–46; Webb 1991: 163–214; Taylor 1997: 49–100), they have seldom used resources from ritual theory to enrich their historical analyses. How do ritual inventions, such as John's immersion, function as catalysts for new movements? What exactly was the 'speciality' of John's ritual performance?

One way to approach the issue is to leave aside, for a moment, the socio-cultural meanings and functions of John's rite and to focus on its formal characteristics. Whatever interpretations or functions we assume for John's immersion, the most distinctive feature of it as compared to other water rituals in Second Temple Judaism (Lawrence 2006) has to do with its formal structure. Unlike other Jewish ritual washings, which were self-administered, John's rite involved a ritual agent acting upon a ritual patient (baptizand). This difference has of course often been recognized by scholars (see, for example, Webb 1991: 180), but without ritual theory its implications have remained unexplored. A theory that is particularly helpful here is T. E. Lawson and R. N. McCauley's Theory of Ritual Competence, also referred to as Ritual Form Theory (Lawson and McCauley 1990; McCauley and Lawson 2002).

Figure 21.1   Cruciform baptismal font near the Octagonal Church, Philippi. Photo Philip Esler

Lawson and McCauley argue that irrespective of social functions or verbal interpretations offered by ritual participants, religious rituals are mentally represented as actions in which somebody (agent) is doing something to somebody (patient), often by means of something (instrument). As they put it, 'ritual drummers ritually beating ritual drums are still drummers beating drums' (McCauley and Lawson 2002: 10). The difference from ordinary actions is that in religious rituals 'culturally postulated superhuman agents' (CPS agents) are associated with one of these action roles (agent, instrument or patient). This account may sound trivial for a scholar of early Christianity who is interested in finding the theological and cultural meaning of the text under study, or as in this case, of the practice described in the text. But Lawson and McCauley's theory has some interesting implications which have a bearing on the issue of how rituals or ritual innovations play a role in the emergence of a movement.

A central concept in Lawson and McCauley's theoretical construction is a ritual profile they call 'special agent ritual'. By this they refer to rituals in which CPS agents are primarily associated with the agent of the given ritual (vs. 'special instrument' and 'special patient rituals', in which CPS agents are associated with the instrument or the patient of the ritual). In terms of Lawson and McCauley's theory, John's immersion can be described as a special agent ritual. In a structural account of the ritual, a CPS-agent is primarily associated with the agent of the ritual, i.e. with John, a God-sent prophet (Matt 11:9/Luke 7:26), or with someone who has received a baptism from him (cf. John 3:26).

The most interesting part of Lawson and McCauley's theory involves the predictions they formulate as to how a ritual's profile will determine the participant's intuitive judgements concerning the ritual's properties. They hypothesize, among other things, that special agent rituals are sensed as more powerful and generate higher emotional arousal than special instrument/patient rituals. Rituals in which the agent of ritual action is primarily associated with the agent of a ritual are generally perceived to be stronger and more energizing than rituals with other profiles.[3] This account of special agent rituals is helpful in understanding the role of John's ritual innovation.

Scholars' explanations of John's ritual invention have usually focused on the assumed 'functions' of the rite, for example that it represented a protest against the temple establishment (Webb 1991: 203–5; Wright 1996: 160–1) or that it functioned as an initiation to John's movement (Webb 1991: 197–202; for the problems involved in both interpretations, see Uro 2016: 80–5). The functions discussed by scholars also include the theological explanations given by ancient authors, i.e. Mark's statement that John proclaimed a baptism of repentance 'for the forgiveness of sins' (eis aphesin hamartiōn; Mark 1:4) and Josephus' report that John meant his baptism to be 'not for seeking pardon of certain sins, but for purification of the body' (eph' hagneia tou sōmatos; Ant. 18.117; trans. Webb 1991: 32).

Joan Taylor, who has written perhaps the most extensive analysis of John's immersion rite in the context of Second Temple Judaism, believes that Josephus' report is closer to the original intention of John. According to Taylor, John's rite had to do with purification of the body, not with mediating forgiveness of sins to those who received baptism. Taylor points out that in John's time purification by immersion in water was a cultural truism; everyone knew that was what an immersion was about (1997: 94). But she also recognizes that there was something 'novel or extraordinary' in John's activity, as otherwise he would not have earned his title of 'Immerser' (1997: 94). Taylor suggests that John's novelty was not so much in his immersion practice as in his teaching that 'previous immersions and ablutions were ineffective for Jews without the practice of true righteousness' (1997: 99–100). You cannot become pure outside unless you are pure inside.

Attempts to find the most plausible interpretation of John's practice in its ancient cultural context are an important part of the historical investigation, but Ritual Competence Theory can enrich such analyses in a number of ways.

First, McCauley and Lawson's claim that special agent rituals can play a significant role in motivating and energizing ritual participants helps us to conceptualize ways in which ritual innovations can influence the rise of religious movements (cf. McCauley and Lawson 2002: 212). Introducing an emotionally strong special agent ritual may be a way to recruit and mobilize new members. There are indeed good reasons to assume John's baptism was an emotionally engaging ritual: it involved the whole body and it centred on the individual ritual patient confessing his or her sins.[4]

Furthermore, the cognitive theory is useful in evaluating interpretations of John's immersion by scholars. For example, Taylor's view that the 'speciality' of John's rite relates only to the ethical prerequisites set by John for his baptism overlooks the ritual structure of John's innovation. According to Ritual Competence Theory, John's special agent ritual would have intuitively been felt to be more powerful than a self-administered ritual purification. This is confirmed by the historical record: people came to John to be baptized by him, and his immersion rite gained unprecedented success among his contemporaries. People certainly believed they were receiving more by letting John press them down under the water than by immersing themselves in a pool or a river. What verbal interpretations John or his ritual patients attached to this ritual action is irrelevant to an analysis of ritual structure, and the question is best treated as a separate issue.

Finally, a cognitive analysis of John's rite helps us to see why symbolic and cultural analyses, without recognition of intuitive psychological constraints, do not lead to a sufficient account of the role of the ritual in the emergence of John's movement. Assessing various culturally plausible interpretations is important and indeed indispensable in many ways. Such analyses focus on the few extant references and interpretations that have been preserved in our sources (in the Gospels and Josephus), as well as on the wider cultural background (such as ritual bathing in early Judaism). What is important is to realize that such public narrative manifestations have only limited value for explaining people's actual behaviour. This is so at least for three reasons. First, people are not always willing or able to explain why they participate in a ritual (Humphrey and Laidlaw 1994: 100). Second, the reports that have survived may not be representative of the majority of those involved in the movement; they may for example have been randomly preserved, or may derive mostly from the educated elite. The last is almost certainly true of those few explicit interpretations that have been preserved for John's immersion. Third, even if they were representative, they would not necessarily reveal the cognitive processes which trigger the behaviour in the first place, and which play an important role in directing the course of events in the long run (Bloch 2012).

In conclusion, Ritual Competence Theory provides one of the missing pieces in the historical puzzle of John's movement: it explains why his ritual immersion was regarded as so important among the contemporaries of John; the theory also sheds new light on the issue of why it became a model for the type of ritual washing performed by later baptizers in the Jesus movement. To be sure, this particular ritual theory provides only one piece in the puzzle and should be complemented with other theories and approaches.

Ritual and early Christian meals

It is generally acknowledged that the ritual life of the earliest Christian communities centred on meals which were held in small 'house churches', i.e. in private houses offered by (relatively) wealthy members of the movement. Early Christian meals have received a considerable amount of attention in recent studies. An important line of research has focused on studying the early Christian meal gatherings in the light of the Greco-Roman banquet customs (Klinghardt 1996; Smith 2003; Taussig 2009; McRae 2011; Smith and Taussig 2012). These studies have brought about important knowledge as to festive dining in the cultural world of early Christianity and highlighted the need to see early Christian meal practices as part of the larger dining culture in the ancient Mediterranean world. A new consensus has emerged which, among other things, underscores:

- the twofold structure of the festive meal: a supper proper (deipnon) was followed by an extended time of drinking, conversation and performance (symposium), a libation or series of libations marking the transition from deipnon to symposium;
- the reclining of the participants or most of the participants;
- the ubiquity of this mode of festive dining: the reclining banquet was a highly influential social institution in the Greco-Roman world (Smith 2012);
- the idealized (utopian) values that were attached to this social practice: in particular, koinonia (community), isonomia (equality), philia (friendship) and charis (grace, generosity, beauty) (see Klinghardt 1996; Taussig 2009: 26–32).

Among the scholars who have applied the 'banquet perspective' to early Christian meal practices, Hal Taussig has emphasized the importance of the use of ritual theory in the analysis of Christian origins. Taussig refers to the work of Catherine Bell, Jonathan Z. Smith, Pierre Bourdieu, Victor Turner and Mary Douglas, and contrasts their approaches to the understanding of ritual as 'an esoteric set of gestures or symbols practised by strict adherents to religious or social cults' (Taussig 2009: 55). According to Taussig, the work of these theorists has '(re)focused on the social power of ritual rather the metaphysical, psychological, or institutional meanings of ritual' (2009: 57). 'Ritual is', Taussig writes, 'a kind of social intelligence, often reserved for subject matter that has proved too complex for individual discernment, too frightening for more direct address, or attached to vying long-term social loyalties' (2009: 66).

How do these insights help us to illustrate the meal as a central framework of early Christian ritual life? Taussig's analysis highlights, among other things, the capacity of the meal to construct identities, negotiate about power relations and to create a site for social experimentation. In more concrete terms, he suggests that meals functioned as acts of resistance against imperial power (libations, songs, bread blessings and stories told in the symposium evoked the death of Jesus at the hands of Roman authorities) and allowed participants to 'think about' or 'mark' the differences (the reclining of all participants representing different ethnic identities and social statuses both blurred and highlighted the differences).

Although nuanced and moving beyond a straight-forward functionalist explanation, Taussig's theorizing about the 'social power' of the early Christian meal can be lined up with many previous analyses which elaborate 'the Lord's Supper' in Paul (1 Cor. 11: 17–33) as a ritual of solidarity and community-building (Meeks 1983; MacDonald 1988). All such approaches are ultimately indebted to the Durkheimian tradition in the social sciences in which ritual is seen as a (or the) basic ingredient of social life (Uro 2016: 128–53).[5] In recent years, ritual theorists have made significant advances in formulating more specifically how ritual activities support social coherence and cooperation. One way to conceptualize the issue is to suggest that by taking part in ritual activities people send messages to each other and to themselves. Many theorists propose that such ritual communication is basically about acceptance or commitment. Roy Rappaport, for example, argues that the first of a 'ritual's fundamental offices' is the act of acceptance (Rappaport 1999: 119).

Maybe the most helpful suggestion with regard to ritual communication has been made by theorists who argue that by performing religious rituals people send honest signals to each other. An honest signal, these theorists claim, is a signal that is too costly to fake and religious rituals are just such – at least in the perspective of the human evolution (rituals generally involve costs such as time, energetic, materials or physiological costs). The key argument of this Commitment Signalling Theory is that religious rituals promote group cohesion by requiring members to engage in behaviour that is too costly to fake and hence provide an efficient mechanism for overcoming the problem of freeriders (Bulbulia and Sosis 2011). Importantly, Commitment Signalling goes beyond the standard functionalist explanation by distinguishing a mechanism that operates in ritual's capacity to promote group cohesion and by formulating hypotheses that can be empirically tested (for example, the prediction that costly religious behaviours correlate with group solidarity and longevity; see Sosis and Bressler 2003; Sosis and Ruffle 2003; Ruffle and Sosis 2007).

If we apply the signalling perspective to our information of the early Christian meal gathering in Corinth, we can make at least two observations. First, on a more negative note, it is not easy to determine how the meal itself promoted cooperation and social cohesion, at least beyond what happened in other social contexts in Paul's society. It is obvious that for Paul himself, partaking of 'one bread' and of the 'table of the Lord' (1 Cor. 10:17, 21) was a key symbol of unity, the ekklēsia being one social body in Christ. We can conjecture as to practices of sharing food at meals; it is possible, for example, that well-to-do members shared their food with poorer ones (Alikin 2010: 104) or that each member brought his or her own food-basket, albeit not necessarily of equal size and quality (Lampe 1994). Whatever dining protocol the Corinthians followed, Paul's critical comments on their practice show that, against his best intentions, eating caused disunity and division rather than fostering harmony (1 Cor. 11:27–33; cf. also Gal. 2:11–14). While there is no reason to contest 'the power of the banquet to create bonds' in general (Smith 2003: 200), it is difficult to see how exactly these eating practices worked as honest signals, promoting trust and social cohesion in Corinth. Paul's discussion in First Corinthians gives an impression of clashes and tensions between different understandings of the Lord's Supper, rather than of a celebration of unity and mutual love.

Second, if we look for cooperative cues in the Corinthian assembly, the best candidates are the other activities described by Paul in 1 Corinthians 11–14 aside from the meal proper, namely music and spiritual gifts, such as prophecy and speaking in tongues. It is now commonly assumed that such ritual activities took place in the symposium part of the dinner party, dedicated in antiquity to entertainment, conversation and religious actions. Paul's discussion of the assembly's activities clearly indicates that everyone was free to take part in them. The members are described as bringing contributions to the group's common affairs: 'When you come together, each one has a hymn, a lesson, a revelation, a tongue, or an interpretation' (1 Cor. 14:26; NRSV). We can thus assume that the symposium part of the gathering was a time especially suitable for cooperative signalling.

Of the two forms of spiritual activity discussed by Paul in 1 Cor. 12–14, glossolalia and prophecy, the nature of the latter phenomenon has been subject to debate. While a few scholars have been eager to make a clear distinction between Christian (Corinthian) prophecy and that involving alternate states of consciousness, comparable to the Greco-Roman mantic oracles (for example, Grudem 1982), others have taken Paul's references to prophecy as evidence of religious ecstasy in Corinth. Shantz, for example, argues that 'privileging of dissociation trance seems to have been an active part of prophetic activity within the major cultures of the Mediterranean', and contends that the Pauline data fit well into that context (Shantz 2009: esp. 189). She sees Corinthian prophecy as a form of spirit possession and draws on Michael Winkelman's cross-cultural category of mediumship (Winkelman 2000).

The evidence in 1 Corinthians is suggestive of high-arousal ritual activities in the Corinthian assembly. Paul's instructions that prophets should not speak simultaneously in the meeting, and that 'the spirits of the prophets are under the control of the prophets' (1 Cor. 14:29–33) indicates that the prophets lacked conscious control while they were prophesying. The implied participation in prophecy as a collective ritual is best understood as being induced by what the psychologists call 'emotion sharing' or 'emotional contagion' (Harmon-Jones and Winkielman 2007: 250–6; Czachesz 2012: 82). The fact that some Corinthian women prophesied with their heads uncovered (1 Cor. 11:2–15) is also informative for our understanding of Corinthian prophecy. Although it is difficult to say what exactly is Paul's concern and argument in the section – for example, whether he is referring to women prophesying unveiled or with their hair loose – it seems clear that the Corinthian practice was somehow inappropriate for Paul, and that he tried to use his intellectual power to redirect their behaviour. Such behaviour could thus be emotionally stimulating and also costly insofar as it also has to do with the issue of women's honour. Read together with Paul's warning about disorder in the assembly, Paul's discussion in 11:2–15 seems to speak for the view that prophecy involved both emotional arousal and synchrony.

Glossolalia is usually taken as the most striking evidence of emotional arousal in Corinth. Paul's several references to it in 1 Corinthians 12–14 indicate that it was a central and highly valued practice among the Corinthians. Shantz sees it as the 'predominant form of spirit possession' in Corinth (2009: 157). There has been a considerable body of anthropological research on modern tongue speaking. The findings show that many of the basic features of glossolalia are cross-culturally similar and that the phenomenon can be reasonably compared with other traditional forms of non-linguistic speech uttered by religious specialists or members of secret associations in traditional societies (for a survey of the research, see Goodman 2005). On the other hand, it may be difficult to find close parallels to glossolalia in the Greco-Roman culture of Paul (Forbes 1995), lending support to the view that, at least in the form described in First Corinthians, it is a Christian ritual innovation. The references to tongue speaking in the Acts of the Apostles, although misconceived by Luke as xenoglossia in Acts 2:4 (cf. 10:46; 19:6), may be based on recollection of the role it once played in some other early Christian groups as well (Esler 1994: 37–51).

There has been considerable discussion concerning the role of emotions and high-arousal rituals as honest signals, facilitating group cohesion and cooperation. Many signalling theorists have argued that emotions can function as honest signals and thus enhance cooperation. The explanation behind such an assumption is that emotions are generated by the limbic structures of the brain, which are out of conscious control and are thus difficult to 'fake' (Alcorta and Sosis 2005: 333; see also Levenson 2003). It can of course be argued that emotional contagion may make emotions less reliable as signs of a deeper commitment, but then again this psychological mechanism seems to speak in favour of a general human inclination to respond to a performance of emotional rituals with synchrony. Moreover, empirical research has been recently carried out to confirm what anthropologists have claimed for a long time, namely that synchronous activity or collective effervescence produce emotions that weaken the psychological boundaries between the self and the group and contribute to group cohesion. For example, researchers have found evidence that pairs of individuals who mimic each other are more inclined to cooperate than those who do not mimic (Van Baaren et al. 2003); it has even been shown that synchrony promotes prosocial actions toward outsiders (Reddish et al. 2014). The role of music, singing, dance and rhythmic movement in evoking congruent emotions and generating cooperation is well documented (Anshel and Kipper 1988; McNeill 1995; Alcorta and Sosis 2005; for the role of music in early Christian identity-construction, see Weimer 2015). Researchers have also found support for the view that extreme rituals increase synchrony and cooperation (Konvalinka et al. 2011; Xygalatas et al. 2013). While prophecy and glossolalia can hardly be characterized as extreme rituals in comparison to such practices as firewalking, they are nevertheless arousing and emotionally salient.

The analysis of the Pauline evidence, especially that in 1 Corinthians 11–14, together with insights from recent studies on ritual, emotion and synchrony, seems to support the view that prophecy and glossolalia, along with other emotional rituals in the Pauline assemblies, functioned as cooperative signals. The commitment signalling perspective to ritual can complement the earlier analyses of Pauline Christianity and early Christian ritual life by offering a more accurate picture of the mechanisms that contribute to social cohesion and cooperation in ritual activity. This picture may also be somewhat more realistic than the earlier ones which have often relied heavily on the rhetoric of Paul or other early Christian writers.[6]

Conclusion

A ritual approach to Christian origins provides new tools for analysing early Christian evidence from a perspective that has been largely ignored in earlier scholarship. Ritual theory integrates several research traditions and fields into a multidisciplinary approach which can enrich and to some degree also correct the existing accounts of Christian beginnings. This chapter has discussed two examples, John the Baptist's ritual innovation and the role of cooperative signalling in the ritual life of the Corinthian assembly. Future research hopefully generates more systematic accounts of early Christian rituals based on solid theoretical and historiographical work.

Notes

1 This chapter incorporates portions from chapters 2, 3 and 5 in R. Uro, Ritual and Christian Beginnings: A Socio-Cognitive Analysis (Oxford University Press 2016). These portions have been reproduced by courtesy of Oxford University Press.

2 This pattern, however, may be rapidly changing. A recent introductory book on the study of liturgy and worship (Day and Gordon-Taylor 2013) includes contributions from historians of liturgy using analytical tools from Ritual Studies (see especially Bradshaw and Harmon 2013; Johnson 2013). Moreover, the forthcoming Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Ritual relies on collaboration among biblical scholars, ritual theorists and historians of liturgy (Uro et al. forthcoming).

3 More specifically, they hypothesize that special agent rituals are generally understood as ones that cannot be repeated ('when gods do things, they are done once and for all'), can be reversed (for example by defrocking priests) and involve sensory pageantry. The prediction that special agent rituals are performed only once for a single ritual patient can be challenged, however, by a significant amount of contradicting evidence (cf. e.g. healing rituals). See the discussion in Uro 2016: 85–9.

4 In the light of the story of Jesus' baptism in the Gospels, which is described as a visionary and auditory experience (esp. Mark 1:9–11; cf. Matt. 3:13–17; Luke 3:31–2; cf. also stories about the temptations of Jesus in the wilderness; Mark 1:12–13; Q 4:1–13), we may even speculate that the ritual triggered an altered state of consciousness among John's followers.

5 Also, Taussig points out that the theorists he is using in his book 'are in substantial debt to Durkheim' (Taussig 2009: 213, n. 7).

6 Cf. Stanley Stowers' criticism that scholarship has generally assumed too much social cohesion and 'groupness' for the Pauline assemblies by using such theologically loaded words as 'church' and 'community' (Stowers 2011).

Bibliography

Alcorta, C. S. and Sosis, R. (2005) 'Ritual, emotion, and sacred symbols', Human Nature 16(4): 323–59.

Alikin, V. A. (2010) The Earliest History of the Early Christian Gathering: Origin, Development and Content of the Christian Gathering in the First to Third Centuries, Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 102. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Anshel, A. and Kipper, D. A. (1988) 'The influence of group singing on trust and operation', Journal of Music Therapy 25(3): 145–55.

Baird, W. (2003) History of New Testament Research: Volume Two: From Jonathan Edwards to Rudolf Bultmann. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Barrett, J. L. (2011) 'Cognitive science of religion: Looking back, looking forward', Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 50(2): 229–39.

Baumstark, A. (1953) Liturgie comparée: principes et éthodes pour l'étude historique des liturgies chrétiennes, Collection Irénikon, 3rd ed., review by Dom Bernard Botte. Chevetogne, Belgium: Éditions de Chevetogne.

Baumstark, A. (1958) Comparative Liturgy, revised by Bernard Dotte; English edition by F. L. Cross. London: Mowbray.

Biró, T. (2013) 'Is Judaism boring? On the lack of counterintuitive agents in Jewish rituals', in Czachesz, I. and Uro, R. (eds) Mind, Morality, and Magic: Cognitive Science Approaches in Biblical Studies. Durham, UK: Acumen.

Blasi, A., Duhaime, J. and Turcotte, P.–A. (eds) (2002) Handbook of Early Christianity: Social Science Approaches. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira.

Bloch, M. (2012) Anthropology and the Cognitive Challenge: New Departures in Anthropology. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Bousset, W. (1921) Kyrios Christos: Geschichte des Christusglaubens von den Anfängen des Christentums bis Irenäus, Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testament 4, Zweite umgearbeitete Auflage. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Bousset, W. (1970) Kyrios Christos: A History of the Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus, trans. Steely, J. E. Nashville, TN: Abingdon.

Bradshaw, P. F. (2002) The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship: Sources and Methods for the Study of Early Liturgy, 2nd ed. London: SPCK.

Bradshaw, P. F. and Harmon, K. E. (2013) 'Ritual', in Day, J. and Gordon-Taylor, B. (eds) The Study of Liturgy and Worship: An Alcuin Guide. London: SPCK.

Bulbulia, J. and Sosis, R. (2011) 'Signalling theory and the evolution of religious cooperation', Religion 41(3): 363–88.

Cameron, R. and Miller, M. P. (eds) (2004) Redescribing Christian Origins, Society of Biblical Literature Symposium Series. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Czachesz, I. (2012) 'Filled with new wine? Neuroscientific correlates of religious experience in the New Testament', in Shantz, C. and Werline, R. A. (eds) Experientia, Volume 2, Early Judaism and Its Literature 35. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Czachesz, I. (2017) Cognitive Science and the New Testament: A New Approach to Early Christian Research. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Czachesz, I. and Uro, R. (eds) (2013) Mind, Morality, and Magic: Cognitive Science Approaches in Biblical Studies. Durham, UK: Acumen.

Day, J. and Gordon-Taylor, B. (eds) (2013) The Study of Liturgy and Worship: An Alcuin Guide. London: SPCK.

DeMaris, R. E. (2008) The New Testament in Its Ritual World. London: Routledge.

Dix, G. (2005) The Shape of the Liturgy, New edition with an introduction by Dr Simon Jones. London: Continuum.

Durkheim, É. (2001) The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, Oxford World's Classics, trans. Cosman, C. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Eichorn, A. (1898) Das Abendmahl im Neuen Testament, Hefte zur 'Christlichen Welt' 36. Leipzig, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Ernst, J. (1989) Johannes der Täufer. Interpretation – Geschichte – Wirkungsgeschichte. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter.

Esler, P. F. (1994) The First Christians in Their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. London: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (ed.) (1995) Modelling Early Christianity: Social Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context. London: Routledge.

Forbes, C. (1995) Prophecy and Inspired Speech in Early Christianity and Its Hellenistic Environment, Wissenshaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Goodman, F. D. (2005) 'Glossolalia', in Jones, L., Eliade, M. and Adams, C. J. (eds) Encyclopedia of Religion, 2nd ed. Detroit, MI: Macmillan.

Gorman, J. F. H. (1995) 'Ritual studies and biblical studies: Assessment of the past, prospects for the future', in McVann, M. (ed.) Transformation, Passages and Processes: Ritual Approaches to Biblical Texts, Semeia 67. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Grimes, R. L. (1985) Research in Ritual Studies: A Programmatic Essay and Bibliography, Atla Bibliography Series 14. Metuchen, NJ: The American Theological Library/Scarecrow.

Grimes, R. L. (1995) Beginnings in Ritual Studies: Revised Edition. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press.

Grimes, R. L. (2014) The Craft of Ritual Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Grudem, W. A. (1982) The Gift of Prophecy in 1 Corinthians. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

Gruenwald, I. (2003) Ritual and Ritual Theory in Ancient Israel, The Brill Reference Library of Judaism. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gunkel, H. (1927) 'The "historical movement" in the study of religion', The Expository Times 38: 532–36.

Harmon-Jones, E. and Winkielman, P. (2007) Social Neuroscience: Integrating Psychological and Biological Explanations of Social Behavior. New York: Guilford Press.

Heitmüller, W. (1903) Taufe und Abendmahl bei Paulus: Darstellung und religionsgeschichtliche Beleuchtung. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Humphrey, C. and Laidlaw, J. (1994) The Archetypal Actions of Ritual: A Theory of Ritual Illustrated by the Jain Rite of Worship. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Jensen, R. M. (2012) Baptismal Imagery in Early Christianity: Ritual, Visual, and Theological Dimensions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

Johnson, M. E. (2013) 'Initiation', in Day, J. and Gordon-Taylor, B. (eds) The Study of Liturgy and Worship: An Alcuin Guide. London: SPCK.

Jokiranta, J. (2013) 'Ritual system in the Qumran movement: Frequency, boredom and balance', in Czachesz, I. and Uro, R. (eds) Mind, Morality and Magic: Cognitive Science Approaches in Biblical Studies. Durham, UK: Acumen.

Kazen, T. (2011) Emotions in Biblical Law: A Cognitive Science Approach, Hebrew Bible Monographs 36. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Phoenix Press.

Klingbeil, G. A. (2007) Bridging the Gap: Ritual and Ritual Texts in the Bible, Bulletin for Biblical Research Supplements 1. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.

Klinghardt, M. (1996) Gemeinschaft und Mahlgemeinschaft: Soziologie und Liturgie Frühchristlicher Mahlfeiern. Tübingen, Germany: Francke Verlag.

Konvalinka, I., Xygalatas, D., Bulbulia, J., Schjødt, U., Jegindø, E.-M., Wallotd, S., Van Ordend, G. and Roepstorff, A. (2011) 'Synchronized arousal between performers and related spectators in a fire-walking ritual', Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences 108(20): 8514–19.

Lamoreaux, J. T. (2013) Ritual, Women, and Philippi: Reimagining the Early Philippian Community, Matrix: The Bible in Mediterranean Context Series 8. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Lampe, P. (1994) 'The Eucharist: Identifying with Christ on the cross', Interpretation 48(1): 36–49.

Lawrence, J. D. (2006) Washing in Water: Trajectories of Ritual Bathing in the Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Literature, Society of Biblical Literature: Academia Biblica 23. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Lawson, E. T. and McCauley, R. N. (1990) Rethinking Religion: Connecting Cognition and Culture. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Lehmkühler, K. (1996) 'Die Beteutung des Kultus für das Christentum der Moderne: Eine Discussion zwischen Wilhelm Bousset und Ernst Troelsch', in Lüdemann, G. (ed.) Die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule: Facetten eines theologischen Umbruchs, Studien und Texter zur Religionsgeschichtliche Schule 1. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang.

Levenson, R. W. (2003) 'Blood, sweat and fears: The autonomic architecture of emotion', in Ekman, P., Campos, J. J., Davidson, R. J. and De Waal, F. B. M. (eds) Emotions Inside Out: 130 Years After Darwin's The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals. New York: New York Academy of Sciences.

Lüdemann, G. and Schröder, M. (1987) Die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule in Göttingen: Eine Dokumentation. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Luomanen, P., Pyysiäinen, I. and Uro, R. (eds) (2007) Explaining Christian Origins and Early Judaism: Contributions from Cognitive and Social Science, Biblical Interpretation Series 89. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

MacDonald, M. Y. (1988) The Pauline Churches: A Socio-Historical Study of Institutionalization in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline Writings, SNTSMS 60. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Mack, B. L. (1996) 'On redescribing Christian origins', Method and Theory in the Study of Religion 8(3): 247–69.

Martin, L. H. (2000) 'Of religious syncretism, comparative religion and spiritual quests', Method and Theory in the Study of Religion 12: 277–86.

Martin, L. H. and Sørensen, J. (eds) (2011) Past Minds: Studies in Cognitive Historiography, Religion, Cognition and Culture. London: Equinox.

McCauley, R. N. and Lawson, E. T. (2002) Bringing Ritual to Mind: Psychological Foundations of Cultural Forms. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

McGowan, A. (2010) 'Rethinking eucharistic origins', Pacifica 23(June): 173–91.

McNeill, W. H. (1995) Keeping Together in Time: Dance and Drill in Human History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

McRae, R. M. (2011) 'Eating with honor: The Corinthian Lord's supper in light of voluntary association meal practices', Journal of Biblical Literature 130(1): 165–81.

Meeks, W. A. (1983) The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Neyrey, J. H. and Stewart, E. C. (eds) (2008) The Social World of the New Testament: Insights and Models. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Post, P. (2015) 'Ritual studies', Religion: Oxford Research Encyclopedias. Online: religion.oxfordre.com/, doi: 10.1093/acrefore/9780199340378.013.21. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Pyysiäinen, I. (2012) 'Cognitive science of religion: State-of-the-art', Journal for the Cognitive Science of Religion 1(1): 5–28.

Räisänen, H. (2000) Beyond New Testament Theology, 2nd ed. London: SCM.

Rappaport, R. A. (1999) Ritual and Religion in the Making of Humanity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Reddish, P., Bulbulia, J. and Fisher, R. (2014) 'Does synchrony promote generalized prosociality', Religion, Brain and Behavior 4(1): 3–19.

Rohrbaugh, R. (ed.) (1996) The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Roitto, R. (2011) Behaving as a Christ-Believer: A Cognitive Perspective on Identity and Behavior Norms in Ephesians. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.

Rudolph, K. (1991) 'Early Christianity as religious-historical phenomenon', in Pearson, B. A. (ed.) The Future of Early Christianity: Essays in Honor of Helmut Koester. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Ruffle, B. J. and Sosis, R. (2007) 'Does it pay to pray? Costly ritual and cooperation', The B.E. Journal of Economic Analysis & Policy 7(1): article 18.

Shantz, C. (2009) Paul in Ecstasy: The Neurobiology of the Apostle's Life and Thought. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Smith, D. E. (2003) From Symposium to Eucharist: The Banquet in the Early Christian World. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Smith, D. E. (2012) 'The Greco-Roman banquet as a social institution', in Smith, D. E. and Taussig, H. (eds) Meals in the Early Christian World: Social Formation, Experimentation, and Conflict at the Table. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.

Smith, D. E. and Taussig, H. (eds) (2012) Meals in the Early Christian World: Social Formation, Experimentation, and Conflict at the Table. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Sosis, R. and Bressler, E. R. (2003) 'Cooperation and commune longevity: A test of costly signaling theory of religion', Cross-Cultural Research 37: 211–39.

Sosis, R. and Ruffle, B. J. (2003) 'Religious ritual and cooperation: Testing for a relationship on Israeli religious and secular kibbutzim', Current Anthropology 44(5): 713–22.

Stephenson, B. (2015) Ritual: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Stowers, S. K. (2011) 'Kinds of myth, meals, and power: Paul and the Corinthians', in Cameron, R. and Miller, M. P. (eds) Redescribing Paul and the Corinthians, Early Christianity and Its Literature 5. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Stringer, M. D. (2005) A Sociological History of Christian Worship. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Taft, R. F. (2001) 'Anton Baumstark's comparative liturgy revisited', in Taft, R. F. and Winkler, G. (eds) Comparative Liturgy Fifty Years After Anton Baumstark (1872–1948), Orientalia Christiana Analecta 265. Rome: Pontificio Istituto Orientale.

Taft, R. F. and Winkler, G. (eds) (2001) Comparative Liturgy Fifty Years After Anton Baumstark, Orientalia Christiana Analecta 265. Rome: Pontificio Istitutio Orientale.

Taussig, H. (2009) In the Beginning Was the Meal: Social Experimentation and Early Christian Identity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Taylor, J. E. (1997) The Immerser: John the Baptist within Second Temple Judaism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Theissen, G. (1999) A Theory of Primitive Christian Religion, trans. Bowden, J. London: SCM.

Turley, S. R. (2015) The Ritualized Revelation of the Messianic Age, The Library of New Testament Studies 544. London: Bloomsbury T&T Clark.

Uro, R. (2007) 'A cognitive approach to gnostic rituals', in Luomanen, P., Pyysiäinen, I. and Uro, R. (eds) Explaining Christianity Origins and Early Judaism: Contributions from Cognitive and Social Science, Biblical Interpretation 89. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Uro, R. (2011) 'Cognitive and evolutionary approaches to ancient rituals: Reflections on recent theories and their relevance for the historian of religion', in Turner, J., Bull, C. H. and Lied, L. I. (eds) Mystery and Secrecy in Late Antique Thought and Praxis, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 76. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Uro, R. (2016) Ritual and Christian Beginnings: A Socio-Cognitive Analysis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Uro, R., Day, J., DeMaris, R. E. and Roitto, R. (eds) (forthcoming) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Ritual. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Van Baaren, R. B., Holland, R. W., Kawakami, K. and Van Knibbenberg, A. (2003) 'Mimicry and prosocial behavior', Psychological Science 15(1): 71–4.

Webb, R. L. (1991) John the Baptizer and Prophet. A Socio-Historical Study, Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 62. Sheffield: Sheffield Academy Press.

Weimer, J. B. (2015) 'Musical assemblies: How early Christian music functioned as a rhetorical topos, a mechanism of recruitment, and a fundamental marker of and emerging Christian identity'. PhD thesis, University of Toronto.

Whitehouse, H. and Martin, L. H. (eds) (2004) Theorizing Religions Past: Archeology, History, and Cognition. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira.

Williams, R. H. (2010) 'Purity, dirt, anomalies, and abominations', in Neufeld, D. and DeMaris, R. E. (eds) Understanding the Social World of the New Testament. London: Routledge.

Winkelman, M. (2000) Shamanism: The Neural Ecology of Consciousness and Healing. Westport, CT: Bergin and Carvey.

Wright, N. T. (1996) Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Xygalatas, D., Mitkidis, P., Fisher, R., Reddish, P., Skewes, J., Geertz, A. W., Roepstorff, A. and Bulbulia, J. (2013) 'Extreme rituals promote prosociality', Psychological Science 20(10): 1–4.

22

COMMUNICATION AND TRAVEL

Blake Leyerle

The slowness of communication

In antiquity, news traveled no faster than people. In our age of instantaneous communication, the reality of a world in which a letter from Syria to Rome might spend 100 days in transit (Cicero, Epistulae ad Familares 12.10.2) seems almost unimaginable. But to early Christians, a lag between an event and its report was so inevitable that Anthony can attribute the apparent ability of demons to foretell the future to the speedy thinness of their bodies. Having seen a person start out on a journey, or the rains beginning in Ethiopia, they could race ahead and, arriving well in advance of human messengers, astonish people with accurate predictions of an unexpected visit or the flooding of the Nile (Life of Anthony 31–2). Holy bodies shared this uncanny agility. After Apa Ammonathas had promised to travel to Alexandria to petition the emperor that monks be exempted from the poll tax, the brothers were 'dissatisfied' when two weeks later (apparently, the expected time for such a trip) they had not seen the old man stir from his cell. But on the fifteenth day, he came to them bearing a letter with the emperor's seal. In response to their query, 'When did you get that, Apa?' he replied, 'That very night I went to the emperor, who wrote this decree, then, going to Alexandria, I had it countersigned by the magistrate.' Hearing this miraculous feat, the brothers were appropriately 'filled with fear' (Apophthegmata Patrum, Ammonathas 1 [PG 65. 136–7]). The gift of instantaneous communication was given only to the holy. Sitting on his mountain, Anthony knew the moment that Amun had died, as he saw him being led up to heaven. When the brothers from Nitria arrived with the news thirteen days later, they were stunned to learn that Anthony had already known of Amun's death (Life of Anthony 60, cf. Jerome, Life of Paul 14). Such stories of exceptional mobility and immediate knowledge simply underscore the expected slowness with which news and people regularly traveled. In the face of this overwhelming physical fact, the bulk of any essay on communication in the late ancient world must focus on travel: its modes, impediments, and facilities.

The reasons for travel

General

Then, as now, people traveled for a variety of reasons. The most conspicuous group of travelers was undoubtedly the military, as any deployment of troops entailed mass movement. Wherever the military went, fleets of vehicles and pack animals followed as well as crowds of servants, grooms, porters, and women. Careful planning was required to supply the needs of troops on the move (Hist. August. Alexander Severus 45.2–3; cf. Ambrose, Exp. Ps. 118 5.2). Army recruits journeyed to Rome for induction and assignment to their individual units (Adams 2001: 146–52). The army's constant need for communication ensured that, at any given time, several soldiers in every military unit would be away serving as couriers (Sherk 1974; Austin and Rankov 1995; Kolb 2001: 98–9). Even when not on active duty, individual soldiers traveled and arranged for family members to visit. Tariff inscriptions indicate that soldiers' wives and prostitutes paid higher tolls for their road use, presumably because the state wanted to profit from this group of regular travelers (Philostratus, Vita Apollonii 1.20). When required, military officials traversed the empire to sites of distant operations, but generally preferred to have others do their traveling for them. Thus couriers and minor officials bearing letters, official decrees, reports, and gifts criss-crossed the empire (Bradbury 2004: 73–80).

Business matters spurred other travelers. Given the cost of moving goods overland, large-scale importers and exporters preferred to use shipping routes whenever possible. But the realities of distribution meant that they too had to make regular use of overland routes (Kolb 2000). Small merchants routinely shuttled between their sources of supply and their markets (Horden and Purcell 2000: 342–77). According to Apuleius, trade 'in honey, cheese, and other foodstuffs of that kind used by innkeepers,' kept one man traveling through Thessaly, Aetolia, and Boeotia (Met. 1.5). Tollbooth receipts show that donkey and camel caravans regularly traveled through the Western and Eastern deserts in Egypt (Adams 2001: 150; cf. Salway 2001: 26, 59). Effective agricultural exploitation demanded mobility (of goods and people) as well as the use of migrant labor (Suet., Vesp. 1; Varro, Rust. 1.16; Horden and Purcell 2000: 383–7). Wealthy landlords, like Pliny or his delegates, needed to visit their distant estates on a regular basis (Pliny, Ep. 3.19.4; 1.3.2; 9.15.3; 4.14.8). Artisans and entertainers traveled throughout the empire to ply their distinctive trades (Laurence 2001: 169; Grey 2004). Other mobile specialists included mercenaries, pirates, and robbers (Horden and Purcell 2000: 387–8).

Economic and environmental disasters also fed population redistribution, not only through voluntary relocation but also through the practice of debt slavery (De Ste. Croix 1981: 215–16; Horden and Purcell 2000: 388–91). The migrations of Germanic peoples in the fifth and sixth centuries precipitated widespread displacement. The sack of Rome in 410 initiated waves of migration to Africa and the eastern provinces (Jerome, Ep. 128.5); and in the sixth century, Africans fled to Spain from their Vandal-occupied homeland (Dietz 2005: 22–3).

Legal affairs often required travel. Manumitted slaves had to present themselves before the provincial governor to receive their official grant of freedom. Every petition, including that of Ammonathas, had to be delivered by hand (Llewelyn 1994: 26–9, 51–7; Bagnall 1993:162–3; Jördens 2011: 233–5). By the later third century, the imperial law courts were no longer stationed in Rome but had become roving entourages (Salway 2001: 59–60); when summoned, a person had to travel to the place of the assizes.

Family matters often prompted travel. Letters from the period suggest that the presence of a large number of ex-patriots in an area ensured a steady flow of potential couriers (Llewelyn 1994: 27–9). The notes they carried back to their hometown often contained requests for further travel: that relatives come to celebrate birthdays and festivals, to attend funerals, or to look after the sick (Adams 2001: 148–50).

For the sake of higher education, promising students traveled to centers of learning (Llewelyn 1998: 117–21; Cribiore 2001: 102–23; Watts 2004: 13–23). For advanced rhetorical instruction, they might go to Athens or Antioch; but for legal training, Beirut was the place. As teachers, they would later travel to lecture or take up positions. The promise of more docile students brought Augustine to Rome, but he was later lured to Milan by the expectation of a more lucrative position (Confessions 5.8, 5.13). Research interests in a particular kind of soil prompted Galen to travel to the Greek island of Lemnos (De simp. med. 9; Brodersen 2001: 8–9). Sight-seeing was an additional educational privilege enjoyed by the moneyed (Apuleius, Met. 2.21; Aelius Aristides, Oration 36; Rutherford 2003).

Pausanias recorded his travels around Greece to celebrate his own intellectual discoveries, as well as to provide a guide for other potential travelers (Elsner 1992; Cohen 2001).

Christian reasons for communication and travel

To the reasons that spurred on their Greco-Roman neighbors, Christians added their own, institutionally specific ones. From its foundation by itinerant preachers, missionary activity remained a hallmark of the early church. Once founded, individual churches depended upon on-going travel for material aid and ideological support (1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 7:12; Rom. 15:25–7; Phil. 4:16; cf. Acts 24:17; Thompson 1998). Writing from Corinth to the Christians in Rome, Paul says that he hopes to visit them en route to Spain, but that he must first go to Jerusalem (Rom. 15:24–9). The nonchalance with which he proposes this ambitious itinerary is striking, but even more astonishing is the apostle's assumption that his audience will share his confidence. In addition to his own travels, Paul relied upon emissaries to gather and disseminate news, to encourage and teach—in general, to build up the churches in his absence (Llewelyn 1998: 54–7). Even after church leadership passed into the hands of local bishops, priests, and deacons, clergy continued to travel on missionary voyages.

Other early Christian travel was involuntary. Both Paul and Ignatius were compelled by the state to go to Rome and their death. In response to Decius' legislation in the mid third century mandating universal sacrifice, Cyprian, along with other clergy, fled. His place of exile was no more remote than the suburbs of Carthage, but from that retreat he penned a defense of flight that contained the seeds of a theology for refugees (De lapsis). Under the pressure of doctrinal or disciplinary controversy, others had to travel much farther. When Constantine banished Athanasius from Alexandria, he sent him to Gaul, in what was to be only the first of five exiles (Brakke 1995: 8). And when the Egyptian ascetics known to us as the Tall Brothers brought charges against bishop Theophilus, he was compelled to travel from Alexandria to Constantinople to defend himself (Palladius, Dialogus de vita S. J. Chrysostomi 7.87–9; Socrates, Historia ecclesiastica 6.15; Sozomen, Historia ecclesiastica 8.16).

Yet the congestion occasioned by the press of ecclesiastical travel had been apparent to Ammianus Marcellinus decades earlier, when he complained of the 'throngs of bishops hastening hither and thither on the public mounts' (21.16.18). The need for large numbers of bishops (with various types of assistants) to attend the numerous church councils during this period (see Chapter 32 of this volume) was the spur to much of this traffic (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.6; Sotinel 2004).

Among the specifically Christian reasons for travel, pilgrimage merits particular attention. Not that it was unknown in the ancient world: hope had long urged the sick to make their way to healing shrines (Kötting 1950: 33–53; Volokhine 1998; Elsner and Rutherford 2005). When Pliny the Elder's freedman Zosimus started spitting blood, he sent him first to Egypt and then to Fréjus (Ep. 5.19). Aelius Aristides traveled to a number of Asclepian shrines in search of 'comfort' from his multiple afflictions—a concept that combined the hope of healing with the balm of religious experience (Sacred Tales 2.49–50, 3.6–7, 4.83, 6.1). But in the wake of Constantine's ambitious building program, the phenomenon of Christian pilgrimage increased tremendously in scope and importance (Hunt 1982; Maraval 1985; Wilken 1992). The draw exercised by these shrines is brilliantly captured in the sixth-century mosaic map from Madaba (Figure 22.1), which presents the Holy City as it might have appeared from a high viewpoint in the west in astonishing detail (Donner 1992: 87–94).

While a few pilgrims had come to Palestine 'for prayer and investigation' in the third century (Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica 6.11.12), it was the lure of being 'on the very spot' that brought Egeria to the Holy Land in the following century (Itinerarium Egeriae 4.6), and caused John Chrysostom to wish for the leisure and bodily strength to travel to Philippi to see the chains that had imprisoned Paul (Eph. Homiliae 8.2). So powerful was this sense of place that Jerome promised Marcella that if she came to Palestine she would see not simply the sites where scriptural events occurred, but the actual events themselves. Together, he assures her, they will 'see Lazarus come forth tied up in winding bands . . . and perceive the prophet Amos sounding the shepherd's horn upon his mountain' (Ep. 46.13; see also Ep. 108.10). Another anonymous pilgrim made scripture his own by scratching onto a wall in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre the words 'Lord, we came' (compare Psalm 122) under a rough sketch of a typical fourth-century boat (Gibson and Taylor 1994: 25–48; see Figure 22.2).

Figure 22.1   Sixth-century CE mosaic map from Madaba in Jordan with detail of Jerusalem.
            Photo J. C. N. Coulston

Many pilgrims traveled in the hope of obtaining tangible blessings. Healing shrines, such as the great complex at Abō Mīnā in Egypt, drew crowds of pilgrims in search of miraculous cures (Grossman 1998).

Figure 22.2   Pilgrim graffito in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, Jerusalem, the Latin inscription reading
            Domine ivimus ('Lord we came'). Photo Zev Radovan/Jerusalem

For others, the goal of pilgrimage was a person rather than a place (Frank 2000). So many visitors traveled to hear 'a word' from the solitaries of Egypt, that Apa Arsenius feared that the sea had become a highway (Apophthegmata Patrum, Arsenius 28). But not everyone shared these misgivings. Monastic communities sprang up along the main pilgrim routes precisely in order to supply the needs of these religious travelers (Hunt 1982: 62–6; Hirschfeld 1992: 55–6). In addition to food and lodging (at least for a week according to Palladius, Historia Lausiaca 7), they provided a certain amount of tour guidance (Itinerarium Egeriae 12.2–4; Sivan 1990). Such hospitality was inspired by charitable motives, but it was not wholly disinterested. Not only did visitors often contribute alms for the upkeep of the monastery, but pilgrimage had also become an increasingly common prelude to entering a religious community. Many monastics, moreover, continued to embrace periods of wandering as part of their ascetic practice (Cyril of Scythopolis, Life of Euthymius, 14; Life of Sabas, 94, 106; Caner 2002; Dietz 2005).

Enabling this growing movement of pilgrims was the vast network of roads and shipping routes established by the Romans to serve their economic and military interests. As all wayfarers shared perforce the same infrastructure of travel, only motivation separated pilgrim from commercial traveler. Indeed it is our earliest pilgrimage account, dated to 333 CE, that provides our best evidence for the state of communications in the empire. Meticulously tracing a step-by-step itinerary, the anonymous pilgrim from Bordeaux notes the distances between cities, changes of horses, and overnight stays from his home to the Holy Land (Itinerarium Burdigalense). His route, along with that of five other early Christian pilgrims, Melania the Elder in 373–400, Egeria in 381–4, Paula and Jerome in 385, and Postumianus in c. 400, has been conveniently mapped by Hunt (1982: 52; see Figure 22.3).

From their travels, pilgrims usually sent or brought home various mementos: small quantities of soil, rock, or other indigenous produce from the Holy Land (Leyerle 2008). Flasks, often decorated, of blessed water or oil were especially popular (Davis 1998; Vikan 2010: 23–44). Not simply souvenirs, these objects shared in the power of the land, and thus were widely believed to have protective and beneficent powers. Serving as religious sights in their own right for non-travelers back home, they no doubt stirred in others the desire to take to the road (Leyerle 1996).

Social networking and travel

The result of all this movement was enhanced communication, as far off people were brought into contact. So common was it, indeed, for settlements to spring up along roadways that vanished roadways can now be reconstructed from patterns of human settlement (Chevallier 1976: 43, 117; Isaac and Roll 1982: 90–2). But social networks were not simply the result of travel; they were equally often its cause. The application of social network theory to early Christianity has illuminated the extent to which pre-existing bonds of kinship, friendship, and patronage encouraged people to travel, write letters, and send gifts (Clark 1992; White 1992). By serving as couriers, new people were introduced into the network, and their belonging was then cemented through reciprocated hospitality. As friends of friends developed independent relationships, the web of communication grew sturdier and more complex. At every step, the astonishingly dense communication network created by early Christianity was dependent upon the movement of bodies, whose mobility was in turn enabled by a vast web of roads and shipping routes that linked the distant outposts of the empire.

The experience and infrastructure of travel and communication

Travel by land

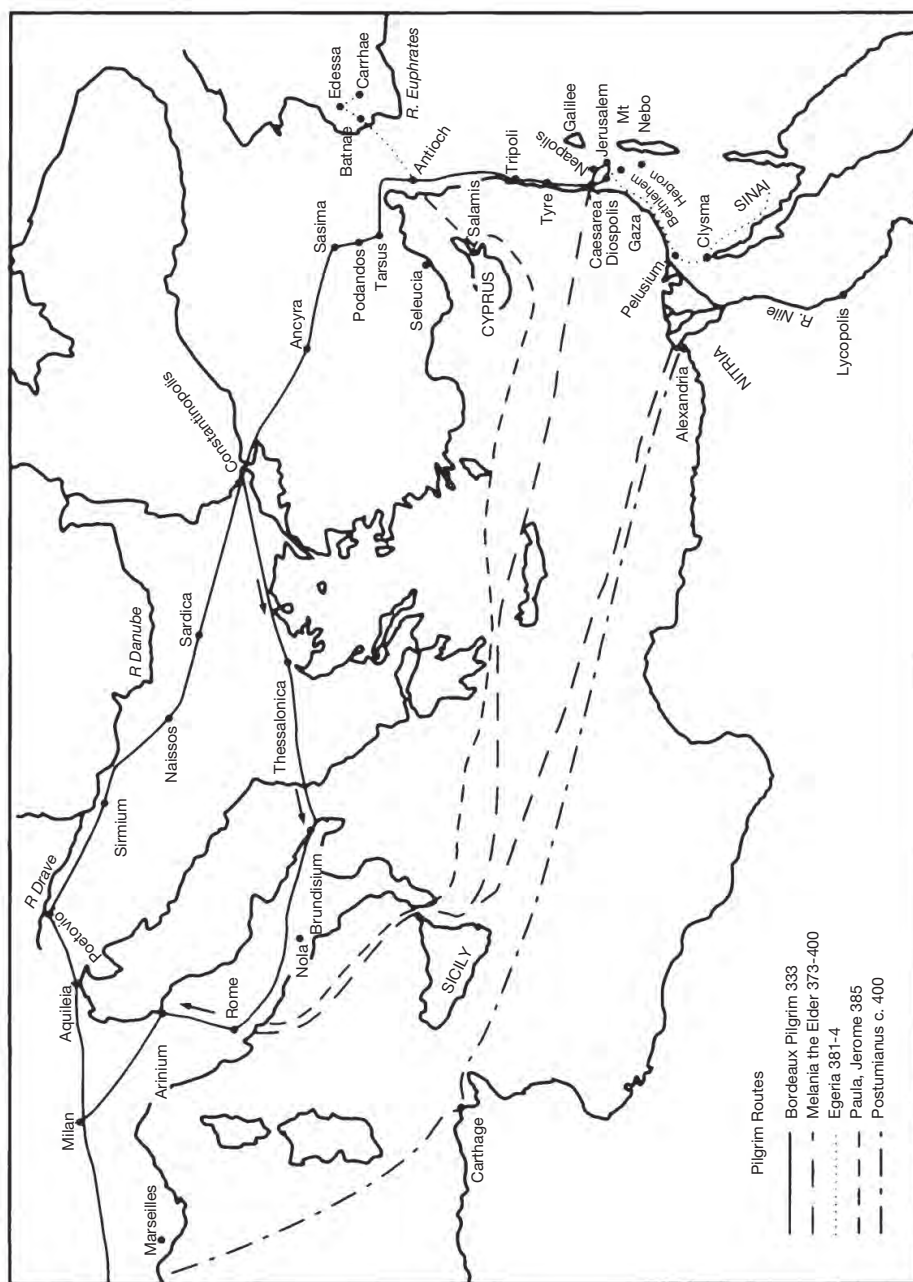
At the height of the empire, some 200,000 miles of graveled or paved highways linked the disparate provinces to Rome (Forbes 1955: 138; Quilici 2008; Talbert 2010: 7–93). As we would expect, the quality of these roads varied tremendously. Main routes were always better


Figure 22.3 Map of major pilgrim routes to the Holy Land in the fourth century. From Hunt (1982: 52), by permission of the Clarendon Press, Oxford constructed and maintained than secondary paths. But even stretches of the same road showed considerable variation, since construction techniques always had to be accommodated to local materials (Chevallier 1976: 106–21, 131–77).

The majority of routes were simply graveled paths. Under dry conditions, these were perfectly adequate, but in poor weather they might turn into 'deep impassable mud.' Procopius describes one notoriously frightful stretch in ancient Bithynia on which innumerable travelers and animals perished (Procopius, de Aedificiis 5.3.12–3). Most of these routes have not withstood the passage of centuries. What remains are the stretches of premier roadway that characterized the Mediterranean core (Laurence 2001: 82, 1999: 58–77). These were the result of skilled engineering and considerable monetary outlay.

In a remarkable passage, Statius describes the process of constructing the Via Domitiana:

> The first labor was to dig ditches and to cut out the borders of the road and to excavate the ground within to a great depth; next to fill in the emptied ditches with other materials and to prepare the interior for the high ridge of the road, so that neither would the soil give way nor a treacherous foundation provide an unstable bed for the paving stones under the pressure of traffic; finally, to bind the road with blocks close-set on either side and with packed polygonal pavers. Oh how many gangs are at work at the same time! This group cuts down forests and clears the mountains, another group smoothes stakes and fashions beams with iron tools; another binds the rocks and weaves together the work with lime and dusty pozzolana; still another group dries up the thirsty pools and draws the smaller streams far away by their labor.
>
> *(*Sil. 4.3.40–55; Quilici 2008: 566–7)

First a bed was dug and leveled. Straightness was valued as a means of facilitating the movement of troops, but it demanded an extraordinarily high level of accurate surveying (Lewis 2001: 217–45). Thus absolute straightness was often abandoned in favor of following the contours of the land. On hillsides, beds were laid slightly below the crest to take advantage of firmer footing and better drainage, as well as to afford troops a degree of protection while traveling through hostile territory (Chevallier 1976: 114–16; Coulston 2001). The concern for safety also dictated that densely wooded areas be avoided and underbrush cleared back from the roads. In rugged terrain, routes often followed older paths, skirting mountains and avoiding defiles. But if the need were great enough, the Roman engineers were prepared to bore through mountains or cantilever a roadway along the side of a cliff (Forbes 1955: 150; Chevallier 1976: 104–6; Quilici 2008).

Road width varied according to use, importance, and terrain, but a width of 4.1–4.2 m (14 Roman feet) was customary. Roads widened as they approached major towns and around curves, and narrowed when going through difficult terrain (Chevallier 1976: 66, 89). But even when boring through solid rock, military routes had to be sufficiently wide to accommodate heavy baggage wagons. In difficult alpine passes, pullouts were constructed to provide room for passing or stopped vehicles. The slope was kept to around 7 percent (Quilici 2008: 56–68).

Once the roadbed was prepared, it was filled with a foundation mixture of broken pottery, small stones, and often some waterproofing material. Heavy rollers then rammed this mixture down to prevent pockets that could collect water and lead to heaving and cracking. Finally, flat paving stones were fitted closely together, ideally to form an unbroken surface (Forbes 1955: 146–7; Casson 1988: 354). Pedestrian sidewalks, of 3 meters on either side, were common.

To facilitate drainage, the road surface was slightly crowned and ditches were dug on either side. These were usually 3 meters wide and at least as deep as the foundation course. The result of this labor was a road some 100–140 centimeters deep, or three to four times the depth of a modern roadbed (Forbes 1955: 148). Roads built over unstable ground might require even more elaborate construction techniques involving support posts and planks or bundles of sticks (Chevallier 1976: 89–90; Quilici 2008: 568).

Figure 22.4 Section of a paved Roman road showing curbing and sidewalks, Jerash, Jordan.
 Photo Andrew Leyerle

This impressive technology gave Roman roads exceptional durability. They could sustain the wear of iron wheels for 70 to 100 years before needing thorough reconstruction, although high-traffic stretches might need servicing every 30 to 40 years. Even relatively simple cobble roads, in which cobbles were embedded in a 10 centimeter sandbed, probably had a life of 10 to 15 years (Forbes 1955: 148–9). A road's longevity was, in part, determined by weather. In the northern parts of the empire, roads were subject to frost damage such as cracks and potholes. By the end of the empire, the task of road repair had outstripped the construction of new routes.

The construction of these routes served ideological as well as practical ends. They proclaimed the domination and control of Rome not only by their impressive durability and straightness, but also by their implicit disregard of pre-existing networks and boundaries (Muir 2000: 100; Howe 2005: 29). Scenes depicting the clearing of forests and the graveling of roads thus appear on Trajan's column, where they trumpet the Roman virtues of discipline and control over natural resources, in apparent contrast to barbarian disorganization and panic (Coulston 2001: 123, 126–9; cf. Salway 2001: 56).

Even more than roads, bridges symbolized the technological abilities and political will of Roman culture (Quilici 2008: 569–73). Caesar's successful spanning of the Rhine on two occasions was a triumph of engineering (Bell. 4.16–19; 6.9), and even four centuries after Hadrian had dismantled Apollodorus of Damascus' bridge over the Danube, it was still worthy of praise (Dio 68.13.1–6; Procop. Aed. 4.6.11–16; Coulston 2001: 124). With good reason, Pliny lists the construction of bridges among topics suitable for a panegyric (Ep. 8.4.2). Bridges were usually constructed out of a core of concrete faced with local stones, and typically feature large piers and rounded arches—some with remarkable spans. Impressive examples, such as the bridge at Cordoba, were built throughout the empire to carry roads across major rivers.

Figure 22.5   The Roman bridge at Cordoba. Photo J. C. N. Couston

The cost of this infrastructure was understandably high. Funding for road works was initially raised through direct taxation. Private officials might also contribute their own money to this public work. In return, they expected to receive public recognition and honor, often in the form of inscribed milestones (CIL 10.5416, 5.8668, 10.3851; Justinian, Digesta 31.10; Laurence 2004: 45–53). These were columnar markers set along the road and readily visible from a distance, as they stood two to four meters above the ground. While the earliest examples are simply inscribed with the distance from the nearest city, later ones often bear a list of the public works of the donor responsible for funding the road's construction (e.g., CIL 12.1524; Chevallier 1976: 39–44). Where successive patrons vied to commemorate their public-spirited generosity, milestones occur in clusters (Isaac and Roll 1982: 91–8). Within Italy, the maintenance of the road system gradually devolved upon specially appointed officials, but in the provinces it remained a duty of the governor—one closely related to the preservation of peace.

The speed of travel along these well-engineered and costly roads strikes us as almost unbelievably slow. Casson estimated that a person traveling by foot on level ground, would go on average 15 to 20 miles per day (Casson 1974: 188). On longer trips, the rate would fall to a more sustainable rate of 13 to 20 miles per day (Kolb 2000: 310–11; McCormick 2001: 474–81). On his forced march from Antioch to Rome, Ignatius would have spent 86 days walking and 9 days aboard ship (Ramsay 1904: 384–6). In a carriage, one could reasonably expect to cover 25–30 miles a day, at a rate of four miles an hour. Under duress, this rate might increase to as much as 40 or 45 miles per day, but not for long (Chevallier 1976: 188). While horses were the swiftest means of conveyance, they were seldom used because of their costliness. Not only were they expensive to buy, but they also required a high quality, costly, diet. Unable to sustain hard driving, they also proved less sure-footed over uneven terrain (Hyland 1990). For heavy loads of grain or metals, oxen were the best choice. Their pace was slow at 6 to 10 miles per day, but sustainable over long distances and on an inferior diet readily available to most Greek and Roman farmers (Varro, Rust. 1.20, 2.8; K. D. White, 1984: 52). Donkeys were popular, especially in mountainous regions, but the load they could carry was significantly less than that of a horse. By far the most popular animal for traveling was therefore the mule, a cross between a horse and a donkey that combined the best features of both (Raepsaet 2008: 584–98). Camels were also used in sandy regions (It. Eg. 6.1–2; Casson 1988: 356; Bagnall 1993: 38–40).

A variety of carts, carriages, and litters were available. Of these, the most comfortable, but also the slowest, was the litter (lectica), in which one sat or reclined while being conveyed by animals or a group of sturdy men (Casson 1988: 356–7). It was thus in a gesture of asceticism that Paula exchanged her customary litter for a mule on her pilgrimage through Palestine (Jerome, Ep. 108.7). For swifter travel, two- and four-wheeled vehicles (carpentum, raeda, carruca dormitoria) were available (Ammianus Marcellinus 29.6; Laurence 1999: 136–42; Raepsaet 2008: 598–9). Those desiring protection from the elements or from the eyes of others might choose a closed carriage, as did Pliny when suffering from eye-strain (Ep. 7.21), or Gregory of Nyssa when forced to abandon monastic seclusion for a trip to the Holy Land (Ep. 2).

A number of technological problems slowed the progress of vehicles (Raepsaet 2008). Traction was generally poor without 'dished' wheels that could grip the crowned road surface. Indeed, where routes ran along sheer drops, deep groves were scored into the pavement to guide the wheels (Forbes 1955: 138; Chevallier 1976: 89; Quilici 2008: 562). A fixed front axle demanded a slow, wide arc on every turn. Without ball or roller bearings, or even cost-effective lubrication, wheel hubs were vulnerable to friction from the axle (Harris 1974; Casson 1988: 356). Any steep gradient posed a real danger to a heavily laden wagon, since neither efficient bits nor brakes had been invented. There was, moreover, always the danger of an animal slipping on slick sections of the stone-paved road (Polge 1967: 28–54). The earliest horse 'shoes' were, in fact, designed to hold hobnail studs to improve traction, rather than to protect sensitive hooves (Apuleius, Met. 4.4, 9.32; Green, 1966: 305–8). Finally, none of the wheeled conveyances had any suspension system. Given the bone-jarring prospect of long-distance driving, most people preferred to walk.

The laborious difficulty of travel over land is graphically summed up in the prices for the conveyance of goods. From Diocletian's Price Edict of 301, A. H. M. Jones calculated that a wagon-load of wheat doubled its price every 300 miles (Jones 1964: 2.841). At such a rate, it was far cheaper to bring wheat to Rome from Egypt by ship than to carry it even 75 miles by road. These older estimates can now be supplemented and refined by consulting the Stanford Geospatial Network Model of the Ancient World (ORBIS), which allows users to track with astonishing precision the fluctuations in travel time and cost associated with various routes at different seasons of the year (Scheidel 2014, 2015). Personal travel was also expensive. Apuleius writes that the outlay necessary for Lucius' trip from Corinth to Rome 'melted away his humble inheritance' (Met. 11.28).

To the intrinsic discomforts of travel, we must add the danger of bandits (Riess 2011). Suetonius and Strabo both praise Augustus for suppressing brigandry by extending the road system and installing military posts (Augustus 32; Geography 4.6.6), but Luke's story of the Good Samaritan takes for granted the likelihood of robbers setting upon travelers on deserted stretches of road (10:30; see also 2 Cor. 11:26; Pliny, Natural History 6.25; Apuleius, Met. 1.7). In 296 CE, a soldier wrote to his wife: 'Bring your gold jewelry with you, but don't wear it!' (P. Mich. 214). Poorer travelers were always more vulnerable to assault than the rich, who typically traveled with a retinue and might even have the resources to hire a military escort (Lucian, Alexander 55). Certain routes were, we gather, best avoided. Basil was surprised that no one had warned the priest Dorotheus that the road to Rome from Constantinople was impassable in winter, 'being full of enemies' (Ep. 215). Despite these perils, everyone knew that things had been worse. Abraham's ready obedience to God's command to go to a place he did not know is all the more impressive, according to Chrysostom, since 'at that time, traveling was so unpleasant; it was not possible then, as it is now, to mingle with others safely and to travel abroad without apprehension' (In Genesim homiliae 31.5).

Even if one managed to avoid the clutches of bandits, there was no escape from the irritation of gnats or the chugging of bullfrogs that might make sleep quite impossible (Horace, Sermones 1.5.14–7). Other perils included roving packs of wolves or fierce dogs (Apuleius, Met. 8.15–7, 9.36), and bridges in states of ruinous disrepair (Procopius, Aed. 5.5). Winter brought its own difficulties. Not only were avalanches a risk in mountainous regions (Strabo, Geography 4.6.6), but all travel slowed to a crawl. When Aelius Aristides set out eagerly in midwinter from Asia Minor, he was impeded first by rain and then by snow before being wholly arrested by sickness; 100 days later and a shadow of his former self, he finally reached Rome. Under favorable circumstances, the trip should have taken no more than a month (Sacred Tales, 2.60–2).

All these hazards encouraged the religiously minded to take precautions. Many consulted the gods on when to travel (Apuleius, Met. 2.12–3, 9.8). In response to a question concerning travel to Italy, one oracle in Asia Minor replied with unusual clarity: 'Make not your journey by sea, but travel afoot by the highway' (Lucian, Alex. 53, trans. A. M. Harmon, Loeb Classical Library). Dreams would be carefully scrutinized: keys meant travel delays, and quails ambushes by bandits (Artemidorus 3.54, 3.5). Few were so foolhardy as to set out on a journey with the left foot first (Apuleius, Met. 1.5, Chrysostom, In Eph. hom. 12.3).

Orientation devices

To the question of how travelers planned their routes and made their way across the empire, scholars have long assumed that the Romans had scale maps (Sherk 1974: 559; Dilke 1987: 254; Harvey 1987: 466), and we do have some comparable 'illustrated' maps (itineraria picta). Of these, the best known, as well as the most beautiful, is the Peutinger Table, a twelfth-century copy of a Roman civilian map. In brilliant colors, it traces the main routes of the empire, depicts major topographical features, and indicates resting stops, towns and cities and the distances between them (Talbert 2010). But it was never designed to serve as a practical aid. Not only would it have been extremely cumbersome to consult, but it evinces no concern for scale or even geographical accuracy (Brodersen 2001). The most common means of orientation in antiquity were simple lists of stations along a route (itineraria adnotata) (Brodersen 2001; Salway 2001: 48–54). Our earliest pilgrim account—that of the anonymous traveler from Bordeaux—is in fact just such an itinerary. At major nodes, travelers could also consult tabellaria, or wall plaques, that listed distances along several routes radiating from a central point (Salway 2001). Another practical aid were the piles of small stones that marked the edges of the roadway in desert regions (Itin. Eg. 6; Adams 2001: 141). Comments made in passing, however, suggest that most travelers relied on experienced guides. Chrysostom assumes that people 'moving from one city to another need someone to lead them by the hand' (De Laz. 2.2): ideally, this would be a person who had 'traveled over much country' and thus could 'report with great precision the number of stadia and the arrangement of cities: their layout, harbors, and markets' (In Matthaeum homiliae 1.7).

Inns

In a system of communication built upon the movement of bodies, hospitality was of crucial importance. Whenever possible, travelers preferred to stay with acquaintances. But when this option was not available, they often carried letters of recommendation that enabled them to knock on the door of friends of friends or other members of their guild or profession (Rom. 16:10–12; 1 Cor. 16:11; 2 Cor. 7:15; Apuleius, Met. 1.21–3, 10.1). These letters tended to be highly formulaic: 'Receive this highly honored and much sought-after man, and do not hesitate to treat him hospitably, thus doing what behooves you and what pleases me' (Malherbe 1988: 74–5). In his own letters, Paul often requests lodging for himself as well as for his companions (Rom. 15:23–4; Philem. 1:22; 1 Cor. 16:6–7). He was evidently not the only itinerant Christian to stay with Gaius at Corinth, as the apostle styles him, 'host to me and to the whole church' (Rom. 16:23). By the second century, 'being hospitable' was one of the qualifications for episcopal office (1 Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:8), and would remain an expectation throughout the early Christian period. In addition to welcoming strangers, bishops were also required to write letters of recommendation. Many of these survive. In the late third century, for example, Bishop Sotas of Oxyrhyncus wrote and received letters of recommendation on behalf of women and catechumens, as well as of men and fully initiated Christians (Llewelyn 1998: 169–72; Luijendijk 2008: 81–124).

In addition to being a kindly gesture, sheltering others was an important means of extending one's social network. The record of people who stayed with Jerome in his monastery on the Mount of Olives constitutes a virtual Who's Who of the late fourth-century Christian world (Clark 1992: 28–33).

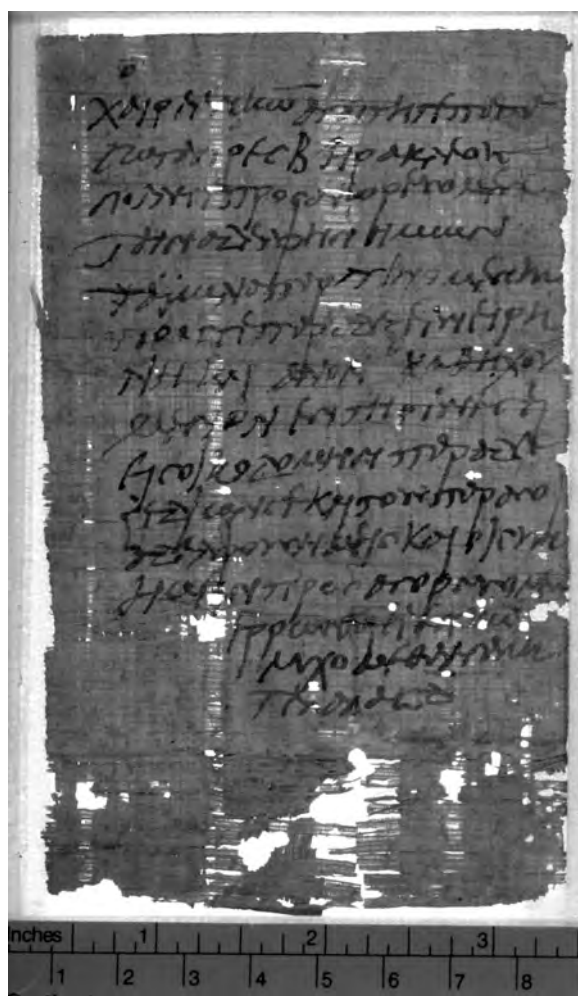
For those who lacked contacts in any given region, there were commercial venues. Inns were available not only in towns, but also along the main routes. They were usually located a day's journey, or 25 miles, apart unless difficult terrain demanded closer placement (Casson 1988: 354). Hostelries were needed not only for the refreshment of travelers, but also for the regular exchange of horses and vehicles. Stops made simply for fresh horses were originally called mutationes (changes), whereas overnight stays were termed mansiones (rest-stops). By the time of the Theodosian Code, however, these terms were used interchangeably (Chevallier 1976: 185). From one rest-stop to another, two changes seem to have been typical. The Bordeaux pilgrim, for example, records that he covered the 2,221 miles from Bordeaux to Constantinople, with 230 changes and 112 rest-stops: an average rate of travel of about 19.8 miles per day. Occasional difficult stretches demanded three or even four changes of equipment a day.


Figure 22.6   P.Oxy 36.2785, a letter of recommendation from the presbyters of Heracleopolis to bishop Sotas. Photo with permission of the Egypt Exploration Society

Facilities at inns varied considerably, but complaints are common (Constable 2003: 11–35). Traveling in northern Greece, Lucius wrote that his bed, 'besides being a bit too short and missing a leg, was rotten' (Apuleius, Met. 1.11; cf. Aelius Aristides, Sacred Tales 2.61). Jerome assumes that his readers will appreciate Paula's ascetic commitment that led her, while traveling in the Holy Land, to refuse invitations to lodge at official mansions and put up instead at what he tautologically terms 'miserable inns' (Ep. 108.7, 9, 14). But where travelers had a choice in accommodation, the quality tended to improve (Plutarch, Moralia 532B–C). In Asia Minor, Epictetus suggests that a traveler might be tempted to linger on in a luxurious inn (Dissertationes 2.23.36); and in that same region, Aelius Aristides preferred to stay at an inn rather than at the house of a friend (Or. 27). The Peutinger Table's use of a variety of symbols for inns (a four-sided building surrounding a court, a house with a twin-peaked roof, or a single-peaked cottage) seems to reflect this potential range, rather than the actual quality of lodging at any given point (Talbert 2010: 117–22). But whatever their level of amenities, inns had a poor reputation as places of prostitution and potential violence. A porter in Apuleius's novel assumes that any guest hurrying to leave before daybreak might have murdered his traveling companion (Met. 1.15; see also Acts Thom. 11.2), and a fourth-century tombstone near Antioch, recording the death of two cousins 'murdered in the inn of Theodorus near Laodicea,' attests to the fact that such a scenario was not purely fictional (Tchalenko 1953–58: 31–2, 111). Churchmen especially decried the danger posed to sexual virtue by inns. It was largely on this basis that Gregory of Nyssa tried to dissuade Christians from going on pilgrimage (Or. 2; cf. Ulpian, Digesta 3.2.4.2; 23.2.43.1 and 9; Codex Theodosianus 4.56.3); but the association of inns with prostitution is still taken utterly for granted in the sixth-century Life of Theodore of Sykeon (Encomium in S. Theodorum Siceotam 1, 3). In order to combat this hazard, as well as to provide charitable support for pilgrims, monks, and other Christian travelers, churches and monasteries began to establish hospices (xenodocheions) in the fourth century (Basil, Ep. 94; Gregory Nazianzen, Or. 43.63; Palladius, Historia Lausiaca 7; Constable 2003: 35–8). Over time, these facilities became increasingly devoted to caring for the sick and dying (Miller 1990). In the late sixth century, when the anonymous pilgrim from Piacenza traveled to Jerusalem, he marveled at the hospice facilities associated with the Nea church: 'in order to look after travellers they have innumerable tables and more than three thousand beds for the sick' (Itin. Plac. 23). Even if we reduce this number to 200, on the basis of archeological findings, this was still a facility of extraordinary size.

Tolls

Occurring with even more regularity than inns were tollbooths and customs offices. Along the roads and at every bridge travelers would have to pay a fee for their use of the facilities, with the proceeds going into a fund for maintenance (Forbes 1955: 152). At the borders of provinces, as well as city gates, taxes were due on all transported goods (Rougé 1966: 450–1; Chevallier 1976: 195–7; Bang 2008: 202–38). The amount varied according to province. Some taxed goods at variable rates; others charged a flat percentage (from 2½ to 5 percent). In a small village in Egypt, a man transporting six measures of lentils on two donkeys in 190 CE, owed 3 percent in customs tax (Oxford, P. Grenf. II 50 h; Hopkins 1991). Another inscription, however, suggests that this tax varied according to rank (OGIS 674; Ramsay 1904: 394–6). By the time additional fees and administrative charges were tacked on, the payment of custom duties often equaled or surpassed the cost of transport. Tariffs on luxury goods were even more punitive. According to Pliny, caravans importing frankincense from southern Arabia to Gaza had to pay 688 denarii per camel in various local taxes, even before surrendering the official customs tariff to the Roman publicans (Pliny Nat. 12.32; see also Strabo 17). Penalties for making a false declaration were proportionately severe: often up to twice the usual rate

(Dig. Marcian, 39.4.16.10). Philostratus humorously exploits this reality in his Life of Apollonius of Tyana. When this first-century itinerant sage and wonder worker came to a bridge crossing into Mesopotamia, a customs official asked him what he had to declare. Loftily, he replied:

> 'I export moderation, righteousness, virtue, continence, courage, discipline'—thereby stringing together a number of female names. [The tax-collector] scenting profit, said, 'Register these slaves.' But [Apollonius] replied, 'Impossible! For these are not slaves that I am taking out of the country but masters.'
>
> *(*Vita Apollonii 1.20)

While making jokes at the expense of a customs official is seldom in the best interests of a traveler, we are not told whether Apollonius' wit caused him unnecessary expense or delay.

Sea travel

Compared to the grinding tedium of travel overland, travel by water, if the winds were favorable, seemed almost miraculously swift. Thus, while the Greeks had many words for the sea, their favorite term was pontos, a word that never entirely severed its connotation of a bridge.

Travel by sea, as by land, remained largely determined by the necessities of business. As there were no dedicated passenger boats, those wishing to travel by sea booked passage aboard merchant vessels destined, ideally, for the same port. Passengers desiring to go from Rome to Alexandria were the most fortunate. The capital city's constant need for wheat ensured a steady stream of huge cargo ships. These freighters offered no special amenities for travelers, but did typically make better time. Travel to less frequented destinations, however, as with air travel today, required several layovers and the use of progressively smaller vessels. A passenger heading to Palestine from Rome was thus well advised to board a grain ship for Alexandria and proceed from there to Palestine (Philo, In Flaccum 5.26).

Unlike the mobile warships which were constructed like oversized racing shells, merchant ships were built to maximize cargo space. They were broad in the beam and difficult to maneuver (Casson 1995: 252–7; McGrail 2003). A spread of canvas made out of flax (Pliny, Hist. Nat. 19.1.3–4) provided their only means of locomotion. In periods of calm, they would simply drop anchor and wait for the wind to pick up, as Plautus well knew when he described a couple of dawdlers as 'slower than corbitas on a calm sea' (Poenulus 507), a corbita being a slow-sailing merchant ship. To modern eyes, their spread of sail was insufficient for their size (Casson 1988: 359). A three-sail rig (a main sail, topsail, and forward bowsprit sail or artemon) was standard throughout the ancient world for all but the largest ships, which added a square mizzen on the afterdeck. Without fore-and-aft rigging, moreover, these boats were unable to take efficient advantage of winds blowing from any direction other than behind. During the summer months when the sea was open for travel, strong winds, the so-called 'yearly' or 'etesian' winds, blew steadily from the north west. The run from Rome to Alexandria was thus relatively speedy, with two weeks being average; but the return voyage was a laborious affair. Instead of striking out across the Mediterranean, these boats would skirt the coast of Roman Palestine until they could cross on the leeward side of the Island of Rhodes; from there, they sailed to Fair Havens Harbor on Crete, before striking across to Malta and on to Sicily; only then could they make their way up the western side of Italy into the harbor at Puteoli or Ostia (Ramsay 1904: 379–81). This circuitous route usually took about two months, but might take longer. When Gregory Nazianzen sailed from Alexandria to Greece, he reached Rhodes only on the twentieth day (Or. 18.31). Even with a favorable wind, ancient ships probably averaged no more than four to six knots, and against the wind, half of that or less.

When the wind blew from the side, but from a point somewhat ahead, the square-rigged ships of antiquity could still make some headway by tacking, or tracing a zigzag course through the water, which allowed the ship to take the wind on one bow and then the other (Casson 1988: 357).

To be effective, the transition from one direction to another needed to be as abrupt as possible, a procedure that could alarm passengers unfamiliar with the technique. Synesius, a fourth-century bishop of Cyrene, was thus certain that the ship's captain had lost his mind when he began to tack against the prevailing northwesterly winds (Ep. 4).

Unlike modern sailing craft, which are more at risk when sailing close to land, ancient ships were most vulnerable on the open sea. Sudden strong gusts of wind brought pressure to bear on the huge central sail, causing the central mast to work like a giant lever and splinter the ship's hull (Ramsay 1904: 399). To counteract this danger, ingenious reefing techniques were developed. Lines running from the deck up through rings, or 'brails,' attached at regular intervals to the sails, allowed the canvas to be shortened rapidly like some large venetian blind, provided, of course, that the ropes ran smoothly and did not jam in the pulley-blocks (Synesius, Ep. 4).

The famous description of the storm at sea in Acts 27 vividly traces the steps taken to avoid shipwreck. In the grip of a rising wind, the captain tries to face into the storm. When he loses control, he orders the sails reefed and allows the boat to be driven by the wind. As the storm worsens, the crew begins to throw surplus cargo overboard, on the third day, jettisoning even the ship's tackle. Without sight of sun or stars and caught in a tempest, the travelers succumb to despair. On the fourteenth day, as the ship drifts in the Adriatic, the sailors take soundings and discover that the boat is heading into shore. Immediately, they let out four anchors from the stern. Other sailors, fearing that the ship is about to run onto rocks, surreptitiously lower the life boat while pretending to cast anchors from the bow. Toward day, the crew lightens the ship further by casting its cargo of wheat into the sea. As day dawns, the shore appears. The crew then cut the anchors loose and hoist the foresail to head toward the beach. Striking a shoal, the ship runs aground. With the bow firmly stuck, the stern is broken up by the surf. But all the passengers and crew escape safely either by swimming to shore or riding in on planks or other flotsam. The passengers in Achilles Tatius' romance were not so lucky. As passengers and crew fight bitterly over places in the one small lifeboat, many drown impaled on spars or dashed upon the rocks (3.3.1–5.5).

Figure 22.7 A relief on the mausoleum of C. Munatius Faustus (50 CE) of a typical Roman merchant ship with crew members reefing the sails to enter port. Photo Erich Lessing, Art Resource New York City

The use of anchors in the Acts narrative is particularly instructive. Underwater archeology has discovered a contemporary Roman ship that went down off the coast of Taranto; it had thrown out 5 anchors, each weighing over 600 kilograms. These were made mostly of wood weighted down with iron fittings. Surviving specimens of ancient anchors reveal, not surprisingly, a poignant blend of practicality and fervent prayer. The stocks, or cross bars, are often inscribed with the names of gods or occasionally with knucklebones, a placating gesture to 'Lady Luck' (Casson 1995: 250–7). The associations of trustworthy stability made the anchor a popular symbol for signet rings, which were used to secure valuables at home (Clement, Paedagogus 3.11).

Aside from storms and the inevitable bouts of seasickness (Oldelehr 1977), travelers by sea braved the threat of pirates (Achilles Tatius 5.7; Horden and Purcell 2000: 157–9) and the scarcely less fearful rapacity of legendary sea-creatures (Herodotus, Historia 6.44.3). Such dangers encouraged even more superstition than did travel by land (Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.16.18; Artemidorus, 2.23, 2.12, 2.17, 3.65, 3.38; Polyaenus 3.10.2; Plutarch, Themistocles 13.3; Cicero, De Divinatione 2.4.84; Petronius, Satyricon 103–5).

To book passage on a ship, an ancient traveler headed down to the port. In most harbors, would-be passengers simply walked the quays asking where ships were bound, as Libanius did in 340 CE when looking for passage from Constantinople to Athens (Or. 1.31). In Rome's great port city of Ostia, however, a square directly inland from the harbor held the offices of all the merchants plying trade overseas. A prospective traveler might simply make a round of the square to book passage on any ship (Casson 1988: 361). Boats were distinguished not by name but by an image painted or modeled in relief just under the bow on either side. They also varied in color (Pliny, Hist. Nat. 35.31, 49; Philostratus, Imagines 1.19.3; Casson 1995: 211–12).

Ships did not sail on a schedule; they waited for a favorable wind. Passengers were thus also compelled to hang about the waterfront until a herald announced their ship's departure (Augustine, Conf. 5.8; Philostratus, V. Apoll. 8.14). Gangways and ladders were used for boarding. Once aboard, passengers had limited space. The largest of the grain ships might take on 600 passengers (Josephus, Vita 15). On Paul's ship to Rome, there were 276 people in all (Acts 27:37), of which perhaps 260 were passengers. But this ship was sailing in the off-season, and might not have been at capacity. Synesius tells us that he traveled with about 50 other passengers, a third of whom were women. From him also we hear that most of the ship's crew were Jewish (Ep. 4). Aside from the captain, there were other specialized officers: usually a first mate and purser, as well as those in charge of the cargo. These officers, as well as the rest of the crew, might well be slaves (Casson 1995: 314–21).

As the hold was mostly reserved for cargo, ballast (often sand but sometimes edible produce like lentils), and dunnage (packing material designed to protect fragile cargo such as building slates or jars of wine or olive oil), there was limited room for passengers below deck. A few might travel down by the bilge water, in the ancient equivalent of steerage. Lucian's characters describe these quarters as so cramped and uncomfortable that they were fit only for criminals (Juppiter Tragoedus 48; cf. Athenaeus 5.207f). Most passengers camped out on the open deck, either setting up temporary shelters or simply rolling out bedding (Achilles Tatius, 2.33.1; Petronius, Sat. 100.6; Lucian, Toxaris 20; Pachomius, Regula 119). Well-to-do travelers brought on board an impressive panoply of creature comforts, with a corps of servants to deploy them. An elite few might enjoy the greater comforts afforded by the one permanent cabin on deck, where the owner or his agent, the captain, and a few select guests might travel as it were in first class (Achilles Tatius, 5.15.3). But for the majority, few amenities were available. Fresh drinking water was provided from a special tank lined with waterproof fabric, located either in the hold or on deck (Casson 1995: 177). While storage on deck was more convenient, it was also more risky. Gregory Nazianzen's describes the helpless dismay felt by passengers witnessing their loss of potable water: 'While the ship was heaving, the receptacle which held our treasured supply of sweet water was smashed and its contents dispersed in the sea' (Poemata de seipso 11.145–7). In boats equipped with a galley, passengers might avail themselves of its facilities once the crew had been fed (Van Doorninck 1972: 137–44). The only other available facility may have been a latrine, as some relief sculptures show a small covered structure perched over the water on the stern, directly behind the steering apparatus (Casson 1995: 180), but this is only a guess.

Roman engineers, having discovered a kind of concrete capable of setting under water, were able to construct breakwaters and thus ensure calm harbors (Vitruvius, De arch. 2.6.1, 5.12; Oleson et al. 2004; Brandon et al. 2014). In Alexandria, the first lighthouse was erected to such acclaim that it became one of the seven 'Wonders of the Ancient World.' Like all subsequent lighthouses in antiquity, it served to guide boats into the harbor rather than to warn them of dangerous rocks or reefs (Morton 2001: 210–14). Once inside the breakwater, large ships were guided to shore where they were made fast to massive stones set into the quays (Blackman 2008: 643–54). Cargo and passengers traveling further inland might then progress to smaller vessels designed to travel along rivers, as did the Lady Poemenia (Palladius, Historia Lausiaca 35; Hunt 1982: 76–7). Traveling upstream on rivers such as the Danube, Rhōne, and Seine, often demanded towing, usually by humans but sometimes by animals (Campbell 2012: 212–14). For this reason, tow-paths were a common feature running along both sides of the river banks. For smaller boats plying along the coast, two versions of the fore-and-aft rig were known: the spritsail and lateen. Running parallel to the keel, these sails could make efficient use of winds blowing from ahead.

Travel by sea, although potentially so swift, was subject to seasonal limitation. From November 10 until March 10, the Mediterranean was officially 'closed' (Vegetius 4.39; Codex Theodosianus 13.9.3). During this time, sailors were reluctant to put to sea not only because of the risk of winter storms but also because of the increased cloud cover that made navigation on the open water all but impossible (Casson 1988: 357; McGrail 2008: 628–30). Thus Paul urged the sailors to put up for the winter in Crete, because 'the fast' (i.e., Yom Kippur) had already passed, bringing an end to the safe sailing period (Acts 27:9). But even during the winter abatement, vessels such as the Roman grain ships and military craft still sailed as required (Casson 1995: 270–1; Roth 1999; McCormick 2001: 444–68). Smaller commercial boats no doubt also continued to ply the waters; but these, instead of risking the open water, sailed from port to port, hugging the coastline (Horden and Purcell 2000: 142–3; Beresford 2013).

Letter-writing

Wherever people traveled, they brought news. Coming into town, merchants were typically surrounded by townspeople eager for news (Caesar, Bellum Gallicum 4.5; Livy 42.4). In return for hospitality, guests were expected to regale their hosts with information, including news about their 'native country, its leading men and governor' (Apuleius, Met. 1.26). If one could not travel oneself, sending a letter was the next best thing. The sentiments that Seneca expressed when he wrote to his friend Lucilius were no doubt widely shared: 'I never receive a letter from you without being in your company forthwith . . . For that which is sweetest when we meet face to face is afforded by the impress of a friend's hand upon his letter – recognition' (Epistulae Morales 40.1, trans. LCL). Jerome was later to confess that he was unable to estimate the number of letters he had sent to his friend Paula, since he wrote to her every day (De viris illustribus 135). From its very beginning, Christianity was a movement of letter writers (Stowers 1986: 15; Klauck 2006: 299–434). More than 9,000 letters written by Christians in antiquity have come down to us. They wrote on many different kinds of materials (papyri, parchment, leather, wax-covered wooden tablets, and ostraka) and for all sorts of reasons (Jördens 2011).

Official business required letters. To bring charges, appeal decisions, and intercede on behalf of others, Christians wrote petitions to governmental officials of all ranks, up to and including the emperor. During the so-called Great Persecution, church leaders submitted letters detailing the property owned by their churches; and lay Christians sometimes reported how they had han-dled the imperial decree mandating sacrifice. One man wrote to his wife, telling her that he had compelled a pagan friend to make the offering on his behalf (Luijendijk 2008: 189–226). After the peace of Constantine, when the emperor wished to summon bishops to a council, he did so by let-ter (Jerome, Ep. 108.6). And when clerics wanted to rally empire-wide support for disputes, they wrote letters. Thus, when the fourth-century priest Arius found himself in bitter disagreement with his bishop, he sent letters describing this local quarrel throughout the eastern empire. The bishop, meanwhile, having already called a council that excommunicated Arius, wrote to all his fellow bishops condemning the priest's position. And with this exchange of letters, the Arian controversy began (Stowers 1986: 46–7).

The majority of letters, however, are concerned with familial or business matters. They relay family news, discuss pregnancy, childbirth, and nursing; make arrangements for textile production, agricultural work, and rent collection; request assistance, food, and money; or itemize gifts that accompany the letter (Bagnall and Cribiore 2006). Health concerns arise frequently. Despite their terseness, many of these letters are remarkably poignant, as in this example sent by a fourth-century lay woman, Valeria, to an Egyptian monk named Papnouthis. After the formulaic greeting, she makes her request:

> I ask and beg you, most honored father, to ask for me a kindness from Christ and that I may obtain healing. I believe that in this way I may obtain healing through your prayers, for revelations of ascetics and worshipers are manifested. For I am afflicted by a great disease of terrible shortness of breath. I have believed and believe that if you pray on my behalf I will receive healing. I beg of God, I beg also of you, remember me in your holy prayer.
>
> (P.Lond. 6.1926 [c. AD 340–350], trans. Bagnall and Cribiore 2006: 205)

The fluency of expression as well as the handwriting suggests a moderately proficient writer, but one did not need to be literate to send a letter. Although the reading-and-writing population of late antiquity was never more than 20 percent, and may often have been considerably less, almost eve-ryone was able to access writing and reading skills to meet their needs (Harris 1989; Hopkins 1991; McDonnell 1996; Bagnall and Cribiore 2006: 42–8). A technical skill among others, it may have been no more difficult to find someone able to write a letter than to sew a piece of clothing.

People to carry letters were essential to the system. Anyone traveling in the right direction might be pressed into service, or provide a reason for the writing of a letter (White 1986: 213–17; Klauck 2006: 43–65). We gather from the frequent accusations of failure to write that it was not difficult to find a courier. When an expected message was delayed, people assumed that it had not been written rather than that a courier had been unavailable (Llewelyn 1994: 26–9). The presence of large numbers of ex-patriots in any given area is understood as ensuring a regular stream of people traveling between the two locations. 'Write word to us,' a third-century letter enjoins, 'if one of our people sails down' (BGU XIV 2417; Llewelyn 1994: 26, 29). The ideal courier, however, was someone known to the writer, who could be relied upon to deliver the message to the right address (Bagnall and Cribiore 2006: 37–40), and to amplify the message if required. Thus Paul sent his let-ters via trusted associates, such as Timothy and Titus (1 Cor. 4:17; 2 Cor. 8:16–24; 9:3–5; see also Phil. 2:25–30; Eph. 6:21–2; Thompson 1998: 65–8) and Ignatius entrusted two of his missives to his companion and secretary, Burrus (ad Phil. 11.2; ad Smyrn. 12.1; Llewelyn 1994: 51–7).

Not all couriers were reliable. Some letters were never delivered. Among these were the always problematic ones that accompanied money (Llewelyn 1994: 28–9). But couriers might simply be unable to locate the addressee, since most letters bore only the name of the intended recipient (Llewelyn 1994: 29–43). Delivery instructions were no doubt given orally, as when Ananias was told: 'Go to the street called Straight and inquire in the house of Judas for a man of Tarsus named Paul' (Acts 9:11). Other missives were intentionally delivered to the wrong person.

When Jerome entrusted Pammachius with a letter of reconciliation for Rufinus, Pammachius delivered instead a vitriolic missive intended for the privileged eyes of Jerome's close friends (Ep. 84 instead of Ep. 81; Clark 1992: 27–8). In this system, privacy was not guaranteed at any level (Jerome Ep. 57.2; Clark 1992: 32).

Recorded times for the delivery of letters vary widely. The time of year was a crucial factor, as letters might take twice as long in delivery during the worst season for traveling than during the best (Basil, Ep. 48). Yet even under the most favorable conditions, delays were not atypical. The demands of other business might produce a circuitous route, as when a letter from Puteoli south of Rome, went to Tyre in North Africa via Alexandria. In order to ensure that the government had access to a reliable, steady flow of information, the emperor Augustus developed the cursus publicus, or Imperial Post. At first, news was brought by a series of runners, but this system was quickly replaced by a relay of vehicles. The latter system, in which a single courier traveled the whole distance on a series of light wagons, ferries, and sailing ships sacrificed speed for the sake of the more detailed information that could be obtained by questioning the messenger (Suetonius, Augustus 49.3). The cursus was originally an infrastructure for use solely by designated state officials (SEG 26 1392, 13ff; Llewelyn 1995), but because vehicles could accommodate additional people and baggage, it quickly devolved into a transportation system and remained thus throughout late antiquity (Augustine, Conf. 5.13.23; Kolb 2001: 95–6).

The average speed of the post was perhaps five Roman miles an hour. In a day, a messenger traveled about 45 Roman miles (Procopius, Historia Arcana 30.3; Kolb 2000: 321–2). In a pinch, dispatch bearers occasionally covered twice the distance, with 160 miles a day being the maximum ever reported. Speed always depended upon the quality of the road, the density of the traffic, and the season. In places of strategic importance, a company of troops might be stationed to serve the postal service as dispatch bearers and road police (It. Eg. 7.2, 9.3; Cod. Theod. 8.5.38). A special section of the post was established in the late fourth century for express service, the so-called cursus velox.

Only designated officials had the right to use this relay system. To prove entitlement, they were required to carry a letter, or diploma, sealed by the governor of the province, authenticating their rightful business and stipulating the type of transport to which they were entitled (Chevallier 1976: 182). These certificates were inscribed on bronze, papyrus, or parchment tablets that were then attached either to the messenger's vehicle or the horse's neck. Official messengers would also be granted a letter of credit (evectio) stating the supplies he might requisition from each station. Initially, the government reimbursed these services, but by late antiquity, the economic burden fell entirely upon the local inhabitants (Kolb 2001: 97–8). By the early fourth century, an edict of Constantine makes it clear that travelers had to furnish their own drivers (CTh 8.5.2; Kolb 2001: 101). Despite the fact that penalties attached to those found abusing the system, legal and epigraphic evidence suggests that fraud was common (Forbes 1955: 153; Chevallier 1976: 182–4, 188). Chrysostom knew that the elite were likely to make use of the cursus a condition for their travel. They would greet a summons to the imperial city with a set of demands:

> Unless you give us carriages and soft bedding, we cannot come; nor can we come unless we have many attendants and are allowed to rest continually. And then we will come only if we have the use of beasts of burden and travel for just a small portion of the day—and there are many other things we need as well.
>
> (In Hebraeos homiliae 2.5)

Conclusion

Despite rates that strike us as impossibly slow and routes that seem to us fraught with danger and delays, travel and communication were swifter and more readily effected in the early Christian period than at any previous time. A desire to communicate prompted people to travel vast distances in the early Christian world, and the realities of travel inform all communication. We see this, certainly, in accounts of actual trips but also in the widespread use of metaphors drawn from travel. Even Augustine's comparison of Neoplatonism and Christianity is shaped by common concerns over impassable routes and potential incursions by bandits:

> It is one thing to see from a wooded mountain peak the land of peace, but to find no route to it, and to struggle in vain towards it by impassable ways, ambushed and beset by fugitives and deserters, under their leader, the lion and the dragon. It is a different thing to keep to the road that leads to that land, guarded by the protection of the heavenly commander, where no deserters from the heavenly army lie in wait like bandits.
>
> (Conf. 7.21; cf. Tertullian, De resurrectione carnis 43)

In a similar vein, Chrysostom's praise of monastic life echoes antiquity's admiration for lighthouses:

> There is a calm port. [Monks] are like beacons sending forth their light from a high point to those sailing in from afar. Stationed in the harbor, drawing all people to their own tranquility, they preserve from shipwreck those who look to them.
>
> *(*1 Tim. homiliae 14.3; cf. de virginitate 24.2)

Travel and communication were thus inextricably entwined. All our sources suggest that early Christians believed they lived in a time of exceptional mobility. But we know what they could not, namely that this ease of travel would not be surpassed until the age of the steam engine.

Bibliography

Adams, C. (2001) 'There and back again: Getting around in Roman Egypt,' in Adams, C. and Laurence, R. (eds) Travel and Geography in the Roman Empire. London: Routledge, 138–66.

Austin, N. J. E. and Rankov, N. B. (1995) Exploratio: Military and Political Intelligence in the Roman World from the Second Punic War to the Battle of Adrianople. London and New York: Routledge.

Bagnall, R. S. (1993) Egypt in Late Antiquity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Bagnall, R. S. and Cribiore, R. with contributions by Ahtaridis, E. (2006) Women's Letters from Ancient Egypt, 300 BC–AD 800. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

Bang, P. F. (2008) The Roman Bazaar: A Comparative Study of Trade and Markets in a Tributary Empire. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Beresford, J. (2013) The Ancient Sailing Season. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Blackman, D. J. (2008) 'Sea transport, Part 2: Harbors,' in Oleson, J. P. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Engineering and Technology in the Classical World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 638–70.

Bradbury, S. (2004) 'Libanius' letters as evidence for travel and epistolary networks among Greek elites in the fourth century,' in Ellis, L. and Kidner, F. (eds) Travel, Communication and Geography in Late Antiquity: Sacred and Profane. Burlington, VT: Ashgate, 73–80.

Brakke, D. (1995) Athanasius and the Politics of Asceticism. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Brandon, C. J., Hohlfelder, R. L., Jackson, M. D. and Oleson, J. P. (2014) Building for Eternity: The History and Technology of Roman Concrete Engineering in the Sea. Oxford, UK: Oxbow.

Brodersen, K. (2001) 'The presentation of geographical knowledge for travel and transport in the Roman world: itineraria non tantum adnotata sed etiam picta,' in Adams, C. and Laurence, R. (eds) Travel and Geography in the Roman Empire. London: Routledge, 7–21.

Campbell, B. (2012) Rivers and the Power of Ancient Rome. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press.

Caner, D. (2002) Wandering, Begging Monks: Spiritual Authority and the Promotion of Monasticism in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Casson, L. (1974) Travel in the Ancient World. Toronto, ON: Hakkert.

Casson, L. (1988) 'Transportation,' in Grant, M. and Kitzingerin, R. (eds) Civilization of the Ancient Mediterranean: Greece and Rome. New York: Charles Scribner's sons, 353–65.

Casson, L. (1995) Ships and Seamanship in the Ancient World. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Chevallier, R. (1976) Roman Roads. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Clark, E. A. (1992) The Origenist Controversy: The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Cohen, A. (2001) 'Art, myth, and travel in the Hellenistic world,' Alcock, S. E. Cherry, J. F. and Elsner, J. (eds) Pausanias: Travel and Memory in Roman Greece. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 93–126.

Constable, O. R. (2003) Housing the Stranger in the Mediterranean World: Lodging, Trade and Travel in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Coulston, J. (2001) 'Transport and travel on the Column of Trajan,' in Adams, C. and Laurence, R. (eds) Travel and Geography in the Roman Empire. London: Routledge, 106–37.

Cribiore, R. (2001) Gymnastics of the Mind: Greek Education in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Davis, S. J. (1998) 'Pilgrimage and the cult of Saint Thecla in late antique Egypt,' in Frankfurter, D. (ed.) Pilgrimage and Holy Space in Late Antique Egypt. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 303–39.

De Ste. Croix, G. E. M. (1981) The Class Struggle in the Ancient Greek World. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Dietz, M. (2005) Wandering Monks, Virgins, and Pilgrims: Ascetic Travel in the Mediterranean World, A.D. 300–800. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press.

Dilke, O. A. W. (1985) Greek and Roman Maps. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Dilke, O. A. W. (1987) 'Itineraries and geographical maps in the early and late Roman empires,' in Harley, J. B. and Woodward, D. (eds) The History of Cartography, Vol. 1: Cartography in Prehistoric Ancient and Medieval Europe and the Mediterranean. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 234–56.

Donner, H. (1992) The Mosaic Map of Madaba: An Introductory Guide. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos Publishing House.

Elsner, J. (1992) 'Pausanias: A Greek pilgrim in the Roman world,' Past and Present 135: 3–29.

Elsner, J. and Rutherford, I. (2005) Pilgrimage in Graeco-Roman and Early Christian Antiquity: Seeing the Gods. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Forbes, R. J. (1955) Studies in Ancient Technology, Vol. 2. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Frank, G. (2000) The Memory of the Eyes: Pilgrims to Living Saints in Christian Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Gibson, S. and Taylor, J. E. (1994) Beneath the Church of the Holy Sepulchre Jerusalem: The Archaeology and Early History of Traditional Golgotha. London: Palestine Exploration Fund.

Green, C. (1966) 'The Purpose of the Early Horseshoe,' Antiquity 40: 305–8.

Grey, C. (2004) 'Letters of recommendation and the circulation of rural laborers in the late Roman west,' in Ellis, L. and Kidner, F. L. (eds) Travel, Communication and Geography in Late Antiquity: Sacred and Profane. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 25–40.

Grossman, P. (1998) 'The Pilgrimage Center of Abō Mīnā,' in Frankfurter, D. (ed.) Pilgrimage and Holy Space in Late Antique Egypt. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 282–302.

Harley, J. B. and Woodward, D. (eds) (1987) The History of Cartography, Vol. 1: Cartography in Prehistoric Ancient and Medieval Europe and the Mediterranean. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Harris, H. A. (1974) 'Lubrication in antiquity,' Greece and Rome 21: 32–6.

Harris, W. V. (1989) Ancient Literacy. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Harvey, P. D. A. (1987) 'Local and regional cartography in medieval Europe,' in Harley, J. B. and Woodward, D. (eds) The History of Cartography, Vol. 1: Cartography in Prehistoric Ancient and Medieval Europe and the Mediterranean. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 464–501.

Hirschfeld, Y. (1992) The Judean Desert Monasteries in the Byzantine Period. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Hopkins, K. (1991) 'Conquest by book,' in Humphrey, J. H. (ed.) Literacy in the Roman World. Journal of Roman Archaeology Supplementary Series, No. 3. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 133–58.

Horden, P. and Purcell, N. (2000) The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Howe, N. (2005) 'Anglo-Saxon England and the postcolonial void,' in Kabir, A. J. and Deanne Williams, D. (eds) Postcolonial Approaches to the European Middle Ages: Translating Cultures. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 25–47.

Hunt, E. D. (1982) Holy Land Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire AD 312–460. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hyland, A. (1990) Equus: The Horse in the Roman World. London: Batsford.

Isaac, B. and Roll, I. (1982) Roman Roads in Judea I: The Legio-Scythopolis Road. BAR International Series 141. Oxford, UK: Tempus Reparatum.

Jones, A. H. M. (1964) The Later Roman Empire, 284–602: A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Jördens, A. (2011) 'Communicating with tablets and papyri,' in Peachin, M. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Social Relations in the Roman World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 227–47.

Klauck, H. J. (2006) Ancient Letters and the New Testament: A Guide to Context and Exegesis. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Kolb, A. (2000) Transport und Nachrichtentransfer im Römischen Reich. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.

Kolb, A. (2001) 'Transport and communication in the Roman state: The cursus publicus,' in Adams, C. and Laurence, R. (eds) Travel and Geography in the Roman Empire. London: Routledge, 95–105.

Kötting, B. (1950) Peregrinatio Religiosa. Wallfahrten in der Antike und das Pilgerwesen in der alten Kirche. Münster, Germany: Regensberg.

Laurence, R. (1999) The Roads of Roman Italy: Mobility and Cultural Change. London and New York: Routledge.

Laurence, R. (2001) 'The creation of geography: An interpretation of Roman Britain,' in Adams, C. and Laurence, R. (eds) Travel and Geography in the Roman Empire. London: Routledge, 67–94.

Laurence, R. (2004) 'Milestones, communications, and political stability,' in Ellis, L. and Kidner, F. L. (eds) Travel, Communication and Geography in Late Antiquity: Sacred and Profane. Aldershot, VT: Ashgate, 41–58.

Lewis, M. J. T. (2001) Surveying Instruments of Greece and Rome. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Leyerle, B. (1996) 'Landscape as cartography in early Christian pilgrim narratives,' Journal of the American Academy of Religion 64: 119–43.

Leyerle, B. (2008) 'Pilgrim eulogiae and domestic rituals,' Archiv für Religionsgeschichte 10: 223–38.

Llewelyn, S. R. (1994) New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, Volume 7. North Ryde, NSW: The Ancient History Documentary Research Centre, Macquarie University.

Llewelyn, S. R. (1995) 'Sending letters in the ancient world: Paul and the Philippians,' Tyndale Bulletin 46: 337–56.

Llewelyn, S. R. (1998) New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, Volume 8. North Ryde, NSW: The Ancient History Documentary Research Centre, Macquarie University.

Luijendijk, A. (2008) Greetings in the Lord: Early Christians and the Oxyrhynchus Papyri. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Malherbe, A. (1988) Ancient Epistolary Theorists. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Maraval, P. (1985) Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient: histoire et géographie des origines à la conquête arabe. Paris: Editions du Cerf.

McCormick, M. (2001) Origins of the European Economy: Communications and Commerce, A.D. 300–900. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.

McDonnell, M. (1996) 'Writing, copying, and autograph manuscripts in ancient Rome,' Classical Quarterly 46: 469–91.

McGrail, S. (2003) 'How were boats designed before the late Medieval period?,' in Beltrame, C. (ed.) Boats, Ships and Shipyards. Proceedings of ISBA 9 (Venice 2000). Oxford, UK: Oxbow, 124–31.

McGrail, S. (2008) 'Sea transport, Part 1: Ships and navigation,' in Oleson, J. P. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Engineering and Technology in the Classical World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 606–37.

Miller, T. (1990) 'The Samson Hospital in Constantinople,' Byzantinische Forshungen 15: 101–35.

Morton, J. (2001) The Role of the Physical Environment in Ancient Greek Seafaring. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Muir, R. (2000) The New Reading the Landscape: Fieldwork in Landscape History. Exeter, UK: University of Exeter Press.

Oldelehr, H. (1977) Seekrankheit in der Antike. Düsseldorfer Arbeiten zur Geschichte der Medizin, Heft 47. Düsseldorf, Germany: Triltsch Druck und Verlag.

Oleson, J. P., Brandon, C., Cramer, S. M., Cucitore, R., Gotti, E. and Hohlfelder, R. L. (2004) 'The ROMACONS project: A contribution to the historical and engineering analysis of hydraulic concrete in Roman maritime structures,' International Journal of Nautical Archaeology 33(2): 199–229.

Polge, H. (1967) 'L'Amélioration de l'attelage a-t-elle réellement fait reculer le servage?,' Journal des Savants 1: 4–42.

Quilici, L. (2008) 'Land transport, Part 1: Roads and bridges,' in Oleson, J. P. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Engineering and Technology in the Classical World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 551–79.

Raepsaet, G. (2008) 'Land transport, Part 2: Riding, harnesses, and vehicles,' in Oleson, J. P. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Engineering and Technology in the Classical World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 580–605.

Ramsay, A. M. (1925) 'The speed of the Roman imperial post,' Journal of Roman Studies 15: 60–74.

Ramsay, W. M. (1904) 'Roads and travel (In NT),' in Hastings, J. (ed.) Dictionary of the Bible, extra vol: 375–402. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.

Riess, W. (2011) 'The Roman bandit (latro) as criminal and outsider,' in Peachin, M. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Social Relations in the Roman World. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 693–714.

Roth, J. P. (1999) The Logistics of the Roman Army at War (264 BC–AD 235). Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Rougé, J. (1966) Recherches sur l'organisation du commerce maritime en Méditerranée sous l'Empire romain. Paris: S.E.V.P.E.N.

Rutherford, I. (2001) 'Tourism and the sacred: Pausanias and the traditions of Greek pilgrimage,' in Alcock, S. E., Cherry, J. F. and Elsner, J. (eds) Pausanias: Travel and Memory in Roman Greece. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 40–52.

Rutherford, I. (2003) 'Pilgrimage in Greco-Roman Egypt: New perspectives on graffiti from the Memnonion at Abydos,' in Matthews, R. and Roemer, C. (eds) Ancient Perspectives on Egypt. New York and London: Routledge, 171–90.

Salway, B. (2001) 'Travel, Itineraria and Tabellaria,' in Adams, C. and Laurence, R. (eds) Travel and Geography in the Roman Empire. London: Routledge, 22–66.

Scheidel, W. (2014) 'The shape of the Roman world: Modelling imperial connectivity,' Journal of Roman Archaeology 27: 7–32.

Scheidel, W. (2015) 'Orbis: The Stanford geospatial model of the Roman world,' Princeton/Stanford Working Papers in Classics. http://orbis.stanford.edu/assets/Scheidel_64.pdf.

Sherk, R. K. (1974) 'Roman geographical exploration and military maps,' Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt 2: 534–62.

Sivan, H. S. (1990) 'Pilgrimage, Monasticism, and the emergence of Christian Palestine in the 4th century,' in Ousterhout, R. (ed.) The Blessings of Pilgrimage. Urbana and Chicago, IL: University of Illinois Press, 54–65.

Sotinel, C. (2004) 'How were bishops informed? Information transmission across the Adriatic Sea in late antiquity,' in Ellis, L. and Kidner, F. (eds) Travel, Communication and Geography in Late Antiquity: Sacred and Profane. Burlington, VT: Ashgate, 63–72

Stowers, S. K. (1986) Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity. Library of Early Christianity, Vol. 5. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press.

Talbert, R. J. A. (2010) Rome's World: The Peutinger Map Reconsidered. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Tchalenko, G. (1953–1958) Villages antiques de la Syrie du Nord: Le massif du Bélus à l'époque romaine. Paris: Paul Geuthner.

Thompson, M. B. (1998) 'The holy internet: Communication between churches in the first Christian generation,' in Bauckham, R. (ed.) The Gospel for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 49–70.

Van Doorninck, F. (1972) 'Byzantium, mistress of the sea: 330–641,' in Bass, G. F. (ed.) A History of Seafaring Based on Underwater Archaeology. New York: Walker and Company, 133–58.

Vikan, G. (2010) Early Byzantine Pilgrimage Art, rev. ed. Washington, DC: Dumbarton Oaks Research Library and Collection.

Volokhine, Y. (1998) 'Les déplacements pieux en Egypte pharonique: sites et practiques culturelles,' in Frankfurter, D. (ed.) Pilgrimage and Holy Space in Late Antique Egypt. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 51–98.

Watts, E. (2004) 'Student travel to intellectual centers: What was the attraction?,' in Ellis, L. and Kidner, F. (eds) Travel, Communication and Geography in Late Antiquity: Sacred and Profane. Burlington, VT: Ashgate, 13–23.

White, J. L. (1986) Light from Ancient Letters. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

White, K. D. (1984) Greek and Roman Technology. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

White, L. M. (ed.) (1992) Semeia 56. Social Networks in the Early Christian Environment: Issues and Methods for Social History. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Wilken, R. L. (1992) The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

PART V

Christian culture

23

CHRISTIAN REALIA

Papyrological and epigraphical material

Giovanni Bazzana

The study of Christian realia has assumed a growing importance in the understanding of early Christianity in recent decades. It is a broad field, covering early Christian architecture and art, and papyrological and epigraphical remains. Since architecture and art are the subjects of Chapters 34 and 35 of this volume, this chapter focuses on the papyri and epigraphy.

Papyri

Literary papyri

The study of textual remains has for a long time held pride of place among those scholars of early Christianity interested in the material evidence pertaining to the formative stages of the Jesus movement. Obviously, because of the textual bias that has characterized this sub-discipline no less (or in all likelihood even more) than other sub-fields of the humanities, early Christian textual remains have been mined often (if not always) in order to extract from them texts on which one could then build critical editions, in particular of the all-important writings that were later included in the New Testament collection (Lührmann 2004).

Only in more recent years has it become evident to most observers and scholars engaged in the field that early Christian textual remains should be prized and studied because they constitute—to use a well-chosen phrase of Larry Hurtado (Hurtado 2006)—'the earliest Christian artifacts' at our disposal. Such a radical move is still in its infancy as far as our materials are concerned, but it can benefit greatly from a methodological standpoint of the significant contributions provided by those scholars who, over the last decades, have approached the study of later manuscripts and printed books in the wake of the so-called 'new philology' (see, for instance, Chartier 1992 or Grafton 1997). In this perspective, papyrologists working with any types of ancient texts have begun to look at the formal characteristics of single pieces as a means to produce more solidly grounded hypotheses on the writing and reading practices that ancient writers and readers associated with different configurations (see, for instance, Johnson 2010: 179–98).

Possibly the most interesting test case of these methodological developments is the renewed discussion concerning the Christian preference for the codex format against the traditional bookroll. In fact, the phenomenon of the move from a book production dominated by the bookroll to one in which all books eventually had the format of codices has always attracted the attention of scholars of early Christianity because it took place progressively over the centuries in which the Christ movement came to dominate the Mediterranean world. Since Christians seemed to prefer the codex over the bookroll from a very early date, some scholars have even ventured to hypothesize that the affirmation of the codex might have been due in part to its Christian use or that Christians might have actually invented it. In keeping with the preeminence that is still given to textual contents over their material manuscript forms, scholars of early Christianity have sometimes suggested that the codex might have come to be seen as a perfect container for the four-fold collection of the canonical Gospels (Roberts and Skeat 1993) or for a selection of the Pauline epistles that were considered authentic (Gamble 1995).

Such proposals do not convince on an evidentiary level because we simply lack early enough papyri that might be reconstructed to contain all the canonical Gospels or a sizeable number of Pauline letters. On the contrary, all these texts were continuously copied in codices carrying only a couple of Gospels or some epistles well into the time in which the codex had become the dominant format for any kind of writing (between the fourth and fifth centuries CE). On a more explicitly methodological level, to suggest that the codex format was actually invented to contain a specific selection of writings is tantamount to reinstating the traditional preeminence of content over material form with almost complete disregard for the actual physical features of the latter.

More recently and more appropriately from a theoretical point of view, Roger Bagnall has shown that the evidence points against the conclusion that the codex was invented by Christians (Bagnall 2009: 70–90). Indeed, if one looks systematically through the extant datable exemplars of Egyptian codices, it becomes clear that the earliest instances at our disposal do not carry texts that can be identified as Christian because of their contents. Already beginning in the first century CE, one encounters codices whose contents can be better designated as 'practical' or professional in nature, such as grammars, astronomic or astrologic treatises, or collections of medical recipes. Moreover, despite the clear preference for the codex that characterizes explicitly Christian compositions, from the second century well into the fourth Christian texts inscribed in codices are clearly never more than 40 percent of the total, indicating that the codex format could be and was indeed employed for a very diverse set of purposes.

Observations such as Bagnall's have spurred scholars to propose alternative explanations for the emergence of the codex, usually more independent from Christianity and more attentive to the specific material features of the new format. For instance, it has been suggested that the codex might have been less expensive than the bookroll, since in codices the writing surface is used in a less wasteful manner and papyrus was indeed a rather costly commodity in antiquity. Indeed, the most luxurious ancient bookrolls seem to be designed to showcase the means of the people who paid for them, to the extent that their wider margins and obviously the entire surface of the back that was left intentionally blank can be described—in the words of William Johnson—as a form of 'conspicuous consumption.' However, the overwhelming majority of ancient bookrolls were not conceived according to this design, and more recent calculations have enabled us to establish that the shift to the codex did not in fact afford remarkably significant financial savings for ancient writers.

Others have proposed identifying the reasons behind the shift as the fact that the codex would have been an easier medium for the public reading of texts that arguably took place in the liturgical context of the early Christian communities. However, as we will have the opportunity to discuss below, it is still uncertain what material characteristics can enable us to distinguish ancient manuscripts that were prepared for public reading from those designed for a mere 'private' use. Something that has been established with a degree of certainty is that—in manuscripts that were written without marking the separation between words, in scriptio continua, which was the norm for all ancient writing both in bookrolls and codices—the number of letters that can normally be grasped with a single glance of the human eye corresponds more or less exactly to those contained in a line of the narrow columns that one encounters in bookrolls. In this perspective, it appears that codices—in particular, the early examples of Christian codices carrying Gospels or Pauline letters and written in a single, wide column that occupies almost the entire space of a page—were not the chosen medium for public reading. This conclusion is supported by the observation, as noted above, that the non-Christian codices mostly carry writings that were not certainly intended for public reading, such as collections of medical recipes or grammatical handbooks. In a later period, when Christians began to prepare luxury biblical manuscripts whose main goals were probably display as well as public reading, the page organization will revert to narrow columns (the best example being in all likelihood that of Codex Sinaiticus with its broad pages divided into four columns separated by wide margins).

In sum, the reasons that led to the success of the codex over the bookroll remain largely unclear despite decades of intense debate on the issue. It seems quite evident, however, that not only did the Christians not invent this format, but also that the reasons behind this epoch-making shift are not necessarily tied to the Christian preference for the codex. From what has been observed above regarding the types of texts that are more often inscribed on codices (professional and 'practical' writings as opposed to the 'high' Greek literature carried by the traditional bookroll), it might be possible to conclude that the codex format might have felt more familiar for intellectuals who occupied a sub-elite social position and could not afford the costly services of professional scribes, but were sufficiently educated to produce the texts that they needed on their own (Kloppenborg 2014). In the above-mentioned study, Roger Bagnall has also suggested an alternative origin for the codex format by connecting it with the booklets composed of joined wooden and waxed tablets that were quite common in the west and particularly in Rome (see Chapter 16 of this volume for several photographs and drawings of such tablets recently found in London). Indeed, the time period that witnesses the emergence and ultimate success of the codex is the same in which Rome conquers the eastern Mediterranean, a few centuries of momentous changes in which several Roman cultural habits and preferences made their way through the eastern regions in the context of a trajectory that used to be called 'Romanization.' This is still very much a very hypothetical proposal, but it makes sense to understand the spread of the codex and the Christian preference for this format as another instance of 'Romanization,' since many other features of the diffusion of the Christ movement throughout the Mediterranean can indeed be seen as manifestations of it.

While the origins and most of the functions associated with the early appearance of the codex format remain shrouded in mystery, a few elements connected with the Christian use of it have become clearer in recent years. For instance, it is quite uncontroversial to note that Christians did not copy all their texts on codices. From early on and then more consistently in the later period, Christians continued to employ the bookroll, but the choice of what writings were to be copied in either format does not seem to have been governed by mere chance or preference of the scribe. Indeed, the books that were later included in the New Testament collection are almost invariably copied on codices. The only two exceptions to such a rule (P[98] containing a few verses from the Apocalypse of John and P[13] carrying a more substantial part of Hebrews) concern two texts that were more or less at the margins of the canon and are both written on the back of reemployed bookrolls, indicating that they were produced as occasional pieces or, as in the case of P[98], even possibly as writing exercises. On the other hand, writings that are clearly distinct from those later included in the New Testament are regularly copied on traditional bookrolls. That is the case, for instance, of a very early copy (datable paleographically to the late second or early third century CE) of Irenaeus's Adversus Haereses discovered in Oxyrhynchus (P. Oxy 3 405, LDAB 2459) or of a third-century copy of Julius Africanus's Cesti again from Oxyrhynchus (P. Oxy 3 412, LDAB 2550). This apparently neat distinction might lead one to use this material evidence as proof that the New Testament canon was already somewhat established even before its official ratification in various documents of the fourth century. However, the full picture is much more complicated than that. Besides the two categories described above, one encounters several other texts that ended up not being included in the New Testament canon, but are nevertheless witnessed on codices in the period preceding the fifth century CE. A very interesting case is that of the Gospel of Thomas, which has been recently studied in detail by AnneMarie Luijendijk (2011). Three incomplete fragments of the Greek version of this Gospel have been found in Oxyrhynchus (P. Oxy 1 1; 4 655, 656; LDAB 4028–4030). They all come from three different copies of this writing (incidentally witnessing to the high degree of popularity enjoyed by the Gospel of Thomas in the period at hand) and are datable paleographically between the end of the second and the beginning of the third century. While two of these copies of the Gospel are written on bookrolls, one of them comes from a codex. The same happens also for other early Christian writings that later were considered apocryphal, such as the Gospel of Mary (P. Ryl. 463; LDAB 5329) or the otherwise unknown Gospel designated as Egerton (P. Lond. Christ. 1 + P. Köln 6 255; LDAB 4736). Luijendijk analyzes these data in conjunction with early Christian indirect witnesses of the use of the Gospel of Thomas in liturgical contexts. Her convincing conclusion is that some early Christian groups considered this Gospel an inspired text and as such they copied it in the codex format instead of as a bookroll. The same in all likelihood was the case for the Gospel of Mary and the Egerton papyrus. The observation that early Christian scribes 'reserved' the codex format for writings that were considered 'inspired' (to use the term 'canonical' for this early period would be anachronistic) has far-reaching consequences inasmuch as it enables us to see 'on the ground' the fluidity and pluriformity that characterized early Christ groups not only at a doctrinal level, but also in the choice of their foundational texts. In general, such conclusions are strengthened, for instance, by the analysis of the manuscript transmission of a very important (although now almost completely neglected outside the academic circles) early Christian text, the Shepherd, composed sometime in the second century by the Roman Hermas. In all likelihood, the Shepherd was a wildly popular text among early Christians in the centuries that we are examining here. The number of copies of Hermas's work discovered in Egypt and datable before the fourth century is bigger than any of the New Testament books, rivalling the two most popular Gospels of Matthew and John. Given such a significant and widespread success, it is unsurprising to observe that one encounters remarkable pieces of evidence to the effect that the Shepherd was considered an 'inspired' work by several early Christian authors and groups. Interestingly enough, the most important witness to the text of the New Testament at our disposal, the fourth-century Codex Sinaiticus, includes Hermas's work in its 'canon' by placing the Shepherd in the collection, immediately following the Apocalypse of John. On the basis of these observations, it cannot be surprising to see that almost all the extant copies of the Shepherd datable before the fifth century are codices, thereby confirming the hypothesis that such a format was preferred by early Christian scribes when they intended to copy a text that was deemed 'inspired' or, to use a less fraught formulation, particularly authoritative (Choat and Yuen-Collingridge 2010).

The identification of ancient books produced for or belonging to early Christian groups is a problematic affair when one wants to go beyond the texts mentioned above, whose contents themselves indicate a connection to the Christ movement. As far as papyri are concerned (and as we will have the opportunity to repeat again in the course of the present analysis), the ancient habit of not putting any indication of ownership on literary manuscripts generates for scholars interested in early Christianity the same set of problems faced by classicists intent on reconstructing the contents of ancient libraries from the scattered remains of the papyrological record. Thus, scholars have been at work for decades in an attempt to select specific physical traits that might allow us to identify a given piece as 'Christian.' As already discussed at length, the codex format is often invoked in these discussions on the debatable assumption that it was employed only by Christians. An additional problem should be considered alongside those already mentioned: even as one assumes that all the codices whose content is biblical should be treated as Christian products, there remains the issue of those manuscripts that carry Greek translations of the Hebrew Bible. On what grounds should these papyri be considered Christian? Is it not possible that at least some of them might have been Jewish products and that they might have been used in the liturgy of Greek-speaking Egyptian synagogues (Kraft 2007)? The question is rather complicated and its intractability is further enhanced by the current reconsideration of traditional theories on the 'parting of the ways' between Christianity and Judaism. Several scholars are now inclined to think that such a separation took place much later than was previously assumed and that it was far from a neat and clear-cut break, leaving instead significant areas of fuzziness and overlap (see, for instance, Boyarin 2009).

Two other elements indicating the connection between a papyrus and Christ groups deserve to be mentioned and discussed here, since they can also be accounted for as possibly the earliest instances of a specific Christian material culture. The first one is that of the so-called nomina sacra (for the early identification of this feature and its name, see Traube 1907 and Paap 1959). These are a series of roughly 15 Greek words that are written in a special manner in biblical as well as non-literary (mostly private letters and amulets) papyri that are considered Christian (Hurtado 2006: 95–134). For example, it is quite common in these manuscripts that when the scribe comes to a point in which he or she has to write the word 'Christ' (Χριστός in Greek), instead of writing out the full word the scribe writes only the first (chi) and the last letter (which obviously varies according to the different cases and thus different forms that the word can assume in the sentence) of it. That the name has been abbreviated in this way is signaled by the scribe by putting a horizontal line that stretches over both the letters forming the nomen sacrum. The list of the words that receive such a treatment is somewhat long and surprising, since it contains obvious elements such as 'God' (theos), 'Lord' (kyrios), 'Jesus' (Iesous), and 'Christ' (which are the most regular subjects of the abbreviation), but also more unexpected items such as 'spirit' (pneuma), 'human being' (anthropos), 'son' (huios), 'father' (pater), 'cross' (stauros), 'David' (Daueid), 'mother' (mēter), 'savior' (sōter), 'Israel,' 'Jerusalem,' and 'heaven' (ouranos).[1]

The origins of such a scribal practice are the object of an interesting scholarly debate. Most scholars argue that since the names that are treated in this way at the earliest period and most systematically are 'God' and 'Lord,' nomina sacra might have begun as a Christian imitation of the Jewish use to substitute or 'hide' the name of God in the copies of their sacred texts. Such scribal habits are well attested in the Hebrew manuscripts discovered at Qumran and also in the few Greek biblical exemplars that can be assuredly considered Jewish (Tov 2004). Such a hypothesis seems eminently reasonable, particularly if one considers that the early Christ groups remained Jewish or close to Judaism for a much longer period than it is usually conceded in traditional historical reconstructions of the 'parting of the ways.' Nevertheless, it is also worth remembering that the scribal practices attested for the name of God in Jewish manuscripts are varied and no one of them resembles structurally the nomina sacra as they have been described above. The closest parallel to the Christian nomina sacra from a purely formal point of view is to be found in the practice—widespread in the composition of documents on papyrus—of highlighting Greek letters that should be taken as numbers (and not as sounds forming a word) by tracing a horizontal stroke above them. Since we have seen already above that in all likelihood most of the New Testament scribes arguably had a background in documentary writing more than in the transcription of bookrolls, it stands to reason to suggest that their familiarity with written numbers might have inspired at the very least the mechanics of nomina sacra.

Such considerations on the origin of nomina sacra also lead us to talk briefly about the more important issue of their significance. Hurtado and others have suggested that if the first nomina sacra to be noted were 'God' and 'lord' as an imitation of the Jewish respect for the divine name, then the addition to them of 'Jesus' and 'Christ' might indeed be quite relevant for our understanding of the earliest stages of christology. Hurtado argues that the move to associate the name of 'Jesus' with that of 'God' in such a scribal practice (and at such an early date) should be taken as an indicator of what the same scholar has called 'devotion' towards the divinity of Jesus Christ and thus as a manifestation of an emergent binitarism in Christ groups. In Hurtado's perspective, thus, the use of nomina sacra would reflect a deliberate theological analysis of the texts on the part of its copyists and the resulting manuscripts would then constitute the earliest extant examples of a Christian exegetical practice on the New Testament texts. That is the case, for instance, for P[66] (P. Bodmer 2, LDAB 2777, datable to the first half of the third century and containing a substantial part of the Gospel of John) in which the scribe distinguished systematically between 'God' (theos in the singular), which is written as a nomen sacrum, and 'gods' (theoi, in the plural), which is always written in full. According to some, such an early establishment of rules (which were then followed quite systematically in copying

New Testament manuscripts, but also composing private letters and other similarly occasional documents) would indicate a degree of centralization and cohesiveness among Christ groups that is not usually admitted in the most recent historical reconstruction, which in turn privilege models of differentiation and multiplicity (Trobisch 2000).

That being said, more recent examinations of nomina sacra, besides the four on which Hurtado's reflections have mostly focused, show that the patterns of employment of this scribal technique are less systematic than previously assumed (Treu 1973). For instance, Christopher Tuckett has noted that the treatment of the Greek anthropos ('human being') appears to be fairly old in the papyrological record (it occurs in P[46], the oldest extant collection of Pauline epistles, in P. Chester-Beatty 4, containing the biblical book of Numbers, and in P. Oxy 1, containing a few sayings from the Gospel of Thomas, all datable to roughly the beginning of the third century), but seems to lack any of the systematic application that characterizes some of the other nomina sacra. These observations would lead one to think that the practice was more of a widespread habit than a centralized scribal rule (Tuckett 2003). Even its exegetical and theological significance can sometimes be questioned. In a very recent survey of the uses of pneuma ('spirit') as nomen sacrum in the above-mentioned P[46], Joel Estes has noticed that the scribe does not seem to have differentiated consistently between the passages in which the Greek term referred to a divine 'Spirit' and those in which it indicated the 'spirit' of humans (Estes 2015).

The final Christian feature that is worth mentioning in this context is the monogram composed by the combination of the two Greek letters tau (which has the shape of a Latin T) and rho (shaped as a vertical stroke with a small circle slightly bent to the right at the top) and usually designated as 'staurogram' (Hurtado 2006: 135–54), stauros being the Greek word for cross. In the staurogram, the two letters share the vertical trait, so that the circle of rho ends up being placed right above the horizontal stroke of tau. Monograms are not uncommon in Christian written artifacts. Two other well-known examples are the chi-rho combination, which is intended to shorten the name 'Christos,' and the iota-eta combination, which puts together the two first letters of the name 'Iesous.' The staurogram is less widespread than the two monograms just mentioned and it does not seem to have been created in order to express, in a shortened form, the name of Jesus Christ. The tau-rho combination occurs in three New Testament papyri (P[45], containing the five Gospels plus canonical Acts, P[75] (Papyrus Bodmer)[2] carrying portions of Luke and John, and the above-mentioned P[66]) in a series of verses that have forms of the Greek noun 'cross' (σταυρός) or the verb 'crucify' (σταυρόω). The staurogram is inserted within the word to replace the cluster of letters –taur–, so that what is left of the original word is merely the initial sigma and the suffix that changes according to the case. The cluster is completed with a superlinear horizontal stroke that makes the entire word look very similar to a nomen sacrum.

The origin of the staurogram is a matter of some debate, but it seems likely—from the shape of the monogram itself—that it might have been inspired by the very similar ankh sign, which is very widespread in Egyptian religious iconography (Savignac 1963). With respect to the very shape of the staurogram, Hurtado has insightfully noted that besides being a nice combination of letters, its resulting shape clearly evokes in a stylized form the sketch of a human being nailed to a cross. In this perspective, the staurogram should be understood as a locale in which the textual and the visual intersect and intertwine in a very evocative way.

Some scholars have objected that to postulate that the staurogram actually was understood as a representation of Jesus's crucifixion would violate the traditional principle that Christians did not represent that scene until after Constantine (see, for instance, this position in Snyder 2003). In recent years, however, Bruce Longenecker (2015) has built a strong argument to the effect that the Christian avoidance of the cross and crucifixion in the pre-Constantinian period should not be taken as a rule, but at best as a tendency for which it is entirely possible to envisage exceptions. That being said, one must also observe that such exceptions should not be pushed—as Hurtado himself seems to do at times—to conclude that the handful of occurrences of the staurogram might demonstrate that the cross and Jesus's crucifixion played a fundamental role in the theology and devotion of the early Christ groups. In this perspective, it is also worth noting that the traditional datings of P[66] and P[75] to the third century have been recently reconsidered by Brent Nongbri, who has authoritatively suggested that both manuscripts could be redated to the fourth century (2014, 2016). If Nongbri's palaeographic arguments prove convincing, the bulk of the occurrences of the staurogram in Christian papyri will turn out to be post-Constantinian after all (considering also that the third manuscript discussed here, P[45], in fact contains only one instance of the staurogram).

Private letters and other documentary papyri

Documentary papyrology deals with a very heterogeneous, but also extremely rich, assemblage of diverse materials. Almost since Egyptian documents began to arrive in scores in Europe during the golden age of papyrology, such a promising trove has been mined by scholars searching for information about the 'real' everyday life of Christian individuals and groups. While the potential yield of documentary papyri remains very high (and new pieces are continuously discovered and edited), several decades of critical discussions have brought about a methodologically more sophisticated approach to these studies.

Possibly the most significant examples of the difference made by such a change of methodological attitude can be encountered in the attempt at identifying private letters whose authors might have been Christian. For instance, decades ago it could be stated without encountering much opposition that letters in which senders referred to themselves or to their addressees using terminology of kinship (chiefly the language of being adelphos ('brother') or adelphē ('sister')), when they were not actually members of the same family, could be reasonably considered Christian (this is a methodological problem that afflicts the still widely used anthology of Christian letters put together by Naldini 1998 and that should give pause to anyone relying on it). More recent analysis has demonstrated that fictive kinship language was not used only within Christ groups in antiquity, but was in fact quite widespread not only as a means to express personal affection, but also as a way to indicate the common membership in a voluntary association (Artz-Grabner 2002). Likewise, a feature that earlier scholarship often singled out as an indicator of Christianity was the use of so-called 'monotheistic phrases.' These are a select number of Greek phrases that include the term theos ('God,' in the singular) and that can be interpreted to imply that the user presupposes the existence of only one deity. For instance, in P. Bas 18, a letter whose provenance is unknown and is palaeographically dated to the first century CE, Pasis writes to Orsenouphis calling him 'brother.' In this case, they can actually be members of the same family, because Pasis asks Orsenouphis to take care of his wife during his absence. However, the little message ends (lines 9–10) with Pasis's wish to come to the addressee (and arguably to his family) soon 'if the God wants' (ἐὰν ὁ θεὸς θέλῃ). It is easy to see how one may be tempted to take such a phrase as a signifier of Christianity, both on account of the presence in the same letter of kinship language and of the fact that similar-sounding expressions have become quite widespread in several Christian contexts in the following centuries. Nevertheless, it is also important, as many further studies have shown, to keep in mind that identical phrases are quite common in letters, which are unequivocally 'pagan' (as when the theos in question happens to be Sarapis) or can be attributed to writers belonging to groups whose relationship to Christianity is questionable, as happens in our rich record of Manichean epistles (Choat 2006).

An obvious element that has always attracted the attention of scholars is the presence of the nomen christianum, on the assumption that early Christians might have been keen to identify themselves as such in writing to their fellow Christ-believers or even to others. But the emergent picture is actually much different than expected. Lincoln Blumell (2012) has recently offered a very thorough examination of all the private letters on papyrus coming from Oxyrhynchus, a site in middle Egypt that has yielded thousands of pieces dating to the Roman period, so that one can safely state that this town is possibly the ancient urban center on whose daily life we are best informed. Out of a database comprising more than 100 letters, Blumell identifies only three occurrences of the term 'Christian' in SB 12 10772 (dated to the third century), P. Laur 2 42 (fourth or fifth century), and P. Oxy 43 3149 (fifth century). Even among these three meager instances, two have to be discounted because the references to a 'Christian' are only indirect and thus do not allow us to conclude in any firm way that the two letters might have indeed been written by someone who was a Christian himself or herself. That is the case for the earliest document, SB 10772, which indeed includes an indirect mention of Sotas, possibly a character that we will encounter again later and who is further identified—in a partially reconstructed section of the papyrus—as 'the Christian' (ὁ κρησιανός [sic]). The mention of the nomen christianum does not allow us to conclude that the writer of the letter was himself a Christian (in fact his very 'pagan' name, Sarapammon, and that of his addressee, his mother Olympias, would actually suggest otherwise). In any event, Blumell notes that if the letter were to be considered Christian, it would be an important piece of evidence in favor of the trans-Mediterranean ties among Christ groups and individual Christ-believers, because Sarapammon writes from Antioch in Syria and the message was received in Oxyrhynchus in Egypt (Blumell and Wayment 2015).

Thus, the earliest (and astoundingly only direct use) of the nomen christianum in the vast papyrological record of Oxyrhynchus remains the fifth-century P. Oxy 3149, in which a certain Heras writes a letter of recommendation for the slave Heortasius, who is also the carrier of the message, to Apa Theon. Heras makes explicitly clear in the very first lines of the letter that he is a 'Christian' (ὁ κρητιανός [sic]), in keeping with the conventions of recommendations, since he wants to capture the favor of Theon, who in turn is certainly a monastic or church official. That the letter is written by a Christian who wants to assert his identification is further confirmed by the fact that Heras drew a Latin cross at the very beginning of the message and greets Theon 'in the lord God' (ἐν κυρίῳ θεῷ), a phrase that is employed almost exclusively in writings that are most certainly Christian (and, in this case, is inscribed as a nomen sacrum).

However, the relatively late date of P. Oxy 3149, even more than its being the single example of a direct use of the nomen christianum, leads us to ask why early Christians did not make their allegiance to the Christ movement more explicit in private letters as well as in other types of documents. Indeed, once one has applied careful methodological principles for the identification of Christian letters, the statistics put together by Blumell with respect to Oxyrhynchus are quite surprising. First of all, identifiable Christian letters are extant only from the third century on. That is the period from which one can begin to encounter traits that can be considered unquestionable marks of Christianness, such as the nomina sacra, the crosses drawn at the beginning of the letters, or some specific sigla that are technically designated as 'isopsephims.' The latter category includes monograms that take advantage in their composition of the fact that Greek uses alphabetical signs to indicate both sounds and numbers (the most widely known example of Christian isopsephism is certainly the 'number of the beast' given in the Apocalypse of John as corresponding to 666, the numerical value of the letters forming the name of the Antichrist). An isopsephism that begins to appear in letters written between the end of the third and the beginning of the fourth century is the number 99 (written as in Greek), which correspond to the value of the letters in the word 'amen' (ἀμήν) and is thus used at the conclusion of several letters (Blumell 2012: 46–8).

The relative lack of Christian markers in private letters until the second half of the third century is mirrored in other types of documentation. For instance (and remaining within Oxyrhynchus), Blumell and Wayment note that the earliest documents attesting to the presence of Christians in the city are copies of the libelli that were issued in 250, following the emperor Decius's order that all the citizens of the empire be forced to offer sacrifice. The libelli are the certificates that the commissions, expressly appointed to check on the performance of sacrifices, issued to the people who had actually done the act (or had bribed the committee in order to get a libellus without having to go through the act). Such certificates are extant from all over Egypt (and the Oxyrhynchus's ones are P. Oxy 4 658; 12 1464; 41 2990; and 58 3929), but at best they attest indirectly to the presence of Christians in the region, since arguably the people who did sacrifice and thus requested them were not Christ-believers. Significantly more important might be P. Oxy 42 3035 (dated to February 28, 256), which is a summons for an otherwise unknown Petosorapis, who is identified as a 'Christian' (χρησιανός). It is difficult to tell whether Petosorapis is being sought because he is a Christian (pointing towards a context of persecution) or the reference to him as a 'Christian' indicates his profession (as it happens often in this type of document), so that one might argue that Petosorapis might have been a member of the Christian clergy (Blumell and Wayment 2015: 393–7).

Be that as it may, all the evidence underscores how meager is our information on Oxyrhynchite (and, generally speaking, Egyptian) Christians before the end of the fourth century. Such a datum calls for some sort of historical explanation, in particular because over the same period Egyptian Christianity seems to have had a level of theological and literary production that surpasses—in its size and sophistication—almost any other Mediterranean region (to this effect, it will suffice to mention only the names of Clement, Heracleon, Origen, and Valentinus). Traditional explanations hypothesized that Christ followers avoided mentioning their allegiance even in private letters in order to escape the notice of the Roman government and thus the risk of persecution (Rémondon 1952). While this interpretation does resonate with some of the earliest pieces of evidence examined above, it is worth remembering that it presupposed on the part of the Roman administration an ability to control and a willingness to check even exchanges of personal communications that is frankly unthinkable for an ancient empire. More recently, Roger Bagnall has suggested that the lack of evidence of a Christian presence in the Egyptian countryside should be taken at face value to conclude that Christianity was present only in Alexandria (from which we have very little papyrological information and which nevertheless sustained the sophisticated and creative thinking of figures such as Valentinus or Origen). Only tenuously during the third and fourth centuries do Christ groups begin to appear in the Egyptian countryside, a state of affairs that would account for the limited presence of evidence even over those 200 years (Bagnall 2009: chapter 1). A less radical answer to the historical problem might be the one entertained by Blumell and others, who correctly draw attention to the specific limitations that characterize private letters as well as other types of ancient documentary writings. While these texts do indeed offer a different perspective on everyday life in antiquity with respect to the literary products emanating almost exclusively from the elites, one cannot really say that they convey a direct and unbiased representation of ancient life. For instance, writers of private letters do not tend to give each and every piece of information on their identity when they write, assuming obviously that their addressees in most cases already know them. Thus, in most cases it is quite likely that senders did not include in their letters a mention of the nomen christianum because their addressees already knew about their ties to the Christ movement.

As noted above with respect to the statistics put together by Blumell, in the third and fourth centuries Christians are a very minor percentage of the total (3 percent in the third and no more than 15 percent in the fourth century). However, the ratio begins to raise significantly between the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century to reach 100 percent in the sixth and seventh centuries. This might indicate that the massive Christianization of Oxyrhynchus took place from the end of the fourth century. Here the data provided by the analysis of onomastics (which is particularly rich in private letters and in other documents preserved on papyrus) can be very helpful.

Onomastics was often an obviously primary object of study for scholars interested in tracing the spread of Christianity in Egypt (Bagnall 1982, 1987). But here too one must exercise methodological caution, because it appears that ancient 'converts' to Christianity neither changed their names to make them look more Christian nor gave Christian-sounding names to their children (cases in point may be that of the Petosorapis encountered above or of Origen himself, whose parents were apparently Christian). Nevertheless, the statistics of the percentage of Christian names encountered in the letters from Oxyrhynchus put together by Blumell (2012: 275–9) seem to map almost exactly those of the Christian letters against the overall number of surviving messages. Christian names begin to appear in the record in the third century and then they remain at a low percentage (around 15 percent) throughout the fourth century, to spike decidedly at the turn of the fifth century (when they go up to 45 percent) and to start a progressive increase that would bring them to be 60 or 70 percent of the total in the sixth and seventh centuries. The onomastic evidence confirms the hypothesis that the bulk of the Christianization (at least in the area of Oxyrhynchus) took place not with the 'conversion' of Constantine (which instead seems to have left things mostly unchanged), but later on, at the end of the century and possibly in connection with the edict of Theodosius, who in 381 banned 'pagan' cults from the Roman empire.

Besides what has been briefly said about private letters, the other types of texts that are usually listed under the heterogeneous label 'documentary' yield an enormous amount of information on the several aspects of the early Christian history. As noted above, for the first two or three centuries direct witnesses to Christ groups are hard to come by in the documentary record, but this limitation does not diminish the importance of this evidence for a better understanding of this formative period. Such an opportunity had been already recognized by Adolf Deissmann (1927) in the golden age of papyrology, but his approach has been revived and improved recently in a series of ongoing and comprehensive publications. At least two of them should be mentioned here. The first is the New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity series, published by scholars connected to the Australian Macquarie University, which surveys yearly publications in papyrology and epigraphy that might be of interest for the historical study of the Christ movement. The second series is the Papyrologische Komentare zum Neuen Testament (Papyrological Commentaries of the New Testament) (PKNT) edited by an international team based in the Austrian University of Salzburg. The series aims at covering the entire New Testament with volumes devoted to single books (volumes of 1 and 2 Corinthians, 1 Thessalonians, and Philemon are already published) and each prepared by a different scholar. The ultimate goal of the PKNT is to provide New Testament scholars with a tool that would indicate to them what can be gained through a systematic comparison between biblical texts and documentary evidence. As recognized already by Deissmann, the latter can be extremely helpful not only towards a more adequate lexicographical assessment of the Greek Koine that is employed by the majority of New Testament authors, but also to shed light on a host of socio-cultural themes that the early Christian texts (because of their very literary nature) leave unspoken assuming that readers are already acquainted with them. That is the case for issues as diverse as systems of education and learning (Cribiore 1996), socio-economic structures (Kloppenborg 2006), the status of women in ancient society (Bagnall and Cribiore 2006), or the literary and legal treatment of slaves (Bagnall 2011: 54–74).

When one begins to encounter Christian papyri (as we have seen above roughly in the second half of the third century and then more and more substantially in the following period), the information yielded by documentary texts starts to be more directly relevant and helpful to trace a history of Christ groups besides the topic of their diffusion, which has been reviewed above. The most interesting data are those gleaned by 'archives' or dossiers composed of multiple papyri belonging or related to the same individual or group, which were kept together in antiquity or could be reconstituted by modern scholars. Thus, for instance, AnneMarie Luijendijk has succeeded in piecing together part of the correspondence of Sotas, arguably one of the first Christian bishops of Oxyrhynchus in the second half of the third century, and thus provides precious insights into his everyday activities of fundraising, travel, and book production (Luijendijk 2008: 81–151).

In later periods, the materials at our disposal become even richer and they offer the possibility of novel (and largely still unexplored) insights into the religiously, culturally, and linguistic diverse life that characterized Egyptian Christianity from the fourth century on. For instance, very recently a thorough reexamination of the codicology of the famous Nag Hammadi codices and of the very documents that were used to build their covers has enabled scholars to reopen the debate concerning the origins of these enormously important artifacts and their contents, offering at the same time new vistas on the everyday life of Egyptian monasteries and the theological pluriformity of these institutions (Lundhaug and Jenott 2015). Again, archaeological excavations in the western oasis of Kellis have brought to light a rich dossier of literary and documentary papyri that belonged to a Manichaean community inhabiting the area at the end of the fourth century. Not only do these pieces provide one with information about the everyday life of these groups (for once, not filtered through the polemics of their Christian opponents), but they also illuminate their evangelizing activities in Egypt, their work of translation of Manichaean sacred texts from Syriac into Coptic, and perhaps even their attitude towards the Christian 'persecution' beginning in those years against them (Gardner and Lieu 1996).

Texts of ritual power: amulets, lamellae, and gems

A third even worse-defined category of papyrological materials comprises those that are usually labeled as 'magic,' following the title of a landmark collection, the Papyri Graecae Magicae, edited by Karl Preisendanz in the early twentieth century. The very label 'magic' is notoriously problematic both because it is fraught with ideological baggage (Otto 2013) and because—in the specific case of papyri that have been deemed 'magic'—the categorization has led scholars to 'extract' the texts from their original contexts and to lose sight of the fact that ancient users and readers did not in fact operate according to the binary magic/religion (Mazza 2007).

That being said, these materials—once used outside the constraints of this traditional categorization—prove themselves to be exceptionally good sources of information about lived religion in Egypt in late antiquity (and arguably in the eastern Mediterranean more in general). The big codices included in the first volume of Preisendanz's collection and perhaps forming the so-called 'Theban magic library,' discovered in the early nineteenth century by the archaeologist/looter Anastasy, have mostly held the attention of scholars. The codices are dated to the third or fourth century and in the diversity of their languages (Greek, Demotic, Old Coptic) and their contents mirror the plurality and fluidity of Egyptian society and religiosity in the same period. They were in all likelihood produced by professionals attached to traditional Egyptian temples and, as such, display a rich combination of very practical spells and impassionate prayers and hymns, in which Jewish and Christian elements are often mobilized alongside Egyptian, Greek, and other even more foreign invocations (Dieleman 2005).

Besides (and often obscured by) these major codices, the category of texts of ritual power includes a host of minor pieces (amulets, lamellae, or gems) that were generally disregarded by traditional scholarship as examples of 'popular' religiosity. With the turning of the scholarly tides towards an increased attention to evidence of 'lived' religion, the publication and study of these materials has picked up its pace significantly in recent years. In a recent survey of Greek and Latin Christian amulets (but one already superseded by new discoveries and editions), Theodore de Bruyn and Jitse Dijkstra have counted roughly 186 pieces (2011). This long list does not include the analogous pieces written in Coptic, which are going to be even more numerous (Meyer 1999). Other important pieces that are not strictly speaking amulets can be found inscribed either on metal lamellae (Kotansky 1994) or on gems (Spier 2007).

Several of these pieces are important witnesses for some biblical texts that evidently were considered most powerful by early Christian users and were thus inscribed on these artifacts. This is the case for the Lord's prayer, the beginning verses of the four canonical Gospels, or Psalm 90, but it is important to note that the choice was by no means limited to texts that were on their way to becoming canonical: thus, for instance, one encounters on amulets of all kinds the letter that Jesus allegedly wrote to Abgar, the king of Edessa, promising divine protection for the Syriac city and which became a beloved protective text all over the eastern Mediterranean in late antiquity (Given 2016).

However, scholars have started to note that the texts inscribed on these artifacts of ritual power are interesting not just because of their textual critical potential (see Kraus 2006). In fact, it is clear both that most ancient users of these amulets, being illiterate, could not read their inscriptions and, even more importantly, that the layout of the texts hints at the fact that the very materiality of the inscribed letters was supposed to carry ritual power (Sanzo 2014; Jones 2015). Such a development in Christian artifacts cannot be surprising because in Egypt (and arguably all over the Mediterranean) writing per se—independently of its actual content—has always been attributed religious power.

In this perspective, these late antique artifacts can productively be studied by focusing on their 'poetics,' the performative ways in which their assemblages of texts, letters, images, and other implements are put together by their creators (this integrative approach is brilliantly developed by Joseph Sanzo in a series of recent studies that yield significant results with respect to our knowledge of late antique lived religiosity; see Sanzo 2016).

Epigraphy

Ancient inscriptions are extant in such a plentiful number that their systematic study has so far encountered even bigger obstacles than that of papyri. However, given the broader geographical space covered by epigraphical materials, their analysis can offer even more significant results than those of Egyptian papyrological materials. In truth, the two disciplines of papyrology and epigraphy should work together to offer the best insights into early Christian studies. Most of the initial findings of the study of inscriptions do indeed parallel what has been observed above with respect to papyrology, and thus in this final section I will limit myself to some general remarks and some examples of recent and fruitful research conducted in the specific sub-field of epigraphy.

As already noted with respect to Christian papyri, identifying inscriptions belonging or tied to the Christ movement in the early three centuries is a complicated affair that evokes intricate methodological debates on what counts as a sign of Christianity. However, when some early pieces can be reliably attributed to members of Christ groups, the payoff in terms of our increased understanding is quite significant. For instance, in recent articles, Gregory Snyder (2011, 2014) has proposed dating to the second century a couple of Roman inscriptions which concern the wedding or perhaps the funeral of two women. Snyder convincingly demonstrates that the inscriptions reflect an acquaintance both with sophisticated Greek epigrammatic poetry and Valentinian sacramental symbolism, so that they should be read as exceptionally valuable witnesses about the earliest Roman Christ groups and their lived religiosity (outside the biased representation provided by later heresiologists). Similarly, the hotly discussed honorific inscription of Aberkios, bishop of Hierapolis in Asia Minor in the early third century, demonstrates the same interest for the reception of traditional 'pagan' poetic style, but also a Christian interest in (imaginary) travels and eucharistic symbolism (Llewelyn 1992).

As for papyri, however, likewise for inscriptions, even those pieces that are not Christian can in fact yield a host of important information on the cultural and social background presupposed by the early texts of the Christ movement. An important example of the uses to which epigraphy can be put in this perspective is the current work done with the very numerous inscriptions related to ancient voluntary associations. Even if the Christ groups were not strictly speaking associations, it is quite clear that authors such as Paul thought about their groups in the ideological terms of contemporary associations and in all likelihood also organized some aspects of their everyday life (fundraising or cult, to name two prominent examples) with the model of associations in mind (Ascough 2003; Ascough et al. 2012).

Most extant early Christian inscriptions are not as sophisticated as the examples already mentioned, but are for the most part tombstones with little more than the name of the deceased on them. However, their sheer number and geographical diffusion enable scholars to draw some important statistical conclusions with respect to the spread of Christianity in the Mediterranean. The results are in large measure identical to what has already been said on the basis of the papyrological record: Christian inscriptions begin to appear in the late third century (see Figure 23.1), but their number really starts to pick up only at the end of the fourth century. There are obviously significant exceptions that have—for this very reason—attracted the attention of scholars. For instance, in Phrygia (a region in central Turkey), there is a real outburst of funerary inscriptions datable to the third century, on which the Christian identity of the deceased is stated with great emphasis, often through the use of the still enigmatic phrase 'Christians for Christians' (χριστιανοὶ χριστιανοῖς). Several explanations for this peculiar habit have been proposed, and one very popular among scholars is that the phrase

Figure 23.1   Marble third-century probable Christian funeral stele from Rome, which reads D(is) M(anibus), Ichthus Zōntōn, Liciniae Amiati Benemerenti vixit ('To the gods of the underworld: fish of the living; To the well-deserving Licinia Amiatis; she lived . . . '). From the necropolis on the Vatican hill and now in the Epigraphical Museum, Baths of Diocletian, Rome. Wikicommons would represent a mark of allegiance to the 'New Prophecy' (also called 'montanism' by the heresiologists), an ascetic and millenarian movement that dominated Asia Minor from the second to the fourth centuries (Tabernee 1997).

As with papyri, epigraphy also has its fair share of more popular inscriptions, which were produced by ancient people of a lower social status than that of the elites who wrote the literary texts that have mostly survived to our time. These are graffiti that were probably either painted or scratched on almost any plastered surface of ancient cities. Since this plaster has rarely survived, most of these graffiti have disappeared, but wherever they have luckily been preserved they provide scholars with the opportunity of hearing alternative voices on a host of different subjects and registers, ranging from advertisement to political commentary, from pleas of unrequited love to graphic sexual references (Bagnall 2011: 7–26). The single ancient place where graffiti have survived almost in their entirety is Pompeii, due to the special circumstances of the destruction of the city. This extraordinary situation allows one to reconstruct everyday life at Pompeii in the first century CE to an extent that is unparalleled elsewhere. In turn, the same extraordinary characteristics have invited scholars to look for traces of a Christian presence in the city. With respect to graffiti, something that is periodically brought up in scholarly discussions of materials from Pompeii is the potential presence of crosses. Quite recently, Bruce Longenecker has devoted a very detailed and meticulously researched book to prove that Pompeii actually had several crosses among its many graffiti, witnessing to the early and significant Christian presence in Italy (2016). As noted before, Longenecker's book is well researched and makes some very good points with respect to, for instance, the possibility that indeed Christ followers might have used the image of the cross in some cases even before Constantine. That being said, one must also observe that Longenecker's specific case might not be as solid as it seems, since most of the graffiti that he considers to be most clearly Christian crosses are actually not extant. For instance, the major support of Longenecker's argument, the artifact found in the bakery of the Insula Arriana Polliana is known to us only through a picture drawn in the nineteenth century by a French scholar who—a detail of no minor importance given the subject matter of debate here—was convinced that it was a Christian cross.

Notes

1 For examples of nomina sacra, representing Jesus (the letters ΙΥ beneath a short, horizontal line and God (the letters ΘΥ beneath the horizontal line) in a passage from John 1 in Codex Vaticanus (B), fourth century CE, see upload.wikimedia.org/wikipedia/commons/6/61/Nomina_Sacra_in_Codex_Vaticanus_John_1.jpg.
2 For a staurogam in P[75] (Papyrus Bodmer), with a horizonal line over the staurogram, see en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Staurogram#/media/File:P_Bodmer_XIV-XV,_staurogram.jpg.

Bibliography

Artz-Grabner, P. (2002) '"Brothers" and "sisters" in documentary papyri and in early Christianity,' Rivista Biblica 50: 185–204.

Ascough, R. S. (2003) Paul's Macedonian Associations: The Social Context of Philippians and 1 Thessalonians (WUNT 2/161). Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Ascough, R. S., Harland, P. A. and Kloppenborg, J. S. (2012) Asscoiations in the Greco-Roman World: A Sourcebook. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Bagnall, R. S. (1982) 'Religious conversion and onomastic change in early Byzantine Egypt,' Bulletin of the American Society of Papyrologists 19: 105–24.

Bagnall, R. S. (1987) 'Conversion and onomastics: A reply,' Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 69: 243–50.

Bagnall, R. S. (2009) Early Christian Books in Egypt. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University.

Bagnall, R. S. (2011) Everyday Writing in the Graeco-Roman East. Berkeley, CA: University of California.

Bagnall, R. S. and Cribiore, R. (2006) Women's Letters from Ancient Egypt, 300 BC–AD 800. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan.

Blumell, L. H. (2012) Lettered Christians: Christians, Letters, and Late Antique Oxyrhynchus. New Testament Tools, Studies, and Documents 39. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Blumell, L. H. and Wayment, T. A. (2015) Christian Oxyrhynchus: Texts, Documents, and Sources. Waco, TX: Baylor University.

Boyarin, D. (2009) 'Rethinking Jewish-Christianity: An argument for dismantling a dubious category (to which is appended a correction to my Border Lines),' Jewish Quarterly Review 99: 7–36.

Chartier, R. (1992) L'ordre des livres: lecteurs, auteurs, bibliothèques en Europe entre XIVe et XVIIIe siècle. Collection de la pensée. Aix-en-Provence, France: Alinea.

Choat, M. (2006) Belief and Cult in Fourth-Century Papyri. Studia Antiqua Australiensia 1. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Choat, M. and Yuen-Collingridge, R. (2010) 'The Egyptian Hermas: The Shepherd in Egypt before Constantine,' in Kraus, T. J. and Nicklas, T. (eds) Early Christian Manuscripts: Examples of Applied Method and Approach. TENTS 5. Leiden, The Nethelands: Brill, 191–211.

Cribiore, R. (1996) Writers, Teachers, and Students in Graeco-Roman Egypt. American Studies in Papyrology 36. Atlanta, GA: Scholars.

De Bruyn, T. S. and Dijkstra, J. H. F. (2011) 'Greek amulets and formularies from Egypt containing Christian elements: A checklist of papyri, parchments, ostraka, and tablets,' Bulletin of the American Society of Papyrologists 48: 163–216.

Deissmann, A. (1927) Light from the Ancient East: The New Testament Illustrated by Recently Discovered Texts from the Graeco-Roman World. German edition 1909, New York: Doran.

De Savignac, J. (1963) 'Les papyrus Bodmer XIV et XV,' Scriptorium 17: 50–5.

Dieleman, J. (2005) Priests, Tongues, and Rites: The London-Leiden Magical Manuscripts and Translation in Egyptian Ritual (100–300 CE). Religions in the Graeco-Roman World 135. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Estes, J. D. (2015) 'Reading for the spirit of the text: Nomina Sacra and Πνεῦμα language in P[46]'. New Testament Studies 61: 566–94.

Gamble, H. T. (1995) Books and Readers in the Early Church: A History of Early Christian Texts. New Haven, CT: Yale University.

Gardner, I. M. F. and Lieu, S. N. C. (1996) 'From Narmouthis (Medinet Madi) to Kellis (Ismant el-Kharab): Manichean documents from Roman Egypt,' Journal of Roman Studies 86: 146–69.

Given, J. G. (2016) 'Utility and variance in late Antique witnesses to the Agbar-Jeses corres[ondence,' Archiv für Religionsgeschichte 17: 187–222.

Grafton, A. (1997) The Footnote: A Curious History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University.

Hurtado, L. W. (2006) The Earliest Christian Artifacts: Manuscripts and Christian Origins. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Johnson, W. A. (2010) Reading and Reading Cultures in the High Roman Empire: A Study of Elite Communities. New York: OUP.

Jones, B. C. (2015) New Testament Texts on Greek Amulets from Late Antiquity. Library of New Testament Studies 554. London: T&T Clark.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (2006) The Tenants in the Vineyard: Ideology, Economics, and Agrarian Conflict in Jewish Palestine. WUNT 195. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Kloppenborg, J. S. (2014) 'Literate media in early Christ groups: The creation of a Christian book culture,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 22: 21–59.

Kotansky, R. (1994) Greek Magical Amulets: The Inscribed Gold, Silver, Copper and Bronze 'Lamellae.' Text and Commentary. Papyrologica Coloniensia 22. Opladen, Germany: Westdeutscher.

Kraft, R. (2007) 'In search of Jewish Greek scriptures: Exposing the obvious?,' at ccat.sas.upenn.edu/rak/jewishpap.html (accessed on 28 September 2016).

Kraus, T. J. (2006) 'Manuscripts with the Lord's Prayer: They are more than simply witnesses to that text itself,' in Nicklas, T. (ed.) New Testament Manuscripts: Their Texts and Their World. TENTS 2. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 227–66.

Llewelyn, S. R. (1992) 'The epitaph of Aberkios: The earliest Christian inscription?,' New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity 6: 177–81.

Longenecker, B. W. (2015) The Cross Before Constantine: The Early Life of a Christian Symbol. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Longenecker, B. W. (2016) The Crosses of Pompeii: Jesus-Devotion in a Vesuvian Town. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Lührmann, D. (2004) Die apokryph gewordenen Evangelien: Studien zu neuen Texten und zu neuen Fragen. Supp NT 112. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Luijendijk, A. (2008) Greetings in the Lord: Early Christians and the Oxyrhynchus Papyri. Harvard Theological Studies 60. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Luijendijk, A. (2011) 'Reading the Gospel of Thomas in the third century: Three Oxyrhynchus papyri and Origen's homilies,' in Clivaz, C. and Zumstein, J. (eds) Reading New Testament Papyri in Context − Lire les papyrus du Nouveau Testament dans leur contexte. Actes du colloque des 22–24 octobre 2009 à l'Université de Lausanne. BETL 242. Leuven, The Netherlands: Peeters, 241–67.

Lundhaug, H. and Jenott, L. (2015) The Monastic Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices. Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum 97. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Mazza, R. (2007) 'Medicina, rituali di guarigione e cristianesimi nell'Egitto tardo antico,' Annali di storia dell'esegesi 24: 437–62.

Meyer, M. (1999) Ancient Christian Magic: Coptic Texts of Ritual Power. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Naldini, M. (1998) Il cristianesimo in Egitto: lettere private nei papiri dei secoli II-IV. Biblioteca patristica 32. 2nd edition. Florence, Italy: Nardini.

Nongbri, B. (2014) 'The limits of palaeographic dating of literary papyri: Some observations on the date and provenance of P.Bodmer II (P66),' Museum Helveticum 71: 1–35.

Nongbri, B. (2016) 'Reconsidering the place of papyrus Bodmer XIV–XV (75) in the textual criticism of the New Testament,' Journal of Biblical Literature 135: 405–37.

Otto, B. C. (2013) 'Towards historicizing "magic" in antiquity,' Numen 60: 308–47.

Paap, A. H. R. E. (1959) Nomina Sacra in the Greek Papyri of the First Five Centuries: The Sources and Some Deductions. Papyrologica Lugduno-Batava 8. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Rémondon, R. (1952) 'L'Egypte et la suprēme résistance au christianisme (Ve–VIIe siècles),' Bulletin de l'Institut français d'Archéologie orientale 51: 63–78.

Roberts, C. H. and Skeat, T. C. (1993) The Birth of the Codex. London: Oxford University Press.

Sanzo, J. E. (2014) Scriptural Incipits on Amulets from Late Antique Egypt. STAC 84. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Sanzo, J. E. (2016) 'Wrapped up in the Bible: The multifaceted ritual in a late antique amulet (P. Oxy. VIII 1077),' Journal of Early Christian Studies 24: 569–97.

Snyder, G. F. (2003) Ante Pacem: Archaeological Evidence of Church Life Before Constantine. 3rd ed. Macon, GA: Mercer.

Snyder, H. G. (2011) 'A second-century Christian inscription from the Via Latina,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 19: 157–95.

Snyder, H. G. (2014) 'The discovery and interpretation of the Flavia Sophe inscription: New results,' Vigiliae Christianae 68: 1–59.

Spier, J. (2007) Late Antique and Early Christian Gems. Wiesbaden, Germany: Reichert.

Tabernee, W. (1997) Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia: Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism. Macon, GA: Mercer.

Tov, E. (2004) Scribal Practices and Approaches Reflected in the Texts Found in the Judean Desert. STDJ 54. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Traube, L. (1907) Nomina Sacra: Versuch einer Geschichte der christlichen Kürzung. Munich, Germany: Beck.

Treu, K. (1973) 'Die Bedeutung der Griechischen für die Juden im römischen Reich,' Kairos 15: 123–44.

Trobisch, D. (2000) The First Edition of the New Testament. Oxford: Oxford University Press. (German original Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1996).

Tuckett, C. M. (2003) 'Nomina Sacra: Yes and No?,' in Auwers, J.-M. and De Jonge, H. J. (eds) The Biblical Canons (BETL 98). Leuven, Belgium: Peeters, 431–58.

24

SCRIPTURES IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY

Outi Lehtipuu and Hanne von Weissenberg

What did early Christians conceive of as scripture? What texts did they read and use? Who read and used them? How were the books that are now included in the biblical canon chosen? Finding answers to these questions is challenging, not least because of the scarcity of evidence, particularly on the earliest times. Even though scriptures assumed a constitutive role for Jesus' followers from the beginning and early Christian writers constantly appealed to authoritative texts, there is surprisingly little discussion on what actual books were regarded as scripture before the fourth century. It is only then when the term kanōn starts to be used in the meaning of a list of normative books (Metzger 1987: 289–293).

Another challenge has to do with perspective: it is not easy to approach the question of early Jewish or Christian scriptures without having in mind the closed canon familiar to scholars today (Brakke 2012: 266–267; Najman 2012: 497–518). This means that historians tend to read sources from within the framework of a fixed list of scriptures and evaluate how close to the ultimate goal, the closed canon, each piece of evidence comes (Mroczek 2015). Historically speaking, this kind of a teleological design is problematic – using a standard which did not exist prior to the fourth century does not do justice to earlier sources. The same goes for nomenclature (Ulrich 2002a; Zahn 2011). It makes little sense to speak of 'canonical' and 'non-canonical' texts in a situation where there was no canon. Moreover, a distinction between canonical and non-canonical too often entails a value judgement: only those texts that became accepted as part of the canon are considered important while those that were not can be dismissed as worthless (Dunderberg 2015: 94–95; Najman 2012: 497–501). Investigation of the rich evidence of the Dead Sea discoveries, providing scholars with the earliest biblical manuscripts and scriptural interpretation, has made it clear that in a period during which there is no Bible as a concept, no book format and no printing culture, 'post-canonical' features such as textual stability and a collection with boundaries are not constitutive of sacred texts (Mroczek 2015). Similarly, comparative study of various religious traditions has shown that the role scripture plays in many present-day Christian and other Western religious communities is not universal and cannot be applied when studying religious traditions of different cultures and times. Instead of books, it may be myths, symbols, rituals, etc. that are the primary carriers of religious authority (Levering 1989).

Our starting point in this chapter is the diversity of the early Christian movement. One sign of this diversity is a broad range of different approaches to scripture. Not all Christians read and esteemed the same texts and used them in the same way. Even though there was a wide agreement on the authority of the Jewish 'law and prophets' early on, it is not always clear which textual compositions or which textual forms these concepts entailed. And even though most Christians would have read Paul's letters and one or more gospels, there were exceptions, too. Marcion became famous for rejecting the traditional scriptures that were to be known as the Old Testament and for accepting only one evangelion (presumably an edited version of the Gospel of Luke) and ten letters of Paul (BeDuhn 2013). For most Christian teachers, Paul was a great authority and they saw themselves as the (only) rightful heirs of the apostolic legacy, fiercely attacking their rivals and accusing them of misunderstanding Paul (Lieu 2010a; Lehtipuu 2015: 87–90). However, some early Christians considered him as an enemy to true Christian belief, and opinions about him varied from acclaim to scorn (Lieu 2010b; Bird and Dodson 2011).

Historical inquiry of early Christian scriptures cannot be restricted to writings that later acquired a canonical status. Neither is canonicity an apt distinctive feature in a practical sense, for in many cases there is no more information about where, by whom and for whom the earliest Christian texts were written, be their later status 'canonical' or 'non-canonical'. As far as reception history is concerned, many of the 'canonical' texts such as the four New Testament Gospels and Paul's letters were widely read and quoted, but this is not a characteristic shared by all texts in our canon. For example, the letters of James, Jude and 2–3 John do not feature any more frequently in early Christian literature than do 'non-canonical' texts such as the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Barnabas or the Apocalypse of Peter. Some of these latter texts were included in some of the earliest manuscripts of the New Testament, which means that there were Christians who regarded them as 'canonical', though they are no longer in our New Testament canon.

In what follows, it is impossible to discuss all relevant texts in detail. Instead, we give an overview of the diversity of scriptures in early Christianity. In our discussion, we stick to the customary distinction between 'scriptures', that is, religiously authoritative texts, and 'canon', that is, a fixed list of a selection of scriptures (Sundberg 1968; McDonald and Sanders 2002; Brakke 2012: 264). We confine the use of the word 'canon' to the discussions of the fourth century when this term begins to be used in the sense of a decisive list of the texts of the Old and the New Testament. We also distinguish between authoritative texts and scripture (cf. Ulrich 2002a: 29–30) and take the former as a broader term and 'scripture' as referring to texts that are regarded as sacred, while other texts can also convey authority. For example, when Paul, according to the book of Acts, cites the Greek poet Aratus (Acts 17:28), it is not likely that he (or Luke) considered the poet's text as 'scripture'. Similarly, it is not easy to determine what kind of a status the Book of Enoch had for the author of the Epistle of Jude who quotes it (Jude v. 14). Our use of terminology coheres with the change in preferred vocabulary especially among Dead Sea Scrolls scholars: instead of 'biblical' or 'canonical', scholars have begun to use terms such as 'authoritative', 'sacred' or 'S/scriptural' (preferably with a lower case 's') for texts that were gradually gaining a 'special' status in the late Second Temple Judaism. This change in vocabulary has its roots in the attempt to acknowledge the pre-canonical state of textual instability and the lack of a fixed collection, a Bible in the canonical sense of the word.

We set the scene by describing the earliest pandects, that is, manuscripts containing the complete Bible, which originate from the fourth and fifth centuries. It was in this period that the 'canon debates' (cf. McDonald and Sanders 2002), discussions of the limits of the Bible, were conducted. Canon formation was to a large extent part of early Christian polemics; texts were accepted as authoritative scripture and others were rejected 'to protect and project orthodoxy against what [were] perceived as the wild assertions of heresy' (Brooke 1997: 242). To understand the fourth-century debates, we trace earlier developments and scriptural phenomena. As we understand the development of early Judaism and early Christianity as more or less contemporaneous processes, we discuss what can be known of the emergence of Jewish scriptures, especially in the light of Qumran discoveries. The Qumran evidence and New Testament texts share many similarities in the way they understand scripture, and together they shed light on the scriptures of the earliest Jesus-followers. We continue by considering a variety of texts produced by early Christians: Gospels, epistles and other texts, and raise the question of their readership. We conclude with some observations concerning the formation of the Christian canon.

The first bibles: fourth and fifth centuries

Around the year 330, according to Eusebius, the emperor Constantine ordered fifty copies of 'the divine scriptures' (tōn theiōn graphōn) to be produced on parchment in a portable form and delivered to Constantinople (Vit. Const. 4.36). What does this imperial order tell us? First, its scope was enormous. A codex including all of 'the holy scriptures' would require a huge amount of animal hides for the production of vellum, numerous proficient scribes and a lot of time (Kraft 2007: 10–11). Second, the order raises the question of why it was needed. Did the churches in Constantinople possess no scriptures? Or did the emperor want to make sure that all churches had the same scriptures? Why did he not indicate what the 'holy scriptures' are – did he not know or did he not care? Did he let Eusebius decide? In this case, would Revelation have been included – the book of whose status Eusebius himself seems to be uncertain (Hist. eccl. 3.25.2, 4). Did all fifty codices contain the same texts? It is not possible to answer this question, for it is unlikely that any of these copies has survived. Even though the two oldest codices that encompass the whole Bible are from the fourth century, scholars tend to be skeptical whether either one of them belonged to those produced upon the imperial request (Metzger and Ehrman 2005: 15–16).

Be that as it may, when these two codices, Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, together with a third early Bible, the fifth-century Codex Alexandrinus are compared, their contents show similarities but also striking differences. In terms of the Old Testament, Vaticanus lacks 1–4 Maccabees, included in the other two, while Alexandrinus also contains Psalm 151. The order of the books also varies significantly (see the chart in McDonald 2007: 442). In all three, the New Testament opens with the four Gospels but there is considerable variation among the rest of the books both in terms of the works included and their order. In Sinaiticus, the Gospels are followed by fourteen letters of Paul (Hebrews is included and placed between 2 Thessalonians and 1 Timothy), after which come Acts, the seven catholic epistles and Revelation. Moreover, Sinaiticus also includes two other early Christian texts, the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas. Codex Alexandrinus places the book of Acts after the Gospel of John but then come the catholic epistles before the fourteen letters of Paul and the book of Revelation. Here, too, more texts follow: 1–2 Clement and the Psalms of Solomon. The order of the books in Codex Vaticanus is the same as in Alexandrinus but the end of the manuscript is lost from the middle of Hebrews onward (Smith 2014). It is not known whether the missing texts of 1–2 Timothy, Titus, Philemon and Revelation belonged to the original, and what other texts might have been included.

These three great codices are exceptions among biblical manuscripts. Not only are they the oldest Greek codices to contain the complete Bible, they are also the only full Bibles before the twelfth century (Kraft 2007: 11, n. 21). Before they were produced in the fourth and fifth centuries, and for centuries after that, most texts were copied and circulated either individually or as part of a smaller collection, either on scrolls or, to an ever-increasing extent, in codices. This had to do with physical limitations, for it was not practical to increase the size of a scroll endlessly. After the adoption of the codex form, more text could be included in one manuscript, but it was not until the fourth century that volumes large enough to encompass all biblical texts could be produced. Until that time (and beyond), the 'Bible' was a collection of separate scrolls or codices – as is indicated by the name biblia, Greek for 'scrolls' (plural). It is clear that there was variation in regard to what scriptures early Christian communities possessed, for different communities had different collections of separate manuscripts at their disposal.

The book-like format also raised the discussion about canonicity to a new level, for it made it necessary to determine what texts should be copied in between the front and the back cover and what should be left out (Ulrich 2002a: 25). The aforementioned three great codices show that even though there was a general agreement on most of the texts, some fluctuation persisted in regard to the selection of books and to their order. Local variation concerning the order of the books and the contents continued for the entire period when copying was made by hand. As a matter of fact, no complete unanimity was ever reached. The canons of Christian churches still differ from each other, especially in regard to the question of what books are counted among the Old Testament scriptures (see the diagrams, e.g. in McDonald 2007: 443–444).

The manuscript tradition shows that there is no unambiguous answer to the question of what texts early Christians conceived of as scripture. Texts such as 1 Clement, Barnabas, the Shepherd of Hermas and Didache were in some circles regarded as canonical, and judging by the sheer number of survived manuscripts, they seemed to have been more popular than some of the writings eventually included in the New Testament canon (Gamble 2002: 290). Moreover, sometimes texts that were later canonized were bound in codices together with texts that did not receive a canonical status. A striking example is the third- or fourth-century papyrus P[72] which contains not only the earliest known copy of 1–2 Peter and Jude but also the Protevangelium of James (entitled Nativity of Mary, Apocalypse of James in the manuscript), the apocryphal correspondence between Paul and the Corinthians (3 Corinthians), the eleventh Ode of Solomon, Melito's Homily on the Passover, an otherwise unknown hymn fragment, the Apology of Phileas and Psalms 33 and 34 (Charlesworth 2012). This case suggests that texts that later made it into the canon (Jude, 1–2 Peter) were not always treated differently from other early Christian texts, but nothing definitive can be said about the level of authority granted to any of these texts.

The Jewish 'Bible' in the late Second Temple period

Contrary to what is commonly assumed, the first Christians did not inherit a ready-made Bible from Judaism. Rather, in light of the Dead Sea Scrolls manuscript evidence, it has become increasingly clear that there was no closed collection of Jewish scriptures in the late Second Temple period. Prior to the Qumran discoveries, there were some indirect indicators to a developing collection, such as in the prologue of the Greek Book of Sirach (c. 135 BCE), which refers to 'the Law and the Prophets and the other books of our ancestors', and the Gospel of Luke's (first century CE) reference to 'the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms' (Luke 24:44). The first numerical references to authoritative texts are also found in the first century. Josephus mentions twenty-two ancestral books (Contra Apionem 1.8) and Fourth Ezra refers to twenty-four books (4 Ezra 14:44–45). However, rather than references to a closed collection, the numbers are typological in a manner similar to later patristic canon lists (Mroczek 2016: 160–162).

In the late Second Temple period, there were various, still ongoing canonical processes or developments within Judaism. These are expressed, e.g. by the Greek translations of the separate books of the Hebrew Bible, the Septuagint (LXX), created gradually between the third and first centuries BCE, and by the so-called biblical manuscripts of the Qumran library. Comparison of the scriptural scrolls from the Judean Desert with Septuagint manuscripts and Josephus' rewriting of biblical history has demonstrated that parallel recensions of biblical books were in circulation in Judea, as well as the diaspora, at least until 100 CE (Ulrich 2002b). Further, the Dead Sea Scrolls demonstrate that this was a period of flourishing literary activity. From a magnitude of textual material that was authored, edited and transmitted, only some texts eventually became part of the Jewish Tanakh and the Christian Old Testament canon. Other authoritative texts of the Second Temple period never gained a place in the final collection. Moreover, not all texts that now are a part of the biblical canon were necessarily considered authoritative, or inspired, when first composed (Ulrich 2003: 4–6). Importantly, nowhere in the Hebrew Bible or the Dead Sea Scrolls are texts explicitly referred to as 'sacred'. As a matter of fact, in Jewish texts, written in Hebrew (Aramaic), the earliest explicit references to 'sacred texts / books' (kitvei qodesh) are attested to in rabbinic literature (e.g. m. Šabb. 13:1, m.

Yad. 3:2, 5; 4:6; t. Šabb. 16:1). It is in the Greek texts, written by Josephus (37–100 CE) and Philo of Alexandria (25 BCE–50 CE) where we find a variety of Greek terms referring to sacred writings, usually to the Torah (Bremmer 2010: 340–341).

In the Qumran texts, there are occasional references to 'the Law' or 'the Law and the Prophets', but what exactly these categories entail is not defined (Ulrich 2015: 300–304). For instance, Daniel was counted among the prophets, but we do not know with certainty which books were specifically included in 'the Prophets' in the late Second Temple period (Berthelot 2006). There is no detailed, explicit list of authoritative texts; instead, there are other, commonly agreed criteria to be looked at. For the purpose of defining authoritative Jewish literature, both the number of preserved manuscripts and the secondary use of these texts in later compositions are indicative. The secondary usage includes both explicit exegesis of earlier, authoritative sources, sometimes identified by the formula 'it is written', and the more implicit intertextuality expressed in the rewriting of source texts (i.e. the Temple Scroll). Through these indicators, we can figure out tentatively what texts might have been authoritative for the Yahad movement (Ulrich 2015: 304–308). Assumedly, these findings have broader relevance in relation to other Jewish groups too, even though we know little about their preferences, with the well-known exception of the Samaritans, who regarded only the Torah as authoritative.

There is a consensus that the Torah had already gained a widely accepted and authoritative status in Judaism during the late Second Temple period. The importance of the Torah is visible in all the findings of the Dead Sea area (Judean desert) (Tov 2002: 141). This is also indicated by the Greek translation of the Pentateuch. Regardless of the authority of the Torah, the existence of the many rewritten forms of (parts of) the Pentateuchal text in Hebrew, such as the Rewritten Pentateuch manuscripts, raises questions about wherein exactly the authority lies – probably more in the book or in the tradition than in the text or its actual wording. Textual fluidity holds true for several other biblical books in the late Second Temple period too. The existence of parallel versions shows that the authoritative traditions are represented in a plural form at least for some parts, and the ancient scribes dealt with this reality in a variety of ways (Brooke 2005: 103).

The Psalms, Isaiah and at least some of the minor prophets were very likely authoritative as well (for the XII see von Weissenberg 2012). Books that were later rejected from the Jewish canon but which appear to have been authoritative for the Yahad movement include texts such as 1 Enoch and Jubilees. The evidence is much weaker for many other compositions, suggesting a non-authoritative status for them, even though there is more diversity of scholarly opinion concerning these texts. Later canonical books that are often listed as being not authoritative for the Qumran community include Canticles, Qohelet, Ruth, Esther, Ezra, Nehemiah and Chronicles (Lange 2002: 22–24; Ulrich 2015: 308). The most likely reason for the rejection of the book of Esther, of which no manuscripts are found in Qumran, was a theological one, related to the Qumranic festival calendar, which has no reference to Purim. Furthermore, it is interesting to note that while Proverbs and Qohelet apparently were not authoritative for the Qumran community, several previously unknown wisdom texts (Instruction 1Q26; 4Q415–418, 418a, 418c, 423; Mysteries 1Q27; 4Q299–301; Beatitudes 4Q525, etc.) were found in the Qumran caves. The probable absence of Chronicles at Qumran may reflect the negative attitude of the Yahad movement towards the contemporary practices in the Temple and the political agenda of the Hasmoneans (Brooke 2007: 35–48). If this interpretation of the data is correct, in this case at least, the rejection of certain books was related to issues of identity.

Jewish scriptures in early Christianity

The Qumran evidence highlights the fact that the Hebrew Bible was still in the making during the time of the Jesus movement. Some scriptural texts enjoyed a clearly authoritative and sacred status that the first Christians would have inherited from Judaism, whereas with others, the jury was still out. In Judaism, the discussion continued with certain texts such as Qohelet, Song of Songs and Ben Sira long into the rabbinic era as attested by the Mishnah and Talmud (m. Yad. 3:5, 4:6; t. Yad. 2:13). The earliest extant Hebrew codices including all canonical texts date to the medieval times. Early Christian texts reinforce both the picture of the scriptural status of some texts and the vagueness of the limits of scripture. In the New Testament Gospels, Jesus is presented as reading (Luke 4:16–17) and citing (e.g. Matt. 4:4, 7, 10; 21:13, 42) from literature that was to become part of the Old Testament. The introductory formula 'it is written' and similar phrases reveal the authority given to these texts. Indeed, the Gospels reflect the conviction that God speaks through scriptures: 'have you not read what was spoken to you by God' says Jesus, according to Matthew, and cites Exodus (Matt. 22:31–32). Jesus commonly refers to 'the law and prophets' (Matt. 7:12; 22:40; Luke 16:16; 24:44; cf. 'Moses and the prophets' in Luke 16:29, 31). Strikingly, however, the Gospel of Thomas presents a Jesus who does not even once refer to scriptures or to any of such heroes of the past as Moses or Abraham. On the contrary, in Thomas Jesus dismisses the authority of Jewish prophets (Gos. Thom. 52).

In the Qumran materials, in light of both manuscript evidence and exegetical use, the most important biblical books were Genesis, Deuteronomy, Isaiah and the Psalms (Brooke 2007: 93–96). Correspondingly, most frequently cited texts in the New Testament Gospels are Deuteronomy, Psalms, Isaiah and other prophets. On the other hand, several Old Testament texts are not alluded to at all in the New Testament, such as Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk and Haggai or Song of Songs, Ruth, Ecclesiastes and Esther (Evans 2002: 185). Here, again comparison with the Qumran discoveries is instructive: wheres Habakkuk and Nahum have their own commentaries (1QpHab; 4QpNah), the others are poorly attested, both as manuscripts and as sources for later interpretation.

It is likely that early Christians collected key scriptural texts as proof-texts (the so-called testimonia) and arranged them topically to use in their proclamation (Gamble 1995: 25–28; Albl 1999). The phrase 'it is written' or the like occurs more than sixty times in the New Testament writings. Matthew's Gospel in particular reflects the idea that the events of Jesus' birth and life fulfil the words of prophets (cf. Matt. 1:22; 2:15, 23; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; 21:4; 27:35.) Isaiah's song of the suffering servant (Isaiah 53) was early on interpreted as a prophecy of Jesus' sufferings (cf. Acts 8:26–35). Other popular methods included reading scriptural narratives in a typological way (e.g. 1 Cor. 10:4; 15:21–23) and understanding Israel's patriarchs, prophets, kings and other key figures as forerunners and examples of the Christian faith (cf. Rom. 4:1–3; Hebrews 11). Interpretations and rewritings around key biblical figures such as Abraham are also attested in several rewritten scripture compositions found among the Dead Sea Scrolls (e.g. Genesis Apocryphon, 4QMidrash on Eschatology).

The authority and divine origin of Hebrew scriptures were usually taken for granted – although the expression 'holy scriptures' occurs only twice within New Testament texts (Rom. 1:2; 2 Tim. 3:15). One of the few exceptions to this rule was Marcion in the second century who sought to separate Christianity from its Jewish past and rejected Hebrew scriptures altogether. In addition, Paul already added nuances to what the 'divine' origin meant for Christians, for instance, by arguing that the Mosaic law was 'ordained through angels by a mediator' (Gal. 3:19). However, most early Christian writers continued to use Jewish scriptures side by side with texts produced by Christians. For example, several Nag Hammadi texts include retellings of the Genesis myth of creation (Apoc. John 19.4–33; Nat. Rulers 88.11–17; Orig. World 114.36–116.8; Apoc. Adam 66.14–25; Testim. Truth 45.21–49.15). The vagueness of the boundaries of scripture is seen in the fact that many early Christians read and used a broad variety of Jewish religious texts. Most of the texts traditionally classified in scholarship as 'pseudepigrapha' were copied, edited and transmitted by Christians (De Jonge 2003; Davila 2005).

The emergence of Christian scriptures

The beginnings of Christian literature are no longer traceable. Although scholars have assumed that New Testament letters include quotations of prayers, hymns, creeds and other liturgical materials

(e.g. 1 Cor. 15:3–5; Gal. 3:28; Phil. 2:6–11), it is hard to evaluate whether these circulated in a written or only in an oral form. In the case of the New Testament Gospels, their literary interdependence is evident, and the majority view of Marcan priority seems to be the least problematic of all proposed theories. How much Mark and the compiler of an early collection of Jesus' sayings ('Q') had written traditions of Jesus at their disposal and how much they relied on orally transmitted stories, is not easy to determine.

It is also hard to determine how and when New Testament texts became scripture for there is no documentation of the early stages. On the one hand, Matthew and Luke use Mark and Q freely, modifying and reorganizing their contents as they wish. On the other, the sheer fact that both later Gospel writers used Mark and Q independently and most probably in different geographical locations, suggests that these two earlier texts circulated widely and were publicly read (Smith 2000: 10). Each evangelist intended to write a complete account of Jesus' words and deeds – they did not think that their Gospels were just one part in a series of four (Kyrtatas 2010: 36). Matthew and Luke probably composed their Gospels to supersede Mark and Q which they found inadequate, and several scholars assume that John's Gospel shows the tendency to surpass the synoptic Gospels. All this indicates that the Gospel writers did not acknowledge the work of their peers as scripture.

The authors of New Testament letters were even less likely to think that what they produced were sacred texts. Paul certainly emphasized his authority in many of his letters and expected that his written instructions were received as authoritative. Even though he thinks highly of his own words, however, he makes a difference between them and the words of the Lord (1 Corinthians 7), the latter ranking no doubt higher than the former. Neither Paul nor any other New Testament letter or Gospel writer appeals to their own divine inspiration when composing the text. The only book where such a claim is made is the book of Revelation (Rev. 1:3, 10–11; 22:7–19; Nicklas 2010).

Both Paul's letters and the Gospels began to circulate widely early on and were soon cited as scripture. The earliest references to Paul's letters as scripture appear in the early second century. For example, 2 Peter explicitly juxtaposes Paul's letters with 'other scriptures (graphai)' (3:16), and 1 Clement shows that Paul's letter to the Corinthians functions as scripture to him and claims that Paul wrote it 'in spirit' (47.3). At the end of the second century, Irenaeus lists as authoritative all that which 'the prophets announced, the Lord taught, and the apostles delivered' (Haer. 1.8.1). However, Irenaeus and other early Christian authors also knew of texts that either they themselves or some other Christians regarded as authoritative. In the following, we survey different types of early Christian literature, some of which later became canonical and some of which were left outside.

Letters of Paul

Paul's letters (to Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, Thessalonians and to Philemon) were typically addressed to guide and instruct the local congregation he had founded. Exceptions to this are the letter to the Romans, which was written to a community Paul neither found nor knew very well, and the short letter to Philemon, which is addressed to an individual slave owner. Paul's letters were occasional, that is, they dealt with specific issues in specific communities (Baynes 2010: 96–97), but especially the longer letters such as Romans or 1 Corinthians were carefully composed. The extant letters imply that Paul dictated his letters to a scribe, who wrote them down (Rom. 16:22; cf. 1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 5:11; Phlm. 19; Gamble 1995: 95–96). Composing such long letters must have taken time and was likely based on notes and drafts.

In his lifetime, Paul's teaching was not universally accepted and the letters show that he had to struggle for his authority as an apostle. Soon, however, he gained a highly esteemed reputation. An obvious sign of this is the fact that several pseudonymous letters were penned in his name, many of which ended up in the New Testament (Colossians, Ephesians, 2 Thessalonians and the so-called pastoral epistles: 1–2 Timothy and Titus). Whatever their origin, most of them were universally accepted as Paul's letters; there is no trace that their authenticity was questioned in antiquity. The status of the pastoral epistles may have been an exception as they are missing from some manuscripts. They seem to be the last ones to have been included in the expanding collection of Paul's letters, perhaps simply because they were the last ones to emerge.

Paul's letters were addressed to the whole community and they were meant to be read out loud. This was the case even for the letters to individuals; even though the letter to Philemon is written in second person singular, the greetings at the beginning and end of the letter are in plural. Paul himself probably encouraged the circulation of his letters to other Christian communities. Exchange of letters between Colossae and Laodicea is anticipated in Colossians (3:16), but this may be a fictitious trait since most scholars question Paul's authorship of this letter. Whatever Paul's own role was in the process, his letters were collected and circulated early on. Collecting letters involved editorial activity; someone had to choose what letters to include and in which order (Pervo 2010: 25–30). In the case of Paul, there were several different versions of the Pauline corpus which varied both in regard to contents and to arrangement (Gamble 1995: 58–62, 95–101).

Not all the letters Paul wrote survived. 1 Corinthians refers to a wider correspondence between Paul and the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 5:9; 7:1; 2 Cor. 2:4) and he must have written many other letters, too. It is also possible that some of the surviving letters (2 Corinthians, Philippians) are compilations from earlier ones (Pervo 2010: 38–46). If such editing of Paul's letters took place, it happened early, since there are no manuscripts containing any of the alleged earlier letters. On the other hand, the manuscript evidence shows that editors of the letter collections and copyists felt free to alter the text in several ways. One of their tendencies has to do with the problem of particularity: sometimes the information about the addressees and localities were either omitted or changed to make a letter more universal (Pervo 2010: 30–38).

Paul's letters were well received among most Christian circles. There are several references to them in second-century sources. 2 Peter and 1 Clement were already mentioned earlier. In addition, in the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs, which purportedly describes the trial of twelve Christians in North Africa in 180, one of the accused Christians carries 'books and epistles of Paul, a just man' with him. There are several allusions to Paul's letters in texts found in Nag Hammadi that stem from Valentinus and his followers, such as the Gospel of Truth, which may originate in the second century (Dunderberg 2015: 149–168). Marcion likewise esteemed Paul. His collection contained ten letters, excluding the pastoral epistles – perhaps because they did not exist yet (BeDuhn 2013: 203–228). Hebrews was often placed in the Pauline collection, especially in the East, even though its Pauline authorship was already doubted in antiquity (cf. Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.25.11–14; Rothschild 2009). Amphilochius, the bishop of Iconium, at the end of the fourth century, refers to such doubts in writing that those who say Hebrews is spurious are 'not saying well, for the grace is genuine' (Metzger 1987: 212–213, 314). With the inclusion of Hebrews, the Pauline collection contained a total of fourteen letters, which was twice the number seven, a symbol of perfection (Pervo 2010: 37).

Even though the extent of Paul's collected letters varied, the authority of the apostle, conveyed in the letters, was not called into question. Struggles around Paul continued, but the struggle was not so much about whether to accept or dismiss his letters as about who were the rightful interpreters of them (Bird and Dodson 2011; Lehtipuu 2015: 86–94). For example, Irenaeus declares himself to represent the same truth as the apostle, while his rivals deviated from it. In his view, it was necessary to:

> [e]xplain the apostle and make clear what the heretics who have altogether misunderstood what Paul has said have interpreted differently and to show their foolish senselessness; and to demonstrate from that same Paul, from whose [writings] they press questions upon us, that they are liars and that the apostle was a preacher of the truth and that everything he taught was in accord with the proclamation of the truth.
>
> (Haer. 4.41.4, trans. Roberts-Rambaut)

Paul's authority was also invoked in several other letters ascribed to him (Gregory 2015). A Letter to the Laodiceans was composed to provide the readers with the otherwise unknown (and possibly fictive?) letter referred to in Colossians (4:16). The letter, extant in Latin, closely resembles other Pauline letters, especially Philippians. Several early Christian sources mention the letter, but it is not certain if all of them refer to the Latin text known to us. According to Tertullian (Marc. 5.11.12), Marcion used the name Laodiceans for the letter to the Ephesians and he may not have been the only one. Moreover, the reference in Colossians may have inspired several writers to compose letters by that name. The Letter to the Laodiceans is found in some Western Latin Bibles, such as the sixth-century Codex Fuldensis where the letter is placed after Colossians (Tite 2012).

Another apocryphal letter ascribed to Paul is 3 Corinthians. The letter circulated both as part of the Acts of Paul and independently. In some manuscripts, it bears a title 'Paul to the Corinthians concerning the flesh'. The letter presents itself as Paul's response to an inquiry sent to him by Corinthians. The letter takes a stance in relation to several hotly disputed tenets, such as creation, resurrection and the true humanity of Christ (Webster 2012). 3 Corinthians is a good example of the fluidity of categories such as 'canonical' and 'apocryphal' for it belonged to the Armenian canon until the nineteenth century, placed after 1 and 2 Corinthians and before Galatians (Hovhanessian 2012).

At the end of the fourth century, Jerome mentions a correspondence between Paul and Seneca that was 'very widely read' (Vir. ill. 12.1.) While Jerome took these letters as authentic, their style and contents show that they are later forgeries; some of the letters are even later than others (Pervo 2010: 110–116; Ramelli 2014). Since Jerome does not cite from the letters, it is not quite clear whether the extant Latin texts correspond to those he knew. The alleged correspondence with Paul is the reason why Jerome, somewhat reluctantly, counts Seneca among his list of 'illustrious men'. Neither Jerome nor any other source makes a claim that these letters of Paul should be acknowledged as scripture.

Gospels

Very little is known about the origins and early circulation of the New Testament Gospels. We do not even have secured answers to very basic questions such as who wrote them, where and to whom. All we can say is that they apparently circulated widely and were highly esteemed from the beginning. This early evidence includes juxtaposing Gospels with the law and the prophets (Ignatius, Smyrn. 5.1), introducing a Gospel passage with the scriptural formula 'it is written' (Barn. 4.14 with reference to Matt. 22:14) and calling a Gospel passage 'scripture' (graphē; 2 Clem. 2.4).

It is evident that the New Testament Gospels were partly based on earlier written materials. Memories related to Jesus circulated orally but were also grouped together in smaller collections in writing (Schröter 2013: 84–88). Written sources have been postulated even behind the earliest Gospel, that of Mark, and both the preface to Luke's Gospel and the closing of John's Gospel attest to the existence of several early accounts of Jesus' words and deeds (Luke 1:1–4; John 21:25). It was particularly the words of Jesus to which early Christ-followers accorded special authority (Puig i Tàrrech 2016). The earliest reminiscences of Jesus' teaching are found in the letters of Paul, written before the composition of the Gospels. Sometimes, albeit rather infrequently, Paul quotes 'the word of the Lord' (e.g. 1 Cor. 7:10–11; 9:14; 11:23–25), which probably refers to Paul's received tradition. Another source for receiving the Lord's words, however, was direct revelation in prayer or ecstasy (cf. 2 Cor. 12:3–4, 8–9).

Several second-century texts also reflect how Jesus' sayings were used as authority in instruction and polemic. While many of these references resemble passages in the New Testament Gospels, it is not always possible to say whether authors who quoted them knew them as part of a written text or whether they were relying on oral tradition (see, e.g. 1 Clem. 3.1–2; 46.8; Did. 8.2; Ptolemy, Flor. 3.5–8). These early references also show that Jesus' words began to function as scripture early on (McDonald 2007: 271–273) – perhaps already before they were written down. Interestingly, second- and third-century authors sometimes quote Jesus' words that do not appear in the New Testament Gospels (e.g. Irenaeus, Haer. 5.33.3–4; Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 5.10.63; Origen, Comm. Matt. 13.2; cf. Acts 20:35). These agrapha, sayings ascribed to Jesus that do not appear in the New Testament Gospels, are sometimes identified as part of a Gospel, but some of them might have been known in oral form only (Frey 2015: 18–19).

The Gospels were composed as authoritative guides for Christian communities to be read aloud alongside Jewish scriptures. In this regard they were well received. The earliest reference to such practice is offered by Justin Martyr at around the middle of the second century, that is, only about half a century after the completion of the New Testament Gospels. Justin talks about reading the 'memoirs of the apostles' and the writings of the prophets in Sunday gatherings (1 Apol. 67.3). However, not all churches accepted all Gospels. For a long time, several communities preferred to use one Gospel only (Kyrtatas 2010: 36–37). The most popular seems to have been the Gospel of Matthew, but Marcion notoriously only accepted his own version of the Gospel of Luke, whereas in Syria priority was given to Tatian's Diatessaron, a harmonization of the four Gospels. Moreover, some anti-Montanist writers were reserved towards the Gospel of John or even rejected it because it gave a scriptural basis for the Montanist teaching of the Paraclete (Metzger 1987: 104–105, 150), and some early Christians were skeptical about the attribution of this Gospel to the apostle John.

The first author to clearly refer to a fourfold Gospel tradition is Irenaeus, the bishop of Lyons at the end of the second century. In a polemical passage he argues that there must be four Gospels, not more nor less as 'heretics' claim, just as there are four winds and four zones of the world (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.11.8). Irenaeus also links the four Gospels with the four living creatures in the book of Revelation (Rev. 4:7), which had a lasting impact on Christian art. Some scholars assume that the number of accepted Gospels was still debated and take Irenaeus' argumentation as an innovation, while others see it as defence of a traditional position against those who want to either widen or narrow the number of recognized Gospels (Gamble 2002: 280). Be that as it may, it is clear that the fourfold Gospel became established in the second century. Other authors who bear witness to a collection of the four Gospels include Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 3.93.1) and Origen (Hom. Luc. 1.2). Moreover, the earliest manuscript containing all four Gospels and the book of Acts (P[45]) goes back to the first half of the third century, and Tatian's Gospel harmony, composed in the latter half of the second century, also presupposes a fourfold Gospel tradition (Balla 2002: 379).

The four New Testament Gospels by no means exhaust the number of early Christian Gospels (Schröter 2016). Several other Gospels are known either through references to them in patristic sources or through manuscript finds. Despite some attempts to give an approximate number of extracanonical Gospels (Baynes 2010: 94 referring to Charles Hedrick), any estimate remains conjectural, for several reasons. First, it is possible that several Gospels circulated under the same name. Thus, it is not clear whether the Gospel of Judas and the Gospel of Truth, to which Irenaeus refers (Haer. 1.31.1; 3.11.9), were the same texts as those now extant in Codex Tchacos and Nag Hammadi Codex I. The only quotation of the Gospel of Philip in Epiphanius (Pan. 6.13.2–3) does not belong to the Coptic Gospel of Philip (NHC II,3; Hartenstein 2009). Second, sometimes the references may be confused or there are other reasons to doubt the existence of a particular Gospel. For example, it is uncertain whether the Gospel of the Hebrews and the Gospel of the Nazarenes, traditionally counted as separate Jewish-Christian works, were distinct from each other (Luomanen 2012: 83–144). A hotly debated text is the so-called Secret Gospel of Mark, which some scholars consider a modern forgery (Burke 2013). Third, it is not always easy to define which texts should be counted as Gospels. The title 'Gospel' was given to a variety of texts, many of which do not resemble the New Testament Gospels at all. For example, the Gospel of Mary recounts a dialogue with the risen Christ and Mary (who is most likely to be identified with Mary Magdalene; King 2003: 148), but most texts of the same genre do not bear a name of a Gospel (such as Epistula Apostolorum, the Dialogue of the Saviour, the Apocalypse of James, the Book of Thomas, the Apocryphon of John and many others; Frey 2015: 35–37).

Ancient Gospels can be classified in different ways (Miller 2010; Ehrman and Pleše 2014; Frey 2015). One is to group them according to how they have survived: (1) Gospels that are known only through references or quotations in ancient sources (in addition to Jewish-Christian Gospels these include, e.g. the Gospel of the Egyptians, which is quoted – and rejected – by Clement of Alexandria and also mentioned by some other early Christian writers); (2) Gospel fragments (such as the Egerton gospel, which consists of fragments of papyrus codex of an otherwise unknown gospel); and (3) Gospel manuscripts. Most of the texts in the last category have also survived only partially, but in contrast to the second group these are texts that can be identified.

Another way of grouping the Gospels is according to genre. Typically, three different Gospel types have been identified: narrative Gospels, sayings Gospels and dialogue Gospels. The more fragmentary a text is, the more difficult it is to classify it into any of these types. Apart from different infancy Gospels, which comprise stories about Jesus' birth and childhood (on these, see Chapter 37 in this work), and the relatively late Gospel of Nicodemus (also known as Acts of Pilate), which describes Christ's 'harrowing of hell' between his death and resurrection, not many texts stand close to the category of narrative Gospels and very few, if any, of them narrate more than just one phase of Jesus' life. The surviving part of the Gospel of Peter only includes the passion narrative, but may have included other sections too (Foster 2010; Henderson 2011).

More typically, several Gospels focus on Jesus' teaching. Perhaps the most significant of them all is the Gospel of Thomas, not least because of its good claim for antiquity. The text is known partially in Greek (three papyrus fragments found at Oxyrhynchus) and almost completely in Coptic (Nag Hammadi Codex II,2). It is a collection of 114 sayings of Jesus, usually introduced by a simple formula 'Jesus said' but sometimes containing a short dialogue between Jesus and his disciples. Some of the sayings have a close parallel in the synoptic material, but others differ significantly from anything Jesus says in the canonical Gospels. Scholars have both considered Thomas to be earlier than the synoptic Gospels, introducing a more 'authentic' Jesus (Patterson 2014), and deemed it a later text, dependent on the synoptic tradition (Gathercole 2012; Goodacre 2012), but independent of John's Gospel (Dunderberg 2006). Despite its name, the Gospel of Philip (NHC II,3) provides neither a story about Jesus nor a collection of his sayings; it is rather a collection of early Christian teachings, probably derived from various sources (Turner 1997; Heimola 2011: 28–34).

The dialogue Gospels focus on Jesus' conversation with one or more of his disciples. While this type of Gospel usually does not contain narratives about Jesus' miracles or other deeds, it often provides more context to Jesus' teaching than the sayings Gospels. Typically, the dialogue is set to post-Easter time and occurs between the risen Jesus and his disciple(s) who receives a special revelation not intended for everyone. The newly discovered Gospel of Judas is also a dialogue Gospel, even though the events described in it take place shortly before Jesus' death. Judas, the receiver of Jesus' message, is set apart from the other disciples – a feature the text has in common with the New Testament Gospels. What is different from the New Testament Gospels is that Judas fares better than the other, totally ignorant disciples. Scholarly opinion is divided over whether Judas is seen as a positive figure or whether he is evaluated negatively after all (Scopello 2008; DeConick 2009).

Other texts: acts and letters of the apostles, apocalypses

There is very little ancient evidence about the early transmission and circulation of the Acts of the Apostles. Acts is recognized as a sequel to Luke's Gospel in several early sources (the Muratorian fragment; Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.25.14) but the two never appear one after the other in manuscripts or in canon lists. This indicates that they were perceived as two distinct works early on (cf. Acts 1:1) and that they were not copied together (Gregory 2003). It may also imply that the fourfold Gospel tradition was established early. Even though the sequence of the four Gospels vary in different manuscripts – the order Matthew, John, Luke, Mark was popular especially in the west – there is only one known source where Luke's Gospel is placed as the last one of the four Gospels (the so-called Mommsen catalogue; McDonald 2007: 387) and even here it is not followed by Acts.

Despite its name, the Acts of the Apostles offers very little information on most of the apostles – especially if 'apostles' are taken in the Lukan sense to denote the twelve disciples only. This shortage of information may be one of the reasons for the appearance of several works on the deeds and often also on the deaths of various apostles (Klauck 2008; Pervo 2015). Five major apocryphal acts of apostles, describing the adventures of Peter, Paul, John, Andrew and Thomas respectively, are generally dated to the second and third centuries and also other acts are known (e.g. Acts of Philip, Acts of Bartholomew, or Acts of Xantippe, Polyxena and Rebecca). Even though these narratives are similar to Hellenistic novels and could thus be treated as imaginative literature (see Chapter 37 in this work), there is evidence that they were taken seriously among early Christians. For example, Hippolytus of Rome refers to Paul's encounter with a lion, reminiscent of a scene in the Acts of Paul (Comm. Dan. 3.29), Tertullian reproves women who teach and baptize according to the example of Thecla (Bapt. 17.4–5) and many of the accounts, particularly of the apostles' deaths as martyrs, were used in liturgical commemoration all through the Middle Ages (Rose 2009: 23–78).

The canonical book of Acts is often linked in manuscripts with the so-called catholic letters – pseudonymous writings ascribed to Peter, James, John and Jude (Grünstäudel 2016). Despite being called epistles, they are rather theological expositions than actual letters. The designation 'catholic' or 'general' denotes that they are 'universal' in the sense that they do not have specific communities or individuals as their addressees like the Pauline letters have. Exceptions to this rule are 2 and 3 John, the first of which is addressed to the 'elect lady' (perhaps meaning the church itself?) and the latter to a certain Gaius. The epistles were already called 'catholic' by Eusebius in the fourth century (Hist. eccl. 2.23.25) who knew seven of them, presumably the seven later included in the New Testament canon. Eusebius also relates that the letters of James and Jude were disputed because 'few of the ancients quote them', and reports Origen's uncertainty about the two short epistles attributed to John (Hist. eccl. 6.25.10). Jude was known and used by the author of 2 Peter but otherwise it is rarely cited, as is also the case with most of the other catholic letters, too, apart from 1 John and 1 Peter. The latter two are frequently mentioned in early lists of accepted texts, while the other letters appear only occasionally in them. While it is no coincidence that the letters eventually numbered seven, the collection was not fixed early, and this means that the extent of the canon remained unclear for a long time (Gamble 2002: 287–288). As we have seen, the great codices of the fourth and fifth centuries contain a greater number of letters, Barnabas in Sinaiticus and 1–2 Clement in Alexandrinus. These, however, are placed after Revelation and not as part of the catholic letter collection. These and other early letters, such as the epistles of Ignatius, show that the letter format was a popular way of conveying early Christian teaching. Some examples are also found among Nag Hammadi texts, such as the Treatise on the Resurrection (also called Letter to Rheginos, NHC I,4) and the Letter of Peter to Philip (NHC VIII,2).

Early Christians also produced apocalyptic literature. This genre was popular both among Jews and Christians and any borderline between apocalyptic texts of Jewish provenance on the one hand and Christian on the other is artificial (Bauckham 2015). Christians cherished and transmitted many Jewish apocalypses, for example, the originally Jewish Fourth Ezra is best known (with Christian additions) as 2 Esdras in an appendix of the Vulgate New Testament (where it was called 4 Esdras; Knibb 2008: 173). The Revelation of John seems to have enjoyed wide popularity at first, especially among chiliasts (such as Justin Martyr, Irenaeus and Tertullian) – but later it became disputed expressly for its millenarian ideas and its popularity among Montanists (Metzger 1987: 104–105). In a letter from around the middle of the third century preserved by Eusebius, Dionysius, the bishop of Alexandria, tells that some claimed Revelation was written by Cerinthus to promote the belief in the earthly reign of Christ and hence rejected it. For his part, Dionysius writes:

> But I could not venture to reject the book, as many brethren hold it in high esteem. But I suppose that it is beyond my comprehension, and that there is a certain concealed and more wonderful meaning in every part. For if I do not understand I suspect that a deeper sense lies beneath the words.
>
> (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 7.25.2–4)

Other popular apocalypses included the Apocalypse of Peter and the Shepherd of Hermas. Both are mentioned in the Muratorian fragment whose composer accepts the Apocalypse of Peter along with the Apocalypse of John but admits that not all allow its reading publicly. The list also treats the Shepherd approvingly but wants to limit its use to private settings because it has been written recently and, hence, does not belong to the authoritative texts of the apostolic age. However, the manuscript tradition shows an opposite tendency: there are no examples where the Apocalypse of Peter is copied together with other New Testament texts, while the Shepherd belongs to the New Testament canon of Codex Sinaiticus. Moreover, Irenaeus treats the Shepherd as scripture, quoting it with an introduction 'well said the scripture' (Haer. 4.20.2; cf. Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 5.8.7) and Clement of Alexandria holds it in high esteem (Batovici 2013). Only in the fourth century do writers such as Eusebius and Athanasius show more ambivalence towards it, perhaps because it had become too popular with groups that those in power wanted to exclude (Nielsen 2012: 166).

Who read and used early Christian scriptures?

Scripture is not only about texts, it is very much about people and communities who grant the authoritative status of scripture to certain texts (Brakke 1994: 417; Brooke 2005: 99). Even though literacy was thinly spread in antiquity, acquaintance with scriptures was much wider, for texts were normally read out aloud (Gamble 1995: 2–10) and scriptures enjoyed a central place in community gatherings early on. On the other hand, the role and function of scripture in ancient Jewish and Christian communities should not be overemphasized. The primarily oral culture of late antiquity differed from the bookish, academic culture of present-day scholars, which tends to give texts a constitutive role for identity formation. It is likely that other factors, such as rituals, homilies and sacred spaces were at least as important in the life of early Christians (Stern 2012: 15–30; Nicklas 2016).

Liturgical setting was crucial for the selection of scripture; in several fourth-century sources, a distinction is made between texts that are acceptable for public reading and other texts, some of which are approved for other than public use and some of which are rejected. Which texts belonged to which group, varied. Eusebius, for example, reports different opinions concerning Revelation (Hist. eccl. 3.25.2, 4) and lists disputed writings that 'are read publicly by many in most churches' (3.31.6). He also tells about the intriguing case of the Gospel of Peter and its fate in the Christian community of Rhossus at the turn of the third century. According to a letter of Serapion, the bishop of Antioch, he first approved of the reading of the Gospel of Peter, a text previously unknown to him. Later, however, he learned that some community members had come to entertain ideas which he deemed heretical. This prompted him to familiarize himself with the text after which he denounced it for containing false teachings and being falsely ascribed to Peter and rejected it (Hist. eccl. 6.12.3–6).

Public reading in a liturgical setting was not the only context where scriptures were read. Texts were also used for private edification, sometimes also for entertainment (Gamble 1995: 231–237; Bovon 2015). Private reading took many forms. For example, in addition to approved canonized (kanonizomena) and dismissed apocryphal texts (apokrypha), Athanasius of Alexandria also lists other books which are not included in the canon but which one can – and should – read. These texts include the Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Esther, Judith, Tobit, the Didache, and the Shepherd of Hermas, which Athanasius recommends particularly for cathecumens (Ep. fest. 39). In all likelihood, this kind of 'private' reading still took place in ecclesiastical communities. On the other hand, homilies and theological treatises contain exhortations to read scriptures at home, which reveals that the addressees were the literate elite, few in number. Another important context for reading and interpreting scriptures was formed by study circles or schools gathered around a teacher figure, such as Justin Martyr and Valentinus in Rome, and Clement and Origen in Alexandria. It is likely that these intellectual Christians were not particularly eager to delineate scripture closely, 'for one who knows how to search properly may find the truth in almost any document' (Brakke 2012: 403).

Naturally, at least some of the texts that authors such as Eusebius or Athanasius rejected as apocryphal and heretical were also written for a readership. Who read these texts and did they regard them as scripture? Judging by the hostile reports of some patristic writers, we can conclude that these texts were deemed authoritative by their readers. For example, Tertullian disapproves of women who follow 'the example of Thecla' (Bapt. 17.4–5), which indicates that these women knew the Acts of Paul and Thecla and, unlike Tertullian, highly esteemed it. Clement of Alexandria polemicizes against Julius Cassianus and other ascetic teachers who used the Gospel of the Egyptians to justify their encratite views (Strom. 3.9.63–66; 3.13.91–93). What remains unclear, however, is what other texts Cassianus and others read besides the Gospel of the Egyptians. Was this Gospel meant to complement or to replace other texts, such as the canonical Gospels (cf. Hurtado 2015)? The question related to the possible readership of such texts is virtually impossible to answer since most of these rejected texts now stand so completely out of context. Most of them are known only through one or very few manuscripts in later translations. We do not know who produced them and to whom, or how they were used and transmitted. Sometimes it is not even certain where the manuscript was found.

Interestingly, some texts are explicitly entitled apocrypha, that is, 'secret books' (e.g. the Apocryphon of John; the Apocryphon of James). Others open with an emphasis on secrecy: 'These are the secret sayings which the living Jesus spoke' (Gospel of Thomas) or 'The secret account of the revelation that Jesus spoke in conversation with Judas Iscariot' (Gospel of Judas). This evokes an impression that such texts were not meant for public reading, but were intended for those who were more advanced in their faith. Such a scenario does not have to imply esoteric, secretive communities but a basic division between newcomers and those who have progressed further in faith and learning. A fascinating point of comparison is offered by Athanasius who recommends non-canonized texts expressly for newcomers.

Texts were also used as ritual artefacts (Uro 2013). The notion of holiness in relation to scripture gave rise to the magical use of scriptural texts (Bremmer 2010: 352). More than twenty late antique amulets written on papyrus or parchment with excerpts of New Testament texts have been found (Jones 2016). In addition, amulets were written on wooden tablets and ostraca. They may have had ritual functions in invoking the divine for healing or other favours, or they may have been worn for protection, or both.

Concluding remarks: canon formation as part of inter-Christian polemics

Our discussion has shown that the question of what constituted scripture in early Christianity is broader than tracing the development of the canon of the Christian Bible. Even though the scriptural status of certain central compositions (e.g. Torah and the prophets, Paul's letters) is an early phenomenon, the explicit canonization of scripture happened much later. Several catalogues listing recognized (homologoumena) or canonized (kanonizomena, endiathēka) texts appear in the fourth century (Hahnemann 2002: 412–415; McDonald 2007: 445–450). These lists show simultaneously a wide agreement and considerable variation: while most of the texts listed are the same, none of the earliest lists are exactly identical. Determining what texts should be regarded as authoritative and rejecting others was closely linked with struggles over what constituted true Christianity. Several of the lists contain explicit polemics against groups that were deemed heretical. Thus, the Muratorian fragment (which some scholars date to the end of the second century, while others argue for a fourth-century date; cf. Hahnemann 2002; Verheyden 2003) is aimed 'against Marcion's heresy', and Eusebius and Athanasius wish to distance themselves from 'the inventions of heretics' (Hist. eccl. 3.25.7; Ep. fest. 39).

It is customary to speak about criteria of canonicity according to which texts were either accepted or rejected. Such parlance easily entails a false impression as if a council or a committee scrutinized each text and decided its status. In reality, most of the texts that became included in the canon already enjoyed a scriptural status when debates over the inclusion and exclusion of texts intensified in the fourth century. Different authors appealed to different criteria, such as apostolicity, antiquity and catholicity, but all of these were far from absolute. A text's claim to apostolicity did not suffice; for example, the Gospel of Thomas, supposedly written down by the disciple Didymos Judas Thomas (Gos. Thom. 1), was not accepted, and charges of forgery were made against several texts that went under the name of an apostle. On the other hand, texts written by alleged companions of apostles (Mark, Luke) were included, as well as others of unclear authorship (Hebrews). Similarly, while antiquity was taken as a guarantee of apostolic origin, it is clear that some texts included in the canon (2 Peter) are later than some that were excluded (1 Clement). The criterion of catholicity was also flexible, as the variety in the lists of canonical books shows (McDonald 2007: 433). There is very little evidence of any wide use of texts such as Philemon, 2 Peter, Jude, 2 and 3 John – both in antiquity and in the present (Nielsen 2012: 164–165). It seems, then, that what mattered in the end was whether a text was considered to represent orthodoxy – and here opinion was sometimes divided. Moreover, 'orthodoxy' was not a monolith but included an array of ideas, as the different emphases of accepted texts show (Baynes 2010: 93). In many cases, discussions about the limits of the canon were reactions to already existing situations, and their main purpose was to restrict the use of texts deemed inappropriate (Schröter 2013: 335).

The discussion about the exclusion and inclusion of texts in the canon almost exclusively concerned New Testament texts. The Christian Old Testament consisted of the available Greek translations of Jewish scriptures. The Torah was translated into Greek as early as the third century BCE, further emphasizing its early importance, other compositions only gradually during the following centuries. Rabbinic Judaism abandoned the Greek translation in the second century CE whereas Christians continued to use it as their scripture (Aejmelaeus 2012).

The role of the community was essential in the canonical process. Texts, whatever claims they make, need people to authorize and canonize them. And although 'canon' as a social construct can gain elevated status and thus legitimacy, its actual power to influence communities is pragmatic and tested in practice. The interrelatedness of authority, legitimacy and power is reflected in the problem of 'canon inside the canon', where, after the closure of the canon, certain texts end up having more actual power and importance than others. It seems that inside the canonical collection the actual authoritative status of a text can change over time, although its legitimacy as a canonized text remains the same. Another important factor has to do with interpreting texts: both before and after the closure of the canon, the interpretation often ends up having more actual power than the 'authoritative' source text as such.

Bibliography

Aejmelaeus, A. (2012) 'Die Septuaginta als Kanon', in Becker, E.-M. and Scholz, S. (eds) Kanon in Konstruktion und Dekonstruktion. Kanonisierungprozesse religiöser Texte von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart: Ein Handbuch. Berlin: De Gruyter, 315–327.

Albl, M. C. (1999) 'And Scripture Cannot Be Broken': The Form and Function of the Early Christian Testimonia Collections. NTSup 96. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Balla, P. (2002) 'Evidence for a New Testament canon (second and third century)', in McDonald, L. M. and Sanders, J. A. (eds) The Canon Debate. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 372–385.

Batovici, D. (2013) 'Hermas in Clement of Alexandria', in Vinzent, M. (ed.) Studia Patristica 66, 14. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters, 41–51.

Bauckham, R. (2015) 'Non-canonical apocalypses and prophetic works', in Gregory, A. and Tuckett, C. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Apocrypha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 115–137.

Baynes, L. (2010) 'The canons of the New Testament', in Aune, D. E. (ed.) The Blackwell Companion to the New Testament. Oxford, UK: Wiley Blackwell, 90–100.

BeDuhn, J. D. (2013) The First New Testament: Marcion's Scriptural Canon. Salem, OR: Polebridge.

Berthelot, K. (2006) '4QMMT et la question du canon de la Bible hébraïque', in García Martínez, F. et al. (eds) From 4QMMT to Resurrection: Mélanges qumraniens en hommage à Émile Puech. STDJ 61. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1–14.

Bird, M. F. and Dodson, J. R. (eds) (2011) Paul and the Second Century. LNTS 412. London: Continuum.

Bovon, F. (2015) '"Useful for the soul": Christian apocrypha and Christian spirituality', in Gregory, A. and Tuckett, C. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Apocrypha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 185–195.

Brakke, D. (1994) 'Canon formation and social conflict in fourth-century Egypt: Athanasius of Alexandria's thirty-ninth festal letter', Harvard Theological Review 87(4): 395–419.

Brakke, D. (2012) 'Scriptural practices in early Christianity: Towards a new history of the New Testament canon', in Ulrich, J., Jacobsen, A.-C. and Brakke, D. (eds) Invention, Rewriting, Usurpation: Discursive Fights over Religious Traditions in Antiquity. Early Christianity in the Context of Antiquity 11. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 263–280.

Bremmer, J. N. (2010) 'From holy books to Holy Bible: An itinerary from ancient Greece to modern Islam via Second Temple Judaism and early Christianity', in Popović, M. (ed.) Authoritative Scriptures in Ancient Judaism. JSJSup 141. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 327–360.

Brooke, G. J. (1997) '"The canon within the canon" at Qumran and in the New Testament', in Porter, S. E. and Evans, C. E. (eds) The Scrolls and the Scriptures: Qumran Fifty Years After. JSPSup 26; Roehampton Institute London Papers 3. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 242–266.

Brooke, G. J. (2005) 'Between canon and authority: The significance of reworking the Bible for understanding the canonical process', in Chazon, E. G. et al. (eds) Reworking the Bible: Apocryphal and Related Texts at Qumran. Proceedings of a Joint Symposium by the Orion Center for the Study of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Associated Literature and the Hebrew University Institute for Advanced Studies Research Group on Qumran, 15–17 January, 2002. STDJ 58. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 85–104.

Brooke, G. J. (2007) '"Canon" in the light of the Qumran Scrolls', in Alexander, P. S. and Kaestli, J.-D. (eds) The Canon of Scripture in Jewish and Christian Tradition. Publications de l'Institut Romand des Sciences Bibliques 4; Lausannne, Switzerland: Éditions du Zèbre, 81–98.

Burke, T. (ed.) (2013) Ancient Gospel or Modern Forgery: The Secret Gospel of Mark in Debate. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.

Charlesworth, J. H. (2012) 'Ruminating on the canonical process in light of a Bodmer Papyrus anthology (p72)', in McDonald, L. M. and Charlesworth, J. H. (eds) 'Non-canonical' Religious Texts in Early Judaism and Early Christianity. Jewish and Christian Texts 14. London: T&T Clark, 103–115.

Davila, J. R. (2005) The Provenance of the Pseudepigraph: Jewish, Christian, or Other? Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

DeConick, A. (ed.) (2009) The Codex Judas Papers: Proceedings of the International Congress on the Tchacos Codex held at Rice University, Houston, Texas, March 13–16, 2008. Nag Hammadi and Manichean Studies 71. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

De Jonge, M. (2003) 'The authority of the "Old Testament" in the early church: The witness of the "Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament"', in Auwers, M. and De Jonge, H. J. (eds) The Biblical Canons. BETL 63. Leuven, Belgium: Leuven University Press, 459–486.

Dunderberg, I. (2006) Beloved Disciple in Conflict? Revisiting the Gospels of John and Thomas. New York: Oxford University Press.

Dunderberg, I. (2015) Gnostic Morality Revisited. WUNT 347. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Ehrman, B. D. and Pleše, Z. (2014) The Other Gospels: Accounts of Jesus from outside the New Testament. New York: Oxford University Press.

Evans, C. A. (2002) 'The scriptures of Jesus and His earliest followers', in McDonald, L. M. and Sanders, J. A. (eds) The Canon Debate. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 185–195.

Foster, P. (2010) The Gospel of Peter: Introduction, Critical Edition, and Commentary: Texts and Editions of New Testament Study. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Frey, J. (2015) 'Texts about Jesus: Non-canonical gospels and related literature', in Gregory, A. and Tuckett, C. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Apocrypha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 13–47.

Gamble, H. Y. (2002) 'The New Testament canon: Recent research and status quaestionis', in McDonald, L. M. and Sanders, J. A. (eds) The Canon Debate. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 267–294.

Gamble, H. Y. (1995) Books and Readers in the Early Church: A History of Early Christian Texts. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Gathercole, S. (2012) The Composition of the Gospel of Thomas: Original Language and Influences. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Goodacre, M. (2012) Thomas and the Gospels: The Case of Thomas's Familiarity with the Synoptics. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmanns.

Gregory, A. (2003) The Reception of Luke and Acts in the Period before Irenaeus: Looking for Luke in the Second Century. WUNT 2. Reihe 169. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Gregory, A. (2015) 'Non-canonical epistles and related literature', in Gregory, A. and Tuckett, C. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Apocrypha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 90–114.

Grünstäudel, W. (2016) 'Was lange währt . . . : Die katholischen Briefe und die Formung des neutestamentlichen Kanons', Early Christianity 7: 71–94.

Hahnemann, G. M. (2002) 'The Muratorian fragment and the origins of the New Testament canon', in McDonald, L. M. and Sanders, J. A. (eds) The Canon Debate. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 405–415.

Hartenstein, J. (2009) 'Spekulationen über ein altes Philippusevangelium', Zeitschrift für antikes Chrstentum 13: 62–75.

Heimola, M. (2011) Christian Identity in the Gospel of Philip. Helsinki, Finland: The Finnish Exegetical Society.

Henderson, T. P. (2011) The Gospel of Peter and Early Christian Apologetics. WUNT, 2. Reihe, 301. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Hovhanessian, V. S. (2012) 'New Testament apocrypha and the Armenian version of the Bible', in Hovhanessian, V. S. (ed.) The Canon of the Bible and the Apocrypha in the Churches of the East. Bible in the Christian Orthodox Tradition 2. Frankfurt, Germany: Peter Lang.

Hurtado, L. (2015) 'Who read early Christian apocrypha?', in Gregory, A. and Tuckett, C. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Apocrypha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 153–166.

Jones, B. C. (2016) New Testament Texts on Greek Amulets from Late Antiquity. LNTS 554. London: T&T Clark.

King, K. (2003) Gospel of Mary of Magdala: Jesus and the First Woman Apostle. Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge.

Klauck, H.-J. (2008) The Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles. Trans. B. McNeil. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Knibb, M. A. (2008) 'Language, translation, versions, and text of the Apocrypha', in Rogerson, J. W. and Lieu, J. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Biblical Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 159–183.

Kraft, R. A. (2007) 'Para-mania: Beside, before and beyond Bible studies', Journal of Biblical Literature 126(1): 5–27.

Kyrtatas, D. J. (2010) 'Historical aspects of the formation of the New Testament canon', in Thomassen, E. (ed.) Canon and Canonicity: The Formation and Use of Scripture. Copenhagen, Denmark: Museum Tusculanum Press, 29–44.

Lange, A. (2002) 'The status of the Biblical texts in the Qumran corpus and the canonical process', in Herbert, E. D. and Tov, E. (eds) The Bible as Book: The Hebrew Bible and the Judaean Desert Discoveries. London: The British Library; New Castle, DE: Oak Knoll Press, 21–40.

Lehtipuu, O. (2015) Debates over the Resurrection of the Dead: Constructing Early Christian Identity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Levering, M. (ed.) (1989) Rethinking Scripture: Essays from a Comparative Perspective. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.

Lieu, J. (2010a) '"As much my apostle as Christ is mine": The dispute over Paul between Tertullian and Marcion', Early Christianity 1: 41–59.

Lieu, J. (2010b) 'The battle for Paul in the second century', Irish Theological Quarterly 75: 3–14.

Luomanen, P. (2012) Recovering Jewish-Christian Sects and Gospels. VCSup 110. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

McDonald, L. M. (2007) The Biblical Canon: Its Origin, Transmission, and Authority. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

McDonald, L. M. and Sanders, J. A. (eds) (2002) The Canon Debate. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Metzger, B. M. (1987) The Canon of the New Testament. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Pres.

Metzger, B. M. and Ehrman, B. D. (2005) The Text of the New Testament: Its Transmission, Corruption, and Restoration. New York: Oxford University Press.

Miller, R. J. (2010) The Complete Gospels: Annotated Scholars Version. Sonoma, CA: Polebridge.

Mroczek, E. (2015) 'Imagining scriptures before the canon', Ancient Jew Review. 9 December 2015, www.ancientjewreview.com/articles/2015/12/8/imagining-scriptures-before-canon.

Mroczek, E. (2016) The Literary Imagination in Jewish Antiquity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Najman, H. (2012) 'The vitality of scripture within and beyond the "canon"', Journal for the Study of Judaism 43: 497–518.

Nicklas, T. (2010) '"The words of the prophecy in this book": Playing with scriptural authority in the Book of Revelation', in Popović, M. (ed.) Authoritative Scriptures in Ancient Judaism. JSJSup 141. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 309–326.

Nicklas T. (2016) 'New Testament canon and ancient Christian "landscapes of memory"', Early Christianity 7: 5–23.

Nielsen, D. (2012) 'The place of Shepherd of Hermas in the canon debate', in McDonald, L. M. and Charlesworth, J. H. (eds) 'Non-canonical' Religious Texts in Early Judaism and Early Christianity. Jewish and Christian Texts 14. London: T&T Clark, 162–176.

Patterson, S. J. (2014) 'Twice more – Thomas and the synoptics: A reply to Simon Gathercole, The composition of the Gospel of Thomas, and Mark Goodacre, Thomas and the Gospels', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 36(3): 251–261.

Pervo, R. I. (2010) The Making of Paul: Constructions of the Apostle in Early Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Pervo, R. I. (2015) 'Narratives about the apostles: Non-canonical acts and related literature', in Gregory, A. and Tuckett, C. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Apocrypha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 65–89.

Puig i Tàrrech, A. (2016) 'The sayings of Jesus in the beginning of the canon', Early Christianity 7: 47–70.

Ramelli, I. L. E. (2014) 'A pseudepigraphon inside a pseudepigraphon? The Seneca–Paul correspondence and the letters added afterwards', Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha 23(4): 259–289.

Rose, E. (2009) Ritual Memory: The Apocryphal Acts and Liturgical Commemoration in the Early Medieval West (ca. 500–1215). MITS 40. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Rothschild, C. K. (2009) Hebrews as Pseudepigraphon: The History and Significance of the Pauline Attribution of Hebrews. WUNT 2. Reihe 235. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Schröter, J. (2013). From Jesus to the New Testament: Early Christian Theology and the Origin of the New Testament Canon. Trans. W. Coppins. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Schröter, J. (2016) 'Apocryphal and canonical gospels within the development of the New Testament canon', Early Christianity 7: 24–46.

Scopello, M. (ed.) (2008) The Gospel of Judas in Context: Proceedings of the First International Conference on the Gospel of Judas Paris, Sorbonne, October 27th–28th, 2006. NHMS 62. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Smith, D. M. (2000) 'When did the gospels become scripture?', Journal of Biblical Literature 119(1): 3–20.

Smith, W. A. (2014) A Study of the Gospels in Codex Alexandrinus: Codicology, Palaeography, and Scribal Hands. NTTS 48. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Stern, E. (2012) 'Concepts of scripture in the synagogue service', in Sommer, B. D. (ed.) Jewish Concepts of Scripture: A Comparative Introduction. New York: New York University Press, 15–30.

Sundberg, A. C., Jr. (1968) 'Toward a revised history of the New Testament canon', in Studia Evangelica IV. Texte und Untersuchungen 102. Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 452–461.

Tite, P. L. (2012) The Apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans: An Epistolary and Rhetorical Analysis. TENT 7. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Tov, E. (2002) 'The Biblical texts from Judaean desert: An overview and analysis of the published texts', in Herbert, E. D. and Tov, E. (eds) The Bible as Book: The Hebrew Bible and the Judaean Desert Discoveries. London: The British Library; New Castle, DE: Oak Knoll Press, 139–166.

Turner, M. L. (1997) 'On the coherence of the Gospel of Philip', in Turner, J. D. and McGuire, A. M. (eds) The Nag Hammadi Library after Fifty Years: Proceedings of the 1995 Society of Biblical Literature Commemoration. NHMS 44. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 223–250.

Ulrich, E. (2002a) 'The notion and definition of canon', in McDonald, L. M. and Sanders, J. A. (eds) The Canon Debate. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 21–35.

Ulrich, E. (2002b) 'The text of the Hebrew scriptures at the time of Hillel and Jesus', in Lemaire, A. (ed.) Congress Volume Basel 2001. VTSup 92; Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 85–108.

Ulrich, E. (2003) 'From literature to scripture: Reflections on the growth of a text's authoritativeness', Dead Sea Discoveries 10(1): 3–25.

Ulrich, E. (2015) The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Developmental Composition of the Bible. VTSup 169. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Uro, R. (2013) 'The interface of ritual and writing in the transmission of early Christian traditions', in Czachesz, I. and Uro, R. (eds) Mind, Morality, and Magic: Cognitive Science Approaches in Biblical Studies. Durham, UK: Acumen, 62–76.

Verheyden, J. (2003) 'The canon muratori: A matter of dispute', in Auwers, M. and De Jonge, H. J. (eds) The Biblical Canons. BETL 63. Leuven, Belgium: Leuven University Press, 487–556.

von Weissenberg, H. (2012) 'The twelve minor prophets at Qumran and the canonical process: Amos as a "case study"', in David, N., Lange, A., De Troyer, K. and Tzoreff, S. (eds) The Hebrew Bible in Light of the Dead Sea Scrolls. FRLANT 239. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 357–375.

Webster, C. (2012) 'Trapped in a forger's rhetoric: 3 Corinthians, pseudepigraphy, and the legacy of ancient polemics', in McDonald, L. M. and Charlesworth, J. H. (eds) 'Non-Canonical' Religious Texts in Early Judaism and Early Christianity. Jewish and Christian Texts 14. London: T&T Clark, 153–161.

Zahn, M. (2011) 'Talking about rewritten texts: Some reflections on terminology', in Von Weissenberg, H. et al. (eds) Changes in Scripture: Rewriting and Interpreting Authoritative Traditions in the Second Temple Period. BZAW 419. Berlin: De Gruyter, 93–119.

25

SAINTS AND HAGIOGRAPHY

Mark Humphries

Saints and society in Christian late antiquity

At the very beginning of the fifth century CE, the Spanish poet Aurelius Prudentius Clemens (348–c. 405) composed his Peristephanon (The Crowns of Martyrdom), a set of sophisticated literary hymns praising a variety of martyrs (Palmer 1989; Roberts 1993). The work is very instructive both of the developing cult of saints in the Christian Roman empire and of the ways in which the stories of these saints were told and retold. Among the most famous of Prudentius' martyr stories is his account of the third-century Roman saint Laurence, who was roasted alive on a gridiron and taunted his tormentors to check if he was properly cooked (Peristephanon 2.406–8) (see Figure 25.1). The tale of Laurence's death was plainly popular, since not only is it reflected in Prudentius' poetic version, but is also probably depicted in a mosaic which shows Laurence beside his gridiron in the small chapel erroneously known as the 'mausoleum of Galla Placidia' at Ravenna in northern Italy (Deliyannis 2010: 78–9; Grig 2004: 136–41). The presence of a Roman martyr in a work by a Spanish poet indicates that some saints were being celebrated far beyond their original homes. Prudentius was particularly interested in Roman saints and mentions others, including the apostles Peter and Paul (Peristephanon 12) and the girl martyr Agnes (Peristephanon 14).[1] In fact, Prudentius's vision stretches further to include martyrs such as the African Cyprian of Carthage (Peristephanon 13), the north-Italian Cassian of Imola (Peristephanon 9), and the Danubian Quirinus of Siscia (Peristephanon 7).

Figure 25.1   Mosaic depicting St Laurence and his gridiron from the fifth-century chapel known as the 'mausoleum of Galla Placidia', Ravenna. Photo Wikicommons

But one of the most interesting aspects of the Peristephanon is the light it sheds on a string of Spanish martyrs, for whom Prudentius is often our earliest source. Some of these became quite celebrated, like the headstrong virgin Eulalia of Merida (Peristephanon 3), whose martyrdom is the subject of a famous painting by the English Pre-Raphaelite John William Waterhouse. But the majority are shrouded in local obscurity, like Emeterius and Chelidonius, martyrs of Calagurris (modern Calahorra) (Peristephanon 1), or the eighteen martyrs of Caesaraugusta (Zaragoza) (Peristephanon 4). Prudentius seems to have been particularly keen on Emeterius and Chelidonius: not only does his hymn praising them come first in the Peristephanon, but also a later poem in the collection describes a baptistery built on the site where they had been martyred (Peristephanon 8). About the martyrs themselves, Prudentius reports that they had been soldiers who renounced their careers for their faith and who could not be persuaded to offer sacrifice to the pagan gods during an episode of persecution. They were immediately subjected to tortures, but held firm and died for their faith. Prudentius' account is often sketchy, and with good reason – for, as he reports:

> We are denied the facts about these matters, the very tradition is destroyed, for long ago a reviling soldier of the guard took away the records, lest generations taught by documents that held the memory fast should make public the details, the time and manner of their martyrdom, and spread them abroad in sweet speech for posterity to hear.
>
> (Prudentius, Peristephanon 1.74–8; Thomson 1949–53 trans., 2.105)

In Prudentius' view, however, the destruction of authentic court records of Emeterius and Chelidonius' trial meant only the loss of trivial details, such as how long the martyrs' hair grew during their imprisonment; altogether more important truths had been preserved by memory, and, more importantly, were re-enacted in the miracles that daily took place at the saints' shrine (Grig 2004: 74–5). In other words, the absence of precise historical data relating to Emeterius and Chelidonius was no obstacle to their cult – or, indeed, to Prudentius writing his own 'sweet speech' about their martyrdom.

Prudentius' account chimes in harmony with other evidence for the developing cult of saints between the second and fifth centuries. This chapter will explore various manifestations of the cult, particularly the writing of hagiographical accounts of saints' sufferings and achievements. It will begin by outlining the basic categories of saints venerated in the early Christian period, before examining how such saints were recorded in hagiography. Neither the cult of saints nor hagiography traditionally have enjoyed much esteem among rationally minded historians. To Edward Gibbon (1737–94), that great son of Enlightenment reason, the cult of saints represented the worst excesses of medieval superstition. He wrote in his History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire:

> In the long period of twelve hundred years which elapsed between the reign of Constantine and the reformation of Luther, the worship of saints and relics corrupted the pure and perfect simplicity of the Christian model: and some symptoms of degeneracy may be observed even in the first generations which adopted and cherished this pernicious innovation.
>
> (Gibbon 1994 [1781]: 94 [= ch. 28, part 3])

Hagiography has fared little better, often being regarded as little more than a whimsical devotional literature that served to instruct the docile faithful in tales of the heroic age of the church. It is only in the last century, particularly with the work of scholars like Hippolyte Delehaye (1859–1941) and Peter Brown (born 1935), that the texts have been subjected to a more critical approach.

Even so, the insistence of some scholars in dividing hagiographical texts into the categories of 'authentic' and 'fictional' (e.g. Barnes 2010) is less than helpful. While such a distinction is understandable, it obfuscates the reality that many (perhaps most) hagiographical texts, however much they sought to present a record of historical events, were shaped by the literary milieu and ambitions of their authors. More than that, as we will see, hagiography sought to articulate intimate connections between dead saints and later generations of Christians. In short, this is a sophisticated literature deserving of serious appraisal.

From martyrs to ascetics

The founding myths of Christianity emphasise the sacrifice of Christ for the salvation of humankind though the Crucifixion and Resurrection. Implicit in that story is a particular set of views about the relationship between the material and immaterial world, and specifically that earthly existence is but a prelude to an eternal hereafter. As a consequence, what mattered most was the soul, with the body acting only as a vessel for it during its terrestrial journey. But this did not mean that the body was unimportant: on the contrary, excessive indulgence of physical desires and appetites could seriously jeopardise the soul's progress to eternity. The apostle Paul had already spoken of a conflict in his body between spirit and flesh, of which the only hopeful outcome was deliverance 'from this body of death' (Rom. 7:18–24). Viewed in these terms, the body could, like Christ's body, be subjected to torment so long as the purity of the soul was preserved intact. Furthermore, bodily torments could achieve greater perfection for the soul, because 'the [Holy] Spirit might grant the human body the supreme gift of endurance in the face of death' (Brown 1988: 82). This can be seen as central to the two major models of sainthood that emerged in the early Christian centuries: the martyr and the ascetic.

Emerging Christianity's earliest heroes were the martyrs, those who bore witness (the very name martyr is derived from martys, 'witness' in Greek) to Christian truth and salvation by willingly subjecting themselves to pain, torment and death. In so doing, the martyrs vividly re-enacted Christ's sufferings on the cross and in turn could inspire other Christians to remain steadfast in their faith when facing persecution. Thus one of the earliest accounts of a martyrdom, that of Polycarp of Smyrna in the mid second century,[2] recounts how the martyr calmly awaited his fate 'just as the Lord did' so 'that we might become his imitators' (Martyrdom of Polycarp 1; Musurillo 1972 trans., 3). In a powerful demonstration of Paul's teaching that there was no distinction between male and female in Jesus Christ (Galatians 3:28), such performances were by no means solely a male preserve: when the girl Blandina was martyred at Lyons in 177/8, her brethren gazed upon her hanging from the gibbet 'in the shape of a cross . . . and with their outward eyes saw in the form of their sister Him who was crucified for them' (Eusebius, H.E. 5.1.41; Lake 1926 trans., 427). These actions exemplified the ability of Christians to prevail even when living amid a society that was hostile to them and which periodically unleashed persecution against them. A vivid explanation of the meaning of such sufferings is offered by the African Christian Tertullian, who had seen the horrors of persecution with his own eyes:

> Torture us, rack us, condemn us, crush us; your cruelty only proves our innocence. That is why God suffers us to suffer all this . . . But nothing whatever is accomplished by your cruelties, each more exquisite than the last. It is the bait that wins men for our school. We multiply whenever we are mown down by you; the blood of Christians is seed.
>
> (Tertullian, Apologeticus 50.12–13)

Such views help to explain how the sufferings of martyrs became emblematic of the history of Christianity under the pagan emperors. For Eusebius of Caesarea (d. 339), the experience of martyrdom was one of the four chief themes in his foundational narrative of church from Christ to Constantine, alongside the succession of bishops, the preservation of orthodox faith and the misfortunes experienced by the Jews because of their rejection of Jesus as Messiah (H.E. 1.1.1–3). Towards the end of the fourth century, the monk Jerome (347–420) too planned to write a history of the church; although he never realised this ambition, some sense of what he intended can be gleaned from remarks in his hagiography of the Syrian hermit Malchus:

> I have decided to write an account of the Church of Christ from the coming of the Saviour down to our own time, in other words from the apostle down to the dregs of our own period, showing by what means and through what agents the Church was born, and how it grew up under the persecutions and was crowned by the martyrs, and how, under the Christian emperors, it became more powerful and wealthy but less rich in virtues.
>
> (Jerome, Life of Malchus 1; White 1998 trans., 121)

Once more we can see how the experience of the martyrs epitomised an aspirational, virtuous age in the church's history.

A ready supply of heroic martyrs relied, of course, on a hostile state, so the conversion of Constantine to Christianity and the development of the Christian Roman empire in the fourth and fifth centuries presented a challenge to Christian notions of sainthood and spurred a quest for a new focus of Christian heroism. It is about this time that we get a shift in emphasis from martyrs to ascetics, both those who lived solitary lives remote from society as hermits and those who engaged in communal living, such as monks and, later, nuns (Brown 1971, 1988: 213–58). Just as the martyrs signalled their rejection of conventional understandings of the relationship between body and society by undergoing tortures and execution, so ascetics advertised their disdain for the material world by enduring extreme privations of anything that could be construed as bodily comfort (ranging from sex to food to soft clothing, furniture or washing). Their achievement of holiness through such acts was advertised by the performance of miracles: many holy men and women were credited with working wonders such as healing or prophecy or the divinely inspired destruction of pagan temples.

The reputations of such holy men and women spread rapidly. Just as the sufferings of martyrs provided exemplars for other Christians who might at any moment experience the rigours of persecution, so too ascetics provided models that could inspire other Christians to similar acts of holy privation. Augustine of Hippo (354–430) records such an instance in his spiritual autobiography, the Confessions. At a period in his life when Augustine was experiencing profound spiritual doubt – when, famously, he prayed to God for 'chastity and continence, but not yet' (Confessions 8.7.17) – he records how stories of the famous monk (and prototypical ascetic saint) Anthony of Egypt (251–356; see Chapter 51 of this volume) galvanised him to persevere with his religious struggle. The impetus came from his friend Ponticianus, who related a story of imperial officials at Trier who came across a copy of the Life of Anthony. One of them 'was amazed and set on fire, and during his reading began to think of taking up this [ascetic] life and leaving his secular post in the civil service to be [God's] servant' (Confessions 8.6.15; Chadwick 1991 trans., 143). In turn, Ponticianus' retelling of the story was to be important in nudging Augustine towards his spiritual goal (Confessions 8.12.29). Certainly, the Life of Anthony circulated widely in a variety of versions: in Egypt it was found in Coptic and Greek (although the precise relationship between these versions of the Life, particularly in terms of which came first, is a vexed issue: Barnes 1986; Louth 1988). It was translated into Latin twice by the end of the fourth century, thereby influencing westerners like Augustine. The translations of the lives of numerous saints into languages other than those of their original composition (which includes not only Latin and Greek, but also a range of eastern languages such as Coptic, Syriac and Armenian) became something of a growth industry, as accounts of an astonishing array of ascetic saints from monks and hermits to converted prostitutes were disseminated across the Mediterranean world and the Near East.

In later years, Augustine became bishop of Hippo Regius in Numidia. A hallmark of his episcopate was that he adopted an ascetic lifestyle, and for like-minded members of his community, he provided a monastic rule (Lawless 1987). This reflects a wider trend in the Christian empire in the later fourth and fifth centuries that saw church leaders expected to adhere to ascetic modes of behaviour (Rapp 2005: 296–7). An important model in the west for this combination of the ascetic and bishop was provided by Martin of Tours (d. 397): according to the Life of Martin (ch. 9) written by his disciple Sulpicius Severus, it was precisely his reputation as a miracle-working ascetic that attracted the Christians of the Gallic city of Tours when they sought a new bishop. Once in office, Martin maintained his ascetic lifestyle and established a monastery outside Tours: from there his reputation spread, attracting his hagiographer Sulpicius Severus to visit him and adopt the ascetic lifestyle (Life of Martin 25; Stancliffe 1983: 10–19). In the impulse towards select-ing bishops who were ascetic masters, we can detect anxieties about the virtue of church leadership at precisely that time when Jerome, in his hagiography of Malchus, expressed concerns about the fortunes of Christianity in the Christian empire. Yet while some bishops, like Ambrose of Milan, were successful in securing the appointment of their associates to neighbouring sees, Martin was not: it seems as if, at first, his brand of ascetic bishop was too exotic for his fellow churchmen in Gaul (Stancliffe 1983: 341–62).

It should be noted also that the success of ascetic sainthood depended in no small measure on its endless adaptability. The practice of asceticism had begun in the deserts of Egypt and in the arid limestone massif above Antioch in Syria, but this did not prevent it from spreading into regions where deserts were, in the strict sense, hard to find. Thus in western Europe, ascetics sought to recreate the removal from society that had been characteristic of their Egyptian and Syrian models in a variety of marginal locations. They might choose islands such as Lérins, lying off the French Riviera, chosen by the monk Honoratus for his monastery; hitherto it had been 'uninhabited because of its utter desolation and unvisited for fear of its venomous snakes' (Hilary of Arles, Sermon on the Life of Honoratus 3.15; Hoare 1954 trans., 259). Mountains like the Jura in Gaul, the Alps and the Italian Apennines provided similarly remote locales in which ascetics could devote their lives to God.[3] That this was possible reflects how 'the desert' was as much a symbolic location as an actual one. Western views are neatly encapsulated in a work by Eucherius of Lyons in the mid fifth century: having reviewed various instances of the desert as a place where monks, following the model of biblical figures like Moses, Elijah or Christ could commune with God, he reserves special praise of Lérins as the epitome of the desert lifestyle (Vivian et al. 1999: 197–215).

But more than that, ascetics could live cheek by jowl with settled society, in monasteries or convents on the margins or even within urban centres. These were found dispersed throughout the Roman world by the fifth century, but with clusters in particular places such as the Egyptian and Syrian deserts where they had been so long established that it seemed, in a luminous phrase of Athanasius, 'the desert was made a city by monks' (Life of Anthony 14, trans. Chitty 1966: 5). There came to be concentrations too in places like the Holy Land, particularly at Jerusalem, where ascetic communities could provide both guides and places to stay for pilgrims visiting the holy places (Chitty 1966: 46–64). In a reflexive turn, the monasteries and abodes of hermits themselves became the focus of pilgrim journeys, as enthusiastic Christians sought not just holy places, but also living embodiments of holiness in the shape of particularly celebrated ascetics (Frank 2000). The fifth-century Syrian bishop Theodoret of Cyrrhus wrote a vivid Historia Religiosa listing many such individuals. In his prologue, he makes plain the utility of visiting them and of recounting stories of their achievements:

> How fine it is to behold the contests of excellent men, the athletes of virtue, and to draw benefit with the eyes; when witnessed the objects of our praise appear enviable and become desireable, and impel the beholder to attain them. No middling profit, however, derives from the mere narration of such achievements, communicated by those who know of them to the hearing of those who do not.
>
> (Theodoret, Historia Religiosa, prologue 1; Price 1985 trans., 3)

Theodoret's work is only one example of a significant body of literature generated by this traffic to 'living saints', some of it presenting travelogues of visits to monasteries, such as the History of the Monks in Egypt (Russell and Ward 1980) or Palladius' Lausiac History (Meyer 1964), some collecting the most inspirational sayings of monks and nuns (Harmless 2004; Ward 2003).

While there is a perceptible shift in the fourth century from martyrs to ascetics as models of sanctity, we should resist the temptation to draw a sharp distinction between them, or to see one as effortlessly supplanting the other. Even under hostile emperors, not every Christian could become a martyr, and there was already a strong ascetic impulse in early Christianity before Constantine, as there was also, for instance, in Judaism and certain philosophical strains of paganism (Brown 1988: 37–40; Clark 2000). Many martyrs had manifested traits of renunciation that resembled that of later hermits and coenobites (Brown 1988: 204). Moreover, the idealisation of the martyrs as Christianity's greatest heroes who could inspire the faithful continued long after persecutions ceased. In a number of sermons delivered around 400, bishop Chromatius of Aquileia in northern Italy described the martyrs as an 'ornament of the Church' (Sermon 9.1) and noted how the blood of the martyrs was prefigured in the crimson cloak worn by Christ on his way to crucifixion (Sermon 19.2). Prudentius' Peristephanon attests to the same phenomenon.

But the relevance of martyrs represented much more than abstract idealism. Constantine's conversion was only a staging post in Christianity's journey to dominance; for much of the century (in some places longer) that followed, Christians coexisted with pagans, Jews and others in relative peace. Yet there were occasional outbreaks of violence, as when a group of Christian missionaries in the high Alps above Verona met their deaths in conflict with local pagans and were immediately venerated as martyrs (Paulinus, Life of Ambrose 52). A further consequence of Constantine's action was that, beyond the imperial frontiers, non-Christian polities increasingly came to view Christianity as synonymous with the Roman empire and regarded Christians in their midst with suspicion. We hear, for instance, of sporadic persecutions of Christians living among the Goths, sometimes in the wake of Romano-Gothic hostilities (Heather and Matthews 1991: 103–32). In no small measure, the Romans themselves encouraged this view: Constantine himself had written to the Persian king Shapur II (309–79) commending to him the Christians living in his realm since they were Constantine's responsibility as Christian emperor (Eusebius, V.C. 4.8–14; Smith 2016); meanwhile, a major impulse for Christian conversion of the Goths came from the appointment of Ulfilas as bishop in Gothic lands by an imperial church council (Heather and Matthews 1991: 133–54).

Even within the Christian empire, there remained opportunities for confrontation between Christians and the state as Roman emperors championed different versions of Christian orthodoxy and church order. Those on the opposing side often saw themselves as still at risk of persecution and martyrdom. A particularly pronounced 'church of the martyrs' developed in North Africa as a by-product of the so-called Great Persecution inflicted on the church by Diocletian from February 303. Once the purge ended, the question arose of what to do with those who had capitulated to the persecuting authorities. A hardline group, known as the Donatists, argued that such 'traitors' (traditores) should not be readmitted to the church, but they found themselves in a minority, opposed by most churches in Africa and elsewhere (see Chapter 44 of this work). Nevertheless, they held firm and soon found themselves victims of imperial repression. In response, they generated accounts of their own martyrs, in which otherwise unimpeachably orthodox Christian emperors (such as Constantine's son Constans) appear in unfamiliar guise as tyrannical persecutors, as well as producing their own distinctive versions of earlier martyr acts, such as those of Cyprian of Carthage (Tilley 1996).

The trend was wider, however. During the fourth century, many emperors championed the theological teachings of Arius, which had initially been condemned at the council of Nicaea in 325. Defenders of Nicene Christianity, such as the redoubtable bishop Athanasius of Alexandria, could suffer exile for their determined defence of what they regarded as Christian truth. In such circumstances, it was not difficult to imagine the spectre of persecution reviving once more. For example, the pro-Arian emperor Constantius II (337–61) exiled a number of western ecclesiastics who thought in precisely these terms: one, bishop Lucifer of Cagliari, penned a vituperative attack on the emperor called On the Necessity of Dying for the Faith; his fellow exile, the Gallic bishop Hilary of Poitiers addressed an angry polemic against Constantius, comparing him with the pagan persecutors of old and even the Antichrist (Flower 2016). Even when bishops remained in their cities, the merest whiff of heretical opposition could provoke lively imaginative recreations of persecution and martyrdom: such was the case in Milan in the mid 380s, where bishop Ambrose found himself locked in a power struggle with the heterodox court of the emperor Valentinian II (375–92) and his mother Justina. Once again, memories of persecution and martyrdom were conjured up, as Augustine tells us in an eyewitness report:

> Justina, mother of the young emperor Valentinian, was persecuting your servant Ambrose in the interest of her heresy. She had been led into error by the Arians. The devout congregation kept continual guard in the church, ready to die with their bishop, your servant. There my mother, your handmaid, was a leader in keeping anxious watch and lived in prayer.
>
> (Augustine, Confessions 9.7.15; Chadwick 1991 trans., 164–5 (adapted))

Ambrose sought spiritual endorsement of his righteousness in the form of discovering, under divine inspiration, the bodies of hitherto unknown martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius, between whose skeletons the bishop remains entombed to this day (McLynn 1994: 209–19).

Writings on the saints

From what has been discussed so far, it is clear that saints, whether martyrs or ascetics, existed not only as objects of veneration, but also as the subjects of texts. A strong narrative impulse is clear in Christian writings from an early stage, with the creation of a gospel tradition already by the late first century. While one of the chief influences on such texts was to demonstrate how Jesus' earthly ministry confirmed the prophecies found in Hebrew scripture (what became the Christian Old Testament), the texts, written in Greek, were influenced by a variety of models from ancient narrative literature. The different approaches taken by the authors of both canonical and non-canonical gospels in emphasising particular episodes of Christ's life echoes an approach taken to writing the lives of ancient historical figures adopted by the Greek Plutarch (c. 46–120), who was writing roughly in the same period as the gospels took literary form. In particular, he wrote to offer inspiring moral lessons to his readers, by means of both positive and negative examples.[4] Moreover, his approach was self-consciously selective:

> [i]f I do not record all their most celebrated achievements or describe any part of them exhaustively, but merely summarize for the most part what they accomplished, I ask my readers not to regard this as a fault. For I am writing biography, not history, and the truth is that the most brilliant exploits often tell us nothing of the virtues and vices of the men who performed them, while on the other hand a chance remark or a joke may reveal far more of a man's character than the mere feat of winning battles in which thousands fall, or of marshalling great armies, or laying siege to cities.
>
> (Plutarch, Life of Alexander 1.1–2)

Such an approach, in which biographical details were selected because they were inspirational, can be found not just in the gospel tradition but also in the accounts offered of Christian martyrs and ascetics.

In the second century, Christians began to feel the need to create texts that dealt with the sufferings of martyrs, not only in terms of providing a narrative of how they had died but also offering explanations of the meanings that should be attached to their deaths (Perkins 1995). The earliest extant examples come in the form of letters written from communities that had felt the grip of persecution to brethren elsewhere in the empire: thus the account of Polycarp's death was written as a letter 'from the church of God dwelling in Smyrna to the church of God at Philomelium and to all the communities of the holy Catholic Church everywhere' (Martyrdom of Polycarp, preface; Musurillo 1972 trans., 3). These circulated widely and can be seen to underpin the narratives of martyrdom that punctuate Eusebius of Caesarea's Ecclesiastical History: for instance, his account of the sufferings of Christians in a persecution at Lyons and Vienne in central Gaul in 177/8 is essentially a verbatim quotation from a letter sent by the Gallic Christian communities to their brethren in the provinces of 'Asia and Phrygia who have the same faith and hope in the redemption' (Eusebius, H.E. 5.1.3). The extent to which this epistolary convention became part of the accepted literary style of martyr texts can be seen from the way it was imitated in late accounts: a Greek narrative of a fourth-century Gothic martyr, Sabas, is couched as a letter from 'the church of God dwelling in Gothia to the church of God dwelling Cappadocia and all the other communities of the holy Catholic Church everywhere' (trans. Heather and Matthews 1991: 111 (adapted)): the verbal parallels with the preface to Polycarp's martyrdom could hardly be starker.

In some cases, these accounts of martyrdom owe something to court records, of the type which Prudentius claimed were destroyed for the sufferings of Emeterius and Chelidonius, although the extent to which the versions that survive are genuine is contestable (Barnes 2010: 54–66). It is clear that many of the surviving texts were significant literary elaborations of such bare court records. A famous example is the Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas, recounting the death of a Christian lady and her slave at Carthage in 203, where a later redactor has skilfully blended elements of a confrontation in court with other texts, including a prison diary from Perpetua herself, which features an astonishing dream sequence in which she foresees her death in allegorical form (Barnes 2010: 66–74; see Chapter 49 of this work).

The purpose of such recastings was to make the martyr acts articulate a cogent message. The account of Polycarp's trail, torture and death is redacted in such a way as to stress that Polycarp's sacrifice evoked that of Christ during his passion (Clancy 2009: 113–18). Thus Polycarp is arrested on a Friday and goes willingly with his captors, just as Christ had done at Gethsemane (Martyrdom of Polycarp 7). Moreover, the official who presides over his arrest and trial is called Herod, a parallel which prompts comment from the author of the text in its present form: 'destiny had given him the same name, that Polycarp might fulfil the lot that was appointed to him, becoming a sharer with Christ, and those who betrayed him might receive the punishment of Judas' (Martyrdom of Polycarp 6; Musurillo 1972 trans., 7). When Polycarp is condemned to be burned alive, he is threatened with being nailed to the gibbet, but rejects this quasi-crucifixion as unnecessary, since Christ's example will suffice to keep him steadfast (Martyrdom of Polycarp 13–14). After the pyre is lit, the flames do not touch Polycarp, but instead encircle him so that he gives off an aroma like baking bread: here the text evokes both imagery of the Eucharist and of the three Hebrews whom Nebuchadnezzar had tried to burn alive (Daniel 3). In the end, when the flames do not kill Polycarp, the executioners stab him with a dagger, at which point a great quantity of blood gushes forth from the wound, together with a dove (Martyrdom of Polycarp 16), evoking further episodes of Christ's death on the cross. That the civic official Herod shares the name as Jewish rulers reviled by Christians also points to the text's notable anti-Semitism: it is, for instance, the Jews of Smyrna who cry out (with their pagan neighbours) for Polycarp to be killed (again evoking gospel parallels); and it is they who enthusiastically assembled the pyre on which Polycarp was to be burned (Martyrdom of Polycarp 12–13).

Similar literary concerns can be found in the lives of ascetics. By combating demons, curing the sick and performing miracles, ascetic saints could be presented as resembling Christ just as much as the martyrs (e.g. see Stancliffe 1983: 363–71 for a survey of Martin's miracles). It is also clear that the authors of hagiography were keen to stress a connection between ascetics, and presented their lives accordingly. We saw that the Life of Anthony was being read in the west already in the late fourth century. In turn, this Life exercised a powerful influence over the authors of other hagiographies (Stancliffe 1983: 98–9). For example, Paulinus, who was asked to write a life of Ambrose of Milan by Augustine, noted that the commission required:

> [t]hat I should follow the example set by those holy men bishop Athanasius and Jerome the priest, who penned the lives of St Paul and St Anthony, dwellers in the desert, and by [Sulpicius] Severus, that servant of God, who composed the Life of Martin, the revered bishop of Tours.
>
> (Paulinus, Life of Ambrose 1; Hoare 1954 trans., 149)

Episodes in which a saint resembled a model like Anthony might therefore be stressed by explicit citation. But the same effect could be achieved more subtly, by means of intertextual echoes, evoking the language in which the saintly archetype had been described. The collection of lives of monks who lived in the Jura mountains in eastern Gaul in the fifth century, for instance, has been shown to be patterned on the Life of Anthony.[5] The purpose of such references and allusions was to stress that the monks belonged to a correct tradition. Indeed, one of the chief functions of ascetic hagiography was to present lives that provided a charter for their followers to emulate. Thus, in the middle of his hagiography, when Anthony is asked by the monks of Arsinoe to provide them with instruction on how to live, he launches into a long speech that amounts to a monastic rule (Athanasius, Life of Anthony 17–43; Rousseau 2000). The enormous literary outpourings associated with the fourth-century Coptic monk Pachomius reveal striking parallels between stories told about the saint in the various redactions of his Life and the monastic rules that emanated from his monasteries (Rousseau 1985: 106, 174–5). In short, anyone who read a life could aspire to live the life too.

Saints' lives were didactic texts, then, advocating a particular position among a number of other possibilities. For example, there was a lively genre of philosophical lives circulating in late antiquity, dealing with philosophers of the Neoplatonic tradition and penned by distinguished philosophers such as Porphyry and Iamblichus (Clark 2000). Some hagiographers plainly regarded this alternative as a target. Anthony, for instance, is described as disputing with (and, of course, triumphing over) philosophers (Athanasius, Life of Anthony 72–80). Suplicius Severus highlights the opposition in stark language in the preface to his Life of Martin, where he contrasts hagiography with secular biography: 'what does posterity gain by reading of Hector fighting or Socrates philosophising?' (Life of Martin 1). A Christian reader would do better to study Martin's life, it is implied – but Sulpicius Severus' language was so heavily laden with stylistic tics drawn from a number of classical Latin authors that the ancient past was, in a sense, always present in his writings (Stancliffe 1983: 58–61).

Even within Christianity, the various works of hagiography are also aware that they should present saints who conformed to correct models, worthy of emulation. For example, martyrs should observe correct deportment: while martyrdoms might prompt other Christians to the ultimate sacrifice, there was always a risk that when faced with the instruments of death, a candidate's nerve might fail. The Martyrdom of Polycarp stresses this neatly: the first death in the text is that of one Germanicus, whose heroism inspires others. But one of the next candidates, a certain Quintus the Phrygian, immediately regrets his choice when confronted with wild beasts and succumbs to pressure to offer sacrifice to the gods; to make matters worse, Quintus had actually offered himself up as a martyr (Martyrdom of Polycarp 4). By contrast, Polycarp's calmness – joyousness, even – in the face of death makes it clear how a martyr should behave. As for ascetics, it is clear from the outset that they were expected to conform to the correct definition of orthodox Christianity. Thus Anthony is presented as a vigorous opponent of the Arian heresy, even engaging in polemical disputations with its supporters (Athanasius, Life of Anthony 68–70, 82, 86) – it can hardly be a mere happy coincidence that this adheres to the theological loyalties of the author of the life, bishop Athanasius of Alexandria. Similarly, the lives of Martin of Tours and Ambrose of Milan were written in the shadow of recent conflicts over orthodoxy in the west; once again, both saints are presented as unimpeachably orthodox.

It should also be noted that the authors of saints' lives sought to associate themselves with their subjects. Thus the various accounts of martyrdoms were often presented as eyewitness accounts. The conclusion to the Martyrdom of Polycarp, for example, contains a detailed account of how the text came to be redacted. Similarly, numerous authors of the lives of ascetics similarly stressed their affinity with their subject. At the end of his Life of Anthony, Athanasius claims to have come into possession of a few pieces of the saint's property (ch. 92). Sulpicius Severus and Paulinus both claimed authority for their accounts on the basis that they had been associates of Martin and Ambrose (Life of Martin 25–6; Life of Ambrose 1). One of the most instructive of these lives about the relationship between author and saint comes in a text that might well be largely fictional, the Life of Pelagia, an Antiochene prostitute who converted to Christianity in the fourth century and lived out her days as a transvestite monk (under the masculine form of her name, 'Pelagius') at Jerusalem (Brock and Harvey 1987: 40–62). In large measure, Pelagia is a vehicle through which the author of the life, a priest called Jacob, articulates his views on a number of issues: he presents a gloriously vivid physical description of Pelagia decked out in her courtesan's finery in a passage which exemplifies the danger she poses in terms of carnal pollution. Of equal concern to Jacob are the activities of a bishop called Nonnus, a product of a Pachomian monastery at Tabennesi in Egypt, whose associate Jacob claims to be: it is Nonnus who looks upon Pelagia and sees her for the sinner she is; it is Nonnus who presides over her conversion and baptism; and it is Nonnus alone who knows that the monk Pelagius is none other than the former prostitute and who instructs Jacob to seek her/him out when he visits Jerusalem. The life, then, is as much about Nonnus as it is about Pelagia (Coon 1997: 79–82).

Of course, such closer personal connections could arouse suspicions that authors were exaggerating. Sulpicius Severus bookends his Life of Martin with expressions of anxiety in this regard (ch. 1) and an assertion that he is simply not up to the task of extolling Martin's sanctity, so great was it (ch. 26). This latter factor, in which the author protests his inadequacy to the task of recounting the saint's life, is a well-known classical literary trope, the captatio benevolentiae, by means of which an author sought their audience's indulgence. It was a striking feature of Ciceronian oratory; it can also be found in a string of hagiographies from Sulpicius Severus around 400 to Eugippius, author of the Danubian-set Life of Severinus in the sixth century, and beyond. Such special pleading could achieve interesting results. In a life he wrote of his sister Macrina, the Cappadocian father Gregory of Nyssa stated that he would not pile up accounts of her miracles, for fear that they would be disbelieved; but he manages to get around this obstacle by quoting at great length an account of one of her miracles told to him by an unnamed military officer whom he met on his travels (Life of Macrina 36–9).

The development of cult: saints, place and power

In one striking respect, Christian hagiography, whether it deals with martyrs, ascetics or any other category of saint, differed from secular accounts of individuals' lives: their accounts did not end with their subjects' deaths. On the contrary, both martyr acts and stories of saints often included lengthy descriptions of miraculous events that happened after their death and burial, and which were proof of their continued power and holiness. If death marked only the end of the earthly sojourn of the immortal soul in the mortal body, then it followed that the saint continued to live, in the company of their Saviour, for eternity. For that reason, the occasion of a saint's death was often recast as their dies natalis, their birthday, as the day in which they were born into the life eternal (Martyrdom of Polycarp 18).

A particularly vivid collection of post-mortem miracles is presented in Paulinus' account of Ambrose of Milan. He was seen in visions in a number of places after his death, not just at Milan but also at Florence, where his appearance galvanised the citizens when they were besieged by the Goths in 406 (Paulinus, Life of Ambrose 49–50). He was also seen in visions in Africa, where Paulinus was writing the work, and even struck down a bishop there who had disparaged his memory (ch. 54). For Paulinus, the message of such occurrences was plain, and they should be regarded as part of a continuum with Ambrose's achievements during his lifetime:

> I exhort and beg each person who reads this book to imitate the life of the holy man, to praise the grace of God and shun the tongues of slanderers if he wishes to have fellowship with Ambrose in the resurrection of life rather than, with those slanderers, to undergo a punishment that no-one who is wise does not avoid.
>
> (Paulinus, Life of Ambrose 55; Ramsey 1997 trans., 218)

These accounts of post-mortem miracles demonstrate that hagiographical texts were a central element in a developing cult of saints, and were as essential to it as the shrines at saints' tombs. From tentative beginnings in the second century, the cult of saints expanded exponentially in the fourth and fifth centuries, as particular local churches actively fostered the memory of their saints, not least by means of a vigorous trade in relics, which were either body parts of saints or items that they had used (or, increasingly, objects that had come into contact with other relics) (Brown 1981; Clark 1999; Yasin 2009). We have seen how the discovery of the remains of Gervasius and Protasius was central to Ambrose of Milan's victories over his foes at the imperial court; in time, they became useful also for the greater glorification of the Milanese church, as relics of those saints (and others, like Nabor and Felix) were disseminated around northern Italy (and as far as Gaul and Africa) as a sort of saintly buttress to Ambrose's personal influence (Clark 1999: 364–70).

Few places were as rich in saints or relics as the city of Rome, and the fourth and fifth centuries saw the cult aspects of the veneration of the holy dead on a whole new footing. Particularly under the pontificate of Pope Damasus (366–84), the tombs of martyrs in the catacombs were renovated and decked out with fine verse inscriptions extolling the holiness of earlier martyrs and Roman bishops (Sághy 2015). This focus on the saints helped also to recalibrate the city's calendar away from a litany of pagan festivals to one punctuated by the feast days of particular saints: evidence from the Chronography of 354 suggests that this was already under way by the fourth century, although Christianity still had to compete with a range of secular festivals until the sixth century (Salzman 1990). Chief among Rome's saints were the apostles Peter and Paul, and their cult received particular attention from both popes and emperors. For the popes, their association with Peter in particular became a matter of more than otherworldly concern, since by invoking Jesus' statement to Peter that he was the rock on which Christ founded the church (Matthew 16:18), Rome's bishops could claim to have special authority over other churches across Christendom. This development was only fully articulated by bishops like Leo I in the fifth century, by which time Rome's claims to primacy were attracting competition, not least from Constantine's new imperial city in the eastern empire, Constantinople. As a new (re)foundation, Constantinople was bereft of important saints of its own; but throughout the fourth and fifth centuries we see emperors seeking to buttress their city's religious capital by importing the relics of a range of saints, not least those claimed to belong to apostles who had known Christ during his earthly ministry. That this was no insignificant matter is shown by the elaborate ceremonial that welcomed such relics, in which the emperor and the city's population participated alongside the clergy (Ward-Perkins 2012: 60–2), as seen in the fifth-century CE ivory panel relief showing the arrival of relics in Constantinople (Figure 25.2).

The trends outlined here for great centres like Rome and Constantinople can be replicated across the Mediterranean world, where local calendars and local topography were marked by saints' feast days and shrines. Over time, the popularity of the saints increased, not least among the Christian laity. Vivid evidence of their enthusiasm can be found in the practice of burial ad sanctos ('near the saints'), as Christians hoped, by being buried near a saint, they might share in the grace that flowed from those whom Peter Brown has called 'the very special dead' (Brown 1981: 69–85; Yasin 2009: 222–37). Tales of miracles occurring at saints' tombs become a more common feature of hagiography, attesting to how the saints were regarded as special intercessors between heaven and earth.

While this development of saints' cults was vigorous, it was not without controversy. Already in the Martyrdom of Polycarp we see anxieties about the meaning of the veneration of saints when the text turns to discuss the fate of the martyr's body. Worries that veneration of Polycarp's relics might mean Christians 'abandon the Crucified and begin to worship this man' are placed in the mouths of local
Figure 25.2   Ivory relief panel, fifth century, showing the ceremonial arrival of relics (left) in Constantinople, where they are greeted by clergy and members of the imperial family (right). Now in Trier. Photo Wikicommons

Jews; but the author of the text dismisses this as sheer folly: 'Little did they know that we could never abandon Christ, for it was he who suffered for the redemption of those who are saved, the innocent one dying on behalf of sinners' (Martyrdom of Polycarp 17: Musurillo 1972 trans., 15–17). In short, regarding the veneration of martyrs as somehow weakening faith in Christ is absurd; if anything, it gives additional focus to reverence for Jesus, whose salvific majesty is amplified by the martyr. Yet anxieties about cult honours did not dissipate. Athanasius' reports that Anthony was horrified he might be mummified and his body become an object of worship, so he gave instructions that the location of his burial be kept secret. None of this was an impediment to his cult, since fame of his holiness spread far and wide, not least through Athanasius' Life, and relics, in the form of Anthony's paltry possessions, existed in any case (Life of Anthony 90–3). Meanwhile, Sulpicius Severus reports that Martin of Tours, in addition to demolishing various pagan shrines, also purged Tours of a spurious saint's cult: near the city was an altar dedicated, so it was believed, to a martyr; but Martin was suspicious and, after praying to God for guidance, was gifted with a dream in which the person buried in the tomb revealed himself to be not a martyr, but a bandit (Life of Martin 11; Stancliffe 1983: 164). This insistence on distinguishing the authentic from the false will have served to underscore that any cult developing around Martin would of course be genuine.

In some ways, the cult of saints, and the hagiography that accompanied it, became a victim of its own success. A text preserved under the name of Pope Gelasius I (492–6), but perhaps the product of a church council in Gaul or Italy, offers a stern judgement on the proliferation of saints' lives: there are so many and their authorship is so often uncertain that injudicious use of them might lead to pollution by heresy (Decretum Gelasianum 4.4). This episode of wariness from the end of the early Christian period is an opportune moment at which to conclude this survey, for it demonstrates that the cult of saints and hagiography were not, as rationalist historians have argued, examples of the degeneracy of late antique Christian culture; on the contrary, they represent something of the dynamic creativity of the age. Moreover, this was a creativity that would be pursued throughout the Middle Ages and beyond, as notions of martyrdom and sainthood became firmly rooted in the Christian imagination.

Additional note: accessing hagiography in English translation

For the acts of the martyrs, there is a complete collection in Musurillo (1972). Unfortunately, it is extremely unreliable (see Barnes 2010: 352–3), with poor texts, often inaccurate translations and an overall lack of critical acumen. Rebillard (2017) begins the task of replacing it. Carolinne White has presented two volumes of saints' lives. One (1998) contains many of the seminal lives, including those of Anthony and Martin; the Life of Anthony presented here, however, is not based on the Greek text of Athanasius, but on the Latin translation by Evagrius. The other (2010) assembles a range of texts pertaining to female saints, from Perpetua and Felicitas in the third century to a number of fifth-century examples. Important series of translations encompassing hagiography include Cistercian Studies (Cistercian Publications: Kalamazoo) and Translated Texts for Historians (Liverpool: Liverpool University Press), though both contain a great deal of other texts as well. A useful collection of Syriac lives can be found in Brock and Harvey (1987). For western saints, the classic collection by Hoare (1954) is still serviceable, but needs updating in light of new critical editions of the texts.

Notes

1 Prudentius invokes Roman saints also in a verse polemic against paganism, the Contra Symmachum (for the context, see Cameron 2011: 337–49). Its two books are dedicated to Paul and Peter respectively. The evocation of Paul as 'saviour of the race of Romulus' (Contra Symmachum 1, praefatio 80), echoes themes found in the Peristephanon, where the martyrs are often described as rescuing pagans from their heathen folly (e.g. Peristephanon 1.94–6, on the people of the Ebro valley converted from paganism; 2.413–84, where Laurence prays that the people of Rome might be delivered from worship of the pagan gods).

2 For dating the martyrdom to 157 (and not the reign of Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus (i.e. 161–9), as Eusebius mistakenly does), see Barnes 2010: 367–73.

3 For the Jura, see the hagiographies collected in Vivian et al. 1999; for the Apennines, consider the hermit Bassus mentioned in Eugippius, Letter to Paschasius 1; later, we find Benedict of Nursia similarly seeking remote locations in those mountains (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.1.1).

4 The most explicit statement of this is in Plutarch's prefaces to his lives of the Corinthian condottiere Timoleon (c. 337–283 BCE) and the Macedonian king Demetrius Poliorcetes (337–283 BCE; king 294–288 BCE). He states that writing biographies allows him 'to treat history as a mirror, with the help of which I can adorn my own life by imitating the virtues of the men whose actions I have described' (Life of Timoleon 1.1); and that he aims to show the truth of an otherwise unattested dictum of Plato 'that great natures produce great vices as well as great virtues' (Life of Demetrius 1.7).

5 The commentary in Vivian et al. 1999 highlights these links.

Bibliography

Barnes, T. D. (1986) 'Angel of light or mystic initiate? The problem of the Life of Antony', Journal of Theological Studies 37: 353–68.

Barnes, T. D. (2010) Early Christian Hagiography and Roman History. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Brock, S. and Harvey, S. A. (1987) Holy Women of the Syrian Orient. Berkeley and Los Angeles, CA: University of California Press.

Brown, P. (1971) 'The rise and function of the holy man in late antiquity', Journal of Roman Studies 61: 80–101.

Brown, P. (1981) The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Brown, P. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Cameron, A. (2011) The Last Pagans of Rome. New York: Oxford University Press.

Chadwick, H. (trans.) (1991) Saint Augustine: The Confessions. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Chitty, D. J. (1966) The Desert a City: An Introduction to the Study of Egyptian and Palestinian Monasticism under the Christian Empire. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Clancy, F. G. (2009) 'Imitating the mysteries that you celebrate: Martyrdom and Eucharist in the early Patristic period', in Twomey, D. V. and Humphries, M. (eds) The Great Persecution: Proceedings of the Fifth Patristic Conference, Maynooth 2003. Dublin: Four Courts, 106–40.

Clark, G. (1999) 'Victricius of Rouen: Praising the Saints', Journal of Early Christian Studies 7: 365–99.

Clark, G. (2000) 'Philosophic lives and the philosophic life: Porphyry and Iamblichus', in Hägg, T. and Rousseau, P. (eds) Greek Biography and Panegyric in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 29–51.

Coon, L. (1997) Sacred Fictions: Holy Women and Hagiography in Late Antiquity. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Delehaye, H. (1962) The Legends of the Saints, trans. D. Attwater. New York: Fordham University Press.

Deliyannis, D. M. (2010) Ravenna in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Flower, R. (2016) Imperial Invectives against Constantius. Translated Texts for Historians 67. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Frank, G. (2000) The Memory of the Eyes: Pilgrims to Living Saints in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Gibbon, E. (1994 [1781]) The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. 2, ed. Womersley, D. London: Allen Lane.

Grig, L. (2004) Making Martyrs in Late Antiquity. London: Duckworth.

Harmless, W. (2004) Desert Christians: An Introduction to the Literature of Early Christian Monasticism. New York: Oxford University Press.

Heather, P. and Matthews, J. (1991) The Goths in the Fourth Century. Translated Texts for Historians 11. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Hoare, F. R. (trans.) (1954) The Western Fathers. London: Sheed and Ward.

Lake, K. (trans.) (1926) Eusebius: Ecclesiastical History, vol. 1: books 1–5. London: Heinemann.

Lawless, G. (1987) Augustine of Hippo and His Monastic Rule. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Louth, A. (1988) 'St. Athanasius and the Greek Life of Antony', Journal of Theological Studies 39: 504–9.

McLynn, N. B. (1994) Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in the Christian Capital. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Meyer, R. T. (trans.) (1964) Palladius: The Lausiac History. Ancient Christian Writers 34. New York: Paulist.

Musurillo, H. (1972) Acts of the Christian Martyrs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Palmer, A.-M. (1989) Prudentius on the Martyrs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Perkins, J. (1995) The Suffering Self: Pain and Narrative Representation in the Early Christian Era. London: Routledge.

Price, R. M. (trans.) (1985) Theodoret of Cyrrhus: A History of the Monks of Syria. Cistercan Studies 88. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.

Ramsey, B. (1997) Ambrose (The Early Church Fathers). London: Routledge.

Rapp, C. (2005) Holy Bishops in Late Antiquity: The Nature of Christian Leadership in an Age of Transition. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Rebillard, E. (2017) Greek and Latin Narratives about the Ancient Martyrs. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Roberts, M. (1993) Poetry and the Cult of Martyrs: The Liber Peristephanon of Prudentius. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

Rousseau, P. (1985) Pachomius: The Making on a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Rousseau, P. (2000) 'Antony as teacher in the Greek Life', in Hägg, T. and Rousseau, P. (eds) Greek Biography and Panegyric in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press: 89–109.

Russell, N. and Ward, B. (1980) The Lives of the Desert Fathers: The Historia Monachorum in Aegypto. Cistercian Studies 34. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.

Sághy, M. (2015) 'The Bishop of Rome and the Martyrs', in Dunn, G. D. (ed.) The Bishop of Rome in Late Antiquity. Farnham, UK: Ashgate: 37–55.

Salzman, M. R. (1990) On Roman Time: The Codex-Calendar of 354 and the Rhythms of Urban Life in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Smith, K. (2016) Constantine and the Captive Christians of Persia: Martyrdom and Religious Identity in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Stancliffe, C. (1983) St Martin and His Hagiographer: History and Miracle in Sulpicius Severus. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Thomson, H. J. (1949–53), Prudentius, 2 vols. London: Heinemann.

Tilley, M. A. (1996) Donatist Martyr Stories: The Church in Conflict in Roman North Africa (Translated Texts for Historians 26). Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Vivian, T., Vivian, K. and Russell, J. B. (1999) The Life of the Jura Fathers. Cistercian Studies 178. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.

Ward, B. (2003) The Desert Fathers: Sayings of the Early Christian Monks. London: Penguin.

Ward-Perkins, B. (2012) 'Old and new Rome compared: The rise of Constantinople', in Grig, L. and Kelly, G. (eds) Two Romes: Rome and Constantinople in Late Antiquity. New York: Oxford University Press, 53–78.

White, C. (1998) Early Christian Lives. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin.

White, C. (2010) Lives of Roman Christian Women. London: Penguin.

Yasin, A. (2009) Saints and Church Spaces in the Late Antique Mediterranean. Architecture, Cult, and Community. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

26

TRANSLATION AND COMMUNICATION ACROSS CULTURES

Malcolm Choat

Already in the New Testament, the many language communities which co-existed in the Mediterranean are refracted through the unilingual lens of the Greek text. The Aramaic that was spoken in Judea in Jesus' time; the Hebrew which was read in the temple; the Latin spoken among the community at Rome to which Paul wrote; the local languages the apostles would have heard spoken as they dispersed through the cities in Asia Minor; all fade into the Hellenophone background. Speech in Hebrew is reported (Acts 21–22), and sometimes even directly, if briefly, quoted (John 20:16; Mark 15:34); Hebrew terms are translated (John 19; Matt. 1:23, 27:33; Mark 5:41) and Hebrew writing is reported (John 19:20). But despite this occasional intrusion of other languages, the linguistic variety which pervaded the eastern Mediterranean is ultimately reduced to a single channel, that of Greek.

Bi- and multilingualism in early Christianity

Recent work on bi- and multilingualism in the Roman world has revealed a complex world of code-switching, borrowing, loaning, interference and other phenomena which arose as a result of the sustained language contact which the Hellenistic kingdoms and the Roman empire made possible (Adams et al. 2002; Papaconstantinou 2010; Mullen and James 2012). Alongside more comprehensive and better informed recourse to linguistic research, attention to texts other than the literary productions of elites – especially papyrological and epigraphic documentary material – has illuminated the diglossia and bilingualism (of various types) which pervaded the Roman world. All this has informed further the background against which we must read the development and spread of Christianity in the Mediterranean world.

The early Christian writings are all in Greek. Despite inventive arguments (e.g. Black 1998; Edwards 2009), there is little real trace of an immediate underlying linguistic layer (such as direct translation from an Aramaic original) to any of the Gospels, which, with their explanation of scattered Semitic words and phrases, are written for Hellenophonic audiences who did not know Hebrew or Aramaic. This makes all the more surprising the virtually unanimous belief in antiquity that the Gospel of Matthew was originally written in Hebrew. As early as the first half of the second century, Papias (quoted in Eusebius, HE 3.39.16) asserted that 'Matthew compiled the logia in Hebrew language (hebrais dialektos), which everyone interpreted (hermēneusen) as they were able'. Irenaeus believed the same (Adv. Haer. 3.1.1), as did Origen in his (lost) commentary on Matthew (apud Eusebius HE 6.25.4; see also 5.10.3). Naturally enough, these early testimonia were trusted by fourth-century writers such as Eusebius (HE 3.24.6), Epiphanius (Pan. 29.9.4, 30.3.7) and Jerome, who claimed a copy of this Hebrew Matthew survived in the library at Caesarea (de vir. ill. 3 and elsewhere, see Edwards 2009: 28–38).

The fact that no trace of this Hebrew gospel is extant, either itself or as a plausible Vorlage to the Matthew we have, has led to the belief that Papias was alluding to the 'Hebraic style' of Matthew, and that later writers misunderstood Papias, or their source, if it was not he (Luz 2007: 46–47; cf. Keener 1999: 39). Rather than attempting to re-interpret Papias, one might wonder what this apparently common (and apparently false) belief on the part of many early Christians that Matthew was written in Hebrew and translated into Greek (or that he wrote a gospel in each language) might say about the attitude of early Christians to the text. Was it important to some early Christians that there be a Hebrew text at the base of the tradition? Did this impart some form of authenticity to it? These questions may not be answerable, but they allow consideration of early Christian attitudes to translation and language.

As Christianity spread around the shores of the Mediterranean, it did so in Greek, the lingua franca in which it first evolved beyond the Aramaic and Hebrew-speaking environment of Jesus's mission (Buth and Notley 2014). Greek spanned the Roman empire in a way that Latin, which existed in the eastern empire mainly as an administrative and military language, did not. In many ways this was only natural: Greek was the language of the scriptures used by proto-Christian communities outside Palestine (and no doubt some within there as well), the Septuagint. The authors of the books of the New Testament were either native Greek speakers or, if a Jewish Christian – as Matthew has been routinely argued to be (Luz 2007: 47–48) – fully at home in Greek. And the movement was strongest in its early years in the eastern Mediterranean.

This linguistic preference imprints itself throughout Christianity in the first two centuries in various ways. Whatever languages the Christian mission was undertaken in during its first 150 years, its written output was exclusively in Greek. 1 Clement, written in Rome perhaps in the last first or early second century, is in Greek, as is Hermas, written some decades later in the same region. Irenaeus, who came from the east, wrote in his native Greek when in Lyon in the second half of the century, as did Hippolytus of Rome in the third. When the martyrs of Lyon and Vienne wrote a letter c. 177 CE to 'the brethren in Asia and Phrygia' telling of their travails, they also did so in Greek. When Marcion carried out his editorial programme in the mid second century, he collected the Greek scriptures. Early Christian epigraphy from the east is naturally in Greek (Tabbernee 1983, 1997; Breytenbach et al. 2016), but those few Christian inscriptions from Rome for which a second-century date has been posited are also in Greek (Snyder 2011, 2014; see also Wessel 1989). This linguistic profile may be interpreted in various ways, from being the native language of the writer (e.g. Irenaeus, Hermas, Marcion), the normal language for international epistolary communication (1 Clement; Letter of Lyon and Vienne), or the reflections of the linguistic norms of the community in which they arose (the inscriptions).

Whatever the reasons in individual cases, Christianity maintained its exclusively Hellenophone profile throughout much of the first two centuries. Yet necessity demanded the translation of the scriptures. Proselytisation among Latin-speaking peoples and sermons, homilies and especially liturgy in Christian communities in the west would have generated ad hoc translations of parts of scripture, but perhaps no more than the section required by the context. In 180, one of the Scillitan martyrs affirmed he was carrying libri et epistulae Paulae, perhaps more than the Pauline epistles; yet although the trial took place in North Africa, there is no guarantee he was not reading the scriptures in Greek, as others in the west had done to that point (Burton 2013: 177). At the start of the third century, Tertullian's many scriptural citations in his Latin works not infrequently witness different Latin versions of the same verse, suggesting that he too made his own translations from the Greek as he went (Houghton 2016: 5–7). There are scattered indications within his work that a translation of the New Testament (or at least the Pauline epistles) into Latin may have existed in his time (Houghton 2016: 6, 2013: 377). Yet it is not until the mid third century, in the works of Cyprian, that we finally have clear evidence that a Latin translation of the New Testament was in circulation, and almost certainly had been for some time before he made use of it (Houghton 2013: 378, 2016: 9–11). Some of the earliest Latin manuscripts of the New Testament resemble Cyprian's quotations and likewise bear witness to the production of what the textual evidence strongly suggests was a single translation of the New Testament into Latin in the first half of the third century (Burton 2013: 178–180; Houghton 2013: 376, 2016: 12–14). Jerome's remark on the sheer multiplicity of the Latin versions before his translation is evidently an exaggeration (Houghton 2016: 11), but remains as a (perhaps unwitting) testimony to the variety of extemporaneous renderings of the Greek which preceded this. If this did not lead to wide discrepancies between various depictions of the teachings of Jesus and Paul, it did lead to subtle variations in the reporting of their messages.

The original language of the scriptures imprinted on the Latin of western Christians in subtle ways, bestowing a range of idioms on writings (and presumably speech) of North African and European Christians. Rather than generating a new variety of 'Christian Latin', Christianisation wove novel phraseology and new vocabulary into the Latin of early Christian writers (Houghton 2013: 377, 2016: 8–9). The implications of the long persistence of the use of the Greek New Testament in the western empire, and the prevalence of Greek among those Christians who wrote in the west, is worth considering. Does it speak to the linguistic makeup of the communities, a constellation of coincidences (e.g. Hellenophone correspondents and writers), or a pervasive privileging of the language of the scriptures, only slowly superseded by the western vernacular?

Around the Mediterranean, other linguistic interfaces may be detected within the early Christian communities. Apart from Latin, the most important are in Syria-Palestine, with Syriac and Aramaic (Brock 1997; Williams 2013), and in Egypt with the development of Coptic. Valuable witnesses to the translation of Christian scripture and other texts, and the way Christian missionaries, preachers and teachers interacted in non-Hellenophone (or bilingual) situations, may be derived from literary sources, such as those from the western empire. Egypt provides the opportunity to examine the papyrological record, not only for a deeper analysis of the multilingual world in which these interactions took place but also the physical traces of translation and communication across languages in the papyri.

The case of Egypt

Christianity arrived in Alexandria sometime during the first century CE; little more can be said for certain (Choat 2012a). Christian writings (some of them known only by repute) indicate Christian communities of various theological leanings in the city in the first half of the second century, which most likely had their ultimate source in the metropolis' vibrant Jewish community (Jakab 2001: 49–61; Pearson 2004: 43–81). The philosophical 'school' of Pantaenus and the writings of his follower Clement in the second half of the century show the continued trajectory of the Alexandrian Christian community's engagement with various intellectual influences (Jakab 2001: 91–106). There is however little to suggest the faith spread beyond the capital in this period beyond a small number of fragments of Christian scripture found at several points down the Nile (Roberts 1979; Bagnall 2009). These are of course in Greek, which remained the dominant language of the Church, as well as the administration and literary culture, in Egypt in this period. While Egyptian remained spoken by a significant (though unmeasurable) proportion of the population, the written forms of Egyptian had retreated into the temples: outside of a small number of letters in Demotic (Depauw 2007), only the literary productions of the temples, and (with decreasing frequency) monumental hieroglyphic inscriptions, bear witness to literacy in Egyptian (Depauw 2012; Hoffmann 2012; Klotz 2012). Given both the tight nexus between the Egyptian priesthood and the autochthonous script, and the fact that literacy in them was virtually restricted to that class, it was never likely that Christian texts would ever be translated into Demotic.

Another initiative of the priesthood, however, offered a way forward. Among the scribes training in the temple in Narmouthis (Medinet Madi) in the second- and third-century Fayum, some practised transcribing Egyptian words into Greek and incorporated Greek loan words (largely written in Greek characters in the midst of the otherwise Demotic text) into Egyptian syntax (Fewster 2002; Rutherford 2010). One such scribe copied a short text which gives the flavour of such compositions (Rutherford 2010: 201):

> 10. Salios does not know how to write in Greek. He earns a living in the villages(?) teaching himself in secret everyday.

The italicised words are in Greek script, the rest in Demotic, with the Greek infinitive incorporated into Egyptian syntax via the auxiliary verb ir.

Elsewhere in Egypt in the second and third centuries, various Egyptian ritual and astrological texts were rendered into Greek characters. When a scribe in Thebes copied a lengthy Demotic 'magical' text in the third century, he included interlinear glosses in Greek characters at many points (Dieleman 2005). Elsewhere another scribe transcribed a prayer to Osiris complaining about injustice into Greek characters, supplementing the alphabet where necessary with signs derived from Demotic (Satzinger 1975). In these seemingly largely uncoordinated attempts at representing Egyptian in Greek characters, we may discern a phenomenon which is generally referred to as 'Old Coptic' (Quaegebeur 1982; Satzinger 1991; Bagnall 2005).

Once standardised in the fourth century (certainly as a direct result of Christian use), Coptic developed in a number of dialects. A pan-Upper Egyptian vehicular dialect, Sahidic, rapidly acquired the status of both a regional koine, and the prestige variety of the language for literary use. Bohairic, the dialect of the Delta (which superseded Sahidic as the standard literary dialect round the start of the second millennium) is more difficult to properly assess in the early period, in part because fewer papyri survive from the Delta. Throughout Egypt, a number of regional dialects are visible, but with different levels of longevity: while Fayyumic survived in use until well after the Arab conquest, the Upper Egyptian dialects Achmimic and Lycopolitan (whose names may bear little relationship to where they originated) faded from use in the fifth century, as did other local dialects such as Mesokemic (centred round Oxyrhynchus). These dialects present in phonological and morphological variation, and have at times been argued to be merely orthographic variants of the same underlying language (Loprieno 1981–82, cf. Peust 1999: 34). Yet lexical variation between regions (Peust 1999: 327–328) indicates that real linguistic variation lies behind the differences we see in the texts, which presumably also existed – although it is almost impossible to trace in the autochonous Egyptian scripts – in earlier periods.

Alongside considerable advances in the understanding of Coptic, the koine Greek of Graeco-Roman Egypt is now becoming better understood, including with reference to factors of relevance here, such as the influence on it of Egyptian scribes (Evans and Obbink 2010; Evans 2012). Within the Greek papyri of the Roman period, the linguistic interface reveals itself primarily in the interpreters (hermēneis) who appear in various contexts, often translating in proceedings before officials, at times merely mentioned in passing as figures which might be found in a village or town (Mairs 2012). A second-century letter (SB 18.13867) which demands that the one reading the letter (unknown to the writer) 'make a small effort' and translate it for the women gives an insight into the translation of private documents within households. Little of this directly illuminates the translation, whether written or oral, or the Christian message into Egyptian, but does provide an insight into the prevailing bilingualism which enabled it.

It is not necessary to presuppose that proselytisation requires a full translation of scripture into the language of the target people, or that they all need to learn to speak the language in which the scripture is written, as the spread of Islam in many African and South and South-East Asian countries shows. In any case, it is clear that rather than being a non-indigenous elite language, Greek was used at virtually all levels of Egyptian society in the Roman period, with bilingualism pervasive in various manifestations and levels of functionality. As has been argued in the case of Latin, it is not economical to suppose that the production of a full translation of the New Testament was the first stage of Christian engagement with speakers of Egyptian, or even the first aim. The conversions which undoubtedly took place in the Egyptian chora from the mid second to the end of the third century did not inherently require a translation of the New Testament into Coptic, neither did it apparently produce one. Accounts of the rise of Christian Coptic usually start with the period in which the written record appears, the second half of the third century (e.g. Wisse 1995). In a schema given prominence by its summary translation by Metzger (1977: 129–132), Kasser included a 'preliminary stage' in which improvised oral versions were made in the course of the spread of Christianity down the Nile Valley (Kasser 1965: 298–299). If Kasser's dating of this stage to 150–200 CE is too early, it underlines the fact that the Christian mission itself did not initially require the Coptic script itself to be developed or used: extemporised oral translations made in the course of discussing the gospel message would not have been written down (and certainly no such texts have survived even if they were): the Christian engagement with the Coptic script comes later.

The story of the spread of Christianity through Egypt provides an instructive account of the linguistic adaptations made in pursuit of the spread of the faith, even if the early stages of this story are unclear. Little is known about the spread of Christianity in Egypt beyond Alexandria in the second century, and the few fragments of Christian scripture on papyrus which can be dated to this period with any degree of confidence do not suggest anything beyond small communities largely confined to major urban centres (Bagnall 2009; cf. Roberts 1979). In the episcopate of Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria c. 189–c. 232, converging lines of evidence indicate the formation or formalisation of Christian communities at multiple sites down the Nile (Choat 2012a). By the middle of the third century, a Christian with the thoroughly Egyptian name of Petosorapis son of Horos was being sought by the authorities in the village of Mermetha, in the south of the Oxyrhynchite nome (P.Oxy. 42. 3035; Luijendijk 2008: 177–184).

Literary sources provide little guide to the process by which Christianity spread: Eusebius, relying for the most part on traditions about Origen and the letters and other writings of Dionysius (Bishop of Alexandria 248–264), records only scattered information, and little which speaks to the question of the linguistic interface which must have attended the outreach of Christianity to Egypt beyond the capital. Reports by Dionysius of 'Egyptians' suffering during Decius' edict of mass sacrifice (Eusebius, HE, 6.41.19, 21) are difficult to press for details. The three days of discussion which took place at some point in Dionysius' episcopate in the Fayum (Eusebius, HE 7.24–25), during which he managed to convince a significant body of Christians that their chiliastic doctrines required adjustment, seem to have taken place in Greek, as one would expect in this highly Hellenised region. When, during the persecution under Valerian (c. 257–258), exile in the western Delta allowed Dionysius to meet 'brethren from Egypt' (Eusebius, HE 7.11.12, 17), nothing confirms that they spoke anything but Greek, as would be natural for many residents of the chora, who may not have been ethnically Egyptian at all, seeing as Dionysius merely characterises them as coming 'from Egypt', i.e. the Nile Valley as opposed to the Delta.

As Greek was thoroughly embedded in Egypt as a language spoken at many levels of society, there is little trouble believing that most or even all of the 'Egyptians' encountered in such reports spoke Greek. Nevertheless, a substantial portion of the population either could not, or preferred not to. And it is around this time of the episcopate of Dionysius that our first evidence for Christian use of Coptic appears. The careful standardisation that Coptic underwent during the first century of Christian engagement with the script necessitated a highly bilingual literate environment, such as would be found in the urban centres down the Nile. The process starts too early for it to be linked to monasticism, though monastic engagement was probably decisive in the fourth century in generating a large scale programme of translation and book production, and in the late third, urban ascetics such as the bilingual polymath Hieracas (Goehring 1999) provide a plausible urban locale for some of the experimentation to which the early papyrus record bears witness. These early Coptic papyri (see Choat 2012b), largely derived through the antiquities trade with little or no record of provenance, still less any indication of who produced them, nevertheless each tell interesting stories about Christian engagement with the written Egyptian language.

Sometime around the middle of the third century, somewhere in upper Egypt (the provenance is unclear), a handsome copy of the book of Isaiah was produced (P. Beatty VII; Kenyon 1937). At some stage shortly thereafter, another scribe added a sequence of marginal glosses in Coptic. The Coptic used is a form of the Fayumic dialect and uses some archaic forms found only in other very early texts, and in some cases nowhere else. While Coptic came to use six to eight letters derived from Demotic for sounds not represented in the Greek alphabet, this scribe uses neither Demotic letters, nor the supralinear stroke used in later Coptic to represent a semi-vowel (for which our scribe uses an iota). He also uses an oblique stroke over some letters whose significance is not easy to interpret (see the discussion of W. E. Crum in Kenyon 1937: ix–xii).

Among the glosses, verbal phrases are common alongside nouns, by themselves or in longer phrases, such as at Isa. 16.2–3 ('take counsel concerning Aermon, make for her a shelter for (?) grief', as translated by Crum in Kenyon 1937: xi). Also notable is the occasional translation of morphological, rather than lexical, elements, such as at Isa. 54:16, where the Coptic glosses the tense and number (first singular of the first future), but not the meaning, of its Greek target; so too at Isa. 16:13–14, where two relative perfect conjugation bases, but no accompanying verbs, are given. The first editors assumed the texts were written by the owner 'for his own edification' (Crum in Kenyon 1937: ix). While the identity of the scribe is highly likely, the purpose is less clear. The selection of phrases to gloss is odd: 'of(?) God' (Isa. 44:5) must surely have been transparent to the reader who knew Greek well enough to translate all these glosses and make a marginal comment in Greek. A practical purpose is more likely, picking up phrases of interest to dwell on as the writer writes or talks on Isaiah.

The fact that the scribe uses no Demotic letters cannot indicate that these had not yet been formally adopted, as non-Christian 'Old Coptic' texts already use Demotic letters, as does the roughly contemporary Kellis 'Old Coptic Ostracon', a unique very early example of documentary use of pre-standardisation Coptic from the second half of the third century (Gardner 1999; Bagnall 2005). The supralinear stroke is likewise present in our earliest Coptic texts proper, seems visible in embryonic form in some 'Old Coptic' texts, and is clearly used in the Kellis 'Old Coptic Ostracon'. Rather than use these well-known Coptic orthographic strategies, the scribe of the Coptic in P.Beatty VII renders Egyptian as Greeks did Egyptian names, converting some sounds not represented in the Greek alphabet (e.g. /š/;/dj/) to Greek equivalents (/s/; /kh/, i.e. chi), and ignoring others (i.e. /h/). This idiosyncratic system seems not to be informed by any contact with the Egyptian priestly scribal traditions which had already begun to devise systems for how one should represent the Egyptian sounds and other linguistic elements in a Greek-based alphabet.

Perhaps this unfamiliarity with conventions, such as they existed, may indicate that the scribe did not come from an Egyptian background and needed such 'crib notes' to be able to discuss the text in Egyptian? He thus used simple orthographic strategies that came naturally to someone more familiar with Greek. We may compare one of the earliest examples of glossing Egyptian into Greek, a much earlier bilingual word-list, perhaps from the third century BCE, in which the Egyptian equivalents of a succession of Greek nouns (door, bed, talent, axe, iron, sword, seat, dove, donkey) are given in what is unsurprisingly, given the date, wholly Greek script (Quecke 1997). That list was presumably used for Greek settlers to be able to give simple commands or requests to locals; the owner of P.Beatty VII must have had a more developed intent.

Another very early example of translation from Greek to Coptic, which more closely resembles the Ptolemaic glossary, is provided by P.Lond. inv. 10825 (Bell and Thompson 1925). This is a glossary to Hosea and Amos, written on the back of a land register, which was itself probably written in c. 200 CE; the glossary could have been written any time in the 100–150 years after that (Bell and Thompson 1925: 241–242). The dialect of the Coptic, a form of Mesokemic, suggests an origin in the Oxyrhynchite nome (Kahle 1954: ii, 220–224). What survives covers parts of Hosea and Amos, and probably originally treated those books in their entirety. As with most later Greek–Coptic glossaries, colons stand between Greek and Coptic. Some of the excerpting and abbreviational strategies employed in the Greek would seem to require its use alongside the full Greek text itself: at one place (corresponding to Hos. 2:12) the Greek reads only (in an abbreviated form) 'and now'; the Coptic has 'and now I will uncover'; in the same verse, for 'not rescue', the Coptic has 'and no one will rescue her'; in Hos 7:16, 'unlearned' is rendered in the Coptic by 'because of their unlearned tongue'. At Hos. 9:1, a heavily abbreviated 'gifts on every threshing floor' is translated by 'you have loved every gift'.

This glossary predates any known copy of the Minor Prophets in Coptic, from whose readings this text is on the whole independent. The rationale behind the selection is again not clear. These cannot be phrases which caused their quite proficient bilingual composer trouble: ep oikon, 'over the house' (Hos. 8:1), which appears on the papyrus simply as epoik and is translated literally, should have presented no problems. Sometimes the scribe goes for several lines of the biblical text without recording a gloss, writing none for words which might have been thought worthy of one, then records the meanings of relatively straightforward phrases. The purpose is thus difficult to divine: preparation for a full translation into Coptic (written or oral) should not have required the translation of simple words. It is more likely that, rather than this being a tool to use the Minor Prophets, it was a tool to construct another text, perhaps an oral catechetical analysis of them, or a written commentary on them. These may then be 'crib notes' to which a catechist might have recourse while discussing and explicating the book. If one was expecting to extemporise on the themes of the Minor Prophets, a translation of the parts the speaker wished to quote and address may have been useful, so as not to be lost for words at that point.

Our writer is not necessarily more confident in Coptic than in Greek, and knows Greek well enough to both abbreviate and expertly translate it into Egyptian (there is only one misunderstanding, and even that is merely a different punctuation to how the Greek is normally taken). The composer may have been one of the educated bilingual missionaries who carried Christianity beyond the Hellenised nome capitals in the second half of the third century, at just the time when we find a series of 'letters of recommendation' written by and to the Bishop of Oxyrhynchus (from where the glossary also probably comes), introducing catechumens being sent between communities with the information that they are being instructed in an particular book: Genesis, or the 'first stage of the gospel' (Luijendijk 2008: 81–151; Blumell 2012: 111–117). Their letters of recommendation are in Greek, but the rapid spread of Christianity through the countryside in the second half of the third century indicates that instruction and perhaps even preaching in Coptic must have been taking place by this time. Evidence for the introduction of Coptic into the educational system appears in a codex of wooden tablets from the second half of the third century, containing a variety of texts (Bodl. Gr. Inscr. 3019: Crum 1934; Parsons 1970; Cribiore 1996: no. 388): alongside fractions, declensions and conjugations are a paraphrase of Iliad 1:1–21 and Psalm 46.3–10. All are in Greek, except the last, in a version of Coptic which shows affinities with the Achmimic dialect. The hand which wrote the Coptic also wrote some of the Greek texts, including the Iliad paraphrase. The stage was thus set for the production of full translations.

The proof traditionally adduced that translation of the scriptures had taken place in the third century, Antony hearing the Gospel of Matthew in his village church around 270 (Life of Antony 3), in fact offers no sort of evidence that full translations had taken place by then, both because the translation of a passage in a homily could be easily extemporised or produced for the purpose, and moreover because the writer of the letters of Antony – now commonly believed to be genuine (Rubenson 1995) – was familiar with Alexandrian theology to a degree that means he must have had a Hellenic education himself and thus could probably have understood the sermon even if it had been delivered entirely in Greek.

Coptic palaeography remains less than perfectly understood in general; even in the case of Greek texts, palaeography is not a precise enough tool as to confidently state on which side of the Constantinian revolution a text may fall. It is thus difficult to chronologically plot the earliest translations of Christian scripture into Coptic (Wisse 1995; Feder 2007; Askeland 2012). The rapid linguistic standardisation of Coptic during the fourth century does however allow us to reasonably suspect that texts whose dialect and orthography departs significantly and consistently from later standards may lie in the first quarter of the fourth century or even earlier.

One such example is P.Bodmer 6 (Kasser 1960), which may date to the late third or early fourth century, and is part of the 'Dishna Library' argued (not without reason) to have been once owned by a Pachomian monastery (Robinson 2011). The version of Proverbs contained in this codex is written not in the standardised Sahidic of most of the codices in the assemblage, but in a 'proto-Theban dialect' which uses forms of the Demotic letters which are both different from those used in later 'classical' Coptic and similar to non-Christian 'Old Coptic texts' (Kasser 1991, 2003).

A bilingual codex in Hamburg dated to the late third or early fourth century shows at least two (or up to seven, on some estimates) scribes practising their craft in a codex containing Song of Songs, Lamentations and Ecclesiastes in Coptic, and the Acts of Paul and Ecclesiastes in Greek (Diebner and Kasser 1989). Some of the scribes wrote both Greek and Coptic. The scribes, who were not particularly well-trained in either Greek or Coptic, used a non-standard variety of the Fayumic dialect, and – highly unusually in contrast to later Coptic practice – mostly avoided the use of Greek words.

While the combination of texts is reminiscent of texts which proved popular in monasticism, it does not look like something compiled for use in church. The papyrus is of rough quality; the codex itself an uneven production. An educational, devotional and perhaps monastic context is likely, but whichever of these may be correct, a linguistic interface in a Christian context of scribal training in the Fayum is evident. An even more unusual combination is provided by Chester Beatty Ac. 1390 (Brashear et al. 1990), in which an excerpt from the Gospel of John (10:7–13:38) in the Lycopolitan dialect has been copied into the end of a codex containing mathematical texts in Greek. The Coptic writing exercise(?) may have been added sometime in the first half of the fourth century, after the production of the codex (itself dated to late third or early fourth century).

The copying of scriptural excerpts, such as Chester Beatty Ac. 1390 and Bodl. Gr. Inscr. 3019, assumes a model for copying and thus the existence of full translations, at least of the relevant books. These Bodmer and Hamburg codices seem, in their linguistic and palaeographical features, to be part of the first wave of recorded full translations in Coptic, among which we also find a codex containing Melito's peri pascha; 2 Maccabees; 1 Peter; and Jonah in Sahidic (Schøyen MS 193, ed. Goehring 1990) and a Gospel of Matthew in the Mesokemic dialect (also in the Schøyen collection; Schenke 2001; cf. Leonard 2014). Alongside these two complete (or virtually so) codices, there are pages from Coptic versions of Job, found in a house at Karanis (Browne 1979 no. 2; Van Minnen 1994: 72), and Genesis, found in the cartonnage of the cover to Nag Hammadi Codex VII, along with a letter or homily from the same source (P. Nag Hamm. C1–2). Among papyri dated to the fourth century, the Dishna library (Robinson 2011) contains copies of numerous scriptural texts in Coptic, mostly in Sahidic (Exodus, Deuteronomy), along with some in other dialects (e.g. Genesis in Boharic). A wide range of other texts, including the New Testament, other Christian literature (1 Clement, Hermas, the Apocalypse of Elijah), Manichaean scripture (from Kellis, Gardner 1996, 2007), and perhaps (depending on their date) the Gnostic and Hermetic works in the Nag Hammadi Library (Williams 1996; Lundhaug and Jenott 2015), complete a picture of a vigorous programme of translation into Coptic of a wide range of literature happening at sites throughout Egypt, in communities of various sorts (Smith 1998; Feder 2007).

With the increasing use of Coptic as a vehicle for private communication and literary purposes in the fourth century, late antiquity provides progressively more evidence for the multilingual milieu within which Christianity in Egypt moved towards cultural dominance. This can be viewed in the literary tradition of the Pachomian monastic federation, with its frequent mention of interpreters in the narratives (e.g. in the Letter of Ammon, (ed. Goehring 1986), 5–6, 22–23, 28), and the bifurcated hagiographic tradition that produced closely related yet distinct Lives of Pachomius in both Greek and Coptic (Rousseau 1999: 37–48). From another angle, we can observe the thoroughgoing bilingualism of the papyrus assemblage from 'House 3' in the Dakhleh oasis village of Kellis, whose inhabitants wrote letters in both Greek and Coptic (also on occasion using Syriac), sometimes code-switching within the one letter (Gardner et al. 1999, 2014). For official communications and all legal purposes, Greek was retained; but among the personal documents (letters and private accounts), Coptic is strongly represented (Fournet 2009).

This dichotomy in language choice, in which Greek stays the preferred choice (and indeed the only legally permitted option) for any public document, remains until the Arab conquest, with Coptic only slowly beginning to be used for personal legal texts in the mid sixth century (Fournet 2010), by which time its use for other classes of personal documents, mostly letters, has increased considerably (Richter 2008; Fournet 2009). In ecclesiastical terms, Greek maintains its dominance in late antiquity. The Festal letters, by which the Bishops of Alexandria notified the Egyptian churches of the date of Easter and communicated other news, continued to be issued in Greek (though Coptic translations of them are increasingly apparent in the papyrological record). When a decorative wooden lintel was carved for the 'Hanging Church' (kinesa el-Muallaqa) in Cairo, perhaps as late as 735 CE, the accompanying text was in Greek (Török 2005: 351–358). Alongside this, original literary compositions in Coptic, including homilies, martyrdoms, monastic biographies and letters, became steadily more common, confirming the local language as an acceptable and useful option for such works. Its prominence was further raised in the centuries following the Arabic conquest, when it became both the norm for legal texts contracted between Egyptians and the vehicle for the elaborate output of monastic scriptoria such as the White Monastery in Sohag, before being superseded by Arabic for both daily use and literary composition in the second millennium, surviving thereafter only in the liturgy.

Bibliography

Adams, J. N., Janse, M. and Swain, S. (eds) (2002) Bilingualism in Ancient Society: Language Contact and the Written Word. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Askeland, C. (2012) 'The Coptic versions of the New Testament', in Ehrman, B. D. and Holmes, M. W. (eds) The Text of the New Testament in Contemporary Research: Essays on the Status Quaestionis, 2nd ed. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 201–230.

Bagnall, R. S. (2005) 'Linguistic change and religious change: Thinking about the Temples of the Fayoum in the Roman period', in Gabra, G. (ed.) Christianity and Monasticism in the Fayoum Oasis. Cairo, Egypt: American University in Cairo Press, 11–19.

Bagnall. R. S. (2009) Early Christian Books in Egypt. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Bell, H. I. and Thompson, H. (1925) 'A Greek–Coptic glossary to Hosea and Amos', Journal of Egyptian Archaeology 11: 241–246.

Black, M. (1998) An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts. 3rd ed. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Blumell, L. (2012) Lettered Christians: Christians, Letters, and Late Antique Oxyrhynchus. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Brashear, W., Funk, W.-P., Robinson, J. M. and Smith, R. (1990) The Chester Beatty Codex Ac. (1390) Mathematical School Exercises in Greek and John 10:7–13:38 in Subachmimic. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Breytenbach, C., Hallof, K., Huttner, U., Krumm, J., Mitchell, S., Ogereau, J. M., Sironen, E., Veksina, M. and Zimmermann, C. (eds) (2016) Inscriptiones Christianae Graecae (ICG): A Digital Collection of Greek Early Christian Inscriptions from Asia Minor and Greece. Berlin: Edition Topoi, (2016) Online at: repository.edition-topoi.org/collection/ICG.

Brock, S. (1997) 'Syriac culture, 337–425', in Cameron, A. and Garnsey, P. (eds) The Cambridge Ancient History, vol. 13: The Late Empire, AD 337–425. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 708–719.

Browne, G. M. (1979) Michigan Coptic Texts. Barcelona: Papyrologica Castroctaviana.

Burton, P. (2013) 'The Latin version of the New Testament', in Ehrman, B. D. and Holmes, M. W. (eds) The Text of the New Testament in Contemporary Research: Essays on the Status Quaestionis. 2nd ed. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 167–200.

Buth, R. and Notley, R. S. (2014) The Language Environment of First Century Judaea: Jerusalem Studies in the Synoptic Gospels, vol. 2. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Choat, M. (2012a) 'Christianity', in Riggs, C. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook to Roman Egypt. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 474–489.

Choat, M. (2012b) 'Coptic', in Riggs, C. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook to Roman Egypt. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 580–593.

Cribiore, R. (1996) Writing, Teachers, and Students in Graeco-Roman Egypt. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Crum, W. E. (1934) 'Un psaume en dialect d'Akhmim', in Mélanges Maspero, ii: Orient grec, romain et byzantin. Cairo, Egypt: Institut français d'Archéologie orientale, 73–76.

Depauw, M. (2007) The Demotic Letter: Study of a Scribal Tradition against Its Intra- and Intercultural Background. Sommerhausen, Germany: Gausich.

Depauw, M. (2012) 'Language use, literacy, and bilingualism', in Riggs, C. (ed.) Oxford Handbook of Roman Egypt. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 493–506.

Diebner, B. and Kasser, R. (1989) Hamburger Papyrus bil. 1: Die alttestamentlichen Texte des Papyrus bilinguis 1 der Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek Hamburg. Geneva: P. Cramer.

Dieleman, J. (2005) Priests, Tongues, and Rites: The London-Leiden Magical Manuscripts and Translation in Egyptian Ritual (100–300 CE). Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Edwards, J. R. (2009) The Hebrew Gospel and the Development of the Synoptic Tradition. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Evans, T. E. V. (2012) 'Complaints of the natives in a Greek dress: The Zenon archive and the problem of Egyptian interference', in Mullen, A. and James, P. (eds) Multilingualism in the Graeco-Roman Worlds. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 106–123.

Evans, T. E. V. and Obbink, D. (eds) (2010) The Language of the Papyri. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Feder, F. (2007) 'Die koptische Übersetzung des Alten und Neuen Testamentes im 4. Jahrhundert', in Tubach, J. and Vashalomidze, S. G. (eds) Stabilisierung und Profilierung der koptischen Kirche im 4. Jahrhundert: Beiträge zur X. internationalen Koptologentagung 2006. Halle, Germany: Universität Halle–Wittenberg, 65–93.

Fewster, P. (2002) 'Bilingualism in Roman Egypt', in Adams, Janse, and Swain, 2002: 220–245.

Fournet, J.-L. (2009) 'The multilingual environment of late antique Egypt: Greek, Latin, Coptic, and Persian documentation', in Bagnall, R. S. (ed.) The Oxford Handbook of Papyrology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 418–451.

Fournet, J.-L. (2010) 'Sur les premiers documents juridiques coptes', in Boud'hors, A. (ed.) Études coptes XI. Treizième journée d'études (Marseille, 7–9 June 2007). Paris: De Boccard, 125–137.

Gardner, I. (1999) 'An old Coptic ostracon from Ismant el-Kharab?', Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 125: 195–200.

Gardner, I., Alcock, A. and Funk, W.-P. (1999) Coptic Documentary Texts from Kellis I. Oxford, UK: Oxbow.

Gardner, I., Alcock, A. and Funk, W.-P. (2014) Coptic Documentary Texts from Kellis II. Oxford, UK: Oxbow.

Gardner, I., with contributions by Clackson, S., Franzmann, M. and Worp, K. A. (1996) Kellis Literary Texts, vol. I. Oxford, UK: Oxbow.

Gardner, I., with contributions by Choat, M., Franzmann, M. and Worp, K. A. (2007) Kellis Literary Texts, vol. II. Oxford, UK: Oxbow.

Goehring, J. E. (1986) The Letter of Ammon and Pachomian Monasticism. Berlin–New York: De Gruyter.

Goehring, J. E. (1990) The Crosby-Schøyen Codex MS 193 in the Schøyen Collection. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Goehring, J. E. (1999) 'Hieracas of Leontopolis: The making of a desert ascetic', in Goehring, J. E. (ed.) Ascetics, Society, and the Desert: Studies in Early Egyptian Monasticism. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 110–133.

Hoffmann, F. (2012) 'Hieratic and demotic literature', in Riggs, C. (ed.) Oxford Handbook of Roman Egypt. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 543–562.

Houghton, H. A. G. (2013) 'The use of the Latin Fathers for New Testament textual criticism', in Ehrman, B. D. and Holmes, M. W. (eds) The Text of the New Testament in Contemporary Research: Essays on the Status Quaestionis. 2nd ed. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 375–405.

Houghton, H. A. G. (2016) The Latin New Testament: A Guide to Its Early History, Texts, and Manuscripts. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press

Jakab, A. (2001) Ecclesia alexandrina: Evolution sociale et institutionnelle du christianisme alexandrin (IIe et IIIe siecles). Berne, Switzerland: Peter Lang.

Kahle, P. E. (1954) Bala'izah: Coptic Texts from Deir el-Bala'izah in Upper Egypt. 2 vols. London: Oxford University Press.

Kasser, R. (1960) Papyrus Bodmer VI: Livre des Proverbes. Louvain, Belgium: Secrétariat du Corpus SCO.

Kasser, R. (1965) 'Les dialectes coptes et les versions coptes bibliques', Biblica 46: 287–310.

Kasser, R. (1991) 'Dialect P', in Atiya, A. S. (ed.) The Coptic Encyclopedia, vol. 8. New York: Macmillan, 82–87.

Kasser, R. (2003) 'Considérations de phonologie dialectale copte, II: L'alphabet de P et de pP', Le Muséon 116: 289–328.

Keener, C. S. (1999) A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Kenyon, F. G. (1937) Chester Beatty Biblical Papyri, vol. 6: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ecclesiasticus. London: Walker.

Klotz, D. (2012) 'Egyptian hieroglyphs', in Riggs, C. (ed.) Oxford Handbook of Roman Egypt. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 563–580.

Leonard, J. M. (2014) Codex Schoyen 2650: A Middle Egyptian Coptic Witness to the Early Greek Text of Matthew's Gospel. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Loprieno, A. (1981–82) 'Methodologische Anmerkungen zur Rolle der Dialekte in der ägyptischen Sprachentwicklung', Göttinger Miszellen 53: 75–95.

Luijendijk, A. M. (2008) Greetings in the Lord: Early Christians in the Oxyrhynchus Papyri. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Lundhaug, H. and Jenott, L. (2015) The Monastic Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices. Tübingen, Germany: Möhr Siebeck.

Luz, U. (2007) trans J. E. Crouch. Matthew 1–7. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Mairs, R. (2012) 'Interpreters and translators in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt', in Schubert, P. (ed.) Actes du 26e Congrès international de papyrologie Genève 16–21 août (2010) Recherches et Rencontres, 30. Droz, Geneva, 457–462.

Metzger, B. M. (1977) The Early Versions of the New Testament: Their Origin, Transmission, and Limitations. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Mullen. A. and James, P. (eds) (2012) Multilingualism in the Graeco-Roman World. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Papaconstantinou, A. (ed.) (2010) The Multilingual Experience in Egypt from the Ptolemies to the Abassids. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate.

Parsons, P. J. (1970) 'A school-book from the Sayce collection', Zeitschrift fur Papyrologie und Epigraphik 6: 133–149.

Pearson, B. (2004) Gnosticism and Christianity in Roman and Coptic Egypt. New York and London: T&T Clark.

Peust, C. (1999) Egyptian Phonology: An Introduction to the Phonology of a Dead Language. Göttingen, Germany: Peust & Gutschmidt.

Quaegebeur, J. (1982) 'De la préhistoire de l'ériture copte', Orientalia Louvaniensia Periodica 131: 125–136.

Quecke, H. (1997) 'Eine griechisch–ägyptische Wörterliste vermutlich des 3. Jh. v. Chr. (P. Heid. inv.-nr. G 414)', Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 116: 67–80.

Richter, T. S. (2008) 'Coptic letters', in Grob, E. M. and Kaplony, A. (eds) Documentary Letters from the Middle East. The Evidence in Greek, Coptic, South Arabian, Pehlevi, and Arabic (1st–15th c CE). Bern, 2008 = Asiatische Studien 62(3): 739–770.

Roberts, C. H. (1979) Manuscript, Society and Belief in Early Christian Egypt. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Robinson, J. (2011) The Story of the Bodmer Papyri: From the First Monastery's Library in Upper Egypt to Geneva and Dublin. Eugene, OR: Cascade.

Rousseau, P. (1999) Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt. 2nd ed. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Rubenson, S. (1995) The Letters of St. Antony: Monasticism and the Making of a Saint. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Rutherford, I. C. (2010) 'Bilingualism in Roman Egypt? Exploring the archive of Phatres of Narmuthis', in Evans, T. V. and Obbink, D. (eds) The Language of the Papyri. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 198–207.

Satzinger, H. (1975) 'The old Coptic Schmidt papyrus', Journal of the American Research Center in Egypt 12: 37–50.

Satzinger, H. (1991) 'Old Coptic', in Atiya, A. S. (ed.) The Coptic Encyclopedia, vol. 8. New York: Macmillan, 169–175.

Schenke, H.-M. (2001) Das Matthäus-Evangelium im mittelägyptischen Dialekt des Koptischen (Codex Schøyen). Oslo, Norway: Hermes.

Smith, M. (1998) 'Coptic literature, 337–425', in Cameron, A. and Garnsey, P. (eds) The Cambridge Ancient History, vol. 13, The Late Empire, AD 337–425. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 720–735.

Snyder, H. G. (2011) 'A second-century Christian inscription from the Via Latina', Journal of Early Christian Studies 19: 157–195.

Snyder, H. G. (2014) 'The discovery and interpretation of the Flavia Sophe inscription: New results', Vigiliae Christianae 68: 1–59.

Tabbernee, W. (1983) 'Christian inscriptions from Phrygia', in Horsley, G. H. R. (ed.) New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, vol. 3. Sydney: Ancient History Documentary Research Centre, 128–139.

Tabbernee, W. (1997) Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia. Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Török, L. (2005) Transfigurations of Hellenism: Aspects of Late Antique Art in Egypt, AD 250–700. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Van Minnen, P. (1994) 'The roots of Egyptian Christianity', Archiv für Papyrusforschung und Verwandte Gebiete 40: 71–85.

Wessel, C. (ed.) (1989) Inscriptiones graecae christianae veteres occidentis, Inscriptiones Christianae Italiae, 1. Bari, Italy: Edipuglia.

Williams, M. A. (1996) Rethinking 'Gnosticism': An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Williams, P. J. (2013) 'The Syriac versions of the New Testament', in Ehrman, B. D. and Holmes, M. W. (eds) The Text of the New Testament in Contemporary Research: Essays on the Status Quaestionis. 2nd ed. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 143–166.

Wisse, F. (1995) 'The Coptic versions of the New Testament', in Ehrman, B. D. and Holmes, M. W. (eds) The Test of the New Testament in Contemporary Research: Essays on the Status Quaestionis. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 131–141.

PART VI

The intellectual heritage

Taylor & Francis
Taylor & Francis Group
http://taylorandfrancis.com

27

THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS

Carolyn Osiek

Introduction

The flow of early Christian writing did not cease with the New Testament and the second half of the first Christian century. With no evident break, it continued, including many of the works that would later be labeled 'apocryphal' and even 'heretical'.[1] Part of that stream of literary output constituted what in the mid seventeenth century came to be known as the 'Apostolic Fathers',[2] a collection of writings that was believed to have come not from the apostolic generation, but from those immediately trained by the apostles, and thus to be reflective of their faith. Several European scholars at that time took new interest in early Christian writings and seem to have seized on this idea in the same years with newly printed editions of most of these works, those of Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Ignatius and Polycarp. The letter of Diognetus, the fragments of Papias and the Apology of Quadratus were added by A. Gallandi in 1765. The Didache or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles was not discovered until 1873. Published in 1883, it was then added to the collection.

Since the inception of the collection, its core has been the first five authors, Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Ignatius and Polycarp, along with, once it was added, the Didache. Diognetus, Papias and the Martyrdom of Polycarp have drifted in and out, depending on the degree to which each editor wishes to be inclusive. Quadratus has more frequently been grouped with his own classification of second-century apologists, where Diognetus also belongs by genre. The early second-century writer Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, is said to have written five books of traditional and historical recollections that, unfortunately, survive only in quotations from later church writers. Thus there is no literary coherence to his surviving work. Here we will consider the two Letters of Clement, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Letter of Barnabas, the Didache, the Letters of Ignatius and Polycarp and the Martyrdom of Polycarp. All texts are readily accessible to English readers.[3]

Even within this more limited list, the diversity of literary genre is impressive and somewhat daunting: letters, treatises, apocalypse, church order and martyrdom account. As with the books of the New Testament, each arises from a specific context in the continuous life of Christians, which was of course lived within their own Greco-Roman and Jewish culture. Also, as with the New Testament, any attempt to synthesize or harmonize would be futile. Unlike the New Testament, as seen in the previous paragraph, there is not even full agreement on the number of writings in the collection. Some of these writings have left us considerable evidence of their context, and some precious little. Most of these works have always been known to scholars, though many of them suffered neglect over the centuries. They have been thought to represent the church immediately after the time of the writing of the New Testament, yet some of the earlier writings of the Apostolic Fathers (1 Clement, the Didache) may predate the last of the New Testament books. Their total time span is probably from the end of the first to somewhere in the middle of the second century. Thus rather than being the next step in Christian literature, they are really the overlapping and continuing thread that carries Christian tradition into the second century, 'a messy, confrontational century' (Wagner 1994: 223) that would end with an older, wiser, but more diverse Christianity than it began.

All of these writings might be said to contain in some way and in varying extent two factors: paraenesis or general moral teaching, and some issue of relationship to Israel. These factors give us a glimpse of some of the problems and challenges that beset these churches: how to maintain fervour and seriousness in a growing movement and how to sort out its increasingly complex and hostile situation vis-à-vis Judaism with its distinctive religious claims. Beyond that and their chronological affinity, there is not much that links them all.

Though the rhetorical strategy of 1 Clement is specific, it contains elements of general paraenesis. The same could be said for the Letter of Barnabas. While the Shepherd of Hermas is an apocalypse in structure, it contains long passages of moral instruction. The Didache is predominantly paraenetic but concludes with an apocalypse. The Letters of Ignatius and Polycarp, letters of friendship, thanks and persuasion, often include paraenetic sections. Even the Martyrdom of Polycarp, a theologized account of the protagonist's execution, offers him and others as examples of what to do and what not to do (2.1; 4.1).

The best way to describe the relationship of the earliest Christians to Israel is to say that they were part of it. The majority of the first generation were certainly Jews, and the Scriptures were an integral part of their teaching and worship. It is not clear at what point a majority Gentile Christianity completed its separation from its parent faith, but this process of the creation of a new identity was probably complete by the middle of the second century – which is not to say that there were no more conversions or families of mixed faith beyond that time. The Apostolic Fathers reflect a variety of steps along the way. 1 and 2 Clement draw widely on the Hebrew Scriptures and presume their validity for interpretation of the present Christian situation. The Shepherd of Hermas does the same for Hellenistic Jewish paraenetic traditions and seems to contain echoes of some major Jewish intertestamental writings, especially 4 Ezra. The Didache uses both. Ignatius has emerged from identification with Judaism (Ioudaismos) and asserts its inferiority to Christianismos (Epistle to the Philadelphians 6.1), while the Martyrdom of Polycarp acts out the new antagonistic relationship that will henceforth characterize the interaction between the two groups by implying that Jews participated in the persecution of the bishop-martyr and prevented his followers from getting his body after his death (12.1; 13.1; 17.2; 18.1). At the far extreme, Barnabas' entire message is that where Jews misunderstand the covenant and the law, Christians get them right. Thus within the collection of the Apostolic Fathers, the full range of ambiguous attitudes toward Judaism can be seen.

The writings

1 Clement

1 Clement may be the best known of the Apostolic Fathers today. It was included with the New Testament in the fourth-century Codex Alexandrinus. The text has therefore always been known and revered. By internal evidence, it is a letter from the church of Rome to the church of Corinth on the occasion of some kind of upheaval of leadership in the Corinthian church, in which the author seeks to persuade the Corinthians to return to the previous arrangement. Early tradition attaches to the letter the name of Clement, around whom there is more legend than historical information. An enormous amount of apocryphal literature was attached to his figure (Lightfoot and Harmer 1891: 1.14–103), ranging from his association with Peter in Rome to his exile by Trajan in the Crimea and the miraculous discovery there of his underwater tomb!

What can probably be safely affirmed is that Clement was a prominent leader in the Roman church toward the end of the first century and that there may be a connection between the Christian writer Clement and the family of Titus Flavius Clemens, who was executed and his wife, Flavia Domitilla, exiled by Domitian (81–96 CE) on a charge of atheism (that is, neglect of civil religion) and Judaizing (Dio Cassius, Epitome 67.14).

Church historians from Eusebius on have interpreted this charge of acquiring Jewish customs as a misinterpretation of the embracing of Christianity. Not that this Flavius Clemens would be the author of the letter, but it was the common custom of freedmen to adopt the personal name of their patron,[4] and it could be that large numbers of his household were Christian. Later church tradition names Clement as second or third successor of Peter as bishop of Rome. Since the leadership structure of a single bishop probably did not come to Rome for another century, this is obviously later harmonization, which does not preclude the possibility that Clement was indeed a strong leader in the Roman church of his time.

There is also a location in Rome with a very old tradition connecting it to the name of Clement. The Titulus Clementis, one of the designated oldest churches in Rome, is located to the southeast of the Flavian amphitheatre or Colosseum and the Ludus Magnus, the major gladiatorial training school. Both complexes were completed during the reign of Domitian. The fourth-century basilica of St. Clement was erected over parts of two earlier but post-Neronian buildings, one a brick structure, perhaps an apartment house that also contained a sanctuary of the god Mithras; the other a large building whose walls are of impressive hewn tufa blocks. This building, only partially excavated, seems to have consisted of small rooms around a large central courtyard, and was probably a warehouse. The altar of the fourth-century church lies directly over one of the rooms in the north wall of the warehouse building, not over a private residence. It is therefore quite possible that the location of the fourth-century church preserves a memory from a century earlier of a simple warehouse room in which Christians met for worship into the third century. Again, there is only circumstantial, but pre-Constantinian, evidence to connect the place with the name of Clement.

The dating of 1 Clement is based on the assumption of Christianity on the part of Titus Flavius Clemens, along with an oblique reference at the opening of the letter to 'sudden and repeated misfortunes and reverses' in Rome. This reference is often thought to refer to a persecution under Nero (54–68), but this is too far in the past, or under Domitian, enhanced by references in Rev. 1:9; 2:10, 13 and a traditional dating of Revelation during the reign of Domitian. The traditional dating of 1 Clement is therefore about 96. But recent scholarship has placed in serious doubt any kind of persistent persecution of the church by Domitian, and it has been shown that a reference to recent setbacks as an excuse for not having written sooner is a literary convention. Thus all attempts to date the letter precisely rest on circular and circumstantial evidence (Welborn 1984).

The letter is a carefully constructed argument intended to persuade the Corinthian church that unity is essential to their Christian identity, and that they have placed that unity in jeopardy by ousting the presbyters who had been governing the church and replacing them with another group of leaders.[5] The author first presents examples of how envy and strife placed obstacles in the path of various biblical characters and martyrs, including Peter and Paul (the earliest reference to their martyrdom, 5.4–5). Next, he proposes a long string of biblical examples of obedience and humility, including that of Jesus. His arguments show probable knowledge of 1 Corinthians, Romans and Hebrews, with some Gospel traditions. Arguments with regard to the resurrection and rewards promised to the faithful and from the need for authority and apostolic tradition lead to the climax of the rhetorical strategy: it is therefore not right to remove from their position of moral and liturgical leadership the persons appointed by those who followed in the steps of the apostles (44.3). The leaders of the 'revolt' are therefore urged to submit to the authority of the presbyters (57.1) and all to come to appropriate repentance.
Figure 27.1   Plan of the fourth-century church Titulus Clementis, over first/second-century CE buildings.
Copyright C. Osiek

1 Clement was enormously influential in succeeding centuries with church authorities who sought to consolidate centralized authority. Attention has been focused on chapter 42, in which the author expresses the beginning of a notion of apostolic succession: God sent Jesus, who gave the Gospel to the apostles, who passed it on to their disciples, appointed by them to be episkopoi (overseers or bishops) and diakonoi (ministers or deacons; see Phil. 1:1). With creative exegesis of Isa. 60:17 LXX, he argues that these offices were even foreseen by the prophet. Since in 57.1 the principal leaders of the community are presbyteroi (presbyters or elders), this title and that of episkopoi seem still to have been interchangeable in the churches of the time.

Figure 27.2   Peter and Clement on the main arch of the twelfth-century Basilica of San Clemente, Rome. ©Basilica di San Clemente (Rome). Reproduced courtesy of the Irish Dominican Fathers

It has been suggested that Clement's rather hierarchical and even military notions of the exercise of authority indicate his identification with the ruling class through participation as agent, as a powerful freedman would (Jeffers 1991). His purpose is not to develop a notion of apostolic succession or church authority, but to proclaim and urge the restoration of unity which he sees as absolutely essential to Christian living (Bowe 1988). Later, however, some of his arguments lent themselves nicely to developing hierarchical authority.

The Shepherd of Hermas

The Shepherd of Hermas, a book of revelations granted to Hermas in Rome by the agency of two heavenly figures (the first an old woman and the second an angel in the form of a shepherd), was well known and highly valued in the patristic church. Irenaeus, Clement and Origen speak of it in terms that suggest they considered it Scripture. Tertullian appreciated it greatly until his Montanist conversion, after which he could no longer tolerate its offer of a second chance to the repentant. Along with Barnabas, it was included toward the end of the Codex Sinaiticus of the New Testament in the fourth century. By the time of Eusebius and Athanasius, it was understood to be not part of the canon and therefore not to be read publicly, but nevertheless to be beneficial for private reading. Shepherd was the most widely read Christian book outside our present biblical canon in the first five centuries of the church. If today 1 Clement may be the best known of the Apostolic Fathers, Shepherd was then.

The whole text is divided into Visions, Mandates (or Commandments) and Similitudes (or Parables). These sectional divisions do not indicate shifts of genre, however, for there are visions and revelations, commandments and symbolic narratives throughout. In general appearance the book is an apocalypse, for it gives accounts of revelatory communications that have to do with human destiny in this world and beyond. The genre of apocalypse has long been disputed for the Shepherd, however, since the bulk of the content is allegorical paraenesis. In overall form its classification as apocalypse should be maintained, even if it stretches the limits of that genre to the utmost.[6]

The date of writing is uncertain, though the full text was probably written over a long period of time in which it was first proclaimed orally and only then in segments committed to writing. The earliest reference is to Clement who is to copy the message and send it to other churches, because 'that is what he is supposed to do' (Vis. 2.4.3). Undoubtedly, Clement the Roman church leader is intended. His role as church secretary fits perfectly with the letter attributed to him. Whether this is an actual contemporary reference to the historical Clement or a literary device to connect Hermas' revelation with a revered but past name is difficult to say. If it is genuine, and if the first letter of Clement is to be dated to the end of the first century (which as we have seen is not an airtight argument), then we have here the placement of the first and oldest part of the Shepherd around the same time. An outside reference, the Muratorian Canon, seeks to identify Hermas the author with a mid second-century Roman church leader named Pius. The reliability of this reference has also been much debated. If the sections of the book were composed gradually over time as the themes and images were developed and expanded in response to audience participation, it is not impossible that the composition may have spanned as long as thirty or forty years in the first half of the second century.

Provided that the clues to social setting are basically reliable,[7] we know more about the author of the Shepherd than about any other author in the Apostolic Fathers collection. According to the text, Hermas was a foundling at Rome, one of the abandoned infants frequently taken in by another family and raised as a slave. He was brought up in a Greek-speaking household, which would have been the case with the majority of lower class families in the capital, and later sold at least once to a woman named Rhoda (a Greek name that possibly indicates her own servile or at least non-Roman origins). Sometime later he was manumitted, either by her or more likely by a later owner, and as a Roman freedman, he was at the time of writing a married householder with grown children, heavily invested in commerce of some kind.[8]

At some point in the course of his adult life, Hermas believed that he had received a vision of great import and the responsibility to communicate it to the whole church of which he was a member, though not an official leader. The original core of that message is probably contained in Vis. 1.3. It is a call to change priorities and lifestyles based on the goodness of God the creator and on what God expects. The revelatory agent of the first part, the Visions, is an elderly woman who, besides giving oral revelation, shows him the vision of a tower that is being built on water. At the conclusion of the Visions, the woman disappears and an angel companion in the form of a shepherd comes to be with him and show him what more he must learn.

The Mandates are a body of moral teaching constructed for the most part along the lines of the 'Two Ways' tradition of instruction.[9] They contain the earliest Christian teaching on the discernment of spirits, a discussion of the criteria for true and false prophets, and discussions of the effects of double-mindedness. The third and longest section, the Similitudes (longer than both of the other sections combined), contains several distinctive images but is dominated by two: the cosmic willow tree and a recap of the tower. Both are used to illustrate the variety of ways in which believers respond to the call of faith.

Much of the teaching is done through allegory, using detailed examples from the visions. For example, in the first construction of the tower, square white stones that fit perfectly are church leaders alive or dead who ministered well and lived in harmony with one another, while the stones that are broken and thrown away are those who knew the truth but did not remain in it. Those with cracks are those who harbor malice against others, and the stones that are too short believe but have not completely gotten rid of, their evil ways (Vis. 3.5.1; 3.6.1–3).

The text teaches through images and parables, like that of the building of the tower (Vis. 3, Sim. 9.2–9); living in a strange country as an image of earthly existence (Sim. 1); the symbiotic agricultural relationship of elm and vine as illustration of how rich and poor are to relate in the church (Sim. 2); or the great cosmic willow tree, from which branches are taken and cultivated as illustrations of different ways of receiving and living the word of God (Sim. 8). Most of the images seem to come from a Greco-Roman common ground: the female personification of the church as initial revelatory agent, a shepherd as second revelatory agent and companion, the cosmic tree, the elm and vine, the tower, and the mountains of Arcadia.

Yet the Shepherd also contains long sections of direct paraenesis, moral instruction in virtuous living, mostly in the central section, the Mandates, but scattered throughout the full text as well. They rely rather on Hellenistic Jewish moral traditions, often on the 'Two Ways' tradition of illustrating both a negative way ('dark' or 'of death') and a contrasting positive way ('light' or 'of life').

The text shows hardly any interest in Christology. The name of Jesus does not appear, the name Christ only once in a doubtful variant reading at Vis. 3.6.6. The Son of God is brought in a few times, in puzzling ways in which he is first easily confused with the Holy Spirit (Sim. 5.5), then with the Great Angel who sends the angel-shepherd to be Hermas' guide (Sim. 9.12). At one point, the church, the Holy Spirit and the Son of God seem to be one (Sim. 9.1.1). The resolution of these confusions is to take each portion of the text on its own merits and not to try to work out a cohesive system in a text that was not written cohesively.

If Christology remains puzzling, ecclesiology in the Shepherd is highly developed. The idea of the church as both transcendent symbol and real life collective group with its strengths and weaknesses is very clear. The older woman who first appears to Hermas early identifies herself as the church, yet she interprets for him a vision of the tower being built – which is also the church. The church has both strong and weak members and is in the process of construction. When the tower is completed, the end will come. Yet in the course of the long narrative, the tower is never completed. The woman becomes progressively younger in Hermas' visions and she explains that the reason for this phenomenon is the conversion of church members to more fervent faith life.

The author's chief concern is the call to change of heart on behalf of his community. Their attitude that most troubles him is 'double-mindedness' (see Jas. 4:8; 2 Clement 19.2) which make people hesitate, doubt and be divided in their loyalties rather than go forward energetically with firm faith. There are many obstacles that lie in the way of such faith. One of the principal ones is too much attention paid to daily and business affairs, and the concern for what others (non-believers) will think to see them associating with lower status persons (e.g. Vis. 3.6.2, 5; Man. 10.1.4; Sim. 8.8.1; 9.20.1). Both of these concerns fit very well what we know of the freedman class in the first centuries of the empire: many were economically very successful and at the same time, in a highly status-conscious society, they were some of the most sensitive to their exclusion from high-status civic positions and to their own striving for status within their own socially limited sphere (Osiek 1983).

Quite in contrast to 1 Clement, the literary level of the Shepherd is not very high, and the text defeats all efforts to discover its complete structure. It is a long, sprawling document that shows signs of many levels of expansion in the form of additions and further thoughts on initial themes. The core of the text was probably formed from pieces of oral narrative, revised and added to many times, and finally put together into a whole text that therefore, understandably, cannot be read for internal cohesion (Osiek 1998). Nevertheless, it was highly appreciated in the early church both because of its imaginative and prophetic symbolism and its solid moral teaching.

The Second Letter of Clement to the Corinthians

The Second Letter of Clement has nothing in common with 1 Clement, but thematically comes closer to some parts of the Shepherd of Hermas. Yet by the fifth century in parts of the Greek and Syriac traditions, 2 Clement was attached to 1 Clement in manuscripts and may even have been considered Scripture in the Syriac Church. It is not at all a letter, but a homily or sermon, perhaps the oldest extant Christian sermon, with the possible exception of the canonical so-called Letter to the Hebrews, a treatise or sermon with a letter ending artificially added (Heb. 13:22–25). Nearly every section of 2 Clement begins with a hortatory subjunctive 'let us', as the author urges his hearers on to further excitement and commitment in the Christian life. The text seems intended to be proclaimed to a live congregation by a presbyter after the reading of some Scripture passage by a lector (17.3; 19.1). It is possible that the passage just read was Isa. 54:1, which receives lengthy comment in chapter 2. In the same chapter, a saying of Jesus that occurs in all three Synoptic Gospels, 'I came not to call righteous, but sinners' (Matt. 9:13; Mark 2:17; Luke 5:32) is quoted as graphē, the usual term for Scripture or authoritative text. That the cited source is not a saying of the Lord, but rather graphē, distinguishes the time of the author from the first generations (contrast for example 1 Cor. 7:10; 9:14).

Time and place of origin are unknown, and 2 Clement has received little attention from scholars. Four theories of origin have been proposed. Hilgenfeld, Harnack and Goodspeed suggested that it was the letter of Bishop Soter of Rome (c. 166–174) to Corinth reported by Eusebius (Historia Ecclesiastica 4.23.11), then kept together with 1 Clement in the archives where it eventually took on the same name (Lake 1912; Donfried 1973). Many have objected to this theory that in genre the text is really not a letter at all. Lightfoot noticed the references to athletic contests in 7.1–5 and suggested that the sermon was preached in Corinth at the time of the Isthmian games nearby sometime between 120 and 140, eventually winding up, as in the previous thesis, in the archives closely connected with 1 Clement (Lightfoot and Harmer 1891: 1.2.194–208). It is to be noted that the most prominent use of athletics in the genuine letters of Paul is also addressed to Corinth (1 Cor. 9:24–27). C. Richardson, stressing the anti-gnostic elements in the letter and its quotation from an apocryphal gospel known to have been circulating in Alexandria in the second century,[10] placed its origins in that time and place (Lightfoot and Harmer 1891, ed. by Holmes 1989: 66). Yet a fourth theory of origin is that it is a sermon preached by the reinstated presbyters at Corinth after the argument of 1 Clement was successfully acted upon there; thus it is to be dated earlier than is usually presumed, 98–100 (Donfried 1973, 1974). For Tuckett, the text is a sermon to an uncertain group of Christians in the context of liturgical prayer (2012: 23–25). While all of the above theories have points to commend them, none has won the support of a majority of scholars. The origins of 2 Clement remain a mystery.

The text may be divided form-critically into four sections: theological (1–2), ethical (3–14), eschatological (15–18) and conclusion (19–20) (Donfried 1973). The theology and ecclesiology are incarnational, perhaps even anti-gnostic (Donfried 1973, 1974). Here the text draws close to some of the concerns of the Shepherd of Hermas. While the church is the assembly of believers, it is also a transcendent feminine reality created before anything else (2 Clem. 14.1–2; Herm. Vis. 2.4.1). In both texts, the distinction between this preexistent church and Jesus (2 Clement) or the Son of God (Shepherd) is not totally clear. In an explicit exegesis of Gen. 1:27, with Eph. 5:23–32 lurking in the background, 2 Clement departs from Shepherd by going on to identify male with Christ and female with church, the spiritual church then being revealed in the flesh of Christ. The consequence of this identification is that the flesh must be safeguarded and honoured (here similarity with Herm. Sim. 5.6.5–7.4 returns), so that the one who abuses the flesh abuses the church and will not receive the Spirit, who is Christ (14.2–5). Also different from the Shepherd is the explicit connection in 2 Clement of this necessary reverence for the flesh with bodily resurrection (9.1–5).

The Didache

Recent years have seen a burst of interest in the Didache or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (Sandt and Flusser 2002; Milavec 2003; Schwiebert 2008; O'Loughlin 2010; Draper and Jefford 2015). It is extant in only one manuscript dated to 1056, discovered in the library of the patriarch of Jerusalem in Constantinople in 1873, and published in 1883. It is the earliest known document of the genre of church order, that is, a compilation of instructions and procedures about community life. The genre was later to grow into the major church order documents of the third and fourth centuries, the Didascalia and Apostolic Constitutions, for which the Didache serves as a literary basis. It is a much earlier document, usually dated to the turn of the first to second century, or perhaps a little earlier (Milavec 2003) and located somewhere in the east, perhaps Syria. Some would see the document as a whole treatise on a community's life (e.g. Milavec 2003), but it is really a composite of three different genres, each section probably having been written separately and later combined with the others by an editor. Chapters 1–6 are a moral instruction in the form of the Two Ways, traceable to Hellenistic Jewish teaching (Sandt and Flusser 2002). Chapters 7–15 are a true church order that gives procedures, first for liturgy and discipline (7–10), and then for reception of itinerant apostles and prophets, and finally for episkopoi and diakonoi (overseers and ministers; cf. Phil. 1:1) (11–15). Finally, chapter 16 is very different in genre, a mini-apocalypse that stirs to eschatological warning and expectation, with the ultimate enemies, false prophets, to arise from within the community itself. Concern about false teachers and an eschatological perspective, however, are also present in earlier parts of the text (6.1; 11.1).

The document is full of allusions similar to those of the canonical Gospels, most heavily to Matthew, including a version of the Lord's Prayer quite similar to Matthew's, to be prayed three times daily (chapter 8). Knowledge of that Gospel is generally presumed. The Two Ways teaching of chapters 1–6 contains several parallels to Barnabas 18–21, probably drawn from a common Jewish ethical teaching source that contains close ties as well to the later Doctrina Apostolorum and the earlier Manual of Discipline 3:13–4:26 from Qumran.[11] The teaching, prayers and attitude of the document are fundamentally Jewish, in spite of the warning not to fast on Mondays and Thursdays with 'the hypocrites' or pray as they do (8.1–2; cf. Matt. 6:5, 16; 23:13, 15 passim). As recent scholarship has recognized in the case of Matthew, this is likely intra-Jewish polemic between a messianic group and their critics rather than Jew vs. Gentile. The Didache can be seen as entirely the product of 'Christian' Jews.

The liturgical section (7–10) contains instructions for celebration of baptism and eucharist (using those terms) and for fasting. Three different baptismal formulae are given: 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit' (7.1), 'in name of Father and Son and Holy Spirit' (without articles, 7.3), and the probably earliest 'in name of (the) Lord' (9.5; cf. Acts 2:38; 8:16; passim). Baptism is ideally to be in cold running water, preceded by a fast of one or two days (7).

The formulaic prayer for eucharist has given rise to many speculations about the original form of the dominical eucharistic sayings, since it has no 'words of institution' like the Synoptic and Pauline narratives of the Last Supper. The prayers over cup and bread (in that order)[12] are Jewish blessing prayers, the latter concluding with the eschatological wish that the church might be gathered together in the kingdom (9). The ritual as given here may reflect a very early version of eucharist, an alternative to the Synoptic tradition (Schwiebert 2008), or a combination of agape meal and eucharist as sacred ritual. Whichever it is, the text witnesses to a wider variety of ways of celebrating eucharist in the early church than would be known only from canonical sources.

The structure of leadership in the community is puzzling. There are apostles, prophets and teachers – the three roles named by Paul in 1 Cor. 12:28, but they may not all be distinct, but rather interchangeable titles for the same people, based on the memory of earlier times when these were the most honoured titles of leadership. They seem to be itinerant preachers who visit communities to share teaching. While all grammatical references to these people are masculine, there is no reason to exclude that some could be women, since we know of female apostles, prophets and teachers in the Pauline churches and later (Rom. 16:7; 1 Cor. 11:5; Acts 18:26; 21:9).

There are established behavioural criteria for discerning the false prophet: ordering a meal 'in the spirit' and eating of it; asking for money and keeping it rather than giving to the needy; not practising what he/she preaches; staying more than three days without working (11.7–13; 12.2). The final chapter of the section on leadership (15) urges that episkopoi and diakonoi be honoured with respect equal to that of the prophets and teachers. Most commentators assume the itinerant apostle/prophets to be the earlier and recognized leaders, while this community is at the turning point of beginning to establish local, permanent leadership, perhaps exercised by the community patrons, under the titles of episkopoi and diakonoi (already in place much earlier in Philippi, for example, Phil. 1:1). It has been suggested that the reverse is true, that an established government by episkopoi and diakonoi is being put into question by the arrival of itinerant prophets (Draper in Jefford 1995: 291–294). However, the passage takes the apologetic offensive to make the point that episkopoi and diakonoi must be proven to be truthful, not 'lovers of money' because they also do the same ministry as the prophets and teachers. They are therefore not to be disregarded but to be held in equal honour (15.1–2). Clearly the 'overseers and ministers' are the newcomers who must be accepted.

The Didache fills in a gap in our knowledge of early church life that we might not even know existed without this text. Without it we would have very little knowledge of how sacramental practice was developing at that early stage, neither would we know the extent of apostolic itinerant forms of leadership beyond the Pauline era or the degree of genuinely Jewish spirituality that remained in early Christianity for a remarkably long time.

The Epistle of Barnabas

If the Didache is the work of the Apostolic Fathers that fits most easily within the matrix of Judaism, the Letter or Epistle of Barnabas is the one most directly engaged with Judaism and most directly and thoroughly in opposition to it. While it is hardly likely that Barnabas the companion of Paul is the author, from earliest traditions (a third-century Latin translation) the text has been ascribed to that name. Nearly all commentators take seriously the reference to the destroyed Temple and a rebuilding in the present by those who destroyed it (16.3–4); most would therefore assign the text to the last years of Hadrian's reign (117–138), when there was apparently some consideration of allowing the Jerusalem Temple to be rebuilt, though Hadrian in the end built a temple to Jupiter on the site in his new city of Aelia Capitolina. Evidence of the episode is elusive, and the reference in Barnabas can hardly be to the Temple of Jupiter itself. A quotation from Dan. 7:24 in Barn. 4.4 about ten kings followed by a little king who will subdue three of them seems to be taken by the author as prophecy fulfilled in his own day. No matter how commentators try to count emperors, all attempts to make the count come out to Hadrian are unconvincing.

The Greek text was included in the major fourth-century New Testament Codex Sinaiticus just before the Shepherd of Hermas, and with it was therefore probably considered Scripture by those who produced the codex. Barnabas is not really a letter at all, but a written treatise (17.2) that combines a theological argument (1–17) with a paraenetic instruction according to the Two Ways (18–21), although the literary motif of Two Ways extends throughout the work (Hvalvik 1996).

In the more traditional explicit Two Ways teaching of chapters 18–21, the Way of Light and the Way of Darkness are characterized by types of moral behaviour that are typical of Hellenistic Jewish teaching. The characterization is largely negative; even in the section on the Way of Light, most of the instruction consists not of positive descriptions of virtue but of prohibitions, including condemnations of accepted Greco-Roman practices of pederasty, abortion and infanticide (19.4–5). Some of the material in this section is in literary relationship with passages in the Didache. Sorting out the relationship between the two documents has been by way of a long and torturous path, some scholars at one time arguing the priority of one or of the other, but the consensus today is that both share a common Jewish paraenetic source (J. Kloppenborg in Jefford 1995: 88–92).

Figure 27.3   Restored façade of the second-century Temple of Hadrian at Ephesus. Photo C. Osiek

The more startling part of Barnabas is the first seventeen chapters. Here the author practises on the Hebrew Scriptures an allegorical method similar to that of Philo, though no direct influence of Philo can be detected. Probably a common Alexandrian allegorical training lies behind both authors. While Philo accepts cultic observances as part of the genuine meaning of the law, he leads reflection beyond practices to symbolic meaning. Barnabas, on the other hand, bypasses the first level of cultic observance by arguing that it was never meant to be, that the Israelites misunderstood the entire message of the cultic law by observing it ritually. For example, animals forbidden to be eaten are really types of certain kinds of human behaviour which the faithful are to shun (10.3–8). Rather, allegorical interpretation was intended by God from the beginning. Therefore, those who engage in such interpretation are the authentic interpreters and practitioners of the law and the covenant.

It is never explicitly said that 'the former people', are Jews and 'this people' are Christians (13.1) as the two terms are roughly juxtaposed in Ignatius (Epistle to the Magnesians 10.3; Epistle to the Philadelphians 6.1), but much of the allegory is christological, so there is no question that Christians are involved. Prophetic texts that critique cultic worship are cited as evidence that cult is not necessary. It is possible but not likely that the author simply represents a totally anti-cultic movement within Jewish Christianity. The polemic moves in an anti-Jewish direction. The Son of God came to fill up the sins of those who rejected the prophets (5.11). Their covenant has been broken so that the new covenant of Jesus might be sealed on our hearts (4.8). This author sees his group as quite distinct from Israel and as having superseded it.

The Letter of Barnabas is one of the first Christian writings that moves in a direction that was to appear increasingly in the second century, when one of the popular Christian literary genres was the treatise 'against the Jews', written to argue that the claims of Israel have now passed to Christians. The approximately contemporary Ignatius of Antioch would have approved.

The Letters of Ignatius of Antioch

The Letters of Ignatius of Antioch are 'a battleground for most of the central issues of the development of early Christianity' (Schoedel 1989: 462). They also have the most complicated manuscript history of any of the Apostolic Fathers, the collection occurring in three recensions, short, middle and long. The modern scholarly consensus, not without challenges, is that the middle recension of seven letters represents the authentic Ignatius (Schoedel 1985). What we know of him is that he was bishop of Antioch in Syria, condemned to death in the east, brought under guard probably in a group of condemned prisoners to Rome, and there executed ad bestias (by wild animals in the amphitheatre) probably under Trajan about 110. Along the way, he was allowed visits from local church members, to whom he then wrote. From Smyrna, he writes back to the churches of Ephesus, Magnesia and Tralles from which he had received emissaries, and forward to the church of Rome to announce the terms of his visit. Later from Troas he writes back to the churches of Philadelphia, Smyrna and a personal letter to the bishop of Smyrna, the famous Polycarp.

While in earlier times a collegial group alternately called episkopoi ('overseers') or presbyteroi ('elders') governed a local church, here in each of the communities to which Ignatius wrote (with the exception of Rome), as in his own church at Antioch, a single leader called an episkopos has emerged, assisted by presbyters and deacons. For the first time, that term can be understood as 'bishop' with a meaning roughly equivalent to its meaning today. The notable exception to this pattern was Rome, for neither in 1 Clement, nor in the Shepherd of Hermas, nor in Ignatius' Letter to the Romans is there any indication of other than the older style of collegial government there, and it is not until the last part of the second century that there is concrete evidence the Roman leadership structure has changed.

'We do not often see life from the prisoner's point of view in antiquity' (Schoedel 1985: 11). To Ignatius, his journey in captivity was like 'fighting wild animals', the military guards like leopards, giving worse treatment in exchange for kindness (Rom. 6.1). Yet he was able to think clearly through a number of issues. One of Ignatius' many concerns in most of his letters is that believers submit to the authority of the bishop and his presbyters (Eph. 6.1 (to the bishop as to the Lord himself); Magn. 13.2; Trall. 7.2; Phil. 7; Smyrn. 8; Pol. 6). What is not known is whether this form of governance was already well in place throughout Asia Minor where he was passing, or whether only in specific churches in communion with his own church of Antioch, or whether Ignatius is actively promulgating this form of church government in other churches as he travels west. When he writes to Rome, not only does he make no mention of current church leaders there, referring only to the memory of the apostles Peter and Paul,[13] but he also does not seek to foster the formation of any such leadership structures. Ignatius has no authority in Rome, where he comes begging them not to try to interfere in his martyrdom. By contrast, he does seem to have held at least the authority of a revered figure in the other churches to which he writes.

Figure 27.4   Second-century floor mosaic from Antioch depicting the evil eye attacked by various apotropaic instruments, from the Mosaic Museum. Photo by C. Osiek

Figure 27.5   Peristyle of a luxurious first- to second-century house in Ephesus; Terrace House B. Photo C. Osiek

Ignatius has two objectionable movements in mind, against which he speaks out forcibly, though it is also possible that each is an aspect of the other. One is the apparent desire of some gentile Christians in Philadelphia to adopt Jewish practices or beliefs. It must have been enticing to gentile converts taught through the Hebrew Scriptures to 'go all the way' into fuller Jewish observances, but Ignatius uses the strongest language up to his time in his denunciation of this tendency: 'It is better to hear Christianity from a circumcised man than Judaism from an uncircumcised one' (Phil. 6.1). He stands at that turning point in the relationship between Israel and the church in which the new movement turns its back on its roots, yet more and more claims their inheritance. In the absence of Jewish influence, his language of mystery cults and divine union suggests Greco-Roman religion as the preferred basis (Brent 2006, 2007).

His other and greater objection is to the denial of the reality of the full incarnation of Christ, or 'docetism'. The major issue for Ignatius is principally denial of his suffering and death, seen as the means of our redemption and resurrection (Trall. 10.1; Smyrn. 2–3). Without Christ's suffering and death, Ignatius believes his own would have no meaning. The threat is immediate and personal. Instead, he awaits being devoured by animals as God's wheat ground into the pure bread of Christ (Rom. 4.1). He was prepared to die, he wanted to die, and die he did.

Ignatius' younger friend Polycarp became one of the most revered figures of the early church. Born about 70, he was reputed to have been a disciple of John at Ephesus.[14] Irenaeus, later to become bishop of Lyons in Gaul, had known Polycarp when Irenaeus was a child. Polycarp became bishop at Smyrna early in the second century. At the age of about 40, he already held this position when Ignatius passed through western Asia Minor on the way to his death in Rome about 110. Besides writing a letter to the Christian community of Smyrna, as he did in the case of others he visited, Ignatius also wrote an extant personal letter to its bishop, Polycarp. This letter contains advice about various points of church administration in the areas of his dealings with widows, slaves[15] and celibates[16] among others. It enjoins Polycarp to encourage wives and husbands toward mutual love (with no language of submission!),[17] and the bishop should consent to their marriage (5.2). The letter is not quite totally private, however, for 6.1–7.1 gives instructions in the second person plural toward obedience to church leaders and mutual harmony.

The Letter of Polycarp

From Polycarp, one letter is extant, which may in fact be a composite of two letters.[18] The Letter of Polycarp was written to the Philippian community, presumably at their request (3.1). The distance from Smyrna to Philippi across the north Aegean Sea was about a one-week journey by sea, and these two churches may have had regular contact. We have no letter of Ignatius to the Philippians, but there may be circumstantial evidence that he passed through: the city is on the direct route along the Via Egnatia that Ignatius must have taken to Rome from Troas (Figure 27.6), his last recorded location; and he is mentioned twice by Polycarp in the letter, first (9.1) as an example 'that you have seen with your eyes', then several times in the final chapter, as one who with them wished to send letters to Syria, while they wished to have copies of Ignatius' letters to other churches (13.1, 2).

Figure 27.6   Section of the Via Egnatia alongside the forum of Philippi and looking east, showing wheel grooves worn in the stone. Photo Philip F. Esler

The Letter of Polycarp is a good example of the adaptation of the New Testament household code, with its instructions to various household members about their mutual obligations, to the context of the church as extended household. Already observable in the Pastoral Epistles, this literary adaptation gives instructions to various members of the church. The androcentric perspective of the household codes remains, so that leading men are giving directions to the rest. Thus we (male leaders) should teach 'ourselves' to follow the Lord's commands (4.1), then 'our' wives and widows (4.2–3), then deacons, young men, and virgins or young women (5.2–3). Finally, presbyters are admonished about their duties in 6.1. This format gives us a valuable insight into the way that the church was becoming a tight-knit society that could make the same claims on its members that kinship systems would make. Already at work in the Synoptic Gospels, this tendency became stronger rather than weaker in the second century.

The Martyrdom of Polycarp

Polycarp is best known not from his brief letter but from the account of his martyrdom that happened at Smyrna probably in 155 or 156, or perhaps as late as 167 (Lightfoot and Harmer 1891, ed. by Holmes 1989: 131–132) when he was eighty-six years old. The Martyrdom of Polycarp, though substantially reworked with theological themes, is our oldest Christian martyrdom account and is at its core undoubtedly authentic (see the history of scholarship by Dehandshutter in Gregory and Tuckett 2005b). Originally written as a letter from the church of Smyrna to that of Philomelium in Phrygia (prescript), the text soon became widely known. The testimony now found at the end of the manuscripts indicates the importance assigned to it in antiquity by those who reverenced the memory of Polycarp. There are several obvious additions, chapters 21–22, giving among other things the exact day of his death, 23 February (but not the year), and part of the manuscript's history: copied by one Gaius from Irenaeus' papers, then again from Gaius by Socrates of Corinth, then again by one

Figure 27.7 Roman agora of Smyrna (modern Izmir), restored after earthquake damage in 178 CE. Photo C. Osiek

Pionius of Smyrna, possibly to be identified with a martyr of the same name during the persecution of Decius in the middle of the third century. Eusebius paraphrases or quotes nearly the whole text (H.E. 4.15–46).

The account is a keystone in the shaping of the heroic tradition of the martyr. It is composed in such a way as to configure the sufferings of Polycarp to those of Christ. Yet intriguing details emerge. A dream vision of his pillow on fire tells him that he will be burnt alive (5). When the authorities come to arrest him late in the day, he orders a meal to be served to them while he has time to pray (7). During his public trial, when asked to renounce Christ, he says that he cannot renounce one he has served for eighty-six good years (9). The play on 'atheism' in the encounters of Christians and their world is brought out: while Christians consider others atheists for denying the one true God, the others consider Christians atheists for denying their gods (9.2). Yet miraculous elements are also present: when Polycarp's lifeless body is stabbed, out of it comes a dove and enough blood to quench the fire (16.1). The cooperation of Jews in doing away with him is strongly presented (12.2; 13.1; 17.2; 18.1). This first martyrdom account set the stage for many directions that were just beginning: the glorification of martyrdom, Christian anti-Judaism and the use of miraculous stories in the accounts of saints' lives and deaths.

Conclusion

The Apostolic Fathers represent just the beginning of what post-New Testament Christian literature was to become. In their diversity, these writers allow us to glimpse some of the ways in which Christianity was becoming enculturated in its world, while at the same time creating for itself a new identity that was eventually to be a primary factor in the transformation of that same world.

Notes

1 The first two editions of the Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (1958, 1974) remarked contemptuously that although 'full of reminiscences of the NT, they are on an altogether lower spiritual level'. The editors of later editions, F. L. Cross and E. A. Livingstone (1997, 2005) have thought better of that judgement.

2 J. B. Cotelier is usually credited with being the first user of the term in his Patres, qui temporibus Apostolicis floruerunt (1672), but the credit should probably go to an archbishop of Canterbury, William Wake (1657–1737) with his prior use of 'Apostolical Fathers' (De Jonge 1978; Schoedel 1989).

3 For the texts, with introduction, discussion and bibliography, see originally Lightfoot and Harmer 1891, updated by Michael Holmes for the second edition of 1989; more recently, Ehrman 2003 and Holmes 2007. Jefford 2005 and Pratscher 2010 provide summaries of contents, discussion and bibliography.

4 In the early empire, the tria nomina system was used by free Roman citizen males, whereby they had a praenomen or personal name (Titus), a nomen of family name (Flavius) and an additional name, a cognomen (Clemens). The freedman usually took the praenomen and nomen of his former owner and new patron, and used his own personal slave name as a cognomen. Thus a hypothetical freed slave of Titus Flavius Clemens named Eutyches would become Titus Flavius Eutyches, not Clement. The cognomen was more widely used even by those with no affinity. Nothing, therefore, can be proved certainly about the connection of a writer named Clement to this aristocratic family.

5 Most commentators assume on the basis of 1 Clem. 3.3 ('the young [rose up] against the old') that the Corinthian 'young Turks' have ousted the old guard in a generational coup, but the passage is part of a rhetorical cliché and must not be taken literally (Bowe 1988: 18–19).

6 The text meets the criteria for apocalyptic genre established by Collins 1979; cf. Osiek 1986.

7 Commentators have had various assessments of the historicity of biographical references, from total acceptance to the judgement that they are used allegorically to refer to the whole community (Dibelius 1923), to cautious optimism about the integration of personal details and literary motifs (Brox 1991), to total doubt that they are anything more than the literary strategy of the author (Peterson 1959). Cf. Osiek 1999: 18–24.

8 Vis. 1.3.1; 2.3.1; Man. 3.5; specifically of Hermas; more generally, Vis. 3.11.3; Man. 10.1.4–5; Sim. 4.5, 7; 8.8.1–2 passim; Osiek 1983. An interesting possible model for Hermas is Lucius Caecilius Jucundus, son of a freedman at Pompeii, owner of a spacious house, whose business records included 137 sales receipts and 16 rental receipts in a wooden chest.

9 A Jewish moral tradition widespread in the Hellenistic and Roman period; cf. Kraft 1965: 4–16; extensive discussion and bibliography in Osiek 1999, Introduction 3.3.

10 12.2: 'When the two will become one, and the outside as the inside, and the male with the female neither male nor female' (then the kingdom will come). Clement of Alexandria attributes the saying to the Gospel of the Egyptians, of which only such fragments quoted in other authors are known. The same saying appears in Gospel of Thomas 23 from Nag Hammadi. It is interesting to note that 2 Clement quotes the saying favourably and exegetes it for the rest of the chapter.

11 For further references and bibliography, see Schoedel 1989: 467–468.

12 The order cup-bread also appears in 1 Cor. 10:16–17 and Luke 22:17–18 in the Western text, with the order cup-bread-cup in the majority of manuscripts. For discussion of this text-critical problem, see Fitzmyer 1985: 1388–1389.

13 Rom. 4.3. After 1 Clem. 5.4–5, this is the second earliest mention of the tradition connecting these two apostles with Rome.

14 So Irenaeus, quoted by Eusebius H.E. 5.20.5. There were a number of traditions about 'John', most eventually connected with Ephesus: John son of Zebedee, John the evangelist, John the presbyter (probably a different person, author of the Letters of John), and the named author of Revelation (Rev. 1:9). Later tradition tended to fuse them all into one figure.

15 Ignatius Pol. 4.3 tells Polycarp not to treat slaves arrogantly but, like all Christian literature of the time, takes the institution of slavery for granted. Slaves are to continue in their service and not to expect the church to post the money for them to buy their freedom – an intriguing insight into how slavery worked in the church at this time. See Harrill 1993.

16 Ignatius Pol. 5.2 instructs that anyone wishing to remain celibate (literally, en hagneia, 'innocent') 'out of reverence for the flesh of the Lord' should do so privately, making his or her intention known only to the bishop. This is one of the earliest references to the practice of deliberate and prolonged Christian celibacy.

17 It is characteristic of the Christian literature of this period, with one exception (1 Clem. 1.3) that the submission of wives to husbands, so prevalent in the later New Testament (Col. 3:18; Eph. 5:22–24; 1 Pet. 3:1–6), disappears. The language of submission remains, but it is now directed to all church members in their submission to church authority.

18 The final two chapters (13–14) sound as if they were written at a prior time, when Ignatius had just left and Polycarp is anxious to hear news of him. Yet earlier in the letter, Ignatius seems to be a revered figure consigned with Paul among past heroes (9.1). Many scholars have suggested that chapters 13–14 were written first but added later to an earlier letter, resulting in what we now have. There is by no means consensus on this question (Lightfoot and Harmer 1989).

Bibliography

Bowe, B. E. (1988) A Church in Crisis: Ecclesiology and Paraenesis in Clement of Rome. Harvard Dissertations in Religion 23. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Brent, A. (2006) Ignatius of Antioch and the Second Sophistic: A Study of Early Christian Transformation of Pagan Culture. Studies and Texts in Antiquity and Christianity 36. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Brent, A. (2007/2009) Ignatius of Antioch: A Martyr Bishop and the Origin of the Monarchical Episcopacy. Ebook 2007; print 2009. London: T & T Clark.

Brox, N. (1991) Der Hirt des Hermas. Kommentar zu den Apostolischen Vätern 7. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Collins, J. J. (ed.) (1979) Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre. Semeia 14. Missoula, MN: Scholars Press.

Dehandschutter, B. (2005) 'The New Testament and the Martyrdom of Polycarp', in Gregory and Tuckett, 2005b: 395–405.

De Jonge, H. J. (1978) 'On the origin of the term "Apostolic Fathers"', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 29: 503–505.

Dibelius, M. (1923) Der Hirt des Hermas. Handbuch zum Neuen Testament Ergänzungsband; Apostolischen Väter 4. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck).

Donfried, K. P. (1973) 'The theology of 2 Clement', Harvard Theological Review 66: 487–501.

Donfried, K. P. (1974) The Setting of 2 Clement in Early Christianity. Supplements to Novum Testamentum 38. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill Publishing Company.

Draper, J. A. (ed.) (1996) The Didache in Modern Research. Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums 37. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill Publishing Company.

Draper, J. A. and Jefford, C. N. (2015) The Didache: A Missing Piece of the Puzzle in Early Christianity and Its Literature. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Ehrman, B. D. (2003) The Apostolic Fathers. 2 vols. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Fitzmyer, J. (1985) The Gospel According to Luke. vol. 2. Anchor Bible 28a. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Gregory, A. F. and Tuckett, C. (eds) (2005a) The Reception of the New Testament in the Apostolic Fathers. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press.

Gregory, A. F. and Tuckett, C. (eds) (2005b) Trajectories through the New Testament and the Apostolic Fathers. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press.

Harrill, Albert J. (1993) 'Ignatius, Ad Polycarp 4.3 and the corporate manumission of Christian slaves', Journal of Early Christian Studies 1: 107–142.

Hartog, P. (2013) Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians and the Martyrdom of Polycarp. Introduction, Text, and Commentary. Oxford Apostolic Fathers. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Holmes, M. W. (2007) The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations. 3rd. ed. Ada, MI: Baker Academic.

Hvalvik, R. (1996) The Struggle for Scripture and Covenant: The Purpose of the Epistle of Barnabas and Jewish-Christian Competition in the Second Century. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2.82. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Jeffers, J. S. (1991) Conflict at Rome: Social Order and Hierarchy in Early Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress.

Jefford, C. N. (ed.) (1995) The Didache in Context: Essays on Its Text, History and Transmission. Supplements to Novum Testamentum 77. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill Publishing Company.

Jefford, C. N. (2005) The Apostolic Fathers: An Essential Guide. Nashville, TN: Abingdon.

Jefford, C. N. (2013) Didache: The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles. Early Christian Apocrypha. Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge.

Kraft, R. A. (1965) Barnabas and the Didache. Apostolic Fathers 3. Toronto/New York/London: Thomas Nelson & Sons.

Lake, K. (1912) The Apostolic Fathers. LCL 25. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Lightfoot, J. B. and Harmer, J. R. (1889–1890) The Apostolic Fathers: Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp. 2nd ed. New York: Macmillan. Reprint: Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House. Five volumes.

Lightfoot, J. B. and Harmer, J. R. (1891) The Apostolic Fathers. 2nd ed. London: Macmillan, 1891. Ed. and rev. by M. W. Holmes (1989). Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House.

Milavec, A. (2003) The Didache: Faith, Hope and Life of the Earliest Christian Communities, 50–70 C.E. New York: Newman.

O'Loughlin, T. (2010) The Didache: A Window on the Earliest Christians. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House.

Osiek, C. (1983) Rich and Poor in the Shepherd of Hermas*: An Exegetical-Social Investigation*. Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series 15. Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association.

Osiek, C. (1986) 'The genre and function of the Shepherd of Hermas', in Collins, A. Y. (ed.) Early Christian Apocalypticism: Genre and Social Setting. Semeia 36. Decatur, GA: Scholars Press.

Osiek, C. (1998) 'The oral world of early Christianity in Rome: The case of Hermas', in Donfired, K. P. and Richardson, P. (eds) Judaism and Christianity in First-Century Rome. Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans Publishing.

Osiek, C. (1999) The Shepherd of Hermas. Hermeneia. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress.

Paget, J. C. (1994) The Epistle of Barnabas: Outlook and Background. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2. 64. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Peterson, E. (1959) Frühkirche, Judentum, und Gnosis. Freiburg, Germany: Herder.

Pratscher, W. (ed.) (2010) The Apostolic Fathers: An Introduction. Trans. E. G. Wolfe. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Sandt, H. W. and Flusser, D. (2002) The Didache: Its Jewish Sources and Its Place in Early Judaism and Christianity. Compendia rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum 5. Assen, The Netherlands: Van Gorcum; Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Schoedel, W. R. (1985) Ignatius of Antioch. Hermeneia. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Schoedel, W. R. (1989) 'The Apostolic Fathers', in Epp, E. J. and MacRae, G. W. (eds) The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press; Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 457–498.

Schwiebert, J. (2008) Knowledge and the Coming Kingdom: The Didache's Meal Ritual and Its Place in Early Christianity. London: T&T Clark.

Tuckett, C. (2012) 2 Clement. Introduction, Text and Commentary. Oxford Apostolic Fathers. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Wagner, W. H. (1994) After the Apostles: Christianity in the Second Century. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Welborn, L. L. (1984) 'On the date of 1 Clement', Biblical Research 29: 35–54.

Zwierlein, O. (2014) Die Urfassungen der Martyria Polycarpi et Pionii und das Corpus Polycarpianum. Band 1: Editiones criticae. Band 2: Textgeschichte und Rekonstruktion. Polykarp, Ignatius und der Redaktor Ps.-Pionius. Untersuchungen zur antiken Literatur und Geschichte 116.1, 116.2. Berlin: Walter De Gruyter.

28

THE APOLOGISTS

Anders-Christian Jacobsen

In this chapter, I will first give a short definition of whom I include in the group of early Christian Apologists and give a short description of these.[1] Afterward, I will discuss the addressees of apologetic texts, the motive of defence and its relation to identity formation, some apologetic strategies and, finally, the most common motives in apologetic treatises.

Apologies and Apologists: a brief definition

Apologists can be found in many cultural, political and religious settings. Of concern to us in this context are the Christian Apologists from the second and the first half of the third centuries CE. This group can be defined in many different ways depending on the chosen criteria. In my opinion, we cannot identify or define apologetic texts as a specific literary genre based on, e.g. form or address-ees.[2] Instead, we must take as a starting point the meaning of ἀπολογία (apologia) in Greek. Whereas in English everyday use, an apology is mostly used as an expression of regret, the Greek word meant an oral or written speech of defence or justification. Thus, the primary criterion in this chapter for being included in the group of Apologists from this period is the necessity to have written a treatise whose main aim is to refute accusations (real or portrayed) raised against Christians by non-Christians – and thus to defend the Christians against these charges. This definition excludes persons and treatises that defend accusations against, for example, Judaism or Greek and Roman philosophy and religion. It also excludes treatises that only refute accusations against Christians and Christianity as a minor side effect. Finally, it also excludes authors of treatises who participate in internal Christian polemic and conflicts. This leads us to include the following authors among the Christian Apologists from the second and the first half of the third centuries CE: Aristides, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Tertullian, Minucius Felix and Origen.[3]

Little is known about the life of Aristides, but it is fairly certain that he lived in second-century Athens where he practised philosophy, both before and after his conversion to Christianity. He probably died around 133–134 CE. Aristides' Apology was probably composed between 120 and 130 and is the oldest of the apologies to be treated here.[4] In his text, Aristides first divides humankind into four categories – Barbarians, Greeks, Jews and Christians. He then presents his interpretation of these categories and their religious beliefs and practices and concludes, not surprisingly, that the Christians are superior to the others. Finally, he requests that the emperor, Hadrian, stops persecuting the Christians and converts to Christianity.

Justin Martyr was born into a pagan family in Flavia Neapolis (modern Nablus), in Samaria, around 100 CE and lived until 165 (see Figure 28.1). After having attended a number of different philosophical schools, he eventually encountered and converted to Christianity. Two of his apologies (usually referred to as First and Second Apology) have been preserved. The first is addressed to Antoninus Pius, who was emperor between 138 and 161. In this apology, Justin first argues that the legal treatment of the Christians is absurd and wrong, and he urges the emperor to change this situation. He then describes the teaching of Jesus and tries to prove that Jesus was the son of God by using texts from the Old Testament. The second apology was probably originally part of the first apology. In this, Justin discusses the Christian martyrs, demons as well as eschatological themes.[5]

Tatian was born in Assyria (most likely) and travelled to Rome where he after his conversion to Christianity became the pupil of Justin Martyr.[6] Before his death in 185, he wrote, among other texts, a treatise called Oratio ad Graecos, probably between 155 and 170. As the title reveals, the treatise is addressed to the Greeks, but without further specification. Tatian's overall message is that Christianity in all respects is superior to Greek religion and philosophy.[7]

In a preserved fragment, Athenagoras introduces himself as an 'Athenian, Philosopher and Christian' (Codex Parisinus Graecus 451), but apart from the knowledge that he lived in the second century, this is more or less all that we know of him. Athenagoras was the author of a treatise entitled Embassy for the Christians or – with its Latin title – Legatio pro Christianis. It seems most likely that the treatise was written between 176 and 180 CE and that it was addressed to the Roman emperors Marcus Aurelius and his son Commodus. The main charges against which Athenagoras defends the Christians are atheism, incest, promiscuity and cannibalism.[8]

Theophilus was a patriarch of Antioch and lived until c. 184. He seems to have converted to Christianity after reading the scriptures, but other facets of his life are not mentioned in the writings. His only extant work is the treatise Ad Autolycum, which was named after the text's addressee, Autolycus. He was a learned pagan with whom Theophilus, according to the text, had had conversations about the truth of Christianity. Autolycus was not convinced, however, for which reason Theophilus decided to address a treatise to him containing arguments for the fallacy of Greek religion and the truth of Christianity. These arguments include a number of the common apologetic topoi

Figure 28.1   Nablus, Samaria, the birthplace of Justin. From a lithograph in Keightley (1883: 114)

Figure 28.2   The Roman Forum in the eighteenth century. Etching by Giambattista Piranesi, from Vedute di Roma Disegnate ed Incise da Giambattista Piranesi, Architetto Veneziano, died 1778

but also quite a long interpretation of the first chapters of Genesis, which is not something we find in other apologetic texts. The treatise is written after 180.[9]

Tertullian lived from c. 160–220 in Carthage in the Latin North Africa (where he would have almost certainly used the Baths of Antoninus (Figure 28.4)), and his conversion most likely took place towards the end of the second century. He wrote many – still extant – texts, but one of the most important is his Apologeticum written just before 200 (probably 197). In this treatise, Tertullian touches upon many common apologetic themes, such as criticizing the Roman legislation, denying that Christians commit secret crimes and defending the Christians against charges of not paying proper and due attention to the divine and to the emperor.
Figure 28.3   A nineteenth-century lithograph of Antioch-on-the-Orontes. From Lortet (1884: 199)

We have very few facts about the life of the Latin author Minucius Felix, but it seems quite certain that he lived in Rome and died around 250 CE. He has left us a text called Octavius, after the main character of the treatise. The treatise cannot be dated with any kind of precision, but according to most modern researchers, it is written after Tertullian's Apologeticum from around 197. The narrative setting of Octavius is three friends taking a leisurely walk along the Tiber from Rome to Ostia. During the walk, Octavius – being a Christian – argues so strongly for the superiority of Christianity over and against the absurdities of polytheism that Caecilius converts to Christianity.

Origen, who lived from 185 (when he was born into a Christian family) to 253/54, was the latest of the theologians whom I count in the group of early Christian Apologists. He was the author of numerous dogmatic and exegetical texts and commentaries, but his text Against Celsus is the only apologetic text he wrote. This was written around 248 and was aimed at refuting a text by Celsus against Christians (The True Discourse) from c. 170. From Origen's long and detailed treatise Against Celsus, we get a very good impression of the debate between Christians and non-Christians in the second half of the second century as well as a valuable insight into what the problems and solutions were in the eyes of probably the most important theologian of the third century. The overall argument in Origen's treatise Against Celsus is that Christianity had morally improved the lives of Christian converts, a fact which, to Origen, proves both the validity of Jesus' mission and the value of Christian doctrines.

Figure 28.4 Ruins of the Baths of Antoninus from ancient Carthage, constructed 145–165 CE. Wikimedia Commons: photo by Bernard Gagnon

Addressees

With a few exceptions, Christian Apologists explicitly addressed readers outside the group to which they belonged – typically, the Roman authorities, e.g. the emperors, or the Apologists' Greek friends, etc. Justin, for example, addressed his apologies to the emperor Antoninus Pius; Tatian addressed his treatise to 'Greek men'; Athenagoras addressed his writing to Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Aurelius Commodus, who are called philosophers; and Theophilus' treatise is dedicated to the pagan Autolycus. The question is, however, whether these writings, in reality, were addressed to these authorities and individuals and to them alone.

In the early period of modern scholarship, these explicit addressees were most often taken also to be the implied addressees. Thus, in the introduction to G. Krüger's edition of Justin's apologies (1904), it is simply taken for granted that Justin's treatises are addressed to the emperor. Moreover, in the introductory note to the translation of Justin's apologies in the Ante-Nicene Fathers, it is stated that, 'He [Justin] tells the professional philosophers on a throne how false and hollow is all wisdom that is not meant for all humanity and that is not capable of leavening the masses'.[10] The addressee is thus taken to be the emperor. Further, B. Altaner claims without any discussion or differentiation that the Christian apologies from the second century were written for the emperors.[11]

As these examples demonstrate, we do not find any discussions about whether or not the explicit readers are also the implied readers in many early scholarly books. But we also find examples from the early modern scholarly literature on early Christian apologetics where the straightforward identity of the addressees is questioned. This is, for instance, the case when O. Bardenhewer states, 'Die Verteidigungsschriften der Christen sind durchweg an eine heidnische Adresse gerichtet, wenngleich dieselben ihre Leser jedenfalls von Anfang an zumeist in christlichen Kreisen gesucht und gefunden haben' (Christians' defence writings are all addressed to pagan addresses, although they from the very beginning sought and found most readers in Christian circles).[12] Similarly, Quasten introduces his chapter on the second-century Christian Apologists with the words:

> Whereas the works of the Apostolic Fathers and of early Christianity were directed to the guidance and edification of the faithful, with the Greek Apologists the literature of the Church addresses itself for the first time to the outside world and enters the domain of culture and science.[13]

This is true insofar as the Apologists also aimed at convincing an audience extending beyond the explicit addressees – for example, philosophically educated Greeks in general – but as I will argue later, Christians themselves were most likely a main part of the Apologists' targeted audiences.

The suspicion that the explicitly mentioned addressee was, in fact, not the (only) implied reader is obviously strengthened by the observation that in some cases, this simply cannot have been the case. Thus, in Origen's mid third-century text Against Celsus it is obvious – to the readers and to the author, Origen – that the explicit addressee, Celsus, would never read the treatise because he was long dead when Origen wrote his treatise against him (cf. C. Cels. praef. 4). Neither is Contra Celsum directed at Celsus' cultural, religious or philosophical heirs; it is rather directed at the weak Christians who were affected by the critique raised by Celsus, as is clear from C. Cels. praef. 4:

> But nevertheless, since in the multitude of those who are considered believers some such persons might be found as would have their faith shaken and overthrown by the writings of Celsus, but who might be preserved by a reply to them of such a nature as to refute his statements and to exhibit the truth, we have deemed it right to yield to your injunction, and to furnish an answer to the treatise which you sent us, but which I do not think that anyone, although only a short way advanced in philosophy, will allow to be a True Discourse, as Celsus has entitled it.

In such cases, the implicit readers were obviously other Christians, and the function of apologetics was to strengthen the accused group itself.

In recent research on apologetics, the widespread straightforward identification between explicit and implied addressees has been increasingly questioned, and many scholars now realize that the implied readers of apologetic texts were, in fact, persons belonging to the author's own grouping. M. Fiedrowicz basically holds that early Christian apologetics were provoked from the outside and considers non-Christians to be the main addressees of early Christian apologetics. He is, however, aware that Christians also read the early Christian apologies and that an additional function of these texts, therefore, was to provide Christians with arguments against their non-Christian critics.[14] M. Edwards et al. even suggest that, in fact, not many others than Christians have read the apologetic treatises, a suggestion stemming from their judgement that the content and the style were not inviting for others than Christians.[15] Thus, it is highly probable that the writings also had a function within the Christian community because they could provide Christians with arguments which they could use when forced to explain and defend themselves. Indeed, Philip Esler has argued that where early Christian writings of this sort really had a Christian, rather than an outsider audience in view, the terms 'apology' or 'apologetic' are inappropriate in relation to them and it makes better sense to see them, to use the sociology of knowledge of Peter Berger and Thomas Luckmann, as exercises in 'legitimation', that is, as attempts to explain and justify Christianity to Christian insiders (Esler 1987: 205–211).

In recent research on early Christian apologetic literature, we also find advocates for the opinion that early Christian apologetic texts were directed at a wider non-Christian audience with the aim of softening their view on Christianity and Christians or maybe even converting them to Christianity. Later, I will argue along these lines showing that Minucius Felix' Octavius could be seen as an example of how Christians could argue to convince non-Christians that Christianity is the only true religion. It is also possible that the texts could be addressed to a wider non-Christian audience directly aiming at converting these to Christianity.

Thus, to sum up, the texts themselves were usually directly addressed to those who have raised charges against the group represented by the Apologist – almost exclusively one or more non-Christians. But it is important to bear in mind that the explicitly mentioned addressees were rarely the only (or even main) ones, as was usually assumed in early scholarship.

The aim of apologetic texts: defence and identity

As mentioned above, texts must include elements of defence in order to be counted as apologetic texts. Consequently, a text must also answer to some kind of attack to be labelled apologetic. These attacks could be explicit or implicit, they could be real or constructed by the author himself, and they were countered by the Apologist by presenting Christianity in a positive light and, conversely, by portraying (some of) the views of the opponents in a negative light. This classical understanding of apologetic texts as defensive is reproduced in most ancient and newer scholarship and is supported by numerous primary sources. A few examples will illustrate this.

In his Legatio, Athenagoras says, 'They bring three charges against us: atheism, Thyestian banquets and Oedipean unions' (Leg. 3.1), adding a little later that he 'shall now meet each charge separately' (4.1). Even if the word apologia (ἀπολογία) is not used here, it is quite clear that Athenagoras' aim is to defend Christians against very concrete charges. As a part of his defence, he attacks Greek religious traditions, such as the use of material images of gods in the cult (15.1–30.6). He also explains elements of Christian teaching, for example, the monotheistic idea of God (10.1–5).

