In Justin's first apology, the entire setup is defensive: Justin addresses the emperor because he wants him to protect Christians against legal injustice (1 Apol. 1–12) and charges for immorality, atheism, etc. (13–60). Like Athenagoras, Justin also attacks ideas from Greek religion (e.g. the Greek demonology) and explains concrete elements in Christian teaching, such as the idea of resurrection.[16]

A final example of primary sources similarly illustrates the defensive aim of the apologies. Thus, in the preface to Contra Celsum, Origen makes it clear that he is undertaking an apology for Christianity, using the words ἀπολογία and ἀπολογέομαι several times. It is also interesting to note that Origen discusses the best way to make an apology – is it in writing or by way of life (C. Cels. praef. 1–2)? Similarly, the fact that he describes the weak Christians as the intended addressees is informative (C. Cels. praef. 4), since apologies were usually explicitly addressed to readers outside the Christian community. Thus, Origen's choice to name Christians as the addressees underlines that an essential characteristic of apologies was defence – no matter who the addressee was.

As mentioned above, this classical understanding of apologetic texts as essentially defensive is found in most older and newer scholarship. Thus, A. Von Harnack states in his chapter on the Apologists in his book Dogmengeschichte, that the Apologists' aim was to maintain (behaupten) the Christianity confessed by the Christian congregations.[17] This term 'maintain' in itself signals a strong element of defence, since the act of maintaining implies both an active explanation of the current situation as well as an act of defence against threats that will disturb this position. He further states that the Apologists' preferred way of maintaining Christianity was to combine the Christian idea of revelation with the idea of rationality characteristic of Greek philosophy, i.e. a theme well-known and beloved of most of the Apologists' opponents.[18] Accordingly, the Apologists did not defend Christianity by opposing all Greek ideas but by usurping and reinterpreting basic ideas from Greek philosophy, which on the other hand – according to the Apologists – in the Greek tradition itself had been darkened (verdunkelt) because the philosophers were controlled by demons.[19] The Apologists' defence of Christianity thus also included a positive explanation, directed towards the attackers (and most likely other Christians), of what Christianity was in the view of the Apologists. We will return to this aspect later.

This main classic assertion – that apologetics were primarily a defensive response to outsiders' attacks – is also found in newer scholarly books. Thus, one of the most important books on the Apologists, Apologetics in the Roman Empire (Edwards et al. 1999), is introduced with the words, 'The adherents of these religions attacked each other with great ferocity at times. In response, there emerged the practice of apologetic, the defence of a religion against actual or perceived opponents'.[20] Moreover, according to the author of another book on apologetics from 2000, Fiedrowitcz, one consequence of the fact that in its earliest years, the church was 'kerygmatisch-missionarisch orientiert' (oriented towards preaching and mission) was that it was met with all kinds of criticisms from people who had heard about Christianity, but who were not convinced of what they had heard.[21] This is indeed a classical definition of the Sitz im Leben of early Christian apologetics.

However, it is obvious that many of these apologetic texts, which are characterized by their defensive elements, also have a very offensive character. In antiquity and late antiquity, Christians were situated in a context where they had to define and defend their beliefs and ways of life as a response to many kinds of criticism and attacks. Similarly, at that time, Christian groups had no clear-cut definition of these beliefs and ways of life, and their religious and cultural identities were constantly under construction. And apologetics must be regarded as part of these processes of self-definition and definition of others. Thus, when a religious community defends and presents its own ideas against external criticism, this group simultaneously embarks on the process of self-definition and self-construction. This explains why a typical trait of the apologetic texts is that they reject criticism and, at the same time, present a positive description of their own ideas. Such positive portrayals of Christianity are found in many apologetic texts – even in Tertullian, who is arguably the most negative of all the Apologists.

In Tertullian's Apologeticum, we find the following sentence: 'I shall at once go on, then, to exhibit the peculiarities of the Christian society that, as I have refuted the evil charged against it, I may point out its positive good' (39.1). This sentence is part of a lengthy argument, which runs through chapters 36 to 45. In these passages, Tertullian rejects accusations made against the Christians that they are disloyal towards the emperor and the Roman empire. He argues that the enemies of the emperor are to be found among the Romans themselves, whereas the Christians are loyal and positive towards both the emperor and the empire. The argumentative strategy was thus, first, to reject the negative charges and, subsequently, to create a positive image of Christians and Christianity in place of the negative.

In Justin's first apology, we find the same combination of defence against accusations and positive descriptions of Christianity; in fact, this form of argument structures the whole of Justin's text. In chapters 1–12, he deals with the illegality of the processes against the Christians and refutes the accusations of atheism, immorality and the alleged disloyalty to the Roman empire. Chapters 13–67 demonstrate the superiority of Christianity concerning morals, teaching, worship and communal life. Justin concludes his treatise with a positive description of the Christian worship and the life in a Christian community (61–67). Hence, in early Christian apologetic writings, positive descriptions of the dogmatic and ethical content of Christianity seem to be as important as the negative rejections of accusations and charges raised against the Christians.

As we saw above, the classical understanding of apologetic texts as primarily defensive in character is still found in recent books, but the view that a positive construction of identity is a very important part of the apologetic endeavour plays an increasingly larger role among recent scholars.[22] Surely, defence is still – and wisely so – regarded as a main characteristic of apologetics, but it has been stressed by several researchers that the defence against attacks from outsiders – real or invented – was also directed inwards as a way to strengthen members of the attacked group. Thus, as argued by J. Engberg, one of the more important functions of the conversion accounts found in apologetic texts was to inspire other Christians in their conversion processes, not (merely) to convince outsiders to convert.[23] In addition, what the Apologists sometimes did was to create images of 'the others' that they could next attack as a way to establish and maintain an identity for themselves and for their communities.[24] In reality, the religious identities were fluent at that time, but what the Apologists did was to construct fixed identities out of these many fluent identities – and it was these fixed identities that the Apologists could subsequently attack or defend. This shift in the understanding of how the making of identities internally among the Christian groups took place is very important, but the fact that apologetics and apologies deal with attack, defence and explanation still holds true.

Apologetic strategies

Related to the topic of aim is the question of apologetic strategies. When dealing with strategies in apologetic texts, we must differentiate between explicit and implicit strategies. Tertullian's Apologeticum is a good example of a text that explicitly describes the strategy that the author intends to apply: 'and I shall not only refute the things which are objected to us, but I shall also retort them on the objectors'. Tertullian probably did not intend this sentence to reveal the strategy for the whole of his Apologeticum. But he certainly employs this strategy in several paragraphs treating specific themes, for example in Apol. 7–9 where he first rejects the accusation that the Christians eat small children and commit incest (7–8) and then accuses the Romans of doing exactly these things themselves (9).

A more implicit strategy used by Tertullian is rhetorical irony. An example of this can be found in Apol. 10–16 where he criticizes the Roman and Greek gods. He ironically describes how the pagan images of the gods were made by artisans using all kinds of tools. But even though the gods were hurt very badly by these tools, the gods did not complain. How is this possible? Naturally, because the artisans actually worked on a piece of dead wood or stone. Had the images been living gods, they would not have put up with such treatment.

Another typical strategy of the Greek Apologists was to try to make alliances with whom they considered the best representatives of the Greek tradition, i.e. the philosophers. In chapters 18–30 of his Legatio, where Athenagoras discusses the use of images and statues in Greek cults, he points out several times that the Greek philosophers also – like Athenagoras himself and other Christians – reject the concept that God has a physical shape (e.g. Leg. 20.2). In addition, Athenagoras cleverly turns the arguments of the philosophers against the Greek poets whom he considers the originators of the idea that the gods have a physical shape (20.1).

The Apologists could use alliances with the philosophers to show their readers that parts of the Greek traditions agreed with Christianity in certain respects. Those who would be convinced by such an argument were obviously the Greeks with whom the Christians agreed. This would mean that the Apologists strategically aimed at convincing the philosophically educated Greeks. In contrast (with a few exceptions), Latin Apologists usually did not enter into alliances with philosophy – in fact, Tertullian was directly hostile towards philosophy. In chapters 46–50 of Apologeticum, he emphasizes the difference between Greco-Roman philosophy and Christianity. The Christians are the 'good guys' who know the truth and live morally while the philosophers have gone astray:

> So, then, where is there any likeness between the Christian and the philosopher? Between the disciple of Greece and of heaven? Between the man whose object is fame and whose object is life? Between the talker and the doer? Between the man who builds up and the man who pulls down? Between the friend and the foe of error? Between one who corrupts the truth, and one who restores and teaches it? Between its chief and its custodian?
>
> (Apol. 46)

In other apologies, we learn that the Apologists themselves had converted from Greco-Roman traditions to Christianity. Such stories can also be counted among the Apologists' strategies. These statements can be very short, as is the case in Tertullian's Apologeticum, or be the overall theme of the treatise, as is the case with Minucius Felix' Octavius. In a passage where Tertullian, among other things, expounds on Christian eschatology, he says, 'Once these things were with us, too, the theme of ridicule. We are of your stock and nature: men are made, not born, Christians' (Apol. 18). In Tatian's Oratio ad Graecos, we find a more detailed but still brief account of his conversion. This account reveals how he happened to find the Christian scriptures after he had searched for the truth in many different cults and rites without finding it:

> While I was engaged in serious thought, I happened to read some barbarian writings, older by comparison with the doctrines of the Greeks, more divine by comparison with their errors. The outcome was that I was persuaded by these because of the lack of arrogance in the wording, the artlessness of the speakers, the easily intelligible account of the creation of the world, the foreknowledge of the future, the remarkable quality of the precepts and the doctrine of a single ruler of the universe.
>
> (Or. 24)

It is obvious that Tatian used his own conversion as a strategy to convince others that they should also convert to Christianity. Among the things he accentuates are the straightforward arguments in the Christian writings, which in the context of Tatian must be understood as a critique of Greek philosophy. This suggests that Tatian addressed his treatise to people who were critical of the complexity and the sophisticated arguments of the Greek philosophers.

Minucius Felix' Octavius is one of the latest of the early Christian apologies from around 200 CE and is particularly interesting for the discussion of apologetic strategies. It is organized as one long account of the conversion of a pagan to Christianity; as such, a mere (though not insignificant) tendency in earlier Christian apologetic writings has been made the determining principle of the content and struc-ture of the entire text. Octavius is organized as a dialogue between two friends – the pagan Caecilius and the Christian Octavius. Caecilius is the first speaker, offering a positive account of the Roman religion and cult and criticizing Christianity (5–15). After Caecilius has spoken, Octavius responds by giving a positive account of Christianity and criticizing the Roman cult and religion (16–38). In the end, Caecilius is convinced of the superiority and truth of Christianity and converts to Christianity.

In my opinion, Minucius Felix' Octavius should be regarded as a conclusion to the second-century Christian apologetics. If this is correct, the inclusion of conversion stories stands out as the main strategy in early Christian apologetics. Therefore, we must also pay attention to the fact that in Octavius, the conversing parties – a Christian and a non-Christian – were friends. This is significant because it demonstrates that an important aim of early Christian Apologists was to teach other Christians how to enter into dialogues with their non-Christian friends in order to convert them to Christianity. Simultaneously, however, such conversion stories could also serve as ideal conversion paradigms for other Christians who recently converted.

Main content of the apologetic writings

The Apologists treat many different topics in their treatises as a result of the accusations raised against Christians. Now I will mention the most important general themes and describe how the Apologists reacted to and argued against these accusations.

Atheism, superstition and other politically loaded charges

Because most Christians did not recognize the Greco-Roman gods as gods and therefore did not participate in the local and imperial cults, the Christians were accused of atheism.[25] In the second and third centuries, the state deities and the divinity of the emperor were an integral part of the foundation and the legitimacy of the Roman empire. Consequently, anyone who did not acknowledge the existence of deities – atheists – was considered to deliberately place themselves outside of society and to endanger it because they challenged the Pax Deorum, which guaranteed the welfare of the society. To be accused of atheism was, therefore, a very serious charge.

The fact that Christians were accused of atheism is not only apparent from the apologetic texts but is also confirmed by texts written by early critics of Christianity. Hence, two accusations figure prominently both in the writings of the early critics and in those of the Apologists: (1) The Christians did not take part in the local Greco-Roman cults; (2) The Christians did not honour the emperor as a god.

Both charges were formulated in the correspondence between Pliny and Trajan (112 CE).[26] Pliny's letter to Trajan is the first outsider account to refer to Christianity, but although it reveals that the mere accusation of being Christian was punishable by death, it does not use the word atheism. However, according to Pliny, part of the legal proceedings against the Christians involved instructing them to pray and sacrifice to the Roman gods and to the image of the emperor; further, they were instructed to curse Christ.[27] A little later in his letter to Trajan (Letters 10.96.9–10), Pliny writes that attempts to diminish and stop the growth of Christianity had led to the re-establishment and flourishing of the traditional Greco-Roman cults. This signals that the conflict between Christians and the non-Christian authorities and populations was about religious and cultic ideas and practices, among other things, and this very circumstance endangered the empire.

In Pliny's letter, however, these charges are not summed up as a charge of atheism. Accordingly, J. J. Walsh claims in his article 'On Christian Atheism' that Pliny and other early critics of Christianity, in fact, did not accuse the Christians of being atheists.[28] In Walsh's opinion, this charge did not emerge before the time of Marcus Aurelius.[29] His observation is probably correct insofar as we think of explicit charges of atheism. However, in my opinion, it is obvious that, to Pliny, one of the fundamental problems with Christians was that they would not participate in the Greco-Roman cults because they did not accept the Greco-Roman gods as gods,[30] and this is a fundamental aspect of atheism.

From the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180 CE) and onwards, the charge of atheism was explicit and outspoken.[31] Thus, in his Church History (4.13) Eusebius quotes a letter from Marcus Aurelius to the provincial Council of Asia in which the emperor explains why the council should be cautious about bringing forward accusations against the Christians:

> The Emperor Caesar Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Augustus Armenicus Pontifex Maximus, holding Tribunician Power the fifteenth time, Consul the third, to the Council of Asia, greeting. I know that the gods also take care that such persons should not go undetected: they are far more likely to punish those who will not worship them than you are. You get them into serious trouble by your accusations of atheism and thereby strengthen their existing determination: and if accused they would choose apparent death rather than life, for the sake of their own god. And so they are the real winners when they part with their lives rather than agree to carry out our commands.

It is clear from the passage quoted, especially the last lines, that Marcus Aurelius did not propose this strategy out of any kind of sympathy towards the Christians. The most important message for us is that Christians explicitly are accused of atheism and that atheism was a serious charge.

Common to such charges is the underlying assumption that Christians destabilized both local societies and the empire as a whole. The Christians' negligence in not fulfilling their religious and social obligations could bring about the wrath and punishment of the gods.[32] Faced with these charges, the second-century Apologists defended Christianity in different ways. In his First Apology (3–5), Justin argues that Christians should not be condemned just because of the 'name', i.e. just because they are called or call themselves Christians. Instead, the authorities ought to investigate the manners of the Christians in order to be able to decide whether these were good or bad. When doing so, the authorities would find that Christians acted properly and to the benefit of society, according to Justin. Moreover, he states in 1 Apol. 6 that Christians are called atheists because they reject the evil demons responsible for men's bad lives and acts. In fact, there is a clear link between the Christian's rejection of the demons as gods and the charge of atheism as well as a clear link from this charge to the actual convictions of Christians without any preceding investigations (see 1 Apol. 13; 46). But this is erroneous, according to Justin – Christians are not atheists, because they respect the most true God.

The refutation of atheism plays a prominent part in the Legatio of Athenagoras in which the Apologist argues against this charge in different ways.[33] First, he states that the reason for the refusal of the Christians to take part in the local and imperial cults is not that they are atheists, but that they are monotheists (2–12). This is a significant difference in that it clearly demonstrates that Christians do indeed acknowledge a transcendent and sustaining power. Accordingly, the difference between Christians and non-Christians is not that the Christians reject a transcendent and sustaining power while non-Christians acknowledge it. The difference lies in defining this power. According to the Greeks and Romans, there are many gods; according to the Christians, there is only one true God. Thus, the Christian theology comes into play as one of Athenagoras' arguments.

In the first part of his treatise, where he argues that Christians are monotheists, Athenagoras uses positive as well as negative arguments. Of course, he rejects the accusations that the Christians are atheists (Leg. 4.1–2), but he devotes more space and energy to his positive account of the Christian understanding of God as one (7–12). He even goes into details with the question of how this one God can have a son who is also God (10.2–5). In this passage, we find some of the very first considerations about a trinitarian understanding of God. Why did Athenagoras explain Christian theology in such detail? According to Athenagoras himself, his intention is to prevent his addressees – the emperors – from being led astray by false opinions about Christian beliefs. He further claims that in this way he is able to prove that Christians are not atheists. This straightforward explanation – that Athenagoras wants to teach the emperors about Christianity, and then they will stop persecuting the Christians – is probably part of the answer, but not the whole answer. Thus, it is easily imaginable that Athenagoras uses these positive arguments about the Christian theology to convince non-Christian (and perhaps Christian) readers in general about the truth and the positive intentions of Christianity in relation to the stability and welfare of the society.

Tertullian confirms that the charge of atheism was the most important charge against the Christians (Apol. 10.1), and he rejects the accusations in Apologeticum 10–27. He gives a very short answer to the question of why the Christians do not worship the gods: it is because the gods of the Greeks and the Romans are not gods at all. The arguments for this claim are unfolded in Apol. 10–16. One is that humans invented the Greco-Roman gods, for example, as a result of dead people being deified (11). Tertullian further claims that the images of the gods are mere handicrafts made of wood or other materials. Thus, at a certain time, a material substance could be formed into an image of a god or goddess, but later, it would be redesigned as a spoon or a pot used for cooking (12). As a third example, Tertullian criticizes the Roman and Greek gods because they are associated with many kinds of violence, like the violence going on in arenas (15).

Like Athenagoras before him, Tertullian does not stop at this negative critique of the pagan gods but continues with positive descriptions of some of the main points of Christianity. In Apologeticum 21, he focuses on the divinity of Christ. In this description, it is clearly important for Tertullian both to underline how the Christian belief in Christ as God is related to the Jewish belief in the Messiah and how the Christ can be said to be the son of God without being a product of God's sexual escapades – as was the case with the endless number of children of the Greek and Roman gods. Even if Tertullian is not as explicit as Athenagoras in his positive descriptions of Christianity, it is obvious that he also feels compelled to say something positive about the Christian beliefs.

A special aspect of the general charge of atheism directed against the Christians is that they did not bring sacrifices to the image of the emperor. It is not quite clear from the apologetic texts what this cult of the emperor was, but generally it is clear that one part of it was that some emperors were deified after their death. To these emperors, one could bring sacrifices as to other gods. Another aspect was the cult of the living emperor. The living emperor could be worshipped as a god or a demigod, and the citizens could bring sacrifices to the other deities for the sake of the welfare of the emperor.[34] In Tertullian's Apologeticum 28–35, it seems as if the charge against the Christians belong to the latter category (cf. 28.2). Confronted with the charge that Christians do not sacrifice to the gods on behalf of the emperor's welfare, Tertullian first asks whether the emperor depends on the gods or vice versa. And he already knows the answer: the emperor maintains the cults – accordingly, the gods depend on the emperor. For this reason, Christians cannot and should not be forced to take part in this empty cult of the emperor. On the other hand, he positively describes how the Christians do indeed pray to the true God for the emperor (31–32). The Bible thus orders the Christians to pray for the authorities because the authorities were inaugurated by God himself. Furthermore, the Roman empire was God's way of postponing the destruction of the world. According to Tertullian, the Christians consequently have no interest in undermining the emperor because he has been chosen by God. Therefore, the Christians honour the emperor and pray for him (33).

Further, and related to the charge of atheism, the Apologists criticized the Roman authorities for treating Christians in an illegitimate way when they were accused and convicted only because they confessed to being Christians. That this was indeed the case has been demonstrated by J. Engberg in an analysis of Pliny's correspondence with Trajan: Pliny tested the Christian's confession, and if the accused stuck to it, he was executed – merely because of the name 'Christian'. In fact, Pliny was not entirely convinced that this was the correct way to proceed: 'Should the name itself be punished (even if crimes are absent), or the crimes that go with the name?', as he writes in Letters 10.96. But this was nevertheless the road he took. What is not so clear from the texts of Pliny and Trajan, is why the Romans felt it necessary to execute Christians who stuck to their confession. There are, however, some hints in the texts. As part of the trial, Pliny (knowing very well that the Christians worshipped Christ as their god) asks the accused to pray to the gods and to bring sacrifices to the images of Trajan and the gods. This reveals that the Christians were convicted not only because they were atheists but also because the Roman authorities suspected them to be representatives of a despicable superstitio that – just as atheism – led to disloyalty towards the emperor and the gods. At that time, superstition was considered as dangerous as (sometimes even worse than) atheism. According to the second-century biographer Plutarch, 'the atheist, apparently, is unmoved regarding the Divinity, whereas the superstitious man is moved as he ought not to be, and his mind is thus perverted' (On Superstition 2). Thus, the Christian Apologists are telling the truth when they complain that Christians were convicted and executed only 'because of the name' – that is, only because they confessed to being Christians, because this name alone, to the Romans, was proof of superstition and all the negative aspects that came with this stamp.

In the texts of the Apologists, there is evidence that the Christians were also met with other, related, political accusations. In Apologeticum 38–41, Tertullian discusses the charge that Christians were forming secret associations. The Roman political administration and rulers were always on guard against groups that – in the eyes of the Roman authorities – conspired against those in power. It was, therefore, illegal to form associations without obtaining permission from the authorities. The Christian communities had no such permission and were thus considered illegal associations.

Tertullian defends the Christians against this charge by arguing that they are criminalized only because they do not want to take part in the society's customary social and religious life – the Christian communities are not and should not be considered a threat to Roman society and social order. In order to prevent any speculations about what went on in the Christian communities, Tertullian describes these communities and their activities: the Christians meet to pray to the one true God; they discuss the Christian scriptures, they sing, and they admonish each other to live their lives as Christians. Further, the Christians share everything, except their wives; they give money and food to the poor, and they dine together. It follows that, according to Tertullian, the Christian communities were in no way a menace or threat to society or to its rulers. What happened in the Christian communities was not more 'dangerous' to society than when carpenters, cooks or others met in one of the numerous koina, or associations – quite the contrary. Thus, the meetings of the Christians involved ethical and moral training, which is why, according to Tertullian, the Christian associations are actually best compared with those philosophical schools that were well respected and legally recognized by the authorities.

Tertullian further stresses that the Christians pray for the emperor and the Roman empire (Apologeticum 28.2). And Justin (1 Apol. 11) argues against the suspicion that the Christians tried to establish a new earthly kingdom by stressing that the kingdom, which the Christians await, is the kingdom of God not belonging to this world. He also emphasizes that Christians follow the example of their master and therefore pay the taxes that were demanded from them (1 Apol. 17).

Most of the second-century Apologists emphasized their loyalty towards society and the authorities in order to avoid suspicions of disloyalty or of being a direct threat to the society and the authorities in power. By the third century, things seem to have changed. Christianity was better established, and at least some Christians seem to have been more self-confident. This can be deduced from the question about forming associations. According to Origen (Contra Celsum 1.1), the first main point in Celsus' attacks on Christianity was that Christians formed secret associations contrary to the laws. To judge from the prominent position Celsus gave to this charge, it must have been very serious. In his answer, Origen does not deny that the Christians form associations, neither does he deny that these are illegal and could be a threat to the Roman society. Instead, Origen responds that Christians live in a society where the laws themselves are contrary to the divine law. Therefore, they are doing the right thing when they abandon the false laws in order to live according to the divine law. Hence, Origen clearly did not consider it important to try to calm down those who were suspicious against the Christian communities. Later on (1.7), he also underlines that the associations of the Christians are not secret – Christianity had now become known to almost everyone in the Roman empire. This development and Origen's frankness is most likely the result of the growing power of Christianity around 250 CE – a power which Christianity did not have in the second century when most of the early Christian Apologists were writing and when Celsus raised his criticism of Christianity.

From these observations, we can conclude that, from the beginning of the second century, Christians were accused of being a liability to the stability of the Roman empire and, consequently, a political threat. This charge appeared in different forms. They were accused of being atheists, first indirectly, then explicitly. On the one hand, the Apologists confirmed that Christians did not worship the Greek and Roman gods or the emperor. But this was because these were not real gods. Therefore, the Apologists denied that Christians were atheists, because they believed in, and served, the one true God. The 'political' aim of the Apologists was thus to defend the Christians, describing them as loyal citizens of the empire; their 'theological' aim was to defend the Christians by describing their theism. As theists – and not atheists – Christians agreed with their pagan neighbours that God is a transcendent and sustaining power who takes care of men and society – if worshipped correctly. A similar political accusation lies behind the decision of the Roman authorities to execute Christians merely on account of their name, because this revealed that they did not properly worship and honour the Roman gods. So whether atheists or adherents of a despicable superstition or members of dangerous secret societies, the Christians – in the eyes of the Romans – endangered the welfare and stability of the Roman empire by refusing to sacrifice to the emperor and the Roman state deities. Theology and politics were thus intimately interconnected.

Ethical charges

Another kind of typical charge against the Christians concerned ethical issues. It is evident that Christians in the second century were confronted with different charges concerning their moral habits, their way of life and their cultic arrangements. The Apologists responded to these charges by denying them, by showing that immorality was widespread in the Greco-Roman tradition and by claiming that in fact, the moral standards among the Christians exceeded those of any other inhabitants of the empire.

In his letter to Trajan from the early second century, Pliny says that some of the accused whom he had questioned had told him that on a certain day in the week (Sunday), the Christians used to meet and eat together – but only ordinary and innocent food (Letters 10.96.7). From the way he expresses himself, it seems that Pliny knew Christians were accused of cannibalism, but he did not find any reason to believe this accusation. Another typical accusation in the second century was that the Christians practised incest and other kinds of sexual amoralities, as can be seen, e.g. in Minucius Felix' Octavius, where he quotes a passage from Fronto's speech against the Christians, delivered some time before his death in the 160s.[35]

Tertullian deals with all these charges in Apologeticum, chapters 7–9. He describes the charges of cannibalism and incest in a way that reveals they were quite widespread, and he uses several different arguments in his defence against the charges. First, he challenges the judges to investigate the charges and prove that they are true – which they, naturally, would not be able to do. Second, Tertullian uses irony to refute the charges by saying:

> If you want to know what is going on in the cult of the Christians, you can go and ask the leader of the cult what is required for the ceremony of initiation into the cult. If the charges are true, he will answer the following: 'You must have a child still of tender age, that knows not what it is to die, and can smile under thy knife; bread, too, to collect the gushing blood; in addition to these, candlesticks, and lamps, and dogs – with tidbits to draw them on to the extinguishing of the lights: Above all things, you will require to bring your mother and your sister with you'.
>
> (Tertullian, Apologeticum 8.7)

This ironic response is clearly intended to – and does – demonstrate how foolish it would be to think that cannibalism and incest could take place in the Christian groups. Finally, Tertullian also uses the well-known apologetic argument that the Romans themselves and their beloved gods do the very things they accuse the Christians of (9).[36] To underline his point, he lists numerous stories from the Greek and Roman mythological traditions. In this case, Tertullian uses no positive arguments, but, as we shall see below, Athenagoras does.

In chapters 31–36 of the Legatio, Athenagoras discusses the same charges of cannibalism and incest and uses various arguments to refute these charges: the first argument rests on the Christian teaching about eternal life or eternal punishment. The Christians know, Athenagoras says (Leg. 31.3–4; 36), that they will be punished or rewarded in the life to come according to their works in this life. As a result, they will not commit such crimes. Next (32–35), he uses the well-known apologetic strategy of turning the charges against the accusers themselves. The Greeks should not criticize the Christians for sexual misbehaviour because the Greek gods themselves excel in immoral behaviour. Thus, they were notorious for committing incest – not least Zeus, who was married to his own sister and had children with his mother as well as with his daughter. Finally, the Greeks, in general, were known for a promiscuous sexuality, and some of them earned money from female as well as male prostitution.

According to Athenagoras, the moral behaviour of the Christians is exactly the opposite of this. The Christians have laws that forbid them to look at women with lustful desire (cf. Matt. 5:28). The Christians consider each other brothers and sisters, parents and children. They protect their 'families' so that their bodies will not be harmed (Leg. 32.4–5). The Christians only have sexual intercourse with their spouses – and only in order to continue the bloodline.[37] There are even Christians who totally abstain from marriage and sexual intercourse in order to come closer to God. Divorce is not allowed for Christians, and widows are not allowed to re-marry.

It is obvious that many of these ethical and moral charges against the Christians were connected with the cultic life of the Christians, and that there were many rumours about it. These rumours probably stemmed from the non-Christians' unfamiliarity with the Christian cult, resulting, at least partly, from the fact that the Christian cult was accessible only to the baptized. Thus, the non-Christians only heard about the sharing of blood and flesh, the love between sisters and brothers and so on, a situation almost bound to be misunderstood by some of the enemies of Christianity.

Christianity: a new religion without tradition

A final – less typical, yet recurring – criticism of Christianity to be mentioned here is the claim that Christianity was a new religion that threatened the Roman mos maiorum (ancestral custom). In a society that – unlike our modern society – honoured tradition and antiquity, this was a charge not to be taken lightly. Among many others, Pliny's contemporary Suetonius contends that, 'innovations in the customs and principles of our forefathers do not please us, nor seem proper',[38] and he mentions that emperor Nero severely punished the Christians, 'a class of men given to a new and mischievous superstition' (Nero 16.2). Celsus also raised the charge of – unacceptable – newness against Christianity, which, he claims, had broken off from the Jewish traditions. Origen responds, in Contra Celsum 2.1, that Celsus was mistaken in this claim. Quite the contrary, they still follow these traditions. Christianity is the true continuation of Judaism, and since the Jewish scriptures prophesy the coming of the Christ, they, therefore, belong to the Christians. Moreover, Origen tries to demonstrate that the Christian traditions about the creation of the world are older than the traditions of the Greeks. The Christian traditions go back to the Old Testament prophets (Moses), while the Greek traditions only go back to Plato's Timaeus, Origen claimed.

A more or less similar argument can be found in Tertullian's Apologeticum 21 when he claims that although everyone knows that Christianity dates to the time of Tiberius, it is, in fact, much older – because Christianity is the true heir of the Old Testament prophecies about the Christ. The Jews failed to recognize Jesus as the Christ, and, therefore, the Christians have taken their place.

Conclusion

Above, I have presented a group of second- and early third-century Christian Apologists and their texts. This group definitely included more members (as we know more names from, e.g. Eusebius), but unfortunately, little other than their names is known about these. The Apologists used different styles, arguments and methods, and their treatises had different addressees and could be focused on different themes. But they also shared many common traits, and they were all focused on defending Christianity against formal and informal, direct and indirect attacks from non-Christians, whether these came from authorities or individual persons. The most common accusations were that Christianity was a new religion and that the Christians were unethical and immoral, superstitious, atheists and/or members of secret communities. The charges of atheism and superstition had indirect political implications, because proper worship of the deities was a precondition for maintaining the stability and welfare of the empire. But the Apologists also defended Christianity against direct political accusations, such as being members of secret communities, which were always a thorn in the side of the Roman elite. The Apologists used their treatises to reject these charges – and thus to defend Christianity – but at the same time, their treatises served an important function for Christian identity formation, which is a feature that has rightly been increasingly stressed in the most recent scholarship.

Notes

1 This overview chapter draws on material from two of my previous articles on apologetics (Jacobsen 2009a, 2009b).
2 See Jacobsen (2009b: 21).
3 Most of them are mentioned by Eusebius in his Church History, see 3.33.3; 4.3.3; 4.8.3; 4.16.7–8; 4.24; 6; 17.1. Eusebius mentions more apologists and more titles of apologetic writings (e.g. 4.26.1; 4.27), but these texts are unfortunately lost.
4 His text was not available for us until a tenth-century manuscript was discovered in 1878 by Armenian monks in Venice. Concerning Aristides, see further Pedersen (2014).
5 Cf. also Ulrich (2014) for Justin Martyr.
6 See Georges (2015) for this relationship.
7 Concerning Tatian, see Falkenberg (2014).
8 See Jacobsen (2014) and my article in Brill (forthcoming) for Athenagoras.
9 Cf. Engberg (2014) for Theophilus.
10 Coxe (1989 (reprint): 159).
11 Altaner (1955: 87).
12 Bardenhewer (1913: 175).
13 Quasten (1962: 186).
14 Fiedrowicz (2000: 15, 17).
15 Edwards et al. (1999: 8–9).
16 P. Keresztes analyses, Justin's First Apology in accordance with classical rhetorical categories. He argues that Justin's text is an apologetic work with a defensive character (1965: 100), thus agreeing that apologetic texts must include defensive elements. From there, he goes on to show that the type of defence found in Justin's 1 Apol. is not forensic (100) but deliberative (106 and 108) and persuasive (105f.). According to Keresztes, the situation in which the Christians found themselves in the second century would not allow them to make a forensic defence, but they could – as Justin did – try to persuade and advise (110) the emperor to deal with the Christians in a more proper way.
17 Von Harnack (1909: 496–497).
18 Von Harnack (1909: 522–523).
19 Von Harnack (1909: 523).
20 Edwards et al. (eds) (1999: 1).
21 Fiedrowicz (2000: 14).
22 What is new here is not that the writings of the apologists dealt with identity formation. Already A. Von Harnack was aware of that, although he did not dwell on the point. But the significance of this element has been increasingly stressed – with different nuances – and it should not be overlooked.
23 Engberg (2009).
24 Jacobsen (2012).
25 Wlosok (1974: 149) describes the charges against the Christians of atheism as one of the most widespread and serious charges against which the apologists had to argue. Wlosok underlines the important connection between the Christians' monotheism, their critique of the pagan polytheism and the charges of being atheists. As we shall see later, the apologists rejected this connection claiming that monotheism in no way leads to atheism. See further these classical contributions to the theme: Von Harnack (1905) and Nestle (1950).

26 Cf. Engberg (2007: 173–206) who evaluates the scholarly discussions of what can be learned about the relations between the Roman authorities and the Christians from the letters of Pliny and Trajan. See further Sherwin-White (1966) – the standard commentary to the letters of Pliny.

27 Pliny, Letters 10.96.5.

28 Walsh (1991: 258–259).

29 'In our pagan sources it is not until the late 170s (Celsus, Lyon, etc.) that atheism is clearly discernible as the chief concern of pagans' (Walsh 1991: 262).

30 See Engberg (2007: 193–198), who reaches the same conclusions.

31 Wlosok (1974: 152–154) rightly says that the increased critique of the Christians under Marcus Aurelius was a consequence of the grave difficulties (wars, natural disasters, famine, etc.) facing the empire during the reign of Marcus Aurelius. This situation led to criticism and persecution of Christians because Marcus Aurelius and numerous others in the empire reasoned that the problems were the result of the wrath of the gods. The cult had not been properly conducted and thus the gods were angry (cf. the Pax Deorum). According to Wlosok, it was easy and obvious to blame the increasing number of Christians for this infringement of the Pax Deorum.

32 Cf. Benko (1980).

33 The discussion of this accusation is the theme of chapters 2–30.

34 See Gradel (2002).

35 See Engberg (2006: 315–319).

36 Justin uses the same argument against charges of cannibalism and sexual excesses; cf. 2 Apol. 12.

37 Cf. also Justin 1 Apol. 29.1.

38 Suetonius De Clar. Rhet. 1.

Bibliography

Altaner, B. (1955) Patrologie. Fourth edition. Freiburg, Germany: Herder.

Bardenhewer, O. (1913) Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, vol. I. Freiburg, Germany: Herder.

Benko, S. (1980) 'Pagan criticism of Christianity during the first two centuries', in Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt II, 23(2): 1055–1118.

Coxe, A. C. (1989 repr.) The Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. 1: The Apostolic Fathers with Justin Martyr and Irenaeus. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Edwards, M., Goodman, M., Price, S. and Rowland, C. (eds) (1999) Apologetics in the Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Engberg, J. (2006) 'TITEL', in Engberg, J., Jacobsen, A.-C. and Ulrich, J. (eds) Til forsvar for kristendommen – tidlige kristne apologeter. Copenhagen, Denmark: Anis, sider.

Engberg, J. (2007) Impulsore Chresto. Opposition to Christianity in the Roman Empire c. 50–250 AD. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang.

Engberg, J. (2009) 'From among you are we. Made, not born are Christians', in Ulrich, J., Kahlos, M. and Jacobsen, A.-C. (eds) Early Christian Apologetics. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 49–78.

Engberg, J. (2014) 'Theophilus', in Engberg, J., Jacobsen, A.-C. and Ulrich, J. (eds) In Defence of Christianity. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 101–124.

Esler, P. F. (1987) Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lucan Theology. SNTS Monograph Series, 57. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Falkenberg, R. (2014) 'Tatian', in Engberg, J., Jacobsen, A.-C. and Ulrich, J. (eds) In Defence of Christianity. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 67–80.

Fiedrowicz, M. (2000) Apologie im frühen Christentum: Die Kontroverse um den christlichen Wahrheitsanspruch in den ersten Jahrhunderten. Paderborn, Germany: Ferdinand Schöningh.

Georges, T. (2015) 'The role of philosophy and education in apologists' conversion to Christianity: The case of Justin and Tatian', in Bøgh, B. (ed.) Conversion and Initiation in Antiquity: Shifting Identities – Creating Change. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 271–285.

Gradel, I. (2002) Emperor Worship and Roman Religion. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Jacobsen, A.-C. (2009a) 'Main topics in early Christian apologetics', in Jacobsen, A.-C., Ulrich, J. and Brakke, D. (eds) Critique and Apologetics: Jews, Christians and Pagans in Antiquity: Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 85–111.

Jacobsen, A.-C. (2009b) 'Apologetics and apologies: Some definitions', in Ulrich, J., Kahlos, M. and Jacobsen, A.-C. (eds) Continuity and Discontinuity in Early Christian Apologetics. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 5–22.

Jacobsen, A.-C. (2012) 'Images of the others in Tertullian', in Kahlos, M. (ed.) The Faces of the Other: Religious Rivalry and Ethnic Encounters in the Later Roman World. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols Publishers, 105–135.

Jacobsen, A.-C. (2014) 'Athenagoras', in Engberg, J., Jacobsen, A.-C. and Ulrich, J. (eds) In Defence of Christianity. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 81–100.

Jacobsen, A.-C. (forthcoming) 'Athenagoras', in Van Geest, P. J. J. and Peerbolte, B. J. L. (eds) The Brill Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Keightley, T. (1833) The Crusaders, vol. 1. London: J. W. Parker.

Keresztes, P. (1965) 'The literary genre of Justin's first apology', Vigiliae Christianae 19: 99–110.

Krüger, G. (1904) Die Apologieen Justins des Märtyrers. 3rd ed. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr.

Lortet, L. (1884) La Syrie d'Aujourdhui. Paris: Hachette et cie.

Nestle, W. (1950) 'Atheismus', in Dassmann, E., Klauser, T. and Kremer, C. J. (eds) Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, vol. 1. Stuttgart, Germany: Hiersemann, 866–870.

Pedersen, N. A. (2014) 'Aristides', in Engberg, J., Jacobsen, A.-C. and Ulrich, J. (eds) In Defence of Christianity. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 35–50.

Quasten, J. (1962) Patrology, vol. 1. Utrecht, The Netherlands: Spectrum Publishers.

Sherwin-White, A. N. (1966) The Letters of Pliny: A Historical and Social Commentary. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Ulrich, J. (2014) 'Justin Martyr', in Engberg, J., Jacobsen, A.-C. and Ulrich, J. (eds) In Defence of Christianity. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 51–66.

Von Harnack, A. (1905) Der Vorwurf des Atheismus in den drei ersten Jahrhunderten. Leipzig, Germany: J. C. Hinrichs.

Von Harnack, A. (1909) Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. vol. 1: Die Entstehung des kirchlichen Dogmas. 4th ed. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr.

Walsh, J. J. (1991) 'On Christian atheism', Vigiliae Christianae 45: 255–77.

Wilken, R. (1970) 'Toward a social interpretation of early Christian apologetics', Church History 39: 437–458.

Wlosok, A. (1974) 'Christliche Apologetik gegenüber kaiserliche Politik bis zu Konstantin', in Frohnes, H. and Knorr, U. W. (eds) Kirchengeschichte als Missionsgeschichte, Band I. Die Alte Kirche. Munich, Germany: Kaiser-Verlag, 147–165.

29

EARLY THEOLOGIANS

Gerald Bray

About the year 180 there was a noticeable change in the level and content of Christian writing. What had been largely occasional and apologetic in nature now became much more systematic and ambitious, reflecting the enormous strides which the Christian church had made and the growing need for its leaders to present a reasoned account of their faith which could stand alongside the great works of pagan antiquity. During the course of the third century, Christian writers outstripped their pagan counterparts to become the most profound and prolific force in both the Greek and the Latin literary worlds. This happened, it should be noted, before Christianity became a legal religion (with the Edict of Milan in AD 313), by which time its intellectual underpinnings were as solid as those of any of its rivals.

The achievement of these years belongs to a group of theologians who mostly worked independently of one another, but who together created a corpus of writings which have been regarded ever since as classics (Osborn 1993). During this period, moreover, there was a clear and conscious divide between 'orthodox' writings, on the one hand, and heretical ones on the other. There is considerable debate (Turner 1954; Bauer 1964; Osborn 1993) about the appropriateness of using this terminology to describe writings before c. 180, but after that time there can be no doubt. However poorly it may have been defined, there was an orthodox consciousness in the church which united its principal apologists and set them apart from others who were being clearly branded as dissidents. This consciousness survived any number of schisms, and even the posthumous condemnations which affected some of the leading theologians of this period.

Another important factor which must be taken into account is the rise of a Latin-speaking Christianity which was increasingly independent of its Greek predecessor. Broadly speaking, the two language areas developed distinctive traditions with very little interaction between them during this period. This would have important consequences at a later date, when it became necessary to resolve doctrinal controversies at the ecumenical level. However, at the time they were writing, all the theologians discussed here believed that they were expressing the mind of the universal church and were unaware of any major differences between them.

For the sake of clarity, this chapter is subdivided into Greek and Latin sections, and each major theologian is treated separately within the appropriate section.

Greek writers

Irenaeus

His life

Irenaeus was born in Smyrna, one of the seven churches of Asia mentioned in the book of Revelation sometime about 140. As a young man he heard the aged Bishop Polycarp preach, and through him had direct contact with the apostolic age. At some point, Irenaeus left Asia Minor for Gaul, where he settled in the city of Lugdunum (Lyon). In 177 he went on a mission to Rome to deal with some questions raised by the Montanist heresy, but when he returned to Lyon he found a church decimated by persecution. He was immediately elected its bishop and remained there for the rest of his life. It is not known how or when he died, though a late tradition claims that he was martyred. Irenaeus wrote in Greek, which was his native tongue, even though he ministered in a Latin-speaking province of the Roman empire.

His works and theology

Of his many writings, most survive only in fragments. Only two of his treatises have been preserved intact, one in a Latin translation and the other in Armenian. The first of these is the Detection and Overthrow of the So-called Gnosis, more usually known as Against all Heresies, and it is on this work that Irenaeus' reputation as a theologian rests. There are several editions available (Massuet 1710; Harvey 1857; Dods 1885; Roberts and Rambaut 1868–9). As the original title indicates, it is divided into two parts. The first consists of a single book, which gives a history of Gnosticism and details the beliefs of particular Gnostic thinkers. It is an invaluable source for our knowledge of Gnosticism, though it must now be supplemented and corrected by the Gnostic texts discovered at Nag Hammadi (Egypt) in 1946 (see Olson 1992). The second part is divided into four books, each of which is a refutation of Gnosticism. The first of these books combats Gnostic ideas from the standpoint of reason, the second from the standpoint of the church's doctrine, and the third from the sayings of Jesus. The last book is a treatise on the resurrection of the flesh, which all the Gnostics denied.

The work is not well structured, and this has led to a number of theories about its composition (see Benoit 1960; Bacq 1978). Some scholars (see Minns 2010) have maintained that Irenaeus threw it together haphazardly over many years, but it seems more likely that he had a planned structure from the beginning, which he supplemented at different times. The various incongruities and repetitions can therefore be regarded as later insertions which were never properly edited. Irenaeus is known to have depended on earlier sources, but as these have almost all been lost it is impossible to say to what extent.

His second surviving work is the Demonstration of Apostolic Teaching which was unknown until an Armenian version turned up in 1904. English translations are available (Robinson 1920; Smith 1952). It is subdivided into two main parts, the first of which tells the sacred history of mankind from Adam to Christ and the second of which tries to prove the truth of the Christian revelation on the basis of Old Testament prophecies. The first part is prefaced with a short discourse on the Trinity, one of the earliest in Christian literature.

Irenaeus' theology was fully Trinitarian, and he believed that all three divine persons could be found at work in the Old Testament as well as in the New (Osborn 2001). He was particularly concerned to identify the Creator God with the Father of Jesus Christ, in direct refutation of most Gnostic theories. As for the Son, he believed in his eternal generation from the Father, but castigated any attempt to explain this great mystery. He was strongly interested in the incarnation, and the extent to which the Son shared our humanity (Wingren 1959; Lassiat 1974).

Irenaeus believed that God's revelation was fully contained in the New Testament, though he did not use that word to describe the apostolic writings (Lawson 1948). His canon seems to have contained the Shepherd of Hermas, but not the Epistle to the Hebrews. According to Irenaeus (Adversus Haereses 3.3.1), the right interpretation of the Bible had been confided to the churches that had been founded by the apostles, and it was to them that the seeker after truth should turn. This helps to explain his particular reverence for the church of Rome, because it was the final home of both Peter and Paul. Irenaeus believed that the apostles had entrusted what he called 'the canon of truth' to these churches (Adv. Haer. 1.3.4). This may have been a kind of credal formula, which is certainly what the expression came to signify at a later date, or it may have been simply the general gist of apostolic teaching, which is preserved for us in the New Testament as a whole.

Irenaeus had a tripartite view of the human being, which was divided into body, soul and spirit. He further believed that the soul was the image of God, which at the fall of Adam had lost its likeness to the divine being. Salvation therefore was the restoration of the lost likeness to the image, which took place by an extensive programme of 'recapitulation' (Fantino 1986; Holsinger-Friesen 2009). According to this idea, Christ was the second Adam, whose main purpose was to recapitulate human history, avoiding the errors of the first Adam and his offspring (see Nielsen 1968). In this scheme of things, Mary the mother of Jesus became the second Eve, an identification which came originally from Justin Martyr, but which Irenaeus incorporated into a complete doctrine of salvation. Irenaeus believed that history was heading towards a final cataclysm, predicted in the book of Revelation. He was what would today be described as a 'millenarian', although his version of this relied more on recapitulation than on any dispensational theories.

In spite of the loss of most of his output and the disorganised nature of what remains, Irenaeus has a claim to be called the first systematic Christian theologian. He had a clear sense of what was wrong with Gnosticism and was able to articulate a coherent picture of the Christian theology that was needed to combat it.

Hippolytus

His life

Although he was almost certainly of eastern, and possibly of Alexandrian origin, Hippolytus spent most of his active years at Rome, where he was the last major figure to use Greek as his chief means of expression. He was already prominent in that city in 212, when Origen heard him preach there, and in 217 he set himself up as the head of the Roman church in defiance of Pope Callistus I, whom he regarded as too lenient in his treatment of penitents. The schism continued until 235, when both Hippolytus and Pontian, Callistus' successor but one, were arrested and deported to Sardinia. It is thought that the two men became reconciled at this time, and that both died in captivity shortly afterwards. They were buried together at Rome in 236 or 237, and a statue was erected to Hippolytus about the same time. This statue, or something claimed to be it (see Brent 1995) was recovered in 1551 and installed in the Vatican Library in 1959 (see Figure 29.1). On its base are inscribed all the works claimed to be by Hippolytus, but although this list helped scholars to identify works preserved under other names, and to give us an idea of what we have lost, there is no reason to believe that all (or any) of the works mentioned are by Hippolytus.

His works and theology

Little of Hippolytus' work has been preserved in the original Greek (Migne, Patrologia Graeca, vols 10 and 16), but there are numerous translations into Latin and a number of oriental languages which have survived (Quasten 1950: II, 163–98). English translations are available (MacMahon 1886). Together with the surviving Greek fragments, these give us a fairly complete picture of his works and beliefs. It must be said that the details of his career have been called into question by scholars who doubt the story that he was an anti–pope, but the majority opinion still accepts the broad outline of the traditional account as given earlier.

Figure 29.1 The statue of Hippolytus at the foot of the steps leading into the Vatican Library.
  Photo Philip Esler

Hippolytus was a disciple of Irenaeus, and in many ways he represents a middle stage between the bishop of Lyon and Origen. However, it must also be said that he lacks the theological depth of those giants. His most important theological work is the so-called Refutation of all Heresies (Philosophoumena) of which eight books are preserved. The first has been known since 1701 under the name of Origen, and is a poor summary of the history of Greek philosophy. It was evidently designed as a preliminary to the refutation of the Gnostic heresies derived from it. The next two books are lost, but the following seven were discovered in 1842 and published nine years later. The whole work was identified as belonging to Hippolytus by L. Duncker and F. G. Schneidewin in 1859. Book four is a treatise on astrology and magic, while the tenth book is a summary of Jewish history and true biblical doctrine. The most interesting and important books are 5 to 9 which contain a detailed refutation of 33 different Gnostic sects. These books remain one of the most important sources for our knowledge of Gnosticism, and they show a profundity and originality which are lacking in the other books.

Similar to this was another work, the Syntagma (Against all Heresies), which is now lost but which can be recovered from fragments as well as from the extensive portions of it which were copied more or less directly into other works, including Tertullian's On the Prescription of Heretics and Epiphanius' Panarion, or 'remedy' against heresies. It covered 32 different heresies, all of which are listed at the end of Tertullian's work. Hippolytus believed that heretics were atheists who derived their ideas from Greek philosophy rather than from the scriptures. It was a simplistic view but one which was widely held by contemporaries and which influenced the thinking of more sophisticated theologians like Tertullian.

Hippolytus also wrote a book called The Antichrist, in which he endeavoured to prove that Rome was not to be identified with this figure, who was still to come. He made considerable use of the book of Daniel, on which he also wrote a commentary, which is the oldest work of biblical exegesis to survive in its entirety. Hippolytus was also the author of an allegorical commentary on the Song of Songs, which is remarkably similar to that of Origen, though there is no known connection between the two. The ideas contained in it became stock themes of later allegorical commentaries on the book, though it is uncertain whether these were derived from him or from Origen.

Hippolytus also wrote chronological works, of which the most important is his Chronicle which he completed shortly before his death. It is a history of the world based mainly on biblical sources, and represents an important attempt to reinterpret human history from a Christian point of view. He also tried to devise a method for calculating the date of Easter, and wrote a treatise on the subject, but it was not successful and had to be abandoned when the calculation failed as early as 237.

Several homilies are known by title, and there are a number of fragments which have been preserved in different places, but there is little more that we can say about them. His major work, from the modern point of view, is the Apostolic Tradition, which is a compendium of liturgical practices purporting to be a record of the most traditional rites of the church. It has been known for many centuries, but was not identified as belonging to Hippolytus until 1916 and this identification has been strongly contested in recent years, though it has also been defended (Stewart–Sykes 2001). It survives in a Latin translation, as well as in numerous oriental versions. It appears that the book was quickly forgotten at Rome but preserved in the east, where it became the model for liturgical practice. It is divided into three parts, the first of which deals with the ordination of bishops, priests and deacons, as well as a number of minor ministers.

The second part contains rules for the laity, including rites of baptism, confirmation and first communion. The first of these is of special interest because it contains the full text of the old Roman creed and the pattern of question and answers which characterised early baptismal ceremonies. The last part covers the weekly eucharistic service, the rules for morning prayer, the burial service and a form of catechesis. All of these have become well-known to modern churchgoers because they have formed the basis of the liturgical revisions which have swept through the major Christian denominations in the second half of the twentieth century. As a result of this, there is a vast literature on this work (Quasten 1950: II, 181–5), which is now more influential in the life of the church than any other text from antiquity apart from the Bible itself.

There is not much to be said about Hippolytus' theology except that it is closely modelled on that of Irenaeus. In particular, he follows the same recapitulationist scheme. However, he is less successful in his attempts to defend Trinitarianism against the monarchianism of his time, and in reaction to men like Sabellius, he falls into an extreme form of subordinationism, even going to the point of claiming that the Logos emerged from the Father in three separate stages, of which the incarnation of Christ was the final and most complete one. His ecclesiology is hierarchical, again following Irenaeus and anticipating Origen, but he was a perfectionist with no room for 'sinners' in the church. This point of view is clearly unrealistic, but it is characteristic of many of Hippolytus' contemporaries and cannot be regarded as an aberration on his part.

On the whole, it can be said that Hippolytus was a rather simplistic thinker, who was nevertheless able to categorise the thoughts of others and provide a reasonable schematic account of the different heresies which were current in his day. That made him a useful source for subsequent authors to draw on, and much of what they write concerning this early period must be regarded as deriving more or less entirely from Hippolytus' accounts.

Clement of Alexandria

Clement (Titus Flavius Clemens) was probably born in Athens about 150. It is not known when he became a Christian, but at some point he came under the influence of the Sicilian philosopher Pantaenus, who was a Christian and had become a teacher and head of the catechetical school at Alexandria. Pantaenus died shortly before 200 and Clement succeeded to his position as head of the catechetical school, but in 203 he was forced to flee to Cappadocia because of an outbreak of persecution. There he remained until his death in about 214.

Clement's theological reputation rests on his three surviving books (see Osborn 1957, 2005). The texts are set out in Migne (Patrologia Graeca vols 8–9) and there are English translations (for example, Coxe et al. 1885). The first of these is the Protrepticus ('exhortation'), which is an evangelistic tract. Clement was severely critical of paganism, especially its reliance on mythology. He was also strongly opposed to the mystery religions, which he regarded as a nonsensical mish-mash of material and spiritual elements. His second book, the Paedagogus ('tutor') is a sequel to the first. In it, he addresses the man who has been delivered from the foolishness of paganism and tries to instruct him in the way of Christ. He does this by calling Christ the true Logos, borrowing a philosophical term and developing it in the light of John's Gospel, which had also used the same theme. In the first part of the Paedagogus Clement concentrates on the idea of love, but in the second part he becomes more practical and gives his reader what amounts to ethical guidance for everyday life. This part of the book is particularly interesting for us, because it gives us one of the best pictures we have of daily life in Alexandria during the Roman period.

The third book is called the Stromata ('carpets') because it is a collage of disconnected chapters knit together rather like a carpet. This was a standard genre in late antiquity and was frequently employed by writers who wanted to concentrate on special themes without bothering to construct an overarching philosophical framework to hold them all together. In this book Clement defends philosophy as the true Gnosis, and claims that it was given to the Greeks as their version of the Old Testament. However, he also says that knowledge of God can only come by faith, not by reason, and that Plato copied all his best ideas from Moses.

Clement also wrote a kind of commentary on scripture, but it seems that this was more like an explanation of isolated verses than a systematic treatment of the whole. The work is now lost, but we know something about it from the criticisms made of it by Photius (ninth century). According to Photius, it was highly allegorical in tone and contained a number of fanciful interpretations of the Bible, some of which were frankly heretical. It is possible that Clement got some of these ideas from Philo of Alexandria, but this cannot be proved.

Clement's theology was deeply rooted in philosophy, and he was a firm advocate of the basic harmony between faith and science. To his mind, the Logos was the highest principle in the universe, the creator of the world, and the teacher and lawgiver of mankind. The Logos became incarnate in Christ, but in other ways he had already revealed himself both to the Jews and to the Greeks. His philosophical approach gave him a strong predisposition towards affirming the ultimate unity of all things, and this must have contributed to his aversion to any form of heresy or schism in the church.

Clement believed in the fall of Adam, but not in inherited guilt, and his view of this question has been standard in the eastern orthodox churches ever since. He accepted the notion that baptism was a spiritual regeneration of the believer, and rejected any notion of sacrifice in connection with holy communion, which to him was likewise a purely spiritual rite. Somewhat surprisingly, he spoke out in defence of matrimony, and even regarded it as superior to celibacy, a view which was very rare in ancient times.

Clement's works may be summed up by saying that they reveal a deep and mature knowledge of the Bible, as well as a good command of Greek philosophy. He regarded it as his mission to convert pagan intellectuals to Christianity, and he was the first Christian who took the need to reconcile faith and science seriously. In that respect his writings have a curiously modern relevance, though their Platonic context (Lilla 1971) creates a barrier which somewhat reduces their appeal today, and the fact that he wrote mainly against the Gnostic heresies of his own time makes much of his teaching almost incomprehensible to anyone not familiar with them.

Origen

His life

A reasonable amount of information survives concerning the life of Origen (Crouzel 1989). He is profiled in Chapter 47 of this volume, and fuller details and bibliography are found there. Origen was born into a Christian family at Alexandria about 185, and was given the best education which his father could afford. He became a pupil in the catechetical school at Alexandria, where he succeeded to the headship in 203, when Clement fled to Cappadocia. He was only about 18 years old at the time, but already his great intellectual gifts were being recognised. It seems that it was about this time also that he castrated himself, in the mistaken belief that this had been approved by Jesus, who had spoken of those who made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of God.

Origen travelled widely in his early years at the school, going to Rome in 212 and to Palestine in 216. Later he visited Greece as well, probably in order to deal with heretical tendencies in the churches there. Unfortunately, he had fallen out with Bishop Demetrius of Alexandria, who seems to have been jealous of his pupil's growing fame and brilliance. Demetrius complained that Origen, who was still a layman, should not have been permitted to give lectures to bishops, as he had apparently been doing at Caesarea Philippi on his visit in 216. To avoid any repetition of this problem, the bishops of Jerusalem and Caesarea ordained him when he was on his way to Greece (in 228), but then Demetrius objected on the grounds that a man who had castrated himself was unfit for the ministry! On his return to Alexandria from Greece, Origen was tried by the bishop and his synod, and in 231 he was excommunicated. Demetrius died not long afterwards, and Origen might have stayed in Alexandria, but when the excommunication was confirmed by the new bishop, he gave up the struggle and emigrated to Palestine. There he was welcomed and encouraged to open another theological school, where he taught for nearly 20 years. He suffered in the persecution under Decius in 251, and it seems that he died, possibly of wounds suffered at that time, at some point between then and 254.

Origen's writings

Origen is credited with something like 800 works, almost all of which have been lost. Of the remainder, only a minority have been preserved in the original Greek, and most are available only in Latin translations, some of which are known to be fairly free in their renderings (the texts are in Migne, Patrologia Graeca vols 11–17; see Crombie 1885 for an English translation). To give some idea of the scale of this loss we may take Origen's homilies, of which there were originally 574. Of these, 388 are now totally lost, 166 survive in Latin and only 20 have come down to us in the original Greek. But although so much has been lost and much of what remains has been abridged, paraphrased and translated, the evidence of the originals, when we have them, suggests that our general picture of Origen's beliefs has not been seriously distorted as a result.

Origen wanted to be remembered above all as a biblical scholar, and his great masterpiece was the so-called Hexapla, or Old Testament in six parallel columns. The first of these contained the Hebrew text in its original alphabet. The second was the same text turned into Greek letters, because otherwise it would have been impossible for most people to pronounce. The Hebrew vowel points were not added until some centuries later, so this was an important service for those who wished to learn the language. The last four columns contained four different Greek translations of the original. The first of these was done by Aquila (c. AD 130), the second by Symmachus (c. AD 180–200), the third was the Septuagint translation (LXX) and the fourth was done by a Jew named Theodotion (c. 200–150 BC).

The compilation of this great work fully justifies Origen's claim to be the founder of the textual criticism of the Bible. Not only did he take the trouble to familiarise himself with Hebrew, which was a very rare accomplishment among the early Christians, but he was also prepared to compare different Greek translations of it, when both the synagogue and the church had more or less accepted the LXX as the preferred version. The Hexapla was prepared at Caesarea and remained there for several centuries. Jerome was able to consult it, and testified to its great value. It was so vast that nobody seems to have copied it in full, but extracts were made, and some of these have survived in fragments. Their main value today is to show that the other Greek translations are sometimes superior to the LXX in their rendering of the Hebrew.

In addition to his textual criticism, Origen wrote an enormous number of tracts on the Bible, which can be divided into the so-called scholia, which are short exegetical notes, the homilies and the commentaries. The first of these survive only in fragments. The homilies are interesting, but they are of value mainly for our understanding of Origen's spiritual outlook, with its profound mystical streak, and tell us little about the text of scripture itself. It is therefore mainly in the commentaries that we encounter Origen as a biblical interpreter. It seems that these originally covered the entire Bible, but only fragments of them remain, apart from the works on Matthew, John, Romans and the Song of Songs. To these may be added the fragments of 1 Corinthians, which are extensive enough to give us some idea of Origen's treatment of the book as a whole.

Of the commentaries, the one on John is the earliest and most extensive, though parts of it have been lost. Origen spends the first book expounding 'In the beginning was the Word' (John 1:1) and in the course of this exposition he manages to deal with most of the themes of the Gospel as a whole. He believed that John was the greatest of the Gospels because of its theological tone, and this is reflected in his exegesis. The commentary on Matthew is only partially preserved, and his remarks on the first 12 chapters are missing. The approach is less thematic than in the commentary on John, but his tendency to allegorise makes up for this to some extent and produces similar results.

More important than either of these are his commentaries on Romans (Scheck 2001–2) and on the Song of Songs. The first survives only in a Latin abridgment composed by Rufinus around the year 400. There were originally 15 books, but Rufinus cut these down to 10 because he felt that the original was unnecessarily prolix. He must have been right, because even after his editorial work, the commentary seems to us to be extraordinarily verbose and diffuse. Much of it is really a kind of biblical encyclopedia, ranging through the Old Testament in an attempt to explain Judaism to contemporary Gentiles. However, the core treatment of Romans is fundamentally sound and is much more literal than one might expect. It is also marked by a deep pastoral sense, which gives us some insight into Origen's greatness as a Christian leader, as well as a scholar.

It is very different with the commentary on the Song of Songs, which is totally allegorical. Origen regarded the bridegroom as Christ, but he was less consistent with the bride, who is sometimes thought of as the church and sometimes as the soul of the individual believer. This commentary can fairly be said to have set the tone for the next 15 centuries and more, and the ambiguity in his treatment of the bride became typical of the allegorical tradition as a whole. The revival of interest in patristic biblical interpretation that has occurred in recent years has brought Origen and his hermeneutic back into focus, and there have been several important studies of it (Hanson 2002; Simonetti 2004; Lauro 2005; Martens 2012). It must however be doubted whether these will lead to a revival of his interpretive method, which remains alien to scientific approaches to the scriptures.

To the modern mind, Origen's most important work is probably his Against Celsus (Chadwick 1953), which is a refutation of the pagan philosopher Celsus' work, the True Logos, in which he attacked Christianity and tried to shame Christians out of their faith. Celsus was a Platonist who wrote about 175, and the most remarkable thing about him is that he was so well-informed about Christianity. He knew the scriptures of both the Old and New Testaments well enough to be able to pinpoint apparent discrepancies in them, and he was thoroughly familiar with the differences between the mainline church and the various Gnostic sects. However, it has recently been shown that in attacking Christianity, Celsus was also giving into it. He basically accepted the Christian contention that people need to be saved, and he tried to prove that philosophy could do this as well, if not better than Christianity. In this respect he was the forerunner of Plotinus and the neo-Platonist philosophers of the third century, who would turn Platonism into a mystical belief which was almost a religion.

Celsus was ahead of his time, and for many decades his work was ignored. Pagans were not yet interested in Christianity and Christians moved in different circles. But by about 240 the two worlds were meeting with increasing frequency, and Origen was persuaded to tackle this great adversary of the faith head on. He did so by quoting extensively from Celsus' work (which is how we now know what Celsus actually said), and by refuting him point by point. The result was a Christian philosophical apologetic which was to be the forerunner of all subsequent efforts of that kind. Without accepting Platonism, Origen borrowed the structure of logic on which it was based and used it to argue for the truth of Christianity. He demonstrated that Christians could use philosophical methods in defence of their cause, without coming to conclusions which were incompatible with the teaching of scripture.

Origen's work extends to eight books, all of which survive in the original Greek. He begins by saying that when Jesus was attacked he remained silent, and regrets that he is unable to follow this wise example, because he has been asked specifically to deal with Celsus' misrepresentations. Celsus apparently attacked the church on the grounds that it was a secret society, and Origen has little difficulty refuting that. He also claimed that there was no real difference between Judaism and Christianity, since both were barbarous in origin, and again, Origen has no problem in showing that that was a gross misunderstanding. Celsus then adopted the persona of a Jew, and argued that the Christians had abandoned their ancestral religion. This was a powerful argument in ancient times, but Origen was able to show that the Christian revelation was inherent in Judaism and represents its fulfilment, not its abandonment. Much of the refutation is therefore concerned with the fulfilment of various Old Testament prophecies in Christ, and this is the heart of Origen's argument. The remainder consists of objections raised by Celsus to the possibility of a divine incarnation, about the uncouth style of the New Testament, and so on. Origen has little difficulty answering these points, and his work has remained a classic of apologetical literature ever since.

Closely related to his rebuttal of Celsus is Origen's great dogmatic work, On First Principles, which survives in a number of Greek fragments as well as in a free Latin translation (Smith 1992). This book can fairly claim to be the first manual of systematic theology to have been written by a Christian. In four books it covers theology in the strict sense (i.e. the doctrine of God), cosmology, anthropology and teleology. He begins from the principle that it is the task of the theologian to clarify the obscure passages of scripture, and to harmonise them into a consistent whole. Many of his conclusions rely on an allegorical interpretation of the Bible, which most modern readers find unacceptable, but it is still possible to appreciate his intention and his method to some extent.

'Theology' for Origen covered the being and nature of God, and extended to the entire super-natural realm. It is in that book that he discusses the being of angels, and even the nature of the resurrection body and the last judgement. In the second book he talks about the creation of the material world, a controversial subject in his day because of the Platonist belief that matter was evil. In this book he refutes the Gnostic idea that the creator was an inferior god, and not the Father of Jesus Christ, and he gives an extensive explanation of the incarnation, including a discourse on the human soul. He returns to the theme of the Holy Spirit, which he had already discussed in the first book, and gives a more detailed account of the resurrection and last judgement as well. The third book is more like a running commentary on biblical history, followed by discourses on philosophy, temptation and time. The final book is an extensive treatment of the inspiration of scripture, and also contains Origen's observations on the Trinity. For the last two books, we have Greek fragments that are long enough to be useful supplements to Rufinus' Latin translation.

Of Origen's remaining works, mention should be made of his Discussion with Heraclides, which was discovered in Egypt in 1941. In it, Origen interrogates Heraclides on the latter's Trinitarian orthodoxy, and so the book gives us a useful complement to Origen's other works on that particular subject. There is also his very popular work On Prayer, which is the first systematic treatment of that subject by a Christian writer. Origen regards prayer as a supernatural gift, in which the Holy Spirit prays for us. It is the preparation of the soul to receive God, and therefore the foundation of the Christian life. Finally, there is his Exhortation to Martyrdom, written shortly after the persecution of 235, which was designed to steel believers to meet the challenge of suffering. Origen's own father had been martyred in the persecution of 202, and he himself was to suffer in 251, so the work has a special poignancy, as well as being a first-hand witness to the main challenge which the church of his day had to face.

Origen's theology

Origen has left us a complete theology, which was to be very fruitful in the subsequent development of the Greek tradition. He believed that God is a simple, intellectual nature, unbegotten, and the Absolute Being. He also believed in the eternal generation of the Son, whom he described as homoousios ('consubstantial') with the Father, the first person known to have used this word in any context. Nevertheless, the Father remains autotheos ('God in himself'), and we are left to conclude that the Son is in some way subordinate to him. This has been a very controversial subject in Origenist studies, and several scholars have denied that Origen was subordinationist in his thinking, but it must be admitted that his language is somewhat unguarded at this point and that it is easy to see how others would have interpreted him in a subordinationist way.

Origen thought of the three 'persons' of the Godhead as hypostases, a word which was current in the jargon of ancient philosophy but which is also found in the New Testament (see especially Heb. 1:3). Each hypostasis is fully divine, and it is in and through them that we meet with God. However, there is an order in this, which may be regarded as a kind of hierarchy. The Holy Spirit comes to dwell in our hearts by faith, giving us a knowledge of the divine. It is his task to reveal the Son to us. The Son in turn is the mediator between God and man, the one who gives us access to the Father, who is in some sense the ultimate divine being. This Trinitarian theology is closely linked to the pattern of Christian experience, and it became the model for subsequent treatments of the subject by the mystical writers of the Greek tradition.

Origen described the incarnate Christ as the God-man (theanthropos), once more inventing a concept which was to have a long history. It seems that he may also have been the first person to refer to Mary as theotokos ('God-bearer'), though this cannot be proved. In his anthropology, Origen was a firm believer in original sin, and therefore in the necessity of infant baptism, but he did not believe in the eternal punishment of the damned. On the contrary, his eschatology was that at the end of time God would refashion the world by a process known as apokatastasis ('restoration'), when all existing sin and evil would be destroyed and the whole creation would be reborn. He also believed that the differences of status between people which are evident in this life can be attributed to the sins committed by our souls in a previous existence, and it is this curious form of reincarnation or metempsychosis which was to get him into so much trouble after his death.

Origen believed that the Bible had three senses, corresponding to the three parts of the human being – body, soul and spirit. The first sense is the literal one, the second is the moral one and the third is the spiritual one. According to him, every passage of scripture has a spiritual meaning, but not all have a literal or moral one as well. In practical terms, this meant that if the literal or moral sense was offensive, it was necessary to look behind it to the spiritual meaning, which could be discerned by allegory. The Song of Songs provides the classic example of this, but the principle could be applied much more widely. Origen was the real founder of Christian allegorical interpretation, and his writings were forerunners of the extravagant interpretations of this kind that proliferated during the Middle Ages. He was criticised for this by Jerome, and his approach has been discounted by modern biblical scholars. On the other hand, it remains influential in mystical circles, to which his allegorical interpretation was closely linked.

Origen was a mystic in his spiritual life, and he developed notions of Christian perfection, of self-knowledge, of asceticism, of the mystical ascent to heaven and of the beatific vision of God which have been found in mystical writing ever since.

Origen became the fountainhead of Greek theology, and there is no writer in that tradition who has not been profoundly influenced by him. His own labours as a pioneer inevitably meant that in many areas his conclusions are tentative and even self-contradictory, and this has been reflected in subsequent controversy. Shortly after his death, the word homoousios was taken up by the adoptionist Paul of Samosata and used to such effect that when the fathers of the first council of Nicaea (325) wished to use it to describe the relationship of the Son to the Father, they had to defend themselves against the charge of heresy. Arius, the heretic condemned at Nicaea, also attributed his subordinationist doctrine to Origen, with rather more justification than had Paul.

Towards the end of the fourth century, Origen's hermeneutic was taken up by Jerome and Rufinus, who endeavoured to translate his works into Latin. Jerome soon realised that Origen was defective in his theology, and turned against him, but Rufinus did not follow him in this and the two men fell out over it. Jerome then sounded the alarm in the Latin world, and Origen came under suspicion in many quarters. However, it was not until the sixth century, when his theology was revived at Constantinople, that real trouble occurred. Old suspicions of his orthodoxy resurfaced, and his writings were studied with great care and attention. The result was that he was condemned as a heretic at the second council of Constantinople in 553, largely because of his reincarnationist ideas. After that, he fell out of favour and his works were seldom copied. Today his greatness is universally acknowledged, but the ambiguity remains, and in spite of the enormous influence which he has exerted, he has never been fully rehabilitated as a Christian thinker and teacher.

Latin writers

Tertullian

Tertullian was the first Latin Christian writer of any importance, and his works remain one of the great monuments of early Christian thought (Osborn 1997). He is profiled in Chapter 48 of this work, and further details and bibliography are to be found there. In range and volume they surpass anything which has survived from antiquity before the time of Augustine and Jerome. He deals with everything from the most abstruse points of theology and philosophy to the humblest practical details of everyday life, offering us a complete world-view which is worked out in every detail he can think of. His style is pungent and memorable, provoking either admiration or revulsion, but never indifference.

He was born and brought up in Carthage in the second half of the second century (see Barnes 1985). Evidently his family were well-to-do pagans, and he received the best education which was available at that time. In Tertullian's youth, Carthage was the major centre of Latin letters, and the city wore this tradition proudly. Its church was to provide many of the leading theologians and thinkers of the Latin world, and it bowed to no-one, not even to Rome. Tertullian reflects both this culture and this attitude, and it may fairly be said that his works set the tone for a distinct North African Christianity which would survive until the Arab invasion (AD 698).

Almost nothing is known for certain about his life. Jerome provides us with some biographical details, but these must be regarded as unreliable. The traditional picture of him as a lawyer who became a presbyter in the Carthaginian church may be correct, but it is not supported by the internal evidence of Tertullian's writings. He must have become a Christian well before 196, when he is known to have been writing highly sophisticated theological treatises, but the details are unknown. He was still writing in 212 and is supposed to have lived to a ripe old age, but we know no more than that.

The biggest problem concerning Tertullian's career is that of his relationship with Montanism. It has traditionally been assumed that he was converted to that sect sometime about 205, and it is possible that he later broke away to found his own group of 'Tertullianists'. This reconstruction is based on internal evidence from his writings and on the fact that there was a sect of Tertullianists in Carthage in the late fourth century. There can be no doubt that Tertullian felt a deep affinity for the Montanists, but this appears to be because their ideas coincided to a great extent with his, not because he was 'converted' to their way of thinking (Bray 1979).

It seems that there were a number of Montanist sympathisers in the early third century, and that it was not until their writings were rejected by the Roman church (about 213) that a clear division appeared between them and the mainline church. Tertullian is known to have been personally affronted by the decision to reject the Montanist prophecies, but whether this led him to break with the Carthaginian church in a formal sense is hard to say. We have to remember that his writings were preserved, and not even their Montanist allusions were expurgated, which seems improbable if he were really condemned by the church at that time. It is not until 494 that we hear of an official condemnation of his works (by Pope Gelasius I), and that was much too late to have any serious impact on his reputation or influence.

Tertullian's writings and theology

Tertullian has left us more than 30 treatises, which can be subdivided according to theme. It is also customary to label them 'pre-' or 'post-' Montanist, but this distinction is more important for their chronology than for an analysis of their content. The first and most famous group of his writings may be described as 'apologetic' because they were formally addressed to pagans or Jews in an attempt to win them to Christianity. It is not known how effective they were at this, but they have remained defences of the Christian position and some of them are still read and even quoted today.

The first of these treatises is his Apology, which must have been written about 196–7 and is generally regarded as one of his earlier works. In this book he demonstrates the absurdity of pagan mythology and contrasts it with Christian beliefs, which are based on the well-known historical record. Tertullian does not hesitate to claim that the records of Jesus' trial are still available in the archives at Rome, and he appears totally confident that serious investigation of the sources will clear Christians of the charges laid against them by ignorant accusers. In particular, he refutes the claim that they are bad citizens because they do not participate in emperor-worship, and accuses the Roman government of foolishness in its blind mistreatment of what was in fact one of the most loyal and law-abiding elements within it. This is an important witness to Tertullian's understanding of the state and the relations which the church ought to have with it. Far from being revolutionaries determined to overturn the existing order, Christians were in fact conservative supporters of the empire, whose basic ideals (shorn of their pagan religious associations) they were proud to claim as their own.

Closely resembling the Apology is the shorter treatise To the Nations, which may in fact be no more than a rough draft of the former. The only major difference between them is that the Apology is addressed to the rulers and magistrates of the empire, whereas To the Nations is directed to the general public. On similar themes, there are treatises on idolatry, on the shows in the theatres, on the crown of victory worn by soldiers, and on persecution, the last of which is addressed to Scapula, who was governor of Roman Africa about 212. The main arguments of all these treatises are the same as those found in the Apology. Idolatry is absurd, persecution of Christians is illogical, and Christian integrity demands that believers refuse to participate in social events which reinforce the false religious beliefs on which the Roman world was constructed. But to accuse Christians of being disloyal on that account was a misunderstanding, because true loyalty is due to God, whom the Romans have failed to honour properly. What is required is the conversion of Rome to the truth, at which point the conflict between Christian and Roman values will disappear and the former will be revealed as the chief supports of the latter.

Perhaps the most interesting of these treatises is the one On the Soldier's Crown, which was apparently occasioned by a historical incident in the army. It seems that a soldier was expected to wear the laurel crown of victory following a successful campaign, but refused to do so on the grounds that he was a Christian. He was then court-martialled and executed. Tertullian takes up his cause with great enthusiasm, but runs up against the objection that nowhere does the Bible tell Christians that they should not wear such a crown. Here we see for the first time evidence of Tertullian's 'rigorism', which might also be described as his insistence that basic Christian principles (as he understood them) must be applied to the practical concerns of everyday life. His approach was to argue that the laurel wreath had obvious pagan associations, being particularly associated with the orgiastic cult of the wine-god Bacchus. It was therefore inappropriate for Christians to wear it, even if the circumstances were not particularly compromising in themselves.

Tertullian's contention was that perception is an important part of reality and that Christians must avoid even the appearance of evil, and it is this belief which governs his rigorism. Other Christians were prepared to be more lenient, and these Tertullian would later brand, in Montanist fashion, as 'psychic' (i.e. 'soul-led') as opposed to the 'spiritual' ones, among whom he numbers himself. But although this terminology came with Montanism, the basic beliefs underlying it can be traced right back to the beginning of his career.

Tertullian also wrote a tract against the Jews, which is basically a defence of the Christian interpretation of Old Testament prophecy. In keeping with his literalistic and historic bent, he gives a detailed account of the prophecies in the book of Daniel, comparing the reigns of the various Hellenistic rulers to what the book predicted. In general, however, he follows the arguments of Paul in his epistle to the Romans, particularly in his exposition of the place of the Gentiles in God's plan of salvation.

Of special interest are his short treatise on The Testimony of the Soul, and the much longer work On the Soul, in which Tertullian expounds his teaching about human nature, drawing on the resources of ancient philosophy as much, if not more than on Holy Scripture. Tertullian is often portrayed as an anti-philosophical writer, but this is a misrepresentation. It is true that he was openly anti-Platonic at a time when Platonism was enjoying a revival of interest and creativity, but his criticisms of philosophy can be paralleled in other writers who made ample use of Platonic ideas. The truth is that he was a Stoic 'materialist', who believed that all reality was essentially material, including the spirits and even God. He has been strongly attacked for this notion, but in his favour it can be said that at least he was able to develop a theory of reality in which the spiritual and the natural worlds interacted without the kind of conflict which was endemic to Platonism. In this way, Tertullian was able to avoid the dualism characteristic of Platonic writers and to remain more faithful to the biblical vision of reality, even if he misunderstood it in other ways.

Like many works of its kind, On the Soul contains a number of fascinating digressions into such areas as dreams and ecstatic experiences, which so fascinated the ancients. The work concludes with the assertion that all souls are kept in hell until the resurrection, when their ultimate fate will be decreed, even though it is already known in advance. With his materialistic outlook, Tertullian was naturally a 'traducianist' in his understanding of the soul. That is to say that he believed that the soul of each individual is inherited from his parents, not created independently at the moment of conception. In this respect, his view is closer to modern beliefs about genetic inheritance than is the majority opinion among his contemporaries. It may be added that Tertullian also believed that sin is a stain on the soul, passed on from one generation to the next, so that it is impossible for any human being to be born in a state of innocence.

The next class of Tertullian's works is directed against the heresies of his time. In these treatises he shows himself at his most vicious, not hesitating to impugn the morality of his opponents. He even calls Marcion a 'mouse' because he came from Pontus, which the Greeks believed was the home of mice. (In modern Greek, the word for 'mouse' is pontiki.) This characteristic is distasteful to most modern readers, but it was par for the course among ancient rhetoricians, and can be paralleled without difficulty in the writings of the sixteenth-century reformers, so Tertullian should not be blamed too severely for it.

Of the individual books, pride of place belongs to The Prescription against Heretics, because it is in this work that Tertullian outlines his basic principles. These are that heresy is a disease which preys on the weakness of the flesh, that it derives from an addiction to pagan philosophy (see above under Hippolytus), and that it can only be combatted by sticking firmly to the 'rule of faith', which is Christian doctrine as revealed in scripture. Heretics cannot read the Bible because they cannot understand it, and when they attempt to use it to justify their arguments they merely show how ignorant and inept they are.

Tertullian also claims that the apostles conveyed the whole of Christian truth to the church, an assertion which goes directly against the Gnostic belief in a 'secret gospel' which was supposedly kept for those who were specially initiated. This belief is of particular importance when it comes to assessing Tertullian's view of the Montanist prophecies. He evidently believed that they were inspired by God, but not that they added anything of substance to the apostolic deposit. Montanism, like Tertullian's own statements, was an intensification of what was already known and believed – an exhortation to live up to the principles revealed to the apostles, rather than a new departure in the spiritual realm.

Tertullian's longest work is his five-volume book Against Marcion, which is a major defence of the unity of the two testaments. Marcion rejected the Old Testament on the grounds that its God was a creator deity inferior to the Father of Jesus Christ. Marcion also expurgated large parts of the New Testament, which appeared to him to be infected with Judaism. Tertullian refutes all this in great detail, by demonstrating among other things that even the parts of the New Testament which Marcion retained (Luke's Gospel and the Pauline epistles) are incomprehensible without taking the Jewish background into account. He goes on to describe how Christ is himself the creator, whose incarnation was predicted by the Old Testament prophets, and cleverly bases his argument exclusively on those parts of the New Testament which Marcion was prepared to accept. The result is a commentary on Luke and Paul which upholds the literal and historical interpretation of the Bible.

Tertullian also wrote treatises against the Gnostics Hermogenes and Valentinus, in which he refutes their ideas as absurd and untenable on their own premises, quite apart from the fact that they are incompatible with scripture. Against Hermogenes, he argues that matter cannot be eternal, because if it is there would be two ultimate principles and therefore two gods behind the universe. Furthermore, Hermogenes effectively made matter superior to God, and therefore on his own principles, regarded evil as more important than good, even though he claimed the opposite. In response to this, Tertullian says that only the biblical doctrine of creation out of nothing can account for the co-existence of spirit and matter in a single universe. The Valentinians were relatively easier to refute, because their fantastic theories were so ludicrous, being a mish-mash of mythology and biblical ideas.

Two other treatises, On the Flesh of Christ and On the Resurrection of the Flesh, are also anti-Gnostic in intention, being directed against the views of men like Marcion and Apelles. They are presented in the form of defences of key Christian doctrines, which everyone recognised as fundamental in the struggle against all forms of philosophical rationalism or mysticism. Tertullian argues that Christ really did become a man and live an ordinary human life. His death on the cross was the ultimate proof of his humanity. Furthermore, it was necessary that Christ should have assumed a human nature, complete with a human soul, since his purpose in coming to earth was to save the human race. Without a genuine incarnation there could have been no resurrection, and therefore no salvation either. In the process, Tertullian develops the view that the Son of God is a divine person who takes on a human nature without giving up his divinity, a doctrine which anticipates the two-natures Christology of the council of Chalcedon (451), which remains the touchstone of Christological orthodoxy in the western church.

The Resurrection of the Flesh continues the argument, concentrating on the goodness of creation, a view which was denied not only by the Gnostics but by the whole Platonic tradition which lay behind them. The resurrection of the flesh is not only a biblical teaching, it is also the ultimate affirmation of the rightness of God's plan from the beginning. Much of the treatise is concerned with practical issues, such as the nature of the resurrected flesh, and Tertullian draws heavily on the Apostle Paul's teaching in 1 Corinthians 15.

The last major anti-heretical work is the treatise Against Praxeas, in which Tertullian develops his Trinitarian theology. The identity of Praxeas is uncertain, and the name may be an epithet meaning 'busybody', but whoever he was, he was evidently responsible for convincing the Roman church that the Montanists were in error, and this is what excited Tertullian's wrath. Tertullian's Trinitarianism begins with the assumption that God is One, but that within that One it is necessary to distinguish Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Praxeas appears to be a monarchian rather like Sabellius, believing that these names are no more than masks representing different roles played by the One God in the drama of human history. The Trinity is not a covert form of polytheism, but a faithful reflection of the inner being of God, which can be detected even in the Old Testament.

Praxeas made use of some biblical texts to support his view, but he handled them ineptly. In particular, he completely misunderstood Jesus' statement that 'I and the Father are One' (John 10:30). Tertullian goes through large sections of the Fourth Gospel to show how that verse must be placed in its Trinitarian context, and in the process takes the opportunity to develop his views on the Paraclete, who is the third divine person. Once again, the terminology may be Montanist but the underlying belief is in complete harmony with everything Tertullian wrote and believed from the start of his career.

Two other treatises against heresies may be mentioned briefly. The first is called the Scorpiace, or antidote against the scorpion's sting. The scorpion is heresy, and the antidote is the teaching of scripture as summed up in the rule of faith. The second treatise is called simply Against all Heresies, and is a short catalogue of the different sects and their beliefs. It is generally regarded as spurious.

The third class of Tertullian's works consists of a group of treatises dealing with different aspects of the Christian life. One of them covers the subject of repentance, which Tertullian says is a supernatural gift applicable in principle to any sin, material or spiritual. It is enjoined on us by God's command, quite apart from the spiritual benefits which accrue from practising it. However, repentance is something which cannot be repudiated without losing one's salvation completely. In particular, it is the essential precondition for baptism, which is not to be undertaken without clear assurances that the candidate has indeed turned away from his sins. Nevertheless, Tertullian holds out the possibility of a second repentance for sins committed after baptism, although he does his best to make such a thing seem as anomalous as possible.

Tertullian's treatise on baptism also belongs in this category, and is of special interest because of his objection to the practice of infant baptism. This was because Tertullian believed that baptism takes effect automatically, regardless of the faith of the person receiving it (a view known as ex opere operato), and that a baby ran the risk of growing up and falling ignorantly into sin, thereby losing its salvation. Furthermore, it is in this treatise that Tertullian makes it clear that if someone has sinned after water baptism, the only remedy is the baptism in blood – martyrdom. This theme is not developed here, but it points to the increasingly rigorist position which he, and much of the church, would gradually adopt.

Other treatises in this category are one on prayer, which begins with an exposition of the Lord's Prayer and then concentrates heavily on practical matters, such as the right posture to adopt when praying. The order of priorities sounds strange to us, but it accurately reflects Tertullian's outlook. He was always concerned to demonstrate how spiritual principles should be applied, and there is no doubt that many people must have been helped by the clear directions which he gives. He also wrote an exhortation addressed to the martyrs, in order to encourage them to stand fast in the face of persecution. The most interesting thing about this is the way in which he draws his examples from the ancient Roman heroes, rather than from the Bible. Perhaps he felt that his hearers would relate to their national traditions more easily than to a scripture which for many would still have been only half-absorbed. This treatise must be read in tandem with another, On Flight in Persecution, which deals with the same theme of martyrdom and encourages Christians to face it boldly. Tertullian was determined to turn what many saw as a tragedy into a triumph of faith, and thereby forward the gospel, because, as he himself said, 'the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church'.

Further to these, there is a treatise on patience which extols this virtue as a sign of God's presence in the Christian's life. Impatience is regarded as the work of Satan. Furthermore, Christian patience is active and forward-looking, unlike pagan patience which is basically inertia and indifference, and therefore merely superficial. Apart from a short book on fasting and one which somewhat satirically proclaims the virtues of the philosopher's cloak, the remaining treatises deal with questions relating to women, matrimony and chastity. Like many Christians in antiquity, Tertullian was greatly exercised by these themes, though his way of dealing with them is not without originality.

Tertullian believed that matrimony is ordained by God, but he did not believe in sexual intercourse. His ideal was virginity, of which the noblest form was that of voluntary self-denial. A married couple who abstained for times of prayer and fasting were giving up something to which they were theoretically entitled, and were therefore superior to those who had no obvious opportunity to exercise such restraint. When challenged by the New Testament, which clearly does not support such a view, Tertullian replied that things have moved on since apostolic times. The apostles knew the truth, but they also knew that it was impossible to change people overnight. By a special divine dispensation they were permitted to make concessions, particularly in this sphere. Younger widows were allowed to get married again, for example, and although married women were expected to cover their heads, nothing was said about unmarried virgins.

Tertullian regarded it as his duty to point out that with the coming of the Holy Spirit in power and the announcement of the approaching end of time, these concessions and loopholes must now be closed. Here more than anywhere we can see the influence of Montanism on his thought. He even went to the point of telling his wife that it was better not to conceive, because if Christ were to return before the nine months were up, she would be pregnant in eternity – not a happy prospect. This sounds absurd to us, but underlying much of Tertullian's concern was the fact that ancient Roman religion was a cult of ancestor worship, in which children were necessary in order to guarantee that the parents would be remembered after their death. Against that background, the Christian had to proclaim that eternal life could be had only in Christ, whose church transcended the limitations of flesh and blood.

Tertullian's theology

Tertullian invented the Latin word 'Trinity' as a translation of the Greek word trias, and he was the first writer to speak of 'persons' in the Godhead. This caused misunderstanding later on, because it was not clear that a 'person' had the characteristics of autonomous being which were inherent in a 'hypostasis'. The matter was not sorted out until the time of Basil of Caesarea (329–79), who declared that the two concepts were synonymous, a belief which was finally enshrined in the church's official doctrine at the council of Chalcedon. Before that, many people assumed that by 'person' Tertullian meant 'mask', and that his teaching was just a form of Sabellianism (modalism). This would have denied the reality of the persons and reduced them to roles in the divine drama of salvation, a view which Tertullian would certainly have repudiated.

Despite his opposition to Judaism, Tertullian had a high opinion of the Old Testament and rejected attempts to interpret it allegorically. He saw a parallel between the Jews and the Romans, both of whom had an ancient law to govern them, and he tried to harmonise the two as much as he could. When Jesus told his disciples that their righteousness must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 5:20), Tertullian understood this to mean that Christians must be even more legalistic than they were, because the gospel was a 'new law' (nova lex).

In other matters, Tertullian's views compare favourably with the orthodoxy of the fourth and fifth centuries. It can be said, for example, that he believed Christ was one divine person in two natures, even though he did not use that precise formula. Similarly, his doctrine of the Holy Spirit can be harmonised with later teaching without any difficulty, even if his way of expressing it is less precise than what later controversies required. Perhaps it is for this reason that he retained his currency as a theologian into the fifth century and was accepted by Jerome and Augustine as an equal. His Montanist affiliations have never been a barrier to appreciating him, even if his eschatology and the rigorism which went with it have long since been abandoned. Today he remains a living voice in the church in a way which cannot be said of his great Greek contemporary, Origen, and he continues to be respected as the founder of western Trinitarianism.

His theology has been the subject of penetrating analysis (Braun 1977; Osborn 1997), but more attention has been paid in recent years to his social and political ideas which give us an insight into life in North Africa, and indeed into the Roman empire, around the year 200 that is otherwise hard to come by. The fact that he wrote on so many topics, and that he did so in a style that is arresting and highly quotable, adds to the continued attractiveness of his work. It is to him that we owe such memorable phrases as 'the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church' and 'what has Athens to do with Jerusalem?' His approach to these questions may not be universally followed today, but the questions themselves remain perennially topical and are still widely discussed, even by people who have no idea where or with whom they originated.

Cyprian

Cyprian was born at Carthage about 200, apparently to a family of wealth and social standing. He became a noted rhetorician, well connected socially and politically, before converting to Christianity under the influence of the presbyter Caecilius (Sage 1975). He was a great admirer of Tertullian, but does not seem to have known him personally. This may be because Tertullian had died before Cyprian's conversion, or because he had separated himself from the church. The latter must be regarded as unlikely, however, since Cyprian's great aversion to division in the church (Hinchliff 1974) is hard to reconcile with admiration for a notorious schismatic. About 248 he became bishop of Carthage, a post which he retained until he was arrested and martyred on 14 September 258.

There are about 13 different works attributed to Cyprian which have survived (the Latin texts are in Migne, Patrologia Latina 3–4, and in Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum vol. 3; for an English translation, see Wallis 1886). Most of them are short pieces and many reflect the influence of Tertullian. In fact it is no exaggeration to say that apart from the lack of any Montanist tinge and the more irenic style, their content and theology are indistinguishable from the writings of the man Cyprian regarded as his 'master'. On the other hand, he was more inclined to accept allegorical interpretations of the Bible (see Fahey 1971) than Tertullian was, a fact which can be seen from his treatise on the Lord's Prayer, which understands the 'daily bread', for example, as Christ's body given to us in the Eucharist. Cyprian also develops the notion that pagan idols are ancient kings who were worshipped after their death. This is in line with the Roman predilection for ancestor worship, but it is not an idea found in Tertullian. Cyprian also wrote a spiritual autobiography which he addressed to his friend Donatus (not to be confused with the later schismatic of the same name). This anticipates the Confessions of Augustine, which it resembles in both style and content, rather than anything which went before.

Cyprian's two most important works are On the Lapsed and On the Unity of the Church, and it is for them that he is best remembered today. In the first of these, he deals with the vexed question of penance for those who have fallen away and who wish to be restored to the fellowship of the church. This was always a difficult problem, especially in North Africa, where rigorism was to some extent endemic in the church. Cyprian takes a moderate line, advocating the possibility of penance for the lapsed but discouraging any kind of leniency.

In the second work, he deals with the theme which was closest to his heart. Schism was an ever-present danger and had to be avoided at all costs. This was not just because a persecuted church could not afford the luxury of division, but because the gospel message could only be credible if the church maintained its unity. Truth is one, and if those who maintain it are divided, the credibility of their faith is called into question. Cyprian believed that divisions in the church were the work of Satan, and that rooting them out was therefore part of the mission to purify the body of Christ. He also believed that there is no salvation outside the church, a phrase which has become embedded in later tradition.

This led him to reject the baptism of heretics, a policy which got him into trouble with Rome, which recognised the validity of Trinitarian baptism whoever administered it. The Roman policy would later prevail in the church at large, but Cyprian did not hesitate to differ with his Roman counterparts and reject their understanding of the matter. This shows that he did not accept that the Roman see had any special entitlement to jurisdictional authority, let alone to doctrinal infallibility, merely because it had been the see of Peter. It seems that Cyprian originally included a passage on Petrine primacy as part of chapter 4 of his book on the unity of the church, but deleted it during this controversy in order not to be misunderstood.

There is little more to be said about his theology, which shows few signs of originality. In contrast to Tertullian, he believed that infants should be baptised as soon as possible, so as not to lose their salvation, which probably also means that he was less of a perfectionist than was Tertullian. On the other hand, it cannot be stressed too often that in the ancient church leniency in such matters was rare, and there is no doubt that Cyprian expected high standards of his flock. Another interesting feature of his writings is that he clearly understood the Eucharist in sacrificial terms, which was unusual, though by no means unprecedented in his day.

Today, it is as the teacher of unity that he is most often remembered (Burns 2002). His dictum that there is no salvation outside the church is still officially accepted by the Roman Catholic Church, though in recent years it has been reinterpreted to the point where it is hard to say whether it really means what Cyprian intended it to mean. Other Christians either reject it outright or interpret it in a purely spiritual sense, which was clearly not Cyprian's original intention.

Novatian

Novatian belongs to the first generation at Rome which used Latin as its medium of theological expression. He was a presbyter of the Roman church who was highly regarded as one of the most brilliant men of his day. When Pope Fabian died on 20 January 250, Novatian assumed the direction of the Roman church during the interregnum, which lasted just over a year, during which the church was severely persecuted. When it at last became possible to elect a bishop, the Roman presbyters chose another of their number, Cornelius, much to Novatian's disgust. He managed to gain the support of three bishops in southern Italy who agreed to consecrate him, and set himself up as a rival pope for several years. His followers were numerous and persistent, and there developed a Novatianist schism which lasted for nearly three centuries after his death.

Novatian's end is not recorded, but it is generally supposed that he died a martyr, probably during the persecution of 258. In 1932 a tomb was discovered at Rome honouring the 'blessed martyr Novatian' and this may be his, though there is no indication on it of his episcopal title. It seems that the main reason why Novatian was rejected in 251 was that he took an extremely rigorous line against those who had lapsed during the persecution. Cornelius was in favour of readmitting them after due penance, but Novatian wanted them to be permanently excluded from communion. His attitude smacked of Montanism, and some people apparently assumed that he hailed from Phrygia, the province in Asia Minor where Montanus had preached. Certainly there are many affinities between him and Tertullian, which are reflected in his writings.

Novatian has left us four treatises (see the Latin texts in Migne, Patrologia Latina vol. 3: 861–970 and an English translation in Wallis 1886). Two of his works (on modesty and on theatrical entertainments) are merely versions of similar writings by Tertullian. A third book deals with the Jewish food laws in the Old Testament, which Novatian believed must be understood in a spiritual sense. However, by far his most important work is his treatise On the Trinity, which accomplishes the remarkable feat of dealing systematically with that doctrine without ever once mentioning the word 'Trinity' itself – the title was probably added later (see De Simone 1970).

This work was the most systematic of its kind in existence when it first appeared, and it follows the arrangement of the old Roman creed. Novatian gives an entirely conventional exposition of the essence and attributes of God, and has a two-natures Christology without using that terminology. However, there is a noticeable tendency towards subordinationism in his work, which stresses the fundamental unity of the divine being and the eternal immanence of the Logos inside it. Novatian is also rather weak on the relationship of the Holy Spirit to the other persons of the Godhead, though he goes into great detail about the relationship of the Spirit to the church. Like Tertullian, he is important for the vocabulary he uses, and it seems that he is the first person to employ the word 'predestination' as a translation of the Greek proorismos. Like Tertullian, his philosophical leanings were towards Stoicism, and this affects his theological method which tends to be inductive and dialectical, rather than deductive in the Platonic style.

Novatian has always been greatly admired for his style and his acute theological perception, and in spite of his schismatic history his works have never been condemned by the church. On the other hand, they are little studied today and he is largely ignored by modern scholarship.

Lactantius

Lactantius is the last of the major pre-Nicene Latin theologians. Little is known of his life except that he is supposed to have been of African origin, with his birthdate around AD 250. In 303 he was teaching at the catechetical school of Nicomedia, in Bithynia, but he resigned in that year when persecution broke out. He apparently left Asia Minor about 307, but no more is heard of him until 317, when he was invited by the Emperor Constantine to go to Trier to tutor his eldest son (see Fontaine and Perrin 1978). Lactantius is often called the Christian Cicero, and his writings are in many ways closer to Ciceronian philosophy than they are to anything distinctively Christian. The Latin texts are in Migne, Patrologia Latina, vols 6 and 7, and they are translated into English by Fletcher (1886).

This is particularly true of his work On God's Workmanship, which is a treatise in praise of the human body. It is clearly anti-Platonic in tone, but both the style and content owe more to Roman Stoicism than they do to Christianity. Two other works deal with the anger of God and the death of persecutors. The first of these proclaims that God is active within his creation, and the second assures the reader that he will not be slow to punish those who have persecuted the church.

Lactantius' most important work is his Divine Institutes, which is intended to be a complete summary of Christian thought. In this work, Lactantius refutes paganism and all forms of rationalism, claiming that revelation is necessary for the truth to be understood. There is a strong emphasis on providence, rather than on a more personal theology, and Lactantius stresses moral behaviour rather than true spirituality. He seems to have a dualistic view of creation, giving evil much the same status as good. He says little or nothing about the Holy Spirit, and believes that each soul is created at birth. There are also indications that he had millenarian views, though these are less prominent than in other writers of the period.

The Deaths of the Persecutors (c. 318–21) aims to show that all persecutors meet a bad end, as exemplified by Diocletian, Galerius and Maximinus Daia (see Creed 1984). He was writing just as the age of persecution was drawing to a close, though he could not have known that at the time. Circumstances have ensured that he has gone down in the history of the church as a transitional figure, a man who was highly educated in the classical style and converted to Christianity before it became a legal religion, but who lived to see the triumph of the cross and the end of the age of martyrdom.

Conclusion

In conclusion, it may be said that the third century saw the rise of an embryonic systematic theology in both the Greek and Latin worlds. During this period there was little interaction between them, and that would lead to misunderstanding later on when different forms of expression were thought to conceal heretical beliefs. It is also true that the greatest theologians, Origen in the east and Tertullian in the west, would prove to be unsatisfactory in the eyes of later generations, though for very different reasons. Origen would come to be regarded as a heretic because of his questionable views on the nature of the soul, and Tertullian would be suspect because of his Montanist sympathies. Yet in spite of this, the broad lines of theological thought which they developed have remained visible ever since in their respective traditions, and they are still fruitful today. Without the theology of this period, forged against the background of a persecuted church, the subsequent history of Christianity would have been very different and undoubtedly poorer both intellectually and spiritually. We owe a permanent debt to these thinkers whose reputation has survived not only the test of time, but also the repudiation of many of their most characteristic opinions.

Bibliography

Primary sources

Clement of Alexandria

Bibliotheke Hellenon Pateron (1956) Clement of Alexandria, Vols. VII–VIII. Athens: Apostoliki Diakonia.

Coxe, A. C. et al. (1885) English translation of Clement of Alexandria. Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers, Vol. II. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 165–605.

Migne, J. P. (1857) Patrologia Graeca, VIII–IX.

Stählin, O. (ed.) (1905–36) Clement of Alexandria, 4 vols. Berlin: Akademie Verlag. (Revised by U. Treu et al. 1972–80.)

Cyprian

Migne, J. P. (1844) Patrologia Latina, Cyprian, Opera omnia, Vol. IV, Paris: Sirou. Also in Corpus Christianorum Series Latina (1972) Vol. III.

Wallis, E. (trans.) (1886) Cyprian, Opera omnia. Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers vol. V, Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 267–600.

Hippolytus of Rome

Bibliotheke Hellenon Pateron (1955–6) Hippolytus, Opera, vols. V–VI. Athens: Apostoliki Diakonia.

Duncker, L. and Schneidewin, F. G. (eds) (1859) Hippolytus, Refutationis omnium haresium librorum decem quae supersunt. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

MacMahon, J. H. (trans.) (1886) Hippolytus, Opera. Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. V. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 9–266.

Migne, J. P. (1857–60) Hippolytus, Opera, Patrologia Graeca, vols. X, XVI. Paris: Migne.

Stewart-Sykes, A. (2001) Hippolytus. On the Apostolic Tradition. Crestwood, NY: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Irenaeus

Bibliotheke Hellenon Pateron (1955) Irenaeus, vol. V. Athens: Apostoliki Diakonia, 89–188.

Dods, M. (trans.) (1885) Irenaeus, Adversus haereses. Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. I. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 305–578.

Harvey, W. D. (ed.) (1857) Irenaeus, Libri quinque adversus haereses, 2 vols. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Massuet, R. (ed.) (1710) Irenaeus, Adversus haereses. Reprinted in J. P. Migne (1857), Patrologia Graeca, vol. VII. Paris: Migne.

Roberts, A. and Rambaut, W. H. (trans.) (1868–9) The Writings of Irenaeus: The Ante-Nicene Fathers, 2 vols. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Robinson, J. A. (1920) English translation (from the Armenian) with introduction and notes, of Irenaeus, The Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching. London: SPCK.

Smith, J. P. (trans. and annot.) (1952) Proof of the Apostolic Preaching. Ancient Christian Writers 16. London: Longmans, Green & Co.

Ter-Mekerttschian, K. and Ter-Mianassiantz, E. (eds) (1907) Irenaeus, Gegen die Häretiker. Texte und Untersuchungen, vol. XXXI, 3. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Lactantius

Creed, J. L. (ed. and trans.) (1984) Lactantius: De mortibus persecutorum. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Fletcher, W. (trans.) (1886) Lactantius, Opera omnia. Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. VII. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 9–328.

Migne, J. P. (1844) Lactantius, Opera omnia, Patrologia Latina, vols. VI–VII. Paris: Sirou et Vrayet.

Novatian

Migne, J. P. (1844) Novatian, Opera, Patrologia Latina, vol. III. Paris: Sirou, 861–970.

Wallis, E. (trans.) (1886) Novatian, Opera omnia, Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. V. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 611–52.

Origen

Bibliotheke Hellenon Pateron (1956–8) Origen, vols. IX–XVII, 11–160. Athens: Apostoliki Diakonia.

Chadwick, H. (trans.) (1953) Origen, Contra Celsum. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Crombie, F. (trans.) (1885) Origen: Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. IV. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 223–669.

De la Rue, C. (ed.) (1733–59) Origen, Opera omnia, Paris. Reprinted in J. P. Migne (1857), Patrologia Graeca, vols. XI–XVII. Paris: Migne.

Heine, R. (2002) The Commentaries of Origen and Jerome on St Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Heither, T. (1990–9) Comentarii in epistulam ad Romanos. 6 vols. Fontes Christiani 2 (1–6). Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder.

Origen (1899–1941) Opera omnia. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2001–2) Origen: Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. 2 vols. Fathers of the Church. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 103–4.

Tertullian

Holmes, P. and Thelwall, S. (trans.) (1885) Tertullian, Opera omnia: Library of Ante-Nicene Fathers, vols. III–IV. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 5–166.

Migne, J. P. (1844) Tertullian, Opera omnia, Patrologia Latina, I–II; Tertullian, Opera omnia (1954) Corpus Christianorum Series Latina, I–II. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Secondary literature

Altaner, B. (1980) Patrologie, 9th ed. Freiburg, Germany: Herder.

Andresen, C. (1955) Logos und Nomos. Die Polemik des Kelsos wider das Christentum. Berlin: De Gruyter.

Bacq, P. (1978) De l'ancienne à la nouvelle alliance selon S. Irénée: Unité du Livre IV de l'Adversus Haereses. Paris: Lethielleux.

Barnes, T. D. (1985) Tertullian: A Historical and Literary Study, 2nd ed. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Bauer, W. (1964) Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum, 2nd ed. (1st ed. 1934). Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck. (Trans. R. A. Kraft as Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1964.)

Benoit, A. (1960) Saint Irénée: Introduction à l'étude de sa théologie. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.

Bercot, D. W. (1998) A Dictionary of Early Christian Beliefs. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Braun, R. (1977) Deus Christianorum. Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de Tertullien. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Bray, G. L. (1979) Holiness and the Will of God: Perspectives on the Theology of Tertullian. London: Marshall, Morgan and Scott.

Brent, A. (1995) Hippolytus and the Roman Church in the Third Century: Communities in Tension before the Emergence of the Monarch-Bishop. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Buell, D. K. (1999) Making Christians: Clement of Alexandria and the Rhetoric of Legitimacy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Burns, J. P. (2002) Cyprian the Bishop. London: Routledge.

Cerrato, J. A. (2002) Hippolytus between East and West. The Commentaries and the Provenance of the Corpus. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Crouzel, H. (1989) Origen, the Life and Thought of the First Great Theologian. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

De Simone, R. J. (1970) The Treatise of Novatian the Roman Presbyter on the Trinity. Rome: Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum.

Di Berardino, A. (ed.) (trans.) (2014) Encyclopedia of Ancient Christianity. 3 vols. Downers Grove, IL: Inter-Varsity Press.

Dix, G. (1937) The Treatise on the Apostolic Tradition of St Hippolytus of Rome. London: SPCK.

Fahey, M. A. (1971) Cyprian and the Bible: A Study in Third-Century Exegesis. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr.

Fantino, J. (1986) L'homme image de Dieu selon saint Irénée de Lyon. Paris: Cerf.

Fontaine, J. and Perrin, M. (eds) (1978) Lactance et son temps. Paris: Beauchesne.

Hägg, H. F. (2006) Clement of Alexandria and the Beginnings of Christian Apophaticism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hanson, R. P. C. (2002) Allegory and Event: A Study of the Sources and Significance of Origen's Interpretation of Scripture. 2nd ed. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox.

Hinchliff, P. (1974) Cyprian of Carthage and the Unity of the Christian Church. London: Geoffrey Chapman.

Holsinger-Friesen, T. (2009) Irenaeus and Genesis: A Study of Competition in Early Christian Hermeneutics. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.

Lassiat, H. (1974) Promotion de l'homme en Jésus Christ d'après Irénée de Lyon. Témoin de la tradition des Apôtres. Paris: Mame.

Lauro, E. A. D. (2005) The Soul and Spirit of Scripture within Origen's Exegesis. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Lawson, J. (1948) The Biblical Theology of Saint Irenaeus. London: Epworth.

Lilla, S. A. C. (1971) Clement of Alexandria: A Study in Christian Platonism and Gnosticism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Martens, P. W. (2012) Origen and Scripture: The Contours of the Exegetical Life. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Minns, D. (2010) Irenaeus, 2nd ed. London: T&T Clark.

Nielsen, J. T. (1968) Adam and Christ in the Theology of Irenaeus of Lyons. Assen, The Netherlands: Van Orcum.

Olson, M. J. (1992) Irenaeus, the Valentinian Gnostics, and the Kingdom of God. Lewiston, PA: Mellen.

Osborn, E. F. (1957) The Philosophy of Clement of Alexandria. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Osborn, E. F. (1993) The Emergence of Christian Theology. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Osborn, E. F. (1997) Tertullian, First Theologian of the West. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Osborn, E. F. (2001) Irenaeus of Lyons. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Osborn, E. F. (2005) Clement of Alexandria. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Quasten, J. (1950) Patrology, 3 vols. Utrecht, The Netherlands: Spectrum.

Quasten, J. (1986) Patrology, Vol. 4. Westminster, MD: Christian Classics Inc.

Rankin, D. (1995) Tertullian and the Church. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Sage, M. M. (1975) Cyprian. Cambridge, MA: Philadelphia Patristic Foundation.

Scheck, T. P. (2008) Origen and the History of Justification: The Legacy of Origen's Commentary on Romans. Notre Dame, IN: University Of Notre Dame Press.

Simonetti, M. (2004) Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione. Brescia, Italy: Editrice Morcelliana.

Smith, J. C. (1992) The Ancient Wisdom of Origen. Lewisburg, PA: Bicknell University Press.

Trevett, C. (1996) Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Trigg, J. W. (1983) Origen, the Bible and Philosophy in the Third-Century Church. Atlanta, GA: John Knox Press.

Turner, H. E. W. (1954) The Pattern of Christian Truth. London: Mowbrays.

Van den Hoek, A. (1988) Clement of Alexandria and his Use of Philo in the Stromateis. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Wingren, G. (1959) Man and the Incarnation: A Study in the Biblical Theology of Irenaeus, trans. R. Mackenzie. Edinburgh, UK: Oliver and Boyd.

30

LATER THEOLOGIANS OF THE GREEK EAST

Andrew Louth

Introduction

The later theologians of the Greek east belong to another world from that of their predecessors. Their predecessors faced the threat, and often the reality, of persecution by a hostile Roman state, while the later Greek theologians lived in a world where Christianity was first tolerated and then gradually became the official religion of the Roman empire. This radical change of orientation posed enormous problems for the Church, ultimately problems of identity. During the first three centuries of its existence, the Church had grown remarkably but still remained a group of relatively small and isolated communities. The long catechumenate that preceded baptism, together with the reality that martyrdom might well be a corollary of being a Christian, gave Christians a strong sense of identity over against the 'world' of the pagan society of the Roman empire. This sense of a tight-knit community was reinforced by celebration of the eucharist reserved for the baptised, excommunication of those who failed in their Christian vocation, by serious moral failing, as well as by apostasy, and the power of the local bishop over the local church. The fourth century CE saw changes that forced Christians to reformulate their sense of identity, or, rather drastically, to adapt the organs of identity they had developed. This was the context in which the later Greek theologians articulated their understanding of Christianity.

One important factor for the development of theology was what one might call the growing 'ecumenicity' of the Church, that is, the sense of the unity of the Church throughout the whole oikoumene or 'inhabited world', as the Romans called their empire. The Church had always believed that it was one, but this unity had primarily meant unity with the whole church from Adam onwards, and especially unity with the martyrs who, on their heavenly birthday, as their day of martyrdom was called, had become part of the church in heaven. This 'vertical' sense of unity always entailed a 'horizontal' unity, a unity of faith and communion, articulated through the episcopacy. But in the conditions of persecution this horizontal sense of unity had been difficult to realise, though notable efforts were made from the kind of pastoral care of one church for another manifest in I Clement, through the activity of episcopal meetings, called synods, to the kind of witness to the unity of the Church throughout the Mediterranean world found in Bishop Averkios' famous inscription (Lightfoot 1885: 476–85). (In about the middle of the second century CE, Averkios, the bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia, left his episcopal city and visited Rome. On his way home, he travelled through Syria and Mesopotamia, and was received with great honours in various places. Shortly after his return to Hierapolis he died, c. 167 CE, but not before composing his epitaph, which conveys a vivid impression of his visit to Rome and return. See Figure 30.1.)

Figure 30.1 A cast of the reconstruction of the Epitaph of Averkios, in the Museo della Civiltà Romana in Rome from the original in the Vatican Museums. Photo Wikimedia Commons: author Giovanni Dall'Orto

Imperial patronage almost immediately made available to the Church the possibility – or necessity – of undreamt-of horizontal unity. The emperor Constantine felt the need for the united prayers of a united church, and this provided an additional pressure on the Church to seek to articulate its unity. Such unity meant unity of teaching ('doctrinal unity') because Christians had long claimed not just to offer an effective way of religious contact with the divine, but also truth: about God himself (what came to be called theologia), and the way He dealt with the world (his management of the world, or oikonomia).

The growth of ecumenical authority

Decisions about such matters were made by synods (or councils, but 'synod' was the Christian word),[1] which had already evolved at a local level in the first three centuries. The period from the peace of the Church (312) to 431, the date of the Council of Ephesus, is marked by a series of church synods, three of which were to be recognised as 'ecumenical', that is authoritative for the whole oikoumene. Many of the decisions of these synods took the form of 'canons' (as decisions of church law were called) governing the life of the Church, which came to have the force of the Roman legal system, and through which the Church began to shape the sense of its own identity as the organ of the official religion of the empire. But ecumenical synods (and those that claimed to be ecumenical) were also concerned with doctrinal matters – especially with teaching concerning the trinitarian nature of God and the union of divine and human in Christ – which were central to later Greek theology. The first three synods, which were held at Nicæa in 325, Constantinople in 381 and Ephesus in 431, concerned themselves with these fundamental doctrinal issues (and such concern continued through the rest of the seven synods regarded as ecumenical, the last of which was held in Nicæa in 787).

The first three ecumenical synods mark out the fundamental doctrinal concerns of the Church in the period up to 431. Nicæa I was concerned with the status of the Son of God in relation to the Father; Constantinople I ostensibly with the divinity of the Spirit, and the beginning of discussion over the nature of the union of divine and human in Christ, but perhaps more fundamentally with reaffirming Nicæa as the standard for the religious orthodoxy that the Emperor Theodosius wanted to make the sole system of valid belief for the empire; and Ephesus was concerned with the central Christological issue (not finally settled until the Third Synod of Constantinople in 680–1), that of affirming the unity of Christ, while acknowledging the reality and integrity of his divine and human natures.

Nicæa and the doctrine of God

The synod of Nicæa was called to settle a dispute between the pope of Alexandria, Alexander, and one of his presbyters, Arius.[2] There are differing accounts in the Church historians about the precise origins of the dispute, but the nature of the dispute is clear, and concerned how to understand the relationship between God the Father and the Son of God. Behind the ideas of them both lay earlier attempts to understand this relationship by the Apologists and especially by Origen, attempts that revolved round the notion of the Logos.

Pre-Nicene theology

Earlier theologians had thought of the Logos as mediating between the inaccessible simplicity of God the Father and the multiplicity of the world; they had invoked the Logos as the subject of the theophanies of the Old Testament, and as incarnate in Jesus Christ. They also thought of the Logos as lying behind the harmonious structure of the world, and the human capacity to perceive this harmony as due to human participation in the Logos, a participation that rendered them logikoi, or rational. As an inbetween being, the Logos had a shifting valency, his closeness to God the Father being affirmed when it was a matter of emphasising the genuineness of his manifestation of God; his closeness to the human being asserted when his role in validating human understanding (not least of God) was emphasised. Within Origen's whole theological ontology, this shifting valency was simply a matter of emphasis. For Origen endorsed one of the fundamental tenets of Platonist metaphysics, according to which the most important ontological distinction was that between the spiritual (or noetic) world and the world of the senses, the former being eternal, the latter transitory. To the spiritual world belonged God the Father, the Logos, and rational beings, the logikoi (which included not just humans, but angels and demons too). Origen's doctrine of the eternal generation of the Logos affirmed his closeness to the Father, but did not distinguish him fundamentally from the logikoi, who also partook of eternity.

From the beginning of the fourth century, however, it was becoming more clearly perceived that the doctrine of creation out of nothing applied to all beings apart from God, including spiritual beings. With this perception, Origen's pattern of teaching lost something of its coherence. Both Arius' doctrine and Alexander's can be seen as ways of recovering coherence. Alexander affirms the coeternity of the Logos with the Father, while Arius rejects any doctrine of the Logos' inherent eternity, and places him among the beings created out of nothing. The writings of both Arius and

Alexander are preserved only in fragmentary form, so it is difficult to form any impression of their overall doctrine, but Arius is perhaps the more radical of the two and is one of the first to affirm what was to become the central tenet of Christian metaphysics, namely the doctrine of creation ex nihilo.

Arius

For Arius, everything other than God himself, that is the Father, is created out of nothing by the will of God: the fundamental ontological divide is between the uncreated God and the creation. That the Logos (or the Son, as he generally calls him) must belong on the created side of the divide is entailed by his monotheism, his belief that there is one God; several uncreated beings would entail several gods. But though created, the Son is different from all other creatures in being the 'Only-begotten', the first of God's creatures, through whom all other creatures have been created. Arius is often pre-sented (also by his contemporaries) as a cold logician, in contrast to the ardent faith, tolerant of logical muddle, that characterises the orthodox. That may well be unfair (as it also is to the orthodox). For although Arius emphasises the radical divide that separates the Son from the Father – the Son does not know the Father, he is foreign to the Father – so far as humans are concerned, the Son represents all they can know of the Father, he is a faithful image of the Father, and through the Son humans can approach the Father and offer him true worship. A glimpse of the devotional theology that this implies can be seen in the sermon Eusebius of Caesarea gave at the consecration of the Christian basilica in Tyre after the end of the persecution:

> [t]he worship of the church on earth led by the bishop in his basilica is a copy of the worship of the Church in heaven led by Christ Himself. We worship God as God made manifest to us, and through Him worship the Father of all.[3]

Nicæa and the homoousion

Arius was condemned at the synod of Nicæa in 325 CE for refusing assent to a creed, drawn up by the synod, that included the keyword homoousios, consubstantial, 'one in being', to describe the relationship of the Son to the Father; this relationship was also described as being 'out of the being of the Father', and called being begotten, in explicit contrast to being created. It is not clear how the creed was drawn up, or why the word homoousios was used, though Arius had already rejected the term as 'Manichaean' (materialist, in this context?).[4] Neither is it clear what the fathers of the synod made of the term. Eusebius of Cæsarea gives the only contemporary interpretation, which is minimalist.[5] After the death of Constantine in 337, a series of synods called over the next two decades makes it clear there was little support in the east for the doctrine of the homoousion, and even Athanasius rarely uses the term, save in connection with the Nicene synod, until the late 360s. The eventual victory for the 'Nicene' doctrine of the homoousion is due in large measure to the efforts of Athanasius and the Cappadocian Fathers.[6]

Athanasius

Athanasius was a young deacon, accompanying his bishop Alexander of Alexandria, at the synod of Nicæa, and probably played little part in the proceedings of the synod, despite later claims to the contrary (see Chapter 53 of this work). In 328 he succeeded Alexander as pope of Alexandria; by then he was probably barely thirty, as there were claims that he was under the canonical age. He spent the rest of his life administering his huge diocese, when he was not in exile for his opposition to imperial religious policy, which in the east abandoned Nicæa from the death of Constantine until the accession of Theodosius in 389. His writings, therefore, are far from systematic; it is, however, possible to discern in them the outline of a profound theological vision, which it is fair to say was to cast its spell over nearly all later Greek theology.

His theological vision

This vision is expressed in Athanasius' two-part treatise, Contra Gentes-De Incarnatione.[7] The first part is in the tradition of apologetic, that is a defence of Christianity against Greek philosophical culture; the second part is more deeply theological. More precisely, both parts of the treatise present a defence of the cross (proving that Christ was 'the Saviour of the universe and that the cross was not the ruin but the salvation of creation' [CG 1]; reaffirmed by the allusion to 1 Cor. 1:22–4 in Inc. 1),[8] the treatise as a whole establishing an overall contemplative context: the human person is created to contemplate God, contemplation itself being a transforming activity (as with Origen, one is what one contemplates). This contemplative dimension of human existence is founded on the fact that humans are created, kat' eikona tou Theou, according to the image of God, which Athanasius takes to mean, following most earlier Greek theologians, that human beings are created in accordance with the Logos, who is himself the image of God. Humans are 'in the image', because they are logikoi, rational, and thus it is in the soul or intellect that the image is principally to be found (CG 2; Inc. 3). The soul functions as a kind of mirror (CG 8, 34) in which one can see reflected the image of God, that is the Word, and through contemplation of the Word, one is led to contemplate the original, of which the Word is the image, that is the Father.

But – and here Athanasius parts company with Origen and pursues the insight he shares with his opponent, Arius – human beings are created in the image of God, and for Athanasius, as for Arius, this means created out of nothing, ex nihilo (cf. Inc. 2–3). Athanasius explores deeply the meaning of being created. On the one hand, being created out of nothing means that there is nothing as such in being created that is opposed to God; in its relationship with God there is no limit to what it may become, indeed the goal of creation (at least rational creation) is deification, becoming God. This establishes the fundamental arc of Greek theology, an arc that passes from creation to deification, and within which everything else – including the Fall and redemption – has a subordinate place. But there is another side to being created, for being created out of nothing means that once the creature loses hold of its relationship to the Creator, it loses hold on being itself and begins to slip into non-existence. This indeed happened to the human creation, and this is what is meant by the Fall. Fallen creation slides into non-existence; it falls prey to what Athanasius calls corruption and death, phthora and thanatos, which stalk through the pages of de Incarnatione like a couple of avenging furies. This is a corruption of what things are, of their being or nature; it is not a superficial rust (Inc. 44). In human beings, this corruption eats into the state of being in the image of God (the kat' eikona, as Athanasius puts it), which begins to disappear (Athanasius uses the verb in the imperfect): this negative corrosion ultimately leads to death. Contemplation of God fails (Athanasius suggests that contemplation in fallen creatures is directed to the nothingness of creatures, instead of God), and human beings cease to know God. Lack of knowledge of God and a nature dissolving through corruption: this is the result of the Fall. And Athanasius argues that only the embracing of humanity, that is the living of a human life to the point of death, by the Word who is in himself the image of God can arrest the effects of the Fall. The Word made flesh came and preached and thus restored the knowledge of God; more fundamentally, by assuming humanity he restored the image, in accordance with which we were created; more fundamentally still, by encountering death in his humanity he destroyed the power of death, and manifested the 'grace of the resurrection' (Inc. 21). Everything in Athanasius' mature theology can be traced back to the theological vision outlined in this work.

Athanasius' understanding of the homoousion

In his works against the Arians, Athanasius worked out an understanding of the homoousion that was to be determinative for later orthodoxy. But it is clear from his writings that only gradually did the language of the homoousion come to form part of his own theological vocabulary. What was fundamental for Athanasius was to acknowledge that the Son (and eventually the Spirit) belonged with the Father as uncreated beings. For him the homoousion was fundamentally relational: the Son was to be confessed as homoousios with the Father, which he understood as expressing 'full unbroken continuation of being' (Stead 1977: 263, quoting Robertson). But this could be expressed in a variety of ways, of which the homoousion was simply one. The reason for this insistence on the uncreated status of the Son was twofold. First, like Arius, he saw that creation ex nihilo implies that the fundamental division of Christian metaphysics is between the uncreated and the created; there is no inbetween. Second, the Son could only repair the consequences of the Fall, which saw the whole created order sliding into nothingness, if he were himself uncreated; any creature would be implicated in the Fall. Further, and perhaps more fundamentally, only God can deify; anything less than God would represent a limit to the potentially limitless movement of deification. The purpose of the Incarnation, then, is not simply to redeem, but to deify: 'he became human, that we might be deified' (Inc. 54). A consequence of the Son being uncreated, homoousios with the Father, is the need to define and defend the unity of God: does the existence of two uncreated beings mean, as Arius argued, the denial of monotheism? Athanasius clearly thought not, neither did he think that the divine unity demanded by monotheism could be secured by arguing that the uncreated divine beings were one in purpose, harmony or will. Rather, Athanasius argues that the unity of Father and Son is to be found on the ontological level. But he expresses this by using traditional analogies and arguments: the Son is to the Father as radiance to the sun, or a river flowing from a spring; the very notion of Father implies a Son; the Son is the Father's wisdom, or the Father's will. He makes use of more formal ontological language, but not systematically, mentioning the 'oneness of being (ousia)' manifesting the 'sameness of Godhead', and affirming that the nature (physis) the Father and the Son share is one (Contra Arianos 3.3–4). Athanasius' success in fighting against those he (somewhat unfairly) regarded as 'Arians' was sealed by the synod he called at Alexandria in 362 (taking advantage of the truce for exiled bishops declared by the emperor Julian), when he secured agreement between those eastern bishops, like himself, who saw little difference between the terms ousia and hypostasis, and understood both to refer to the unity of the Godhead, and other eastern bishops (who may be called 'Origenian' in this respect) who used the term hypostasis to refer to the Father, Son and Holy Spirit in their distinctness. There were those who refused to accept this – 'Homœans', who believed that the Son was like the Father and who retained the political ascendancy for another decade or so and 'Anomœans', who believed that the Son was unlike the Father – but they failed to withstand the Cappadocian defence of orthodoxy, that built on Athanasius' achievement at Alexandria in 362.

Athanasius and the Holy Spirit

Athanasius' neglect of the Spirit is remedied in his anti-Arian writings, an example being the way in which the famous assertion of de Incarnatione, quoted above, linking incarnation and deification, is reformulated in de Decretis to read: 'For "the Word became flesh", that he might offer this on behalf of all, and that we, participating in his Spirit, might be capable of deification' (de Decretis 14). But it was only towards the end of the 350s that Athanasius addressed the question of the Holy Spirit directly. The creed adopted by the synod of Nicæa had merely affirmed the existence of the Spirit, and there seems to have been little concern about the nature and status of the Spirit in the ensuing controversy over the adequacy of the dogmatic decision of that synod. The issue was raised by those whom Athanasius calls Tropici, that is those, he argued, who interpreted Scripture allegorically (or 'tropologically') in order to evade the teaching of Scripture on the Holy Spirit. (They were later called Pneumatomachoi, or 'Spirit-fighters', or Macedonians, after Macedonius, archbishop of Constantinople c. 342–60 CE, about whom we know little.) In truth, as St Gregory Nazianzen was to acknowledge, the witness of Scripture to the Holy Spirit is by no means straightforward. The Tropici maintained that the Holy Spirit was a creature, one of the 'ministering spirits' mentioned in Hebrews (1:14). In essence, Athanasius' response is to extend the arguments he had already used to establish the divinity of the Son in his anti-Arian writings to the case of the Holy Spirit, whom he called the 'Image of the Son' (Letter to Serapion [= Serap], 1.24). He argues that the Holy Spirit belongs to the uncreated side of the primal divide between the uncreated and the created: he is from God, not ex nihilo. His titles – life-giving (zōopoion), unction and seal – demonstrate his role in deification and therefore his uncreated, divine status (Serap. 1.23). Athanasius also extends to the Spirit the epithet homoousion (Serap. 1.27; 3.1).

The apparent neglect of the life of faith in de Incarnatione is amply compensated in his formal ascetic writings (cf. Brakke 1995), and in the festal letters sent to his clergy and people each year in preparation for Easter. From these it is clear that for Athanasius the Incarnation invites and demands a response that includes faith and a strenuous attempt to respond to God's offer of grace by fighting against temptation and growing in the virtues.

The Cappadocian Fathers

The Cappadocian Fathers – Basil ('the Great') of Cæsarea (modern Kayseri in Turkey),[9] his friend Gregory of Nazianzus ('the Theologian'),[10] and his younger brother Gregory of Nyssa, to whom should be added Macrina, the elder sister of Basil and Gregory, of whose teaching we know through Gregory's devotion to her – built on the achievement of Athanasius and were instrumental in formulating and defending the Nicene orthodoxy that was made the religious ideology of the Roman empire at the synod of Constantinople, called by Theodosius in 381. The depth of their admiration for Athanasius can be gauged from Gregory Nazianzen's panegyric 'on the Great Athanasius' (Oration 21). They are often called 'Neo-Nicenes', with the implication that what they called Nicene orthodoxy was something other than the doctrine of the Synod of 325. Their theology is certainly more developed, both in terms of trinitarian theology and Christology, but the widespread assumption that they owe more to the so-called 'homœousian' party, who in the late 350s advanced the belief that the Son was of similar substance (homoiousios) to the Father, instead of homoousios, needs to be challenged. There are two reasons for this widespread belief: first, Basil's association with homœousian circles through his (then) friendship with Eustathius of Sebaste (Rousseau 1994: 98–9); second, the conviction that Athanasius' understanding of the homoousion is to be interpreted as expressing a doctrine of 'numerical unity of substance', with which the Cappadocian doctrine cannot be reconciled. The latter characterisation of Athanasius' doctrine has been refuted conclusively by Professor Stead (1977: 260–6). The former point runs the risk of attributing guilt by association, but is sometimes supported by appeal to the alleged early correspondence between Basil and the then revered defender of Nicene orthodoxy, Apollinaris of Laodicea (Epistles 361–4), in which Basil, as an homœousian, sought advice from Apollinaris about the meaning of the homoousion. But even if the correspondence is genuine (and there is no agreement on this: cf. Fedwick 1981: 6, n. 23), it would seem that Apollinaris convinced Basil, as a genuine letter of Basil's (Ep. 9 to Maximus the philosopher), written shortly afterwards, defends an authentically Athanasian understanding of the homoousion.

The Cappadocian contribution to theology, in the widest sense, is enormous. They were all committed to the ascetic movement of the fourth century, and Basil, in particular, is a fundamental figure for eastern monasticism, not least through his misleadingly entitled 'Rules'. The Cappadocian Fathers, not least Macrina, are also important in the history of the Christian incorporation of the values and ideas of classical, hellenic culture (cf. Pelikan 1993). Gregory Nazianzen (see Figure 30.2) was a prolific poet (especially in his last decade), and Gregory of Nyssa wrote compellingly on the personal transformation that faithful pursuit of the Christian life entails (what is often called 'mysticism'). All of them shared an understanding of the human person as being on the border between uncreated and created being by virtue of being created in the image of God, and exercising a mediatorial role as a kind of little cosmos (mikros kosmos), in which the great cosmos of the created order is reflected and contained. But we shall be mainly concerned here with their contribution to the development of the fundamental doctrines of the Trinity and Christology.
Figure 30.2   Twelfth-century mosaic of Gregory Nazianzen, Santa Maria dell'Ammiraglio in Palermo, Sicily.
Photo Wikimedia Commons; Jastrow

The Cappadocians and the unknowability of God

Fundamental to Cappadocian theology is their conviction of the radical unknowability of God. In one of his letters to his friend and fellow-bishop, Amphilochius of Iconium, Basil insists that though God reveals himself through his activities, in his essence he remains unknowable: 'We say that from his activities (energeiōn) we know our God, but we do not undertake to approach the essence (ousia) itself. For his activities descend to us, but his essence remains unapproachable'. It is precisely this incomprehensibility that inspires our reverence and worship:

> [k]nowledge of the divine essence is the sense of his incomprehensibility; and what inspires our worship is not what the essence is comprehended as being, but that it is at all . . . Therefore, from the activities comes knowledge, and from knowledge worship (ep. 234).

The second of Gregory Nazianzen's 'Theological Orations' (Or. 28) is devoted to the subject of God's ineffability. But perhaps the profoundest exploration among the Cappadocians of the unknowability of God is found in Gregory of Nyssa. For him, God's unknowability is a consequence of ontological divide between the uncreated Trinity and the created order; because of this divide there is nothing in common between God and creature, and thus God is utterly unknowable to the creature. It follows from this, Gregory argues, that the closer the creature comes to God in himself, the more he is aware of God's incomprehensibility: coming close to God is to enter darkness. As the soul seeks God in himself:

> [i]t goes always towards the more inward, until by the activity of the intellect it arrives at the invisible and the incomprehensible and there it sees God. For the true knowledge and seeing of what we seek consists in this, in not seeing, because that which we seek transcends all knowledge, cut off, as it were, on every side by incomprehensibility, as by a thick cloud.
>
> (de Vita Moysis [= Moses] 2. 163)

This implies that the soul, in its search for God, is engaged on an endless quest:

> For no limit can be conceived in a boundless nature. And the limitless cannot by nature be understood. But every desire towards the beautiful which draws us on in this ascent is intensified by the very progress towards the beautiful. And this is truly to see God: never to have this desire satisfied.
>
> (Moses 2. 238–9)[11]

Opposition to Anomœanism

This Cappadocian conviction of the radical unknowability of God was deepened by their engagement with Anomœanism, the doctrine, promoted especially by Eunomius, who was briefly bishop of Cyzikus in 360, at the height of the power of the radical opponents of Nicæa. According to this doctrine, the Son is unlike the Father. Eunomius' defence of this doctrine, of which only fragments now survive in the refutations of him principally by Basil and Gregory of Nyssa, was expressed in terms of considerable philosophical sophistication, and continued to engage the minds of the Cappadocian Fathers, and also of St John Chrysostom,[12] until the 380s. Part of Eunomius' case, it was alleged, was that the simplicity of God's nature entailed that 'God does not know anything more about his own essence than we do' (cf. Vaggione 1987: 167–73, 179). Against this the orthodox tirelessly asserted God's ineffability. The earliest of Basil's theological works was directed against Eunomius (Sesboüé et al. 1982–3). Gregory of Nyssa also composed a series of responses to Eunomius' defence against Basil's attack (the first written just after Basil's death), and a response to Eunomius' 'Confession of Faith', submitted to Emperor Theodosius (all these constitute Gregory's Contra Eunomium);[13] the third and fourth of Gregory Nazianzen's 'Theological Orations', Or. 29–30, also attacked Eunomius.

Being and person: ousia and hypostasis

More important than the details of the Cappadocian response to Eunomius was the terminology Basil formulated, which soon won universal acceptance in the Greek east, for expressing the doctrine of the Trinity. As noted above, the synod of Alexandria in 362 had accepted that different use of the terminology of ousia and hypostasis did not necessarily entail different doctrines. Basil's proposal was to agree to use these two words differently, using ousia to express the unity of the Godhead, and hypostasis to express the distinct members of the Trinity. In two letters written in 375, Basil introduces the distinction between ousia and hypostasis:

> Ousia has the same relationship to hypostasis as the common (koinon) has to the particular (idion). For each of us participates in existence by the common term ousia, and is such a one by his own properties. So there (kakei: in the Godhead) the term ousia is common, such as goodness, divinity, or any other notion, while the hypostasis is beheld in the property of fatherhood, or of sonship, or of sanctifying power.
>
> (ep. 214)

He insists that hypostasis is a better word than prosōpon, used by the Sabellians, since hypostasis has ontological connotations, absent from prosōpon. He also comments that western Christians should also accept this, even though their own terminology confuses the terms (since the Latin substantia, used to translate ousia, is literally equivalent to hypostasis): with typical Greek hauteur, he puts this confusion down to the 'poverty of their language'. Basil is often accused of (or credited with) introducing an Aristotelian distinction, but there is nothing more than a general similarity of concept between Basil's distinction and Aristotle's distinction between first and second substance in Categories 5. We need to recall Basil's conviction of God's fundamental ineffability: this is an analogy that gives us a glimpse of the nature of the Trinity, not a rigorous distinction from which we can make logical deductions. It is worth noting that one reason Basil advances for making this distinction is: 'for unless the mind is free from confusion over the properties of each [of the persons], it will be impossible to complete the doxology to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit' (ep. 210). Such precision is necessary for worship.

The doctrine of the Holy Spirit

Basil

The doxology to the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit was at the heart of a controversy that produced from Basil one of his greatest works, his treatise On the Holy Spirit.[14] This was written in the mid 370s, almost twenty years after Athanasius' letters to Serapion on the Holy Spirit. But despite the later date, it is much less explicit on the nature and status of the Holy Spirit than Athanasius had been: Basil does not call the Spirit God, much less use the term homoousion. Central to the controversy was the form of the doxology, whether it should have the form, 'Glory to the Father, through the Son, in the Holy Spirit', or, 'Glory to the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit' (in Spirit 1. 3 he speaks of this latter form as concluding 'with the Son and with the Holy Spirit'). Basil insists that both are to be used, because the former makes clear the order of the divine persons in the oikonomia of salvation, while the latter ranks the three persons together as equal.

But Basil's reticence in making his doctrine of the Spirit explicit caused something of a scandal among those committed to the orthodoxy for which the Cappadocians were fighting; we learn of this both from one of Gregory Nazianzen's letters (ep. 58) and his panegyric on Basil (Or. 43). In both cases, Gregory defends his friend by distinguishing between what one can confess in private and what it is wise to confess in public. This corresponds exactly to a distinction Basil himself makes in the course of On the Holy Spirit between kerygma, the public teaching of the Church, and dogma, the deeper meaning of the experience of the life of faith: 'Dogma is one thing, kerygma another; the one is kept silent, while the kerygmata are proclaimed publicly' (Spirit 27. 66). The distinction between kerygma and dogma corresponds to the distinction between the 'written teaching' and 'what is handed down to us secretly (en mysteriō[i]) in the tradition of the apostles'. This latter is no whispered message, but liturgical practices like the sign of the cross, eastward-facing prayer, the eucharistic invocation; also the 'obscurity that surrounds the Scriptures making the meaning of its doctrines difficult for the profit of its readers' is a 'form of silence'. What Basil perhaps means is that the doctrine of the divinity of the Holy Spirit is not something that can be grasped apart from its being experienced, an experience that takes place primarily in participation in the Church's liturgy. At any rate, Basil's reticence over explicitly affirming the divinity of the Spirit is reflected in the clause added to the confession of the Holy Spirit in the creed drawn up at the synod of Constantinople in 381, which restricts itself to ranking the Spirit with the Father and the Son in worship and glorification (Tanner 1990: 24), though the letter of the Synod to Pope Damasus, summing up its achievements, is more explicit (Tanner 1990: 28).

Gregory Nazianzen

Basil's reticence was not shared by his friend, Gregory Nazianzen, who asserts clearly in his fifth 'Theological Oration', 'What then? Is the Spirit God? Yes, indeed. Is he homoousios? Yes, if he is God' (Or. 31.10). But Gregory, too, knows that the divinity of the Holy Spirit is less clear from the Scriptures than that of the Father or the Son, and also agrees with Basil that the real demonstration of the Spirit is found in the life of the Church:

> The Old Testament proclaimed the Father clearly, and the Son more obscurely. The New Testament makes clear the Son, and indicates the divinity of the Spirit. Now the Spirit lives among us, providing us with the clearest revelation of himself.
>
> (Or. 31.26)

Gregory advances beyond his friend in other ways. Basil's distinction between ousia and hypostasis as parallel to that between common and the particular raised the question as to what were the particular features that distinguished Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Basil suggested, as we have seen above, fatherhood, sonship and sanctifying power (in ep. 236 Basil derives these idiōmata or charaktēres from the opening words of each clause of the creed). But what kind of particular features are these? Furthermore, is sanctifying power really distinctive of the Spirit; surely it could be ascribed to Father or Son? Gregory's contribution is first to identify such a particular feature as a relationship (schēsis): '"father" is the name neither of an essence nor of an activity, but of a relationship or manner of being that holds between the father and the son' (or. 29.16). Fatherhood and sonship, then, are to be seen as relationships. What of the Holy Spirit? For Gregory, the relationship that identifies the Spirit is that mentioned in John 15:26: procession (ekporeusis: or. 31.8). The Son is begotten from the Father; the Spirit proceeds from the Father. In that way, Gregory turned the jibe of the pneumatomachians that inclusion of the Spirit within the Godhead would make him either the Son's twin (if the Spirit was derived from the Father) or the Father's grandson (or. 31.7–8). But what these terms, begetting and procession, mean in themselves when used of the Godhead is beyond our comprehension.

The Cappadocians and Messalianism

There is perhaps more to this combination of reticence about the Spirit and a sense of the power of the Spirit's presence than appears on the surface of the historical record. The period of the Cappadocian struggle for Nicene orthodoxy overlapped with the period when we first begin to hear of the so-called 'Messalians', a word derived from the Syriac meaning 'those who pray' (in Greek, Euchites).[15] The Messalians were accused of neglecting the sacramental life of the Church and its hierarchy, and placing all their faith in prayer to the Holy Spirit, who, it was believed, would descend on those who sought him and transform them, granting them that serenity and freedom from temptation that was called apatheia in the language of Greek ascetic theology. They were condemned at synods held in Antioch in Syria and Side in Pamphylia in the 380s or 390s, and also at the Third Ecumenical Synod at Ephesus in 431. Despite this official condemnation, they exercised considerable influence in orthodox circles. Their influence is most evident in the collections of homilies ascribed to Macarius of Egypt, which were treasured in orthodox circles, but they also made an impact on the Cappadocian Fathers, at least on the two brothers. Chapter 9 of Basil's On the Holy Spirit, a chapter that forms an interlude between the two parts of the treatise and constitutes an encomium on the Holy Spirit in which have been detected echoes of Plotinus, circulated separately as part of the Macarian literature (Haykin 1994: 106), and Gregory of Nyssa's de Instituto Christiano is in part dependent on the 'Great Letter' of Macarius (Staats 1968). It may be that Basil and others felt pulled in different directions by this enthusiastic movement: keen to acknowledge the experience of the Spirit, but reluctant to play into the hands of those who appealed to the Spirit against the episcopal hierarchy and the sacraments – precisely the context in which Basil locates the experience of the Spirit.[16]

The defining of orthodoxy

The purpose of the Synod of Constantinople held in 381 was to place the seal on the restoration of Nicene orthodoxy. By this time Basil was dead, but the two Gregories played important roles in the synod. Gregory Nazianzen had a significant part, as the pastor of the orthodox congregation at the church of Anastasia, in the preparation for the synod, but the synod was, for him, a political disaster. His appointment as archbishop of Constantinople was opposed on the grounds that it would mean translation from his see of Sasima, the 'utterly dreadful and cramped little settlement', of which Basil had had him consecrated bishop against his will, and where he had never resided. Deposed, Gregory left for his family estate and his literary activity. For Gregory of Nyssa, on the contrary, the synod marked the beginning of prominence as one of the official spokesmen for imperial orthodoxy. One of his works belonging to this period is his Catechetical Oration,[17] perhaps the first attempt to present a systematic account of Christian doctrine since Origen's On First Principles. The first four chapters concern the doctrine of God the Trinity, and it is perhaps worth giving an outline here, as this passage was to have a lasting influence on eastern theology, as it formed the basis for the exposition of the doctrine of God in St John Damascene's Exposition of the Orthodox Faith.

Gregory begins by presenting Christian teaching as a middle way between pagan polytheism and Jewish monotheism. He starts by arguing for the existence of a single divine power (dynamis), 'manifest in the [harmony of the cosmos] and transcendent over the all' (Cat. prol), against the dispersed divinity of paganism. He then goes on to say, against Judaism, that 'the doctrine of piety is able to see a certain distinction of hypostasis in the unity of the [divine] nature' (Cat. 1), and argues for the existence in God of Logos. His argument is based on the analogy of the human being's uttering of a word, but whereas everything about the human is transitory, and so our word is passing, 'the incorruptible and eternally enduring nature has a word that is everlasting and subsistent' (ibid.). Briefly, he sketches out the qualities of the Logos, that it is free and a power that works unerringly towards the good, for which reason the world, created by the Logos, is good, too. He argues that a Logos is different from that of which it is the Logos, and yet this difference is not a matter of nature (physis), so that all the properties that we ascribe to God – goodness, power, wisdom, eternity – lead us both to the Father, and to 'the Logos that subsists from out of him' (ibid.). Chapter 2 argues that just as by analogy we have been able to discern the existence of God's Logos from the human word, so in the case of the Holy Spirit we can discern 'certain shadows and likenesses of the ineffable nature in ourselves'. He pursues this by seeing an analogy in the breath (pneuma) that gives force to our words (in this probably picking up Basil's idea of the Spirit as the 'breath of [God's] mouth', developed in Spirit 16.38). Chapter 3 sums up this middle way, while stressing the 'inexpressible depth of mystery' that we are venturing into:

> The unity of nature survives from the assumptions of the Jews, the distinction into hypostaseis from paganism, each being healed mutually by the other from their irreverent opinions. For it is as if the number of the triad is a remedy for those who err concerning the one, while the doctrine of unity is a remedy for those dispersed into multiplicity.
>
> (Cat. 3)

Chapter 4 derives all this from Scripture by an exegesis of Ps. 32:6: 'by the word of the Lord were the heavens established, and all their power by the breath of his mouth'.

There are several points worth noting about this exposition. First, it starts from the single divine power manifest in the world that makes clear the unity of God; it is from the unity of God (the Father) that Gregory proceeds to develop the doctrine of the Trinity. Second, although Gregory is clearly aware of his brother's distinction between ousia and hypostasis (indeed, the most elaborate discussion of this distinction, preserved as Ep. 38 in Basil's correspondence, is most likely by Gregory of Nyssa himself), he makes use of this distinction in quite an informal way, and (probably because he starts from the divine dynamis) uses the term physis in preference to ousia. And third, the analogy from which he develops his doctrine of the Trinity is drawn from the human being as a whole, soul and body, not from the spiritual side of human nature, as if that were in some way closer to God.

. . . and heresy

A clear exposition of the faith, in creed and treatise, was clearly an important part of the project of defining imperial orthodoxy. The other side of that project was the categorising and condemnation of error, which was fulfilled in the work of Epiphanius, bishop of Constantia (ancient Salamis, near modern Famagusta) in Cyprus. In his own life, he was active in the exposing of heresy, not least Origenism, but his main contribution to Theodosius' enterprise of establishing Christian Orthodoxy was his Panarion, in which he summarised and refuted eighty heresies, from the time of Adam to his own time, providing thereby a kind of genealogy of heresy.

The Cappadocians and Christology

The background to the problem

But clarification about the co-equal divinity of Father, Son and Spirit only rendered more acute the problem of understanding how divinity and humanity could be united in the person of Christ. The theologians of the second and third centuries had tended to suggest that the Godhead perceived in Christ was itself a mediator between the supreme Godhead of the Father and the human condition. Arius had called into question what could be meant by such mediation, if God were Creator, and solved the problem by making the Only-begotten God, manifest in Jesus, the supreme creature. The eventual triumph of Nicene orthodoxy left the Christological problem posed in stark terms: in Christ were united human nature and the divine nature of the Son, co-equal with the Father. Two trends can be seen in the theology of the later fourth century. The first, already clearly stated in Athanasius, held firmly to the full divinity of the Son, and sees in the Incarnation the amazing paradox of God living a human life, a paradox that is a measure of God's immeasurable love for humankind. The second trend kept the two natures apart, for fear lest the integrity of either be affected by the presence of the other. (The two tendencies are often called, not altogether satisfactorily, Word–flesh and Word–man – Logos-sarx and Logos-anthrōpos – christologies: see especially Grillmeier 1975.) The dangers of the first trend, with its stress on the unity of Christ, for in him God was living a human life, were soon to be manifest.

Apollinarianism

Apollinaris of Laodicea, a friend of Athanasius, who had openly proclaimed his support for him and his theological stance by welcoming him and sharing communion with him on his return from exile in 346, was the first we know of to reveal these dangers. Only fragments of his works remain, but from these it can be argued that Apollinaris, in his reflections on Christ, was simply thinking through the implications of Athanasius' approach to Christology (these parallels are more telling than the fact, often mentioned, that Athanasius never unambiguously asserts that Christ had a human soul). For instance, in Against the Arians 3.30, Athanasius asserts that '[The Word] became man, he did not come into a man', and goes on to explain that 'coming into a man' is what happened in the case of the prophets, whereas 'becoming a man' refers to the Incarnation. Three fragments (preserved in Gregory of Nyssa's Antirrheticus adversus Apollinarium) are perhaps reflections on this distinction. They read: 'unless the Lord was enfleshed mind, he was wisdom enlightening a human mind. But this happens in all men. If this were the case, the advent of Christ was not the coming of God, but a human birth'; 'if the Word did not become an enfleshed mind, but wisdom in a mind, the Lord did not come down nor did he empty himself'; 'therefore he was a man; for, according to Paul, a man is a mind in the flesh' (frr. 70–2; fragments taken from Lietzmann 1904). Like Athanasius, Apollinaris is trying to distinguish between inspiration by divine wisdom (as in the prophets) and incarnation (as in Christ). But unlike Athanasius, whose method is simply to illustrate the differences (e.g. the Word is not said to suffer when a prophet suffers, in contrast to the case of Christ), Apollinaris' method is analytical: if inspiration means the Word or Wisdom illuminating a human mind, then Incarnation must be something different – the Word taking the place of the human mind, which means that he becomes a human being, because a human being is a mind in the flesh (he cites Paul). This means that the Incarnate one is as much a single being as any human being (for which Apollinaris used the fateful phrase mia physis tou Theou Logou sesarkōmenē: one incarnate nature of God the Word): the Word is living a human life.

But what kind of a human life, without a human mind? To understand Apollinaris here, we need to be sensitive to the way he juggles the two ontological divides we have already mentioned: the Platonic divide between the spiritual and the material, and the Christian divide between uncreated and created. For Apollinaris seems to share Athanasius' analysis of creation as well as his approach to Christology: the creature, left to itself, slides away into nothingness. Hence the Fall: the frail human mind drifted off into sin, and became subject to the opportunities for sin provided by the flesh. No human mind could reverse that, for it too would be frail and succumb to the flesh. What was needed then was an uncreated mind, that is the Logos himself, who is unchangeable, and could assume flesh and overpower it, and thus restore fallen humankind. The Platonism is revealed in Apollinaris' anthropology: the human is simply a conjunction of spiritual mind (which can be either created or the uncreated Logos) and material body; but this has been radicalised by his understanding of the creature as essentially changeable and frail. There are then two motives in Apollinaris' Athanasian reflections on Christology. First, incarnation is distinct from inspiration: incarnation produces a new nature, God become man. Second, his profound sense of human frailty, including the frailty of the human mind. These two motives are manifest in Apollinaris' switching between a dichotomous and a trichotomous anthropology (in which he is not at all unusual): when he is thinking of the single nature of Christ, he tends to use a dichotomous anthropology, with the Logos assuming flesh; when he is thinking of human moral frailty, he employs the trichotomous model with the Logos taking the place of the nous and being joined to the soul (psychē, representing animal life) and body.

The Cappadocian response

Apollinaris' doctrine is neat, but what is the human life that the Logos has assumed in Christ? It was on that point that the two Gregories, especially Gregory Nazianzen, concentrated their attack on Apollinaris. (They attacked him, less fairly, for other beliefs that are misunderstandings of Apollinaris, either by them or by Apollinaris' disciples, for instance the belief that the Word brought his human-ity from heaven and did not assume it from the Virgin.) For them both, Apollinaris' Christology was radically deficient because Christ had to assume all human life if he was to redeem it. But the part of man most in need of redemption was precisely the human mind and will, for humans had fallen, according to the biblical narrative, not because they succumbed to the flesh, but because they rebelled against God, or crossed wills with him: the fundamental sin that had brought about the Fall was pride, setting oneself up in defiance of God. As Gregory Nazianzen memorably put it: 'For the unassumed is the unhealed; that which is united to God is saved' (ep. 101.32). But as the second part of that sentence (often forgotten) reveals, Gregory remained committed to the Athanasian approach to Christology: the Word assumes everything human to live a human life, and thereby to redeem and indeed to deify humankind. Elsewhere in the letters devoted to the Apollinarian heresy (epp. 101, 102, 201), and also in his sermons, especially the third 'Theological Oration' (or. 29.17–21), Gregory tackles the problem of how the Word, fully divine in himself, can assume humanity, lacking in nothing. Two principles emerge. First, there is one subject in Christ, and that subject is the Logos, everything done by Christ or suffered by him is to be ascribed to the Logos; second, this produces a paradoxical union of God and humanity, and to enter into that paradox is to begin to realise the meaning of the Incarnation:

> As a lamb he is dumb; but he is word, proclaimed by a voice crying in the desert. He is frail, wounded; but he heals every sickness, and every frailty. He is brought to the cross, and crucified; but he restores us by the tree of life.
>
> (or. 29.20)

(It is worth noting that, here, as with Athanasius in Inc., there is no 'Incarnational' theology that prescinds from the cross: the Incarnation entails kenōsis, as understood by Paul in Phil. 2:5–11.)

The Christological controversy

The Antiochene school

Apollinarianism marked the beginning of the Christological controversy sparked off by the ascription of uncompromising divinity to Christ by Nicene orthodoxy. The next stage was sparked off by the reaction to Apollinaris, less measured than that of the Cappadocian Fathers, by a group of Christian thinkers associated with the metropolis of the diocese of the east (Oriens), Antioch. The central figure, about whom, alas, we know less than we would like, was Diodore (d. c. 390), who had a kind of Christian school in Antioch, where he instructed his pupils in both scriptural exegesis and theology, and the principles and practice of Christian asceticism. He later became bishop of Tarsus. Among his pupils in Antioch were numbered Theodore, who later became bishop of Mopsuestia (d. 428), and probably John Chrysostom, who later, fatefully, became archbishop of Constantinople (d. 407). Later representatives of this group of Christian thinkers include Nestorius (d. c. 451), later archbishop of Constantinople, who was probably a pupil of Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret (c. 390–c. 460), a later product of the ascetical schools in Antioch, who became bishop of Cyrrhus, and, as well as a theologian and church historian, was a historian of Syrian asceticism.

Characteristics of the Antiochenes

This group is marked by a number of features. First, there is the commitment to Christian asceticism, which, however, did not lead them to a withdrawn form of monasticism (at least, not permanently), but rather led them to pastoral (and eventually episcopal) activity, through which they pressed the demands of asceticism on ordinary Christians. Second, in apparent contrast to the ascetic commit-ment, there is their attention to, and skill in, rhetorical ability: both John and Theodore were pupils of the great pagan rhetor, Libanius; John and Nestorius were summoned to the episcopal throne of Constantinople because of their fame as preachers; Diodore attracted the attention of the emperor Julian for the rhetorical skill with which he attacked the ancient gods.[18] Third, and representing the convergence of their ascetical commitment and their rhetorical training, there is their distinctive approach to scriptural interpretation, marked by concern to establish the literal meaning of the text, and to draw from it a predominantly moral and ascetical message (cf. Young 1997). John Chrysostom engaged in such biblical exegesis almost entirely through sermons; Theodore and Theodoret produced continuous commentaries and treatises (zētēmata) discussing difficult passages in biblical books; Theodore's skill was such that he was known as 'the Interpreter'. All of them, however, suffered condemnation for crossing the archbishops of Alexandria, Theophilus and his nephew and successor Cyril. John, whose offence was primarily political, was rapidly reinstated; but Nestorius, Theodore and Theodoret were condemned at ecumenical synods – Nestorius at Ephesus (431) and Theodore and Theodoret at Constantinople II (553) – with the result that their works have survived in a fragmentary form, preserved by churches that did not acknowledge the authority of these councils. The works of Diodore, who was linked with Theodore by Cyril as precursors of Nestorius, have suffered the same fate.

Because of the imperfect transmission of their works, there are serious gaps in our understanding of their theology. The abundant (indeed over-abundant) survival of Chrysostom's works do little to fill this lacuna, as Chrysostom seems untypical in his approach to Christology, which provided the grounds for the condemnation of his fellow-Antiochenes. It is perhaps the case (though the lack of evidence makes it difficult to be certain) that Christology, as it was understood by the Cappadocians and Cyril, was not in fact at the centre of Antiochene theology.

Christology and exegesis

The Antiochene approach to the nature of Christ seems to have been directly influenced by their approach to scriptural exegesis. An important question posed by their exegetical approach concerned identifying the person – as in 'dramatis personæ' – or character (prosōpon) speaking or acting in the text. This led to their distinguishing between the 'person' of the man and the 'person' of the Word in the Gospel narratives: the person of the man performed all the human-befitting actions of Christ – being born, eating, walking, being tired, suffering pain, anguish and death – and the person of the Word performed those actions characteristic of the Godhead – miracles, supernatural insight into people and circumstances. Their exegesis, therefore, led them directly to embrace the second tendency in post-Nicene Christology mentioned earlier, the tendency to keep the Godhead and manhood apart, to keep them in their distinctness and integrity (the so-called Word-man Christology). This was enhanced by the moral thrust of their exegesis and indeed the moral dimension of their whole understanding of the cosmological role of humanity. Christ's humanity is appreciated for its function in providing an example of morally perfect humanity: this moral emphasis demands the full integrity of his humanity.

Theodore of Mopsuestia

To see this in more detail, it will be helpful to look more closely at the one who was perhaps the most penetrating theologian among the Antiochenes, Theodore of Mopsuestia.[19] Central to Theodore's theology is his doctrine of the Two Ages: the present age and the age to come. His understanding of the present age is very like Athanasius' understanding of the human fallen state: beings created out of nothing are sliding back into non-existence, and their state is characterised by corruption and death. But whereas Athanasius gives this a fundamentally ontological interpretation, Theodore's reading of this is primarily moral: corruption is the negative side of the creature's fundamentally changeable state which makes it impossible for the human creature in this present age to live a life in conformity to the will of God, which is marked by unchangeability. The age to come represents the reverse of the frailty and changeability of the present age: it is characterised by unshakable, serene conformity to the will of God. Athanasius and Theodore also differ in their understanding of how God has remedied the fallen human condition of the present age. Whereas Athanasius sees this present world transformed by the presence of the Incarnate Word, a transformation manifest in the achievement by Christians of virginity and martyrdom and their defeat of the demons (Inc. 27–31, 48–55), Theodore seems to look rather to the establishment of a Christian hope that, when this present age is swept away, the age to come will be manifest. And Theodore sees that hope established in the existence within this present age of the life of the age to come in the person of Christ: in the person of Christ we see, amid the corruption and changeability of the present age, the living out of a life of perfect conformity to the will of the Father. This life was a perfect human life; it is necessary then that Christ had a complete humanity – hence the fierce opposition of the Antiochenes to any hint of Apollinarianism. It is the Resurrection that sets the seal on this life, and demonstrates that this life has destroyed the corruption and death of the present age and opened up the way to the age to come. Henceforth, Christians, believing in Christ, while they still live in this present age marked by corruption and death, 'receive in hope communion with him and this life to come'.[20]

The Christological question for Theodore is simply: how was it possible for Christ to live in this present age the life of the age to come? And his answer is that the Word dwelt in the man Jesus so completely that he was able to resist the corrupting influence of the present age. But it was an indwelling by grace, even though more complete (both in intensity and duration: from his very conception) than with other human beings. Theodore spoke of an indwelling 'by [God's] good pleasure' (kat' eudokian), 'as in a son' (hōs en huiō[i]). As a result of the Word's exceptional indwelling in Christ, there appeared to be two 'persons' (prosōpa), as in the Gospel accounts, but also, as the Gospel account makes clear, these two prosōpa were in complete harmony – the grace of the Word was present in the actions of the humanity – so that one could speak of one prosōpon, the prosōpon of the union, as his disciple Nestorius will call it. But this one prosōpon is a result of the union, not its presupposition, as with Athanasius and his followers. It is the coming together of the 'Word who assumes' and the 'humanity assumed': and that coming together is a mutual coming together, a union of two perfect subjects, divine and human.

Nestorius and the beginnings of the conflict

Theodore died in the communion of the Church, but that same year (428) Nestorius was elected archbishop of Constantinople. He arrived full of reforming zeal, promising the emperor heaven in return for an earth purged of heretics, and set about persecuting heretical Christians – Arians, Macedonians and others – though prevented by the emperor when he turned to the Novatianist congregations. But he soon found himself embroiled in charges of heresy. One of the priests he had brought with him from Antioch, Anastasius, preached against the use of the title Theotokos ('one who gave birth to God', Mother of God) of the Virgin Mary. Devotion to the Mother of God had grown throughout the fourth century; this is presumably not unconnected with the development during that century of the feast of the Nativity of Christ, which provided a focus in the Christian Year additional to the Resurrection, and one in which the Virgin Mary had an inalienable role as Theotokos. Word of Nestorius' opposition to the use of Theotokos came to the ear of Cyril, pope of Alexandria, who saw this as an ideal opportunity to clip the wings of the upstart see of Constantinople (granted status after Rome and before Alexandria by the synod of Constantinople in 381). For the title Theotokos was central to the Christology of Cyril of Alexandria.

Cyril of Alexandria: the seal of the Fathers

It is difficult to overestimate the importance for Greek theology of Cyril of Alexandria (c. 380–444), who by the seventh century had been dubbed the 'seal of the Fathers'. The heart of his theology is Christ: Cyril has been claimed as 'the only theologian of genius there has ever been of whom it is true to say, almost without metaphor, that his theology is "Christocentric"' (Wickham 1983: xxxiv).

It was the failure of the synod of Chalcedon in 451 to convince the east that it had not betrayed Cyril that led to schisms that still endure. Cyril's understanding of Christ is essentially that of Athanasius, shorn of the danger of Apollinarianism; Cyril always insists that the flesh that the Word became, according to John 1:14, was 'flesh ensouled with a rational soul'.[21] But the Word made flesh was, as Athanasius had understood, God living a human life, and the sole subject of the Incarnate life was the Word, something Cyril likes to demonstrate from the creed of the Nicene synod of 325. As such, the Incarnate one was a unity, a single nature: 'one incarnate nature of God the Word' (mia physis tou Theou Logou sesarkōmenē), to use the phrase of which he later became fond, and which he thought Athanasian, although it was, alas, from Apollinaris. Because of the unity of the Incarnate one, it was proper to acknowledge 'God's Word as having suffered in the flesh, been crucified in the flesh, tasted death in flesh and been made first-born from the dead',[22] as Cyril put it in the twelfth anathematism he insisted that Nestorius affirm, although in himself, in his own being, the Word of God is immune to suffering. It followed equally that Mary was Theotokos (first anathematism), and that the Gospel narrative is not to be interpreted of two subjects (fourth anathematism). Nestorius refused to accept these and other stipulations and, outflanked by Cyril's superior political acumen, was condemned at the synod of Ephesus in 431 (the third Ecumenical Synod). After the synod, Cyril came to an agreement with the bishops of the diocese of the Oriens, led by John of Antioch, who accepted the condemnation of Nestorius. According to this agreement, the 'Formula of Union' (Tanner 1990: 69–70), the unity of Christ was affirmed, with the entailment that Mary is indeed the Mother of God, Theotokos, but the natures thus united were affirmed as being perfect, one homoousios with the Father, the other homoousios with us, and it was further agreed that both ways of interpreting the Gospel narratives – that which referred the actions of Christ to a single prosōpon, and that which distinguished between two natures –were acceptable.

With Cyril, we find ourselves at a cusp in the development of the theology of the Greek east: in him many of the insights of his predecessors find their culminating expression, but his theological vision was of such power and profundity that it represents the beginning of a further stage in the formation of the theological tradition of the Byzantine east.

Notes

1 Ammianus Marcellinus, Res Gestæ 15.7.7; 21.16.18: Hamilton 1986: 80, 232.
2 On Arius and the controversy he aroused, see Williams 1987.
3 Williamson 1989: xxxiii, referring to Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 10.4.
4 Arius, Epistula ad Alexandrum Alexandrinum, 3 (Opitz 1934: 12).
5 Eusebius of Cæsarea, Epistula ad ecclesiam Cæsariensem 7 (Opitz 1934: 43–4).
6 For more detail on the wake of Nicaea, see Ayres (2004), Behr (2004), Anatolios (2011).
7 See Thomson 1971. Contra Gentes is abbreviated as CG, and de Incarnatione as Inc.
8 See Anatolios (1998: 28); Behr (2004: 168–9).
9 For Basil, see Radde-Gallwitz (2012).
10 For Gregory Nazianzen, see Daley (2006) and his articles.
11 For the doctrine of God in Basil and Gregory, see Radde-Gallwitz (2009)
12 See especially John Chrysostom, de Incomprehensibili Dei natura homiliæ 1–5 (Malingrey 1970).
13 See Jaeger (1960).
14 See Pruche 1986. De Spiritu Sancto is abbreviated as Spirit.
15 On the early history of the Messalians, see Stewart 1991.
16 From a somewhat different perspective, see Staats 1979.
17 Srawley 1903. Catechetical Oration is abbreviated as Cat.
18 Julian, ep. 55 (Wright 1923: 188).
19 For this interpretation of Theodore, see Norris 1963: especially 125–262.
20 Theodore of Mopsuestia, Homily 6. 12 (Tonneau 1949: 153).
21 Cyril, ep. 2 ad Nestorium 3 (Wickham 1983: 4).
22 Cyril, ep. 3 ad Nestorium 12 (Wickham 1983: 33).

Bibliography

Anatolios, K. (1998) Athanasius: The Coherence of his Thought. London and New York: Routledge.

Anatolios, K. (2011) Retrieving Nicaea. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

Ayres, L. (2004) Nicaea and Its Legacy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Behr, J. (2004) The Nicene Faith, 2 parts. Crestwood, NY: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Brakke, D. (1995) Athanasius and the Politics of Asceticism. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Daley, B., SJ (2006) Gregory of Nazianzus. London and New York: Routledge.

Fedwick, P. J. (ed.) (1981) Basil of Cæsarea: Christian, Humanist, Ascetic. 2 vols. Toronto, ON: Pontifical Institute of Mediæval Studies.

Grillmeier, A. (1975) Christ in Christian Tradition, vol. 1. 2nd rev. ed. London-Oxford, UK: Mowbrays.

Hamilton, W. (trans.) (1986) Ammianus Marcellinus, The Later Roman Empire (A.D. 354–378), with an introduction and notes by Andrew Wallace-Hadrill. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin Books.

Haykin, M. A. G. (1994) The Spirit of God. The Exegesis of 1 & 2 Corinthians in the Pneumatomachian Controversy of the Fourth Century. Leiden, The Netherlands; New York; Cologne, Germany: Brill.

Hofer, A., OP (2013) Christ in the Life and Teaching of Gregory of Nazianzus. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Jaeger, W. (ed.) (1960) Gregory of Nyssa, Contra Eunomium Libri, 2 vols. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Lietzmann, H. (1904) Apollinaris von Laodicea und seiner Schule. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr.

Lightfoot, J. B. (1885) The Apostolic Fathers, part II, vol. 1. London: Macmillan and Co.

Malingrey, A.-M. (ed.) (1970) Jean Chrysostome, Sur l'Incompréhensibilité de Dieu I, Sources Chrétiennes 28bis. Paris: Le Cerf.

Norris, R. A. (1963) Manhood and Christ: A Study in the Christology of Theodore of Mopsuestia. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Opitz, H.-G. (1934) Athanasius Werke, Band 3, Teil 1, Urkunde zur Geschichte des arianischen Streites 318–328. Berlin and Leipzig, Germany: Walter De Gruyter & Co.

Pelikan, J. (1993) Christianity and Classical Culture: The Metamorphosis of Natural Theology in the Christian Encounter with Hellenism. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Pruche, B., OP (ed.) (trans.) (1968) Basile de Césarée, Sur le Saint-Esprit. Sources Chrétiennes 17bis. Paris: Le Cerf.

Radde-Gallwitz, A. (2009) Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, and the Transformation of Divine Simplicity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Radde-Gallwitz, A. (2012) Basil of Caesarea: A Guide to His Life and Doctrine. Eugene, OR: Cascade.

Rousseau, P. (1994) Basil of Cæsarea. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.

Sesboüé, B., De Durand, G. M. and Doutreleau, L. (ed.) (trans.) (1982–3) Basil de Césarée, Contre Eunome, suivi par Eunome, Apologie, Sources Chrétiennes 299, 305. Paris: Le Cerf.

Srawley, J. H. (1903) The Catechetical Oration of Gregory of Nyssa. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Staats, R. (1968) Gregor von Nyssa und die Messalianer. Die Frage der Priorität zweier altkirchlichen Schriften. Berlin: Walter De Gruyter & Co.

Staats, R. (1979) 'Die Basilianische Verherrlichung des Heiligen Geistes auf dem Konzil zu Konstantinopel 381', Kerygma und Dogma 25: 232–53.

Stead, C. (1977) Divine Substance. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Stewart, C., OSB (1991) 'Working the Earth of the Heart': The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Tanner, N. P., SJ (1990) Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils, vol. 1. London: Sheed and Ward; Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.

Thomson, R. W. (ed.) (trans.) (1971) Athanasius, Contra Gentes and De Incarnatione. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Tonneau, R., OP (trans.) (1949) Les Homélies Catéchétiques de Théodore de Mopsueste. Vatican City: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana.

Vaggione, R. P. (ed.) (1987) Eunomius, The Extant Works. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Wickham, L. R. (ed.) (trans.) (1983) Cyril of Alexandria, Select Letters. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Williams, R. (1987) Arius: Heresy and Tradition. London: Darton, Longman & Todd.

Williamson, G. A. (trans.) (1989) Eusebius of Cæsarea, The History of the Church, revised and edited with a new introduction by Andrew Louth. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin Books.

Wright, W. C. (1923) The Works of the Emperor Julian, vol. 3. London: William Heinemann Ltd; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Young, F. (1997) Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

31

LATER THEOLOGIANS OF THE WEST

Ivor J. Davidson

Western theology from 312–430 in context

The period between Constantine's adoption of Christianity in 312–13 and the death of Augustine in 430 was traditionally hailed as the Golden Age of Latin patristic literature. First impressions may suggest this is an exaggeration, or at least an error of chronology. If we measure the intellectual importance of the era by the number of major authors producing seminal works, we might conclude that a time of real productivity did not begin until the 350s, and it was only in the last quarter of the fourth century that the western churches developed an output in any sense comparable to its Greek counterpart (Young et al. 2004: pt. III). From Tertullian onwards, the articulation of a Latin apologetic had been pioneered by the erudite zealots of North Africa; one of this tradition's distant sons, the eminent court-teacher Lactantius, had been able to celebrate the dawning of the Constantinian age and the providential triumph of a faith so recently persecuted, but Lactantius was by then approaching his later years, and no western intellectual of his succeeding generation appeared to make any effort to supplement his moralizing marketing strategies with a serious exposition of the core doctrines which underpinned the Christians' message. A distinct Latin theology blessed with either depth or breadth had yet to materialize. Even when such a theology did come to birth, much of it never equalled the accomplishments of the Greek tradition in either quantity or, with the clear exception of Augustine's work, quality. Should the 'Golden Age' designation simply be abandoned?

Intellectual capital needs to be assessed by subtler mechanisms, however, than counting up texts and comparing them with contemporary trends elsewhere. The literary legacy of the period does consist supremely in the achievements of the writers concentrated in its second half, above all the galaxy of Ambrose, Jerome and Augustine, who between them made outstanding contributions to most of the branches of what we might today call biblical exegesis, dogmatics and moral theology (they themselves would have been puzzled by our distinctions between those categories), and who laid doctrinal foundations which, for good or ill, have affected western Christianity ever since. But the importance of the era is also to be traced in the major issues about which these writers thought, and those issues had in most cases been germinating over some considerable time. The later west's story does not begin at mid-century, but in a process of intellectual evolution set in motion by the so-called Constantinian revolution itself.

To appreciate that process, we need to grasp the impact of the changes in the social environment within which western Christians had already started to operate by the teens, twenties and thirties of the fourth century. Over a relatively short period, believers had gone from being targets for persecution to beneficiaries of imperial patronage; clergy had become favoured with the kind of fiscal privileges and exemptions from curial service traditionally reserved for pagan priests and other select groups. The outworking of that change of status over the ensuing generations never was half so smooth as the assured accounts of some of the chroniclers of Christianity have implied. There was no wholesale cultural metamorphosis. The ongoing tensions between 'paganism' and the churches can be discerned not just at the obvious flash-points, such as the short-lived attempt by Julian to reinstate some of the symbolism of the old order in the early 360s, but in a host of less conspicuous yet none the less revealing social and political developments as well. The Christianizing of the empire was plagued by the considerable theological differences that existed within the Christian communities themselves; by the shifting calculations of their political patrons; and by the ability of non-Christian power groups to play upon the fragilities of imperial alignments with particular doctrinal causes in the interests of their own strategies. The status of Christianity as an official religion brought its own problems, not least over what to do when schisms erupted in local contexts and rival claims were adduced for imperial favours. Despite a series of anti-pagan measures by Constantius II in the 350s, the religions of the classical world remained officially tolerated for most of the century, only being declared obsolete superstitiones in the later years of Theodosius' reign (375–95), when the label pagani at last symbolized a definitive second-class status for those who remained loyal to the traditions of polytheism.

Despite all the caveats, however, the developments of the later century were organically linked to a process which began under Constantine. Long before the 350s, urban Christian communities were growing used to state largesse. They could express their new-found prestige and wealth by erecting elaborate church complexes and playing upon their civil privileges. Bishops positioned themselves as a new class of imperial leaders, vital to the judicial and financial affairs of their regions, the overseers of clerical hierarchies charged not only with the cure of souls but with the promotion of a certain social order. Church officials could no longer simply be dismissed as zealous parvenus: in Italy at least, the church's figureheads came from increasingly privileged backgrounds and were educated to the highest standards; it was easy for them to see themselves as custodians of a new elite. Constantine himself may never have anticipated the longer-term implications of the vast paradigm-shift for which he was responsible, and whether he is regarded in the light of them as hero, villain or something in between is, in one sense, almost beside the point. What mattered was that the social world in which western Christianity existed had been launched on a course of profound change from 312–13 onwards. Inevitably, the intellectual contours of the faith were being altered along with it.

As external pressures on the Christian communities had eased, so the quest to attain theological and structural unity internally had intensified. The ideal of a unified empire was to be facilitated and reinforced by the ideal of a unified Catholic church, notionally embracing all those everywhere who were subject to the rule of faith. The impetus towards ecumenical oneness was of course most visible in the church's grand new imperial councils and the creeds they generated. It is no accident that the critical phase in the west's development loosely parallels the period between the Council of Nicaea in 325 and the Council of Chalcedon in 451, and the politically driven aspiration to fashion benchmark statements to differentiate the normative from the unacceptable at a confessional level, so defining the boundaries of the imperial church. Latin-speaking Christianity may for a generation after Nicaea have lacked the doctrinal acuity to rival the achievements of its eastern neighbour, but it already shared implicitly in the same socio-cultural assurance and recognized the value of articulating its gospel in the same kinds of political terms. Latin culture had always been indebted to the Hellenistic world, and it was entirely natural that the florescence of Greek theology represented by Athanasius, the Cappadocians and the great exegetes of Alexandria and Antioch (who, it might be noted in passing, were far less neatly differentiable in their reading habits than was once supposed) would influence later western thinking, evoking a plethora of Latin translations of Greek texts and a steady assimilation of eastern ideas into vernacular preaching. But even before these direct connections came to be so prominent, western clergy could appreciate that the future of their mission was closely bound to the imperial dream and to the defence of a notional common tradition. The church's own understandings of ecumenicity were driven, even subsumed, by the exigencies of a cultural ideal.

Yet the fourth- and early fifth-century west was in fact anything but an obvious time for calm reflection. On the political stage, the age which began with the promotion of Christianity to privileged status ended with the crumbling of the military boundaries which had served to delimit the territory of truth, and the realization that the idea of a common destiny for east and west was and always had been a chimera. At both ends of the time-line, the consequences for the church were considerable: without the Constantinian revolution, Donatism would never have become the force it was; without the fall of Rome, the beliefs of Pelagius and his followers would never have assumed the significance they did. On the theological stage, the western church was riven by a whole series of doctrinal problems throughout our period, not just the causes célèbres like 'Arianism', or the tensions evoked by conflicting visions of an ascetic ideal (seen most notably, perhaps, in the controversies surrounding Priscillian of Avila in the 370s and 380s (Chadwick 1976; Burrus 1995; Conti 2009)), but the much wider-reaching intellectual challenges posed by the popularity of systems such as Manichaeism (Lieu 1992, 2014), or the powerful appeal of Platonism for the intelligentsia in particular (Gerson 2010). For all the punching-power of Rome and its bishops, and for all the theological rhetoric, diversity not unity characterized the west: the dream of straightforward doctrinal unification was elusive.

In the eastern empire, the centralization of political authority in Constantinople produced a steady imperial control of ecclesiastical affairs; in the west, the papacy secured a position of greater influence, yet in theological terms its significance for much of this period was heavily symbolic: popes like Damasus (366–84) and Siricius (384–99) proudly epitomized and promoted independent western traditions, liturgical, ascetic and moral, but their actual control over ecclesiastical events beyond their immediate context was often limited. One of the most striking features of the Golden Age is the extent to which the formulation of Latin Christianity was affected by the considerably different visions of the church and its salvation that prevailed in North Africa, Italy and Gaul. The ultimate triumph of what we think of as western 'orthodoxy' was a highly messy process, deeply affected by the ebb and flow of political and military developments and the ability of competing ecclesiastical power-brokers to muster support for their particular doctrinal shibboleths. The story of it all is perforce written by the victors, whose vision of a realized Catholicity and consensus inevitably manages to smooth away the bumps in the prehistory of their theme; it is important to recognize that the success of the protagonists was not achieved by a series of easy strokes, or by the naked power of argument alone. Nevertheless, the very problems which beset the quest for oneness evoked serious intellectual endeavour in themselves: fewer wrangles, fewer theological milestones.

The complexities of the later imperial world have been remarkably opened up to us in modern times. Historical scholarship has learned to deploy not only the traditional tools of literary and archaeological research but models of enquiry deriving from the social sciences to uncover more and more of the milieux in which the Christians of late western antiquity lived, worked and witnessed (for an overview, see Bowersock et al. 1999; and especially Harvey and Hunter 2008; Casiday and Norris 2014). We now appreciate that the ostensibly monolithic structures of church and empire were far more stratified than previous generations tended to imagine, and that the relationship of churchmen to the machinery of state patronage was a delicate and precarious business. However privileged the upper echelons of the ecclesiastical hierarchy may have become, they had to struggle to define the identity of their communities over against the prestige represented by the older traditions of their social contexts. It was all too easy to get the balance wrong between milking the rich opportunities afforded by political beneficence and falling prey to the vested interests of secular authorities. Christian leaders were caught between the competing imperatives of an ideal of other-worldliness and the incentives to extend and sustain their churches' profile in a system that offered rich rewards for services rendered to the cause of socio-political cohesion. In the process, they learned to exploit local pride and prejudices in order to develop power-bases of their own, each in its own way self-contained and self-assured, for all the professions of conciliarity and the ostensible ties of spiritual amicitia that bound it to other sees. Within certain parameters of loyalty and deference to metropolitan authority, each bishop could cultivate his own particular manifestation of the ecclesia Catholica, defined by his abilities to present himself as the benefactor, counsellor and figurehead of his community. These provincial fiefdoms were especially important in the west, where in the wake of Rome's collapse in the fifth century they would contribute to the emergence of a new world order in which regional societies could aspire to their own kind of pragmatic stability independent of an overarching military and fiscal system.

Here, then, is the world of the late west – a scene remarkably different for Christianity from any which had preceded it, yet one that was much more complex and ambivalent than we might once have supposed. An understanding of this socio-cultural context is vital to our evaluation of the intellectual heritage bequeathed by the churches' great thinkers. Like so much Christian thought before and since, most of the ideas with which we deal in this period took shape in the white heat of controversy, and amidst personal, political and ecclesiastical alliances that were often characterized by significant tension and distrust. But it was in the convergence of these specific factors that they assumed the form they did, and without the contingencies of personalities and politics, the legacy of this 'Golden Age' would have no overall meaning.

The Donatists

The Donatist controversy, so-called after the election of Donatus as rival bishop to Caecilian of Carthage in 313, was the most famous issue of ecclesiastical discipline in the early church, and it led to an attempt to grapple with questions of Christian identity at a much more complex level than ever before in the west (Frend 1985; Tilley 1997; Shaw 2011). Since Chapter 44 of this volume is devoted to Donatism, in this section I shall offer only a general outline.

The roots of the controversy lay in the rigourist views of salvation which had emerged in Roman North Africa from the second century. There the true church had come to be perceived as an essentially separatist movement, the community of God's elect, pure and holy, constituted by baptism as a Spirit-led people. This puritanism had been intensified in the Decian persecution, when the revered martyr-bishop Cyprian of Carthage had insisted (in De lapsis in 251 CE) that baptism could be administered only by clerics who belonged to the faithful, confessing church; bishops who had compromised in times of trouble could not offer effective prayers of baptism or ordination, for they had forfeited their possession of the gift of the Spirit, and Christians who had lapsed from the faith required to be baptized afresh if they were to be re-admitted to the Catholic community. The idea had been fostered that the real church was always under threat from a spurious imitator, whose officials and ceremonies had no divine sanction.

The Numidian clergy in particular, from the rural areas of modern-day eastern Algeria, were heirs to this tradition. They saw themselves as the upholders of a Christianity that remained qualitatively distinct. They refused to countenance the validity of Caecilian's election as bishop in 311 because one of his consecrators, Felix of Aptungi, was rumoured (unfairly, as it turned out) to have been a traditor, or one who had 'handed over' his Scriptures to be burned during the Great Persecution under Diocletian in 303–5. They elected an alternative candidate, one Majorinus, in his place; he in turn was shortly succeeded by Donatus. Caecilian held out against his challengers, arguing that many of the Numidians themselves had been collaborators, and that the Catholic church, particularly in the light of Constantine's conversion, naturally embraced a wide range of sinners in its ranks.

According to the standard disputes procedures of empire, Donatus' party appealed to the emperor. To Constantine, the affair seemed like a distant, parochial quarrel over personalities; guided, evidently, by Miltiades, bishop of Rome, he took Caecilian's part from the outset. An imperial commission in 313 decided against Donatus, and an ecclesiastical council at Arles in 314 exonerated Felix of the charge of having been a traditor. Caecilian was formally endorsed as rightful bishop of Carthage in November 316. Initially, the Donatists had argued that they were contending simply for the purity of the church and the exclusivity of its sacraments, but they soon formed into a separate group which, they insisted, now represented the true populus Dei in North Africa.

The Donatist movement spread rapidly, fuelled by Donatus' charismatic personality and by the plausibility of his supporters' claims to represent many of the genuine moral and spiritual traditions of the North African church. Much of the history has been filtered through the polemic of the Donatists' fiercest enemies, and it is necessary to do a fair bit of critical work to piece together the realities. Despite what some have argued, it is clear that Donatism was not a protest movement of a political or nationalist kind, neither should it be characterized as an indigenous regional force at odds with an urban, romanized Catholicism (pace Frend 1985). Associations with the so-called circumcelliones (militant ascetics who based themselves around martyrs' cellae or shrines but also roamed across the region) from the 340s (Shaw 2004; Pottier 2008) intensified a claim on the part of some of the movement's insiders, and certainly many of its foes, that the violent subversion of social structures was part of the agenda. Donatist theology did make a strong appeal to North Africa's martyr traditions, and the line between death as a consequence of unavoidable persecution and death as the goal of zealous commitment could certainly be blurred (Tilley 1996). But for all their spiritual energy, the Donatists were not primarily social revolutionaries. Seeing themselves as God's elect, they sought to anchor their self-image in biblical teaching and local ascetic ideals, adapting their practical interpretations of both as their social circumstances evolved (Tilley 1997).

Though actively repressed by the imperial powers at various stages in the fourth century, the Donatist movement achieved a massive dominance of its territory. Archaeology has uncovered the physical evidence: vast basilica complexes erected in key Numidian towns such as Timgad and Bagai, which effectively became Donatist 'holy cities', and countless smaller churches all over the countryside as individual villages eagerly symbolized their devotion to the idea that they were a chosen people (Frend 1985: 48–59). By the second half of the century, these communities bid fair to be the established church of their region. Relations with the believers they challenged were often highly tense, and there was significant struggle for power, some of it violent. From the 360s onwards, Donatus' successor in Carthage, Parmenian, could present a somewhat more constructive tone, and in the 370s and 380s the Donatist lay-theologian Tyconius, whose Liber Regularum (Babcock 1989) constituted the first Latin study on hermeneutics (even his resolute opponent, Augustine, appreciated it greatly), could concede that the true church included good and bad elements. Nevertheless, the claim continued to be pressed that, as far as North Africa was concerned, the separatist movement was the authentic body. Over against this, the Catholic Optatus of Milevis argued that Parmenian and his followers were schismatics precisely because they were not heretical in their doctrine, but insisted on condemning everyone else. Yet when it came to staking a claim to represent the real traditions of the North African faith, in various respects it was Optatus, not Parmenian, who appeared on the back foot.

When Augustine became bishop of Hippo in 395, he inherited a community deeply divided between a very powerful Donatist party and a resentful Catholic one. Augustine preached vigorously against the Donatists' claims, took steps to raise the moral tone of his own clergy so as to limit criticisms of their discipline, and laboured to assemble a fuller account of the dispute as it had evolved historically. In a series of treatises and epistles addressed to Donatist leaders, he attacked their logic head-on, and the debate with Donatism came to be pitched much more seriously in exegetical and intellectual terms. But it was imperial legislation that took things to another level. If the Donatist movement was in fact heretical in its claims, not merely an alternative way of understanding things, it could be argued that it warranted more vigorous suppression still. A series of civil laws was passed; finally, in May of 411, Augustine succeeded in forcing his opponents into an open conference at Carthage, presided over by an imperial representative. Donatism was roundly condemned, and in 412 was formally outlawed by imperial edict; its clergy were exiled, their property confiscated. Even so, it did not die fast: though seriously weakened, it perhaps persisted in one form or another into the eighth century. By then, however, the rival communities of North Africa had for the most part long since coalesced.

The story of Donatism's course can be followed up elsewhere (see Chapter 44). It is easy to sense how powerful its appeal would have been to people nurtured on separatist ideals of one kind or another. It is equally beguiling to trace possible later parallels in the European Reformation or in British and North American Nonconformism. But the movement's lasting significance lies not so much in the compound of cultural concerns by which it was fed as in the theological arguments it engendered. Donatism produced the first serious efforts in the west to address the complex relationships between the nature of the church, Catholicity, baptism and the validity of clerical office.

What was the true church? Was it, as the Donatists believed, an absolutely pure body; or was it, as Augustine argued, an inevitable mixture, not just sociologically but morally as well? The Donatist appeal to Cyprian's stern line on apostasy could be matched by invocation of another element of Cyprian's teaching – that repentance by a schismatic restores to grace. To Augustine, Jesus' parables implied that the church included the wheat and the tares, the good fish and the bad; only God had the ability finally to separate them. Human attempts to differentiate led only to schism, a far worse sin than the traditio so abhorred by the Donatists. The church could be co-extensive with its social world, both for good (as in the emerging unity of empire or missionary expansion) and for ill (as in the risk of moral and doctrinal corruption). The mystery of Catholicity, Augustine argued, was located within this tensile reality. The holiness of the church consisted not in its members but in the holiness of the Christ whose body it is.

Again: what made baptism valid? Was it the spiritual condition of the officiating cleric, or was it the command of Christ? Wherein lay the authority of ordination? Was it in the moral spotlessness of the priest, or in the divine commission to ordain? The Donatists contended that baptism had to be performed by a 'pure' representative of a 'perfect' church; Augustine insisted that the validity of a sacrament rested not upon the merits of the individual who administered it but upon the merits of the Christ who instituted it in the first place. His logic abandoned the austere side of Cyprian's reasoning. It was an explicit affirmation of what would later be called an ex opere operato understanding of sacramental efficacy, which became the consensus western position.

Augustine's defence of the legitimacy of exploiting state authority to coerce his Donatist opponents into submission lent a theological weight to later campaigns to persecute minority voices within the church, and appeal would certainly be made to his example by some of European church history's darker tacticians (Shaw 2011; see also Gaddis 2005: 131–50). Primarily, however, Donatism had served as a catalyst for the discussion of ecclesiological and sacramental themes. It raised issues which have remained central to western debates in these areas ever since.

Arianism

The theological controversy that dominated the fourth century was Arianism. Modern scholarship has alerted us to the reality that 'Arianism' as we have traditionally spoken of it is a rhetorical construct; there is good reason to rethink conventional ways of categorizing the wide array of so-called 'Arian' theologies which arose in the course of the fourth century after Nicaea (Barnes and Williams 1993; Williams 2001; Ayres 2004; and Chapter 45 of this volume). Arius' own theology was quite different from many of these. Nicaea's homoousios, the insistence that the being of the Son does not belong within the ranks of creatures, but is (in later strict construal of the term) 'of the same substance' with the Father, was initially highly ambiguous; it did not become the watchword of a clearly 'pro-Nicene' position in the east until a generation after its original adoption. The theological issues at stake in these debates were and are of immense significance for Christian theology, but the idea of a monolithic 'Arianism' opposed by an equally homogeneous orthodoxy only originates in the middle of the fourth century (Lienhard 1999; Parvis 2006; Gwynn 2007).

The enduring myth that the disputes over Nicaea were primarily an eastern affair, without the same impact in the Latin-speaking west, also testifies to the skill with which the opponents of 'Arian' theologies managed to control the course of subsequent historiography (Ferguson 2005). Athanasius' periods of exile did enable him to amass considerable support in the west, but the alliances on all sides were fluid and pragmatic, reflective of more than neat or clear doctrinal convictions. Emergent Nicene theology enjoyed formal western support at the Council of Serdica in 343. Western Nicenes enjoyed the protection of Constans until 350. But the sole rulership of Constantius II in the 350s brought renewed patronage for alternatives to the homoousian position, and a reversal of official western assessments of Athanasius; a number of pro-Nicene western bishops were removed from their sees. The upshot was the creed of Sirmium in 357, a version of which was endorsed, after imperial pressure, by a majority of westerners at Ariminum (Rimini) in 359 (as it was at Seleucia in the east): in Jerome's famous words, 'The whole world groaned and marvelled to find itself Arian' (Dialogue against the Luciferians 19). The west had signed up to a 'homoian' doctrine, that God the Son is like (homoios) God the Father, but subordinate, not consubstantial. Exiled bishops were permitted to return to their sees during the renaissance of paganism under Julian, as part of a bid to play off Nicene and Arian against each other in order to weaken Christianity en bloc. Life continued to be easier for western Nicenes under Valentinian I, who (unlike his brother Valens, who deliberately promoted other interests in the east) aspired to remain free from open doctrinal affiliations; nevertheless, homoian clergy remained dominant in significant sees. The young Gratian was manoeuvred into a Nicene position in the end, though not before some vacillation. His co-regent and successor, the boy-emperor Valentinian II, heavily encouraged by his mother Justina, Valentinian I's widow, actively advanced the homoians' cause. A definitive political end to homoian prospects in the imperial west was not achieved until Theodosius, and even then it was partly bound up with the political uncertainty of the times and the ability of pro-Nicene leaders, above all (as I set out in Chapter 57) Ambrose of Milan, to force their opponents' hand and to blend doctrinal arguments with appeals to baser prejudice: the homoians shared the form of Christianity adopted by the Gothic invaders who had begun to destabilize the empire itself.

In reality, principled non-Nicene theology constituted a mainstream position within western imperial Christianity for much of the fourth century, and it persisted long after that as the faith of people-groups who identified as different from the Romans. Pro-Nicene theology was nevertheless advanced in the second half of the century by a number of remarkable figures, and their activities contributed substantially to the evolution of theology in Latin. Two in particular stand out.

Hilary of Poitiers

The first is Hilary (c. 315–67/8), bishop of Poitiers from around 350, classically labelled 'the Athanasius of the West'. We know almost nothing about Hilary's early life, but he was clearly given a good classical education prior to embarking on his ecclesiastical career (Galtier 1960; Daniélou et al. 1968; Labande 1969). As bishop, he found himself exiled by Constantius in 356. The reasons are not entirely clear: it may be that he had refused to acquiesce in the condemnation of Athanasius and the Nicene cause (Borchardt 1966: 24–37; Doignon 1971: 455–513; Barnes 1992); it may be there were other political factors (Brennecke 1984: 210–43; Williams 1991). At any rate, he spent four years in Phrygia, where he came into contact with eastern theology first-hand, and expanded his understanding of the kinds of strategies adopted by anti-Arians in the east. He developed some sympathies for the homoiousian ('similar-substance') approach, which he felt could, if understood correctly, be an appropriate way of addressing the core issues in dispute. Homoiousian theology appeared to avoid the dangers of modalism implicit in claims to literal identity of divine substance on the one hand while disowning the idea of dissimilarity of substance advocated by harder-line anti-Nicenes on the other. Hilary participated in the Council of Seleucia in 359 among the ranks of the homoiousians. On his return to Gaul in 360, he embarked on an energetic campaign to persuade western clergy that homoian theology, which remained widely favoured, was in error. In a series of synods, he persuaded his fellow-bishops in Gaul to renounce the creed of Rimini as 'blasphemy'. He then, more boldly, turned his attentions to Italy itself, and attempted unsuccessfully to unseat from Milan the homoian Auxentius, occupant of the see since 355 (Williams 1992).

Hilary engaged in scholarly activity throughout his career and produced a number of important works. His De synodis, written in exile in 359, is an attempt to explain eastern theologies to the west in a way that would encourage western Nicenes to identify more closely with the homoiousians in the east. A number of other works provide valuable information on the doctrinal history of the period and fill in some of the details of Hilary's opposition to homoians such as Saturninus of Arles and Auxentius in Milan. Hilary completed important, spiritually focused commentaries on Matthew's gospel (the first Latin commentary on the text to survive in original form) and on some of the Psalms, read as heavily prefigurative of Christ; his Old Testament exegesis there and elsewhere owes much to Origen. He is also significant in being the first definitive writer of hymns in Latin, though only three of these survive (incomplete at that). They reflect a range of classical influences. Like Ambrose after him, Hilary was conscious of the value of hymns as popular media of theological instruction.

Hilary's most significant theological work, composed largely in exile, is the text known to us as De Trinitate, in twelve books. In its final form a composite text, its structure is a matter of continuing scholarly debate (Beckwith 2008). It constitutes not so much a full-scale Trinitarian theology (typically for the period, little is said on the Spirit) as an elaborate defence of the status of the Son. Reflecting his homoiousian sympathies, Hilary is anxious to insist upon the Son's participation in the Godhead, but also to avoid a blurring of the distinction between the Father and the Son; his concern is that the homoousios label as used by some pro-Nicenes may run the latter risk. The equality of Father and Son is to be thought of in terms of a unitas substantiae, a unity of substance, not a unio personae, an identity of personhood.

In his attempt to account for the divinity of Christ while rejecting the logic that Christ's human weaknesses rendered him inferior to God, Hilary develops a Christology which is quite docetic. He posits a three-stage process of incarnation and glorification, speaking respectively of the Son's preexistence, his humiliation and his elevation of human nature in his resurrection and ascension. But though the incarnation is said to have involved the Son's actual renunciation of the form of God in his assumption of servant form, his human body was nevertheless celestial. As naturally constituted, the human nature of Christ was free from normal human needs; amazing feats like walking on water were not, strictly speaking, miraculous for him at all, for he was simply exercising his divine prerogatives. His passion and death were real, but only because the divine Word, incapable of suffering in his divine self, condescended to allow his human nature to experience these things. Hilary aspires to a strong account of a unipersonality in Christ, but in the end the humanity is overwhelmed by the divinity. Hilary's Christology is innovative, but not without its problems (Weedman 2008).

Hilary's method is heavily grounded in the exegesis of biblical texts, and he is adamant that the only valid epistemology for theological work lies in scriptural revelation; he sees extra-textual tradition, like philosophy, as inherently subordinate. His debts to Tertullian are substantial. His style is frequently quite difficult, obscured both by the force of his rhetoric and by his polemical orientation. His Trinitarian theology never entirely gets off the ground, for his preoccupation with the issue of generation focuses his argument almost entirely upon the Father and the Son, and he does not move beyond an agential account of the Spirit to discuss the wider question of intra-divine relations and personhood. Yet Hilary should not be judged anachronistically. For the 350s and 360s, his work was pioneering, and whatever difficulties attach to some of his own formulations, he played a considerable part in the west's engagement with serious Christological reflection. Not without cause did a cult in his honour develop in Gaul (Van Dam 1993: 28–41, 155–61): the range of his travels and influence, and the intensity of his work as exegete and constructive thinker, meant that his relatively short episcopal career carried a disproportionately high significance.

Ambrose of Milan

The person who contributed more than anyone else to the demise of homoian interests in the west was, however, Ambrose (c. 339–97), bishop of Milan from 374. I offer a much fuller account of him in Chapter 57 of this volume. Born at Trier, son of the praetorian prefect of Gaul, Ambrose was given a classical education and pursued a career in the imperial civil service, becoming governor of Aemilia-Liguria, with a base in Milan. In 374, still unbaptized, he was elected successor to Auxentius, the long-serving homoian bishop of the city. After initial reluctance, he consented and was baptized and consecrated within the space of a week. Despite its unpromising start – an almost totally ill-prepared spiritual leader assuming a see dominated by homoian clergy opposed by a minority pro-Nicene party – his 22-year episcopate transformed the social standing of the Nicene faith in the west, not only in north Italy but much further afield as well ((McLynn 1994; Williams 1995; Ramsey 1997; Savon 1997; Moorhead 1999; Liebeschuetz 2011: pt. II).

Ambrose's success was hard won, and in reality he faced substantial opposition from homoian opponents for more than half his episcopate. But he possessed a powerful combination of intellectual, social and political skills. A fluent reader of Greek, he was able to familiarize himself with eastern theological ideas and to articulate a pro-Nicene theology with great effect from his pulpit. An experienced senior administrator, he knew how to organize people and resources. Above all, he understood how to maximize his opportunities. Though he inherited a large see still overshadowed by its powerful Roman neighbour, when the western imperial court was moved to Milan in 381 he gained access to the ear of emperors in a way that no western bishop before him had done. A consummate operator, he exploited this advantage to the full. He created a church worthy of a capital city, developing an ecclesial identity which would be acknowledged by Milan's social sophisticates and which would serve in turn as a model for other churches in north Italy and beyond.

Ambrose laboured to sustain an impression of awesome ecclesiastical authority: any attempt by Caesar to usurp what was God's was to be firmly and publicly opposed. He could see to it that a significant pagan symbol like the Altar of Victory was not restored to the Roman Senate-house (384); that homoian attempts to have basilicas sequestrated in the name of the emperor were refused, even in the face of military pressure (385–6); that legal penalties imposed upon a bishop who had orchestrated the destruction of a synagogue were lifted (388); and that Theodosius himself would do public penance for allowing a massacre of innocent citizens at Thessalonica (390). Through it all, there was a considerable measure of theatre in what Ambrose was seen to be and do, and his own position was often far less secure than the spectacle suggested; but he succeeded thanks to his ability to manage even unpromising circumstances to good effect.

The outlines of Ambrose's activity are sketched elsewhere in this volume (Chapter 57); here we note only the intellectual gifts with which he achieved his ends. First and foremost were his skills as scholar and preacher. His devotion to study made a deep impression on his contemporaries, and its fruits were no less obvious. One of the greatest orators of the early church, Ambrose learned to charm hearers as discriminating as Augustine with the learning and intensity of his style (Nauroy 1985; Oberhelman 1991: 21–61). He could rapidly assimilate the exegetical techniques of Philo and Origen, and imbibe the ideas of Athanasius, Basil and Didymus (Lucchesi 1977; Savon 1977; Pasini 1990). Some of Milan's intellectuals were keen on Platonist texts: Ambrose could evoke Plotinus, Porphyry and other writers in his homilies (Courcelle 1968: 93–138). In cultural terms, Ambrose's greatest importance lies in his mediation of Greek thought to his Latin context. More than any writer before him, he was able to popularize the idioms of eastern Nicene thinking in the vernacular of the west. Not the least of his channels for doing so lay in song: he introduced to Milan the Greek practice of congregational singing, composing simple yet evocative hymns to celebrate a fully consubstantial Christ and a truly divine Spirit. The form of the 'Ambrosian hymn', iambic dimeters arranged in quatrains to be sung antiphonally, caught on with remarkable success and proved a seminal force in the development of the western liturgy (Fontaine 1992; Dunkle 2016).

Ambrose's surviving exegesis (Pizzolato 1978) is concentrated particularly on the Old Testament, though he also produced an exposition of Luke's gospel (Graumann 1994). His chief foci are the narratives of creation and fall in Genesis (his Hexaemeron draws extensively on Basil's work of the same name), the lives of the patriarchs, the Psalms (Maur 1977), and the characters of Job and David. A number of treatises are ostensibly on other Old Testament exemplars such as Elijah and Naboth, but are in fact largely moral diatribes against evils such as avarice and usury (Colish 2005). An important group of texts is devoted to ascetic subjects – the promotion of virginity and the commendation of chaste widowhood as superior to the married state. Ambrose contributed a great deal to the development of female asceticism in the west (Brown 1988: 341–65). He preached funeral sermons for the emperors Valentinian II and Theodosius; we also have two homilies on the death of his brother Satyrus, who died at an early age in 378 (Biermann 1995), and both a stenographic record and a redacted version of catechetical addresses to initiates (De sacramentis and De mysteriis), which sketch a striking theology of the holy privileges into which the mystery of the sacraments conducts the humble believer (Satterlee 2002). A collection of 91 letters, arranged, on the Plinian model, into ten books (nine 'private', one 'public'), is deliberately shaped to show the bishop in the best possible light (Zelzer 1989).

His most important dogmatic works are books on the Nicene faith (De fide), and a sequel text on the Holy Spirit. His debts to the literary and philosophical traditions of the classical world can be gauged in his frequent evocation of Roman literature (Zelzer 1987; Davidson 2004). His most enduring moral treatise is his De officiis, a manual on clerical ethics based directly upon Cicero's classic of the same name, and thus significantly influenced by Stoicism, but intended very much as a Christian replacement for its literary archetype (Davidson 2002). Ambrose, the former governor who had worked hard to sustain his place among a social elite, was an intellectual who stood at the confluence of two cultural streams. Always he insisted upon the supremacy of biblical revelation over all secular philosophy (Madec 1974; Lenox-Conyngham 1993), yet the success of his ministry depended heavily upon his ability to represent an intriguing fusion of the traditional and the revolutionary. It was a paradigm that proved eminently suited to its social context.

Ambrose may not have been an original thinker of the order of an Origen, a Gregory of Nyssa or an Augustine. He was a genuinely creative intellectual nevertheless. His theological ideas and hermeneutical techniques were much shaped by his sources, but his interpretation and presentation of Scripture's message was not just a pastiche of other people's thought, neither did it merely represent a light retouching of classical moral philosophy. Ambrose was a biblical theologian; his sermons and other exegetical material may not seem like systematic textual exposition as moderns might understand such a thing, but his presentation reflects his deep investment in the scriptural economy of creation and redemption, and is aimed at practical ends in spiritual terms: the expression of Christian difference (Smith 2011). The saeculum was a corrupt place; the journey which began in the waters of baptism entailed a movement of conscious ascent away from false entanglements and an obedience teleologically ordered towards final fellowship with God. The expression of holiness might involve virtues that the world would recognize as admirable, particularly for a social elite, but it would also mean the representation of more radical understandings of purity and integrity, deriving from biblical, not merely conventional, anthropology. Deeply conservative as he remained at various levels, Ambrose also aspired to reshape assumptions of wealth, power and status in light of his particular narrative of salvation (Brown 2012: 120–47).

Ambrose anticipated various ideas that would be set out more comprehensively in later years in the west. He adumbrated aspects of Augustinian thinking on original sin (Homes Dudden 1935: 612–24), and on the validity of a just war (Swift 1970). His theology of the Eucharist assumed that a supernatural change takes place in the elements when the priest recites the dominical words (Johanny 1968); the metaphysical exploration of such an idea would of course come later. His advocacy of female asceticism made a great deal of the example of Mary (Neumann 1962), and his language encouraged the development of Marian evolution in the medieval west. He also did much to encourage devotion to the martyrs. His depictions of natural law and its societal implications, fed by Stoic and biblical sources at once, would inform elements of medieval thought (Maes 1967). His musings on the dangers of private property have sometimes been taken as evidence for an inchoate patristic socialism, though in reality his concern was to denounce in general terms the abuses of a grasping drive for possession, not to set out some proto-Marxist agenda (Swift 1979).

Ambrose is perhaps at his most disappointing if we seek serious advances in the dogmatics of Christology and Trinity (Markschies 1995). His concern is to articulate a pro-Nicene theology as he finds it in his Greek models, but given the momentous debates which were taking place in his time over divine ontology or the dynamics of the incarnation, and given his clear ability to understand the language in which these ideas were being thrashed out, it is disappointing that some of his doctrinal discourse is dominated by rhetorical vituperation of his opponents and a blanket condemnation of all anti-Nicenes as equally wrong. The quality of argument in De fide may not deserve the assessment that it is 'beneath contempt' in theological terms (Hanson 1988: 669), but there are certainly finer efforts to be found in patristic reasoning; though De Spiritu Sancto is the first western treatise on its theme, it does not progress much beyond a lengthy demonstration of the Spirit's essential divinity. Ambrose sought to justify Nicene orthodoxy, as he heard it from Basil and others, in fairly elementary biblical terms. Speculative dogmatics never was his strongest suit; he was better at engineering public victories over his doctrinal enemies and their sponsors, as he did notoriously at the Council of Aquileia in 381, or in confrontation with the court of Valentinian II in 385–6.

But if Ambrose could not always out-argue his opponents, he could generally outclass them, and as a public communicator of his particular way of reading the Bible's moral message for an imperial capital, he was a master. His effectiveness was undoubtedly born of a deep spiritual sincerity, and there is no reason to question his own commitment to the ethical and religious vision which he held up to his world. Ambrose was not merely a politician, or a naïve or superficial conduit of ideals to which he was less than fully pledged. It fell to yet more fertile minds than his in the later west to go further, but without his intellectual and cultural work many of their achievements would not have been possible.

Jerome

With Jerome (c. 347–420), we encounter one whose importance consists squarely in the quality of his scholarship and in his ability to articulate in his own brilliant way ideas nurtured by both eastern and western roots. Jerome spent a good part of his life in the east, and employed a fair part of it in attacking western enemies; yet his mindset was fundamentally a Latin one, and he was anything but an uncritical friend of eastern perspectives and practices. Much of the image we have of his life as holy man, scholar and biblicist is crafted by his skilful self-fashioning, but of the intellectual range and cultural significance of his literary legacy there can be no doubt (Kelly 1975; Duval 1988; Rebenich 1992, 2002; Fürst 2003; Cain and Lössl 2009; Chapter 56 of this volume).

Born in an insignificant town, Stridon in Dalmatia, the son of prosperous Christian parents, Jerome was classically educated to a high level at Rome, where he was baptized. While spending some time in Gaul in his early twenties, he developed an interest in the monastic life, and after a spell at Aquileia he moved to Syria, where he lived for a while as a hermit at Chalcis, east of Antioch, and devoted himself to language study, particularly the acquisition of Hebrew. After getting embroiled in a number of quarrels with other hermits, he found his life in the desert an excessive strain, and he returned to Antioch where he was ordained a presbyter.

He was in Constantinople in the important years of 380–1, and was able to acquaint himself with the cream of contemporary Greek writing, supplementing his experience in exegetical techniques with a deeper reading in the big Christological issues of the day. Back in Rome from 382 to 385, he acted as de facto assistant to the ageing pope Damasus, and formed close friendships with a number of aristocratic Christian women, to whom he became a spiritual tutor and counsellor. His literary gifts were immediately obvious, and his elegant epistles, brilliant treatises and eloquent protreptics for ascetic virtues appeared to promise him great things, perhaps the chair of Damasus himself. But his bitingly satirical attacks on the mores of the Roman clergy also made him deeply unpopular with his ecclesiastical peers, who saw it as rather anomalous that he was ardently preaching the values of self-denial and criticizing them for their failures while he enjoyed delicately close relations with his female patrons, especially the wealthy widow, Paula (Cain 2013: 1–6). So long as Jerome enjoyed Damasus' patronage, little could be done, but on the advent of Siricius he was investigated, condemned and effectively banished from Rome. After a period of travel around the east, including Egypt, accompanied by his entourage of devoted women, he settled in Bethlehem in 386 and established a monastic community, financed initially with Paula's wealth; Paula herself set up a convent nearby. The rest of his life was devoted to study, writing and teaching, and the administration of what amounted to a fairly liberal ascetic regime.

A bibliophile from an early age, Jerome stands out as the most learned of the western Fathers, and one of the greatest biblical scholars in the history of the church (Kamesar 2013). His most remarkable achievement was his new translation of the Scriptures, launched by a commission from Damasus. The Latin Bible of the fourth century was notoriously corrupt, with differing versions in existence in Gaul, North Africa and Italy. Jerome famously remarks that there were almost as many textual forms as they were manuscripts (Epistle Prefatory to the Gospels, addressed to Damasus). A new edition was sorely needed. It is a mistake, however, to think that Jerome's work proceeded according to a uniform plan, or to imagine that he was personally responsible for every part of what we have come to think of as the editio vulgata. His initial project was to produce a new rendering of the four gospels – not so much a fresh translation of the Greek as a synthesis of some of the existing Latin versions in conformity with the Greek text. The completed work was presented to Damasus shortly before his death in 384. This was followed by a new version of the Psalter, a rapid and rather crude rendering of the Septuagint (traditionally, but unreliably, associated with the Roman Psalter, the standard Roman version until the time of pope Pius V in the sixteenth century). In c. 392, Jerome was able to replace this with another translation, the so-called 'Gallican Psalter' (so named after its subsequent popularity in Gaul), which used the text of the Septuagint given in Origen's massive Hexapla. Further work on other parts of the Old Testament convinced him that any translation relying only on a Greek text was simply not good enough: it was necessary to go back to the veritas Hebraica itself. As a rare example of a vir trilinguis, a scholar competent not just in Greek and Latin but in the prized Hebrew as well, he was exceptionally well-equipped to take up the challenge, and he embarked on a completely new rendering of the Hebrew Scriptures. Pursued intermittently, the work occupied about a decade and a half of his life, from 390/1 until 405/6. It included a third recension of the Psalter, based on the Hebrew, though this version never attained the liturgical popularity of its 'Gallican' predecessor, which was ultimately incorporated into the Vulgate manuscripts in its stead.

Jerome's return to the Hebrew was ground-breaking, not least because he urged an adherence to a Hebrew canon and argued that the deuterocanonical Greek texts included in the Septuagint but rejected by non-Hellenistic Judaism were to be regarded as apocryphal. His work was also controversial. He was sharply criticized by Augustine and others, who argued that he was in danger of relapsing into a Judaizing faith by abandoning the Greek antecedents of the Bible as it had come to be known in the west. Jerome could hardly be faulted, however, for his linguistic rigour, or for the care with which he set about his research. Much influenced by the example of the great Origen, he took Bible study as a thoroughly serious business. He enquired into questions of topography and etymology, expanding on existing reference manuals in Greek and drawing also on rabbinical wisdom. He produced major technical commentaries which sought to discuss, often in painstaking detail, textual and philological issues. The most valuable of these are on the prophets and on Genesis (Kamesar 1993; Hayward 1995).

Exegetically, Jerome's tastes were eclectic, reflecting the range of his influences (Duval 1973; Jay 1985; Brown 1992; Cain and Lössl 2009: pt. II; Kamesar 2013). Overall, a concern for the literal sense of Scripture predominates, but there is considerable room for spiritual interpretation as well.

In the end, he never evolved a consistent methodology and effectively saw no need to do so. It is clear that he pondered a good deal on what it means to practise the art of interpreting Scripture as comprehensively authoritative master-text. Given their piecemeal release over a period of years, his biblical translations themselves are patchy in quality, and it took time for them to gain acceptance; they were used alongside existing versions for some while. In the end, however, the obvious superiority of their scholarship to anything that had gone before in the west won them the recognition they deserved, and from the sixth century onwards they started to be collected into a new Vulgate Bible. The remainder of the New Testament was not translated by Jerome, and the identity of its reviser(s) remains enigmatic. It is cited first by Pelagius in his work on Paul, and one guess has been that an associate of his was involved in it. The oldest extant manuscript of the Vulgate, the Codex Amiatinus, was produced in Northumberland in the last years of the seventh century, but only in the ninth century did the new collection become a standard text in any meaningful sense, and attempts to homogenize it went on for centuries after that.

The other side to Jerome, already to be glimpsed in the acerbic letters with which he had mocked the clergy of Rome, was his fondness for invective. Almost his entire career was littered with controversy, and he left broken relationships everywhere. For many years he was an ardent devotee of Origen and translated a whole series of his homilies into Latin. In the fierce controversy that flared up surrounding Origen's theology in the last years of the fourth century (Clark 1992), he changed his mind, partly under the influence of Epiphanius of Salamis, and became a bitter and tendentious opponent. Matters were not helped when his old friend Rufinus of Aquileia published a new (and rather free) translation of Origen's De principiis, in a bid to demonstrate that their former mentor was indeed orthodox, and referred in his preface to Jerome's earlier support for him. The friendship of Rufinus and Jerome was no more, and the ensuing years witnessed a bitter war between the two, during which Jerome released his own translation of De principiis to prove just how heretical Origen really was (this work is now lost). Again, positive evaluation of Ambrose's contributions to the subject of virginity soon gave way to scathing denunciations of Ambrose's lack of originality. More predictable and impassioned salvos were fired at foes such as Helvidius, the Roman layman who denied the post partum virginity of Mary, and Jovinian, the monk whose anti-ascetic ideology also evoked the ire of Ambrose and Augustine (Hunter 2007). Vigilantius, a priest from Aquitania, visited Bethlehem in 395, and his stay ended in a quarrel: years later, Jerome was accusing him of opposing sacred ideals such as clerical celibacy and the principles expressed in the cult of the martyrs.

Jerome's propensity to berate his opponents while constructing his models of asceticism and Christian moral identity produced the most brilliant satirical writing of late antiquity (Wiesen 1964). Vital as his biblical and historical work was, his epistles (Cain 2009) and polemical treatises make for far more entertaining reading than the technicalities of his commentaries or the hagiographical vignettes he produced to celebrate the lives of various eastern hermits. But even his other texts, like his catalogue of eminent Christian writers before him, De viris illustribus (the first example of a patrology), contain their share of caustic humour. The downside, apart from the obvious poisoning of so many of his relationships, was that his contributions to theological debate were not always very acute. Even in his last years, spent attacking Pelagianism, he showed greater ability to vilify his opponents than to address the doctrinal issues they were raising.

It would not be hard to show that many of the accusations Jerome levelled at his foes and critics reflected deeper-seated insecurities and struggles within his own psyche – not least over the ambiguities of sexuality and self-denial, or over his relationship to a saeculum whose literary legacy he held dearly yet uneasily. The most obvious sign of the latter tension is his famous dream in which he was turned away from heaven for being a Ciceronian, not a Christian, and his vow to devote himself thenceforth to sacred texts rather than to the classics (Epistle 22.30) – a pose later amended to the claim that the best features of Latin literature could in fact be turned to good use (Ep. 70) (Hagendahl 1958: 318–28). A large number of European paintings depict Jerome in the wilderness, beating his chest with a stone to drive out the temptation to pursue classical Latin literature (see Figure 31.1).

Figure 31.1   St Jerome in the Wilderness, 1475–1480 by Bernardino Pinturicchio, in the Walters Art
Museum, Baltimore. Photo Wikicommons

Jerome did not suffer fools gladly, and to him any sustained dissent to his own principles, moral, doctrinal, liturgical or scholarly, tended to look like the effrontery of a fool. The genius which made him the giant that he was brought an arrogance with it, and Jerome hardly looks the better for it. But in an age when Greek forms remained so dominant, he did a huge amount to restore the importance of Christianity's Hebraic inheritance; his enthusiasm was not matched again in the west until the Reformation. His prolific output demonstrated powerfully that the greatest Christian learning could be expressed in Latin, and it helped to craft a particular kind of identity for biblical scholarship as a mode of Christian asceticism in the west. As such, his work belongs not only in a narrative history of theological or spiritual thought; it is also an essential part of the story of late-antique ideas of education and the western history of the book (Williams 2006).

Augustine

None of the figures mentioned thus far, however, comes close in importance to Augustine (354–430), whose influence has pervaded not simply the history of the church but the entire course of western civilization (Brown 2000 remains unsurpassed; see also Chadwick 1986; Fitzgerald 1999; Bonner 2002; Lancel 2002). Augustine is profiled in Chapter 58 of this volume.

His intellectual and spiritual pilgrimage is famously presented in the first nine books of his Confessions, a text which deserves to be placed alongside the greatest works of European literature (O'Donnell 1992). Augustine's mature self-depiction in that work is of course strategic in all kinds of ways and cannot be taken as autobiography in a straightforward sense; still, its story is significant of how he later wished the highlights of his journey to appear (see, generally, Harmless 2010). Born at Thagaste (the modern Souk-Ahras, in Algeria) to a pagan father and a devout Christian mother, Augustine was made a catechumen as a child, but became estranged from the church as an adolescent. A reading of Cicero's (now lost) Hortensius inspired him to think seriously about moral and religious issues; disillusioned with the style of the Scriptures, he found himself drawn to alternative philosophies: first to astrology, then to Manichaeism, which seemed to him intellectually superior to the Christian message. He became a teacher of rhetoric, and for a decade, in Carthage and Rome, he remained associated with the Manichees as an auditor, or second-grade adherent, which allowed him to avoid the strict ascetic standards imposed upon the higher-tier 'Elect', and to continue to live with his concubine. As his studies in the philosophy of rhetoric became more sophisticated, he grew disenchanted with the Manichaean account of cosmology and its answer to the problem of evil, and he began to explore more sceptical paths. In 384, newly appointed to a professorship of rhetoric at Milan, and plunged into existential crisis (in the interests of his career, he had reluctantly separated from his concubine, the mother of his son, Adeodatus, to become engaged to a young heiress), he went to hear the great Ambrose preach and became deeply impressed by the power of his oratory, particularly his ability to interpret Old Testament texts in allegorical fashion. He also imbibed Platonist ideas by studying Plotinus and Porphyry, and began to resolve some of his difficulties with issues such as the nature of the soul and the question of evil.

His account of his conversion experience of July 386 is a classic: sitting in his garden, worn out physically and mentally, he heard a child's voice calling, Tolle, lege, 'Take and read'; turning at random to Rom. 13:13–14 (Conf. 8.12.28–30), he felt summoned to abandon sexual licence and 'put on' Christ. Jettisoning career and marriage, he aimed to be baptized. First, he withdrew to a friend's estate at Cassiciacum to recuperate physically and to explore with a group of friends and family some of the great philosophical issues with which he was still wrestling: the nature of happiness, the basis of knowledge, the shape of providence, the immortality of the soul. Their imaginary dialogues on such themes were published in imitation of Cicero's model in the Tusculan Disputations (Conybeare 2006). After receiving baptism from Ambrose at Easter 387, he moved to Rome. Following the death of his mother, he returned to North Africa, where for almost three years he lived at Thagaste with a group of friends in a kind of impromptu ascetic community. During this time, he continued to write extensively, seeking to branch out from the general intellectual preoccupations of his time as a teacher of the liberal arts to engage specifically theological questions. In 391, on a trip to the seaport of Hippo Regius, he found himself pressed into ordination as a priest by the elderly local bishop, Valerius. In 395 he became Valerius' co-adjutor, and assumed the office of sole bishop not long afterwards.

He had already issued a series of works against Manichaeism; immersing himself further in the study of Scripture, particularly the epistles of Paul, he expanded his credentials as a theological teacher. His later ideas on sin and grace began to take clear shape (Harrison 2006). He established his episcopal residence as a clerical chapter-house, setting out for its residents a rule expressive of the spiritual ideals of their life together. Cerebral as he was by nature, he proved a hard-working pastor (tracing ever more critical analyses of human nature the more he felt himself confronted with the evidences of sinfulness); like other bishops, he also spent a considerable amount of his time – often to his own great frustration – in civil administrative work, settling property and family disputes, petitioning officials and engaging in other bureaucratic chores. Amidst such demands, he was an exceedingly dedicated and highly popular preacher and engaged in preaching almost every day, either in his own church in Hippo or elsewhere in North Africa, especially in Carthage.

Figure 31.2   St Augustine in his Study by Vittore Carpaccio, 1502; Scuola di San Giorgio degli Schiavoni, Venice. Wikicommons

Augustine's classical rhetorical training and experience as a teacher were naturally of great significance to his preaching abilities. Though his assessment of the need for the reshaping of secular learning would become more radical over time (Pollmann and Vessey 2007), he continued to believe that traditional scholarly disciplines could facilitate Christian communication. His own preaching style remained, however, generally simple and direct (Bright 1999; Van Fleteren and Schnaubelt 2001; Müller 2012; Cameron 2012a). He made much of figural exegesis, and Christ was everywhere to be found in his Scriptures (Cameron 2012b). While his preaching could certainly be highly polemical, critical of social mores, erroneous philosophies and false teaching, it was also practical, aimed at the formation of a people. To that end, it persistently holds up the redemptive, therapeutic and evocative significance of the incarnation as fundamental to a Christian application of the biblical text. Moral and spiritual perfection was unattainable, and social ethics in particular had to be realistic (Clair 2016), but grace itself was real, and obedience and perseverance mattered. Augustine's sermons have become a fascinating field of study in their own right, their range extended by remarkable discoveries of further texts in modern times (Brown 2000: 441–81).

When Augustine died on 28 August 430, while Hippo was being besieged by the Vandals, he left an enormous literary legacy, much of which has survived intact, his library having mercifully escaped the fires which destroyed much of his city the following year. He left hundreds of books, treatises, letters and homilies. He seemed to write on almost everything, providing scholars with endless scope to write about him ever after (often, of course, he is far clearer and more interesting himself). There are vast pastoral treatises on John's gospel and the Psalms, drawing on his sermons. There is his huge dogmatic study on the Trinity (De Trinitate), composed over twenty years, the greatest of its genre in western theology, its arguments and legacy much misread in modernity (Ayres 2010; Gioia 2016). There is his learned enquiry into the relationship between hermeneutics, preaching and culture (De doctrina Christiana), a text profoundly influential for subsequent western interpretation (Arnold and Bright 1995). There is his magisterial exploration of history and society, visualized in terms of the contrasting purposes of God and human agency – part apologetic, part polemic, part political analysis and philosophy of history (De civitate Dei) (Markus 1970; O'Daly 1999). And then there are all his other exegetical, moral, philosophical and polemical texts – on subjects ranging from the exposition of Genesis to theories of rhythm (De musica), from the origins of evil to the merits of chaste widowhood, from the sin of lying to the correct places in which to bury the dead (De cura pro mortuis gerenda). Isidore of Seville (c. 560–636) was not joking when he recalled the saying that anyone who claimed to have read all of Augustine must be a liar (PL 83.1109).

A great deal of Augustine's output had its origins in controversy. He spent his early years attacking the Manichees; he then moved on to the Donatists, whose dominance in North Africa posed a major practical challenge; the last period of his life, from 412 to 430, was spent in intensifying opposition to the ideas he would array in systemic terms as the evil of Pelagianism. All these positions, he was convinced, required to be tackled head-on, not just because of their influence but because they were wrong in intellectual terms. Against his erstwhile associates the Manichees, with their denigration of the Old Testament and their dualistic cosmology which conceptualized evil as a force too powerful for good completely to eliminate, he argued for the primordial goodness of the creator's purpose, the reality of human free-will and the nature of evil as privatio boni (Evans 1982). He set out an epistemology of faith, underscoring the importance of religious authority both in texts and in the church. Against the Donatists and their preoccupation with personal holiness and ecclesial purity, he developed the seminal western theology of the sacraments we have already noted. He buttressed his argument that the church on earth was irreducibly a mixed body by asserting a doctrine of pre-destination, by which it could be said that God alone knows those who are truly his. Against the Pelagians and their contention that divine commands presuppose human capacity freely to comply, he first set out defences of original sin and the need for infant baptism, then elaborated increasingly forceful arguments linking the transmission of Adam's sin with sexual intercourse, and maintaining that human beings are naturally helpless and incapable but for the grace of God's eternal decree which predestines a certain constituency to salvation and also gives them the ability to believe and to persevere to the end.

Augustine's writings are, we might say, everywhere pervaded by his fascination with the fundamental relationship between God and human existence as it is meant to be. Augustine brilliantly reconceives the epistemological and moral preoccupations of ancient philosophy (Rist 1994) in light of a Christian narrative of the creation, redemption and perfection of creatures. He does so not – as has too often been assumed – as some crude synthesis that never properly emerges from Plato's shadow, but as a theological tour de force. In the process, his ideas have been important for everything from spirituality to sexuality, from theories of cognition to understandings of contingency.

Whether talking of nature, sin and grace (Harrison 2000); of the relationship between self-love and love for God (O'Donovan 1980); of the nature of beauty (Harrison 1992); of memory and time (O'Daly 1987; Hochschild 2012); of meditation and cognitive development (Stock 1996), for Augustine intellectual expression was always intensely personal and contemplative (Kenney 2015). Truth, for him, mattered utterly, and the search for it could never be, in the nature of things, a dilettante diversion from some other, ostensibly more 'real' world: it was bound up with the knowledge of the God who had created creatures for the end of knowing him first, and all things else as his (Drever 2013). Augustine's genius lay in his ability to communicate his vast, penetrating enquiries in ways that remained highly personal but also transcendent of his own contexts. Ultimately, he came to believe that the quest to which he had devoted himself was basic to the creator's design for creatures; the real rest we crave, intellectual and spiritual, is found only relationally in the God who made us; in spite of the enormity of human evil and all that it has produced, God had made it possible for the alienated to return to their true home in fellowship with him.

The fifth and sixth centuries saw the enshrining of a good deal of Augustine's teaching on sin and grace, and the entire course of medieval and Reformation theology was affected by his ideas of the church and salvation. At the same time, critical reactions to his views began in his own lifetime and have never disappeared. Modernity in particular has been full of attempts to blame him for almost everything that has gone wrong in western civilization, and to trace all manner of misanthropies, repressions and denigrations of the world to his pernicious influence. Undoubtedly the history of Augustinianism has its dark sides, and some of the protests have been understandable. Far too often, however, there has been lazy, generic repudiation rather than an attempt to engage Augustine's own thought: it is frequently far more sophisticated than its glib critics have imagined. Problems and tensions abound in his ideas, no doubt, but beyond all the figures in our period he can seem remarkably contemporary, engaging intellectual issues that remain of perennial fascination.

Pelagianism

Pelagianism, the last of the major theological developments with which we are concerned in this chapter, drew its initial support from the upper classes and intelligentsia of Rome and spread in accordance with their migration, first to areas such as Sicily where they held estates, then, after the fall of Rome, to North Africa and the east. It was essentially a lay movement, and its core ideas were in great measure configured as a theological system only by those who considered them heretical. Pelagius' personal history (Ferguson 1956; Evans 1968; Rees 1988; Bonner 1993; Lamberigts 2000) has been buried beneath an avalanche of personal caricature. He was possibly British by birth (early 350s), and had received an education in classical literature and philosophy by the time he arrived in Rome in the 380s. Though Jerome and Augustine refer to him as a 'monk', he never belonged to any obvious religious community and was never ordained as a priest. He was a layman, but a layman in a period in which many cultivated lay-people, male and female, exercised prominent roles in Roman Christian society.

Pelagius aspired to be a serious exegete and biblical theologian. In an age in which Christianity might well be embraced for opportunistic reasons rather than out of spiritual conviction, he urged that the moral message of Scripture needed to be taken seriously. At a time of deep political uncertainty, when ascetic ideals seemed to many aristocratic Christians to be incompatible with any significant secular involvement, he attracted rich patrons and inspired young disciples with his pleas for strong commitment. He stood in direct opposition to Manichaeism, whose resignation at the injustices of an intrinsically corrupt material world had found considerable support among Rome's intellectuals. Contrary to the Manichaean logic, human beings were endowed with the precious gift of free-will and were thus (theoretically at least) capable of living sinless lives. Tolerance of sin as an inevitability was unacceptable; there was a divine imperative to pursue holiness. Augustine's famous prayer in Conf. 10.29.40; 30.45; 37.60, 'Give what you command and command what you will', seemed to Pelagius to reflect a despairing acceptance of human incapacity, turning the individual into a puppet and undermining the whole basis of moral endeavour.

On the fall of Rome, Pelagius sought refuge in Africa, accompanied by a number of his supporters, most prominent of whom was a lawyer called Celestius, who proved to be of far more combative temperament than his mentor. Pelagius moved on to Palestine soon afterwards, evidently without provoking any particular theological controversy; Celestius remained in Carthage, where he thrust himself into local theological debates on the nature of the soul and the solidarity of the human race in the sin of Adam. Celestius argued that infants were born into the same state that Adam was in prior to his fall, and so baptism was not for the remission of sins but for sanctification. His case was logical enough, but it brought him swift condemnation. When he applied to become a priest, he was denounced for heresy by Paulinus, a deacon of Milan, who happened to be in Carthage on business, and at a local council in 411 his views were condemned. He left for Ephesus, where he succeeded in persuading a more accommodating church community to accept him, and was ordained in 415.

Pelagius, in Palestine, got himself embroiled in the Origenist dispute, quarrelling with Jerome that humans have the capacity by the force of their will to resist evil and attain perfection. By this time, Augustine had emerged from his labours against Donatism, and he began to get involved in the polemic against Celestius. In 415, a Spanish presbyter, Paulus Orosius, arrived in Bethlehem, sent by Augustine. Orosius, already a doughty combatant of Priscillianism in his native country, took up the cause and sought to link Pelagius with Celestius' errors. With the support of John, bishop of Jerusalem, Pelagius successfully defended himself, and at a provincial synod at Diospolis he was completely exonerated after distancing himself from some of Celestius' more extreme language. The African bishops nevertheless chose to condemn both Pelagius and Celestius in councils at Milevis and Carthage in 416, and took steps to curtail their influence by urging Pope Innocent I to excommunicate them. Very soon after he consented to do so in January 417, however, Innocent died. His successor, Zosimus, was visited by Celestius, who impressed him with his high moral ideals. The African bishops stuck to their guns, and a furious phase of epistolary pamphleteering ensued, as Augustine and his supporters sought to whip up a widespread antagonism to Pelagius and Celestius. The two were condemned by the emperor Honorius in the spring of 418, following a riot in Rome in which the ringleaders (mysteriously) happened to be Pelagians; then, on 1 May, a council of the African church was convened at Carthage which denounced Pelagius, Celestius and their supporters in a series of nine canons, and set out an unequivocal defence of the idea that sin and guilt are both transmitted by heredity. Not long afterwards, Zosimus capitulated to the pressure, acceding to the denunciation of the Pelagians and writing a circular letter, his famous Tractoria, to all the principal sees of east and west, requiring subscription to the anti–Pelagian position.

A group of South Italian bishops, led by Julian of Eclanum (c. 380–454), refused to comply and were deprived of their sees. Pelagius himself disappeared from sight not long afterwards; probably he died in the east some time before 420. Meanwhile, Julian, an exegetical and systematic theologian of considerable ability (Lössl 2001), embarked on a long and acrimonious war with Augustine that endured to the end of Augustine's days in 430. The papal attitude under Boniface I remained opposed to the Pelagian teachings. Celestius found some sympathy at Ephesus from Nestorius, but the papacy of Celestine I marked an even firmer rejection of the Pelagian cause, and Nestorius did himself no favours by his involvement in the affair when he found himself in other theological troubles of his own at the Council of Ephesus in 431; both he and Celestius were condemned (Wickham 1989).

The Pelagian controversy produced a substantial literary legacy. Pelagius himself wrote a great deal, on themes exegetical, doctrinal and moral-ascetical, but many of the works which circulated under his name are spurious, and others remain uncertain; debate continues on how best to classify them (Morris 1965; Evans 1968). Some of his letters have been preserved among the writings of his opponents, Augustine and Jerome. Pelagius was a reluctant heretic (Rees 1988; Markus 1989; Lamberigts 2000), and 'Pelagianism' as a packaged system of errors was only created gradually by the polemical dexterity of Augustine. Pelagius' Roman writings, especially his commentaries on the letters of Paul (which provide valuable evidence on the Latin texts of the fifth century, and reflect the growing popularity of the Vulgate; see e.g. De Bruyn 1998), are self-consciously traditional on the errors of Arianism and on the doctrine of the Trinity. He deliberately evokes the anti-Manichaean sentiments of Ambrose, Ambrosiaster ('Hilarius') and Augustine. His moralizing dwells on standard ascetical themes: the virtues of constancy in adversity, the dangers of material riches and the merits of virginity. Theologically, his concern was to debunk fatalism and to outline a robust anthropology which would inspire warfare against evil. To blame heredity or to talk of the existential inevitability of sin was, he felt, to seek excuses for failure. The disobedience of Adam constituted a bad example, but human freedom remained, and by effort of will it was possible to resist sin. The issue for Pelagius was not the necessity of divine grace, but the nature of that grace. Grace lay in the endowment of humanity with the faculties of reason and free-will, and in the provision of another example, counter to Adam's, to enlighten and stimulate these faculties into the performance of moral duty. This example was to be found in the Old Testament law and supremely in the perfect obedience of Christ. Many of the accusations levelled against Pelagius by his critics are not discernible in his surviving writings. His intentions were not to advocate unalloyed human autonomy or a 'do-it-yourself' system of salvation, but to give what he regarded as an appropriate place to human responsibility and moral effort. He would undoubtedly have been uncomfortable with a lot of the views espoused by his followers. Like the Donatists, he strongly upheld the importance of baptism as an initiation into a community called to holy living (unlike them, he does not say much about the relationship of this group to the social entity of the visible church).

Augustine's initial response was lukewarm, consisting chiefly of an insistence on the reality of evil as a universal disease and the consequent necessity of infant baptism to deal with its corrupting effects at the personal level. It was only after the exoneration of Pelagius and Celestius in the east and their claims to be articulating the traditional position that he sensed a challenge to the rigourist theology of North Africa which, to his mind, was the true Catholic faith (Bonner 1972). Had it not been for the collapse of Rome and the impact made by Pelagius in the east, the affair would never have assumed the significance it did, and had it not been for the African church's final success in securing its teaching as the official western one by obtaining Zosimus' condemnation of the Pelagian views in 418, Augustine would never have worked out the synthesis of his logic on sin, grace and predestination. It was in the heat of his bitter dialogue with Julian of Eclanum that he welded together what we think of as the Augustinian doctrine of sin and grace, connecting the transmission of original sin with sexual intercourse and insisting on the absolute moral helplessness of humanity but for the goodness of a God who has predestined some to be saved and left others to be damned. For Augustine, as for Pelagius, a sinless Christ was vital (Keech 2012), but the significance of Christ, while exemplary in essential ways, was divine grace in action in a stronger sense: not just as inspiration, but as constitutive liberation for the enslaved whom God has chosen for salvation.

Augustine's theology did not find immediate favour in the west. Pelagian ideas of one kind or another remained widespread. They continued to enjoy popularity in Britain in the 420s and 430s (Myres 1960; Markus 1986), and in Gaul there was considerable alarm among monastic groups that Augustine had gone too far, undermining human responsibility altogether. The protest, spearheaded by John Cassian (c. 360–431/2) and his supporters around Marseilles (Chadwick 1968; Stewart 1998; Casiday 2006), endured in the years following Augustine's death and evoked an uncompromising Augustinian defence from Prosper of Aquitaine (c. 390–463) (who later tempered his views markedly). The monks argued that while grace was necessary for salvation, human free-will was a presupposition of the gospel invitation. Their position has misleadingly been dubbed 'semi-Pelagianism', perhaps implying that it deliberately sought to retain the gist of the ideas associated with Pelagius' name while taking on board elements of Augustine's arguments. In fact, they were seeking to distance themselves from both Pelagius and the extremes of Augustine's predestinarianism (Tibiletti 1985).

As Vincent of Lérins (d. before 450) insisted, they saw themselves as upholding a Catholic tradition on nature and grace that the narrower trajectory in Augustine's thought seemed to have abandoned. Vincent's famous 'canon' (Commonitorium 2.3), setting out the triple test of ecumenicity, antiquity and universal consent as criterion of orthodoxy, needs to be read against this polemical background. The controversy endured in Gaul into the early sixth century. The course of the debates was considerably affected by the growing prestige of Lérins and Arles as ecclesiastical centres, well capable of writing their own theological agendas (Van Dam 1985). Even when the 'semi-Pelagian' perspective was officially condemned through the influence of Caesarius of Arles (c. 470–542) at the Second Council of Orange in 529, the council endorsed a series of dogmatic capitula which stopped well short of Augustine's language and repudiated the idea of predestination to damnation. It may be that for many of Gaul's clergy, deeply conservative by temperament, the issues mattered little, given the more immediate challenges they faced from Burgundian and Visigothic Arianism.

As had been the case with Donatism, the assortment of claims woven together as Pelagianism threw into relief some of the enduring differences between the theological traditions of North Africa, Italy and Gaul. The controversy yielded not just a new 'heresy', but a new 'orthodoxy' as well, for Augustine's darker doctrine of sin and predestination ultimately did prevail in the west. Even then, however, many of the core debates rumbled on throughout the Middle Ages, to resurface with a vengeance in the Reformation and Counter-Reformation, in the Jansenist controversies, and in the arguments between Calvinists and Arminians from the seventeenth century onwards. In the wake of Enlightenment assertions of human potential, and the subsequent demise of some that confidence amidst the cultures of a post-modern world, the focus on questions of freedom and determinism remain of pertinence today.

It is doubtless unwise to attach the name 'Pelagian' straightforwardly to any contemporary philosophy, but of the heirs of later fourth- and early fifth-century ideas there are many.

In retrospect

Any survey such as this has to skim along the high points of its terrain, picking out only the giants (both the heroes and the villains, judged from the standpoint of later orthodoxy) who made the most obvious contributions to the intellectual story of the later west. A fuller account of the evidence would have to canvass the parts played by many other key figures. There was the redoubtable Marius Victorinus Afer (fl. 360s–370s), celebrated rhetor and convert from paganism who produced – inter alia – an important series of Pauline commentaries and intriguing neo-Platonist metaphysic of the Trinity which in certain respects anticipated Augustine. There was Prudentius (348–c. 410), Spanish poet and writer of elegant hymns, whose allegorical depiction of the struggle of the Christian soul, the Psychomachia, profoundly influenced later generations. There was Paulinus of Nola (c. 353–431), scion of a wealthy noble family who gave up career and fortune to devote himself to the life of a sanctified scholar, channelling the energies of his literary gift into the production of an urbane Christian poetry and the maintenance of a wide-ranging correspondence with Christian and pagan peers. There was the elusive 'Ambrosiaster' (fl. late fourth century), whose remarkably sophisticated commentaries on the Pauline epistles remained unrivalled until the sixteenth century. There was the missionary-bishop Martin of Tours (d. 397), forever captured as holy man, healer and champion of the weak in the hagiographical Life of his disciple, Sulpicius Severus. There was Rufinus (c. 345–411), erstwhile friend of Jerome, monk, historian and producer of an important range of Latin translations of Greek texts, many of which would otherwise be lost.

Supremely, there were the vast majority – not just the poets, ascetics, minor preachers and teachers, but all the so-called 'ordinary' Christians – men, women and children – whose individual and collective input to the churches' development was far more profound than any summary of only 'great men' or movements can possibly imply. That people's history, and its material and symbolic as well as intellectual expression, is an indispensable part of the later west's inheritance (Burrus 2005). What we have traced here are just aspects of the roles played by the few, those whose work proved, by dint of their status and influence, programmatic for the narrative that would subsequently unfold. Their bequest is only one starting-point for our understanding of a yet more complex sequel.

Bibliography

Arnold, D. W. H. and Bright, P. (eds) (1995) De doctrina christiana: A Classic of Western Culture. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Ayres, L. (2004) Nicaea and its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Ayres, L. (2010) Augustine and the Trinity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Babcock, W. S. (1989) Tyconius, The Book of Rules, translated with an introduction. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Barnes, M. R. and Williams, D. H. (eds) (1993) Arianism after Arius: Essays on the History of the Fourth-Century Trinitarian Conflicts. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Barnes, T. D. (1992) 'Hilary of Poitiers on his exile', Vigiliae Christianae 46: 129–40.

Beckwith, C. (2008) Hilary of Poitiers on the Trinity: From De Fide to De Trinitate. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Biermann, M. (1995) Die Leichenrede des Ambrosius von Mailand: Rhetorik, Predigt, Politik. Stuttgart, Germany: Steiner.

Bonner, G. (1972) Augustine and Modern Research on Pelagianism. Villanova, PA: Villanova University Press.

Bonner, G. (1993) 'Augustine and Pelagianism', Augustinian Studies 24: 27–47.

Bonner, G. (2002) St. Augustine of Hippo: Life and Controversies, rev. ed. Norwich, UK: Canterbury Press.

Borchardt, C. F. A. (1966) Hilary of Poitiers' Role in the Arian Struggle. The Hague, The Netherlands: Nijhoff.

Bowersock, G. W., Brown, P. and Grabar, O. (eds) (1999) Late Antiquity: A Guide to the Postclassical World. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Brennecke, H. C. (1984) Hilarius von Poitiers und die Bischofsopposition gegen Konstantius II. Untersuchungen zur 3. Phase des Arianischen Streites (337–361). Berlin and New York: Walter De Gruyter.

Bright, P. (ed.) (trans.) (1999) Augustine and the Bible. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Brown, D. (1992) Vir Trilinguis: A Study in the Biblical Exegesis of Saint Jerome. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos.

Brown, P. R. L. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Brown, P. R. L. (2000) Augustine of Hippo: A Biography. 2nd ed. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Brown, P. R. L. (2012) Through the Eye of a Needle: Wealth, the Fall of Rome, and the Making of Christianity in the West, 350–550 AD. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Burrus, V. (1995) The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Burrus, V. (ed.) (2005) Late Ancient Christianity. A People's History of Christianity: 2. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress.

Cain, A. (2009) The Letters of Jerome: Asceticism, Biblical Exegesis, and the Construction of Christian Authority in Late Antiquity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Cain, A. (2013) Jerome's Epitaph on Paula: A Commentary on the Epitaphium Sanctae Paulae with an Introduction, Text, and Translation. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Cain, A. and Lössl, J. (eds) (2009) Jerome of Stridon: His Life, Writings and Legacy. Farnham, UK and Burlington, VT: Ashgate.

Cameron, M. (2012a) 'Augustine and Scripture' in Vessey, M. (ed.) A Companion to Augustine. Oxford, UK: Wiley-Blackwell, 200–14.

Cameron, M. (2012b) Christ Meets Me Everywhere: Augustine's Early Figurative Exegesis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Casiday, A. M. C. (2006) Tradition and Theology in St John Cassian. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Casiday, A. and Norris, F. W. (eds) (2014) The Cambridge History of Christianity: 2: Constantine to c. 600. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Chadwick, H. (1976) Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Chadwick, H. (1986) Augustine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Chadwick, O. (1968) John Cassian: A Study in Primitive Monasticism, 2nd ed. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Clair, J. (2016) Discerning the Good in the Letters & Sermons of Augustine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Clark, E. A. (1992) The Origenist Controversy: The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Colish, M. L. (2005) Ambrose's Patriarchs: Ethics for the Common Man. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Conti, M. (2009) Priscillian of Avila: The Complete Works. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Conybeare, C. (2006) The Irrational Augustine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Courcelle, P. (1968) Recherches sur les 'Confessions' de saint Augustin, 2nd ed. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Daniélou, J., Fontaine, J., De Gaiffier, B., Le Guillon, M.-J. and Marrou, H.-I. (1968) Hilaire de Poitiers, évēque et docteur (368–1968). Cinq conferences données à Poitiers à l'occasion du XVIe centenaire de sa mort. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Davidson, I. J. (2002) Ambrose, De Officiis, Edited with an Introduction, Translation, and Commentary. 2 vols. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Davidson, I. J. (2004) 'Doing what comes naturally? Ambrose and Vergil', in Rees, R. (ed.) Romane Memento: Vergil in the Fourth Century. London: Duckworth, 97–111.

De Bruyn, T. (1988) Pelagius' Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, Translated with an Introduction and Commentary. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Doignon, J. (1971) Hilaire de Poitiers avant l'exil. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Drever, M. (2013) Image, Identity, and the Forming of the Augustinian Soul. New York: Oxford University Press.

Dunkle, B. P. (2016) Enchantment and Creed in the Hymns of Ambrose of Milan. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Duval, Y.-M. (1973) Le Livre de Jonas dans la littérature chrétienne grecque et latine: sources et influences du Commentaire sur Jonas de saint Jérôme. 2 vols. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Duval, Y.-M. (ed.) (1988) Jérōme entre l'Occident et l'Orient. XVIe centenaire du départ de saint Jérōme de Rome et de son installation à Bethléem. Actes du Colloque de Chantilly 1986. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Evans, G. R. (1982) Augustine on Evil. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Evans, R. F. (1968) Pelagius: Inquiries and Reappraisals. London: A&C Black.

Ferguson, J. (1956) Pelagius: A Historical and Theological Study. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Ferguson, T. C. (2005) The Past is Prologue: The Revolution of Nicene Historiography. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Fitzgerald, A. D. (ed.) (1999) Augustine Through the Ages: An Encyclopedia. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Fontaine, J. (1992) Saint Ambroise: Hymnes, text établi, traduit et annoté. Paris: du Cerf.

Frend, W. H. C. (1985) The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa. 3rd ed. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Fürst, A. (2003) Hieronymus: Askese und Wissenschaft in der Spätantike. Freiburg, Germany: Herder.

Gaddis, M. (2005) There is No Crime for Those Who Have Christ: Religious Violence in the Christian Roman Empire. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Galtier, P. (1960) Saint Hilaire de Poitiers, le premier docteur de l'église latine. Paris: Beauchesne.

Gerson, L. P. (ed.) (2010) The Cambridge History of Philosophy in Late Antiquity. 2 vols. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Gilson, E. (1961) The Christian Philosophy of Saint Augustine (English trans.) London: Victor Gollancz.

Gioia, L. (2016) The Theological Epistemology of Augustine's De Trinitate. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Graumann, T. (1994) Christus Interpres. Die Einheit von Auslegung und Verkündigung in der Lukaserklärung des Ambrosius von Mailand. Berlin and New York: Walter De Gruyter.

Gwynn, D. M. (2007) The Eusebians: The Polemic of Athanasius of Alexandria and the Construction of the 'Arian Controversy'. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hagendahl, H. (1958) The Latin Fathers and the Classics: A Study on the Apologists, Jerome, and other Christian Writers. Gothenburg, Germany: Gothenburg University Press.

Hanson, R. P. C. (1988) The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Harmless, W. (ed.) (2010) Augustine in His Own Words. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Harrison, C. (1992) Beauty and Revelation in the Thought of Saint Augustine. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Harrison, C. (2000) Augustine: Christian Truth and Fractured Humanity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Harrison, C. (2006) Rethinking Augustine's Early Theology: An Argument for Continuity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Harvey, S. A. and Hunter, D. G. (eds) (2008) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hayward, C. T. R. (1995) Saint Jerome's Hebrew Questions on Genesis, Translated with an Introduction and Commentary. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hochschild, P. E. (2012) Memory in Augustine's Theological Anthropology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Homes Dudden, F. (1935) The Life and Times of Saint Ambrose. 2 vols. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hunter, D. G. (2007) Marriage, Celibacy, and Heresy in Ancient Christianity: The Jovinianist Controversy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Jay, P. (1985) L'exégèse de saint Jérôme d'après son 'Commentaire sur Isaïe'. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Johanny, R. (1968) L'Eucharistie, centre de l'histoire du salut chez saint Ambroise de Milan. Paris: Beauchesne.

Kamesar, A. (1993) Jerome, Greek Scholarship, and the Hebrew Bible: A Study of the Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kamesar, A. (2013) 'Jerome', in Paget, J. C. and Schaper, J. (eds) The New Cambridge History of the Bible 1: From the Beginnings to 600. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 653–75.

Keech, D. (2012) The Anti-Pelagian Christology of Augustine of Hippo, 396–430. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1975) Jerome, His Life, Writings, and Controversies. London: Duckworth.

Kenney, J. P. (2015) Contemplation and Classical Christianity: A Study in Augustine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Labande, E. R. (ed.) (1969) Hilaire et son temps: Actes du Colloque de Poitiers à l'occasion du XVIe centenaire de la mort de saint Hilaire. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Lamberigts, M. (2000) 'Pélage: la réhabilitation d'un hérétique', in Pirotte, J. and Louchez, E. (eds), Deux mille ans d'histoire de l'Eglise: Bilan et perspectives historiographiques. Louvain, Belgium: Université catholique de Louvain, 97–111.

Lancel, S. (2002) St Augustine. (English trans.) London: SCM Press.

Lenox-Conyngham, A. (1993) 'Ambrose and philosophy', in Wickham, L. R. and Bammel, C. P. (eds) Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy in Late Antiquity: Essays in Tribute to George Christopher Stead. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 112–28.

Liebeschuetz, J. H. W. G. (2011) Ambrose and John Chrysostom: Clerics between Desert and Empire. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Lienhard, J. (1999) Contra Marcellum: Marcellus of Ancyra and Fourth-Century Theology. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Lieu, S. N. C. (1992) Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire and Medieval China. 2nd ed. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Lieu, S. N. C. (2014) 'Christianity and Manichaeism', in Casiday, A. and Norris, F. W. (eds) The Cambridge History of Christianity: 2: Constantine to c. 600. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 279–95.

Lim, R. (1995) Public Disputation, Power, and Social Order in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Lössl, J. (2001) Julian von Aeclanum: Studien zu seinem Leben, seinem Werk, seiner Lehre und ihrer Uberlieferung. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Lucchesi, E. (1977) L'usage de Philon dans l'oeuvre exégetique de saint Ambroise. Une 'Quellenforschung' relative aux commentaires d'Ambroise sur la Genèse. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Madec, G. (1974) Saint Ambroise et la philosophie. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Maes, B. (1967) La loi naturelle selon Ambroise de Milan. Paris: Presses de l'Université Grégorienne.

Markschies, C. (1995) Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie: Kirchen- und theologiegeschichtliche Studien zu Antiarianismus und Neunizänismus bei Ambrosius und an lateinischen Westen (364–381 n. Chr.). Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Markus, R. A. (1970) Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Markus, R. A. (1986) 'Pelagianism: Britain and the continent', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 37: 191–204.

Markus, R. A. (1989) 'The legacy of Pelagius: Orthodoxy, heresy and conciliation', in Williams, R. (ed.) The Making of Orthodoxy: Essays in Honour of Henry Chadwick. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 214–34.

Maur, H. J. auf der (1977) Das Psalmenverständnis des Ambrosius von Mailand: Ein Beitrag zum Deutungshintergrund der Psalmenverwendung im Gottesdienst der Alten Kirche. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

McLynn, N. B. (1994) Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in a Christian Capital. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Moorhead, J. (1999) Ambrose: Church and Society in the Late Roman World. London and New York: Longman.

Morris, J. (1965) 'Pelagian Literature', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 16: 26–60.

Müller, H. (2012) 'Preacher: Augustine and his congregation', in Vessey, M. (ed.) A Companion to Augustine. Oxford, UK: Wiley-Blackwell, 297–309.

Myres, J. N. L. (1960) 'Pelagius and the end of Roman rule in Britain', Journal of Roman Studies 60: 21–36.

Nauroy, G. (1985) 'L'Ecriture dans la pastorale d'Ambroise de Milan', in Fontaine, J. and Pietri, E. (eds) La Bible de tous les temps 2: Le monde latin antique et la Bible. Paris: Beauchesne, 371–408.

Neumann, C. W. (1962) The Virgin Mary in the Works of Saint Ambrose. Fribourg, Switzerland: Fribourg University Press.

Oberhelman, S. M. (1991) Rhetoric and Homiletics in Fourth-Century Christian Literature: Prose Rhythm, Oratorical Style, and Preaching in the Works of Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

O'Daly, G. J. P. (1987) Augustine's Philosophy of Mind. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

O'Daly, G. J. P. (1999) Augustine's City of God: A Reader's Guide. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

O'Donnell, J. J. (1985) Augustine. Boston, MA: Twayne.

O'Donnell, J. J. (1992) Augustine, Confessions. 3 vols. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

O'Donovan, O. M. T. (1980) The Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Parvis, S. (2006) Marcellus of Ancyra and the Lost Years of the Arian Controversy, 325–343. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Pasini, C. (1990) Tutte le opere di Sant' Ambrogio 24.1: Sussidi: Le fonti greche su Sant'Ambrogio. Milan, Italy: Biblioteca Ambrosiana; Rome: Città Nuova.

Pizzolato, L. F. (1978) La dottrina esegetica di Sant' Ambrogio. Milan, Italy: Vita e Pensiero.

Pollmann, K. and Vessey, M. (eds) (2007) Augustine and the Disciplines: From Cassiciacum to Confessions. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Pottier, B. (2008) 'Les circoncellions. Un mouvement ascétique itinérant dans l'Afrique du Nord des IVe et Ve siècles', Antiquités africaines 44: 43–107.

Ramsey, B. (1997) Ambrose. London and New York: Routledge.

Rebenich, S. (1992) Hieronymus und sein Kreis: Prosopographische und sozialgeschichtliche Untersuchungen. Stuttgart, Germany: Steiner.

Rebenich, S. (2002) Jerome. London and New York: Routledge.

Rees, B. R. (1988) Pelagius: A Reluctant Heretic. Woodbridge, UK: Boydell Press.

Rist, J. M. (1994) Augustine: Ancient Thought Baptized. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Satterlee, C. A. (2002) Ambrose of Milan's Method of Mystagogical Preaching. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press (Pueblo).

Savon, H. (1977) Saint Ambroise devant l'exégèse de Philon le Juif. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Savon, H. (1997) Ambroise de Milan (340–397). Paris: Desclée.

Shaw, B. D. (2004) 'Who were the Circumcellions?', in Merrills, A. H. (ed.) Vandals, Romans and Berbers: New Perspectives on Late Antique North Africa. Aldershot, UK and Burlinton, VT: Ashgate, 227–58.

Shaw, B. D. (2011) Sacred Violence: African Christians and Sectarian Hatred in the Age of Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Smith, J. W. (2011) Christian Grace and Pagan Virtue: The Theological Foundations of Ambrose's Ethics. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Stewart, C. A. (1998) Cassian the Monk. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Stock, B. (1996) Augustine the Reader: Meditation, Self-Knowledge, and the Ethics of Interpretation. Cambridge, MA and London: Belknap Press/Harvard University Press.

Stump, E. and Kretzmann, N. (eds) (2001) The Cambridge Companion to Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Swift, L. J. (1970) 'St. Ambrose on violence and war', Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association 101: 533–43.

Swift, L. J. (1979) 'Iustitia and ius privatum: Ambrose on private property', American Journal of Philology 100: 176–87.

TeSelle, E. (1970) Augustine the Theologian. New York: Herder & Herder.

Tibiletti, C. (1985) 'Rassegni de studi e testi sui "semipelagiani"', Augustinianum 25: 507–22.

Tilley, M. A. (1996) Donatist Martyr Stories: The Church in Conflict in Roman North Africa. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Tilley, M. A. (1997) The Bible in Christian North Africa: The Donatist World. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Van Dam, R. (1985) Leadership and Community in Late Antique Gaul. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Van Dam, R. (1993) Saints and their Miracles in Late Antique Gaul. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Van Fleteren, F. and Schnaubelt, J. C. (eds) (2001) Augustine: Biblical Exegete. 2nd ed. New York: Peter Lang.

Weedman, M. (2008) The Trinitarian Theology of Hilary of Poitiers. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Wickham, L. R. (1989) 'Pelagianism in the east', in Williams, R. (ed.) The Making of Orthodoxy: Essays in Honour of Henry Chadwick. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 200–13.

Wiesen, D. S. (1964) St. Jerome as a Satirist: A Study in Christian Latin Thought and Letters. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Williams, D. H. (1991) 'A reassessment of the early career and exile of Hilary of Poitiers', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 42: 202–17.

Williams, D. H. (1992) 'The Anti–Arian campaigns of Hilary of Poitiers and the liber contra auxentium', Church History 61: 7–22.

Williams, D. H. (1995) Ambrose of Milan and the End of the Nicene–Arian Conflicts. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Williams, M. H. (2006) The Monk and the Book: Jerome and the Making of Christian Scholarship. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Williams, R. (2001) Arius: Heresy and Tradition. 2nd ed. London: SCM Press.

Young, F., Ayres, L. and Louth, A. (eds) (2004) The Cambridge History of Early Christian Literature. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Zelzer, M. (1987) 'Ambrosius von Mailand und das Erbe der klassischen Tradition', Wiener Studien 100: 210–26.

Zelzer, M. (1989) 'Plinius Christianus: Ambrosius als Epistolograph', Studia Patristica 23: 203–8.

32

CREEDS, COUNCILS AND DOCTRINAL DEVELOPMENT

Piotr Ashwin-Siejkowski

Introduction

In the history of the church creeds, councils and doctrinal developments have been directly interconnected. Questions over beliefs, interpretations of the Scriptures, discipline and liturgical practices have raised questions since the beginning of Christianity. When Christianity received legal status in the Roman empire (the Edict of Milan 313 CE), these debates took place within the public gathering of the synods and councils. But the development, if that is the correct word,[1] of Christian doctrine started much earlier. Christianity, if this generic term applies to the phenomenon of the diversity among Jesus' followers (King 2008: 66–84), from its first moments embraced and publicly confessed a number of paradoxes. These opinions astonished the Jews as well as Christian Graeco-Roman neighbours (e.g. 1 Cor. 1:22). Christians claimed that a humiliated and crucified Jesus of Nazareth is now alive and glorified (e.g. Acts 2:32–33; 4:10; 7:56). They proposed that the Galilean preacher and exorcist (Mark 3:23; Luke 10:18) was the ultimate revelation of the Holy God of Israel (Heb. 1:2). They boldly stated that Jesus' personal opinion about salvation reflected the divine and eternal truth (John 14:6). These views would soon call for rational and coherent justification; as such they would make their way to the doctrine of the universal (i.e. Catholic) church.

During the second century more bold and puzzling claims were put forward: for instance, Justin Martyr (c. 100–c. 165) argued against a certain Jew, Trypho, that Christianity (a religion that was only 100 years old) now understood better the meaning in the Jewish Scriptures than the Jews themselves (e.g. Dialogue with Trypho, 84.3). The bishop of Lyons, Irenaeus, called for a limitation of the divine revelation to only four channels: Mark, Matthew, Luke and John (Against the Heresies, 3.11.8). In the same century, Clement of Alexandria maintained that his ecclesiastical community exclusively interpreted the apostolic message in a correct, unspoiled (orthodox) way (Paedag., 3.98.1–2). The development of Christian doctrine in the forthcoming centuries suggested that the Apophatic God existed, as an impenetrable mystery, as the Father, Son and the Holy Spirit. Three divine persons share one nature, however, each retaining their own individuality. By confirming that all other views were rejected, neither three-theism nor modalism, by the standards of the Great Church, expressed true faith. Why was Christianity in its mainstream tradition so concerned about the strict correctness of the highly speculative creeds? Why did the practice of that doctrinal exactness lead to the persecution of other believers? Neither Second Temple Judaism (in its plurality of forms, see Dunn 1991:

18–36) nor the diversity of Graeco-Roman religions and cults, aspired to argue for the existence of their divinities and for the value of their rituals with such intellectual zeal and dramatic consequences. And, again, why did Christian clergy and monks, unlike the priests and priestesses of Roman religions and Jewish rabbis, persistently quarrel about the nature of God, human will, sin and grace, to name just few controversies?

The scope of this chapter imposes certain serious limits on my discussion. I have chosen only one trajectory of the emerging Christian doctrine focused on the person of Christ (Christology), later concluding with the theology of the Holy Trinity. This subject, in my view, was essential to the formation of Christian thought, worship/prayer and mysticism. It also reflected from the fourth century onwards the crucial link between theology and politics; between the church and the empire. I am aware that my subject is only one thread in the rich tapestry of early Christian theology, which included many other themes (e.g. women and gender), debates (e.g. human freedom and divine grace), conflicts with some compromises, but more often with anathemas proclaimed by local synods and ecumenical councils. This slant on the subject also turns our attention to mainly Greek theologians; others, such as Tertullian (c. 160–c. 225) and Augustine (354–430) will receive only limited attention. It is impossible to embrace in this essay the riches of Coptic theology (Goehring and Timbe 2007) and Syriac Christianity (Brock 2004: 362–372). I would like to offer an overview of the crucial 'Y-junctions', up to the ecumenical Council of Chalcedon (451), which shaped early Christian theology and which still determines modern understanding of Christian dogma. Modern theologians and Christian believers cannot simply return to 'point-zero' and suggest, for example, the inclusion of the Gospel of Thomas in the New Testament canon, or the readjustment of the position of the Holy Spirit in relation to the two other persons in the Trinity as proclaimed by the ecumenical Council in Constantinople (381). Still, we can understand better the origins and the context of those ancient declarations of faith which still shape various aspects of modern, ecumenical Christian theology.

The emergence of Christian scriptures and identity

Jesus of Nazareth was a Jew from Galilee and his close followers were his local, rural compatriots, some of them fishermen in the Sea of Galilee, who expected the coming of the Jewish Messiah. Jesus did not write down his stories, nor aspire to reach a wider cosmopolitan audience. Together with his followers, he claimed that there is only one God. Jesus' followers also believed in the election of Israel and the unique covenant through the Torah between the Holy God and his people. They regularly worshipped in the Temple (Dunn 1991: 18–56, 98–116). As far as we can say, neither Jesus of Nazareth nor his first disciples intended to invent a new religion/Christianity (Ashwin-Siejkowski 2009: 9–12).

However, the vital and dramatic events of Jesus' arrest, crucifixion and resurrection totally changed his followers' perception: in the light of the Easter experience they reinterpreted the meaning of Jesus' suffering, death, his earlier teaching and miracles, even the circumstances of his birth. The Gospel of John went even further: it highlighted Jesus' pre-existence as the divine Word (Gr. Logos). This original process of evolving a whole new set of views about Jesus, his nature, mission and teaching, from its earliest phase, showed a plurality of emphases and theological interests.[2] Jesus was proclaimed as 'the Lord' (Gr. Kyrios,[3] e.g. Acts 2:36; Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3; Col. 2:6), the 'last Adam' (e.g. 1 Cor. 15:21–22; Heb. 2:6–9), 'divine wisdom' (e.g. 1 Cor. 8:6; Heb. 1:1–3), and/or 'the High Priest' (Heb. 7:16). One of the earliest hymns preserved in the Epistle to Philippians (2:6–11) glorifies Christ's self-abandonment (Gr. kenosis) and later exultation, while the epistle written by Pliny the Younger, Roman governor to the Emperor Trajan at the end of the first century CE, clearly indicates that the local Christians in Asia Minor worshipped Christ as '[a] god' (Pelikan 1971: 173). Pliny's correspondence is important as he was aware that those worshippers of Christ were not Jews any more. These and other sources (e.g. Col. 1:15–20) show that the advance of Christian views about the nature and role of Jesus Christ not only originated within the spectrum of Second Temple Judaism but also continued a number of aspects of Jewish theology, which gradually received a new interpretation. In brief, the interpretative, theological transition from memories of Jesus as a Galilean teacher to a more elaborated literal testimony about Christ, the Saviour, was surprisingly continuous, but not smooth or unchallenged. Two further issues have to be signalled at this stage.

Figure 32.1   The Sea of Galilee, from Ha-Shekat Beach looking towards Mount Arbel, with modern–day
Migdal and Kibbutz Ginosar beyond in the background. Photo Prof. Joan Taylor

Around the turn of the first century, the anonymous author of the First Epistle of John puts in his correspondence a noticeable emphasis on Christ's physical existence (e.g. 4:2–3; earlier 1:1–3 and later 4:6–8). Just a decade or two later, the same concern was expressed by one of the Apostolic Fathers, Ignatius, who stressed that Christ was really a human being (Ep., Trallians, 9–10). The history of theology labelled the view which challenged the reality of Christ's incarnation as 'docetic/ism' (Gr. Dokeo – 'appear to be'). It is clear, however, that some Christians, such as those criticised in the First Epistle of John, or by Ignatius, found it difficult, if not impossible, to acknowledge that the divine could dwell in weak, if not shameful, human flesh. Around the same time, yet another challenge came from other Christians, those who still held on to some Jewish values and practices. These Christians, labelled as 'Ebionites' (Heb. 'the poor'), held the view that Jesus was born as all people are, but at his baptism at Jordan he was elected/adopted to be the Son of God (Häkkinen 2005: 268). The latter view was denoted as 'adoptionism' as Christ's divinity was rejected. It is important to remember that these opinions did not originate from a speculative type of theology, but came from a specific interpretation of Christian Scriptures with local communities. Irenaeus (Against the Heresies, 1.26.2) and Tertullian (On the Prescription of Heretics, 33.5) claimed that the Ebionites used the Gospel of Matthew, while rejecting the Pauline epistles. Those commentators built up their understanding of salvation by focusing on Christ's teaching and mission, with the Scriptures in the centre of their exegesis. For example, the Gospel of John was well known to the followers of Valentinus (d. c. 165) and his disciples. Some Valentinians produced highly detailed and elaborate commentaries on this Gospel (Heracleon in Thomassen 2010: 173–210) and other Christian documents (Clement of Alexandria, the Excerpts from Theodotus in Hill 2004: 211–212). Literary activity during the second century in various Christian milieus delivered an astonishing number of exegetical works. Some of those theologians aimed to amalgamate valuable testimonies about Jesus' salvation in just one 'Gospel' (Tatian, second century); others were happy with a plurality of source. Irenaeus' famous claim restricted the number of Gospels to four, while Marcion's (d. c. 160) exegetical attempt aimed to regain the purity of God's revelation and Jesus' teaching by a radical re-edition of Luke's Gospel and some Pauline letters (Moll 2010: 83–106). The richness of Christian literary production is well attested by another second-century author, Clement of Alexandria (c. 150–c. 215). Clement provides us with many and unique quotations from Christian sources which commented on Jesus' life and salvation.[4]

The open, polyphonic debate among Christians in the second century prompted some theologians to advocate the value of 'the rule of faith' (Lat. regula fidei). This rule was not a creed itself (the proclamation/confession of faith), but rather a summary of core-beliefs. First, the bishop of Lyons, Irenaeus (c. 130–c. 200), proposed a 'rule of faith' which would separate error from truth, or correctness (orthodoxy) from perverse, selective choice (Against the Heresies, 1.22.1). Irenaeus wished to establish that sort of measurement not only for his church, but boldly claimed its 'universal' (catholic) dimension (Against the Heresies, 1.10.1–2 in Stevenson 1999: 111). In consequence, his measurement could also be used to assess the error in Rome, Asia Minor and North Africa. For Irenaeus, this rule had to be connected with a historical succession and the plain meaning of the Scriptures.[5] Next, the Latin author who wrote some time after Irenaeus, Tertullian of Carthage (c. 160–c. 225), supported this idea of theological discernment (On the Prescription of Heretics, 13 in Stevenson 1999: 165). In his case, 'the rule of faith' was directed against his Christian opponents: among them Valentinians, Marcionites and Basilideans. Clement of Alexandria used this rule in his debate with his adversaries (Stromata, 7.93.1–105.5). In the next century, Origen (c. 185–c. 254) found the rule of faith as a helpful way to demarcate between falsehood and truth (On First Principles, 1 in Stevenson 1999: 198–199). These important thinkers, although paradoxically not all of them were later found to be orthodox, give evidence that the need to distinguish between 'error/erroneous' teaching and the 'correct/right-way-of-thinking and believing' gradually appeared in the minds of some Christian intellectuals. The philosophical underpinning conviction was that the truth is one, while error is multiple. Soon, in the case of Tertullian, another conviction was added: first there was truth; then came corruption and error (On the Prescription of Heretics, 29).

The apologetic battle during the second and third centuries enhanced the 'rule of faith' as a doctrinal discernment applicable in inter-Christian polemic. However, the Apologists also defended Christianity against Jewish and Graeco-Roman critics. First, for instance, Justin's inventive treatise, the Dialogue with Trypho, aimed to prove that Christian faith contained the whole truth about salvation, that the ultimate truth had been disclosed in Jesus' life and teaching. In Justin's presentation, Jews (represented in the treatise by Trypho), did not understand the meaning of the Scriptures (or prophetic utterances), while Christians, those with whom Justin identified himself, explored the Scriptures in the correct way. Second, responding to Graeco-Roman ridicule,[6] the Apologists such as Clement of Alexandria argued that their faith reflected the light of the universal truth, discovered by some ancient sages such as Socrates, or learnt by Plato from . . . Moses (Stromata, 1.165.1). Against the accusation of 'novelty',[7] the Apologists claimed that the ancient sages (e.g. Socrates, Heraclitus) were the embodiment of Christian wisdom and virtue (Justin, First Apology 46.3 in Stevenson 1999: 61). The Apologists aimed to prove the universal connection of Christianity with the virtuous life of ancient sages and prophets by reference to either the Greek philosophical passion for truth, or the Hebrew oracles now fully revealed as one of Jesus' names (John 14:6). Against the claim that their religion was yet another 'superstition', they highlighted the rational and discursive element within the Christian faith (Athenagoras of Athens, Plea, 8.1–8). The importance of their thoughts and works to the development of the Christian doctrine is irreplaceable. Those first Christian intellectuals used various exegetical and philosophical tools to show the rational and coherent aspects of Christian beliefs. They used arguments to prove that Christianity was not a new, mainly emotional, adherence to an oriental deity, but could be placed and respected among other philosophical schools.

That apologetic activity emerged among different Christian groups alongside preparation to baptism in the name of the 'Father, Son and the Holy Spirit' (e.g. the Didache, 7.1–3; Justin, First Apology, 61; the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, 11.26–27; the Gospel of Philip, 67.19–22 and earlier 59.11–18).[8] The life of the community was expressed through fellowship which first and foremost recognised the central role of the Redeemer: the recollection and preservation of memoirs of his teaching, miracles, his death and resurrection. Then that life produced charitable works which embraced the less privileged and more vulnerable members of the community. In the context of house-churches, the beliefs of local Christians became a part of the doctrine not yet acclaimed by synods and councils as orthodox, but already strong enough to sow seeds of future dogmas. However, change over time, movement in geographical space, together with a greater assimilation of philosophical language and notions, stimulated theologies which were less concerned with Jesus, the Galilean teacher, and more focused on Christ, the divine Logos and the universal Teacher (Gr. didaskalos). Around the middle of the second century, the first 'Y-junction' was definitely reached: Christian communities lost their association with their original Jewish setting and turned towards Graeco-Roman concepts becoming clearly visible in theological literature.

Arius: when scriptures called for a larger theological overview of salvation

The 'rule of faith' as a general method was used by the leading Apologists in their confrontation with their Christian adversaries. Soon, however, mainstream Christianity would adopt new methods of defending and promoting its orthodoxy. When Christianity became acknowledged in the Roman empire (313 CE), the debate about orthodoxy and heresy found new forms and means of discernment. The new forms included the local synods,[9] ecumenical councils and their official declarations, including the creeds. But the path to this next stage began in Alexandria.

Somewhere in the early years of the fourth century, the bishop of Alexandria, Alexander (d. 328), gathered his clergy and inquired about the specific nature of the Christian view of the Holy Trinity (Socrates, HE, 1.5 in Stevenson 1999: 321), possibly in connection with liturgical readings or even in order to prepare to address his flock. One of his presbyters, Arius (d. 336), put forward his view which strongly distinguished between the Father's (eternal) existence with the existence of Jesus, which had a defined beginning. In Arius' view, as preserved by a declaration of Arius' faith sent to his bishop around 321, the Son 'had a beginning, but God is without beginning' (Theodoret, HE, 1.5.1–4; Epiphanius, Haer, 69.6 in Stevenson 1999: 325). Arius' exegesis of the Scriptures and logical tenets defended what he believed was orthodoxy originating in the apostolic tradition and upheld by the Alexandrian church as 'the rule of faith', namely that there is only one God, alone unbegotten and eternal. As to the nature and origin of Jesus, who was also named as the Son of God by Christian tradition, the Son was distinguished from God the Father, as he received his existence at some point, even if that point was before the creation of the world. In brief, the Arian 'creed' would announce that 'there was a time when he (the Son) was not'. The source of the Son's existence, according to Arius' exegesis and theology, was God's will (Athanasius, On the Synods, 15 in Stevenson 1999: 331). It has to be pointed out that the long and excruciating debate on the origin and nature of the Son was not a 'duel' but 'a mêlée' (Edwards 2009: 105). It was not an exegetical and theological conflict exclusively between Arius with his followers against Alexander with his defenders. The conflict engaged a whole spectrum of theologians with different views who passionately argued for their understanding of what should be accepted as the orthodox doctrine of God (Ayres 2004: 11–84). The first stage of the debate between Arius and Alexander centred on the crucial theological notion of the origin (or generation) of the Son. While Arius' concern was on the one hand to make a clear distinction between the divine Father and his Son ('the One without beginning' and 'the one with a beginning') and not to amalgamate both into one divine being (contra Sabellius and his 'modalism'),[10] on the other hand, Arius rejected any idea of the division within the divine realm (contra Valentinus). In addition, as an exegete, Arius read various Scriptural statements about the Son which showed his human weakness, his inequality with his Father (e.g. John 14:28), change and growth (e.g. Luke 2:52; Phil 2:5–11). In Arius' argument, these characteristics did not confirm the Son's divine origin and nature. However, in Alexander's view, Arius denied Christ's divinity and claimed that Christ was equal with all mankind (Alexander, Letter of Alexander in Stevenson 1999: 328). Consequently, Arius placed Christ half-way between God and humanity. Alexander's position, on the contrary, highlighted the co-eternity of the Son with the Father (how could the Father be called father if there was no son?). Like Arius, Alexander and his followers also searched Scripture for quotations which supported their theology. One of the decisive moments in this ongoing theological and exegetical exchange was the appearance of the young deacon Athanasius (c. 296–373) on the side of Alexander. Athanasius succeeded Alexander after his death (April 328) and brought into the debate not only his intellectual acumen and Scriptural knowledge, but also a certain theological sense and vision. In brief, Athanasius' stance questioned the possibility of salvation, one of the most vital events in the history of humankind, if the Saviour were only half-way between God and creation. The Saviour must be both fully divine and fully human in order to bring humanity back to its Creator and God's grace to all people. Athanasius' theological intuition lifted his mind away from the search for the arguments in the Scriptures led him to reflect on the crucial idea of salvation and its pivotal condition: can reconciliation with God be achieved by the acts of somebody who was only close to the divine Father? This negative answer to this question prompted a new interpretation of the Scriptures, Apostolic tradition and previous Alexandrian liturgy, where prayers were offered to God 'through Christ'. It boldly pronounced not only the co-existence of the Son with the Father, but also his shared substance (Gr. homoousios). This non-Scriptural term was known to second-century Christians, such as the Valentinians, although used in a different context (Clement of Alexandria, the Excerpts from Theodotus, 50.1; 53.1; 58.1; for Heracleon see Williams 2001: 134–135). It was also used by Neoplatonist (pagan) philosophers such as Plotinus and Porphyry (Stead 1977: 214–215). Both cases of use did not provide the term with a proper pedigree for the traditional type of theologians such as Arius. In the time of Athanasius, this very term was still highly controversial, if not blasphemous (Sozomen, HE, 2.8 in Ayres 2004: 101). At this stage, the development of doctrine, either its progress with the new non-Scriptural terminology or its regress with the heretical (Valentinian) notion applied to the Christian understanding of the Trinity (at least the relationship between the Father and the Son), reached the ears of Constantine who, as the first emperor, accepted Christianity as the religion of his empire. In this crucial moment in the development of doctrine, Christian beliefs and sophisticated arguments were placed in front of the majesty of the emperor; he himself was neither theologian nor philosopher but an army leader and politician. He might even have been confused as various proponents of Christian orthodoxy argued about Christ's status as either 'the alike in essence' (Gr. homoiousion), 'the different in essence' (Arians) or 'of the same essence' (Gr. homoousion), naming here only three opinions. Christian theology/-ies entered the courts of the emperor's palace, fulfilling the dream of the early Christian Apologists, to beg for favour in front of the Roman emperor.

Figure 32.2 Alexandria, Kom el-Dikka (fifth/sixth century CE). Photo Prof. Pawel Janiszewski

In this place there is no room to discuss the complexity of Constantine's conversion to Christianity. His response to the crisis in Alexandria was political: as the dispute between Alexandrians quickly became an open disagreement with other Christians risking the divine Constantine's administration and more importantly his army, his personal dream about the unity of the empire under 'one Sun', that is the emperor (i.e. himself), was becoming increasingly disturbed. Constantine issued a letter to his Alexandrian opponents (Eusebius, Life of Constantine, 2.70–1 in Ludlow 2009: 113), asking them to cease their ongoing, disruptive quarrel about 'small and very insignificant questions'. He also called for 'a synod', or gathering of church leaders in Nicaea, a city of Bithynia/Asia Minor (Stevenson 1999: 338) in the summer of 325 CE. It is hard to tell who came up with the original idea of the ecclesiastical 'gathering'. Still, it is acknowledged that Constantine sponsored it, while his trustworthy advisor, bishop Ossius, chaired it. Although all Christian bishops of the empire were summoned to the Council, the gathering was attended by around 250–300 leaders (Williams 2001: 67), overwhelmingly from the eastern provinces. It remains unclear whether Arius himself attended the Council; however it is certain that his views were represented by his supporters. The bishops present overwhelmingly agreed to formulate a summary of the Christian orthodox faith, a 'rule of faith' which would demarcate error from truth about Christ's origin. The crucial passage pronounced:

> We believe in . . . and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten from the Father as only-begotten, that is, from the substance/ousias of the Father, God from God, light from light, true God from true God, begotten not made, of one substance/homoousios with the Father.
>
> (Kelly 1952: 215 with my highlights)

The creed ended with anathemas for its opponents. The importance of this statement for the development of Christian theology lies in the fact that those bishops, not all of whom were well educated in Graeco-Roman philosophy, but rather were readers and teachers, accepted that their faith, which originated in the Scriptures, called for support from non-Scriptural metaphysical ideas (substance, being of one substance and eternal generation). The second important and historical contribution of Nicaea was the promulgation of the creed which reaffirmed and celebrated the authority of the faith declared in baptism. The Nicene Creed in its core-version issued at the Council was not unanimously accepted among Christians (Williams 2001: 71–81). It led to many decades of further ardent debates, vigorous scrutinies, expulsions of bishops, even persecutions and sufferings, if not martyrdom, on both sides of the debate. The Arians pushed towards the edges of the empire by the Catholics re-emerged with the invasion of the Goths who received this version of Christianity from Ulfilas, 'the bishop of Goths'. Ulfilas himself was consecrated as a Christian bishop by another supporter of Arius, Eusebius of Nicomedia (Meyendorff 1989: 23). It has to be pointed out that throughout this crisis it was Arius who represented the more traditional view on Christ. Before Nicaea, Christian theologies subordinated the Son to the divine Father in order to avoid any confusion that these two may be one divinity (modalism). At the same time, they highlighted the unique role of the Son as the mediator between (the apophatic) God and humanity. The Trinity (with still quite a vague idea of the Holy Spirit), as understood before Nicaea and after Nicaea, differed radically. Still, the Nicene expression of faith, which placed the Son on the same level of divinity as his Father and affirmed an exceptional way of the generation of the former, reached and crossed yet another doctrinal turning point. There was no way back from Nicaea, even if Arianism survived and flourished among the Goths, and much later surfaced in sixteenth century after the Reformation, for example, in Poland. The Nicene theological dogma would soon ask a fresh set of questions, this time about the co-existence of two natures (divine and human) in Christ and about the identity of the third person in the Christian notion of God: the Holy Spirit. These forthcoming fervent debates would be led by new generations of Christians who produced a new synthesis of Scriptural exegesis with a Neoplatonic outlook.

The way to Chalcedon

There is a famous oil painting by Rembrandt called The Anatomy Lesson of Dr Nicolaes Tulp (1632). This rather graphic picture presents a pale dead body of a man on a table surrounded by curious medics who watch with attention as Dr Tulp explains the musculature of the dead man's arm. In this picture, the attention given by the medics to the detail of the body is extremely well captured by the Dutch artist. This picture represents also some important aspects of the theological climate between the Council of Nicaea (325) and Chalcedon (451), where a number of theologians scrutinised various aspects of the humanity and divinity of Jesus Christ. Needless to say, nobody wanted to be heretical, while all the disputants held orthodoxy as the highest value. Apollinarius (c. 320–c. 390), the bishop of Laodicea (nota bene, the place known from the Book of Revelation, 3:15–22), in Asia Minor, was an old friend of Athanasius of Alexandria. He was not only in the pro-Nicene party, but was also acquainted with Graeco-Roman philosophy. His education is important as in his pastoral ministry he combined his Christian, exegetical approach to the Scriptures with his philosophical outlook. Apollinarius' zeal to promote pro-Nicene Christology (homoousion) led him to propose that the divine, eternal Logos (against Arius) became incarnate as a real human being, which according to his anthropology is made of the mind/soul and the body. Through incarnation, the divine Logos entered into human flesh; however, the Logos (here also the mind) replaced the human rational element with the divine one. Jesus of Nazareth, in that picture, was a divine man in his human flesh, however, with a divine mind which replaced his human reason/soul. Apollinarius, one of the most intelligent defenders of orthodoxy, reduced the humanity of the Saviour: Jesus' mind (being divine) was left outside incarnation. Apollinarius believed his own contribution advanced the pro-Nicene doctrine: the divinity of Christ was fully protected by the mind/soul, while his humanity remained fully acknowledged. In addition, Apollinarius' proposal provided an intelligent answer to another Christological dilemma: how a divine being such as Christ can be at the same time 'impassible' (not subject of change, increase or diminution as a divine being should be) and 'changeable' or vulnerable as all human beings are? Apollonarius' Christ was impassible because of his mind/soul, yet also fallible because of his body. Among Apollinarius' critics, the vital problem and error lay in his view of the incarnation: the lack of human mind/soul revealed the incompleteness of the incarnation and in consequence, the failure of salvation: the human mind/soul would not be redeemed.[11] At first, synods in Rome (374; 376/7) condemned Apollinarius' views, then ultimately the second ecumenical Council of Constantinople (381) marked his theology as heretical. The pro-Nicene apologist and his disciples ended up on the list of heretics.

Alongside various individual exegetical and philosophical efforts which aimed to enhance the pro-Nicene doctrine, two types of intellectual milieus began to produce rather different theological understandings of Christology and salvation. The Arian crisis originated in Alexandria, the city which had a long intellectual legacy of elaboration of the Scriptures in an allegorical way. That hermeneutical tradition went back to the illustrious Jewish philosopher and exegete, Philo of Alexandria (c. 20 BCE–c. 50 CE), and was applied to theology by Clement of Alexandria and then by Origen. It was centred on an allegorical (Gr. allegorein)[12] approach to the Scriptural narrative (Simonetti 1994: 5, 35–52). That allegorical tradition was identified with Alexandria and even received the too narrow name 'Alexandrian school'.[13] The emergence of an alternative method of interpretation, usually denoted as the 'Antiochene school', requires explanation. It was not an institutional organisation (i.e. a school) with one teacher and a group of disciples, but rather an association of scholars who shared a similar approach to exegesis and theology, which valued the literal and historical meaning of the Scriptural narrative. The opposition, Alexandrian versus Antiochene exegesis, was based on Antiochene attempts to bring balance to hyper-allegorical, esoteric commentaries of the Alexandrians (Young 2007: 182). Famous representatives of the Antiochene style included Diodore of Tarsus (d. c. 390), Theodore of Mopsuestia (c. 350–428), Thedoret of Cyrrhus (c. 393–c. 460) and John Chrysostom (c. 347–407). Within their spectrum of attraction and influence was yet another disciple, Nestorius (c. 351–d. c. 451). He would soon attract the attention of his opponents from the Alexandrian milieu. At this point it should be noted that the Antiochene Christology, analogically to their approach to the written text, began at a literal, historical level: Jesus' incarnation as a fully human being, with his experience of life, moral choices, even solidarity with all people. Christ was like one of us, although in the post-Nicene context he had two natures: human and divine. To illustrate earlier Alexandrian theology, again in its post-Nicene form, the same Christ revealed his divinity, his eternal existence as the divine Logos, that descending to our existence the Saviour brought salvation which was also the expression of the difference between himself and humanity. It is possible to imagine that both approaches with their difference in emphasis could coexist peacefully, and even at some stage complement each other. However, doctrinal development did not often value theological consensus; on the contrary, strong uneasy personalities ignited clashes which often turned into long crises, persecution and suffering, although such controversies also brought further crystallisation of the doctrine. Such was the case of Nestorius.

In the spring of 428, Nestorius, a monk from Antioch with an ascetic reputation and connection with Antiochene theologians, including John Chrysostom, the former bishop of Constantinople, was appointed as John's successor. Like orthodox Christians of his time, Nestorius believed that Christ had two natures: human (as Antiochene, he would put the stress on this one first) and divine. As these two natures could not be mixed, they existed in Christ, Nestorius believed, in a parallel way. The fragile human nature existed alongside the perfect divine. That harmonious viewpoint and orthodoxy in Nestorius' understanding was, however, disputed by some monks in Constantinople who were excited about the growing Marian devotion in which Mary was called 'God-bearer' (Gr. Theotokos). That controversial title (how can divinity have a human mother?) provoked Nestorius' response in the form of a sermon. With his ignited zeal to get rid of any heresy in Constantinople, Nestorius posed a highly inquisitive question: can Mary be the mother of that which was divine in Christ, or was she only the mother of that which was human in her Son (Gr. anthropotokos)? Accordingly to Nestorius' Christology, where the two natures were parallel and never reached any point of intersection (i.e. Apollinarius' theory), there could be only one answer, which reflected what he believed Christian orthodoxy to be: Mary was the mother of Jesus' humanity, not his divinity. The latter had its origin in God the Father. Again, as on many previous occasions (Arius, Apollinarius), now Nestorius could also find clear Scriptural references which would support that view. Jesus from the Scriptures had quite a clear idea of his divine origin (e.g. Luke 2:49) and Nestorius' coherent opinion was also convincing to some degree.[14] Nonetheless, his logic clashed with the devotion spread through Constantinople where even the emperor's sister, Pulcheria, herself a virgin regarding Mary as her personal patron, felt offended by Nestorius' sermon and conclusion. As the consternation in Constantinople reached other Christian centres, it is not surprising that the Patriarch of Alexandria, the city that was in an ongoing competition with Constantinople over its place in the ranking of the hierarchy of places in Christendom, responded vigorously to Nestorius' preaching. His reaction had also a political agenda. At the end of the same year, 428, Cyril of Alexandria (b. c. 375/80–d. 444) attacked Nestorius, having earlier informed the bishop of Rome (the pope), Celestine I (d. 432), about Nestorius' opinions. I have mentioned above Nestorius' difficult character; a similar note can be made about Cyril (Isidore of Pelusium, Ep. 1.310 in Stevenson 1989: 319). The Patriarch of Alexandria was a highly skilful leader of his church, a very strong character, but also an effective, pragmatic and determined politician. During his leadership, a local Neoplatonic philosopher, Hypathia, was murdered by a Christian mob and, although Cyril was probably not personally involved in that killing, his entourage, agents and supporters knew about the plot against her (Haas 1997: 313). As an Alexandrian theologian, Cyril was faithful to his own tradition with the now highly regarded authority of Saint Athanasius. For Cyril, the vital issue was in the unity of the divine Logos (before and after incarnation) and being born from Mary. He did not change: he was the Son of the divine Father. In brief, Mary was Theotokos; she gave birth to her Son, who was as one person, human and divine, and in consequence after incarnation his divinity could not be separated from his humanity. Cyril endorsed an Alexandrian theological notion of 'interchange of proprieties' (Lat. communicatio idiomatum), which attached the proprieties of one of Christ's natures (here: human, born of Mary) to the other (here: divine). Therefore, it was possible to argue that not only was the divine Christ born of Mary, but also the divine Logos died on the cross. In his astute approach to the conflict with Nestorius, Cyril sent a series of dogmatic letters to him demanding that the patriarch of Constantinople renounce his opinion and accept the correction proposed by the Patriarch of Alexandria. Nestorius rejected both the letters and Cyril's theology. The polemic and a different theological dispute reached the emperor Theodosius II, who called the third ecumenical Council in Ephesus (431). Under Cyril's leadership, the Council deposed Nestorius and proclaimed his teaching unorthodox. It also affirmed Mary's title Theotokos, pronouncing that she was the mother of Christ's divinity, not only his humanity.

Figure 32.3   Ephesus, the way from the theatre to the harbour. Photo Prof. Pawel Janiszewski

The whole debate between Cyril and Nestorius highlighted three important issues for Christian doctrine in the fifth century. First, in relation to Christology, it opened yet another level of enquiry about the unity of natures in Jesus Christ. The divine/eternal origin of Christ was now a part of orthodoxy; however, the correlation of both natures raised many questions. There was ongoing philosophical debate: how were the immaterial and material elements of human nature are correlated (i.e. the soul/mind and the body)? What was more complicated for Christian theologians, as the personhood of the Saviour is without analogy to any other beings, was that they were aware of Christ's uniqueness and the problem arising from that. At this point the previous, rather general, doctrinal statement of Nicaea was no longer sufficient. Cyril, while pondering this question, proposed that in Christ, his mind/spirit and body coexisted in an inexpressible way that goes beyond understanding, existing without confusion, without change and without alteration (Ludlow 2009: 202). The negative aspect of this statement is clearly noticeable; the exact nature of that union seems to be impenetrable to the human mind and faith. Second, this inquisitiveness had a very important impact on the understanding of salvation, the ancient axiom that through the incarnation salvation redeemed the whole of human nature; it asked for reaffirmation that all elements of the human being, independently of the philosophical system (body and soul; body, mind and spirit) were included in redemption. Third, the crisis caused by Nestorius' radical preaching not only caused a theological, equally radical, response, but by the fifth century fully involved ecclesiastical and secular politics of the empire. The outcome of the third ecumenical Council in Ephesus was not only the reaffirmation of the Nicene Creed, but the addition of further specification of two ways of being eternally 'begotten of the Father' and in the last days 'born of Mary', so called 'the Formula of Union' (Cyril, Ep. 39 in Stevenson 1989: 314). In consequence, Nestorius was removed from his episcopal see in Constantinople and exiled to Egypt, under Cyril's jurisdiction. However, he never changed his views.

The next and final stage in this debate drew yet another radical conclusion from the emerging orthodox theology. Eutyches (c. 378–454) entered the scene of doctrinal discussion as an archimandrite of a monastery at Constantinople. Eutyches wished to eradicate any sign of pro-Nestorian views about two parallel natures of Christ; however, he was not convinced about the truth of the 'Formula of Union'. His own reflection on Christ proposed radical opposition to Nestorius: there were not two natures in Christ, but one (Gr. Monos – 'one' and physis – 'nature'). Eutyches not only reduced two natures to one, which amalgamated two after the incarnation, but also challenged the highly careful notions used by Cyril in his account of the co-existence of Christ's soul/mind and body. His followers, labelled as 'Monophysites', well represented in the monastic milieu, aimed to gain acceptance of their views as orthodox at the 'Robber Synod' of Ephesus (449). As the current patriarch of Constantinople, Flavian (d. c. 449) recognised the danger of Eutyches' opinion and his strong position among the monks. He asked for help to support his case against the Monophysites from two other metropolises: Rome with its Bishop Leo, and Alexandria, with its patriarch Discoros (d. 454). They had already been informed about Eutyches' stance by himself; while Discoros found Eutyches' views acceptable, Leo in his letter to Flavian (known as the Tome of Leo) condemned Eutyches together with his new ally Discoros. This letter, not only political in its meaning but also highly important in its theology, would become one of the founding documents in the forthcoming council. It looked as if the eastern churches of the empire were again approaching yet another phase of doctrinal turmoil, and the highest authority of the Christian emperor was needed to find the way out by means of yet another council. The new emperor Marcian, who married Pulcherina (known from her opposition to Nestorius, and a previously devoted virgin who changed her mind and married Marcian), exiled Eutyches in 450. He also summoned the ecumenical Council at Chalcedon in 451 in order to correct the outcomes of the 'Robber Synod' (449). The renowned statement of Chalcedon endorsed the Nicene Creed together with the 'Formula of Union' and provided Christians with a refreshed insight into the mystery of Christ:
Figure 32.4   The third ecumenical Council, Ephesus, 431 CE; modern mosaic showing Cyril in the middle with Mary and the child; in the Basilica Notre-Dame de Fourvières, Lyon. Photo Wikimedia Commons; author Philippe Alès

> In agreement, therefore, with the holy fathers, we all unanimously teach that we should confess that our Lord Jesus Christ is one and the same Son, the same perfect in Godhead [against the Arians] and the same perfect in manhood [against Apollinarius], truly God [against the Arians] and truly man, the same of a rational soul and body [against Apollinarius], consubstantial [Gr. homoousios, against the Arians] with the Father in Godhead [against the Arians], and the same consubstantial with us in manhood, like us in all things [against Apollinarius] except sin; begotten from the Father before the ages as regards his Godhead, and in the last days, the same, [see, 'the Formula of Union'] because of us and because of our salvation begotten from the Virgin Mary the Theotokos [against Nestorius] as regards his manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, only-begotten, made known in two natures [against Eutyches] without confusion, without change, without division, without separation, the difference of the natures being by no means removed because of the union [against Eutyches], but the property of each nature being preserved and coalescing [Gr. syntrechousēs or 'comes together'] in one prosōpon and one hypostasis – not parted or divided into two prosōpa [persons], but one and the same Son, only-begotten, divine Word, the Lord Jesus Christ, as the prophets of old and Jesus Christ Himself have taught us about Him and the creed of our fathers has handed down.
>
> (Kelly 1977: 339–340, italics added)

As in the previous case of the Council of Nicaea, the gathering of the bishops in Chalcedon and this important doctrinal summary of the Christian (orthodox) faith did not end the debate on Christ's two natures. It produced even greater diversity among Christians, as some, such as the monks in Palestine (later their view was changed, Perrone 1980), Egypt (Copts) and Syria rejected the Chalcedonian definition. Yet again, theological confrontation produced martyrs on all sides of the dispute (Meyendorff 1989: 188–206). The shortcomings (e.g. Coakley 2002: 163) and the positive contribution of the Chalcedonian statement to the development of the Christian doctrine (Studer 1993: 218–219) still attracts the attention of modern scholars, confirming the irreplaceable status of the council not only during the Patristic period, but also in the ongoing debate on the Christian interpretation of Christ's uniqueness as both a human and divine being.

A more complex understanding of the incarnation and its consequences was not the only trajectory of the development of Christian discourse and orthodoxy. The structure of the Nicene Creed (325) shows that the main priority of this declaration is focused on the Son of God. The priority of the Father is reaffirmed in the first sentence, while the Holy Spirit occupies only half of one line of the creed. This disproportion illustrates the fact that at Nicaea the issue of Christ's origin and status (homoousios) attracted the full attention of all who took part in the debate. This debate already emphasised on the correct understanding of the term 'substance', or 'being as such' (Gr. ousia); however, since Origen's theological activity, there was yet another important term being discussed describing this time the individuality of a being (Gr. hypostasis). Origen started the tradition to apply the term hypostasis to each member of the Holy Trinity and, in pre-Nicene theology, these beings were in a specific order: the Son/hypostasis was subordinate to the Father/hypostasis, while the 'position' of the Spirit did not yet come into question.

The crucial problem after Nicaea in relation to the notion of the Holy Trinity was to reaffirm monotheism (one God) with the Christian revelation about the individuality of the Father, Son and the Spirit which would avoid an amalgam of all three into one divinity (modalism).[15] The greatest contribution to that clarification came from three theologians from Cappadocia (Asia Minor/ Turkey). They were: Basil (c. 329–379), his younger brother Gregory of Nyssa (c. 335–395), and Basil's friend Gregory of Nazianzus (329/30–389/90). Their theological erudition and sensitivity to various dangers in the language used about God allowed them built upon an already established pro-Nicene theology, especially in its Alexandrian tradition, as proposing a view of God's mystery which presented three divine persons (hypostases), while sharing one substance (i.e. divine way of existence/ousia).

In response to the theology of Macedonius' (d. c. 363) followers, who acknowledged the consubstantiality (Gr. homoousios) of the Son and the Father, while rejecting the sharing of the same substance by the Spirit, Basil argued, on the basis of the Scriptures, that the Holy Spirit also shared the same divine substance as the Spirit which performs the acts of salvation/illumination appropriate only to God (On the Holy Spirit, 9:22–23 in McGrath 2001: 182). In Basil's view, the activity of the Holy Spirit proclaimed in the Scriptures, liturgy (i.e. baptism), prayer and Christian tradition recognised the unity of the Spirit with the Son and the Father. Gregory of Nazianzus enhanced that vision and, as an exegete, pointed out the Johannine expression about the origin of the Spirit who, unlike the begotten Son, 'proceeds' from the Father (John 15:26 in Oration, 31.8–11, 14, 15; Bettenson 1984: 113–115). It now became clear that Jesus' origin as begotten of the Father and the Spirit's proceeding from the Father expressed two different ways in the Holy Trinity hinting at two different hypostases of the Son and the Spirit who share their divine substance (Gr. ousia) with the Father.

Gregory of Nyssa further advanced the theological language about the Trinity. First, he highlighted that the Spirit was indeed by nature divine (On the Holy Spirit 23:54). Second, Basil stressed the harmony within the Holy Trinity, meaning all divine actions are interconnected (i.e. all three persons were involved in the creation and redemption of the world), although they performed different roles. There was no confusion in their activity and the realisation of the divine plan of redemption. For that harmonious inter-dependence and coordinated activity (John 10:30; 14:11) Basil used a new theological term 'inter-dwelling' (Gr. perichoresis in On the Holy Spirit, 45), which would later find its enhancement with John of Damascus (c. 655–750). The creed announced in the second ecumenical Council of Constantinople (381), reinterpreted the earlier Nicene confession and endorsed the Trinitarian theology of the Cappadocian Fathers.

Away from the Greek-speaking theologians, an important contribution to the development of the doctrine of the Trinity came from the eminent Latin theologian, Augustine of Hippo (354–430). During twenty years of ongoing reflection, Augustine explored yet another aspect of that central Christian dogma. In his great dogmatic and spiritual oeuvre On the Trinity, Augustine took into consideration the Scriptural commandment to love God, aiming to provide his readers with a clear vision and understanding of God's mystery in order to strengthen their love. Looking into the human experience (love, being loved and the loving one), the common (philosophical) concept of a person (body, mind and spirit), he applied these limited concepts to the mystery of the Holy Trinity. Various expressions of that interconnection between three elements of human life prompted Augustine to carefully argue about their similarity to three divine persons, who were interconnected, could not be reduced to one nor considered as three, independent beings. Augustine's theology on many occasions embraced poetic images and human feelings; although his narrative was still logical, coherent and philosophical, the oeuvre appealed also to the human imagination, passion for being loved and giving love, as well as for better understanding of the Trinity (Ludlow 2009: 176–182; Williams 2009: 845–851). With contributions from both the Cappadocians and Augustine of Hippo, the Christian notion of the Holy Trinity received a vital intellectual and spiritual framework, which combined not only intellectual inquisitiveness but also spiritual magnitude which then inspired Christian liturgy and mysticism in the forthcoming centuries.

Doctrinal development: final observations

There were two main phases of development in the first five centuries. The first and early one was related to the gradual separation from Judaism. The second signified greater openness to various Graeco-Roman philosophical ideas and terminology which were absorbed to various degrees into Christian doctrine (Studer 1996: 305–333). The second phase also embraced the historical moment of the recognition of Christianity as a 'permitted religion' (Lat. religio licita). The religion of the Roman empire was shaped in the mode of the current political ideal: as one, true and united under one authority. Now the public, visual liturgy in either post-pagan buildings or newly built churches reflected splendour and majesty. Doctrinal development under either the scrutiny of pagan critics or in polemic with other (heretical) proposals produced a great number of theological models, which aimed to support the faith of the Universal Church of the empire. But Christianity also paid a significant price for its development. In the context of Christology, the dogma about 'the Word made flesh' significantly shifted the original, historical and Scriptural context of the Logos' incarnation into Jewish life and culture into a much more abstract, metaphysical and speculative notion of the two natures and their correlation as proclaimed by the Council of Chalcedon (451). The various aspects of reality of Jesus' life – his teaching and miracles, later his suffering, death and resurrection – all lost their original and crucial connection with the religious climate of his lifetime. In addition, this alteration in social and political context produced an apologetic genre directed against the Jews (Adversus Iudaeos). This literature not only shaped the imagination of Christians but also penetrated the style of exegesis and vision of redemption.

Second, the encounter with Graeco-Roman philosophy and its mindset stimulated a number of great debates and helped to define a whole range of theological dilemmas. Even if these new formulations used highly advanced metaphysical and anthropological concepts, they were not born in sterile academic minds and lecture-rooms. They reflected a new desire to know better what is 'true' and 'false' in the Christian understanding of salvation. They reaffirmed the original Christian intuition that salvation came to humanity exclusively through Jesus Christ. Synods and ecumenical councils aimed to express that original, true and unalterable doctrine against, in their view, heretical novelty and innovation (Price 2015: 410). None of the Church Fathers, and indeed their opponents, would enjoy the term 'development' of the Christian doctrine, but rather they would all agree that their proposal expressed what was believed from the beginning of Christianity. This intuition was spelled out by Vincent of Lérins (d. before 450) who proposed in his work (Commonitorium, 2.5 in Stevenson 1989: 322) that orthodoxy is a universal reception (Lat. ab omnibus), everywhere (Lat. ubique), and at all times (semper). Certainly, early Christian Apologists would see in his words the echo of their own belief. Synods and councils, as well as Catholic theologians, put great emphasis on their theological axiom: salvation embraced the fullness of human experience, except for sin: that is revolt against God. They also claimed that salvation is God's gift, not a mere human achievement. The second phase rooted Christian doctrine in a particular type of philosophy which dominated late Antiquity; it translated faith into the language of that Neoplatonic worldview (prioritised invisible over visible; eternal over temporal; spiritual over material) and within that outlook Christians, guided by the councils and dogmas, expressed their beliefs. Again, this process was natural as Christian believers of all stripes thought, argued, but also prayed in that Neoplatonic atmosphere.

Two more elements of the development of the Christian doctrine have to be pointed out at this concluding stage. First, the role of the Christian emperor and the connection between Christendom and empire must be noted. This connection not only provided Christians with freedom from persecution (Constantine the Great), but also allowed them to travel peacefully, to gather in appointed cities, even to sponsor the ecumenical councils. It led to a certain triumphalism: 'our view is the only view'. However, the relationship between the church (or church Fathers, Patriarchs and bishops) and the emperors was not an easy one. Some emperors' open promotion of Christian beliefs led to intolerance against their pagan subjects (e.g. Gratian 359–383); others, such as Theodosius I (347–395), tried to eradicate all forms of Christian heresy. Here doctrine and dogma served as an ideological tool to unite the subjects under one religion and faith. However, not all emperors were 'orthodox' (e.g. pro-Arian Constantius II 317–361; Valens 328–378), yet their powerful authority (Lat. Dominus, 'supreme Ruler/Lord', Aeternitas, 'perpetual/continuity' or Conservator generis humani, 'Preserver of the human race')[16] influenced the life of the church and its teaching. Second, this period witnessed many clashes between church leaders with power, zeal, vision, great faith but also personal pride and ambition. Those theologians, among them the Fathers, were also very canny and effective politicians. Their activity and influence contributed to the advancement of the doctrine on many occasions. In brief, the development of the Christian doctrine did not happen only as a necessary intellectual crystallisation under pressure from various challenges; on the contrary, it included many factors which, if recognised, help us to understand the complexity of that creative period. Was the Christian faith and doctrine more mature after Chalcedon than in the first century? Certainly it was expressed in completely different language for a radically different mentality and changed pastoral needs.

Dedication

For Dan and Christina.

Notes

1 I shall return to this notion in the final part of this essay: 'Doctrinal development: final observations'.
2 See Dunn 1991: 183–207.
3 In Paul's theology, the title kyrios highlights Jesus' exclusiveness and the unique nature of his mission. Paul's faith in God remained monotheistic.
4 More in Annewies Van den Hoek (1990: 179–194).
5 Nota bene, the issue of historical succession and the plain meaning of the Scriptures as two distinctive characterstics of the 'rule of faith' did not bother other Apologists, such as Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and Origen. They did not provide any references to the succession of their bishops, and prioritised even less the 'plain' meaning of Scriptures. Still, as I noted above, they value this concept.
6 See the 'Alexamenos Graffito', Figures 9.6 and 9.7 of Chapter 9 in this volume (and in Ferguson 2003: 597).
7 For the motif of Christianity as 'new and mischievous superstition' see Suetonius, Nero, 16.2.
8 My selection of these documents aims to show the spectrum of the various early Christian traditions, which referred to the baptism with the Trinitarian formula.
9 Not all synods defended what later became 'orthodoxy'. As we shall see later in this essay, some such as the 'Robber Synod' of Ephesus (449) promoted erroneous theology by the standards of orthodoxy.
10 Sabellius (third century): not much is known about his life, while his teaching, as described by his opponents, presented the Father, the Son and the Spirit as three 'ways/stages' of self-revelation of God ('modalism').
11 Gregory of Nazianzus reiterated the old Christian idiom (quod non assumptum–non sanatum): 'what is not assumed is not healed, what is united with God is saved'; see his Ep.101.7.32.
12 Allegorical reading was based on the assumption that literal reading, although providing an account, also points to another (hidden) meaning, or even more than one (e.g. moral, theological and mystical).
13 A number of Church Fathers who used the allegorical reading worked outside Alexandria, for example, Eusebius of Caesarea.

14 Although a more inquisitive reading of this proposal might suggest 'a split' within Christ: Mary would give birth only to the human Jesus.

15 See the earlier note 10.

16 Another title Pontifex Maximus was rejected by Gratian and Theodosius I.

Bibliography

Ashwin-Siejkowski, P. (2009) The Apostles' Creed. London: T&T Clark.

Ayres, L. (2004) Nicaea and its Legacy. An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Bettenson, H. (1984) The Later Christian Fathers. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Brock, S. P. (2004) 'Ephrem and the Syriac tradition', in Young, F., Ayres, L. and Louth, A. (eds) The Cambridge History of Early Christian Literature. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Coakley, S. (2002) 'What does Chalcedon solve and what does it not? Some reflections on the status and meaning of the Chalcedonian definition', in Davies, S. T., Kendall, G. and O'Collins, G. (eds) The Incarnation. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Dunn, J. D. G. (1991) The Partings of the Ways. Between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity. London and Philadelphia, PA: SCM Press/Trinity Press International.

Edwards, M. (2009) Catholicity and Heresy in the Early Church. Farnham, UK: Ashgate.

Ferguson, E. (2003) Backgrounds of Early Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publishing.

Goehring J. E. and Timbe, J. A. (2007) The World of Early Egyptian Christianity. Language, Literature, and Social Context. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Haas, C. (1997) Alexandria in Late Antiquity. Topography and Social Conflict. Baltimore, MD: The Johns Hopkins University Press.

Häkkinen, S. (2005) 'Ebionites', in Marjanen, A. and Luomanen, P. (eds) A Companion to Second-Century Christian 'Heretics'. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Hall, C. A. (1998) Reading Scriptures with the Church Fathers. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

Hill, C. E. (2004) The Johannine Corpus in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kelly, J. N. D (1952) Early Christian Creeds. London: Longman, Green and Co.

Kelly, J. N. D (1977) Early Christian Doctrines. 5th ed. London: Continuum.

King, L. K. (2008) 'Which Early Christianity?', in Ashbrook Harvey, S. and Hunter, D. G. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Ludlow, M. (2009) The Early Church. London and New York: I. B. Tauris.

McGrath, E. A. (2001) Christian Theology Reader. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Meyendorff, J. (1989) Imperial Unity and Christian Divisions. New York: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Moll, S. (2010) The Arch-Heretic Marcion. Tübingen, Germany: Mohn Siebeck.

Pelikan, J. (1971) The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600). Chicago, IL and London: University of Chicago Press.

Perrone, L. (1980) La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche: dal concilio di Efeso (431) al second concilio di Constantinopoli (553). Brescia, Italy: Paideia Editrice.

Price, R. (2015) 'Fathers and the church councils', in Perry, K. (ed.) The Wiley Blackwell Companion to Patristics. Oxford, UK: Wiley Blackwell.

Simonetti, M. (1994) Biblical Interpretation in the Early Church. An Historical Introduction to Patristic Exegesis. Trans. J. A. Hughes. Edinburgh, UK and New York: T&T Clark.

Stead, C. (1977) Divine Substance. Oxford, UK: Oxford Clarendon Press.

Stevenson, J. (1989) Creeds, Councils and Controversies. Documents Illustrating the History of the Church, AD 337–461. London: SPCK.

Stevenson, J. (1999) A New Eusebius. Documents Illustrating the History of the Church to AD 337. 7th ed. London: SPCK.

Studer, B. (1993) Trinity and Incarnation. The Faith of the Early Church, ed. A. Louth; trans. M. Westerhoff. London: T&T Clark.

Studer, B. (1996) 'Sapientia Veterum', in Di Bernardino, A. and Studer, B. (eds) History of Theology. The Patristic Period. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press.

Thomassen, E. (2010) 'Heracleon', in Rasimus, T. (ed.) The Legacy of John. Second-Century Reception of the Fourth Gospel. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Van den Hoek, A. (1990) 'How Alexandrian was Clement of Alexandria? Reflections on Clement and his Alexandrian background', Heythrop Journal (XXXI): 179–184.

Williams, R. (2001) Arius. London: SCM Press.

Williams, R. (2009) 'Trinitate, De', in Fitzgerald, A. D. (ed.) Augustine Through the Ages. An Encyclopedia. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans.

Young F. (2007) Biblical Exegesis and The Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

33

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

Oskar Skarsaune

Introductory remarks

A quite substantial part of Christian literature in the period covered in this volume is devoted to exposition of the Bible. In other words, the amount of material to be covered in the limited space of this chapter is enormous. It would be illusory even to think of attempting here anything like a complete, comprehensive survey of all biblical interpretation produced in our period.[1] Instead, a selective approach has been chosen. The material selected for treatment is thought to have representative value, so that through it some central currents in the development of biblical interpretation will become visible. An attempt is made to place early Christian interpretation of the Bible in its proper cultural context, which in the beginning was predominantly Hellenistic-Jewish, and gradually became more Hellenistic-pagan.

The Jewish context

The first believers in Jesus were Jews. To say this, of course, is to say the obvious. But it is also to say something of great significance for our theme. The first Christian interpreters of the Bible did not begin from scratch. They were Jews and therefore heirs to a rich tradition of reading the Bible, re-telling the Bible, translating the Bible, interpreting the Bible.

In the first century CE, this Jewish tradition of interpreting the Bible had already developed a rich variety of approaches, methods and concerns. In the land of Israel there was, and had been for a time, a proliferation of different 'schools', haireseis, as Josephus calls them; modern scholars call them parties or sects. Sadducees, Pharisees, Essenes and Zealots ('The Fourth Philosophy') are enumerated by Josephus, and modern scholars would like to add some more: the Qumran covenanters were certainly related to the Essenes in some way, but possibly not identical with them; priestly scribes might represent a non-sectarian Judaism different from all the above, perhaps there was also a distinct brand of Judaism in Galilee, etc. Many of these had their distinctive approach to the scriptures, different in methods as well as results. If we turn to the vast Jewish diaspora, the spectrum of different traditions of Bible exegesis was hardly less wide.

Not all of these traditions were of equal relevance as contexts for early Christian interpretations of the Bible. Some of them are almost completely unknown to us, so we cannot relate to them anyway. The Christ-movement originated in Jerusalem and the land of Israel, which means that 'Palestinian' traditions should probably be seen as most relevant during the very first decades after 30 CE.[2] There were no water-tight compartments, however, between the Jews of the Land and the Jews of the diaspora. When there are similarities between the Qumran covenanters by the Dead Sea on the one hand, and their contemporary compatriot Philo in Alexandria on the other, it indicates that Philo was not simply a highly original representative of a local Judaism at Alexandria, but that he also knew and used in his works traditions shared with the learned men in the land of Israel (Borgen 1997).

The biblical interpretation of Jesus and Paul could probably be better understood if we knew more than we do about the interpretations of the Pharisees of that period. Unfortunately we have few primary sources to the pre-70 Pharisees. Josephus got his Pharisaic education in that period, but all his writings were post-70, aimed at a gentile readership, and it is difficult to know how representative he was in his grand interpretative re-telling of the biblical story in Antiquitates. The biblical commentaries among the Dead Sea Scrolls are not Pharisaic, but may on occasion interact with Pharisaic exegesis, positively or negatively. Paul was definitely a pre-70 Pharisee, and traces of his Pharisaic schooling are evident in his letters.

Traditionally, many scholars have followed in the footsteps of Strack and Billerbeck (1926–61) in collecting 'parallels' to New Testament passages from the enormous post-70 corpus of rabbinic traditions in the Mishnah, the two Talmuds, and the rabbinic Midrashes and Targums. In recent scholarship the trend has been to understand this rabbinic material not as 'background' to early Christian texts, but rather as polemical responses to them.[3] This does not mean, however, that rabbinic interpretations of biblical texts are of no interest as comparative material when studying early Christian interpretation of scripture (Yuval 2010). Also, comparison with the Dead Sea Scrolls may indicate which traditions in the rabbinic corpus are in fact pre-70.

It is customary to subdivide rabbinic exegesis into two categories: halachic and haggadic. These terms are stock in trade in rabbinic literature, but are no doubt meaningful also with reference to pre-70 interpreters. The halacha is the sum total of the concrete, detailed rulings by which the interpreters of the Law tried to turn the Law of Moses into an exact code of law, and to supplement it where it said nothing concrete. In rabbinic tradition Hillel the Elder (flourished c. 20 BCE–15 CE) is credited with the formulation of 'seven rules' of interpretation. All of them are hermeneutical principles from Hellenistic forensic rhetoric and play a fundamental role in rabbinic halachic exegesis.[4] The basic aim of these exegetical principles is to derive exact rulings in specific cases from the rather general directives of the biblical Torah.

The attribution of these principles to Hillel may be legend, but the point is that many discussions about details as well as main principles in the Law between Jesus and the contemporary legal experts can often be clarified by reference to Hillel's rules (sometimes also by other principles not formulated by him, but frequently used in early rabbinical sources and the Qumran writings). Daube (1956) made several pioneering attempts at analysis along these lines. Recently Brewer (1992) has undertaken a detailed study of all pre-70 exegeses in rabbinic literature. He finds that they are all halachic, and that they all display the characteristics of this kind of exegesis, which he calls 'nomological'. He discerns five basic principles behind Hillel's and other rules of halachic interpretation: (1) scripture is totally self-consistent (there are no contradictions); (2) every detail in scripture is significant (there is no unnecessary redundancy; apparent repetitions have deeper significance); (3) scripture should be read according to its context; (4) scripture does not have a secondary meaning; (5) there is only one valid text form of scripture. In later rabbinic terminology this kind of exegesis would be called the peshat, the 'plain' meaning of the text.

It is not only material in the Gospels that may be elucidated in this context; also in Paul's letters one may often observe the same type of halachic reasoning – even in Paul's sometimes quite sophisticated arguments against the continued validity of the Law as a means of obtaining righteousness before God!

It should be emphasized that as far as our evidence goes, the author of the Gospel of Matthew is the last Christian author to whom this whole culture of detailed halachic exegesis is still familiar.

Very soon, the Christian idea that the Law was abrogated in Christ, or that it applied to the Jews exclusively, and not to gentiles, made the whole question of exactly how the Law should be practised quite irrelevant, at least for gentile members of the Christ-movement.

The appropriation and continuation of Jewish haggadic exegesis among early followers of Christ is to some extent a different story. It is hardly possible to make a comprehensive statement about the concerns and aims of haggadic exegesis. The term derives from the verb higgid, 'to tell, narrate', and haggadic exegesis is applied primarily to the narrative texts of scripture. Biblical narratives are scrutinized in search of halachic precedents, but also moral or theological lessons of a more general character. Sometimes clues are extracted from the texts which are thought to illuminate contemporary events and pressing dilemmas. Also with regard to eschatology and the portrait of the coming Messiah(s), haggadic exegesis often informed and enriched the eschatological projection of biblical models. A basic principle behind all this was formulated at a later period: 'As the first redeemer [Moses] – so the last [the Messiah]'.[5] Or, in more general terms: there is a correspondence between patterns of events and actors in the 'classic' history of redemption and in the end-time events.[6] As to exegetical techniques, this type of interpretation parts company with the halachic approach outlined above. In haggadic exegesis scripture is found to have one or more secondary meanings (of an allegorical type), and often variant readings of the consonantal text are preferred.[7] In later rabbinic tradition this exegesis would be called the derash (roughly: 'scrutiny') interpretation of the text.

It would far exceed the scope of the present chapter if we were to expound in any detail how this haggadic interpretation is put into practice in the different New Testament writings, and how rich a variety of exegetical techniques are employed.[8] Here it may suffice to say that many New Testament authors evince a great familiarity with haggadic details in the Jewish interpretative tradition, to which they allude explicitly or implicitly. One example is when Paul in 1 Cor. 10:4 says that the Israelites in the desert drank from the supernatural rock that followed them; he seems to presuppose the rabbinic interpretation of the scriptural doublette in the narratives of Exodus and Numbers: we hear of the same rock (from which Moses drew water) in two places, Exodus 17 (at Rephidim/Horeb) and Numbers 20 (at Kadesh). The rabbis concluded: 'The rock with water ascended with them to the mountain-tops and descended with them into the valleys; wherever Israel dwelled, the rock dwelled with them, opposite the entrance to the Tent of meeting'.[9]

In the same context, Paul states very clearly the principle of correspondence, the 'typical', model-like character of the classical history of salvation: 'These things are warning examples [Greek: typoi] for us . . . upon whom the end of the ages has come' (1 Cor. 10:6,11).

In this and other ways exegesis of the scriptures among first-century Christ-followers was deeply embedded in Jewish traditions. And this did not change overnight when we turn to the Christian interpreters of the second and third centuries. When we find that they, too, incorporate Jewish haggada in their own expositions – approvingly or as polemic counterpoints – it may often be observed that they cannot have learnt all this from the New Testament or other Christian sources from the first century. They seem rather to be in touch with developments within contemporary Jewish exegesis. In recent research, several scholars have found typically rabbinic haggadahs in the Church Fathers that have not been preserved in the rabbinic writings.

Again, one example: towards the end of the fifth book of Against Heresies, Irenaeus makes a summary of what he has shown in the preceding treatment. The prophets have all spoken about the blessings to be realized in the millennial kingdom of Christ, concretely upon earth. Regarding the eternal life following the millennium, no prophet saw that far: 'those [are the] things which neither the eye has seen, nor the ear has heard, nor have arisen within the heart of [any] man' – not even to any prophet's eye, ear or heart has this been revealed.[10] The scripture quoted here is Isa. 64:3, in the text form it has in 1 Cor. 2:9. For Irenaeus, this saying of scripture means that the prophets 'saw' the blessings of the earthly millennial kingdom of Christ, but not the subsequent life of the blessed in the world to come. This is all very different from the millenarian ideas of Revelation, and also very different from Justin's millenarian doctrine some decades earlier. It is quite parallel, however, to roughly contemporary sayings of leading rabbis. The rabbis by that time had begun to distinguish between 'the days of the Messiah' as an intermediate period before the final aeon of life eternal, the 'coming world'.[11] They disagreed as to what the prophets had spoken about: the days of the Messiah or the coming world. In the third century Rabbi Johanan stated his view in the following saying: 'All the prophets prophesied only in respect of the days of the Messiah; but as for the world to come, "No eye has seen – except you, O Lord – what he has prepared for those who wait for him"' [Isa. 64:3].[12] The structure in this eschatological model is strictly parallel to Irenaeus; so is the scriptural testimony chosen to 'prove' it. This parallelism is hardly accidental; it seems there was some kind of contact between eschatological thinking among the rabbis and Christian theologians.

Pesher interpretation

Before we conclude this section on Jewish contexts for early Christian interpretation, we should add a few remarks concerning one point. As is well known, we find in the New Testament a distinct kind of interpretation of prophetical oracles in which the interpretation is simply given through a reference to the event which is supposed to realize the prophecy: 'This happened so that what was said by the prophet should be fulfilled' (e.g. the fulfilment quotations in Matthew and John, and by implication in several of the speeches in Acts). The basic claim here is that the event corresponds to the prediction contained in the text; in other words, the text is a prophecy 'fulfilled' in the event. In making the event occur, God kept his promise contained in the prophecy. At the same time, the prophecy explains the meaning or significance of the event. The biblical text and the historical event interpret each other mutually.

This way of interpreting biblical texts was not new within Judaism. When revolutionary changes took place, when history seemed to take unforeseen twists and turns, Israelites would turn to the scriptures to find explanations and guidance in the new situation. Ultimately, they sought confirmation of their continued identity and legitimacy as God's elect people, still under his grace and favour.

The Qumran covenanters by the Dead Sea had to cope with shocking realities: their leader and founder had been rejected and persecuted by the ruling priestly leadership; the Temple was polluted by illegitimate sacrifices and festivals; they themselves were rejected and reduced to marginality within Jewish society; their interpretation of the Law was not recognized by the ruling leadership, etc. For all this, and more, they sought, and found, predictions and explanations in scripture. In so doing, they developed an interpretation they called the pesher of the text; pesher being an Aramaic term frequently used in the book of Daniel for the interpretation of dreams. In speaking about the pesher of the prophetical texts of the Bible, the Qumran covenanters indirectly characterized the prophetical texts as dreams or visions about their own time and circumstances, to be unriddled by inspired interpretation.[13] It seems a development took place: in the earlier Dead Sea texts, single pericopes (passages) from the Bible are given a pesher interpretation; later whole books are regarded as coherent visions about the (present) end-time, resulting in full-fledged pesher commentaries verse by verse.

Early Christian interpretations of prophetical texts have much in common, from a hermeneutical point of view, with the Qumran pesher. But they have a greater thematic unity because of their exclusive Christological focus, and at the same time a greater methodological variety with regard to exegetical techniques.

The distinctively Christian 'proof from prophecy'

The New Testament and the early Fathers

A convenient point of departure is to be found in Paul's kerygma summary in 1 Cor. 15:3–5:

   I delivered to you as of first importance what I also received, * that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures,

* that he was buried,
* that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures,
* and that he appeared to Cephas . . .

It was part of the primitive Christian kerygma, the primary proclamation of the faith, that the startling and unexpected aspects of Jesus' messianic career – his death by crucifixion and his resurrection – were in fact not contrary to, but in accordance with the scriptures.

No doubt they were contrary to Jewish expectations with regard to the Davidic Messiah (even if we make allowance for the great diversity in the messianic expectations of the period). Jewish expectations were based on current and widely accepted interpretations of the biblical texts understood to refer to the Messiah(s). The discrepancy between this biblically based picture of the career of the Messiah, and the actual career of Jesus, created the need for innovative interpretation of traditional messianic proof-texts, but also innovative selection of new texts which had formerly not been taken to refer to the Messiah. In Luke's gospel, this novelty of the Christian scriptural 'proof' of the Messiah's career is most vividly brought out on the journey to Emmaus in Luke 24: the risen Christ 'opened' the scriptures so that the disciples could see things in them they had never seen before:

> [The risen Jesus] opened their minds to understand the scriptures, and said to them, 'Thus it is written, > * that the Messiah should suffer > * and on the third day rise from the dead, > * and that repentance and forgiveness of sins should be preached in his name to all nations, beginning from Jerusalem'.
>
>
> (Luke 24:45–47)

The novelty was a suffering and risen Messiah gathering a new people of God beyond the boundaries of Israel, 'a people for his name from the gentiles' (Acts 15:14), a new people of God being saved by forgiveness of sins through faith in Jesus. In a masterpiece of condensation, Luke has in these few lines pointed out the startling novelties of the Christian kerygma, compared with traditional Jewish Messianism, and claimed that precisely these novelties had the full support of scripture.

In a now classic study, Arthur von Ungern-Sternberg[14] showed that this tradition of Christian 'proof from the scriptures'[15] developed with a remarkable degree of continuity and stability from the New Testament right until and inclusive of Eusebius of Caesarea at around 300 CE. To illustrate this continuity in the shortest possible way, we juxtapose here Justin's summary of his scriptural proof (c. 150 CE) and that of Irenaeus (c. 190 CE), which both continue the line of development begun by Paul's and Luke's summaries above:

> In the books of the Prophets we found Jesus our Christ foretold as > * coming to us born of a virgin, reaching manhood, curing every disease and ailment, raising the dead to life, > * being hated, unrecognized, and crucified, dying, > * rising from the dead, ascending into heaven . . .
>
> * and that he would send certain persons to every nation to make known these things, and that the gentiles rather [than the Jews] would believe in him.
>
> (Justin, 1. Apology 31.7)

The Church . . . has received from the apostles and their disciples this faith:

(1) in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth . . .

(2) and in one Christ Jesus the Son of God, who became incarnate for our salvation

(3) and in the Holy Spirit, who proclaimed through the prophets the dispensations of God and the advents [of the Messiah]:

* the birth from a virgin;
* and the passion;
* and the resurrection from the dead, and the ascension into heaven . . . of the beloved Christ Jesus, our Lord,
* and his [second] manifestation from heaven in the glory of the Father . . . to raise up anew all flesh of the whole human race . . .

(Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.10.1)

As the excerpt from Irenaeus makes evident, the development of a Christological 'proof from prophecy' is intimately linked with the crystallization of a Christological 'rule of truth' or 'rule of faith', which some decades later was incorporated in the second article of the Old Roman creed.[16] Much more is at stake here than a mere parallel development of two parts of the Christian tradition. The 'rule of faith' serves as the basic exegetical criterion for the development of the biblical 'proof from prophecy'. This is probably indicated already in a famous saying by Ignatius of Antioch at around 110 CE:

I heard some men saying, 'if I find it not in the charters, I do not believe in the gospel'. And when I said to them that it is in the scriptures, they answered me, 'that is exactly the question'. But to me the charters are Jesus Christ, the inviolable charter is his cross, and death, and resurrection, and the faith which is through him.

*(*To the Philadelphians 8.2)

It would seem that Ignatius' opponents required a full proof from prophecy for every point in his gospel proclamation. When he says that to him the 'archives' are Jesus Christ, his cross and resurrection, this does probably not mean that for Ignatius the Christological creed replaces the scriptures, but rather that the Christological rule of faith contains the hermeneutical canon according to which the scriptures should be interpreted.

This was no idiosyncrasy of Ignatius; it was to become the common conviction of ecclesiastical theologians. In her fine study of Christian biblical exegesis during the first five centuries, Frances M. Young (1997) has shown that interpreting the scriptures according to the 'rule of faith' was implicit in ecclesiastical exegesis before Irenaeus stated it explicitly, and that it remained operative in later exegetes, and can be shown to form the core of Athanasius' biblical case against the Arians (in the 320s–350s period). The one who interprets scripture apart from the Christology of the creed, says Athanasius, is not in touch with the 'mind' (dianoia) of scripture (Young 1997: 17–45).

Having stressed this aspect of basic continuity in the Christological reading of the scriptures, we have to add that there are also elements of development and change in this proof from prophecy tradition. We shall look at some of them.

From different Messiah to Jewish Messiah

We have seen that in the beginning (Paul's traditional kerygma in 1 Cor. 15) the focus of the Christological proof from the scriptures was the aspects of Jesus' career that were not part of traditional Jewish expectations. The same focus on scriptural 'proof' for things not expected about the Messiah seems to be present in the 'fulfilment quotations' in Matthew: He was born of a virgin, 1:23; already as a baby he had to flee to Egypt, 2:15; his birth resulted in a massacre, not peace, 2:18; he was called a Nazarene, 2:23; he lived and worked in 'the Galilee of the Gentiles', not Judea, 4:14–16; etc. One observes the same tendency in the fulfilment quotations in John and in the scriptural proof in the early speeches in Acts. The unexpected novelties, first and foremost the cross and the resurrection/ ascension, are at the very centre of the proof from prophecy.

In the latest strata of New Testament literature, and in the literature of the second century, we observe, however, an increased use of more traditional messianic proof-texts in the Christological proof. The Christian proof that Jesus is the Messiah in a way becomes 'more Jewish' and 'more complete'. In Justin traditional messianic proof-texts such as Gen. 49:10 (the famous Shilo oracle) and Num. 24:17 (the Star from Jacob – important for the Jewish Messiah Bar Kokhba) are given prominent position and extensive exposition (see Figure 33.1). What we observe is an amplification of the Christian proof-text dossier to include more of the traditional Jewish Messianism. We see Justin Martyr painting a strikingly Jewish portrait of Messiah Jesus and his task, applying to Jesus all the main messianic proof-texts which loom large in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the rabbinical writings – but not in the New Testament.[17]
Figure 33.1   Fulfilment of prophecy in early Christian art: fresco of the Virgin Mary with child and a prophet pointing to a star in the Catacomb of Priscilla, Rome, dated c. 220–250. Usually interpreted as an illustration to Num. 24:17. Tafel 22 in Wilpert 1903

This development is continued in some later Greek and Latin writers, like Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus and Eusebius,[18] but most of all in the Syriac fathers, like Aphrahat and Ephrem.[19] On the other hand, these fathers in many ways represent the culmination point of this development; in still later Greek and Latin fathers we observe again a greater distance from Jewish Messianism. This probably has to do with the increased importance of Logos Christology compared with Messiah Christology. Or in terms of the emerging creeds: the exegetical 'rule of faith' gradually shifts from an old Roman type of credal summary to the eastern–Nicene type.

From books to testimonies

In the New Testament writings there is normally a quite wide and also an even distribution of the scriptural quotations with regard to the different books of scripture. In other words, most New Testament authors have the biblical books at their fingertips and can choose apposite quotations freely, from a rich and thorough knowledge of the entire biblical text[20] – very much like the rabbis of rabbinical literature.[21] At the same time, however, a certain selection of favourite proof-texts is in the making – a kind of basic proof-texts dossier. In a now classic study of the 'sub-structure of New Testament theology', C. H. Dodd (1965) showed that these texts were not chosen at random, neither were they entirely severed from their biblical context. Instead, Dodd argued, certain scriptural passages of considerable length were found to be particularly relevant as foreshadowing the basic pattern in the New Testament events. When selected phrases from these text-units were quoted, the entire scriptural context of these greater units was called to mind, and other key passages from the same unit can often pop up in the same New Testament context. Long before the concepts of 'sub-text' or 'intertextuality' became fashionable, Dodd demonstrated the great relevance of this phenomenon.

Turning to the evidence of the second century, one observes that the process of forming a set dossier of proof-texts continued, and that the interpretative effort was concentrated more and more on this selection of Christian proof-texts.[22] Some scholars have speculated that this process had a concrete literary basis in a standard anthology (or anthologies) of scriptural proof-texts, a so-called 'testimony book'. The existence of one or more such books is difficult to prove, and the available evidence seems rather to indicate that later Christian writers in general borrowed scriptural quotations as well as exegetical comments on those quotations from earlier Christian writers.[23] In any case there is good reason to speak of a tradition of proof-texts (or 'testimonies') and appended interpretations; a tradition we can follow from writer to writer: from the Epistle of Barnabas through Justin, Melito, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Novatian and Cyprian. The quite characteristic feature of this tradition is the almost exclusive concentration on prophetical predictions of Jesus' career and the history of the Church – whether these predictions are found in (1) prophetic oracles, (2) legal practices, or (3) 'typical' events contained in scripture. One example from Justin of each of these may suffice to give the reader an idea of how this 'testimony approach' to scripture works.

The fulfilment of prophecy

Our example is Justin's interpretation of Gen. 49:10f, which he regards (as Jewish exegetes did) as a predictive oracle about the Messiah:

(A)   The [saying] 'He shall be the expectation of the nations'
(B)   shows that men of every nation will look forward to his coming again,
(C)   as you can clearly see and be convinced of by the facts . . .
(A)   The [saying] 'Binding his foal to the vine . . .
(B)   is a symbolic exhibition of the things that would happen to Christ . . .
(C)   for an ass's foal was standing at the entrance of a village . . .

(A) The 'washing his robe in the blood of the grape'

(B/C) was predictive of the passion which he was to suffer, cleansing by his blood those who believe on him. For the men who believe on him are what the divine Spirit through the prophet calls a garment . . .

(1. Apol. 32.4–8)

The scheme of this type of exegesis is simple and rather consistent: First (A) a portion of the oracle is quoted, next (B) the interpretation is given, then (C) it is pointed out how this fits some fact or aspect of Jesus' career. As one can see, in the interpretation it is often the case that words or phrases are taken to be figurative or metaphors; one might therefore call these interpretations allegorical. For example, the 'garment' of the Messiah is his community of believers. The purpose of these allegorical interpretations is not, however, to transfer the concrete realities of the prophetic oracle to the realm of abstract virtues or spiritual realities – as in Philo or Origen. It is rather to make the prophetical oracle 'match' its supposed 'fulfilment' concretely and in all details.

The closest parallel to this kind of exegesis occurs in the pesher interpretations in the Qumran scrolls. One random example:

(A) 'The lion went there, and the lioness, and the cubs, and there is no one who frightens them' [Nah. 2:12]. (B/C) The interpretation of this concerns the king Demetrius, King of Jawan, who craved to come to Jerusalem . . .

(4Q Pesher Nahum)

Types in the Law

An example of 'testimony' interpretation of a commandment in the Law, is the following about the paschal lamb:

The mystery of the lamb which God has ordered you to sacrifice as the Passover was a type of Christ, with whose blood the believers . . . anoint their houses, that is, themselves . . . And that lamb you were ordered to roast whole was a symbol of Christ's suffering on the cross. The lamb, while being roasted, resembles the figure of the cross, for one spit is pierced from the lower parts to the head, and one at the back, to which the legs are fastened.

(Dialogue with Trypho 40:1–3)[24]

As one can easily observe, this is very similar to the typological interpretation of narrative texts that we are to consider next. Legal commandments, when performed, are also about events.

The same typology of Christ as the paschal lamb is developed from the same biblical text, Exodus 12, by Melito of Sardis, but he treats Exodus 12 as a narrative, not Law. He also develops a 'theory' of why God directs salvation history so as to make typological reading of the biblical events possible:

What is said and done is nothing . . . without a comparison and preliminary sketch . . . This is just what happens in the case of a preliminary structure: it does not arise as a finished work, but because of what is going to be visible through its image acting as a model. For this reason a preliminary sketch is made of the future thing out of wax or of clay or of wood, in order that what will soon arise taller in height, and stronger in power, and beautiful in form, and rich in its construction, may be seen through a small and perishable sketch.

(Melito, Peri Pascha 35f)[25]

Types in narratives

The following is a typical example of Justin's typological reading of scriptural narratives:

> Righteous Noah [with his family] . . . at the Flood . . . eight persons in number, were a symbol of the number of the eighth day, on which our Christ appeared risen from the dead, a day which is however always first in power. For Christ, the first-born of all creation, also became the beginning of a new race, a race regenerated by him through water and faith and wood which contains the mystery of the cross, the same way as Noah was saved by wood as he rode on the waves with his family.
>
> (Dial. 138.1f)

It is debatable whether 'allegorical reading' is the best characterization of this kind of interpretation. Justin is not primarily concerned with single metaphors in the text, which he then transfers one by one to the spiritual realm. He is rather concerned with the total 'picture' presented in the narrative, centred around the 'wood' and 'water' as the pictures of the cross and baptism. To use Frances M. Young's terminology, Justin is exploiting the 'iconic' dimensions of the text.[26]

Having studied these examples of the 'proof from prophecy' or 'testimony' approach to scripture, it is easy to see that this type of interpretation was best suited to single, isolated 'oracles' and 'types'. Scripture is considered as a store-house of such oracles, an inexhaustible source of prophetical predictions. But they are treated one by one, not as part of a continuous, coherent textual whole, such as a biblical book. This exegetical approach almost never resulted in full-fledged verse by verse commentaries on entire biblical books.[27]

The exception comes in one of the last representatives of this tradition, Hippolytus, who wrote commentaries on Daniel and the Song of Songs. But these represent the same hermeneutics as in the old 'testimony' approach: the whole text of Daniel or Song of Songs is regarded as a continuous series of predictive types or oracles, fulfilled in the story of Jesus and the Church.[28]

Figure 33.2 Photo of the front of the copy of the Junius Bassus sarcophagus in the Vatican. Photo Reidar Hvalvik

Typological interpretation of the Old Testament was not only restricted to the pages of theological works but also found its way into Christian art. A good example is the Junius Bassus sarcophagus from 359 CE (see Figure 33.2).

The five pictures in the lower register are in different ways types or imitations of those in the upper register (see Malbon 1990). The scenes depicted are the following:

Abraham 'sacrificing' Isaac	Peter's arrest	Christ enthroned	Christ's arrest	Pilates' judgment
Job's distress	Adam and Eve	Triumphant entry	Daniel 6	Paul's arrest

The proof from prophecy in changing contexts

It almost goes without saying that the intense concern in this tradition of legitimizing Jesus as the Messiah and the Church as the end-time Israel, must be understood within a Jewish framework. Jewish culture, Jewish questions, Jewish opposition is the constant backdrop to this tradition, not only in its early formative period, but also later. In this tradition we see an important part of early Christian self-definition, first within, later vis-à-vis Judaism. In the beginning, the startling novelties of the Christian kerygma are legitimized from the highest Jewish authority, the scriptures. Later, Jesus is legitimized as also fulfilling the more traditional expectations attached to the Jewish Messiah. And the Church of Jews and gentiles is legitimized as the end-time people of God, predicted by all the prophets.

But through the second and third centuries CE, this tradition also acquired secondary functions vis-à-vis the non-Jewish environment, which increasingly became the most important environment of the early Church. First, the fact of prophetical announcement of the gospel events centuries before they happened was a powerful apologetic argument against the main 'flaw' of the Christian kerygma: its newness or lateness. Second, the fact of prediction secured the reliability of the gospel record and the truly divine nature of Jesus. Justin takes advantage of the proof from prophecy in both respects in his First Apology to a gentile audience:

> So that nobody should argue against us: 'What excludes [the view] that this man whom you call Christ was a man of merely human origin, and that he did these miracles you speak of by magic art, and so appeared only to be God's son?' – we will bring forward our proofs. We do not trust in hearsay, but must of necessity believe those who prophesied [what happened to Christ] before it came to pass. We see that things have happened and still do happen exactly as was predicted. This will, I think, be the greatest and surest proof for you [gentiles] too . . . [The career of Christ] was prophesied over five thousand years before he appeared, then three thousand, and two thousand, and again one thousand, and once more eight hundred [years before]. For there were new prophets time and again as the generations passed.
>
> (1. Apol. 30:1 and 31:8)[29]

By appropriating, through the 'proof from prophecy', the entire Bible as their own, Christians became heirs to the Jewish apologetic motif of the greater antiquity of Moses compared with Homer and the other wise men of old in Hellenism.[30] In Theophilus of Antioch, this proof of the greater antiquity of the biblical authors receives extended treatment in the third book of Against Autolycus.

But there was a third argumentative setting in which the 'proof from prophecy' was re-used in perhaps the most important secondary function. In the debate with Marcion and the Gnostics in the second century CE, one finds an extensive use of the proof-text tradition. Marcion and the Gnostics agreed on one crucial point: the creator God of the Jewish Bible was not identical with the Father, the highest God, from whom Jesus Christ was sent. In addition to that, Marcion agreed with Judaism on another point: Jesus was not the Messiah promised in the Old Testament. Therefore, the traditional Christian 'proof from prophecy' had to be repeated and strengthened in debate with Marcion. One observes this most vividly in Tertullian: large portions of his Adversus Ioudaeos recur almost word by word in Adversus Marcionem.[31] A similar mechanism is at work in Irenaeus in his debate with the Gnostics.[32] Gnostics generally showed little or no interest in messianic prophecies, and – like Marcion – denied the father-son relationship between Christ and the creator God of the Old Testament. In order to combat this, Irenaeus once again marshals the proof-text tradition. But the 'direction' of the proof has been reversed. While discussing with Jews, one could take the authority of the Old Testament for granted, while the fulfilment of the Old Testament prophecies in Jesus and the Church were the objects of proof. In debate with Gnostics, it was the other way round: the authority of Jesus as the revealer of truth was uncontested. The very possibility, however, of proving that Jesus had been predicted by the prophets, and that therefore the Old Testament was a revelation given by His Father, was the best possible vindication of the authority and the divine origin of the Old Testament.

In this way, the proof-text tradition is developed and modified in different settings, and also became a cherished piece of supporting argument in internal Christian instruction, as in Irenaeus' Proof of the Apostolic Preaching, or Novatian's De trinitate.

Biblical interpretation: from the scriptures to two testaments

In the tradition of scriptural interpretation we have reviewed so far, the Christian scriptures are the same as the Jewish scriptures in Greek, although Christians from Melito of Sardis onwards gave them a new name: the books of the Old Covenant / Testament.[33] The scriptures in their entirety were understood primarily as prophetical, they predicted the salvific events that had happened with and through Jesus. As prophetical they were also inspired, the two concepts of prophecy and inspiration through the Spirit were nearly identical in early Christianity (as they were in much of contemporary Judaism). The New Testament writings were partly the simple report on the fulfilment of the scriptures: the Gospel narratives. Partly they were lessons on how to read and interpret the scriptures – this is the way Justin uses Paul's letters. For Justin, the most important material in Romans, for example, is the scriptural quotations of the epistle!

This means: in the 'proof from prophecy' type of interpretation, it is only the Old Testament which is the object of exegesis, not the New Testament writings. The New Testament writings are considered clear and straightforward; they only need to be read and heard; it is the Old Testament which is the scripture in need of interpretation.

This does not mean that the New Testament writings were not accorded high authority before they became the object of explicitly exegetical endeavours. It rather means that texts are seldom subjected to explicitly exegetical procedures until they are perceived as enigmatic, or their interpretation has become controversial. The latter happened to New Testament works primarily in the debate with Marcion and Gnosticism during the second century. This does not mean there was no implicit interpretation of New Testament texts before that time. It means, however, that all interpretative activity was expressed indirectly, through the practical and theoretical application the New Testament texts received. In an early writing like 1 Clement, this is true not only in relation to the rich use of New Testament texts and allusions, it is also to a great extent true of the even richer use of Old Testament texts and examples. There is little if any explicit exegesis of any scriptural texts in this epistle, which quotes and alludes so frequently to both Testaments. The scriptural interpretation is expressed indirectly, through the use that is made of the scriptural and New Testament material.[34]

It is only when we come to the anti-Gnostic or anti-Marcion polemicists of the second century that we encounter for the first time explicit discussions of the meaning and import of New Testament passages.[35] Marcion had confronted the ecclesiastical tradition with a formidable exegetical challenge, indirectly through his 'purged' version of the Gospel text and the text of the (ten) Pauline letters, directly through his highly polemical 'Antitheses'. Very likely Justin was the first to confront him on any broader basis, but his book against Marcion has been lost, and it is Irenaeus' and Tertullian's works that have come down to us. In both writers, we observe the effort to refute Marcion from that part of the New Testament text which he recognized as authentic, be it the 'purged' Gospel or the letters of Paul. Especially with regard to the Pauline letters, we see here the very beginnings of the long and complicated history of interpretation of the Pauline corpus. There were sayings in Paul which were not easily squared with the ecclesiastical rule of faith. How, for example, are we to reconcile the 'resurrection of the flesh' with Paul's saying that 'flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God' (1 Cor. 15:50). This was an issue vis-à-vis the Gnostics also.[36] And with regard to Marcion, there was the additional challenge of proving that the twelve Apostles were in agreement with Paul.

As Hans Von Campenhausen has pointed out, the latter challenge made Irenaeus a pioneer of 'redactional criticism' with regard to the Gospels of Matthew and John (1968: 224–230). Irenaeus needed sources from which to document the authentic theology of the Twelve Apostles. For Peter he used his speeches in Acts, for John he used the Gospel of John and for Matthew he used the Gospel of Matthew. In other words: Irenaeus did not use these Gospels in the ordinary way, as sources to Jesus' doctrine, but as sources to the theology of the evangelists!

Just as was the case with the exegesis of the Old Testament, the object of this New Testament interpretation was to demonstrate the agreement between the doctrine of Jesus and the Apostles on the one hand, and the ecclesiastical rule of faith/truth on the other. Because the dominant thrust of Gnostic exegesis, as well with regard to the words of Jesus as to the sayings of Paul, was to take them in a highly spiritualized vein, the thrust of Irenaeus and Tertullian is rather for literal and 'plain' reading of the texts. In rebutting fanciful Gnostic interpretations, the two fathers often evince plain exegetical common sense, and the modern exegete may on occasion feel there is little difference between their way of reasoning and his/her own.[37]

In one respect the New Testament exegesis of these fathers is strikingly similar to their treatment of the Old Testament: they only treat single questions and single controversial texts. They never write a commentary on any New Testament book – as far as we know. Neither do Hippolytus, Cyprian, Novatian, with the same proviso.

We only mention this to bring out the almost complete contrast, and the feeling one has of entering a completely different world, when one turns to the vast exegetical corpus of Origen of Alexandria – the subject of our next section.

Scripture as platonic allegory: the Alexandrian tradition[38]

In Hellenism in general, there was a literary canon which was basic to all education and which played the role of a 'scripture' common to all: Homer's Iliad and Odyssey. With this almost sacred canon as text, children in elementary school learnt their grammar, and in more advanced studies learnt the rules of rhetoric and allegorical interpretation. The necessity and the justification of interpreting Homer allegorically had to do with the theories of the leading school of philosophy at the time: the Middle Platonists. Plato had rejected the myths of Homer altogether; they told stories completely unworthy of the gods, and were removed by two steps of imitation from the divine reality they purported to portray. Instead, the 'theology' of the ideal republic should always be true to the nature of the divine reality (Republic 379A). This complete rejection of Homer was not accepted by the rival Stoic philosophy; instead, the Stoic philosophers 'saved' Homer by regarding him as a divinely inspired author who had dressed 'true' (or 'natural') theology in allegorical garb. His texts were philosophical enigmas to be unriddled by the interpreter. In Middle Platonism – itself an amalgam of the Platonic and Stoic traditions – this approach to the Homeric myths was developed further, and through the influence of the dominant Middle Platonic school this was made part of the common curriculum and common learning in the more advanced levels of classical education.[39]

Speaking of the Jewish and Christian adoption of this kind of literary and scholarly culture, we are by far best informed with regard to Alexandria. Here we meet a Jewish Middle Platonist, Philo, who adopts the allegorical exegesis of the Middle Platonic school, but applies it to the Torah of Moses.[40] Here we meet two Christian Middle Platonists, Clement and Origen, who in turn adopt large quantities of the allegorical exegesis of Philo, but then also develop their own Christian variety along the same hermeneutical lines. It all results in something qualitatively new in the history of Christian biblical interpretation.

For the sake of brevity, we shall concentrate on Origen in the following presentation of the Alexandrian approach (see Chapter 47 of this volume for a profile of Origen). He was the one who was to influence ecclesiastical interpretation of the Bible in the east and west for a very long time.[41]

Basic to the Platonic worldview was the conviction that the invisible world of intelligible ideas is more real than the visible world of sensible objects, and that the latter contains images, copies, of the former. The contrast of the visible versus the invisible world is so to speak found on a 'vertical' scale of value: the timeless hierarchy of different levels of being.

In early Christian writings we also find a similar contrast between what is seen and what is not seen, and the latter usually ranges over the former. But the reason for not being seen is partly different: the most valuable things are not seen yet, but will be exposed to sight in the end-time. The scale of value is so to speak horizontal, oriented along the time axis. The unseen things are the eschatological realities not yet revealed.

The contrast to the Platonic scheme is not absolute: in the here and now the eschatological things are so to speak stored in heaven, they are 'above'. But they are not to remain timelessly there, and one is not to bring oneself near to them by making a heavenly ascent of the intellect, as in Plato. God will bring heavenly things to earth in the end-time. Thus the Epistle to the Hebrews is more 'biblical' than Platonic when it states that 'faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not [yet] seen (11:1)'.

In Origen, this 'horizontal' or eschatological dimension of the invisible world is by no means absent. He shares a lot of the typological and prophetical exegesis of the Old Testament we have found in his predecessors.[42] But at the same time it is true that in Origen the 'vertical' dimension of the Platonic worldview tends to take first place in his theology as well as in his exegesis. This is clearly to be seen in his hermeneutical treatise on the principles of Christian exegesis in On First Principles, Book 4, as well as in his own exegetical practice in his innumerable commentaries and homilies.

One random example may illustrate the main points: In his homilies on Genesis, Origen comes to Gen. 26:15–33 on the numerous wells cleared by Isaac.[43] They had been dug in the days of Abraham, but the Philistines had filled them with earth; Isaac and his servants now clear them of the earth and find they still contain water. The deeper meaning of this, Origen explains, is that in the days of old the servants of Abraham, that is Moses and the other biblical authors, had dug the deep and water-producing wells of scriptural revelation. In order, however, to drink of this water, one has to read the scriptures spiritually. This the Philistines, that is, the Jewish scribes and Pharisees, did not. Neither did they allow others to do so: they hated the spiritual water of scripture and put earth in the wells. They 'put an earthly and fleshly interpretation on the Law and close up the spiritual and mystical interpretation so that neither do they themselves drink nor do they permit others to drink'. But Isaac, that is Christ, clears the wells; and not only Isaac himself – his servants the Apostles also. And they not only clear the old wells; they dig new ones: the New Testament books. These wells also the Jews try to fill with earth, i.e. interpret in a fleshly way.

> But also each of us who serves the word of God digs wells and seeks 'living water', from which he may renew his hearers. If, therefore, I too shall begin to discuss the words of the ancients and to seek in them a spiritual meaning, if I shall have attempted to remove the veil of the Law and to show that the things which have been written are allegorical, I am, indeed, digging wells. But immediately the friends of the letter will stir up malicious charges against me and will lie in ambush for me.
>
> (Homilies on Genesis 13)[44]

Here we encounter many of Origen's basic exegetical principles. First, there is a prophetical dimension to the Old Testament text: Isaac and the events experienced by him point forward to Christ and his disciples. In fact, Origen is a master of this kind of typological interpretation. He takes Old Testament events, persons or institutions to prefigure Christ or the Church; and events in the life of Christ or the Church to prefigure the eschatological events; often one and the same event is seen to have analogies on all the four levels: Old Testament prefiguration; life of Jesus; life of the Church; eschatological realization.

But pointing out these correspondences is only the first step in Origen's exegesis; it is not his final aim. Once the correspondence is established, it turns out that basically the same lesson is to be learnt from the Old Testament story and its New Testament counterpart: that lesson is the superiority of spiritual, allegorical exegesis of scriptural stories, because only this exegesis brings out the spiritual lessons that help the soul in its ethical and mystical ascent towards God. This spiritual, allegorical exegesis is valid for texts from both Testaments indiscriminately. This second step of allegorical interpretation – 'digging the well' – is 'vertically' oriented, it is part of a spiritual ascension to heavenly realms.[45] It is not oriented along the time-line, it is not of the prophecy-fulfilment type, it does not discriminate between predictive texts in the Old Testament and fulfilment reports in the New.

The literal, historical meaning of the biblical text, the story it is about, corresponds to the visible realities in the Platonic worldview. The spiritual meaning of the text corresponds to the Platonic invisible world of intelligibles, the world of ideas. But how does Origen know that the biblical texts in both Testaments are to be interpreted in this double way, literally and allegorically? He tries to substantiate this with biblical texts which – when allegorically interpreted – seem to support such an idea. But his basic argument is this: God has placed in scripture some texts which are clearly 'unworthy of God' or simply illogical when taken literally. They have an allegorical sense only. The necessity of allegorical exegesis in these cases is a proof that allegorical exegesis is legitimate for each and every text of scripture.

Origen is plainly aware that in this argument he is making the same case as the allegorists of Homer. They, too, saw the need for allegorical interpretation in the embarrassing fact that, taken literally, the Homeric poems contained very much that was 'unworthy of God'. And it is interesting that, like the Homeric allegorists, Origen is aware that this way of interpreting texts is by no means uncontroversial.[46] There are those who reject allegorical exegesis altogether. Origen calls them 'carnal', 'simple-minded' and 'Jewish', and insinuates time and again – as in our example – that the masters and instigators of carnal exegesis are the Jews. Christian literalists are, perhaps without knowing it, making common cause with the Jews.[47]

Origen has, in the example we have been studying, a revealing aside which shows that he is fully aware of the Stoic-Platonic origins of his allegorical method:

> If anyone who has a secular education should now hear me preaching, he is perhaps saying: 'The things you are saying belong to us, and is the learning of our science. This very eloquence with which you discuss and teach is ours'. And, like some Philistine, he stirs up quarrels with me saying: 'You dug a well in my soil'.[48]

It is relevant to notice that in the older Christian exegetes of the 'proof from prophecy' tradition, we encounter no similar awareness that their method was controversial, or of foreign origin. Justin has no quarrel with Trypho about his interpretative techniques, only about his exegetical results. Origen, on the other hand, has frequent apologetic remarks on his method. He is painfully aware that it is not uncontested. In Justin's days, Christian exegesis was, culturally speaking, of a 'normal' Jewish type, and therefore uncontroversial with regard to its techniques. In Origen's days, Philo's allegorism had long been extinct among the Jews Origen knew, and they and some Christians accused him of interpreting scripture with a pagan method developed for interpreting pagan myths – an accusation also made by pagans themselves, as in the above quotation.

Finally, we learn from the example of Isaac's wells and their allegorical import that Origen's technique allows for continuous commentary on the scriptural texts as a whole, book by book, verse by verse. Origen is the first ecclesiastical writer, as far as the evidence goes, to write complete commentaries on biblical books, and as we have seen already his basic hermeneutical principle would make him write the same sort of commentaries on the books of both Testaments.[49] The aim of Origen's commentaries was to bring out the spiritual sense that each and every phrase of scripture, Old and New Testament, contained.

It remains to be added that Origen, as he himself was aware (as noted above), was the first Christian exegete to employ the full arsenal of antique scholarship in the field of interpretation. He carefully took all the steps required of a professional interpreter: establishing the original text, analysing the realia of the text, explaining the names of places and persons, analysing the figures of speech and the rhetorical patterns in the text, etc.[50] This careful attention to the literal meaning, the historia of the text, its 'flesh', was not in contradiction with Origen's search for the spiritual meaning: if the concrete 'flesh' is an image of heavenly realities, each and every detail in the image is significant.

In all this Origen set a new standard of Christian biblical scholarship, and through his enormous output of commentaries and homilies left a legacy which more or less all Christian interpreters of the Bible after him interacted with, in some way or other.[51] Origen marks a high point in the field of scholarship, a high point in spiritual reading of the Bible, and also a high point in 'Hellenizing' the Christian approach to the Bible. As we have seen, the latter fact made him and his exegesis somewhat controversial already during his lifetime, and it was to remain so for a long time. But even those who opposed him in no uncertain terms, remained deeply indebted to him in their own exegetical practice, even if they tried to conceal the fact.

We see this most clearly in the greatest biblical scholar of the west, Jerome (who is profiled in Chapter 56 of this volume).[52] His history with regard to Origen was dramatic: from enthusiastic admiration in his early years to bitter animosity in his later. But even in his later years, Origen remained his (often unrecognized) mentor and tutor, in questions of textual criticism as well as exegesis.[53] When Jerome sides with Origen's opponents in later Greek exegesis – the Antiochenes (see next section) – he nevertheless incorporates many of Origen's ideas on the 'spiritual' meaning of the texts, as in his Jeremiah commentary (his last work). And when Jerome boasts of knowledge he has got from his 'Hebrew' mentor, it is sometimes really Origen he is quoting, or rather Origen's report of what he had learnt from his Hebrew mentor!

Apart from Jerome, Ambrose (profiled in Chapter 57 of this volume) and Hilary are the main channels of Origenistic allegorism in the west.[54]

Allegory or theoria? The Antiochene school[55]

As we have seen already, allegorical exegesis in general, and Origen's in particular, was by no means uncontested in its own time. The most well-known ecclesiastical opposition to Origen is not the 'simple ones' he complains about himself, but a whole group of highly skilled exegetes of the late fourth and early fifth centuries, who all had their education in Syrian Antioch. The following are reckoned as the first members of this school: Diodore of Tarsus; Theodore of Mopsuestia;

John Chrysostom (profiled in Chapter 54 of this volume); and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (its later members had to move east, and continued their work in Edessa and further east).

Diodore of Tarsus can to some extent to be regarded as the founder of the Antiochene approach. Most of his writings are lost (he was later branded a heretic); but an interesting preface from his commentary on the Psalms has come down to us, and it is from this preface we are going to present some of the points made by the Antiochenes.

Diodore is openly hostile towards what he calls 'allegory':

> Those who pretend to 'improve' scripture and who are wise in their own conceit have introduced allegory because they are careless about the historical substance, or they simply abuse it. They follow not the apostle's intention [in Gal 4:28 when he uses the term allegory] but their own vain imagination, forcing the reader to take one thing for another [= Diodore's definition of allegory]. Thus they read 'demon' for abyss, 'devil' for dragon, and so on. I stop here so that I will not be compelled to talk foolishly myself in order to refute foolishness.[56]

Many scholars have felt compelled to take this at face value and to conclude that the Antiochenes rejected allegory altogether, and instead stuck to the literal meaning of the text, the historia. But Diodore himself speaks about a 'higher' meaning to be discerned through and above the literal; he calls it theoria. Some scholars have tried to identify this Antiochene theoria with the typological exegesis of the older 'proof from prophecy' tradition, so that theoria could be translated typology.[57] But this seems not to be a precise description of the intention of the 'theoretical' approach advocated by the Antiochenes. Diodore is not thinking in the terms of prediction-fulfilment; he is rather thinking in the following terms: the Psalms were worded by their authors in such a way that in their original setting some of their phrases had to be taken figuratively, as metaphors, because they contained a 'surplus' of meaning in that situation. But later in salvation history, the Psalms can be shown not only to remain relevant in new situations, but even to become more relevant, so that what was figurative in their original setting, can be taken quite literally in the New Testament setting. With other texts, much the same is true. A figurative reading of the Cain and Abel story can be shown to be very relevant for the Synagogue/Church conflict. But this higher sense, the theoria, should never be allowed to replace the literal historia of the text: in that case allegory would result. Allegory discards historia altogether.

'Despite Theodore [of Mopsuestia's] ingenious effort to dissociate theoria from allegory, the difference is not as clear as one might wish' (Froehlich 1984: 22). This is no doubt true; Frances Young has tried to distinguish between the Alexandrine and the Antiochene approach partly by pointing to different Hellenistic backgrounds, partly by emphasizing subtle differences of approach resulting from this. She thinks that the Alexandrines, Origen in particular, were heavily dependent upon the philosophical kind of allegory. One of its characteristics was a close attention to crucial concepts in the text; these key concepts were the points of departure for the allegorical interpretation, which often payed little attention to the whole context or body of the text. It was inattentive to what Young calls the iconic qualities of the text or the narrative as a whole. The Antiochenes were less philosophical, more rhetorical in their approach; they had more feeling for the text as narrative, and for the narrative pattern as image of higher truths.

Augustine's programme for the formation of an interpreter[58]

Augustine, who is profiled in Chapter 58 of this volume, wrote a whole book, On Christian Teaching (De doctrina Christiana), on the noble art of scriptural interpretation and homiletical presentation.[59] The book is remarkable in more than one respect, not least because it outlines a programme for interpreters of the Bible that Augustine himself was not able to follow. In this book one of the basic requirements for the biblical interpreter is knowledge of Greek and Hebrew. Augustine's Greek was poor and he knew no Hebrew (but some Punic, another Semitic language).

In De doctrina Christiana one can easily discern two formative influences on Augustine as a biblical interpreter: his rhetorical education and the Origenistic tradition of spiritualistic allegorism transmitted to him mainly through Ambrose. It should perhaps be emphasized that these influences were of a different nature. His schooling in rhetoric in no way helped him with regard to a sympathetic understanding of the Old Testament; rather on the contrary, as he tells us in his Confessions. It was not until Ambrose in his sermons unlocked the secrets of the Old Testament through his 'spiritual' (we would call it Origenistic) interpretations, that Augustine was able to read this part of the Bible as divine instruction 'worthy of God':

> Ambrose's ideas had already begun to appear to me defensible; and the Catholic faith, for which I supposed that nothing could be said against the onslaught of the Manicheans, I now realized could be maintained without presumption. This was especially clear after I had heard one or two parts of the Old Testament explained allegorically – whereas before this, when I had interpreted them literally, they had 'killed' me spiritually. However, when many of these passages in those books were expounded to me thus, I came to blame my own despair for having believed that no reply could be given to those who hated and scoffed at the Law and the Prophets . . . I listened with delight to Ambrose, in his sermons to the people, often recommending this text most diligently as a rule: 'The letter kills, but the spirit gives life' [2 Cor. 3:6], while at the same time he drew aside the mystic veil and opened to view the spiritual meaning of what seemed to teach perverse doctrine if it were taken according to the letter . . . As to those passages in the Scripture which had heretofore appeared incongruous and offensive to me, now that I had heard several of them expounded reasonably, I could see that they were to be resolved by the mysteries of spiritual interpretation.
>
> (Confessions 5.14.24; 6.5.6,8)[60]

This distinction between a 'literal' and a 'spiritual' or 'figurative' or 'allegorical' sense of scripture was to remain fundamental in Augustine's hermeneutic the rest of his life, and although its main field of application was the Old Testament, he could also freely allegorize gospel narratives in his sermons. But at the same time Augustine remained a rhetor, and the ideal of the rhetor was clarity of expression, not enigmatic and obscure statements. Therefore we find him stating in De doctrina Christiana that the enigmatic style of the sacred authors of scripture is not to be emulated by the Christian homilist or teacher:

> [The biblical authors] have uttered some passages with a beneficial and salutary obscurity, to exercise and, in a sense, to polish the minds of their readers, to break down aversions and spur on the zeal of those who are anxious to learn, as well as to conceal the meaning from the minds of the wicked . . . Their interpreters [on the other hand] . . . should not speak with a similar authority, as if they are proposing themselves for interpretation, but in all their words their first and greatest endeavor should be to make themselves understood as much as possible by clearness of style.
>
> (De doctrina Christiana 4.8.22)[61]

In general, one may observe in De doctrina Christiana how the rhetor, so to speak, keeps the allegorist within bounds, and never allows a neglect of the literal meaning of the biblical text. Here Augustine recommends a series of techniques and auxiliary sciences, useful for establishing the authentic text among variant readings, discerning cultural and linguistic peculiarities in the text, deciphering foreign idioms, recognizing unfamiliar realia in the text, etc. For this purpose, Augustine effectively proposes a Christian programme of education that would later materialize in the medieval education in the 'liberal arts': a preparatory schooling for the study proper, the study of scripture.

We should probably also hear the rhetor speaking when Augustine in De doctrina Christiana is very concerned to establish safe criteria for valid and invalid figurative interpretations. His fundamental criterion is a theological one: all scripture aims at strengthening the love of God and the love of neighbour; this is the final and ultimate criterion for all scriptural exegesis. Texts which cannot be seen to achieve this goal when taken literally, must be allegorized. But one should beware of judging biblical narratives too rashly in this regard. Some actions by the biblical persons which may seem immoral or offensive at first sight, were actually justified and right in their own time and circumstances.

This vacillation between apology for the literal sense of scripture, and a willingness to 'save' objectionable passages by allegorical exegesis, often gives Augustine's exegetical endeavour an experimental, open-ended, unfinished character – more so than in his unrecognized mentor Origen. Augustine was always willing to reconsider earlier interpretations, to try again, and to conclude with unanswered questions (as often in his several works on Genesis).[62]

While finishing the De doctrina Christiana in his later years, Augustine had come across the hermeneutical treatise of Tyconius, a former Donatist, on how to interpret scripture. Tyconius formulated seven rules, which Augustine found helpful in establishing further criteria for legitimate spiritual exegesis. One of the basic principles of Tyconius' rules, which also corresponded with Augustine's own practice, was to refer scriptural sayings either to Christ as head of his body, or to the Church as his body. Scripture itself did not necessarily make this distinction explicit, for example in many of the Psalms, where the 'I' of the Psalm could be either. If the Psalm's I is confessing sin, it is the Church speaking; if the I is speaking in a divine capacity, it is Christ.

It remains to add a final note on Augustine the rhetor in De doctrina Christiana. On one point his distinction between the intended obscurity of scripture and the intended clarity of the interpreter and preacher breaks down. Scripture after all does contain examples of eloquence that are to be emulated by the Christian teacher-preacher. Apart from a passage in Amos – exceptional in a prophet for its clarity! – it is above all the Pauline letters Augustine has in mind. Augustine thinks that Paul was probably not an educated orator, but he was a 'natural' one, and natural oratory is the best. The rhetorical handbooks, in fact, only teach what they have learnt from studying natural eloquence. Paul is one of those from whom natural eloquence may be learnt, full as he is of divine wisdom and divine passion.

One perceives through this that Paul's letters in many ways were a special case within scripture for Augustine – and not only for him. When we observe Origen interpret Paul, and John Chrysostom interpret Paul, we see skilled rhetoricians interpret texts that lend themselves easily to precisely this kind of interpretation. Here Platonic allegorization often recedes or disappears altogether, and instead a rhetorical analysis of the text is presented that almost allows the modern, also rhetorically schooled exegete, to have the feeling he or she is reading an ancient colleague, a worthy discussion partner.[63]

Augustine never states it, but one could perhaps 'explain' Paul's exception to the rule of scripture's general enigmatic and non-rhetorical quality, by saying that in his letters Paul is primarily not an author of scripture, but an interpreter of scripture. Or perhaps, he is both. Therefore he should display that clarity and eloquence Augustine demands from the ordinary expositor and teacher of scripture.

Be that as it may. Our last remarks on Paul in the biblical exegesis of the Old Church, may serve as a sobering reminder that when we often treat 'scripture' more or less as one whole of a uniform nature, and therefore also the big questions of interpretative principles as questions valid for the whole of scripture, we are guilty of a simplification. A more nuanced picture would result if we treated the different categories and genres of biblical books separately. That would, of course, require more space than has been at our disposal here.

Conclusion

There was a distinctively Christian interpretation of the Jewish scriptures (called by Christians The Old Testament). Its distinctiveness had to do, inevitably, with the Christological 'key' early Christians applied to the old scriptures. From a methodological point of view, however, the earliest Christian exegesis was hardly much different from that of other Jewish 'schools' at the time. It was Jewish and Hellenistic at the same time, like that of the other schools.

With Origen as the watershed figure, Christian interpretation of the Bible was acculturated into a wider, more general setting in the early third century. The Bible of two Testaments was to replace the Homeric canon of Hellenistic culture; interpreted along the same allegorical lines as the rival canon of Homer. The project was begun, based primarily on the Law as sacred text, by Philo the Jew in the early first century CE, and brought to its mature completion by Origen in the third.

After Origen, Christian scholars of the Bible faced the challenge of digesting Origen's new approach and daring interpretations, at the same time preserving the valuable heritage of the older 'testimony' approach, balancing or integrating the two, or creating new syntheses. In all of this, Christian interpretation of the Bible was 'contextualized' to a remarkable degree, as we have tried to show.

Notes

1 For comprehensive and succinct surveys of biblical interpretation in the period 70–430 CE, see, for example, Hanson 1970; Schäfer 1980: 25–60; Grant and Tracy 1984: 28–82; Froehlich 1984: 1–29; Horbury 1988; Reventlow 1990: 50–201; Simonetti 1994: 1–109; Young 1997: 285–299.

2 See the comprehensive treatment in Patte 1975.

3 See, e.g. Schäfer 2009, 2014.

4 See especially the fundamental study of Daube 1949.

5 Attributed to Rabbi Levi (c. 300 CE) in Pesikta 49B and Midrash Samuel 45B; to Rabbi Isaac (also c. 300) in Midrash Kohelet 9B; cf. Billerbeck I, 69f.

6 For two incisive studies of this principle at work in the New Testament, see Goppelt 1939 and Bruce 1968.

7 Brewer 1992 found no undisputable example of this haggadic exegesis in the pre-70 rabbinic material, but recognized its presence in Qumran and Philo. One could add that it is also evidenced in the New Testament.

8 For an updated bibliography on the most important studies, see Hübner 1996: 332f.

9 Tosephta Sukka 3:11ff, cf. Billerbeck 1926 III: 406f for more rabbinic parallels. The same haggada seems to be known to the author of Biblical Antiquities (10.7), in the period between the two Jewish wars (70–132 CE). In identifying the rock with Christ, Paul may presuppose a Jewish tradition identifying the rock with God's Wisdom.

10 Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses [Against Heresies] 5.36.3; ANF translation vol. I: 567.

11 On this rabbinic debate, see the excellent excursus of Paul Billerbeck 'Diese Welt, die Tage des Messias und die zukünftige Welt' ['This world, the days of the Messiah and the future world'], in Billerbeck IV: 799–976.

12 Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 99A (my translation).

13 See Patte 1975: 299–308; Maier 1996: 126–129.

14 Von Ungern-Sternberg, 1913.

15 Von Ungern-Sternberg differentiated the traditional 'proof from the scriptures' into 'proof of Christ' and 'proof of gospel' in perfect agreement with Luke 24:46–47.

16 For more on this connection between scriptural proof and emerging creed, see Skarsaune 1987b.

17 For detailed argument, see Skarsaune 1987a: 260–262.

18 See Von Ungern-Sternberg 1913: 27–144, 169–220; Skarsaune 1996a: 421–442.

19 See De Margerie 1980: 165–187; Van Rompay 1996: 619–622 (on Aphrahat) and 622–628 (on Ephrem).

20 See Skarsaune 1990: 210f.

21 They also evince another characteristic of Jewish scribal culture: the 'free' or allusive quotation of scripture. Cf. Skarsaune 1990: 210f; Stanley 1997.

22 See Skarsaune 1990 for a fuller treatment of this theme.

23 See Skarsaune 1996a: 418–421, with references to further literature on the testimony book hypothesis.

24 My own translation.

25 Translation according to Hall 1979: 17–19.

26 Young 1997: 144–152, 184, 210–11.

27 For a more detailed treatment of the argument in this and the foregoing paragraphs, see Skarsaune 1996a: 389–442.

28 On Hippolytus' exegesis in general, cf. Simonetti 1994: 26–31; on his 'extension' of the 'testimony' approach into complete commentary, cf. also Daniélou 1973: 257–271; Skarsaune 1996a: 434–437.

29 Translation according to Falls 1965: 66f.

30 Especially see the fine study of Droge 1989.

31 On Tertullian's Old Testament exegesis, see De Margerie 1983a: 23–64; Skarsaune 1996a: 429–434 (with further bibliography).

32 For reviews of Irenaeus' Old Testament exegesis, see De Margerie 1980: 64–84; Schäfer 1980: 32–35; Reventlow 1990: 150–170; Skarsaune 1996a: 422–429 (with further bibliography); Jourjon 1997.

33 Contrary to much current scholarly opinion, there is hardly any trace of anything approaching canonical status for the so-called Apocrypha in the first and second centuries CE. The thesis of a larger 'Alexandrian' canon taken over by the early Church has been successfully refuted by Sundberg 1964; see also Skarsaune 1996b. In the third century Origen discusses the status of some of the Apocrypha. From then onwards one can observe that several Greek fathers do not include the Apocrypha in their lists of canonical books, but often the same fathers sometimes quote them as scripture. In the west Augustine says that the 'learned' have a more narrow canon, while ecclesiastical tradition has a wider; Jerome confirms this in his own attitude. He basically advocates the Jewish canon, but has to yield to requests from Church members who want him to include the Apocrypha in his translation project. (See more on this in Sundberg 1964.)

34 On the biblical material in 1 Clement, see Hagner 1973.

35 Among the Gnostics we even hear about a full-fledged commentary: Heracleon's on John (somewhat after 150 CE), which Origen quoted extensively to refute it in his own commentary on John.

36 See Pagels 1975.

37 Especially on Tertullian's exegesis, see Waszink 1979.

38 Comprehensive reviews of Clement's and Origen's exegesis: Daniélou 1973: 237–256, 273–288; De Margerie 1980: 95–136; Schäfer 1980: 40–44; Grant and Tracy 1984: 52–62; Reventlow 1990: 170–193; Simonetti 1994: 34–48; Carleton Paget 1996.

39 See Coulter 1976: 19–31; Dawson 1992: 23–72; Siegert 1996: 130–139; Procopé 1996.

40 The literature on Philo as biblical interpreter is vast; for three recent treatments with full bibliographies, see Dawson 1992: 73–126; Siegert 1996: 162–188; Borgen 1997.

41 On Origen and his exegesis, cf. the literature in note 38, and in addition Hanson 1959.

42 Cf. the excellent review of Origen's 'organisation of typology' in Daniélou 1973: 275–280.

43 An English translation is to be found in Heine 1982: 185–195.

44 Translation according to Heine 1982: 189.

45 In this way, being an exegete is more than exercising an interpretative competence, it is part of a spiritual life leading to salvation. See for this perspective on Origen, Martens 2012.

46 On rejection of allegory in secular Hellenism, see Dawson 1992: 52–72.

47 On the opponents of Origen as scriptural literalists, see Hällström 1984: 43–57.

48 See Hällström 1984: 189–190.

49 In this, he is very different from Hippolytus, the only known ecclesiastical writer before him to write commentaries on Old Testament books.

50 On Origen's enormous text-critical project, the so-called Hexapla, see, for example, Trigg 1983: 82–86. On Origen's 'philological' scholarship in general, see Neuschäfer 1987; Young 1997: 82–96.

51 The classic study of this is Von Harnack 1918/19.

52 On Jerome's exegesis, see the following surveys: Sparks 1970; Schäfer 1980: 48–50; De Margerie 1983b: 145–179; Simonetti 1994: 99–103; Kieffer 1996. See also the more extensive treatment in Brown 1992.

53 See Kelly 1975: 220ff, 290–294, 298–308, 316ff.

54 On these fathers, see De Margerie II 1983a: 65–143, and Jacob 1996.

55 For general reviews of the exegesis of the Antiochene school, see Kelly 1973: 75–78; De Margerie 1980: 188–240; Schäfer 1980: 44–48; Grant and Tracy 1984: 63–72; Simonetti 1994: 59–63; Hidal 1996 (with further bibliography).

56 Quoted from the translation in Froehlich 1984: 82–86; quotation 86.

57 So, to some extent, Kelly 1973: 75–78.

58 On Augustine as an interpreter, see Bonner 1970; De Margerie III (1983b); Wright 1996; Young 1997: 265–284.

59 On Augustine's principles of exegesis according to the Doctrina, see Teske 1995; Dawson 1995.

60 Translation according to Outler 1995: 111, 117–119.

61 According to the translation of Gavigan 1947: 187–188.

62 For details on this, see Wright 1996: 704–709.

63 In Gorday (1983) Origen, John Chrysostom and Augustine are brought in as interesting outsiders and counterpoints to the modern 'Romans debate', especially concerning the role of Romans 9–11 within Romans as a whole. It turns out that Origen is most in touch with the modern debate!

Bibliography

Ackroyd, P. R. and Evans, C. F. (eds) (1970) The Cambridge History of the Bible 1: From the Beginnings to Jerome.
Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Arnold, D. W. H. and Bright, P. (eds) (1995) De doctrina christiana: A Classic of Western Culture. Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity 9. Notre Dame, IN and London: University of Notre Dame Press.

Blowers, P. M. (ed.) (1997) The Bible in Greek Christian Antiquity (The Bible through the Ages vol. 1). Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Bonner, G. (1970) 'Augustine as biblical scholar', in Ackroyd and Evans 1970: 541–563.

Borgen, P. (1997) Philo of Alexandria: An Exegete for His Time. Supplements to Novum Testamentum 86. Leiden,
The Netherlands; New York; Cologne, Germany: Brill.

Brewer, D. I. (1992) Techniques and Assumptions in Jewish Exegesis before 70 CE. Texte und Studien zum Antiken Judentum 30. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Brown, D. (1992) Vir trilinguis. A Study in the Biblical Exegesis of Saint Jerome. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos.

Bruce, F. F. (1968) This is That: The New Testament Development of Some Old Testament Themes. Exeter, UK: The Paternoster Press.

Carleton Paget, J. N. B. (1996) 'The Christian exegesis of the Old Testament in the Alexandrian tradition', in Sæbø 1996: 478–542.

Coulter, J. A. (1976) The Literary Microcosm. Theories of Interpretation of the Later Neoplatonists. Columbia Studies in the Classical Tradition II. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Daniélou, J. (1973) Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture (A History of Early Christian Doctrine before the Council of Nicaea Vol. 2). London and Philadelphia, PA: Darton, Longman & Todd/The Westminster Press.

Daube, D. (1949) 'Rabbinic methods of interpretation and Hellenistic rhetoric', Hebrew Union College Annual 22: 239–264.

Daube, D. (1956) The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism. London: School of Oriental and African Studies, The University of London (= reprint n.d. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers).

Dawson, D. (1992) Allegorical Readers and Cultural Revision in Ancient Alexandria. Berkeley, CA and Oxford, UK:
University of California Press.

Dawson, D. (1995) 'Sign theory, allegorical reading, and the motions of the soul in De doctrina christiana', in Arnold and Bright 1995: 123–141.

De Margerie, B. (1980) Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse I. Les Pères grecs et orientaux. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

De Margerie, B. (1983a) Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse II. Les premiers grands exégètes latins. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

De Margerie, B. (1983b) Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse III. Saint Augustin. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Dodd, C. H. (1965) According to the Scriptures: The Sub-structure of New Testament Theology. London: Collins Fontana Books (orig. ed. London: James Nisbet & Co, 1952).

Droge, A. J. (1989) Homer or Moses? Early Christian Interpretations of the History of Culture. Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie 26. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Evans, C. A. and Sanders, J. A. (eds) (1997) Early Christian Interpretation of the Scriptures of Israel: Investigations and Proposals. Journal for the Study of the New Testament Suppl. Series 148. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press.

Falls, T. B. (1965) Writings of Saint Justin Martyr. Fathers of the Church Vol. 6. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America.

Froehlich, K. (1984) Biblical Interpretation in the Early Church. Sources of Early Christian Thought. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Gavigan, J. J. (1947) 'Christian instruction' [translation], in The Fathers of the Church Vol. 2: Saint Augustine.
Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Goppelt, L. (1939) Typos. Die typologische Deutung des Alten Testaments im Neuen. Beitr. z. Förderung christl.
Theologie 2. Reihe 43. Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann Verlag. [= reprint Darmstadt, Germany 1969:
Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft].

Gorday, P. (1983) Principles of Patristic Exegesis. Romans 9–11 in Origen, John Chrysostom, and Augustine. Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 4. New York and Toronto, ON: The Edwin Mellen Press.

Grant, R. M. and Tracy, D. (1984) A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible (2nd ed. rev. and enl.). London: SCM Press.

Hagner, D. A. (1973) The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome. Supplements to Novum Testamentum 34. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Hall, S. G. (1979) Melito of Sardis On Pascha and Fragments. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hällström, G. af (1984) Fides simpliciorum according to Origen of Alexandria. Commentationes Humanarum Litterarum 76. Helsinki, Finland: The Finnish Society of Sciences and Letters.

Hanson, R. P. C. (1959) Allegory and Event: A Study of the Sources and Significance of Origen's Interpretation of Scripture. London: SCM Press.

Hanson, R. P. C. (1970) 'Biblical exegesis in the early church', in Ackroyd and Evans 1970: 412–453.

Heine, R. E. (1982) Origen: Homilies on Genesis and Exodus. The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation 71. Washington DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Hidal, S. (1996) 'Exegesis of the Old Testament in the Antiochene School with its prevalent literal and historical method', in Sæbø 1996: 543–568.

Horbury, W. (1988) 'Old Testament interpretation in the writings of the church Fathers', in Mulder, J. and Sysling, H. (eds) Mikra. Assen, The Netherlands: Van Gorcum and Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 727–787.

Hübner, H. (1996) 'New Testament interpretation of the Old Testament', in Sæbø 1996: 332–72.

Jacob, C. (1996) 'The reception of the Origenist tradition in Latin exegesis', in Sæbø 1996: 682–700.

Jourjon, M. (1997) 'Irenaeus' reading of the Bible', in Blowers 1997: 105–111.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1973) Early Christian Doctrines, 4th ed. London: Adam & Charles Black.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1975) Jerome. His Life, Writings, and Controversies. London: Duckworth.

Kieffer, R. (1996) 'Jerome: His exegesis and hermeneutics', in Sæbø 1996: 663–681.

Maier, J. (1996) 'Early Jewish biblical interpretation in the Qumran literature', in Sæbø 1996: 108–129.

Malbon, E. S. (1990) The Iconography of the Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus. Neofitus iit ad Deum. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Martens, P. W. (2012) Origen and Scripture: The Contours of the Exegetical Life. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Neuschäfer, B. (1987) Origenes als Philologe. Basel, Switzerland: Friedrich Reinhardt Verlag.

Outler, A. C. (1955) The Library of Christian Classics Vol. VII. Augustine: Confessions and Enchiridion. London: SCM Press.

Pagels, E. (1975) The Gnostic Paul. Gnostic Exegesis of the Pauline Letters. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Patte, D. (1975) Early Jewish Hermeneutic in Palestine. SBL Diss. Series 22. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press.

Procopé, J. F. (1996) 'Greek philosophy, hermeneutics and Alexandrian understanding of the Old Testament', in Sæbø 1996: 451–477.

Reventlow, H. G. (1990) Epochen der Bibelauslegung I. Vom Alten Testament bis Origenes. Munich, Germany: Verlag C. H. Beck.

Sæbø, M. (ed.) (1996) Hebrew Bible/Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation I. From the Beginnings to the Middle Ages (Until 1300). Part 1: Antiquity. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Schäfer, P. (2009) Jesus in the Talmud. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Schäfer, P. (2014) The Jewish Jesus: How Judaism and Christianity Shaped Each Other. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Schäfer, R. (1980) Die Bibelauslegung in der Geschichte der Kirche. Studienbücher Theologie: Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Gerd Mohn.

Siegert, F. (1996) 'Early Jewish interpretation in a Hellenistic style', in Sæbø 1996: 130–198.

Simonetti, M. (1994) Biblical Interpretation in the Early Church. An Historical Introduction to Patristic Exegesis. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Skarsaune, O. (1987a) The Proof from Prophecy. A Study in Justin Martyr's Proof-Text Tradition: Text-Type, Provenance, Theological Profile. Supplements to Novum Testamentum 56. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Skarsaune, O. (1987b) 'Schriftbeweis und christologisches Kerygma in der ältesten kirchlichen Schriftauslegung' Schrift und Auslegung (Veröffentlichungen der Luther-Akademie e.V. Ratzeburg 10). Erlangen, Germany: Martin-Luther-Verlag, 45–54.

Skarsaune, O. (1990) 'From books to testimonies. Remarks on the transmission of the Old Testament in the early church', Immanuel 24/25: 207–219.

Skarsaune, O. (1996a) 'The development of scriptural interpretation in the second and third centuries – except Clement and Origen', in Sæbø 1996: 373–442.

Skarsaune, O. (1996b) 'The question of Old Testament canon and text in the early Greek church', in Sæbø 1996: 443–450.

Sparks, H. F. D. (1970) 'Jerome as biblical scholar', in Ackroyd and Evans 1970: 510–540.

Stanley, C. D. (1997) 'The social environment of "free" biblical quotations in the New Testament', in Evans and Sanders 1997: 18–27.

Strack, H. L. and Billerbeck, P. (1926–61) Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch, 6 vols. Munich, Germany: C. H. Beck.

Sundberg, A. C. (1964) The Old Testament of the Early Church. Harvard Theological Studies 20. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Teske, R. J. (1995) 'Criteria for figurative interpretation in St. Augustine', in Arnold and Bright 1995: 109–122.

Trigg, J. W. (1983) Origen: The Bible and Philosophy in the Third-century Church. Atlanta, GA: John Knox Press [= London 1985: SCM Press].

Van Rompay, L. (1996) 'The Christian Syriac tradition of interpretation', in Sæbø 1996: 612–641.

Von Campenhausen, H. F. (1968) Die Entstehung der christlichen Bibel. Beiträge zur historischen Theologie 39. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Von Harnack, A. (1918/19) Der kirchengeschichtliche Ertrag der exegetischen Arbeiten des Origenes I-II. Texte und Untersuchungen 42, Heft 3 und 4. Leipzig, Germany: J. C. Hinrichs'sche Buchhandlung.

Von Ungern-Sternberg, A. F. (1913) Der traditionelle alttestamentliche Schriftbeweis 'De Christo' und 'De Evangelio' in der Alten Kirche bis zur Zeit Eusebs von Caesarea. Halle an der Saale, Germany: Verlag von Max Niemeyer.

Waszink, J. H. (1979) 'Tertullian's principles and methods of exegesis', in Schoedel, W. R. and Wilken, R. L. (eds) Early Christian Literature and the Classical Intellectual Tradition. Théologie historique 54. Paris: Éditions Beauchesne, 17–31.

Wilpert, J. (1903) Die Malereien der Katakomben Roms: Tafelband. Freiburg, Germany: Herdersche Verlagshandlung.

Wright, D. F. (1996) 'Augustine: His exegesis and hermeneutics', in Sæbø 1996: 701–730.

Young, F. M. (1997) Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Yuval, I. J. (2010) 'Christianity in Talmud and Midrash: Parallelomania or parallelophobia?' in Harkins, F. T. (ed.) Transforming Relations: Essays on Jews and Christians throughout History in Honor of Michael A. Signer. Notre Dame, IN: Notre Dame Press, 50–74.

PART VII

The artistic heritage

Taylor & Francis Taylor & Francis Group
http://taylorandfrancis.com

34

EARLY CHRISTIAN ARCHITECTURE

The first five centuries

L. Michael White

By the time the early Christians began to build monumental churches during the reign of Constantine the Great (313–337 CE), there had been a recognizable, public religious architecture in the Graeco-Roman world for over a millennium. Yet, the Christians did not adopt a traditional Greek or Roman style of temple architecture for their churches. Instead, they adapted the basilica. Modeled after a standard type of audience hall used by municipal courts and imperial administrators, the basilica effectively became the norm and hence the rootstock for the evolution of all later types of Christian architecture down to modern times. To understand the forces of tradition and change at work in this religious arena is critical to understanding the development of early Christianity itself. There are important implications in terms of Christianity's social location, its liturgical evolution, and its self-understanding.

Because of this distinctive role in Christian history, it has been suggested that the basilica was a radical departure from the religious architecture of the pagan world, a symbol of the triumph of Christianity over its environment (MacDonald 1977: 12). Christianity's religious architecture, it is thus argued, avoided the sacralization of objects and places typical of pagan temples and shrines.[1] In reality, however, the story is more complex; the cultural disjunctures less clear. The evolution of a typically Christian architecture was a long process that reflected the appropriation of traditional Jewish as well as pagan forms and practices (De Blaauw 2007: 239–261). Local traditions and influences abound, especially in the earlier stages. Prior to the time of Constantine, there was no normative Christian architecture in any strict sense. One could not walk down the streets of Rome, Corinth, or Carthage and pick out a Christian church by its distinctive plan or façade. There was not yet an iconography of architectural planning that had become identifiably Christian. Features that seem familiar today, such as steeples and stained glass windows, were still a millennium away as symbolic markers of Christian religious architecture.

In the age of Constantine, then, Christianity developed its first normative public expression of religious architecture after nearly three centuries of social evolution. For this reason, the study of the origins and development of early Christian architecture is usually broken into two main chronological phases: that before the time of Constantine and that after. In examining this process, then, we shall take up the material as follows:

1 The architectural environment: public and private

    (a) 'Public' religion: temples in classical Greece and Rome
    (b) Domestic space and 'private' religion
    (c) Foreign religions and architectural adaptation

2   From 'houses' to church buildings: Paul to Constantine

  (a)   The synagogue and Diaspora Judaism
  (b)   The house church
  (c)   The domus ecclesiae and architectural adaptation
  (d)   The aula ecclesiae

3   The birth of the basilica: the fourth and fifth centuries

  (a)   Constantine's building program
  (b)   Local and regional variations
  (c)   Other types of Christian architecture: martyria and baptisteries
  (d)   The Christian landscape of late Roman cities

The architectural environment: public and private

For people living in the Hellenistic-Roman world the norms of religious architecture would have been well known and readily recognizable both in the public and private spheres. Nonetheless, there are some key differences between the religious environments of classical Greece and imperial Rome that must be noted.[2]

'Public' religion: temples in classical Greece and Rome

From the late archaic to the Hellenistic period (seventh to third centuries BCE) the center of religious life in a Greek city became the monumental podium temples associated with particular deities or mythic foundations. The interior cella, surrounded by one or more colonnades, housed the statue of the deity; it was tended by a coterie of professional priests often assisted by city magistrates, leading citizens, and other individuals. A cycle of festivals, processions, and sacrifices was managed by the priests and the city as part of its ritual calendar. As at Athens, the most important temples were often set up on the citadel of the city, called the acropolis (or 'upper city'). In some cases, however, the principal sanctuary might be otherwise set apart from the main city, as in the case of the temple of Ephesian Artemis, especially after the city was relocated in Hellenistic times. Other temples, smaller sanctuaries and shrines, and altars were spread about the areas of the agora (or 'marketplace') and other important or sacred localities, such as springs, civic boundaries, and the like. Religious architecture from great to small emulated the iconography of temples and was a part of the civic landscape.

In classical Greek religion, however, there were numerous other sanctuaries that were not exclusively associated with a single city. Often they were associated with places of awe and majesty or with important mythic events, as in the case of the oracular sanctuary of Apollo at Delphi, the temple of Zeus at Olympia, the sacred precincts of Apollo at Delos, the sanctuary of Apphaia on Aegina, the temple complex of Poseidon and Athena at Cape Sounion, or the Telesterion or sanctuary of the mysteries at Eleusis. Some of these came to be closely linked at times with Athenian political control, yet they retained their mystique even after Athens' decline. Centuries later a host of traveling Romans—emperors and senators, Herod and Paul—still knew them as sacred places and favorite tourist destinations. From Hellenistic times, other important sanctuaries also developed, such as those associated with the hero and healing god Askleipios that grew up at Epidauros, Kos, and Pergamon. Then there were lesser shrines that dotted the landscape, such as Herms used to mark key locations, sacred groves, or the tomb of a local hero (called a Heröon). Finally, there were the shrines and religious appurtenances of the household itself. Thus, Greek religion had a continuity of expressions across the public and private spheres that integrated the cultural ideals of Greek society.

The monumental temples of ancient Rome were influenced by both Etruscan and Greek architectural traditions (cf. Edlund-Berry 1988). By the second century BCE Rome had developed its own norms of city planning and sacred architecture. A Roman temple complex (literally a sacred precinct) centered on a podium temple, but traditionally without peripteral colonnades. Elevated on a podium fronted by several steps, the cella enclosed the sides of the podium with a colonnade along the façade only. Round temples with colonnades were also used, and gradually, Greek temple styles with peripteral colonnade became more prominent in Rome.

While temples and sanctuaries might be inside or outside the walls of a Roman city, the pomerium (or boundary) of the city also marked a sacred enclosure; in Roman cities, for example, burials were usually prohibited within the pomerium. Roman city planning was oriented around the forum, increasingly in imitation of Rome itself. By the age of Augustus, the forum was typically dominated by a temple of the Capitoline gods (Jupiter, Juno, Minerva), also called the Capitolium. The foundation and siting of a temple required the assent of religious officials (the collegium pontificum) and the senate (Stambaugh 1978, 1988). Temples for other deities were then located according to traditional functions and events. New temples, sanctuaries, and altars were introduced with regularity in the republican period and even more frequently during the empire.

In the Hellenistic and Roman world temples functioned as banks, social welfare agencies, places of political sanctuary, and the centers of public festivals and processions. The sacred precincts accommodated crowds of people on special holy days or when particular rituals and sacrifices—'liturgies' (leitourgiai) in Greek, 'offices' (officia) in Latin—were performed. Often major festivals functioned as civic banquets, and sacrifices were publically distributed as part of the festivities. Yet, a temple in the strict sense, as the house of a god (the cella in architectural terms), was not normally a place for public assembly or religious 'worship' in any modern sense. The order of procedures for acts of worship and devotion, whether for major festivals or for individual devotion, at most temples was carefully prescribed. In Greek religion there were few exceptions where a gathering of people was convened in a large hall as part of a religious ceremony. One such was the Greater Mysteries, the annual ritual of initiation celebrated at the Telesterion of Eleusis. Otherwise, most corporate religious activity of a public nature was conducted out of doors in processions and festival activities. A number of ancient Greek and Roman temples (such as the sanctuary of Demeter at Corinth or the sanctuaries of Askleipios) made provision for smaller groups to gather in dining rooms in the temple complex, but not in the temple-cella proper. On the other hand, both Greeks and Romans viewed the civic assembly (ekklēsia and curia, respectively)[3] as sacred gatherings, and their architecture reflected this sacralization.

Domestic space and 'private' religion

While the elements of such public and official religious activities and their architectural forms were monumental and distinctive in style, the continuum between public and private forms of religiosity was not clearly differentiated in the Hellenistic-Roman world. In contrast to modern cultural distinctions between public/civic and private/domestic, a number of recent archaeological and cultural studies have shown that many elements of domestic life were considered part of the public sphere (Laurence 1994, 1995, 1997; Wallace-Hadrill 1994, 1995). Compita (or 'crossroads' shrines) marked key sections of the city, including voting districts (the vici) or neighborhoods (Bakker 1994). Domestic religion and the household shrine (or lararium) stood at the intersection between these spheres of activity, especially where key social rituals (patronage, hospitality, and dining) were concerned (Orr 1978; Clark 1991; Foss 1997; Osiek and Balch 1997: 5–47; Wallace-Hadrill 1997; White 1998: 177–181).

Apart from the family, the most important social groupings in Roman cities were the guilds and clubs (Latin: collegia or sodalicia; Greek: thiasoi). Comprised of people in a common trade, veterans, ethnic enclaves, or funerary societies for the freeborn poor, they afforded social cohesion and networks of support for members of the group. Guilds and collegia participated in regular public festivals, often in some special capacity. Yet the majority of their religious activities were conducted in a non-public arena, usually in dinner gatherings for their members. Most had a patron deity or deities, frequently with a special shrine or a private temple set aside within the society's headquarters (sometimes called a schola). Dining halls were another common feature. Their banquets were frequently accompanied by sacrifices and other acts of piety by the group or its individual members. Such communal gatherings could at times find their way into the precincts of the public temples, but most often kept to the more private confines of their own buildings.

In the Hellenistic world, these collegial halls typically resembled domestic architecture, as in the case of the 'Association of Merchants and Shippers from Berytus' who in the second century BCE established a headquarters in the important trade center of Delos. Based on the grandiose inscription from the peristyle of their building, their hall was known as the 'House of the Poseidoniasts from Berytus.' Their patron deity, Greek Poseidon, was an amalgamation with their local form of Ba'al from Syria. Architecturally the building resembles a house with a typical peristyle court and a large room for assembly. Instead of regular domestic quarters, however, it featured a separate room with altars and statues of the gods (Picard 1921; Bruneau 1970: 623–624).

From the Roman period we find analogous groups, such as the Tyrian merchants at Puteoli who maintained a collegial hall and sanctuary dedicated to their ancestral god (Ba'al of Serapta), whom they called by the Hellenized name Helios Serraptenos (Nock 1933: 66; White 1996–97: I. 32). At Ostia we find the collegium of the Fabri Navales (the Shipbuilders Guild), whose head-quarters (III. 2.2) was located along the main street, the Decumanus maximus, a few blocks west of the Forum. The edifice (Figure 34.1 locus A) was installed in a lot previously occupied by private houses and a fullonica (or cleaning establishment). The rear areas of the complex were used for other activities and gatherings of the group (Meiggs 1973: 327; Hermansen 1981: 63).

Immediately across the street hall (see Figure 34.1 locus B) stood another collegial hall (IV. 5.15). Usually known as the 'School of Trajan' (Schola Traiani), it probably also belonged to the same Shipbuilders collegium or perhaps the 'Shipowners Association' (Naviculariei).[4] Their building simi-larly took over and renovated a large peristyle house dating from the early first century CE; the reconstruction dates to the late second century CE. In addition to offices, an imperial shrine, a large peristyle court with central fountain (a nymphaeum), and porticoes, the rear of the complex con-tained a large and richly decorated dining hall with an apsidal niche for a statue of Fortuna. For such groups, social interaction, especially banquets, were closely aligned with their religious activities.

Like the headquarters of the Fabri Navales, a number of these guild halls at Ostia clearly included small temples within their confines, even though the buildings themselves came from the realm of domestic architecture.[5] Some groups adopted explicitly religious designations such as the obscure group known only from inscriptions as 'The Order of the Guildbrothers who contributed funds for enlargement of the temple' (Meiggs 1973: 335; Hermansen 1981: 59, 241). Two further cases known from epigraphic remains reflect this continuum between public and private arenas of religious activity. One is the household of Pompeia Agripinilla which in c. 127 CE was organized as a cult of Dionysus; the nearly 500 members of her household were called 'initiates' (Greek: mystai) and were assigned hierarchically to ranks and offices within the 'cult.' Agripinilla, the mater familias, held the highest rank as priest and patron of the cult (White 1996–97: I. 45 with references). From Rome, another inscription refers to 'the Association which is in the house of Sergia Paullina' (Collegium quod est in domu Sergiae Paullinae, CIL 6.9148). In the former case the household is identical to the cult; in the latter, it appears that the collegium meets in the house of the patron, likely overlapping somewhat with the household but not entirely.[6]

Foreign religions and architectural adaptation

Beginning in Hellenistic times there was a growing trend for new religious groups to move into the urban environment alongside the traditional cults. These new groups came from the eastern Mediterranean and Middle East in the wake of Alexander's conquests and the subsequent centuries of Hellenistic rule. By the first century BCE these regions came under Roman rule, but by then the pathways of migration and cultural interaction had been well worn. As with the shippers and mer-chants on Delos in the Hellenistic period and those at Puteoli and Ostia in the imperial age, many people were drawn by trade and migration to the large cities. With them they carried their cultural heritage and their religious traditions. Their collegial halls thus served both as commercial agencies and as religious and social centers.

Figure 34.1 Ostia: Regions III and IV along the Decumanus Maximus, city plan (White 1996–97: II. fig. 41)

Once out of the realm of the official cults associated with the state or the city, there was much more variety in religious activity and in its architectural forms. Dining and social functions were closely linked to religious activities. Houses might be turned into cult centers or collegial halls. A wealthy homeowner might also install his/her own private 'chapel' in honor of a favorite deity or as part of a small religious confraternity. For example, at Ephesos, a wealthy city official (alytarch) of the early second century CE, named C. Flavius Furius Aptus owned a palatial house (Hanghaus 2) along the Embolos (or Processional Way). Off a peristyle court reached from a mosaic portico along the street, he installed a small apsidal shrine to Dionysus next to an opulent dining hall. It seems that these rooms were meant for formal entertaining of small elite groups (Wiplinger and Wlach 1995: 103–104).

Similarly, at Rome a group using the collegial title 'Association of the Treebearers' (Collegium Dendrophororum) met in an apsidal hall in the house of its patron, Manius Publicius Hilarus, who lived on the Caelian. Though located in a domestic setting, the hall was marked off by a formal inscription of dedication and invocation (CIL 6.641, 30973). It would appear that this was a private cultic association loosely tied to the cult of Magna Mater, but it maintained its own distinct social and religious functions apart from the public cult (White 1996–97: I. 46). Architectural adaptation and renovation was the order of the day, and such groups relied on the patronage of leading individuals.

It seems that many of the so-called 'mystery cults' made their way into the Hellenistic and Roman world by means of architectural adaptation and private patronage either before or alongside of establishing formal public temples of classical design. A common phenomenon, this practice was especially noteworthy in the case of the cults of the Egyptian gods, where communal dining was a prominent feature (White 1996–97: I. 32–39, 43–46). The cult of Mithras, which became popular in the Roman world in the second century CE, developed a distinctive type of religious architecture for its sanctuaries, called mithraea (Figure 34.2).
Figure 34.2   Plan of the Mithraeum of the Painted Walls in Ostia—'Mitreo delle pareti dipinte'
(White 1996–97: II. fig. 42), adapted from Beccati, Mitrei Ostia

There was a typical plan for most mithraea in the Roman world. In imitation of a cave, it was usually a long narrow hall with elevated benches along the two side walls and a central aisle leading to an altar platform at one end. On the side benches the members of the cult assembled, socialized, and ate communal dinners. The halls might be decorated with religious art and symbols, but the altar platform, usually decorated with mythic scenes of Mithras slaying the bull (or tauroctony) served as the focus of attention and cultic actions.

Despite these common features, the actual design and architecture of each mithraeum might be vastly different owing to the fact that most of them were quite small and usually constructed from or within some existing building (White 1996–97: I. 47–50). Very few ancient mithraea were de novo or purpose-built edifices for religious purposes; the vast majority (nearly 90 percent) of excavated mithraic buildings were created by renovation and architectural adaptation of houses, baths, cryptoportici, warehouses, vaulted storerooms, courtyards, and even nymphaea (White 1996–97: I.48; II. no. 87). All of the known mithraea from Rome and Ostia were renovated from existing buildings (see now White 2012). In some cases the renovations were minimal (White 1996–97: II. no. 79). In other cases they could be quite extensive, with lavish decorations and multiple stages of enlargement (White 1996–97: I.49–52; II. nos. 59, 79, 81, 89). For example, the 'Mithraeum of the Painted Walls' (Figure 34.2 and Figure 34.1 locus C) at Ostia (III.1.6) was constructed in two stages in the courtyard and a side room of a house (White 1996–97: II. no. 81). Similarly, at Rome, the mithraeum found beneath the apse of San Clemente (Figure 34.3 and Figure 34.12 below) had been installed in the second or third century in the cortile of a private house; before renovation the same space had been used as a nymphaeum (White 1996–97: II. no. 87).

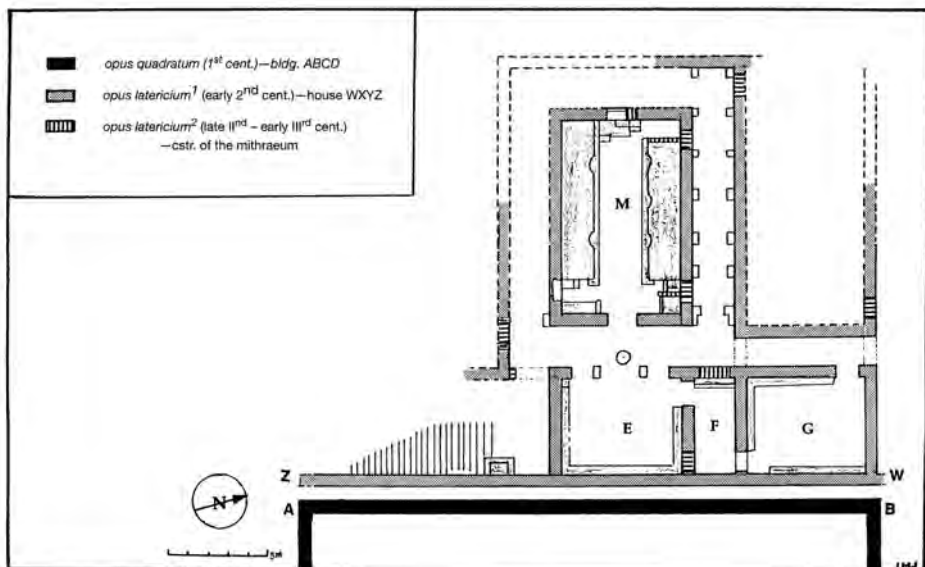
What sets the mithraic cult apart architecturally from other traditional religions of the Hellenistic-Roman world is the lack of a formal temple architecture apart from these small sanctuaries. Still, they participated in public temple activities as part of daily life, even though their own cultic dining and social activities took place within the sanctuary. In this sense, it was more 'private' both in setting and in operations despite the fact that a limited iconography of architecture had evolved.


Figure 34.3　Plan of the San Clemente mithraeum, Rome (White 1996–97: II. fig. 44); after Guidobaldi

In some ways it was closer to a collegium, even though it was publically recognized as a religion by Roman standards. As with most other forms of religious architecture, public or private, the bulk of construction, renovation, and decoration fell to the private acts of devotion of individual members, and especially to the wealthy. They usually functioned as patrons and leaders within the cultic community (White 1996–97: I. 53–57).

From 'houses' to church buildings: Paul to Constantine

In its earliest stages the Christian movement was not a separate religion but a sect within first-century Judaism. As such it observed the rhythms of religious life in the same way as other Jews. In terms of architecture, therefore, the center of religious identity was the temple at Jerusalem. The temple was rebuilt and enlarged extensively under the Hasmoneans and even more under Herod the Great; Herodian construction continued from c. 20 BCE down to 62 CE, not long before the outbreak of the war that would see it finally destroyed in 70 CE. It was a center of sacrificial activity and national identity; it was an architectural showpiece set in an elevated position within the 'sacred' city, Zion. The area surrounding the Jewish temple (the outer courts, or 'Court of the Gentiles') was a gathering place for religious festivals and other public and commercial activities. Jewish men alone could approach the entrance to the building through the inner courts, but the temple proper, and especially its inner sanctum, was restricted to the priests alone. In this sense, it functioned much like other ancient temples. Despite the fact that no Jew would say that their God actually lived there, it was still conceived as the place where God's presence dwelt as a symbol of Israel's status as chosen nation.

According to the New Testament, the first followers of the Christian movement continued in traditional forms of Jewish piety, attending the temple, observing annual feasts and purity rules.[7] As such they initially had no need of other forms of religious architecture, especially since the movement was limited to a Jewish following in the Homeland (White 1996–97: I. 102–103). Like other Jewish sects, these earliest Christians also met in homes for private meals, fellowship, and prayer (Acts 2–5). The Pharisees were another Jewish group that used home-based fellowships as a locus for study and prayer alongside the normal religious functions of the temple.[8] Only after the temple was destroyed in 70 CE would the synagogue emerge as the new center of Jewish worship and identity.[9] A normative synagogue architecture and liturgy did not evolve until the fourth century CE as part of the consolidation of rabbinic Judaism. Consequently, it did not serve as the architectural model for the development of Christian architecture, the basilica in particular, as has sometimes been supposed.[10]

The synagogue and Diaspora Judaism

Early on synagogues were usually just called 'prayerhalls' (Greek: proseuchai). In the Homeland prior to 70 CE they are known from scant references of Josephus (Jewish War 2.285–9; Jewish Antiquities 19.200–305; Life 277–280) and early Christian writings (the Gospels and Acts); however, it is significant that all were authored well after the war. Only in Philo (De vita Mosis 2.215–6; De legibus specialibus 2.62) do we find securely dated pre-70 references, but these come from the Alexandrian Jewish community, not the Homeland (Grabbe 1995: 20–21). Thus, we should probably think in terms of several distinct trajectories or streams of synagogue development, each coming from a different social and cultural experience of Jewish life. In the Homeland, prayerhalls might serve as village councils or be associated with specific sectarian groups. In the Diaspora, they served as community centers where ethnic and religious identity blended in response to the minority environment.

Archaeological evidence for pre-70 synagogues is even more perplexing, since it now appears that the vast majority date to the centuries after the First Revolt; they occur either from the Galilee or from provisions for Diaspora Jews. Moreover, these cases arise only in the post-Hasmonean period, i.e., late first century BCE, or later (Flesher 1995: 30–34; Grabbe 1995: 21–23). By contrast, archaeological and epigraphic evidence points to the origins of Jewish prayerhalls in the second and first centuries BCE in Ptolemaic Egypt and the eastern Mediterranean Diaspora (White 1987; Grabbe 1995: 18–19; Griffiths 1995). In other words, the synagogue originated in regions away from Judaea, where access to the temple was limited. In the Diaspora, it functioned as social as well as religious center, and there was neither a fixed liturgy nor architecture in the pre-70 period (White 1987; Kasher 1995).

When we look at the archaeological remains of Diaspora synagogues (Figure 34.4) we discover that all were adapted from previously existing buildings, usually over several phases of renovation and development (see Figure 34.9 later).

There are six such edifices known that date, at least in part, from the pre-Constantinian period. Listed in more or less chronological order for their earliest phases, they are: Delos (second/first century BCE), Dura-Europos and Priene (late second to third century CE), Stobi and Sardis (third/fourth centuries CE), Ostia (fourth century CE). Of these six, four were clearly renovated from existing private houses and one (Ostia) was likely some sort of insula complex. The complex was not built before the early third century CE, but was probably not renovated for use as a synagogue until the mid fourth century; it was renovated again in the late fifth century.[11] The Sardis synagogue, the largest known from antiquity (see also Figure 34.21 below), was renovated in at least three distinct phases from a municipal bath-gymnasium complex (Kraabel 1995; White 1996–97: I. 60–77, II. nos. 60, 66, 69, 70, 72, 83).

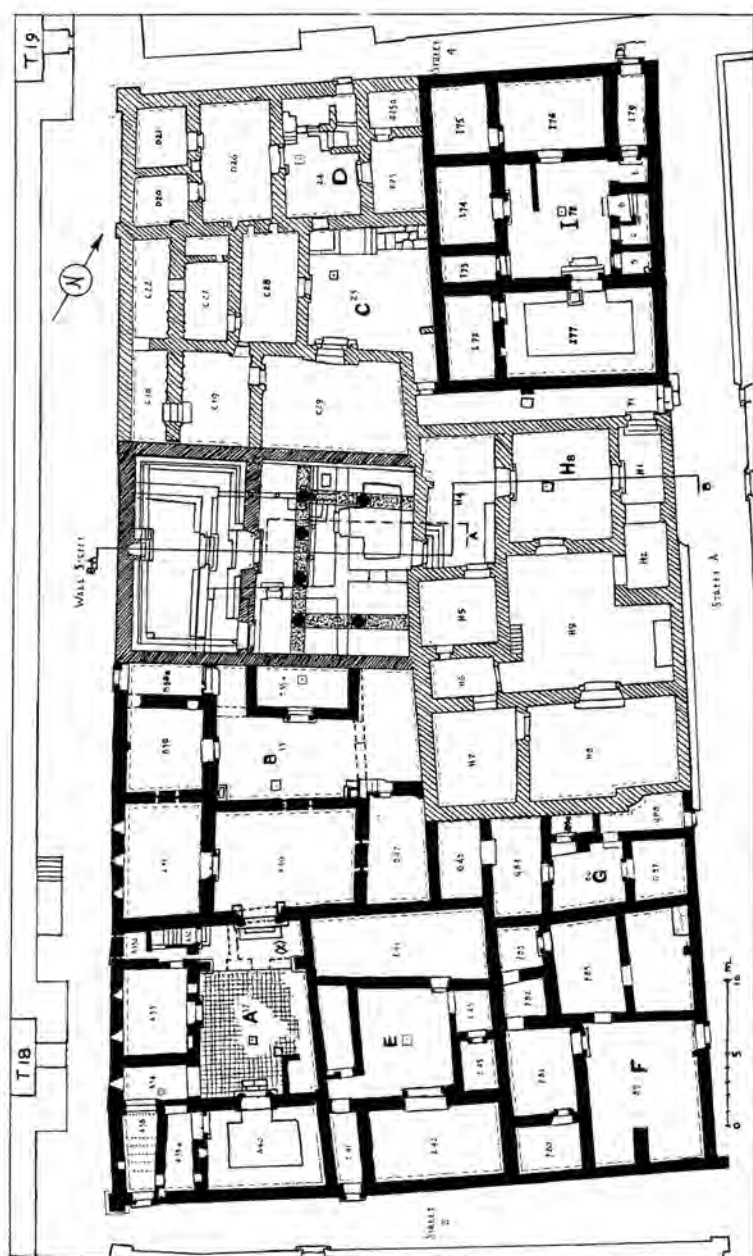
Both the archaeological and epigraphic record from these edifices attest to the significant role played by patrons, both men and women, in their growth and architectural development (Brooten 1982; White 1996–97: I. 77–93). In many ways, the use of space and the social organization of these communities most resemble that of other religious clubs or collegia, especially during the Roman period (White 1987, 1997; Richardson 1996). Three further points are worth noting in the architectural development of these edifices. First, as A. T. Kraabel (1981: 89) has noted, the form of these buildings and their adaptation was determined by local social and economic conditions more than by any architectural norms (cf. White 1996–97: I. 93–101). The Dura-Europos synagogue (Figures 34.5 and 34.6) is a good example since we can see its evolution from an ordinary house in the midst of a block of houses into a formal synagogue edifice in three distinct phases (White 1996–97: II. no. 60).
Figure 34.4 Synoptic plan of six Diaspora synagogues (White 1996–97: I. fig. 9)


Figure 34.5 Plan of the block containing the synagogue in Dura-Europos (White 1996–97: II. fig. 28)

Labels within the figure:

a. Field Plan

0 — 5 m.

X

Z

b. Early Synagogue

A — A

2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7

c. Late Synagogue

Hall of Assembly

Forecourt

B — B

N

LMW

Legend:

Walls of house (original) and early synagogue

Renovation work (late synagogue cstr.)

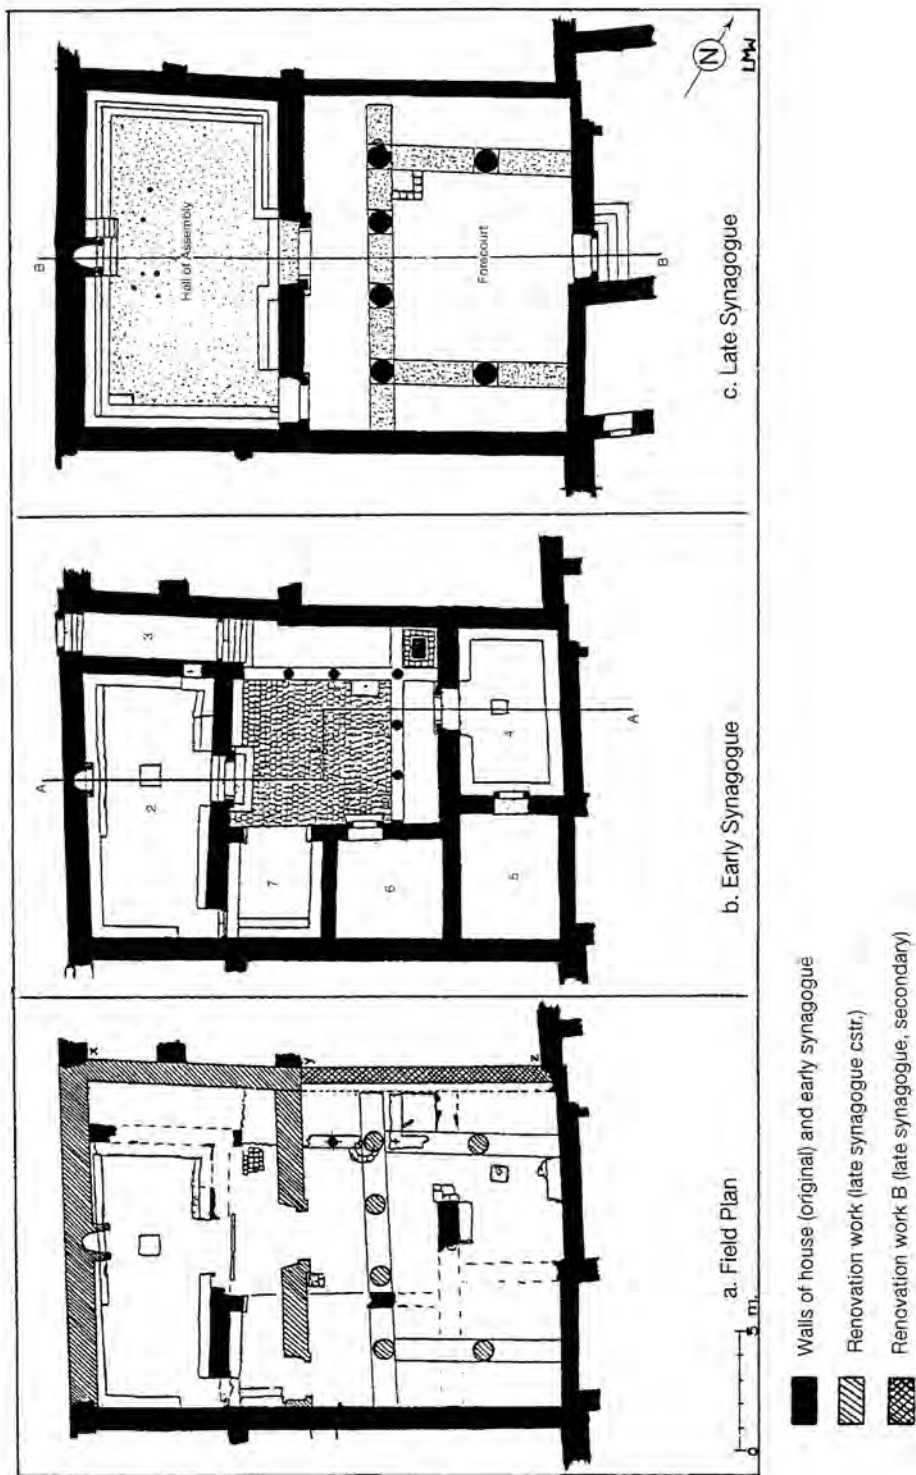
Renovation work B (late synagogue, secondary)


Figure 34.6 Plan of earlier and later phases of the synagogue in Dura-Europos (White 1996–97: II. fig. 29)

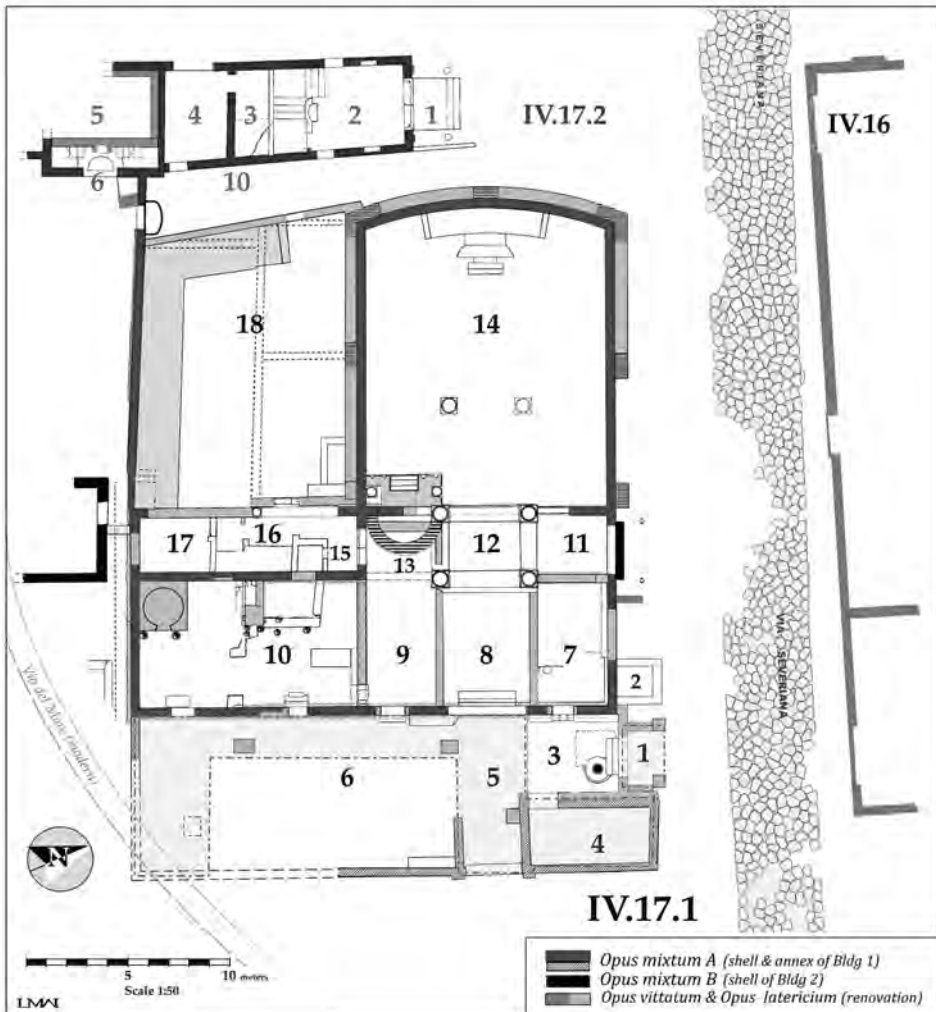
Second, over time, each building achieved more monumental scale and formal liturgical articulation. In particular, four of the six were outfitted with Torah shrines that stood as the focus of the assembly and worship arena (Figure 34.7). As an architectural edifice, the Torah Shrine does not appear before the very end of the second century CE, and becomes more prominent in the third to fifth centuries. It marks an articulation of sacred space in the synagogue and is closely associated with evolution and formalization of liturgy. Its development resulted from new religious functions and symbolism of the synagogue as sacred architecture that emerged after the destruction of the temple, correlated with the consolidation of the synagogue as religious institution in the rabbinic tradition (Hachlili 1989, 2013; Fine 1996; Hachlili and Merhav 1996; Rutgers 1996; White 1996–97: I. 93–101). Despite the absence of a fixed architectural form for the external building, by the end of this process, one finds broad or elongated halls with the Torah Shrine as focal point becoming the norm for the internal plan. In their final stages, the synagogues at Ostia and Sardis, both of which lasted well beyond the fifth century CE, reflect the influence of basilical architecture, probably from contemporaneous Christian usage. So also the emergence of the Christian basilica from the fourth century onward influenced later synagogue architecture in the Homeland as well as the Diaspora


*Figure 34.*7   New composite plan of the synagogue at Ostia. Drawing by L. M. White (Foerster 1995: 92–94; Habas 2000). In fact, it can now be shown that the Ostia Synagogue received its final renovation sometime after 450 CE, when its monumental apsidal Torah Shrine was installed. In this renovation, basilical elements came to dominate its architectural aesthetic, even though it is not a 'true' basilica in plan. It is thus quite significant to find a synagogue complex from the environs of Rome renovated in basilical form at this relatively late date; it continued in active operation well into the sixth century or later (see Figures 34.7 and 34.8).

Third, most of the Diaspora synagogues made provision for social functions, especially dining, during some or all of their renovations. In earlier stages, it appears that dining might be more closely associated with the areas of assembly, while in later stages more segregation occurred. For example, in the Ostia synagogue an ornate dining room was operative in two distinct areas of the complex. The earlier one (10) comes from its first phases of renovation as a synagogue and seems to be more centrally accessible, while in its later phase, a separate dining hall (18) nearly doubled in size resulted from integrating a neighboring courtyard into the building. But this pattern varies significantly from location to location and group to group (Kraabel 1981; White 1998). Thus it may be argued that the process of growth and adaptation was an organic social function and only gradually took on more discrete liturgical planning.

Since the earliest Christian communities arose out of this Jewish matrix, it is not surprising to discover that they began with household meetings or other communal assemblies typical of the Diaspora. Only gradually over time did they begin to adapt existing structures for their religious usage. Thus, two steps, the house church and the domus ecclesiae, mark the beginnings of Christian architectural development.

The house church

Writing at the beginning of the second century CE, the author of Luke–Acts noted that the earliest Christians, in addition to attending the temple, assembled to break bread 'from house to house' or 'at home' (kat' oikon) (Acts 2:46; 5:42; White 1996–97: I. 188, no. 7). Acts also characterizes the ministry of Paul as typically holding meetings in domestic quarters (Acts 20:7), and it was common for whole households to be baptized following the conversion of the pater or mater familias (Acts 16:15, 34; 18:8). These household heads were also Paul's sponsors and hosts in the cities of the Roman east (Acts 18:3, 7, 24). While the account of Acts is likely idealized and intended for a theological and apologetic purpose (Balch 1995: 232–233; White 1995a: 36–38, 1995b: 256–261; cf. Esler 1987: 207–219), the basic picture of the house church is substantiated by Paul's own letters, the earliest writings in the New Testament.
Figure 34.8   Ostia synagogue. Restoration of the interior after the Final Phase of Renovation, showing the monumental, apsidal Torah Shrine. Drawing by L. M. White

Paul's letters regularly relayed greetings both to and from 'so-and-so and the church in his/her/your/their house' (so 1 Cor. 16:19: Aquila and Prisca syn tē kat' oikon autōn ekklēsia; cf. Rom. 16:5; Philm. 2; Col. 4:15). Other references confirm the fact that key households served as the nucleus of congregations (1 Cor. 1:11, 16; 16:15). From these descriptions has come the terminology of the 'house church' as the designation for this early stage of development and organization at the time of the Pauline mission.[12] Some of the larger cities were made up of several house churches. In Paul's day, Corinth had six or more house church groups (Acts 18:3, 7; 1 Cor. 1:11, 16; 16:15; Rom. 16.2, 23) while Rome had at least eight (Rom. 16:5–16).

The owner of the house served as patron of the community as well as host to Paul and his coworkers (Rom. 16:2, 23; Philm. 22). As a result of this social and economic dependency conventions of patronage, hospitality, and friendship—the social interstices of public and private—were important virtues in the social organization of these congregations and explains much about the character of Paul's relationship with them (Malherbe 1983: 92–103; Marshall 1987: 133–150; White 1990b: 210–215; Fitzgerald 1996b; Mitchell 1997; Osiek and Balch 1997: 193–212). Women such as Phoebe (Rom. 16:2), Chloe (1 Cor. 1:11), Prisca (1 Cor. 16:19; Rom. 16:3), Mary and Junia (Rom. 16:6–7), and Nympha (Col. 4:15) are named as house church patrons or leaders of household groups. It seems, therefore, that the house church context afforded social standing and religious leadership roles to prominent women, much as it did in pagan cults and Jewish synagogues (Schüssler Fiorenza 1983: 162–168; Torjesen 1995: 53–110; Osiek and Balch 1997: 103–155; Osiek and MacDonald 2005).

Several characteristic features of Pauline worship and assembly can also be gleaned from these texts. First, the typical setting for worship was in the context of the communal meal, presumably in the dining room of the host's house. This is the setting presupposed for both the Lord's Supper in 1 Corinthians 11:17–34 and for the worship in 1 Corinthians 14. At this stage, there was no formal distinction between the communal meal and the eucharistic observance (White 1998: 178–180). Second, there seems to be no direct basis for seeing 'privacy' or cost as constraining factors for choosing the house setting, since dining and collegial activities were commonly held in domestic settings (contra Blue 1994: 121; cf. Krautheimer 1979: 24–25). Instead, already in Paul's day the house church setting presupposed that at least some members of the community were of higher social and economic standing and used these means to host the church and its assembly (Meeks 1983: 51–73; White 1996–97: II. 142–148; Osiek and Balch 1997: 96–102).

Third, there was no peculiar synagogue organization that had become normative by this stage or that was taken by Paul when he was 'kicked out.' This notion is based on the polemic of Acts and imposes later Jewish norms than were actually operative in the mid first century. The synagogues of the Diaspora were still in an early stage of development; hence, they were very diverse, and, as already noted, often used domestic contexts where the social organization closely resembled that of the surrounding Graeco-Roman culture (contra Burtchaell 1992: 228–263 and others; cf. Ascough 1998: 22–23). Hence unidirectional models of influence do not tell the whole story. While similarities certainly exist, they likely stem from the common social context and the reliance on patronage rather than on strict organizational or architectural norms. As long as the temple was standing, local Jewish congregations of all types, including Jewish-Christian groups at Antioch and Paul's predominantly gentile house churches in the Aegean, followed local patterns of household and collegial assembly and organization.

Finally, and most importantly, the house church, by definition, implies no special architectural articulation beyond that typical of houses, apartments, workshops, and other unrenovated spaces. This leaves us with an archaeological problem, however, since the lack of adaptation and spatial articulation means that the Christian places of meeting are physically impossible to distinguish from other architecture. We are left only with literary remains that must be handled with caution.

According to the literary sources, houses were not the only places of meeting for the earliest Christians. Others include collegial or school halls, such as the 'hall' (scholē) of Tyrannos at Ephesos (Acts 19:9) and warehouses (horrea) at Rome (Passio Pauli 1; cf. White 1996–97: II. no. 9b). Even so, houses are by far the most prominent throughout the early literature. Even in the middle of the second century it appears that Justin Martyr was still meeting with other Christians in some sort of domestic complex or an apartment building, 'above the baths of so-and-so' (Passio Sancti Justini et socii 3; White 1996–97: II. 7b). Even the worship and organization presupposed in early to mid second-century sources (e.g., Didache 12–14 and Justin's Apology 1.61–67), do not reflect more formal places of assembly; apparently, there was no special place for baptism (White 1996–97: I. 110).

In later centuries, it became common to associate formal church buildings with putative claims that there had originally been a house church in the same location. This tendency shows the influence of the earlier house church and domus ecclesiae in the evolving tradition, even though many of these later legends were spurious (cf. White 1996–97: II. nos. 42 and 50). In the case of the so-called tituli or house churches of Rome, such as San Clemente, Christian usage of a house or private property in the early stages has proven difficult to maintain on archaeological grounds (White 1996–97: 1. 1–10, no. 58, and appendix A; Snyder 1985: 67–81).

Because the house church was not archaeologically distinguishable, our first glimpses of the architectural development must come from the first attempts at spatial adaptation. There is, thus, a kind of transitional phase when houses and other buildings began to be partially altered by Christians for specific religious purposes based most likely on continued patterns of usage.[13] Over time, certain areas might be given over to virtually exclusive Christian usage or decorated with Christian symbols. Once physical adaptation of the space and the edifice commenced, then the architecture was moving beyond the 'house church' both in physical terms and in the minds of the users.

By the early second century we begin to see some shifts in the way that some Christians thought about their assembly space in terms of its religious and communal significance. For example, in the Johannine epistles (2–3 John), which likely come from Asia Minor, the setting still clearly presupposed a localized house church under a patron (Malherbe 1983: 103–109). The local patron, Diotrophes, had refused to welcome some traveling Christians with letters of recommendation into his assembly and even expelled some of his own congregation who wished to admit them (3 John 9–10). Thus, tensions erupted between several different house church cells, and the role of local patrons was significant.

Perhaps even more telling is the other letter (2 John) by the same Christian 'elder' who opposed Diotrophes, since his directives for dealing with traveling Christians closely parallel the actions taken by Diotrophes. It says, 'if anyone comes to you and does not bring this doctrine (didachēn) do not receive him into the house or give him any greeting (mē lambanete autōn eis oikian kai chairein autō mē legete); for the one who gives him greeting shares (koinōnei) in his evil works' (2 John 10). The formal greeting was a sign of hospitality and fellowship; it was not offered lightly. The visitor, therefore, was greeted formally at the door of the house and either welcomed or refused admission, in this case based on an anti-docetic creedal affirmation (2 John 7). The procedure makes it clear that admission to the house, and hence to the church's assembly space, had become an important symbol of fellowship. The door of the house and the ritualized greeting enacted there had begun to function both spatially and symbolically as boundary markers of the church. In effect, they had moved one step closer to equating the space where the church assembled with the 'church' as an idealized or symbolic entity.

This shift in conceptualization is very important to the later development of both ecclesiology and church architecture. It must be remembered that the term 'church' (ekklēsia) originally just meant the assembled group or congregation. In the Septuagint it was used to translate the symbolically loaded phrase 'congregation of Israel' (Deut. 23:1–3, 8; 31:30; 1 Kgs 8:14, 22, 55, 65; Neh. 8:2, 14; Sir. 15.5; 1 Macc. 4:59; 5:16; 14:19) and was synonymous with synagogue (sunagōgē, Exod. 16:9–10; 35:1; Deut. 5:22; 1 Kgs 12:20–21; Sir. 1:30; 1 Macc. 14:28). The two terms could also be used in combination as subject and verb (so 1 Kgs 12:21: exekklēsiasen tēn sunagōgēn) not unlike the phrasing typically found in Paul's letters (so 1 Cor. 11:18: sunerchomenōn humōn en ekklēsia, cf. 11:20; 14:23; and 1 Cor. 5:4 which explicitly uses the verb sunagō/-ein).

Only in the period well after the destruction of the temple do these terms become clearly differentiated along sectarian lines. Within the Jewish-Christian matrix of Matthew's gospel, the terms were used to distinguish two distinct congregations in social conflict—'[our] church' (Matt. 18:15–20) and 'their/your synagogue' (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9; 13:54; 23:34). Symbolization of the assembled congregation reinforced boundary definition of the group. It was analogous to that in the Johannine epistles, albeit on quite different grounds (cf. White 1991: 215–216 and n. 17). Growing tensions and boundary definition would result in the separation of the Christian movement from Judaism, at least in most regions, and thereupon the stage was set for a new kind of ideology of religious assembly to develop for both Jews and Christians (White 1998: 195–197). Nonetheless, local influences would still be determinative for each.

The domus ecclesiae and architectural adaptation

As Christianity became more firmly rooted in the urban social context of the Roman world, it followed common patterns of architectural adaptation and rebuilding. The cities themselves were constantly under construction, especially from Trajan to the Severans. Churches, like all sorts of other edifices, were built and rebuilt, remodeled and transformed with the urban growth of cities (see Figure 34.9). The progression toward a distinctive Christian architecture moved gradually to renovation of existing buildings in order to transform them into places set aside for assembly and other liturgical and social functions. To distinguish this phase from the house church, we use the term domus ecclesiae ('house of the church') based on terminology found in Eusebius' Historia Ecclesiastica 7.30.19 and others (Rordorf 1964: 117; Krautheimer 1979: 27; Finney 1988: 325, 331–335; White 1996–97: I. 111, II. 25–26).

The clearest example of this shift can be seen in a Christian building discovered at Dura-Europos in 1931 (Figure 34.10). It was a typical Durene house that had been adapted through a single phase of internal renovations to serve as a place of Christian assembly. In other words, through the process of renovation and adaptation it had become a building set aside for Christian religious functions. The nature of the renovations indicate that ordinary domestic functions ceased after the renovations; it had become a 'church building.' The house had been built about 231 CE and renovated as a domus ecclesiae in c. 240/1 (Kraeling 1967; White 1996–97: I. 120–122; II. 18–24 and no. 36). Because the city was destroyed in 256 CE during Sassanian incursions, it provides a rare case in early Christian architecture where there is clear evidence of an early stage of adaptation without later phases of rebuilding. It is also significant that along the same street were found two other houses that had been remodeled by religious groups—one a mithraeum that went through three phases of adaptation; the other, a synagogue that went through two. In both cases donor inscriptions commemorated the renovation work (White 1996–97: II. 10–18, II. nos. 58–61). The last phases of renovation in the mithraeum and the synagogue were contemporaneous with the single phase of renovation in the domus ecclesiae.

Among private dwellings at Dura, the house was fairly large but otherwise typical with several rooms grouped around a central courtyard. On the exterior the house was almost untouched and retained its domestic appearance. On the interior, the main structural modifications occurred in three areas: (a) the courtyard, (b) the south suite (Rooms 3, 4A, and 4B), and (c) the west suite (Rooms 5 and 6). Renovation of the courtyard was minimal; it included raising and paving the floor and installing two banks of L-shaped benches, and various finishing touches.

Site	No. of phases	Building type / renovations	Dates (ce)	First Xn. phase date
SYRIA (inc. Arabia)
Dura-Europos	2	[1]–[2]house/church	231–56	2/c. 240
Qirqbize	5	[1]–[2]house/hall; [3]–[5]basilica	330–VI	1/c. 330
Umm el-Jimal	3	[1]–[2]house; [3]basilica	IV–VI	2?–3/IV
PALESTINE
Capernaum	3	[1]house; [2]hall; [3]octagonal church	IV–VI	2/IV
Megiddo (Legio)	2–3	[1]domestic complex; [2]hall; [3]renovation/ decoration	III–V?	2/IV
MACEDONIA
Philippi	3	[1]Heröon; [2]hall church; [3]octagonal church	IV–VI	2/c. 334
ISTRIA
Parentium	5	[1]–[2]Roman edifice; [3]hall; [4]basilica; [5]cathedral	III–V	3/IV
Aquieleia	4	[1]house; [2]commercial building; [3]hall complex; [4]–[5]basilica	III–VI	3/IV
ITALY – ROME
Ss. Giovanni e Paolo	6	[1]–[3] house + insula; [4]lg. domus; [5]–[6]basilica	II–V	5/V
S. Clemente	5	[1]–[2]mag. + domus; [3]hall?; [4]–[5]basilica	I/III–V	3/III
S. Martino al Monti	4	[1]–[2]commercial building; [3]–[4]hall/basilica	III–VI	4/IV
S. Crisogono	4	[1]house; [2]hall; [3]–[4]basilica	II–VI	2/c. 310
BRITAIN
Lullingstone	5	[1]–[4]villa/chapel	IV–V	4/c. 350

Figure 34.9   Prebasilical church buildings: An archaeological survey of adaptation and renovation (White 1996–97: II. 27 = table 1, adapted)

In the south suite a formal door led from the court into Room 4A, originally the dining room of the house. With plaster benches and a brazier box, the dining room was typical of the Durene domestic diwan. Room 3 was most likely a pantry, while Room 4B was connected to other living areas of the house. In the remodeling of the edifice, the partition wall between Rooms 4A and 4B was removed. The floor was then filled in to the height of the benches to create one large room for assembly, with a dais installed at its east end. Room 3 continued to serve as a storage or preparation area. Other than plastering of the walls and memorial graffiti there was little or no decoration in this area; a low shuttered window was cut through to the courtyard. (On the nature of the assembly in these areas see also now MacMullen 2009: 1–10.)
Figure 34.10   The Christian building at Dura–Europos, before and after renovation (White 1996–97: II. fig. 2)

On the west side of the courtyard another formal doorway led to Room 5. Originally, Rooms 5 and/or 6 might have served as the women's quarters. Only minimal changes were made in Room 5; another shuttered window to the courtyard was introduced, and the door from Room 5 to Room 6 was fitted with more elaborate trim. Such formal trimwork is unusual for an interior doorway and suggests that this door had become part of a new pattern of movement through the edifice.

Room 6 had originally been only a modest chamber, but in the Christian renovations received the most extensive makeover of all. It was converted into a formal baptistry. A font basin nearly 1 m in depth was set into the floor on the west end of the room. Above it was a decorated canopy carried by pilasters and two plaster columns painted to look like marble. Above the canopy a new ceiling/floor structure divided the space vertically to create an upstairs apartment. On the south wall a small niche between the two doors was enlarged and arcuated, and low steps or benches were set along the east and west ends of the room. Then the entire room was decorated with an extensive pictorial program containing some of the earliest datable examples of Christian biblical illustrations. (On the iconographic traditions, with specific elements of eastern Christian art and liturgy, see now Peppard 2016.)

Along the east and north walls of Room 6 there were two registers that appear to wrap around the corner. The lower contained a scene of five women approaching the tomb (a sarcophagus) of Jesus. The composition suggests a processional toward the font, so that movement of initiates paralleled the scene from the gospels. All that is preserved of the upper register are two scenes depicting Jesus' miracles, both of which were associated with water. The lunette above the font contained a good shepherd scene and a small vignette of Adam and Eve. Immediately to its south side was a scene of the Samaritan woman at the well (so Kraeling 1967) or perhaps the annunciation to Mary at the 'spring' (from the Protevangelium of James, so Peppard 2016), and between the windows was a scene of David slaying Goliath. In the borders of this scene two Christian graffiti were incised, and a similar text appeared in Room 4 (White 1996–97: II. no. 37). The individuals commemorated by these graffiti might have been martyrs or, more likely, Christian leaders, or those who assisted in the renovation of the building.

Taken together, the renovations indicate a conscious plan to adapt the building for particular patterns of religious usage. One area was for assembly and worship, presumably including a eucharistic liturgy and teaching. The courtyard might also have been used for assembly and fellowship functions, but there is no direct evidence of communal dining. Rooms 5 and 6 seem to have been set aside for other specialized functions, especially baptism. It affords the earliest surviving evidence of a formally designed baptistry set within an actual Christian building. Nothing can be ascertained regarding the usage of the upper floor rooms.

The Dura–Europos Christian building thus marks a full transition to a specialized church edifice, a domus ecclesiae. While it is possible that this house was already in use by Christians before the renovation, there is no direct evidence. It is likely, however, that most local Christian congregations made a more gradual transition by partial adaptation. It is also likely that these stages of adaptation varied significantly from place to place. One might guess that the Dura–Europos building, located in a relatively remote garrison town on the eastern frontier, was not the first to devise such modes of spatial usage or artistic decoration, even though their appropriation was local and idiosyncratic.

The only other direct evidence of partial adaptation of a house for Christian assembly comes from the Lullingstone Roman Villa (Figure 34.11) near London (White 1996–97: I. 125; II. no. 57; Bowes 2008: 130–132). In one wing of the house, away from the formal dining area and an adjacent bath complex, a moderately sized room (locus C) and antechamber were decorated with Christian symbols. It appears that this wing also had a separate entrance allowing for Christian gatherings that did not interfere with continuing domestic functions in the remainder of the house. Like Dura, this case is remarkable for its date, since the installation of the Christian chapel occurred in the second half of the fourth century, well after basilical church buildings were being built at Rome and elsewhere. Hence, the phases suggested here are not meant to suggest strict chronological limits, but rather developmental stages. The progression might vary widely from place to place. Neither is it the case that every church building would have gone through all these stages.

Figure 34.11   Isometric drawing of the late Roman villa with Christian chapel, at Lullingstone, England
(White 1996–97: II. fig. 23)

Other instances of partial renovation have been proposed in two of the so-called titular churches of Rome, San Clemente and San Giovanni e Paolo (White 1996–97: I. 114–115; II. nos. 52–53).[14] In San Clemente there is archaeological evidence of Christian usage by the third century with the creation of a large assembly hall on an upper level before being thoroughly rebuilt in basilical form in the early fifth century. In the case of San Clemente, there is no clear evidence of a domus ecclesiae phase in between the earlier Roman warehouse building and the Christian hall of the third/fourth centuries. Since tradition holds that there were congregations associated with both churches at earlier times, it has been assumed that some sort of spatial provisions had already been made; however, direct archaeological evidence is lacking (Krautheimer 1979: 29–30; Snyder 1985: 76; White 1996–97: II. 1–6). Recent archaeological work on the lower structures of San Giovanni e Paolo have now shown that the earlier buildings (including a house with nymphaeum and an adjacent apartment building) had indeed been taken over and renovated in the fourth century. The new owner seems to have been a Christian aristocrat, and the renovations created a lavish house with numerous rooms on the upper (mezzanine) level. The artistic decoration of these rooms (now beautifully restored for viewing) included many apparently Christian motifs, including a room with 'praying' figures (or orantes). It seems that this urban palazzo was likely given over entirely to a massive rebuilding as a basilica dedicated to Saints John and Paul by the early part of the fifth century. Prior to that, there is no direct evidence of a Christian meeting place, even though local tradition identifies this with two earlier tituli, that of a certain Byzans and that of a certain Sylvester. (For discussion, see now Brenk 2005, 2013, and below for the later adaptation to basilical form).[15]

At least some literary texts suggest that such changes were already at work by the beginning of the third century in some of the more populous regions. Clement of Alexandria, writing near the turn of the third century, preferred to call it 'not the place, but the assembly of the elect, the church' (Stromateis 7.5; White 1996–97: II. no. 12a). Indeed, his emphatic tone suggests that the terminology had already begun to blur. Even Clement himself on another occasion refers to 'going to church' in such a way as to suggest both a regular time and place of assembly; in regard to dress and deportment he further draws distinctions between inside and outside the church assembly (Paedagogus 3.11; White 1996–97: II. no. 12b).

Moreover, Clement seems to reflect a worship context where the eucharist and the agape or fellowship meal had already become fully separated (Paedagogus 2.1). Writing at the same time in North Africa, Tertullian shows no clear distinction (Apology 39; White 1996–97: II. no.13a); however, within two decades at Rome the liturgical tradition of Hippolytus makes the separation explicit and further regulates the convening of private Christian dinners (Apostolic Tradition 21–26; White 1996–96: II. no. 14, 1998: 181–185; cf. Bobertz 1993). It is likely that such localized patterns of liturgical development were reflected in the physical arrangements and adaptations. The spatial articulation of the Dura domus ecclesiae presupposed a separate and more formal eucharistic assembly with no social dining. One must guess that this change marked a broader shift in the spatial articulation and layout for Christian assembly.

The Dura domus ecclesiae is also important because it suggests that the edifice had become the property of the church and was publically identifiable even though it had not yet become a distinctive church architecture. Other literary and documentary sources provide important historical indicators to support this shift. The Edessen Chronicle, a fifth-century Syriac court record, reports 'a temple (or sanctuary) of the church of the Christians' that was destroyed along with other buildings by a flood in the year 201 CE (§ 8; White 1996–97: II. no. 26). Later, the Chronicle (§ 12) mentions a new church foundation in the year 313 by the bishop Kūnē. Given the nature of these references, it does not suggest a more formal type of architecture in the year 201, but rather the wording of a door plaque from an earlier type of domus ecclesiae (White 1996–97: I. 118).

The aula ecclesiae

By the end of the third century church buildings were clearly recognized by local civic officials in many cities. Such can be seen from villages in Egypt, where census and court records openly mention Christian 'church buildings' (P.Oxy. I.43; VI.903; P.Gen.Inv. 108) as well as property transfers and ownership by the church (P.Oxy. XII.1492; P.Gen.Inv. 108; White 1996–97: II. nos. 43–45, 47). In some other cases there are court records of the search and seizure of church property during the Diocletianic persecution. From Egypt the reader of a village church near Oxyrhynchus filed a property declaration after their church building was seized in 304 (P.Oxy. XXXIII.2673; White 1996–97: II. no. 46). From the previous year a court record from Cirta in Numidia records the search of the local church building and describes its dining hall (triclinium), a library, and a large cache of clothing, apparently for charitable distribution; however, no description is given of the assembly room proper (Acta Munati Felicis from the Gestae apud Zenophilum; White 1996–97: II. no. 31). One might well guess that the edifice was still in the form of a domus ecclesiae, but certainty is impossible. Clearly the church edifice at Nicomedia, whose destruction Diocletian is reported to have witnessed from his palace, was a publically recognized edifice even though it was not a monumental church building (Lactantius, De mortibus persecutorum 12; White 1996–97: II. no. 24).

These records suggest that in between the renovation of existing structures to form a domus ecclesiae and the building of monumental basilicas after the peace of Constantine, there was an intermediate stage of development in which further enlargement and specialized adaptations were introduced. Although local variations must be allowed, this stage occurred generally in the second half of the third century CE. It continued in some localities, including Rome itself, through the fourth century. This type of development is what Eusebius describes regarding the rebuilding of older church buildings in the period of growth before the Great Persecution. He says:

> With what favor one may observe the rulers in every church being honored by all procurators and governors or how could anyone describe those assemblies with numberless crowds and the great throngs gathered together in every city as well as the remarkable concourses in the houses of prayer? On account of these things, no longer being satisfied with their old buildings (tois palai oikodomēmasin), they erected from the foundations churches of spacious dimensions in every city (eis platos ana pasas tas poleis ek themeliōn anistōn ekklēsias).
>
> (Historia Ecclesiastica 8.1.5; White 1996–97: II. no. 23b)

Eusebius' comments ring with some realistic elements, including rebuilding and enlarging the old buildings 'from the foundations.'[16] Because many of the buildings include larger hall-shaped structures in their building plans, we may designate this phase the aula ecclesiae (or 'hall of the church'). Still it does not imply the architectural elements or the scale that would be introduced with the basilica.

Eusebius' comments were doubtless hyperbole, since he interpreted this period of popular growth as a cause of the ensuing persecutions (Historia Ecclesiastica 8.1.9–2.5). Nonetheless, there is considerable evidence that it was a period of new growth in church building and adaptation. Unfortunately the literary sources rarely give physical and architectural descriptions of these buildings; however, a few passing references may provide some clues. For example, Cyprian's letters from the middle of the third century occasionally mention accoutrements of assembly. In referring to the ordination of a reader, he spoke of placing him 'upon the pulpit (pulpitum), that is upon the tribunal of church,' which was 'propped up in the place of highest elevation and conspicuous to the entire congregation' (Epistle 39.4.1; White 1996–97: II. no. 16.a). In other places it appears that the phrase 'to ascend the platform' (ad pulpitum venire) had become a technical term for ordination (cf. Ep. 38.2; 40).

So it seems that by the middle of the third century in Carthage, at least, the church building had been outfitted with a raised dais or platform (called pulpitum or tribunal) for some clerical and liturgical functions. While the general plan of Cyprian's church building cannot be ascertained, it suggests something of a larger rectangular hall with a dais on one end. In a letter to the bishop of Rome, Cyprian referred to this space as 'the sacred and venerated congestum of the clergy' (Ep. 59.18.1; White 1996–97: II. no. 16.d). Such a construction may have been the forerunner of the chancel as a segregated area for clergy.

This picture is supported in other large urban centers of the empire during the latter half of the second century. At Antioch the ecclesiastical crisis precipitated by the episcopate of Paul of Samosata (261–270 CE) similarly provokes passing references to activities inside their church buildings. Among the charges leveled against Paul prior to his expulsion as a heretic, was that he had installed a throne and a secretum on the bema in his church at Antioch (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 7.30.9; White 1996–97: II. no. 20). The terminology used here explicitly comes from the arena of Roman civic architecture since the Greek text mentions the Latin secretum (sēkrēton), the private chamber of a Roman magistrate, while bema (bēma) is the usual Greek equivalent for the Latin pulpitum, the raised platform on which the magistrate sat. To Paul's outraged opponents, these elements of public architecture were less a threat in themselves than they were symptomatic of Paul's inordinate self-aggrandizement and his other faulty theological ideas. There is no indication that these installations were removed from the building when Paul was expelled. Thus, it appears that the church at Antioch by the year 270 had become a large hall of some sort with several accoutrements of public architecture. It had become an aula ecclesiae.

It is also noteworthy that other buildings from the same period lagged far behind in size and architectural articulation. The simpler domus ecclesiae at Dura-Europos was roughly contemporaneous with the more elaborate buildings suggested for Carthage and Antioch. On the other hand, household meetings were still common during the Diocletianic persecution, and other church buildings still presupposed some elements of domestic architecture (White 1996–97: I. 126; II. nos. 21, 36). Sources from this period indicate further elaborations in the ordering of assembly, at least in some areas. The Syriac Didascalia, for example, is the earliest church order text to prescribe a seating arrangement for various members of the congregation in a pattern that fits a rectangular hall plan, whether of larger or smaller dimensions (§ 12; White 1996–97: II. no. 18).

The archaeological evidence supports this picture of a gradual progression toward rectangular assembly halls. The clearest case of a pre-Constantinian church building, apparently planned de novo for Christian use is that of San Crisogono in Rome's Trastevere region (Figures 34.12 and 34.13b). It was apparently designed as a large, rectangular hall of irregular proportions (length: 35.35 m; width: 17.25–19.25 m) with an exterior portico on one side but no interior divisions (Krautheimer 1979: 37–38; Snyder 1985: 81–82; White 1996–97: II. 55). It was built by about the year 310 and continued in this rudimentary form for over a century before it was remodeled. In the early sixth century its western wall was leveled, the hall was extended, and an apse added onto the new west end. On the east end, a crossing wall was introduced to divide the assembly hall (or nave) from a vestibule (or narthex), thereby giving it some features of basilical architecture. Even so, the edifice lacked the colonnaded aisles typical of true basilical architecture; only in the twelfth century was the church thoroughly rebuilt as a basilica on top of the original buildings (Figure 34.13).

Two of the Roman tituli (the traditional 'parish' churches) seem to reflect a stage of adaptation from existing buildings directly to the aula ecclesiae. One is San Clemente (Figure 34.14), where a plain hall edifice was constructed on the upper floor level of the late third century and survived to the beginning of the fifth century before the first basilica was built on this basic plan (White 1996–97: II. no. 53).

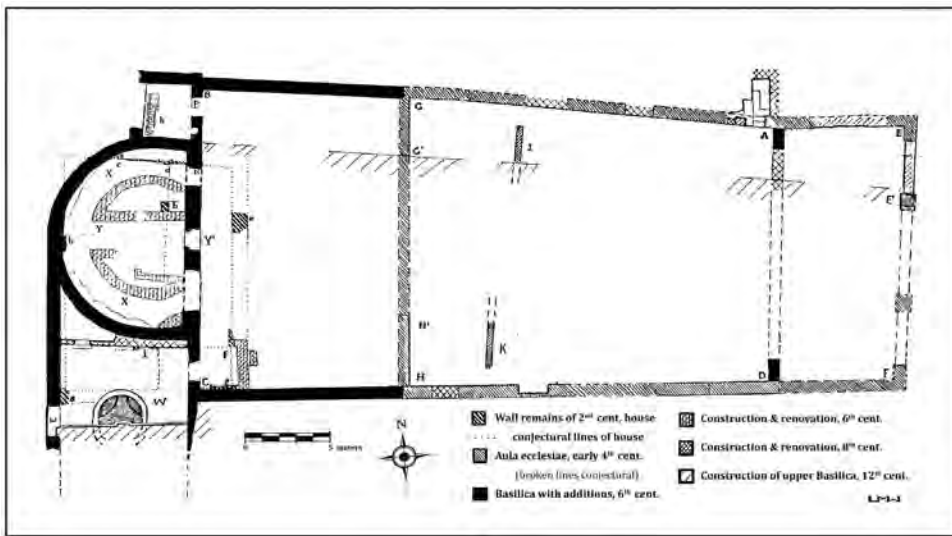
The basilica of Ss. Giovanni e Paolo was built c. 410 CE over an earlier apartment building with ground-floor shops. The nave of the basilica was set just above the level of the second story of this apartment complex, which had been renovated in the fourth century as an urban palazzo (figures 27.15–16; Brenk 2005).


Figure 34.12 Plan of San Crisogono in Rome (White 1996–97: II. fig. 19)

The prevalence of the aula ecclesiae is shown by the fact that throughout the fourth century new church construction continued in this form alongside the introduction of basilical architecture. Four cases are worth noting. First is the so-called 'basilica of Paul,' a small hall edifice found beneath the fifth-century octagonal church D at Philippi (Figures 34.16 and 34.17). The name comes from an inscription in its mosaic floor, which also identifies its bishop, Porphyrios; on this basis it can be dated roughly between 330–340 CE (White 1996–97: I. 134–136, II. no. 49; MacMullen 2009: 10–12).
Figure 34.13 Siting plan and restoration drawing of early aula ecclesiae, San Crisogono, Rome (White 1996–97: II. fig. 20a–b)
Figure 34.14 Isometric drawing of San Clemente, Rome (White 1996–97: II. fig. 17)

Despite the terminology of the inscription it was not a true basilica architecturally; however, this usage suggests that the term 'basilica' had already been applied to 'church buildings' apart from its more precise architectural signification (Voelkl 1954; White 1996–97: I. 196 and n. 92).

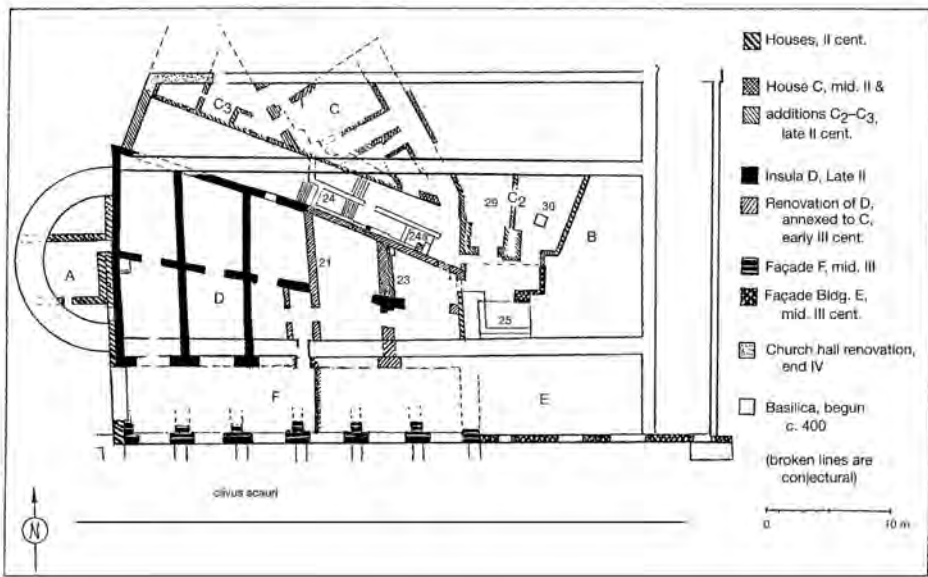
Second is the simple hall from Qirqbize (near Aleppo in Roman Coelesyria), built in the first third of the fourth century. The nature of the construction shows that it was modeled in part after a domestic plan, with a porticoed courtyard flanking the hall proper; however, it was designed for Christian usage from the beginning. In its later stages, the hall was adapted to a basilical style on the interior, in keeping with typical Syrian church architecture of the fifth and sixth centuries. It likely served as a village church, and might have been built by the owner of the estate next door (White 1996–97: II. 38 with plans).


Figure 34.15 Plan of Ss. Giovanni e Paolo, Rome (White 1996–97: II fig. 14)

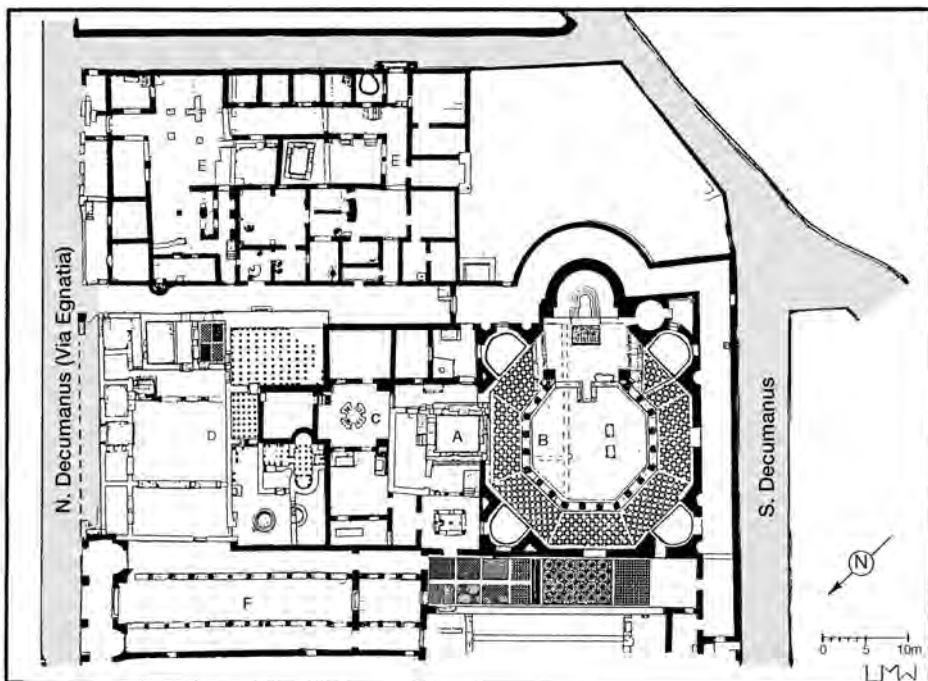
Third is the early church edifice found beneath two later layers of basilical construction at Parentium, Istria (modern Parenzo or Poreč). The sixth-century complex is known as the Basilica of


Figure 34.16 Plan of the octagonal church at Philippi (White 1996–97: II. fig. 9)
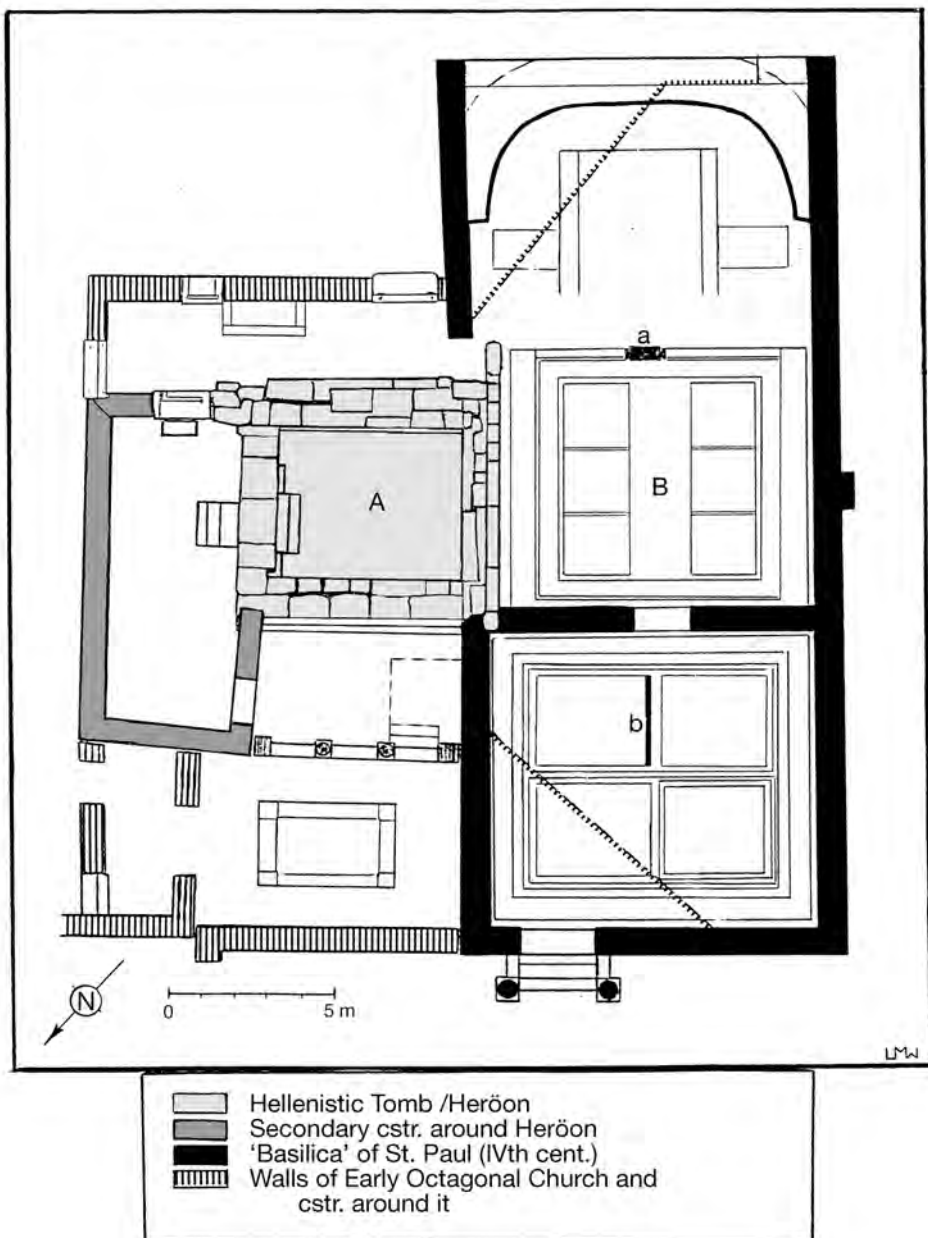

Figure 34.17 Plan of the Basilica of Paul at Philippi (White 1996–97: II. fig. 10)

Eufrasius. It stood over a fifth-century basilica with elaborate mosaic floors, which in turn stood over a fourth-century aula ecclesiae that also contained Christian mosaic floors. Legends associated with the fifth-century construction held that the earlier building had been the house of a martyr bishop Maurus, and the earlier edifice was thought to be a domus ecclesiae. While some earlier domestic structures may be present, it appears that the first Christian construction belongs to the fourth-century building, a de novo Christian edifice with two small parallel halls and other associated rooms (White 1996–97: 122, 194 n. 73, II. no. 50 with plans).

A final example is the Christian 'chapel' recently discovered and excavated (2004–5) at the site of Roman Megiddo (Legio or Kefar 'Othnay) in Israel (under a modern prison). During the second and third centuries the site had been the home of a legionary fortress. The 'chapel' consists of a large hall divided laterally into two uneven quadrangular rooms by an arch (probably) supported by pilasters; it has a mosaic floor with explicit Christian inscriptions and dedications, and a central table (set under the arch). It seems to have been built in (or on top of) what had earlier been a domestic quarter of contiguous buildings in the village adjacent to the military camp. It thus seems to represent the 'village church' but apparently also claimed members among the soldiers.[17] Conversion of the building into a church seems to have occurred sometime in the late third or early fourth century, and conceivably after the time of Constantine (see Tepper and Di Segni 2006; Adams 2008).

The birth of the basilica: the fourth and fifth centuries

The period immediately after the Edict of Milan (313 CE) saw a new burst of church building, which Eusebius contrasts to the 'destruction of the churches' during the persecutions (Historia Ecclesiastica 10.3.1). His programmatic interests are nonetheless visible:

> [a] divine joy blossomed in all as we beheld every place which, a short time before, had been torn down by the impious deeds of the tyrants. Reviving as from long and deadly mistreatment, the temples were raised once again from the foundation to a lofty height and received in far greater measure the magnificence of those that had formerly been destroyed.
>
> *(*Historia Ecclesiastica 10.2.1, emphasis added)

While some churches were doubtless destroyed, it was not uniform. Lactantius describes the demolition of the church building at Nicomedia in 303 (De mortibus persecutorum 12); however, aula ecclesiae already built at Rome (San Clemente) show no signs of destruction and rebuilding from the early decades of the fourth century. In fact, new and larger churches, such as San Crisogono, were being built during the period when the edicts of persecution were still in effect (303–313). It is likely that the majority of church buildings, if they were touched at all, were merely 'seized' by state or local officials. Implementation of the imperial orders varied from region to region. The edicts of toleration and largesse under Constantine and his coregents consistently called for restoration of these church properties to the Christians. Nonetheless, it appears that the period of peace and growth beginning in 313 stimulated new building programs both on the local and the imperial level.

Eusebius' principal example is the church at Tyre rebuilt by the young, aristocratic bishop Paulinus. At its dedication in 317 Eusebius himself delivered the sermon in which he likened it to Zerubbabel's rebuilding of Solomon's temple CE (Historia Ecclesiastica 10.4.36–45; White 1996–97: II. no. 23d). He went on to develop an extended allegory on the .church as God's new, triumphant temple of God on earth (Historia Ecclesiastica 10.4.46–68). Despite Eusebius' elaborate description of its embellishments, the newly rebuilt church at Tyre does not appear to be a basilica in architectural form, but rather a monumental aula ecclesiae (White 1996–97: I. 136; cf. Krautheimer 1979: 45–46). It is also noteworthy that the project seems to be a local initiative undertaken, at least in large measure, by the young bishop of Tyre as an act of public benefaction.[18] Even so, it is clear that Eusebius was applying notions of sacred space and architecture to the church buildings both before and after the persecutions (Finney 1984: 217–225). The entry of Constantine into this process would add yet another dimension, but the architectural revolution did not occur overnight (Voelkl 1953).

Constantine's building program

A number of earlier theories regarding the origins of the Christian basilica attempted to find a genetic progression from houses (and the house church) or other non-public type of architecture

(White 1996–97: I. 11–17). Some relatively recent studies continue to argue that the basilica had already been introduced into Christian usage during the third century (Rordorf 1964: 127–128). Typically, these theories have carried two underlying assumptions: (a) that the basilica as monumental church architecture consciously avoided traditional Roman religious forms, and (b) that Christian liturgy was the determining factor in shaping its distinctive architectural plan.

A new consensus has emerged since the work of Richard Krautheimer (1939, 1979) and J. B. Ward-Perkins (1954). They argued instead that the basilica was a conscious feature of Constantine's policy toward the Christians in the years following 313. The plan was taken from standard forms of monumental civic architecture at Rome. Constantine and Maxentius had only a little earlier (306–310) built a new public audience hall in the Forum Romanum. Christian basilicas derived their basic plan and construction from such civil and imperial halls; they were then adapted self-consciously under imperial patronage to fit the new social and legal status of Christianity. This monumental type of architecture was intended to make a statement about the public acceptance and imperial favor of Christianity and to give it a formal style within the urban landscape. Nonetheless, it shows continuities with earlier patterns of architecture, where a 'hall' of assembly had already emerged. Thus, the basilica as an accepted form of public 'assembly' architecture was a natural choice. Given its traditional civic and military functions, not to mention specific rituals employed in imperial usage, the basilica may properly be considered a type of religious architecture for corporate activity long before its Christian adaptation (Krautheimer 1979: 42). It thereby offered more grandiose elements of style as well as notions of sacred space. Liturgy was also anticipated in the choice of the architecture, but at the same time it was transformed by this choice.

Constantinian patronage set the tone for the transformation of Christian architecture, but prior to c. 350 there still was no set form of basilical church planning (Krautheimer 1979: 43). Regional variations would also evolve, and local builders experimented with designs, as in the cross-arcaded basilica of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme at Rome (completed in c. 329 CE; Krautheimer 1979: 51). Initially at least, adaptation both of basilical form and of existing buildings was still the norm. The first Christian basilica in this strict sense was the Church of St. John Lateran in Rome (Figure 34.18). Originally an imperial palace and barracks complex donated by Constantine himself, the church was begun in 314, the same year that the emperor called for the church council at Arles to consider the Donatist question. The construction was completed by 319/20 (Ward-Perkins 1954: 85–87; Krautheimer 1979: 42–49). A five-aisle hall measuring 75 meters by 55 meters with an apsidal sanctuary and synthronon extending 20 meters more, it soon became the seat of the bishop of Rome. The exterior was finished in a plain plaster while the interior was lavishly decorated, no doubt from imperial gifts.

The plan of the Lateran basilica would eventually become typical of western church architecture, albeit with modifications. The classical Christian basilica comprised a central, rectangular nave oriented on its long axis and flanked by either two or four side aisles separated by columns. This style of construction allowed for a wide hall while still providing a high central clerestory for windows. The entry to the Lateran basilica, as with earlier aula ecclesiae, was not mediated through a portico or propylaeon; later it became typical to front the nave proper with a lateral entry hall (or narthex), usually with either three or five doors. Eventually, church buildings were turned to face east, toward the rising sun as a symbol of resurrection; however, the Lateran basilica, like San Clemente and a number of others, had its apse on the west end. Initially orientation of basilicas was not fixed and depended on the existing buildings and other factors in the sighting of the plan (see De Blaauw 1994, 2007: 297–299).

Finally, it became common for basilicas to include an atrium or forecourt before the entrance and narthex. Rather than the traditional atrium of Roman domestic architecture, however, it was more properly a tetrastoa or peristyle court. The first Constantinian building to incorporate the atrium was St. Peter's at Rome, begun in c. 317–319 but as a funerary basilica rather than a regular church building (Figure 34.19). Even so, it is possible that the atrium was added subsequent to the initial construction (Krautheimer 1979: 57–59). According to Eusebius, the rebuilt church at Tyre
Figure 34.18   Isometric reconstruction of the Lateran Basilica, Rome (Krautheimer 1979: 47, fig. 11)

(dedicated in 317) already contained an open-air court with four stoai, probably a peristyle, but his description implies that it was a viewed as a novel design (Historia Ecclesiastica 10.4.40).

St. Peter's also introduced another architectural innovation over the plan of the Lateran basilica in the form of a transverse hall (or transept) crossing between the nave and the apse. In other basilicas the end of the nave just before the apse served for the altar and clergy, with the bishop and others seated in the synthronon of the apse. At St. Peter's, the transept formally and spatially divided the nave from the apse; immediately before the apse stood a baldachno over the altar and the venerated tombs that lay beneath the floor (Krautheimer 1979: 57). The transept did double duty, serving as a place for the clergy during regular services but also serving for commemorations of the shrine of St. Peter, legendarily identified with one particular tomb structure in the earlier necropolis adjacent to the hippodrome of Nero. The church complex was intentionally placed above this necropolis by an elaborate architectural design to adapt the foundations to the slope of the hill along which the necropolis was set (Snyder 1985: 105–115, with further bibliography). The result was a monumental edifice measuring 119 x 64 meters on the interior, not counting the atrium forecourt (Krautheimer 1979: 57).
Figure 34.19   Plan of the Constantinian Basilica of St. Peter's, Rome (Krautheimer 1979: 56, fig. 22)

While Constantine supported the building of basilical churches at Rome and elsewhere, the construction of St. Peter's reflects another conscious element in his building program through the architectural commemoration of Christian sacred sites. Near the end of Constantine's life Eusebius dedicated a biography to the emperor in which he recited the list of his major building projects (Vita Constantini 3.25–43; 51–53); his interests turned especially to the Holy Land, as it was coming to be called (Wilken 1992: 82–97). His agent in identifying key sites was his mother, Helena Augusta (c. 250–330 CE), who visited Jerusalem in 326. According to tradition, she found the site of the cross and burial of Jesus on which Constantine would build the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (Drijvers 1992). Constantine also supported the building of the Church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives and the Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem; he also gave permission to others to build churches at sites associated with events in the life of Jesus, such as the site called the house of St. Peter at Capernaum where a memoria was built by Joseph of Tiberias (White 1996–97: II, 155).

The Constantinian foundations at both Golgotha (completed c. 330 CE) and Bethlehem (333) followed the basilical architecture already pioneered at Rome for the memoria of Peter. They were five-aisle basilicas with atrium forecourts (Krautheimer 1979: 60–65). In both cases, however, the actual sacred locus was commemorated by a building of central plan extended from the apse end of the basilica proper. In the Church of the Nativity, an octagonal room memorializing the birthplace of Jesus replaced the apse proper; in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, a rotunda was connected to the basilica's apse by a porticoed court (MacDonald 1977: 20–21). Thus, Constantine's building program anticipated the blending of central plan buildings with the longitudinal plan of the basilica; however, central plan architecture (polygonal or rotunda type) was generally reserved for special memorial edifices, either for the dead or for gods (Krautheimer 1979: 66). At least in the beginning, the longitudinal plan of the basilica was primarily the one reserved for traditional Christian assembly and worship.

Local and regional variations

It is likely that over the next few centuries pilgrimage traffic to key sites in Rome and the Holy Land was a powerful force in disseminating the 'Constantinian' type of basilica (Krautheimer 1979: 66). By the end of the fourth century it had become pervasive, especially in the west. Even so, it must be remembered that many of the older domus ecclesiae and aula ecclesiae structures continued in uninterrupted use alongside these new constructions. At Rome itself, the apparent 'aula ecclesiae' of San Clemente remained unchanged until c. 400–410 before being rebuilt in basilical form (White 1996–97: II. nos. 52–53). For a catalogue of churches in the Roman empire built before 400 CE, see MacMullen 2009: 117–141.

In many other cases. new churches were founded in the post-Constantinian era by loosely adapting existing buildings to a rudimentary basilical plan. It sometimes meant little more than spatially marking off a hall and constructing an apse in an otherwise substantial building or complex, as in the case of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme and a number of the fourth-century titular churches of Rome (Vaes 1984–86: 316; White 1996–97: II. 437–438). This practice continued through the fourth century and into the fifth, especially in the larger cities of the eastern empire. They were able to appropriate and convert various other types of buildings, including libraries, market halls, an odeion, and other public edifices (Vaes 1984–86: 318–321). At Ostia (Figure 34.1 locus D), for example, a bath complex and an adjacent building were adapted to form an unusual basilical type structure. First thought to be a Christian church, it now seems rather to be the private house of a Christian aristocrat (Meiggs 1973: 397–399). The Constantinian basilica of Ostia, a monumental de novo construction, has only recently been discovered (1996) just inside the city walls on the southern side of Ostia. It was built on top of what had previously been a residential area of apartment buildings. At least two other cemetarial basilicas were eventually built outside the city: one dedicated to San Ercolano in the necropolis to the south of the Porta Romana and another (now called the Pianabella Basilica) to the South of the Porta Laurentina, in an extension of the large Via Laurentina necropolis. It was also at Ostia in the fifth century that the wealthy Christian senator Anicius Auchenius Bassus (II) dedicated a shrine to Monica, mother of St. Augustine, after she died there in 388 CE (Meiggs 1973: 213, 399; Augustine, Confessions 9.10–13). Gradually, the city was being 'Christianized' at the level of public architecture (Boin 2013).

Even more noteworthy was the fact that Christians began to take over traditional pagan temples and convert them loosely to basilical form. This process can be seen most clearly in fifth-century Athens, where the Parthenon of the Acropolis and the Hephasteion of the agora, were converted to churches; a similar fate awaited the Pantheon at Rome, the temple of Apollo at Daphne (Julian, Misopogon 361A–363A), and many others (Hanson 1978; Vaes 1984–86: 326–333). Despite the appeals of Firmicus Maternus (De errore profanarum religionum 28.6), it is not likely that many cases of destruction or conversion of pagan religious architecture took place before the end of the fourth century. The process was facilitated by edicts of Theodosius banning pagan cultus and ordering the destruction of rural temples (Codex Theodosianus 16.10.10, 16). At the local level, however, tensions and outbreaks of violence arose on both sides. At Alexandria, Christian mobs sacked and burned the Sarapeion and murdered the philosopher Hypatia (Theodoret, Historia Ecclesiastica 5.22.3–6; Socrates, Historia Ecclesiastica 7.15). Elsewhere, pagans rioted to preserve their local temples (Libanius, Pro templis 8.9; Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 7.15.11–15).

A special case in this regard is the Church of Mary, also known as the Church of the Councils, at Ephesos, which has long been thought where the Council of Ephesos of 431 was held (Krautheimer 1979: 113–115). The edifice is unique among Christian churches, a double basilica measuring some 275 meters in length with an apse on either end. It has now been found that the church structure was built in the south hall of the outer ambulatory of the Temple of Zeus Olympus (or Hadrianeion), originally built by Hadrian. The south hall was further elaborated in the early third century with an imperial cult sanctuary for Macrinus (Karwiese 1995: 314–315). The entire temple complex was destroyed by Christians in c. 400; however, the magnificent double church was not constructed until near the end of the fifth century using spoils from the temple complex (Karwiese 1995: 316). This means that the council of 431 must have been convened elsewhere in another church building so far not discovered. Ephesos' associations with the cult of Mary apparently also faced a difficult time in this period (Limberis 1995). All the same, new church constructions continued in the ruins of monumental imperial architecture. At Rome in c. 400 CE, a mithraem installed some 200 years earlier in an imperial palace was destroyed and the Church of Santa Prisca built on top of it (White 1996–97: II. no. 89). Church construction put a new, 'Christian' face on the urban landscape, but often by renovating or replacing traditional forms of public religious architecture with its own.

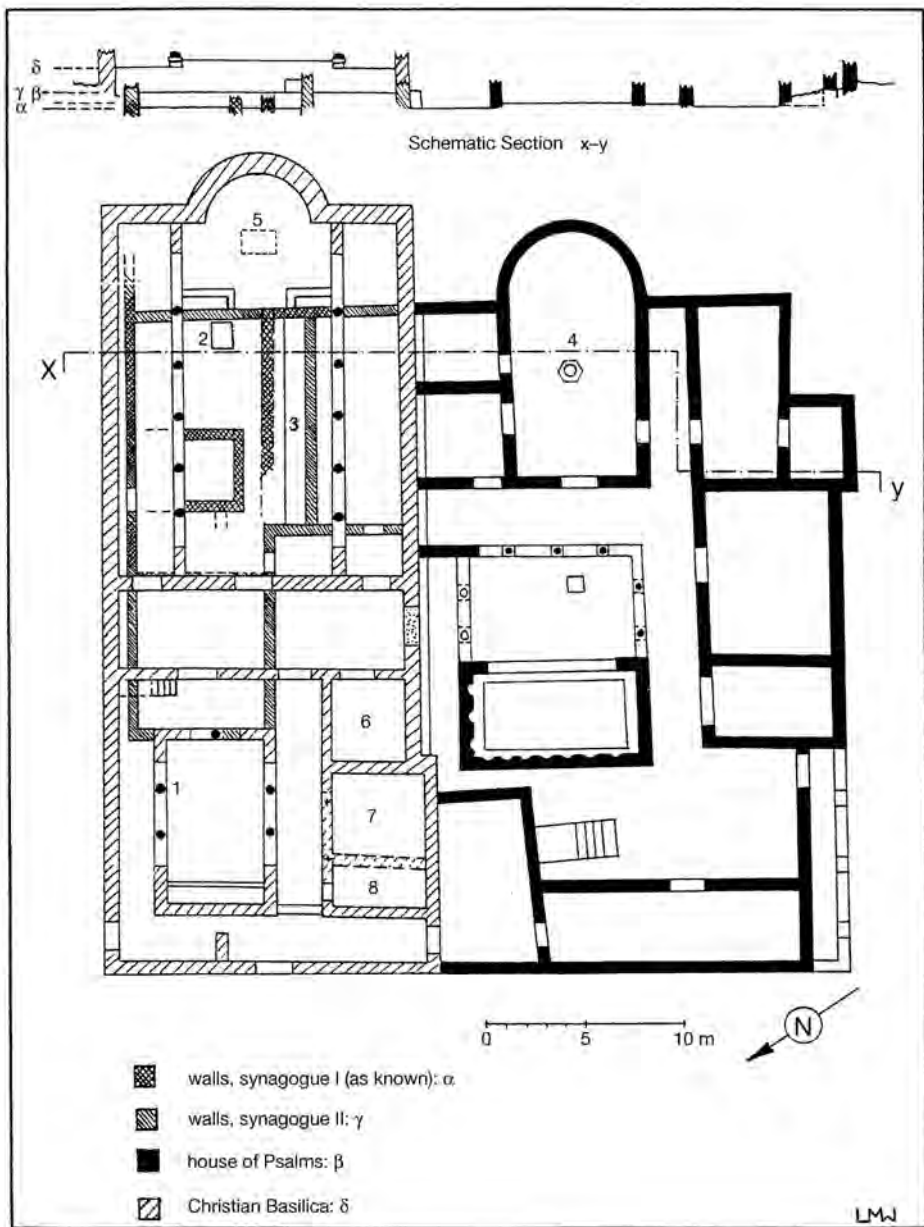
Christians took over Jewish synagogues as well. Despite an imperial edict protecting Jews and pagans who 'live quietly and attempt to do nothing disorderly or contrary to law' (Cod. Theod. 16.10.24) Christian triumphalism turned violent. The case of the destruction of the synagogue at Callinicum in 388 CE by a mob of local Christians is well known from the exchange between Ambrose and Theodosius (Ambrose, Epistles 40.6–7; 41.25–28). At Gerasa in the Transjordan, the local synagogue was taken over to build a church. Also near the end of the fourth century in northern Macedonia at Stobi, another synagogue that had been in use for nearly two centuries and in two distinct phases of rebuilding was systematically destroyed and the remains incorporated into a Christian basilica (Figure 34.20). It is thus noteworthy that some of its earlier architectural elements and dedicatory inscriptions were reused, apparently without alteration, in the new Christian edifice (White 1996–97: II. nos. 72–73).


Figure 34.20 Plan of the synagogue and basilica complex at Stobi (White 1996–97: II. fig. 38)

Jews in other cities fared far better. For example, at Sardis, the Jewish community was apparently given possession of one wing of the municipal bath/gymnasium complex sometime in the third century. By the late fourth century, after several stages of renovation, it had become an elaborately decorated basilica in keeping with, and perhaps influenced by, contemporaneous architectural developments among Christians (Figure 34.21). With interior dimensions of 82.5 x 18 meters, it was by far the largest synagogue now known from antiquity (White 1996–97: II. nos. 66–67). It continued in uninterrupted operation until the city was destroyed in 616 CE.
Figure 34.21   Plan of the synagogue at Sardis (White 1996–97: II. fig. 33)

While basilical planning became predominant in the course of the fourth century, there were local and regional variations. By the early fifth century there emerged in the Aegean coastlands (Greece and Turkey) a distinctive adaptation of the basic basilical plan, typically with a much squarer nave and often with cruciform transept (Krautheimer 1979: 126–132). When later combined with central planning, this style would result in some of the great domed church buildings of the Byzantine tradition, including the monumental Hagia Sophia at Constantinople as rebuilt by Justinian in 561 CE. At Philippi during the fifth century, the earlier aula ecclesiae dedicated in the name of Paul was finally renovated as a hybrid basilica. From the exterior, the edifice appeared to be a squarish basilica with apse on its east side. On the interior, the nave was an octagonal colonnade with clerestory cupola; four apsidal exedrae were tucked into the corners. The apse extended from one of the sides of the octagon. The buildings surrounding the church were remodeled and incorporated into an ecclesiastical complex. They included a baptistry converted from an earlier bath building and a large complex that likely served as Episkopeion or bishop's residence (White 1996–97: II. no. 49 with further bibliography). A similar suggestion has been made regarding the complex around the Church of St. Augustine at Hippo Regius, since it was a typical western basilica but surrounded by what appear to be contiguous domestic structures (Marrou 1960).

Syrian churches were influenced by this Aegean tradition (Krautheimer 1979: 145), but also developed peculiar traits. Rather than entering on the end opposite the apse, Syrian churches often had their main doors (usually two or three) on the side of the nave (see Figure 34.22). The doors might have been designated clergy and laity, or men and women, respectively. These Syrian churches sometimes had external apses, but many had only internal apsidal constructions flanked by exedrae. The ambo—a semi-circular enclosure with interior benches and steps to a rostrum— was a peculiar adaptation to the Syrian liturgical tradition. This structure was situated in the middle of the nave and probably housed the bishop and attendants during some portion of the service (Lassus and Tchalenko 1951). Finally, many Syrian churches seem to comprise large complexes of buildings with differentiated functions, perhaps reflecting a monumental version of the different rooms of an earlier style of domus ecclesiae (Lassus 1947: 22–23; Lassus and Tchalenko 1951; Krautheimer 1979: 149–151; White 1996–97: I. 122–123). A good example is the Church of St. Paul and Moses at Dar Qita (Figure 34.22).
Figure 34.22   Plan of the Church of St. Paul and Moses at Dar Qita (Krautheimer 1979: 150, fig. 97)

Other types of Christian architecture: martyria and baptisteries

As already noted, buildings with a central plan (square, polygonal, or round) had originally been associated more with memorial architecture, mausolea, and sanctuaries rather than assembly. Thus, in the pre-Constantian period the architecture of assembly developed in a different realm and different architectural medium from the cult of the dead (Krautheimer 1979: 30). The adaptation of central plan to memorial architecture arose beginning in the second century when Hadrian had the Pantheon rebuilt after it had long been favored for imperial mausolea. Such memorial associations probably account for appropriation of central plan edifices in conjunction with the basilicas at Golgotha and Bethlehem. Gradually, the central plan was integrated with the basilical plan especially in the Aegean regions, later the center of Byzantine Christianity. It was especially popular for martyria or churches built to memorialize key events in the biblical tradition and in the life of Christ or to commemorate martyrs who had died for the faith (Grabar 1946; Ward-Perkins 1966; De Blaauw 2007: 301–309).

Octagonal churches became common in the fourth to sixth centuries. When blended with the rectangular plan of the basilica, it resulted in monumental domed churches, such as Hagia Sophia at Constantinople, San Vitale at Ravenna, and the Church of St. John at Ephesos. While central planning was thus integrated with basilical style, two other specialized appropriations continued in Christian architecture apart from the ordinary assembly and worship setting.

Martyria, catacombs, and cemetery basilicas

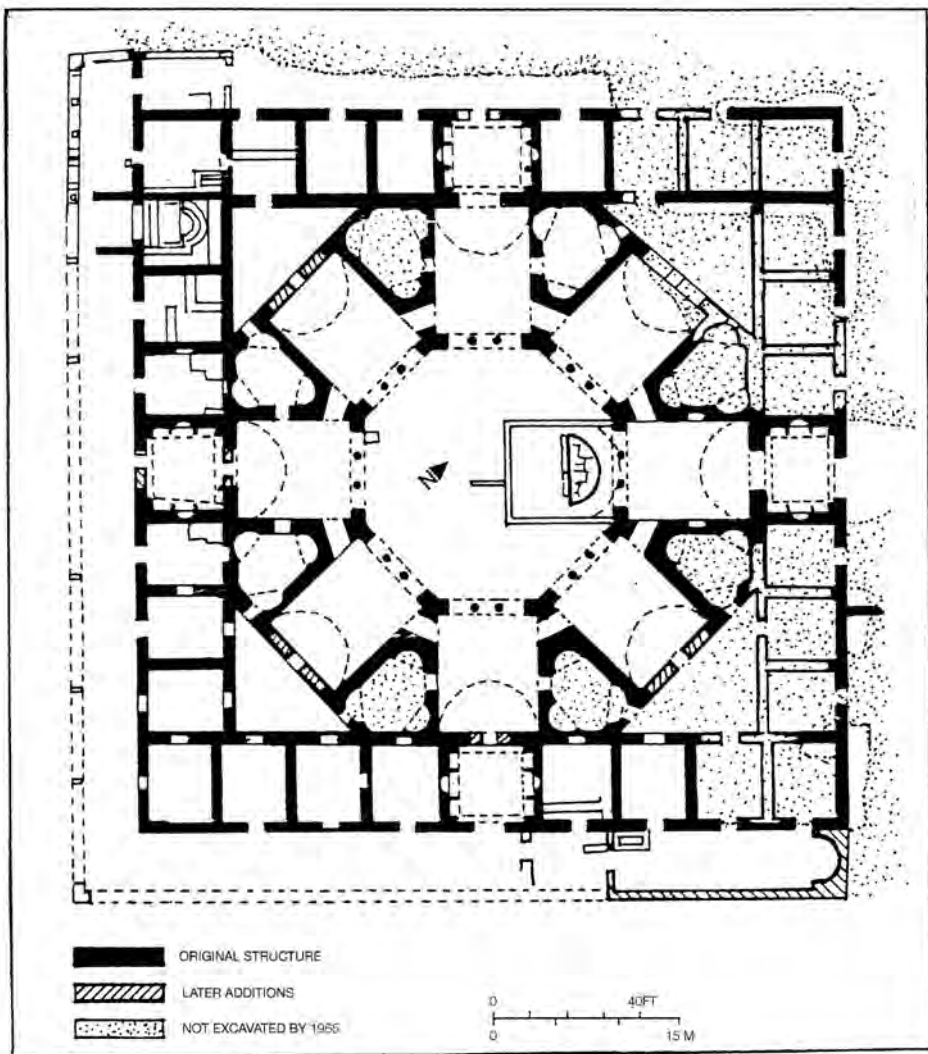
The architecture of the martyrium continued beyond the time of Constantine. It was usually a square or central plan focusing on either a sacred locus (e.g., the monastery of St. Catherine's at Mount Sinai) or the relics of a martyr and saint (Church of St. Philip at Hierapolis, Figure 34.23). Andre Grabar (1946) has identified several other variations on this architectural scheme including the triconch (a square building with apses on three sides) and cruciform buildings. One of the most elaborate was the church built to commemorate the life of St. Simeon the Stilite or Qal'at Siman (Figure 34.24).


Figure 34.23 Plan of the Martyrium of St. Philip, at Hierapolis (Pamukkale); (Krautheimer 1979: 171, fig. 124)
Figure 34.24 Isometric reconstruction of the Martyrium of St. Simeon, at Qal'at Siman, Syria (Krautheimer 1979: 156, fig. 102)

Cemeterial basilicas also became popular, especially around Rome. As in the case of St. Peter's, they may have originated to memorialize a burial site identified with a saint or apostle, but they also needed to enclose larger burial areas while accommodating crowds during festivals of religious commemoration. Ramsay MacMullen has recently shown that the great basilicas growing up in Rome during the fourth and fifth centuries probably could not fit all the crowds (MacMullen 2009). He argues instead that an older tradition of Christians meeting in and around the tombs (both in subterranean catacombs and in above-ground necropoleis) continued actively throughout this later period. Neither was this practice limited to Rome. The massive Manastirine cemetery complex, built around a basilica at Salona Dalmatia (near Diocletian's palace) shows how active such burial complexes might be (MacMullen 2009: 40–45).

At Rome, St. Paul's Outside the Walls marks one of the sites associated with the apostle Paul. Several of the large cemetery basilicas grew up in association with the Christian catacombs, especially San Sebastiano, also known as the Church (or memoria) of the Apostles. Originally a pagan necropolis, it was already being commemorated by Christians as the burial place of both Peter and Paul as early as the third century. These legendary associations gradually transformed it into a regular place of pilgrimage, and many Christians wanted to be buried there, near the apostles. The basilica was built early in the fourth century to sacralize both traditions (Snyder 1985: 98–104; Borg 2013).

It was this same site that actually gave its local place name (ad catacumbas, 'at the hollows') to the growing practice, especially around Rome, of digging out long underground tunnels for burial (Stephenson 1978: 7, 24–25). The first tombs at San Sebastiano were typically Roman 'house tombs' dug into the tufa escarpment of the hill face. Gradually tunnels were extended far into and under the ground.

Most of the other catacombs began as small family tombs or columbaria with an entrance at ground level and a vault or room for multiple burials dug into the ground. Beginning in the second century CE, the older Roman practice of cremation gave way to inhumation as the preferred mode of burial. All burials at Rome had to be outside the pomerium (or sacred boundary) of the city; in practical terms, this meant outside the city walls. A result of the growing popularity of inhumation among pagans as well as Jews and Christians was that land for burial came at a premium (Stephenson 1978: 25–44). Tunneling into the layers of soft igneous rock (tufa) indigenous to Rome offered a cheap solution and also fostered a new profession, the fossores (or 'grave diggers'). Although not alone, Christians figured prominently in this new enterprise. In some cases (such as the Domitilla catacomb), several independent family tombs were interconnected by tunnels, which then grew into an ant-like network of catacombs. By the early fourth century, this site had been memorialized by the construction of a cemeterial basilica of unusual plan above the cemetery complex.

Baptisteries

In the earliest days, it seems that Christians performed baptism in natural streams or pools or wherever they could find water (Didache 7; Tertullian, De baptismo 4). By the middle of the second century, they also used Roman balinea or baths (White 1996–97: 110). At some point, however, Christians began to build special areas for baptism. In part, it came as a result of the increasingly complex ritual process that grew around baptismal liturgy. Privacy and decorum were concerns since baptism was undertaken nude. These factors in the liturgical development likely paralleled the process of architectural adaptation from house church to domus ecclesiae, where specialized areas might be set aside. Gradually they were adapted and further articulated to meet the ritual and symbolic needs of baptismal liturgy.

The earliest known example of such a specially constructed baptistery comes from the domus ecclesiae at Dura-Europos (Figure 34.10 above). One modest chamber (Room 6) was particularly adapted to suit their liturgical and symbolic needs. A small basin or font (length: 2.57 meters; breadth: 1.83 meters; depth: 0.95 meters) was set partially into the floor on one end of the room. The shape of the font and its arched canopy are similar to a small shrine or tomb. It may well be that this funerary symbolism was self-consciously appropriated in conjunction with the practical considerations of a washing ritual. The decorative program also seems to have been tailored to the baptismal liturgy as it juxtaposed scenes of death (the tomb and Goliath) with scenes of salvation from or through water (White 1996–97: II. no. 36). The font itself was barely large enough to allow for immersion, but the precise practice is uncertain. A large amphora was also found and could have been used in some way either for pouring (as recommended by the Didache when running water was not available) or for filling the basin.

Perhaps because of the symbolism of death and resurrection, the architecture of later Christian baptisteries seems to have a strong affinity for memorial style architecture, especially central planned buildings and/or fonts. Over 400 early Christian baptisteries have been catalogued dating from the third to the seventh centuries. They exhibit considerable architectural diversity, especially in the external building forms. Most are artistically unexceptional and clearly designed for utilitarian purposes. There are, however, some general features of font design and siting that suggest patterns of spatial articulation at least by the fourth to sixth centuries (Jensen 2010).

Most baptisteries were attached as rooms or as auxiliary buildings to the main church building. Eventually, it became the norm that only the bishop's church in each locality should have a baptistery; however, many cities had more than one. Other baptisteries were built as freestanding structures or complexes of rooms. The freestanding baptistry buildings were of various shapes, but central plan buildings (square, round, or octagonal) became the most popular, especially in northern Italy. The octagonal baptistery of St. John at the Church of Santa Thecla in Milan (built by Ambrose in c. 350) perhaps set the pattern for others (Krautheimer 1979: 187). The octagonal font was set in the center of the octagonal building, and the decorative program consolidated its imagery of death and rebirth. The shape of various fonts has been correlated with this symbolism: cruciform and hexagonal fonts more with the 'tomb' imagery; round or octagonal fonts with the 'womb' of rebirth (Bedard 1951; Davies 1962; Khatchatrian 1962, 1982). Other rooms in the building served for dressing and waiting areas; at Salona the large complex seems to included an auditorium and room for catechumens as well.

The most elaborate architectural and decorative program in baptismal buildings was that of the Orthodox Baptistery at Ravenna (completed between 450–470 CE). The octagonal building was over 11 meters in diameter; in its center stood a font nearly 3.5 meters in diameter with a depth of 0.85 meters. The central mosaic of the cupola depicted the baptism of Jesus by John. Surrounding it were two concentric bands of decoration. The upper band, still in the circular dome, showed a procession of the apostles in two groups of six each led by Peter and Paul. Each carries a crown, and they meet below the axis of the cupola scene. The lower band of mosaic drew the scene down to the octagonal walls. It depicted four thrones alternating with four altars. The thrones bear a cross; the altars, one of the gospels (Kostoff 1965; Krautheimer 1979: 187–189). The iconography seems to reflect orthodox trinitarian doctrine, over against the nearby Arian baptistery. The combined effect of the spatial and decorative programs was designed to pilot the initiate around and through the font in a particular way so as to maximize the aesthetic, psychological, and theological significance of the experience. Art and architecture were played in harmony and thus facilitated the consolidation of Christian culture.

The Christian landscape of late Roman cities

By the end of the fifth century, the cities of the later Roman empire had become predominantly Christian, although there remained an enduring cultural stamp of traditional Roman and Greek culture, in many cases blended with the local cultures and ethnicities of the far flung provinces of the empire (Bowden 2001; cf. Brenk 2013). Urban planning and architecture reflected continuities as well as change. Traditional temple architecture had largely been abandoned or converted to give it a Christian façade. In its place stood monumental Christian basilicas as the visual and symbolic marker of Christian identity and ritual activity. Festivals and processions at sacred centers and on holy days ordered civic life, while every neighborhood could boast its local shrine. Some became pilgrimage centers to mark the great events and archetypal stories of the founder's life or the exemplary accomplishments of heroes past. Architecture and ritual were media of cultural integration and construction of a new symbolic universe. But now the architectural norm was drawn from the basilica and its varied Christian adaptations and associations. They were attended by a coterie of professional clergy who figured prominently in daily social life. State and civic leaders held important seats in religious festivals. An identifiable religious architecture, great and small now emulating the basilical style, dotted the rebuilt urban landscape. On some levels, at least, not so much had changed after all (MacMullen 1981: 131–137, 1984: 1–9, 2009; Boin 2013; Salzman et al. 2016).

Notes

1 This is the view traditionally taken in more theologically oriented discussions of the origins of Christian architecture as reflected in Deichmann 1964; Süssenbach 1977; Turner 1979. On the Calvinist theological orientation toward ritual and 'sacred space' implicit within these studies, see Finney 1988: 320–328. Compare also Harnack 1908: II. 86.

2 The extensive bibliography on Greek and Roman architecture, city planning, and archaeology will not be recapitulated here. The reader is referred to the following for further references: Connolly and Dodge 1998; Wycherly 1978; Boethius 1978; Ward-Perkins 1974, 1981; Jones 1940.

3 For the Latin curia, which mean either the assembly or the place of assembly (the 'senate' or the 'senate house'), used of the Christian gatherings, see Tertullian, Apology 39.21.

4 It has often been assumed that both buildings belonged to the Shipbuilders Association; however, Hermansen (1981: 71–74) argues that it belonged to the 'Shipowners Association' instead. The former now seems more likely.

5 For collegial halls with small temples at Ostia, in addition to the Shipbuilders Association discussed above, note the House of the Triclinia (I. 12.1), seat of the Housebuilders Association (Fabri tignuari), even though they may be associated with another temple at V.11.1 (Hermansen 1981: 62, 64); The Guild of the Grain Measurers (Mensores frumentarii) located next to their warehouse (I. 19.1–3; Hermansen 1981: 65); and the schola of the hastiferi located in the precincts of the Magna Mater (IV. 1.4; Hermansen 1981: 69–70).

6 Based on the patron's name in relation to Sergius Paulus, proconsul of Cyprus mentioned in Acts 13.7–12 as a 'convert' of Paul, it has been suggested that this collegium represents an early Christian house church at Rome; however, there can be no certainty (White 1996–97: I. 46 with references).

7 So see Acts 2–5, although this might well be an idealized portrayal of the earliest days of the movement.

8 mShabbath 1.4; bMenahoth 41b; Neusner 1979: 81–96; White 1996–97: 103.

9 On the vexed questions surrounding the origins of the synagogue, see White 1987: 133–134; Gutmann 1975: 72–76; Urman and Flesher 1995: xx–xxiv; Griffiths 1995; Grabbe 1995; Flesher 1995.

10 White 1996–97: I. 12 and bibliography cited there; see also Groh 1995; Tsafrir 1995; Hachlili and Mahav 1996: 101–102; Habas 2000. While architectural studies have long since abandoned synagogue models as an explanatory category in basilical origins, such suppositions continue to find a voice especially in studies of liturgy and church organization and should be treated with caution.

11 The Ostia Synagogue continues to be claimed by some as evidence for a first-century 'purpose-built' synagogue; however, these claims are entirely unfounded. Since 2002, a new project of excavations at the Ostia Synagogue has been conducted by a team from the University of Texas under the direction of Prof. L. M. White. As a result of these new excavations, it can now be demonstrated archeologically that the complex was not built prior to the early third century CE, and that its major phases as a synagogue belong to renovations of the mid fourth and late fifth centuries, respectively. The monumental Torah Shrine with menorah reliefs still visible from the excavations belongs to this late fifth-century renovation. A full report of the excavations is forthcoming.

12 The 'house church' in the New Testament period has become a fixture in recent discussions, and the bibliography is now quite lengthy. Inter alia see Meeks 1983: 29–30, 74–84; Malherbe 1983: 60–91; White 1996–97: I. 102–109; Theissen 1982: 73–96, 147–155; Schüssler Fiorenza 1983: 175–183; Klauck 1981; Banks 1994; Balch 2008. Among recent works that deserve special notice are Osiek and Balch 1997; Osiek and MacDonald 2005 (both give a thorough treatment of archaeological and cultural issues in housing and family life relative to the social organization of house churches, and especially the place of women); and Ascough 1998 (with an excellent review of the scholarship). Despite the fact that Paul's letters explicitly refer to houses and households, other recent work (Adams 2015) has argued that the stress on 'houses' is overstated, inasmuch as these gatherings might have been in commercial or non-domestic contexts. The point is well taken even if overstated. The fact that other types of spaces are noted from the earliest record, both for other 'new' cults (such as Mithraea) and for the Christians, has long been observed (White 1996–97 I: 44). A further point needs to be clarified here, however. By stressing the 'house church' over against the domus ecclesiae as a heuristic typology, the key distinction is not so much about the form of the original building (whether domestic or not) but rather about the degree of renovation and adaptation as a means of transforming the space specifically for Christian usage, as we see for example at Dura-Europos (both in the Synagogue and in the Christian building). For the purposes of this definition, a 'house church' implies that no specialized architectural adaptation had occurred, whereas a domus ecclesiae implies some degree of architectural adaptation as 'church' building.

13 I am grateful to Corby Finney (1988: 334–335) for recognizing the significance of these intermediate moments or transitional stages in my earlier discussions of this 'dynamic model.'

14 The term titulus referred originally to the marble plaque that often identified the owner of a house (also used on 'house tombs' in necropoleis). In Roman tradition, the earliest churches were identified with their earlier owners, who figure prominently in the founding legends of these churches, as in the case of Clement of Rome, who is associated with the supposed first-century levels of San Clemente (hence the titulus Clementis). In this case, and most of the others, however, there is no clear archaeological evidence to support these legends.

15 Two other archaeological sites deserve special mention in this connection. First, at Umm el-Jimal in the Hauran (Roman Syria/Arabia), the so-called 'Julianos Church' appears to be a later basilical hall protruding from one side of a house in a domestic insula complex. The addition of the basilical hall and apse dates to the late fourth century; however, there are indications that a portion of the edifice preserved in this construction may have already been in use at an earlier stage, but not likely for domestic functions. An earlier stage of partial adaptation for Christian usage, i.e., a possible domus ecclesiae, may be indicated but is awaiting further excavations (White 1996–97: II. 40). Second, at Capernaum, excavations since the mid 1960s have revealed an area of houses dating to the first century over which was built an octagonal church complex in the fifth and sixth centuries CE. In an intermediate phase, datable to the early to mid fourth century, a simple quadrangular complex had been built, and it appears that it was meant to sacralize a particular room in the domestic complex, which then later stood at the center point of the octagonal structure. It is clear that in the fourth century the first building was a Christian shrine built to commemorate what they thought was the house of St. Peter. Although the evidence is sketchy and archaeologically problematic, it is possible that the site had already been identified with the legend of Peter at a slightly earlier stage (late third century; so Corbo 1969: 71). However, initial claims that the edifice had already begun to function as a domus ecclesiae prior to the building of the fourth century memorial edifice are archaeologically unwarranted. There is no evidence that it was ever used as a regular place of Christian assembly and worship or was adapted for specifically Christian purposes prior to the fourth-century project (White 1996–97: II. no. 42). Even so, the site is of considerable interest for some of the later tendencies in development of Christian holy sites.

16 This phrase (ek themeliōn) is commonly found in building inscriptions from synagogues, mithraea, and the like, and suggests a full-scale rebuilding on an existing structure. It does not necessarily imply a prior catastrophic 'destruction.' See White 1996–97: I. 128; II. 93, 119, 175, 177, 357.

17 The largest of the mosaic inscriptions on the floor names as donor a certain Gaianus, also called Porphyrios, who is identified as both a centurion and 'our brother.' Another member, a certain Brutius, is identified as having carried out the work. What cannot be ascertained from the text, however, is whether Gaianus was still actively serving in the army at the time or had retired and chosen to continue living in the village (a common practice among Roman legionaries stationed in faraway locations). It is also possible that Gaianus had died before the work was completed.

18 Compare the epitaph of Marcus Julius Eugenius at Laodicea Combusta for another case of a local bishop who undertakes a special rebuilding program 'from the foundations' in this period; inscription in MAMA I. 170 and White 1996–97: II. no. 48.

Bibliography

Adams, E. (2008) 'The ancient church at Megiddo: The discovery and an assessment of its significance,' Expository Times 120: 62–69.

Adams, E. (2015) The Earliest Christian Meeting Places: Almost Exclusively Houses? Rev. ed. Library of Early Christianity. Edinburgh, UK: Bloomsbury T&T Clark.

Alikin, V. A. (2009) The earliest history of the Christian gathering: Origin, development and content of the Christian gathering in the first to third centuries. PhD Thesis. Leiden, The Netherlands: University of Leiden.

Ascough, R. S. (1998) What Are They Saying about the Formation of Pauline Churches? New York: Paulist Press.

Bakker, J. T. (1994) Living and Working with the Gods: Studies of Evidence for Private Religion and its Material Environment in the City of Ostia (100–500 AD). Dutch Monographs on Ancient History and Archaeology XII. Amsterdam: J. C. Gieben.

Balch, D. L. (1991) Social History of the Matthean Community: Cross-Disciplinary Approaches. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Balch, D. L. (1995) 'Rich and poor, proud and humble in Luke-Acts,' in White and Yarbrough 1995: 214–233.

Balch, D. L. (2008) Roman Domestic Art and Early House Churches. WUNT 228; Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Balch, D. L. and Weissenrieder, A. (eds) (2012) Contested Spaces: Houses and Temples in Roman Antiquity and the New Testament. WUNT 283; Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Balch, D. L., Ferguson, E. and Meeks, W. A. (1990) Greeks, Romans and Christians: Essays in Honor of Abraham J. Malherbe. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Banks, R. (1994) Paul's Idea of Community: The Early House Churches in Their Cultural Setting. 2nd ed. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Bedard, W. M. (1951) The Symbolism of the Baptismal Font in Early Christian Thought. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Blue, B. (1994) 'Acts and the house church,' in Gill and Gempf 1994: 119–189.

Bobertz, C. (1993) 'The role of the patron in the cena dominica of Hippolytus' apostolic tradition,' Journal of Theological Studies 44: 170–184.

Boethius, A. (1978) Etruscan and Early Roman Architecture. London: Harmondsworth.

Boin, D. R. (2013) Ostia in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Borg, B. E. (2013) Crisis and Ambition: Tombs and Burial Customs in Third-Century CE Rome. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Bowden, W. (2001) 'A new urban elite? Church builders and church building in late antique Epirus,' in Bowden, W. (ed.) Recent Research in Late Antique Urbanism, JRA Supplements 42. Portsmouth, RI: Journal of Roman Archaeology, 55–67.

Bowes, K. (2008) Private Worship, Public Values, and Religious Change in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Brenk, B. (2003) Die Christianisierung der spätrömischen Welt: Stadt, Land, Haus, Kirche und Kloster in frühchristlicher Zeit. Wiesbaden, Germany: Reichert Verlag.

Brenk, B. (2005) Architettura e immagini del sacro nella tarda antichità. Spoleto, Italy: Fondazione centro italiano study sull'altro medioevo.

Brenk, B. (2010) The Apse, the Image, and the Icon: An Historical Perspective on the Apse as a Space for Images. Spatantike-Fruhes Christentum-Byzanz 26. Wiesbaden, Germany: Ludwig Reichert Verlag Brooten, B. (1982) Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue: Inscriptional Evidence and Background Issues. Brown Judaic Studies 36. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.

Bruneau, P. (1970) Recherches sur les cultes de Délos. Paris: Bocard.

Burtchaell, J. T. (1992) From Synagogue to Church: Public Services and Offices in the Earliest Christian Communities. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Clark, J. (1991) Houses of Roman Italy, 100 BC – AD 250: Ritual, Space and Decoration. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Connolly, P. and Dodge, H. (1998) The Ancient City: Life in Classical Athens and Rome. New York: Oxford University Press.

Corbo, V. (1969) The House of St. Peter at Capernaum: A Preliminary Report of the First Two Campaigns of Excavation, 1968. Studium Biblicanum Franciscanum, Collection minor 5. Jerusalem: Studium Biblicum Franciscanum.

Cornell, T. J. and Lomas, K. (1995) Urban Society in Roman Italy. London: University College of London Press.

Davies, J. G. (1962) The Architectural Setting of Baptism. London: Barrie and Rockliff.

De Blaauw, S. (1994) Cultus et décor. Liturgia e architettura nella Roma tardoantica e midievale. 2 vols. Rome (Vatican City): Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana.

De Blaauw, S. (2007) 'Kultgebaude,' Realexikon für Aantike und Christentum 22: 227–393.

Deichmann, F. W. (1964) 'Vom Tempel zur Kirche,' Mullus: Festschrift Theodor Klauser. JAC Ergänzungsband 1. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff.

Drijvers, J. W. (1992) Helena Augusta. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Edlund-Berry, I. E. M. (1988) The Gods and the Place: Location and Function of Sanctuaries in the Countryside of Etruria and Magna Graecia (700–400 BC). Acta Instituti Romani Regni Sueciae, IV.43. Stockholm, Sweden: Svenska Institutet i Rom.

Esler, P. F. (1987) Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lucan Theology. SNTS Monographs 57. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Fine, S. (1996) Sacred Realm: The Emergence of the Synagogue in the Ancient World. New York: Oxford University Press and Yeshiva University Museum.

Finney, P. C. (1984) 'TOPOS HIEROS und christlicher Sakralbau in vorkonstantinischer Überlieferung,' Boreas: Münstersche Beiträge zür Archäologie 7: 193–225.

Finney, P. C. (1987/88) 'Early Christian art and archaeology I/II (AD 200–500): A selected bibliography 1945–1985,' The Second Century: A Journal of Early Christian Studies 6: 21–42, 203–238.

Finney, P. C. (1988) 'Early Christian architecture: The beginnings (A review article),' Harvard Theological Review 81: 319–339.

Fitzgerald, J. T. (1996a) Friendship, Flattery, and Frankness of Speech: Studies on Friendship in the New Testament World. Supplements to Novum Testamentum 82. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Fitzgerald, J. T. (1996b) 'Philippians in the light of some ancient discussions of friendship,' in Fitzgerald 1996a: 141–161.

Fitzgerald, J. T. (1997) Greco-Roman Perspectives on Friendship. SBL Resources for Biblical Study 34. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Flesher, P. V. M. (1995) 'Palestinian synagogues before 70 CE: A review of the evidence,' in Neusner, J. and Frerichs, E. S. (eds) Approaches to Ancient Judaism 6. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1989; repr. in Urman and Flesher 1995: 27–39.

Foerster, G. (1995) 'Dating synagogues with a "Basilical" plan and an apse,' in Urman and Flesher 1995: 87–94.

Foss, P. (1997) 'Watchful Lares: Roman household organization and the rituals of cooking and dining,' in Laurence and Wallace-Hadrill 1997: 196–218.

Gill, D. W. J. and Gempf, C. (1994) The Book of Acts in its First Century Setting, vol. 2: Graeco-Roman Setting. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Grabar, A. (1946) Martyrium: recherches sur le culte des reliques et l'art chrétien antique. 2 vols. Paris: College de France.

Grabbe, L. L. (1995) 'Synagogues in pre-70 Palestine: A re-assessment,' JTS 39 (1989): 401–410, repr. in Urman and Flesher 1995: 17–26.

Griffith, J. G. (1995) 'Egypt and the rise of the synagogue,' in JTS 38 (1987): 1–15, repr. in Urman and Flesher 1995: 3–16.

Groh, D. E. (1995) 'The stratigraphic chronology of the Galilean synagogue from the early Roman period through the early Byzantine period,' in Urman and Flesher 1995: 51–69.

Gutmann, J. (1975) 'The origins of the synagogue: The current state of research,' in Gutmann, J. (ed.) The Synagogue: Studies in Origins, Archaeology, and Architecture: 72–76.

Gutmann, J. (1981) Ancient Synagogues: The State of Research. Brown Judaic Studies 23. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.

Habas, L. (2000) 'The bema and chancel screen in Synagogues: Their origins,' in Levine and Weiss 2000: 111–130.

Hachlili, R. (1989) Ancient Jewish Art and Archaeology in the Diaspora. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Hachlili, R. (2013) Ancient Synagogues—Archaeology and Art: New Discoveries and Current Research. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Hachlili, R. and Merhav, R. (1996) 'Synagogues in the land of Israel: The art and architecture of late antique synagogues,' in Fine 1996: 96–129.

Hanson, R. P. C. (1978) 'The transformation of pagan temples into church buildings in the early Christian centuries,' Journal of Semitic Studies 23: 257–267.

Harland, P. A. (2003) Associations, Synagogues, and Congregations: Claiming a Place in Ancient Mediterranean Society. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Hermansen, G. (1981) Ostia: Aspects of Roman City Life. Edmonton, AB: University of Alberta Press.

Jensen, R. M. (2010) Living Water: Images, Symbols, and Settings of Early Christian Baptism. Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 105. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Jones, A. H. M. (1940) The Greek City from Alexander to Justinian. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Karwiese, S. (1995) 'The church of Mary and the Temple of Hadrian Olympos,' in Koester 1995: 311–320.

Kasher, A. (1995) 'Synagogues as "houses of prayer" and "holy places" in the Jewish communities of Hellenistic and Roman Egypt,' in Urman and Flesher 1995: 205–220.

Khatchatrian, A. (1962) Les Baptistères paléochrétiens. Paris: Imprimerie Nationale.

Khatchatrian, A. (1982) Origine et typolofie des baptistères paléochrétiens. Mulhouse, France: Centre de Culture Chrétienne.

Klauck, H.-J. (1981) Hausgemeinde und Hauskirche im frühen Christentum. Stuttgarter Bibelstudien 103; Stuttgart, Germany: Verlag Katholisches Bibelwerk.

Kloppenborg, J. S. and Wilson, S. G. (1996) Voluntary Associations in the Graeco-Roman World. London: Routledge.

Koester, H. (1995) 'Ephesos metropolis of Asia: An interdisciplinary approach to its archaeology, religion, and culture,' Harvard Theological Studies 41; Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International.

Kostoff, S. (1965) The Orthodox Baptistery of Ravenna. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Kraabel, A. T. (1981) 'The social systems of six diaspora synagogues,' in Gutmann 1981: 79–92.

Kraabel, A. T. (1995) 'The diaspora synagogue: Archaeological and epigraphic evidence since Sukenic,' in Haase, W. and Temporini, H. (eds) Aufstied und Niedergang der Römischen Welt, II. 19(1): 477–510; reprinted in Urman and Flesher 1995: 95–126.

Kraeling, C. H. (1967) The Christian Building. Excavations at Dura-Europos, Final Report 8.2. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Krautheimer, R. (1939) 'The beginnings of early Christian architecture,' Review of Religion 3: 144–159.

Krautheimer, R. (1939–1956) Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae. 5 volumes. Vatican City: Pontifical Gregorian Institute.

Krautheimer, R. (1967) 'The Constantinian Basilica,' Dumbarton Oaks Papers 21: 117–140.

Krautheimer, R. (1979) Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture. 3rd ed. New York: Penguin.

Lassus, J. (1947) Sanctuaires chrétiennes de Syrie. Paris: P. Geuthner.

Lassus, J. (1965) 'Les édifices du culte autour de la basilique,' in Actes de VI° Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana. Studia di Antichità Cristiana 26: 581–610.

Lassus, J. and Tchalenko, G. (1951) 'Ambons Syriens,' Cahiers archeologiques 5: 75–122.

Laurence, R. (1994) Roman Pompeii: Space and Society. London: Routledge.

Laurence, R. (1995) 'The organization of space in Pompeii,' in Cornell and Lomas 1995: 63–78.

Laurence, R. (1997) 'Space and text,' in Laurence and Wallace-Hadrill 1997: 7–14.

Laurence, R. and Wallace-Hadrill, A. (1997) Domestic Space in the Roman World: Pompeii and Beyond. JRA Supplements 22. Portsmouth, RI: JRA.

Levine, L. I. (2005) The Ancient Synagogue: The First Thousand Years. 2nd ed. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press (1st ed. 2000).

Levine, L. I. and Weiss, Z. (2000) From Dura to Sepphoris: Studies in Jewish Art and Society in Late Antiquity. JRA Supplements 40. Portsmouth, RI: Journal of Roman Archaeology.

Limberis, V. (1995) 'The council of Ephesos: The demise of the see of Ephesos and the rise of the Culat of the Theotokos,' in Koester 1995: 321–340.

MacDonald, W. (1977) Early Christian & Byzantine Architecture. New York: George Braziller.

MacMullen, R. (1981) Paganism in the Roman Empire. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

MacMullen, R. (1984) Christianizing the Roman Empire. New Haven, CT: Yale Universiaty Press.

MacMullen, R. (2009) The Second Church: Popular Christianity A.D. 200–400. WGRW Supp. 1. Atlanta, GA: SBL.

Malherbe, A. J. (1983) Social Aspects of Early Christianity. 2nd ed. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Marrou, H. I. (1960) 'La basilique chrétienne d'Hippo d'après le résultat des derniers fouilles,' Revue des Études Augustiniennes 6: 109–154.

Marshall, P. (1987) Enmity at Corinth: Social Conventions in Paul's Relations with the Corinthians. WUNT 2.23. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Meeks, W. A. (1983) The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Meiggs, R. (1973) Roman Ostia. 2nd ed. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Mitchell, A. C. (1997) '"Greet the friends by name": New Testament evidence for the Greco-Roman topos on friendship,' in Fitzgerald 1997: 225–260.

Nasrallah, L. S. (2011) Christian Responses to Roman Art and Architecture: The Second-Century Church among the Spaces of Empire. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Neusner, J. (1979) From Politics to Piety: The Emergence of Pharisaic Judaism. 2nd ed. New York: KTAV.

Nielsen, I. and Nielsen, H. S. (1998) Meals in a Social Context. Aarhus Studies in Mediterranean Antiquity 1. Aarhus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press.

Nock, A. D. (1933) Conversion: The Old and the New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Orr, D. G. (1978) 'Roman domestic religion: The evidence of household shrines,' in Haase, W. and Temporini, H. (eds) Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter. II. 16(2): 1557–1591.

Osiek, C. and Balch, D. L. (1997) Families in the New Testament World: Households and House Churches. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Osiek, C. and MacDonald, M. Y. (2005) A Woman's Place: House Churches in Earliest Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Peppard, M. (2016) The World's Oldest Church. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Picard, C. (1921) L'établissement des Poseidoniastes de Berytos. Exploration archeologiques de Délos 6. Paris: Bocard.

Richardson, P. (1996) 'Early synagogues as collegia in the diaspora and Palestine,' in Kloppenborg and Wilson 1996: 90–109.

Rordorf, W. (1964) 'Was wissen wir über die christlichen Gottesdiensträume der vorkonstantinischen Zeit?,' Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 55: 110–128.

Rordorf, W. (1971) 'Die Hausgemeinde der vorkonstantinischen Zeit,' Kirche: Tendenzen und Ausblicke 190–196, 235–237.

Rutgers, L. V. (1996) 'Diaspora synagogues: Synagogue archaeology in the Greco-Roman world,' in Fine, S. (ed.) Sacred Realm: The Emergence of the Synagogue in the Ancient World. New York: Oxford University Press.

Salzman, M., Sághy, M. and Testa, R. L. (2016) Pagans and Christians in Late Antique Rome. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Schüssler Fiorenza, E. (1983) In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins. New York: Crossroad Press.

Snyder, G. F. (1985) Ante Pacem: Archaeological Evidence of Church Life before Constantine. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Stambaugh, J. E. (1978) 'The functions of Roman temples,' in Haase, W. and Temporini, H. (eds) Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter. II. 16(1): 540–607.

Stambaugh, J. E. (1988) The Ancient Roman City. Baltimore, MD: The Johns Hopkins University Press.

Stephenson, J. (1978) The Catacombs: Life and Death in Early Christianity. London: Thames and Hudson.

Süssenbach, U. (1977) Christuskult und kaiserliche Baupolitik bei Konstantin. Bonn, Germany: Hanstein.

Tepper, Y. and Di Segni, L. (2006) A Christian Prayer Hall of the Third Century CE At Kefar 'Othnay (Legio). Excavations at the Megiddo Prison 2005. Jerusalem: Israel Antiquities Authority.

Testini, P. (1980) Archeologia Cristiana: Notizie Generali dale Origini all fine del Sec. VI. 2nd ed. Bari, Italy: Edipuglia.

Theissen, G. (1982) The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth. Trans. J. H. Schütz. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Torjesen, K. J. (1995) When Women Were Priests: Women's Leadership in the Early Church and the Scandal of Their Subordination in the Rise of Christianity. San Francisco, CA: Harper Collins.

Tsafrir, Y. (1995) 'On the source of the architectural design of the ancient synagogues of the Galilee: A new appraisal,' in Urman and Flesher 1995: 70–86.

Turner, H. W. (1979) From Temple to Meeting House: The Phenomenology and Theology of Places of Worship. Religion and Society 16. The Hague, The Netherlands; Paris; New York: Mouton.

Urman, D. and Flesher, P. V. M. (1995) Ancient Synagogues: Historical Analysis and Archaeologial Discovery: Volume I. Studia Post-Biblica 47.1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Vaes, J. (1984–86) 'Christlichen Wiederverwendung Antiker Bauten: Ein Forschungsbericht,' Ancient Society 15–17: 305–443.

Voelkl, L. (1953) 'Die konstantinischen Kirchenbauten nach Eusebius,' Rivista di archeologia cristiana 29: 60–94.

Voelkl, L. (1954) 'Die konstantinischen Kirchenbauten nach dem literarischen Quellen des Okzidents,' Rivista di archeologia cristiana 30: 99–136.

Wallace-Hadrill, A. (1994) Houses and Society in Pompeii and Herculaneum. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Wallace-Hadrill, A. (1995) 'Public honor and private shame: The urban texture of Pompeii,' in Cornell and Lomas 1995: 39–62.

Wallace-Hadrill, A. (1997) 'Rethinking the Roman atrium house,' in Laurence and Wallace-Hadrill 1997: 219–240.

Ward-Perkins, J. B. (1954) 'Constantine and the origins of the Christian basilica,' Papers of the British School at Rome 22: 69–90.

Ward-Perkins, J. B. (1966) 'Memoria, martyrs tomb, and martyrs church,' Journal of Theological Studies 17: 20–38.

Ward-Perkins, J. B. (1974) Cities of Ancient Greece and Italy: Planning in Classical Antiquity. New York: George Braziller.

Ward-Perkins, J. B. (1981) Roman Imperial Architecture. London: Harmondsworth.

White, L. M. (1987) 'The Delos Synagogue revisited: Recent fieldwork in the Graeco-Roman diaspora,' Harvard Theological Studies 80: 133–160.

White, L. M. (1990a) Building God's House in the Roman World: Architectural Adaptation among Pagans, Jews, and Christians. Baltimore, MD: The Johns Hopkins University Press (reprinted as White 1996–97, vol. I).

White, L. M. (1990b) 'Morality between two worlds: A paradigm of friendship in Philippians,' in Balch et al. 1990: 201–215.

White, L. M. (1991) 'Crisis management and boundary maintenance: The social location of the Matthean community,' in Balch 1991: 210–247.

White, L. M. (1995a) 'Urban development and social change in imperial Ephesos,' in Koester 1995: 27–80.

White, L. M. (1995b) 'Visualizing the "real" world of Acts 16: Toward construction of a social index,' in White and Yarbrough 1995: 234–263.

White, L. M. (1996–97) The Social Origins of Christian Architecture, vol. I: Building God's House in the Roman World: Architectural Adaptation among Pagans, Jews, and Christians; vol. II: Texts and Monuments of the Christian Domus Ecclesiae in its Environment. Harvard Theological Studies 42. Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International.

White, L. M. (1997) 'Synagogue and society in imperial Ostia: Archaeological and epigraphic evidence,' Harvard Theological Review 90: 23–58.

White, L. M. (1998) 'Regulating fellowship in the communal meal: Early Jewish and Christian evidence,' in Nielsen and Nielsen 1998: 177–205.

White, L. M. (2012) 'The changing face of Mithraism at Ostia: Archaeology, art, and the urban landscape,' in Balch and Wiessenrieder 2012: 435–492.

White, L. M. and Yarbrough, O. L. (1995) The Social World of the First Christians: Studies in Honor of Wayne A. Meeks. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Wilken, R. (1992) The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Wiplinger, G. and Wlach, G. (1995) Ephesus: 100 Years of Austrian Research. Vienna, Austria: Böhlau Verlag.

Wycherly, R. (1978) How the Greeks Built Cities. 3rd ed. Princeton, CT: Princeton University Press.

Yasin, A. M. (2009) Saints and Church Spaces in the Late Antique Mediterranean: Architecture, Cult, and Community. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

35

ART

Robin M. Jensen

Origins and development

Most art historians date identifiable examples of Christian visual art to no earlier than the beginning of the third century. Explanations for this seemingly late emergence of Christian visual culture vary. Some scholars argue that, prior to the third century, Christians faithfully observed the so-called Second Commandment's prohibition against graven images (Exod. 20:4–5) and only gradually allowed the use of pictorial images as the church grew in numbers and became both less critical of and more incorporated into Greco-Roman culture. Other scholars offer different explanations, ranging from the early Christian community's lack of financial resources to proposing that lingering eschatological expectations inhibited the making or owning of worldly things.[1] Frequently, historians connect the ostensible lack of visual art to Christian repudiation of pagan idolatry and the church's belief that cult statues or religious images were either vain and useless or dangerously associated with demons. For instance, Justin Martyr (d. 165) contrasts polytheists honoring their cult images with sacrifices and floral garlands with Christians who understand that such things are lifeless and deem it an insult to confuse artifacts fashioned by human hands with gods who are nothing more than wicked demons (First Apology 9.1–9).

Similarly, both Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian assert the folly of idol worship insofar as it attributes the qualities of infinite divinity to mere objects made of wood and stone. Clement ridicules those who set up blocks of wood or pillars of stone along with gods' images made in human form and cites the Second Commandment's prohibition of making likenesses of anything in heaven or on earth (Exhortation to the Greeks 4). Tertullian deemed it bizarre to purchase one's gods at auction—buying and selling images of Minerva—and notes that a statue of Saturn could be melted down to make a cooking pot (Apology 1; On Idolatry 3 and 4).[2]

Nevertheless, at the same time as ancient authors condemned the production and adoration of images of the gods, either because they were prohibited by God's command or because they were associated with idolatrous practices of their polytheistic neighbors, many of these same writers' works provide testimony to the fact that Christians possessed and used small objects that carried distinctively Christian symbols. These items—many of them surviving in museum collections—include lamps, gems, and dishware that were mostly likely made by artisans who sold their wares to a mixed clientele of pagans, Jews, and Christians. Tertullian, for example, describes goblets inscribed with images of the Good Shepherd (On Modesty 7.1–4; 10.12), while Clement discusses which images would be most appropriate for a Christian's signet ring, approving figures of doves, fish, ships, and anchors (Christ the Educator 3.11.59). Thus, it does not appear that early Christians rejected material signs or symbols of their faith altogether. Rather it seems most likely that more complex visual expression simply took time to emerge and be clearly identified as reflecting specific elements of the Christian faith.

While textual evidence shows that certain early Christian theologians inveighed against both the production and use of cultic art objects (a sign that such practice must have been going on and therefore necessitating the admonitions), they perhaps understood functional distinctions between art that was decorative, symbolic, or didactic and cult objects that were worshiped in themselves. Ordinary Christians could have regarded their smaller objects as belonging to a mundane, domestic world. When larger art objects eventually appeared, they were not understood as objects for worship and therefore presented no danger of idolatry. Moreover, Christian converts from polytheism had enjoyed a rich material dimension to their religious practice and were as inclined to adapt certain conventions, applying them to their new faith, as to judge their former customs as altogether incompatible. As clear illustration of this trend to incorporate a pagan past into the artistic or material production of the emerging church, many of the earliest Christian artistic motifs appear to have been modeled on Greco-Roman prototypes, albeit re-interpreted to reflect infused Christian significance. Thus the familiar vocabulary of Greco-Roman religious iconography could be made applicable for a new religious purpose.

Probably the foremost example of this translation from polytheist to Christian artistic type is the Good Shepherd, displayed as a youth dressed in short tunic and boots, carrying a ram or lamb over his shoulders (see Figure 35.1). This extremely popular figure had a direct antecedent in the figure of Hermes as psychopomp (a guide to the underworld—often found in funerary contexts), or in the allegorical personification of philanthropy. Given the biblical use of the Good Shepherd as a metaphorical type for both Christ and God (e.g., John 10), Christians easily and understandably adapted this image as a symbol of God's steadfast care and guidance.

In a similar way, a female figure shown as veiled and praying with outstretched hands (orans), and who in classical art personified the virtue, pietas, comes directly into Christian iconography with little change in meaning. A third person, a seated reader who often appears in conjunction with the shepherd and praying figure, likely represents the classical virtue of philosophical learning. Neither the praying figure nor the seated reader portrays a particular biblical character, but rather suggests certain values (piety or wisdom) that the deceased possessed and which Christian iconography borrowed from Greco-Roman funeral art. Other directly transferred motifs include a range of birds, animals, or floral motifs (peacocks, dolphins, lambs, grape vines, etc.); some clearly were popular for their decorative functions while others may have been more symbolically significant. Sometimes the only way to distinguish certain artifacts as Christian is their inclusion of, or close proximity to, recognizable biblical themes. For instance, a shepherd can be identified as a Christian Good Shepherd (rather than as Hermes) when it occurs next to an image of Jonah or of John the Baptist baptizing Jesus.

In conclusion, identifiable Christian visual art only began to appear to any significant degree around the turn of the third century. Prior to that time, Christians may have produced works of art that were more or less indistinguishable from objects belonging to the wider cultural and religious context. Thus, in its earliest stage, the basis for characterizing certain materials as 'early Christian art' is primarily iconographic (noting certain themes or motifs) rather than stylistic or functional. In other words, some new or uniquely Christian themes began to appear, often on objects or in places common to both pagans and Christians (e.g., lamps and tomb walls). Yet, neither the setting, medium, nor style of the art was necessarily Christian. In almost every case, only the content or subject matter reveals the object's particular Christian character and significance. For instance, archeologists have found decorative terracotta wall tiles bearing representations of the Good Shepherd, Noah, Abraham offering Isaac, or Jesus raising Lazarus—images that conveyed aspects of the Christian faith, illustrated key Bible stories, and identified their owner's religious affiliation.

Figure 35.1 The Good Shepherd from the Catacomb of Callixtus; watercolor from Wilpert 1903, Tav. 15

Chronological periods

Early Christian art can be roughly divided into two general periods, distinguished partly by iconographic motifs but also partly by certain key transitions in style after the initial stages. Beginning during the era of the Severan emperors (180–240 CE), the earliest phase generally coincides with the last century of pagan rule and covers the period of the Decian and Diocletianic persecutions, lasting through to the elevation and conversion of the emperor Constantine. During this early stage, Christian art displays evident influence of classical or pagan Roman prototypes in its conventions, decorative motifs, and style as well as much of its subject matter. For instance, Christ was shown in the guise of the Good Shepherd, Orpheus, or Sol Invictus. Conventional decorative motifs, including grape vines or dolphins, were transferred to Christian settings and probably were understood to have particular Christian symbolic significance. Other themes of more clearly Christian characters were extremely popular during this period and include scenes from the Jonah story (by far the most frequent), Adam and Eve, Noah in the ark, Abraham with Isaac, Daniel with the lions, the three Hebrew youths in the fiery furnace, Susannah and the elders, and Moses striking the rock in the wilderness.

The second period of Christian art covers the era of the Constantinian dynasty through the early sixth century, the time when the church passed from being persecuted to officially recognized as the state religion. The art of this era was largely supported by the wealth of the imperial family or members of the Christian elite, and certain motifs that characterize it have come to be commonly identified as exemplary of a so-called 'imperial style.'[3]

The conversion of the Roman emperor was a watershed moment for the church and, by extension, for Christian art. Almost as soon as emperor Constantine I defeated his rival Maxentius to become the senior ruler in the west (312), he began to patronage the Christian cause and supported the building and rich artistic embellishment of monumental public Christian buildings in Rome, the Holy Land, and his new capital, Constantinople—the 'New Rome.' Consequently, Christian art in this period evolved from being largely private or funereal to being public and monumental in character. As part of this transition, certain motifs from the earlier phase decreased (e.g., the Good Shepherd and Jonah) and new iconographic themes emerged (e.g., Christ enthroned or giving the New Law to his apostles).

This second phase actually bridges the late Roman and the early Byzantine eras, ending with the reign of the emperor Justinian (527–565), whose artistic patronage helped to make his western capital, Ravenna, into a city best known today for its glorious mosaics. However, Ravenna, which replaced Milan as the western capital in the early fifth century, had already been a centre of art and architecture well before Justinian's general Belisarius regained it for the Byzantine empire from the Ostrogoths. Ravenna's buildings therefore are a combination of artistic work that was begun during the reigns of Honorius (395–423), continued under the Ostrogothic King Theodoric (493–526), and finally completed after the re-establishment of the exarchate in Ravenna in 535.

In brief, while the definitive characteristic of Christian art in the earlier period was the content of its iconography (i.e., subject matter and themes), the change in the church's material, economic, and social status in the post-Constantinian era meant that criteria for such identification expanded to include both context and function. While in the third century distinguishable Christian and pagan art works were only just beginning to emerge, by the first decades of the fifth century and through the early Byzantine era, the culture was so permeated by Christian interests that the categories 'secular' and 'sacred' were less sharply defined, and the appellation 'Christian art' came to be as much defined by its physical context (e.g., church décor or pictorial embellishments on liturgical vessels) as by its iconographic content.

Provenance and context

Aside from the lack of first- or second-century evidence, the extant corpus of pre-Constantinian Christian art is limited in two additional respects. First, much of the evidence is of limited geographical provenance. Although significant exceptions exist, most extant examples of earliest Christian art derive from the environs of Rome. In fact, among the earliest and most significant examples of Christian art are frescoes on the walls of the third- and fourth-century Christian catacombs found just outside Rome itself. One of the earliest of these extensive underground cemeteries, the Catacomb of Callixtus, was named for an early Bishop of Rome (c. 217–222) who, according to an ancient source, was put in charge of this first subterranean Christian cemetery while still a deacon of the church under Pope Zephyrinus (Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies [the Philosophumena] 9.7).

Roman dominance of extant pre-Constantinian Christian imagery is not absolute, however. Other Italian sites have produced important examples of early Christian art, including the Catacombs of San Gennaro in Naples. Scholars believe that the Cleveland marble sculptures, generally dated to the third century, came from a Christian family tomb in Asia Minor. Asia Minor may also have been the source of partially finished marble sarcophagi that were sent to workshops in Rome for completion. Additionally, ateliers in Gaul produced many surviving examples of early Christian relief sculpture on sarcophagi, although the influence of Roman workshops is apparent in their technique and style, and some may have been initially carved in Rome for export. Archeologists also have discovered some works of art in Christian catacombs in North Africa and Thessalonica. Arguably, the single most important non-Roman monument is the mid third-century house-church in Dura-Europos, a city on the Roman/Parthian border (modern-day western Syria). When archeologists excavated the site in the 1940s, they found the baptistery of this converted domestic structure with its ceiling and many of its wall frescoes intact, thus discovering a unique example of early Christian architecture and interior decoration (see Figure 35.2).

To a great degree, the limited geographical provenance of early Christian art is an accident of survival and, unlike the lack of pre-third-century data, not a factor that can be explained by the nature of the data itself. Much of the other non-Roman material, which must have existed, presumably has been lost in the continuous urban renewal of cities and towns or from sporadic, purposeful destruction. Accordingly, the fact that the preponderance of existing artistic data derive from Rome is neither proof of Roman superiority in the crafts nor the particular authority of the church at Rome at this early date. Early Christian theology and practice in other regions of the Roman Empire, including Spain, Egypt, Syria, Greece, the British Isles, and North Africa, reflect robust regional variations that are paralleled by stylistic and thematic distinctions in the surviving examples of non-Roman Christian art from later eras.

The second limiting characteristic of the earliest Christian art is the fact that it derives largely from funereal contexts. The major portion of extant pre-Constantinian artwork appears to have served primarily as decoration for tomb chambers or stone coffins (catacomb paintings and relief sculpture on stone sarcophagi). Even certain rare small sculptures in the round, or everyday or domestic items bearing recognizably Christian symbols (e.g., pottery lamps, gold glasses, and inscribed gems) mostly derive from tomb contexts.

The significance of this fact is difficult to determine given the lack of comparative material from non-funereal contexts. Apart from the unique example of the house-church at Dura-Europos and a few rare examples from other parts of the world, including Aquileia in northeastern Italy (whose double basilica may date from both before and after the Constantinian era), scholars may only speculate whether religious imagery typically embellished church walls or pavements and, if so, whether that religious imagery would have been more or less identical to the iconography that decorated burial settings. The Spanish Council of Elvira in the early fourth century condemned the decoration of church walls with religious paintings (Canon 36); a prohibition that suggests such decorations existed. The acts of the council, however, omit any description of the offending paintings. Later in the fourth century, Paulinus, the aristocratic monk and later Bishop of Nola described the paintings he had commissioned for the church he had built and dedicated to the saint, Felix, primarily of saints and biblical figures. Paulinus, obviously comfortable with the use of art in churches, defends his use of art by giving it a didactic purpose—to counter the popularity of pagan idols and to elevate and inspire his Christian flock (Poems 27 and 32).

Figure 35.2 The baptistery from the Christian building at Dura-Europos; photo from the Yale University Art Gallery and used with its permission

Nevertheless, based on the single example of the Dura-Europos baptistery and some of the stylistic parallels to Roman wall painting in domestic structures, it seems likely that church-wall frescoes or floor mosaics shared certain themes and painting techniques with the catacomb frescoes. The Dura frescoes included representations of the Good Shepherd, Adam and Eve, the healing of the paralytic, and the woman at the well—all scenes found also in the catacombs. Even so, the sample is too small for any clear assertions about either the existence or the specific appearance of religious images in other Christian buildings.

As noted above, during the fourth century, both the context and the content of Christian art changed. Churches were built as public buildings, paid for from the imperial treasury, and decorated by the best artisans. At the same time as art began to appear on the walls and in apses of basilicas in Rome, Constantinople, Greece, and the Holy Land, Christians stopped using the catacombs as burial places. Thus, the private, domestic, and funereal character of the surviving evidence was replaced by a dominantly ecclesial one. Moreover, whereas in the earliest period, the distinction between Christian and pagan art was almost entirely in their different themes or iconographical motifs, by the mid fourth century the setting of the art was determinative. A peacock on the wall of a Roman tomb might have been painted either for a pagan or for a Christian client, while a peacock in mosaic above the arch of an apse in a Christian basilica clearly had a Christian symbolic valence.

Wall painting

Apart from the house-church at Dura-Europos and other early examples such as the fourth-century Christian buildings in Lullingstone, Kent, extant frescoes that belong to the earliest period of Christian art mostly appear in a funerary context, on the walls and ceilings of tombs in the Roman catacombs. Their preservation is primarily due to their being underground. The earliest examples of these extensive underground cemeteries with their combination of wall and chamber burials include the third-century catacombs of Callixtus, Sebastian, Domitilla, and Priscilla. Although their use and decoration as burial places continued into the later fourth century, and they continued to be places of pilgrimage through the Middle Ages, catacomb burial mainly had ceased by the fifth century. Nevertheless, some of the most significant examples of fourth-century wall painting come from the catacombs of Saints Peter and Marcellinus, and the Hypogeum of the Via Dio Compagni (Via Latina), also in Rome.

Fresco painting on tomb walls had been a Roman custom prior to the Christian adaptation of that tradition. The continuity with this pagan Roman practice may clearly be seen in the composition and style of the paintings themselves along with many of the decorative elements (borders, urns, birds, garlands, etc.), features that also appear on the walls of Roman villas of the same period. In fact, many of the earliest paintings contained subjects that were as likely to have been pagan as Christian in meaning, including the ubiquitous praying figure (orans), the shepherd with sheep, or a funeral banquet (see Figure 35.3).

Figure 35.3   Funeral banquet from the Catacomb of Callixtus; watercolor from Wilpert 1903, Tav. 66

Although still within the broad tradition of Roman wall painting, the particular technique or style of the Christian catacomb frescoes was often more sketchy and expressionistic than the typical Roman wall painting, and these images are sometimes disparagingly described by historians as being crude, of poor quality, or carelessly executed. These features, however, may be less due to a lack of skill, time, or money expended than to the development of a kind of symbolic shorthand designed to communicate aspects of the faith. Figures were often awkwardly rendered with a limited color palate, sometimes difficult to identify, flat and two-dimensional, and supported by a minimum of narrative details. Noah, for example, is shown standing with his arms up in prayer in a small box-like ark, while a dove flies into the scene carrying an olive branch in its beak. This simple or abbreviated image is sufficient to remind the viewer of the entire story and its significance, making other details (Noah's wife, sons, elaborate boat stocked with lots of animals)—or even careful rendering of the figures—superfluous.

Furthermore, the paintings in the Roman catacombs were not intended for the view of the general public, but were private and personal in their character. They were in small spaces that were poorly lit and infrequently visited. Since Christians did not believe tomb paintings had particular value to the deceased in transition to the afterlife (as is true for ancient Egyptian tomb paintings), the function of these paintings was most likely entirely devotional and decorative—meant to comfort, inspire, or instruct relatives or friends during their annual visits to the graves of loved ones on festival or anniversary days.

The subject matter of these paintings was mainly drawn from biblical narratives, and figures were adapted from classical Roman prototypes such as the shepherd or praying figure. Iconographic references to scripture are often the primary basis for identifying these paintings as Christian. The most common biblical images include Adam and Eve, Jonah entering and exiting the sea creature's mouth, Moses striking the rock to get water in the wilderness, Abraham about to offer his son Isaac, Noah in his ark, the three Hebrew youths in the fiery furnace, Susanna and the elders, and Daniel flanked by lions. Representations of New Testament stories also appear, but are outnumbered by scenes from the Christian Old Testament almost five to one. The most popular New Testament scenes show Jesus in the role of teacher, healer, or wonder-worker and include Jesus healing the paralytic, the blind man, or the woman with the hemorrhage; Jesus multiplying loaves and fishes; and Jesus raising Lazarus from the dead.[4] Also depicted is the meeting of Jesus and the Samaritan woman from John 4. Representations of Jesus' incarnation, birth, Passion, or resurrection are virtually unknown in this early period.

The preference for art images based on Old Testament narratives led some scholars to theorize that Roman artists were particularly influenced by Jewish iconography, or had access to certain illustrated Bibles of the Jews—Bibles that provided the basic composition of many of the images in the Christian catacomb paintings.[5] However, no such illuminated bibles have been discovered. Moreover, the most important example of Jewish art from this early period—the wall frescoes from the synagogue at Dura-Europos—show quite different biblical scenes and, in the few examples of parallel scenes, have very different compositions. Furthermore, the Hebrew scripture-based images that appear in the catacombs are usually abbreviated rather than detailed, and not always what to modern eyes would be obvious choices. For example, Moses striking the rock is far more common in Christian catacomb art than Moses encountering the burning bush or even Moses receiving the Law.

The predominance of Old Testament images may indicate the importance of the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures for the early church. Whether in homilies, catechetical lectures, or in liturgy (prayers and hymns, in particular), preachers and theologians constantly held up episodes or characters from the Old Testament as 'types' prefiguring episodes in the life of Jesus Christ and the salvation offered by the church. The paintings in the catacombs can be understood as interpreting the texts in a similar way, although in visual rather than in written form. Thus representations of Jonah point to the death and resurrection of Christ as well as the death and rebirth of Christian baptism. Abraham offering Isaac figuratively alluded to the sacrifice of the beloved Son on the cross.

This form of visual exegesis also may account for the lack of certain narrative details in the image, or the preference for more obscure stories over the obvious. All that was needed was the visual cue as reminder—a symbol that carried far more meaning than its simplicity would suggest.

One particular image, that of John the Baptist baptizing a youthful—or even childlike—Jesus in the waters of the Jordan, is an exception to the otherwise general presentation of Jesus as wonder-worker or healer. Along with certain other figures or motifs that have no particular scriptural referents (e.g., a banquet scene, images of fish and loaves, or grapevines ripe with fruit), these images could allude to actual liturgical events of the early church, or symbolize certain important events in the life and worship of the early Christian community. Baptism and participation in the eucharistic meal not only were critical points in the communal life of early Christians, they were the liturgical signs that incorporated the deceased's hope of both the general resurrection and messianic banquet at the end of time. Thus, early Christian painting must be understood not as literal illustration, but rather as abbreviated visual references to the deeper or hidden meanings those stories or symbols held for the viewers' religious beliefs, practices, and identity.

During and after the Constantinian era, the range of subjects expanded at the same time as new iconographic themes began to decorate the walls of purpose-built churches as well as burial chambers and sarcophagi. Previously unknown depictions of Bible stories appeared in a variety of media, especially glass mosaic. Among these were Abraham hosting his three visitors, the discovery of Moses by Pharaoh's daughter, the crossing of the Red Sea, and scenes from the books of Joshua and Judges. Meanwhile, certain previously popular figures began to disappear, including the Good Shepherd, Jonah, and Noah.

Relief sculpture on sarcophagi

Many of the same iconographic motifs that appeared in paintings from the early period also appeared on the relief carvings of stone sarcophagi created for Christian patrons. Most Roman sarcophagi were lidded stone coffins and were normally designed to be placed against a wall. Usually box-shaped, but sometimes rounded like bathtubs, backs were often unfinished while the other three sides (front and the two ends), as well as the lids were decorated with relief sculpture. Only wealthy patrons could afford to bury their dead in this way and because of their great expense, sarcophagus reliefs tended to require a different level and type of craftsmanship from wall paintings. Sarcophagi were carved with drills and chisels in white marble, but occasionally also in limestone. Although they were sometimes painted, the application of color was normally restrained. In the earlier era, most sarcophagus images were portrayed on the same level or register, and by the end of the third century designs began to become more detailed, even crowded with smaller figures and multiple scenes. In the early fourth century, double-registered sarcophagi gave more structure or order to the multiple images. Despite their expense, they reflect a range of quality in skill and materials. Some feature reliefs with beautifully polished details, while others display shallower and less finely carved work, often in a lower grade of marble or softer limestone.

Like the tomb frescoes, stone sarcophagi were produced by workshops of artisans who also served a pagan clientele and adapted certain popular motifs for their Christian customers. From the fact that no two are exactly alike, it seems that the designs were customized for each client to some degree. Common to both Christians and pagans were images of shepherds milking or carrying animals over their shoulders, seated male readers, and scenes of children (putti) harvesting wheat or grapes. One or two extant sarcophagi from this period show that faces of a seated reader or female praying figure may have been left unfinished, possibly in the expectation that portraits of the deceased could have been added at a later time. Portraits of the deceased were frequently inserted into central shields or medallions (often of a scallop shell design).

The earliest recognizably Christian sarcophagi date to the late third century. Among the best known is the beautifully composed, so-called 'Jonah sarcophagus', now in the Museo Pio Cristiano in the Vatican and dated to approximately 270 or 280 CE (Figure 35.4). Jonah, the central and dominant figure of this sarcophagus, appears being tossed overboard and into the mouth of the waiting sea creature, and then being spit up on dry land again where he reclines in a posture similar to depictions of sleeping Endymion of Greek legend, frequently shown in earlier Roman sarcophagi. The water in which Jonah's boat floats also supports Noah's ark and a number of fish and sea creatures being caught by anglers on a bank. The boat's mast breaks into the upper portion of the sarcophagus' frieze, which contains images of Jesus raising Lazarus and Moses striking the rock to give water to the Israelites in the wilderness.

Sarcophagi produced for Christian clients in the fourth century showed fewer of the pagan influences in their iconographic programs, and motifs became exclusively Christian in character. The shepherd, praying figure, or seated reader disappeared and their places were taken by familiar biblical images. Most of the same biblical themes that had appeared in catacomb painting found their way onto the often crowded front friezes of sarcophagi, including the most popular of the Old Testament images: Adam and Eve, Moses (or Peter) striking the rock, Abraham and Isaac, or Daniel with his lions. Comparatively more New Testament images appeared on the sarcophagi, but the standard portrayals of Jesus as healer and wonder-worker remained consistent. Alternating with images from the Hebrew Scriptures are representations of the magi bringing their gifts to the Christ child, Jesus healing (the paralytic, the man born blind, the woman with the issue of blood, etc.) and working wonders (e.g., Jesus changing water to wine at Cana, multiplying the loaves and fishes, and raising Lazarus—Figure 35.5).

However, many new iconographic themes appeared on these expensive funerary monuments in the mid fourth century. Among these new themes is Christ handing a scroll (the New Law, the traditio legis) to his apostles Peter and Paul (Figure 35.6). In these images, Christ either sits on a throne-like chair (sometimes with his feet resting on the head of the god, Caelus), or stands on the rock of Golgotha out of which spring the four rivers of paradise symbolizing the link between Eden and Calvary. The gesture of passing a scroll is based upon the traditional gesture of the transfer of imperial authority or power from the Roman political scene. Christ here delegates his authority to his apostles—his earthly magistrates—from his position in heaven.

Another new theme on fourth-century sarcophagi is that of Christ entering Jerusalem riding on a donkey. However, the most striking additions are scenes from the story of Christ's Passion, which is especially noteworthy because of its absence from earlier Christian art.[6]

Depictions of Jesus's crucifixion are omitted from these compositions. Images of Jesus hanging on the cross are uncommon before the fifth or sixth century. However, the episodes from Christ's Passion narrative that do appear in these compositions include Jesus' arrest, Simon of Cyrene carrying the cross, Jesus being crowned with a laurel wreath (instead of thorns), and Jesus' appearance before Pilate (Figure 35.7). In the centre niche of many so-called 'Passion sarcophagi' is an empty cross surmounted by a laurel wreath enclosing the chi-rho monogram. Below, two sleeping soldiers appear, while above their heads, perched on the arms of the cross, are two doves. The whole composition suggests triumph rather than suffering and sacrifice. In fact, the empty cross with the wreath looks very much like the Constantinian imperial insignia, or military standard, and the parallelism was probably intentional insofar as it suggests Christ's victory over death and thus the deceased's hope of resurrection.

The omission of the image of Christ's actual suffering on the cross and its substitution with an image of him standing nobly before the Roman governor, or the symbolic wreathed sign of victory, may arise from a desire to emphasize the triumph of resurrection rather than the pathos of Christ's suffering and death. Theological writings from the same period explore the redemptive significance of Christ's death on the cross and offer a range of theories from Christ as victor over Satan to Christ as substitutionary sacrifice for human sin. Nevertheless, graphic depictions of the crucifixion appear to have been avoided, possibly because the image was too disturbing or the subject too holy. The image of Abraham offering Isaac occasionally appears to have been inserted in its place, as a type

Figure 35.4 Jonah cycle from the late third century so-called 'Jonah sarcophagus' in the Museo Pio Cristiano, Vatican; photo Robin Jensen

Figure 35.5 Double-registered mid fourth-century sarcophagus of the 'Two Brothers,' with various Old and New Testament scenes in the Museo Pio Cristiano, Vatican; photo Robin Jensen

Figure 35.6 Late fourth-century sarcophagus showing Christ giving the traditio legis to Peter and Paul, now in Musée de l'Arles; photo Robin Jensen

Figure 35.7 Passion sarcophagus, third quarter fourth century, from the Vatican Museo Pio Cristiano; photo Robin Jensen

Figure 35.8 Crucifixion. Wooden panel from the door of Basilica of Santa Sabina, Rome, c. 420–430; photo Robin Jensen of the crucifixion, while at other times, the scene is simply passed over altogether. One of the first indisputable images of Christ's crucifixion occurs on a small ivory box now in the British Museum (c. 420); another appears on the wooden doors of Rome's Basilica of Santa Sabina (c. 420–430 Figure 35.8). Crucifixion portrayals start to appear more frequently in the sixth century, a development that chronologically coincides with an increase of pilgrimage to the Holy Land, in particular to visit the Holy Sepulchre and the site of Calvary in Jerusalem. Some of the earliest such images were imprinted on souvenirs that travelers brought home from their visits to these holy places.

The implications of this iconographic shift during the fourth century, shown so clearly on the sarcophagi of the period, are several. First the presentations of Jesus in scenes of his Passion, as resurrected and enthroned, and as giver of the New Law, show a definite shift from an earlier artistic stress on Jesus as healer, teacher, or wonder-worker. Moreover, these new images are more dogmatic in nature and less consistently based in scriptural narratives. The imagery thus emphasizes Jesus' character as divine judge, heavenly lord, and redeemer, more than the events of his earthly ministry: healing, teaching, and working wonders.

Changing social or political circumstances may explain this shift away from the earlier scripturally oriented images toward those with more dogmatic emphases. Often the shift in Christianity's status and imperial patronage has been cited to explain representations of Christ as an enthroned heavenly king, sometimes with his feet placed upon the mantle of the god of the heavens, Caelus. Historians have long presumed these images had political significance and were even forms of imperial propaganda. To the extent that representations of Christ as ruler of the cosmos paralleled depictions of the Roman emperor as ruler of the earthly realm, they thereby confirmed him as a divinely ordained and empowered agent of God. This hypothesis has been re-examined and refined in recent decades. Some scholars have challenged the idea that fourth-century art was primarily captive to imperial interests and have pointed out the similarities of Christ in this iconography with the ruling pagan gods, Jupiter and Dionysus in particular. As Christianity transitioned from a persecuted sect to the official religion of the state, images of the pagan gods were replaced with images of Christ, sometimes shown in remarkably similar guise. Others have argued that presenting Christ as enthroned ruler challenged the previous emperor cult by showing Christ as the ultimate king of kings and lord of lords. Thus many of the new dogmatic themes of fourth-century painting and sculpture might refer to the triumph and power of the Christian God and Christian teachings over the traditional—but dying—Roman pantheon.

A related—but somewhat different—explanation for the fourth century's changing iconographic motifs is their shift from a private, funerary context to a public and monumental venue. Enormous sums of money were required to erect grand buildings and decorate them. They were intended to impress and catechize the masses of both local congregants and visiting pilgrims. The art in these spaces was not commissioned to console the bereaved, or to reflect the personal beliefs and hopes of individual Christians, but rather to express the glory, as well as the faith, of the church triumphant. Just as on the sarcophagi, many favorite scriptural images and sacramental motifs remained, but through the fourth through sixth centuries new themes adorned church apses and arches: representations of a majestic Christ, ruling and giving the New Law, and saints receiving their crowns. One of the earliest examples is the apse mosaic of Santa Pudenziana in Rome (c. 400), which depicts Christ enthroned among his apostles against the backdrop of the New Jerusalem. Female personifications of the churches of the Jews and the Gentiles offer crowns to Rome's founding apostles, Peter and Paul. A gemmed cross rises above and dominates the upper part of the scene and is flanked by the four living creatures from the Book of Revelation (see Figure 35.9).

Sculpture in the round

Few examples of early Christian sculpture in the round exist, which suggests that Christians were less inclined to this medium of art than either painting or relief carving. This form of art may have been most closely associated with pagan idolatry and the imperial cult, and thus shunned as a form of decorative or funerary art by Christian clients. Nevertheless, a few significant examples of sculpture have been assumed to have Christian associations and dated between the third and seventh centuries, in particular a number of third- and fourth-century Good Shepherd statuettes (Figure 35.10).

Figure 35.9 The apse in Santa Pudenziana, Rome; photo Robin Jensen

Figure 35.10 Good Shepherd statuette, Vatican Museo Pio Cristiano; photo Robin Jensen

A series of small sculptures, whose provenance is unknown and are therefore usually referred to as the 'Cleveland marbles' (because they are now housed in the Cleveland Museum of Art), include figures of the Good Shepherd as well as four statues of Jonah (Jonah swallowed, cast up again, reclining under the vine, and standing in prayer). Dated to the late third century on stylistic grounds, these pieces are thought to have come from a family tomb in Asia Minor.

Other rare examples of early Christian sculpture include depictions of St. Peter holding a cross, and a seated figure that has frequently been identified as Christ teaching. Although the existence of these artifacts demonstrates that Christians tolerated a certain amount of sculpture in the round, supporting textual evidence also survives. Eusebius of Caesarea referred to a bronze statue representing Jesus and the woman with the issue of blood that had been set up near the gates of her alleged home in Caesarea Philippi, as well as bronze images of Daniel and the Good Shepherd which decorated fountains in Constantinople (Ecclesiastical History 7.18; Life of Constantine 3.49). The Liber Pontificalis similarly describes statuary given by Constantine to adorn the church he constructed at the Lateran along with its baptistery, which was said to include seven silver stags, a golden lamb, and nearly life-sized figures of Christ and John the Baptist (Book of the Popes 34.9, 13 (Sylvester)). Although none of these figures has survived (allowing some doubt about their historicity), such texts give testimony to the inclination to identify particular pilgrimage sites or to beautify church settings with statues—an inclination consistent with Roman tradition and décor.

Mosaics and ivory carving

Even as the iconographic themes and settings of Christian art changed, many traditional motifs were carried over and some popular themes remained. Thus the end of catacomb painting in the fourth century did not put an end to narrative iconography in general, but only to certain themes that seem to have belonged to an earlier era. Christian art still continued to employ scripture-based imagery, even as both new and old biblical images appeared on the walls of church buildings, on small ivory diptychs or Gospel book covers, or in early illuminated manuscripts. For example, the early fifth-century mosaic panels along the nave of the basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore (c. 432–440), and those from a century later in the upper nave of Sant'Apollinare Nuovo in Ravenna (c. 493–525), continue to present traditional biblical motifs along with innovative ones. The basilica at Santa Maria Maggiore was adorned with an impressive cycle of Old Testament images in mosaic, especially with scenes from the books of Exodus and Joshua. Among the twenty-seven (of an original forty-two) surviving images are scenes from Moses' life, including Moses with Pharaoh's daughter, Moses' marriage to Zipporah, and the battle with the Amalekites. Included among the New Testament scenes found in the basilica of Sant'Apollinare Nuovo are depictions of Christ separating the sheep from the goats, Jesus calling Peter and Andrew to be 'fishers of men,' Jesus with his disciples in the Garden of Gethsemane, and Jesus on the Emmaus Road.

Ivory plaques, book covers, boxes designed to hold consecrated bread, and reliquary caskets also contain small narrative images, many of which were common in catacomb or sarcophagus iconography. Although most Christian ivory carving is dated from the fifth century, the craft was well established in Rome from the second century on and used for luxurious items of every kind from beds to combs. Hinged ivory tablets known as diptychs were used in the Christian liturgy to hold lists of names of saints, bishops, or important church dignitaries. The leaves of these diptychs as well as other ivory objects, including Gospel book covers, and even a bishop's chair, were decorated with carved images of Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the saints and with episodes from the lives or with narrative scenes from biblical stories (Figure 35.11).

Ivory carving was used for small pieces and had a kind of intimacy unlike works intended for public view. By contrast, from the fourth to the sixth centuries, mosaic decoration of churches became one of the most important and beautiful modes of Christian artistic expression on a large scale. As with ivory carving, mosaic decoration did not originate with Christian art, however. The use of decorative mosaics for both walls and floors was widespread in the ancient Mediterranean world, and workshops of skilled artisans merely needed to adapt well-practiced techniques to a new program of images. A few wall and floor mosaics with Christian themes or from Christian contexts are known to date from the pre-Constantinian or very early Constantinian era, and have been discovered in church buildings as well as in funerary contexts. One of the best known of the latter is the mosaic found in the so-called 'tomb of the Julii' (or mausoleum M) under St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, which has been roughly dated to the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century. This tomb includes images of a fisher and Jonah, but the most famous is the ceiling mosaic that presents Christ in the guise of the sun-god (Sol Invictus), complete with radiate halo and riding in a chariot drawn by four

Figure 35.11   Early Christian ivory panel; now in Munich, Bayerisches Nationalmuseum; photo Wikimedia Creative Commons (photo Andreas Praefcke—own work, public domain, all rights released:
https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:Reidersche_Tafel_c_400_AD.jpg) white horses. Such an image, clearly a conflation of a pagan image with the Christian savior, clearly was intentional—to illustrate an aspect of Christ's divinity (i.e., the light of the world or the 'sun of righteousness' from Malachi 4), or to signal Christ's superseding the pagan gods. Grape vines surround this figure. A common decorative motif in Roman art, here they may have alluded to the text of John, 'I am the true vine' (John 15:1).

    Another example of early mosaic decoration exists in an early double church in Aquileia, Italy.
The newer church dates to the early fourth century and may barely pre-date Constantine; the older (north) church building may have been constructed some decades earlier. Both of the churches' floors have elaborate mosaic pavements. The mosaic motifs in the older building may have been part of a pre-existing building on the site and display religiously neutral images of birds and animals while the floor of the newer edifice is clearly Christian in its symbolism. Among its panels are several scenes from the Jonah story as well as a representation of the Good Shepherd.

Mosaics were used to decorate both ceilings and floors of Christian churches in the fourth century, all across the Roman empire, from Britain to North Africa and from Spain to Syria. Archeologists discovered an unusual portrait of Christ on the central medallion of a floor mosaic in a late fourth-century Christian building in Dorset at Hinton Saint Mary (now in the British Museum). This portrait shows Christ as beardless and wrapped in a pallium, A chi–rho monogram stands behind his head, and pomegranates fill the field to the right and left.[7] The rest of the pavement displays personifications of the four seasons and hunting scenes. Adjacent is a small room whose floor mosaic includes scenes from the pagan myth of Bellerophon killing the Chimera, arguably an allusion to the idea of Christ overcoming Satan.

Mosaics began decorating the vaulted ceilings and apses of Christian churches in the mid fourth century, in conjunction with the Constantinian building program. Among the earliest examples, the mosaic program found in the round mausoleum of Constantine's daughter, Constantina (now known as the Church of Santa Costanza), include twining grape vines and harvesting cupids, bird, flowers, and portrait busts of Constantina herself. In contrast with decorative and probably religiously neutral motifs, however, are two apse mosaics in the ambulatory that show images of Christ with his apostles, Peter and Paul. These two mosaic portraits present two strikingly different presentations of Christ. In one, Jesus is represented as youthful and fair, (beardless, with light hair and eyes). In the other apse mosaic, an older, bearded and darker-skinned Christ is seated on the orb of the world as if on a throne, and his expression is solemn and regal. These latter two mosaics may postdate the floral and harvesting motifs by twenty years or more, and show the transition from a generic Roman décor to a more specific Christian iconographic program.

Although the churches of Santa Maria Maggiore and Sant'Apollinare Nuovo continue to show biblical narrative images in their nave mosaic panels, the medium of mosaic was applied most effectively to the apse and dome mosaics that generally emphasized the theological or dogmatic images of Christ transfigured, resurrected, or giving the Law. Typical of these are the early fifth-century apse of Santa Pudenziana (c. 400–420), which shows Christ ruling from the Heavenly Jerusalem (Figure 35.9), or Santi Cosma e Damiano (c. 540), which presents Christ standing in a darkened sky, wearing a golden tunic, surrounded by apostles and saints holding out their martyrs' crowns to their Lord.

The presentation of crowns is repeated in several places in Ravenna (the western capital of the Byzantine empire in the fifth and sixth centuries), in the church of Sant'Apollonare Nuovo, and in the famous mosaic-covered domes of the two baptisteries in that city—the Neonian baptistery (of the Orthodox, 400–450) and the baptistery of the Arians (c. 495–500). Apostles or martyrs processing with jeweled wreaths present a solemn, hieratic, and suggestively liturgical procession (Figure 35.12). These scenes have some resonance with ancient rituals in which lesser nobility pay homage to their newly crowned king.

A few years later, the designers of the mosaic decoration for Ravenna's jewel-like church of San Vitale (526–547) included two imperial processions of liturgical gifts. One shows the emperor Justinian, his courtiers, and the bishop with his deacons bearing the eucharistic bread. The other depicts the empress, Theodora, with her ladies in waiting, preparing to bring in the chalice.

The focal point of the chancel (or presbyterium) in San Vitale is the altar where the bishop would have presided over the eucharistic sacrifice. Above the altar the viewer sees a dominating image of Christ enthroned on the orb of the world, and below the apse are the offertory processions of Justinian and Theodora. Directly above the altar itself, on either side, is a different kind of liturgical commentary in mosaic—representations of biblical types for eucharistic offering or Christ's sacrifice. On one side Melchizedek (drawing on the text of Hebrews 7) and Abel present their offerings, standing on either side of a cloth-draped table that must have looked strikingly similar to the draped altar below. Directly across the chancel and at the same level of vision are two scenes of Abraham combined into one composition, the first showing Abraham serving his three visitors, and the second showing Abraham about to offer Isaac upon a flaming altar (Figure 35.13). The imagery and the liturgy here are in perfect harmony—the first non-verbally referring to and interpreting the language, actions, and symbols of the second.

Figure 35.12 Medallion from the early fifth-century dome mosaic, Arian baptistery, Ravenna; photo Robin Jensen
Figure 35.13 Lunette mosaic of Abraham and Isaac from San Vitale, Ravenna, late fifth century; photo Robin Jensen

Manuscript illumination

In contrast to the monumental character of the mosaics installed in the great churches of the empire, manuscript illuminations were small images preserved and cherished in the codices of the scriptures or Gospel books, which were kept on the ambo or altar, or in church treasuries when they were not in use. Beginning in the second century, the parchment codex (a bound book with separate leaves) replaced the scroll as the primary form of the book, particularly for Christians (Jews continued to use scrolls), and very gradually these codices began to be illuminated with miniature paintings. Some of these manuscripts are illustrated with full-page images, while others combine text with illuminations. The paint used for this work was egg tempera, often accented by silver or gold inks, sometimes on purple-stained parchment, underscoring the great value of the book itself.

The oldest known illuminated Christian manuscript was discovered at the monastery of Quedlingburg. The Quedlingburg Itala (so named for its place of discovery and because it contained a portion of the Old Latin Bible), dates to the early fifth century and consists of five leaves from the books of Samuel and Kings. Historians have assumed this work was produced in a Roman scriptorium that also served pagan clients because of its compositional similarities to a contemporary illuminated manuscript of the Aeneid (the Vergilius Vaticanus). Such cooperation and adaptation demonstrates the continued adaptation of Christian themes by artisans who were the inheritors of an already established tradition and highly developed craft.

The direct proximity of text and image, however, encouraged the continuing development of narrative art, particularly in sequenced cycles that represent the details of the text fairly literally. The abbreviated, sketchy, and symbolic images of the earlier catacomb frescoes are supplanted here by intent to directly illustrate the story. The four illustrated leaves of the Quedlinburg Itala show four scenes on three of its pages and two on another, each representing a relatively small detail of a story in the accompanying columns of text. Calculating that some of these manuscripts had fifty or sixty pages, the volume of artistic work must have been substantial and quite impressive in its richness and detail.

Surviving illuminated manuscripts from the sixth century include codices with fragments of the Pentateuch, particularly the book of Genesis (the Cotton Genesis and the Vienna Genesis) as well as portions of the Gospels (the Gospel of Augustine, the Rossano Gospels, and the Rabbula Codex). Originating in all parts of the empire, including Egypt and Syria, and Constantinople. The Vienna Genesis, perhaps the most beautiful and most complete of these early manuscripts (having forty-eight existing leaves), was executed in the early sixth century on purple parchment, suggesting that it was made for a member of the imperial family. One of the most impressive of the miniatures in this codex is the presentation of the flood, which differs in almost every possible way from the image of Noah in his ark found in catacomb painting or sarcophagus carving. Here, the ark, shown as a boat with a double-decker cabin, barely floats in a dark blue swirling sea in which people and animals are struggling but drowning. Another remarkable miniature from the Vienna Genesis is that of Rebecca and Eliezer at the well, from Genesis 24 (see Figure 35.14).

The Rossano Gospels (named for the Italian city to which the book was brought) are made up of excerpts from the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, and illustrate a series of episodes in the life of Christ, including several healings, the raising of Lazarus, and Christ's arrest and trial before Pilate. The image of Christ raising Lazarus is filled with narrative detail, even showing the onlookers holding their noses

Figure 35.14   Rebecca and Eliezer at the well from the Vienna Genesis; photo: Wikimedia Creative Commons
https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:ViennaGenesisPict45BlessingEphraimManasseh.jpg

for fear of the stench coming from the tomb. The trial scene of Jesus before Pilate is shown in two parts: Christ first appearing before Pilate, and Pilate asking the people to choose between Barabbas and Jesus. The background of these scenes presents what was probably a typical sixth-century court interior, populated with officials, scribes, and Roman guards.

The Rabbula Codex is extremely important in the history of Christian art, if for no other reason than that it contains one of the earliest extant images of the crucifixion. Originating in Mesopotamia, but probably based on iconographic models in Palestine, the cycle of images suggests a visit of pilgrims to the sacred shrines of the Holy Land. Certain topographical details—particularly in the representation of the crucifixion itself—not only lend a concrete literalism to the image but suggest that the creators of the prototype had a familiarity with that particular landscape. Like the mosaic processions and offerings in the churches of Ravenna, which represented or commented upon actual liturgical events, here art works draw upon what was known about actual spaces and geography to conflate image with reality and history with sacred narrative.

Other artworks

Christians also produced an entire range of smaller objects, both personal and private in character or communal and liturgical. Jewelry (cameos and signet rings), furniture, domestic ware (silver spoons or caskets, pottery lamps, bowls, or glass bowls and cups) as well as liturgical implements including reliquaries, incense burners, lamps, chalices, flagons, and patens constitute a large corpus of important objects for historians of Christian art. Pilgrimage tokens and reliquaries made of pottery, lead, enameled metal or wood were painted or stamped with images of events corresponding to particular sites in the Holy Land. Even coins, bearing Christian legends or details of reverse imagery, are a record of the way faith is made visual in daily life. Whether part of a church's treasury or primarily designed for personal and private use, these goods often are hardly distinguishable from common, everyday items, and their function or Christian character is evident only in their physical context or small design details. An ordinary drinking cup could have been used for a eucharistic chalice or a serving plate for a paten.

Depending on their base material, some of these items have survived better than others. Metal and glass remains endure better than textiles or wooden objects. Most of the textiles were garments, altar cloths, or curtains and made of linen or wool that bore Christian symbols or occasionally more elaborate Christian imagery, including images of the Virgin and the saints. The best preserved of these textiles come from Egypt, where the arid climate helped to preserve them.

Conclusion

Although Christian theologians at various times worried about the problem of idolatry and may have tried to enforce restrictions on Christian use of artistic imagery, in practical application Christians were making and using art, probably even from the first generations, although those images have not survived or been identified as definitively Christian. But, taking care not to fall into idolatry, Christians used visual images as identity with community, to enhance their worship, to inspire or educate, to aid devotion, or even to give honor to God and the saints. Not to be confused with those who actually worshipped cult statues or mistook them for living (and circumscribed) realities, Christians might respect or even give homage to a symbol or image without mistaking the mundane elements of wood, paint, or stone for the divine presence itself. Thus what at first appears as a difference between the official theological stance and popular practice, may be more properly a careful definition of form and function.

Several characteristics of Christian art emerge and appear to be foundational. First, early Christian art was almost always linked (either directly or indirectly) to narrative, as found in the sacred texts (or stories)—either the Hebrew Scriptures or the Christian Gospels. In the earliest days, these texts were, however, more illuminated than illustrated. The art works were shorthand references to familiar stories already interpreted and given secondary significance in the life of the community, its liturgy, its faith, and its present circumstances. Certain stories were more popular for representation, were particular favorites, and were represented in a kind of modified shorthand form, only to call the viewer's attention. The rest existed in memory. Only later, when the illuminations were absolutely juxtaposed with text, did the images become more faithfully narrative, but even these were interpretations of the key points and meanings contained in the accompanying texts.

A second characteristic of Christian art is its role in transmitting tradition, whether through instruction, or through the creation of sacred image and space and the formation of a kind of visual spirituality. Christian art was the work of the community, perhaps guided by church authorities and patronized by the wealthy, the aristocracy, or even the emperor, but even so, viewed by a wide range of spectators and eventually on full public display. To this end, Christian art had to be innovative with respect to its surrounding culture; it needed to visually reflect a new religious identity and to draw community around a group of core images or symbols that were its own, even if drawn from earlier traditions or prototypes. As the community grew and changed, so did the art that depicted its practices, beliefs, and values. Although the message of visual art did not necessarily coincide with so-called orthodox positions, it existed within the same context as other modes of expressing the core components of the faith: homilies, hymns, prayers, biblical commentaries, and even theological treatises. While not subservient to written texts, works of art shared many of their methods and purposes.

A third characteristic of Christian art is that it functioned both symbolically and socially. Visual art never merely illustrated texts or simply reinforced theological propositions; it encompassed and reflected the content and meaning of the faith in ways that transcended verbal expression. Whether simple and sketchy, or majestic and monumental, the art of the early church expressed the beliefs and hopes of those who belonged to the community in figures or signs that were effective for shaping and maintaining both personal and social identity. For those who used them regularly, the materials and contents of art required little explanation. Their messages were direct even if difficult to verbalize. Over time those symbols changed, primarily because the community evolved, expanded, or understood itself in new terms. Different aspects of the faith would come to the fore and find their expression in visual form. Each of these developments was keyed to changing theological emphases as well as shifts in the social, cultural, and political circumstances of the church, and each shift was mirrored in other aspects of Christian life, such as liturgy, theological writings, and institutional structures.

Notes

1   For example, see the standard argument in Chadwick 1967: 277–8, and by such prominent art historians as Kitzinger 1977: 3; and a helpful summary of the modern scholarship in Finney 1994: 7–12. See also Finney 1994: 99–145 (chapter 5), for his critique of other arguments for early Christian aniconism, including a presumption that the earliest Christians were more 'spiritual' or 'otherwordly' than their pagan neighbors than later Christian art-users.

2   Murray (1977) summarizes the early Patristic sources on this subject, as well as their use in the later iconoclastic controversy. Most of these ancient texts have appeared in collections including that of Koch (1917).

3   The identification of this art as reflecting imperial styles and motifs has been challenged by Mathews (1999) and more recently discussed in Jefferson and Jensen (2015).

4   For a discussion of the Lazarus imagery in the catacombs, arguing that the early Christians of Rome interpreted the raising of Lazarus from the dead in John 11 as prefiguring the resurrection of the believer and not of Jesus, see Esler and Piper 2006: 131–45.

5   For discussion and elaboration of these arguments, see Weitzmann (1971), Weitzmann and Kessler (1990), and Kogman-Appel (1999).

6   For discussion of the lateness of the crucifixion iconography, see Harley (2006), Jensen (2007), and Longenecker (2015).

7   Some viewers have proposed this might be a portrait of Constantine, based on his hairstyle and lack of beard as well as the prominent christogram behind his head.

Bibliography

Baruffa, A. (1992) The Catacombs of St. Callixtus: History, Archaeology, Faith. Vatican City: Libreria Editirice Vaticana.

Belting, H. (1994) Likeness and Presence: A History of the Image before the Era of Art, trans. E. Jephcott. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Bisconti, F. (2000) Temi di iconografia paleocristiania. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana.

Bovini, G. and Brandenburg H. (1967) Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage, vol. I, Rom und Ostia. Wiesbaden, Germany: Steiner.

Brandenburg, H. (2005) Ancient Churches of Rome: From the Fourth to the Seventh Century. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Brenk, B. (1977) Spätantike und frühes Christentum. Frankfurt, Germany: Propyläen.

Brenk, B. (2010) The Apse, the Image, and the Icon: An Historical Perspective of the Apse as a Space for Images. Wiesbaden, Germany: Reichert.

Brody, L. and Hoffman, G. (2011) Dura-Europos: Crossroads of Antiquity. Boston, MA: McMullen Museum of Art.

Chadwick, H. (1967) The Early Church. London: Penguin Books.

Deckers, J. (2007) Die frühchristliche und byzantinische Kunst. Munich, Germany: Beck.

Deichmann, F. (1958–1989) Ravenna: Haupstadt des spatantiken Abenlandes. 3 vols. (in 6). Wiesbaden, Germnay: Steiner.

Deliyannis, D. M. (2014) Ravenna in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.

Dresken-Weiland, J. (1998) Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage, vol. 2, Italien mit einem Nachtrag Rom und Ostia. Mainz, Germany: Verlag Philipp von Zabern.

Dresken-Weiland, J. (2012) Immagine e parola. Alle origini dell'iconografia cristiana. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana.

Du Bourguet, P. (1971) Early Christian Art. New York: Reynal.

Elsner, J. (1995) Art and the Roman Viewer: The Transformation of Art from the Pagan World to Christianity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Elsner, J. (1998) Imperial Rome and Christian Triumph. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Esler, P. F. and Piper, R. A. (2006) Lazarus, Mary and Martha: A Social-Scientific and Theological Reading of John. London: SCM.

Ferrua, A. (1991) The Unknown Catacomb: A Unique Discovery of Early Christian Art. New Lanark, UK: Geddes and Grosset.

Finney P. C. (1994) The Invisible God: The Earliest Christians on Art. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Grabar, A. (1967) The Beginnings of Christian Art 200–395. London: Thames and Hudson.

Grabar, A. (1968) Christian Iconography: A Study of Its Origins. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Harley, F. (2006) 'The narration of Christ's passion in early Christian art,' in Burke, J. et al. (eds) Byzantine Narrative: Papers in Honour of Roger Scott. Melbourne: Australian Association for Byzantine Studies, 221–32.

Jefferson, L. (2014) Christ the Miracle Worker in Early Christian Art. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Jefferson L. and Jensen, R. (2015) The Art of Empire: Christian Art in its Imperial Context. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Jensen, R. (2000) Understanding Early Christian Art. London: Routledge.

Jensen, R. (2005) Face to Face: Portraits of the Divine in Early Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Jensen, R. (2007) 'The passion in early Christian art,' in Joynes, C. (ed.) Perspectives on the Passion. London: T&T Clark, 53–84.

Kitzinger, E. (1977) Byzantine Art in the Making. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Kitzinger, E. (1978) 'The Cleveland marbles,' Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana I. Vatican City: Pontificio Istituto di Archaeologia Cristiana, 653–75.

Koch, G. (1996) Early Christian Art and Architecture. London: SCM Press.

Koch, G. (2000) Frühchristliche Sarkophage. Munich, Germany: Beck.

Koch, H. (1917) Die altchristliche Bilderfrage nach den literarischen Quellen. Göttingen, Germany, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Kogman-Appel, K. (1999) 'Bible illustration and the Jewish tradition,' in Williams, J. (ed.) Imaging the Early Medieval Bible. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press, 61–96.

Leader-Newby, R. (2004) Silver and Society in Late Antiquity: Functions and Meanings of Silver Plate in the Fourth to Seventh Centuries. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate.

Levin, I. (1985) The Quedlingberg Itala: The Oldest Illustrated Biblical Manuscript. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Longenecker, B. (2015) The Cross before Constantine: The Early Life of a Christian Symbol. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Lowden, J. (1997) Early Christian and Byzantine Art. London: Phaidon.

Mathews, T. F. (1999) The Clash of Gods: A Reinterpretation of Early Christian Art. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Milburn, R. L. (1988) Early Christian Art and Architecture. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Murray, M. C. (1977) 'Art and the early church,' Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 28(2): 304–45.

Nicolai V., Bisconti, F. and Mazzoleni, D. (2006) The Christian Catacombs of Rome: History, Decoration, Inscriptions. Regensberg, Germany: Schnell and Steiner.

Peppard, M. (2016) The World's Oldest Church: Bible, Art, and Ritual at Dura-Europos. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Snyder, G. (1985) Ante Pacem: Archaeological Evidence of Church Life before Constantine. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Spier, J. (2007a) Late Antique and Early Christian Gems. Wiesbaden, Germany: Reichert.

Spier, J. (ed.) (2007b) Picturing the Bible: The Earliest Christian Art. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Thunø, E. (2015) The Apse Mosaic in Early Medieval Rome: Time, Network, and Repetition. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Tronzo, W. (1986) The Via Latina Catacomb: Imitation and Discontinuity in Fourth-Century Roman Painting. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press.

Van den Hoek, A. and Herrmann, J. (2013) Pottery, Pavements, and Paradise: Iconographic and Textual Studies on Late Antiquity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Verkerk, D. (2004) Early Medieval Book Illumination and the Ashburnham Pentateuch. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Volbach, W. F. and Hirmer, M. (1962) Early Christian Art. New York: Abrams.

Weitzmann, K. (1971) 'The illustration of the Septuagint,' in Kessler, H. (ed.) Studies in Classical and Byzantine Manuscript Illumination. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Weitzmann, K. (1977) Late Antique and Early Christian Book Illumination. New York: George Braziller.

Weitzmann, K. (ed.) (1978) Age of Spirituality: Late Antique and Early Christian Art, Third to Seventh Century. New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Weitzmann, K. and Kessler, H. (1990) The Frescoes of the Dura Synagogue and Christian Art. Washington, DC: Dumbarton Oaks Papers 28.

Wilpert, G. (1903) Roma Sotterranea: Le Pitture delle Catacombe Romane. 2 vols: vol. I (text) and vol. II (plates). Rome: Desclèe Lefebvre & Co.

36

MUSIC

John Arthur Smith

The musical context of early Christianity

The concept and idiom of music

The concept of 'music' and the idiom of the music itself were very different in the cultures of Mediterranean and Near Eastern antiquity compared with modern Western and Western-influenced cultures (Foley 1996: 5–6). It is therefore appropriate to begin by considering the conceptual and phenomenological aspects of music in those ancient cultures in order to approach an understanding of 'music' as the early Christians are likely to have known it.[1]

The concept of music

The concept of music implied by musical references in the Hebrew Bible (HB), the Septuagint (LXX), the Greek New Testament (NT) and their related apocryphal, deuterocanonical, extracanonical and pseudepigraphical writings, shows no awareness of organised sound as an independent discrete aural phenomenon, the form, content and performance of which could be appreciated for their own sake. Neither is there any awareness of organised sound alone as a vehicle for the expression of human emotions. For the writers of those ancient texts, organised sound was an integral part of various types of human activity which in themselves were not 'musical' in the modern Western sense. The pertinent types of activity might be functional (directing, signalling and warning), symbolic (ritual action), verbal (uttered liturgy, poetry, prophecy and prose) or performative (dance and drama). This concept of music was prevalent throughout the Near East in antiquity, as many ancient written and iconographic sources show.[2] The concept of music as witnessed in the Bible and early Christian literature is aptly illustrated by the taunt (ostensibly uttered by children) given in the NT: 'We piped for you and you would not dance, we wailed for you and you would not mourn' (Matt. 11:17), and by the ring dance with its accompanying responsive song (ostensibly uttered by Jesus and his apostles) the text of which is given in the apocryphal Acts of John 94–96 and hints (in 95) at the use of the pipe: 'Grace dances. "I [Jesus] will pipe, Dance, all of you"' (NTApoc 2: 182). Dance in conjunction with song is perhaps implied in a passage from Symposium, or On Virginity by Methodius of Olympus, a Christian writer of the late third to early fourth century CE:

> Thecla stood in the midst of the virgins at the right hand of Arete and she sang beautifully;
> the rest stood together in a circle like the shape of a chorus, and responded to her: 'I keep > myself pure for you, O Bridegroom, and holding a lighted torch I go to meet you'.
>
> (Methodius, Symposion e peri hagneias*,* Oratio 11, Cap. 2; PG 18:
> 207–14; SC 95: 309–21; McGowan 2014: 130–1)

In the Mediterranean lands and the ancient Near East there was a widespread belief that the sound of certain musical instruments and instrumental noise possessed magical powers to ward off underworld demons and their malevolent designs. This represented a further functional activity associated with the sound of instruments. Sounding the instruments would banish chthonic influences and bring peace to troubled human souls. It is this belief in the apotropaic power of instrumental sound that lies behind the narratives of the young David playing a lyre to calm the troubled Saul (1 Sam. 16:16–23; 18:10), Elijah calling for a musician (probably a lyrist) to play as he prophesied (2 Kgs. 3:15–16), and Job playing the psaltery to calm his troublesome female servants (Testament of Job 14.4). In devout Christian circles, belief in the apotropaic power of the sound of instruments was frowned upon as a superstition of the faithless: invocation of the name of Jesus alone could banish evil (Quasten 1983: 15–17; Görg and Botterweck 1995).

In Hellenistic culture the concept was similar to that described above except that it also admitted the idea of organised sound as a discrete phenomenon. The Hellenisation of the Near East in the fourth and third centuries BCE inevitably brought with it the Greek concept of music, which eventually became predominant. Nevertheless, as will become apparent as this chapter progresses, the biblical and ancient Near Eastern concept of music remained in place alongside the Greek, especially in religious contexts where individual competitive prowess in vocal or instrumental performance would have been inappropriate. Interestingly, biblical Hebrew and Aramaic have no word that means 'music' in the modern sense; and although the Greek word mousikē (from which the English word 'music' is derived) is used in the LXX and related ancient literature in Greek, it always implies or refers to a combination of organised sound and one or other type of human activity (Smith 2011: xvii, 150–1).

The idiom of music

The musical idiom – the sound of the music itself – is elusive. There are no extant remains of musical notation or technical descriptions of music from either the ancient Israelites, the ancient Arabs, the ancient Egyptians, the early Jews or the earliest Christians. It therefore seems reasonable to suppose that their musical traditions were transmitted orally and never committed to writing. Despite the lack of actual musical remains from those sections of Mediterranean and Near Eastern society just mentioned, there are aspects of Hellenistic, northwest Syrian and Babylonian musical traditions which may be important for an appreciation of the musical idiom, or idioms, prevalent in the Mediterranean and Near Eastern lands in antiquity.

Among the many achievements of the ancient Greeks was their early development of a system of musical notation, examples of which have been preserved and can be reasonably accurately transcribed.[3] One such example is a substantial fragment of a late third-century CE papyrus manuscript from Oxyrhynchus in Upper Egypt, which bears the closing 30 or so words of a freely composed Trinitarian hymn in Greek (see Figure 36.1). The text of the 'Oxyrhynchus hymn' (as it is popularly known) is set to a melody written in Greek musical notation.

Comparison with the music of extant non-Christian Greek hymns from late antiquity shows the musical style of the Oxyrhynchus hymn to be very similar in so far as the word underlay is for the most part syllabic, long and short syllables in the text are usually set to long and short notes respectively, the rhythm of text and music is generally regular (predominantly anapaestic in the Oxyrhynchus hymn), and the melodic style is varied (Smith 2011: 214–15; detailed study: Cosgrove 2011). Published transcriptions of the music of the Oxyrhynchus hymn vary in their details (e.g. West 1992: 324–5; Cosgrove 2011: 92–3), but the characteristics listed above apply to all of them.

Figure 36.1 The Oxyrhynchus hymn (P. Oxy. XV 1786), c. 275 CE. Transcription of lines 3–5. Reproduced from Cosgrove 2011: 93, by permission of Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen

The Oxyrhynchus hymn attests to the early use of a Hellenistic hymnic musical idiom in a Christian context. But while the hymn seems to point to the existence of a Hellenistic, or Hellenistic-influenced, early Christian musical idiom, there are caveats. To begin with, as an example of early Christian music, the Oxyrhynchus hymn stands alone, isolated from other examples both chronologically and geographically; the closest extant examples of transcribable Christian musical notation have a ninth-century Frankish provenance. It is therefore impossible to know to what extent the musical style was typical of Christian hymns elsewhere in the late third century CE (although it is probably reasonable to suppose that the style was similar in areas where Greek culture was predominant). Second, the hymn is an example of only one genre. It provides no clues to the musical idiom employed for rendering biblical texts or liturgy. Under the circumstances, the Oxyrhynchus hymn, although of considerable interest in itself, is of limited value in the quest for the musical idiom of Christian antiquity (compare Cosgrove 2011: 150–1).

Northwest Syrian and Babylonian musical cultures also had long traditions of notated music, spanning well over a thousand years from approximately the eighteenth to at least the fourth centuries BCE. The pertinent extant documents are written in cuneiform script impressed into soft clay tablets which were then baked hard. They are written in a variety of as yet imperfectly understood languages and dialects (Dumbrill 2005: 22); some tablets are in a poor state of preservation. There is sometimes considerable scholarly disagreement about their interpretation.

Two groups of tablets are significant. One, consisting of items from a broad area of Babylonian influence in the ancient Near East, contains technical information about the tuning of the seven-stringed (and perhaps in some instances nine-stringed) Babylonian lyre (West 1994; Dumbrill 2005: 11–110). The other, consisting of some 29 more or less complete items and approximately 40 small fragments from around 1400 to 1200 BCE, unearthed at Ugarit, contains mostly religious texts in the Hurrian language (the so-called 'Hurrian hymns' or 'Hurrian songs'), and a complex system of abbreviated instructions for realising the pitched sounds associated with them (West 1994; Dumbrill 2005: 111–74).[4]

The two groups of tablets are in broad agreement about the tonal features and structural elements of the music; the music they represent clearly belongs to one and the same sound-world. With regard to tonal features, there seems to be a preference for intervals said to be 'fourths' and 'fifths', although whether they would have sounded like the present-day intervals is not known since precise pitches cannot be determined. There seems to have been no sense of a tonal hierarchy of pitches in a succession of pitched sounds (unlike, for example, modern major and minor scales).[5] The tuning patterns of lyres were normative throughout the ancient Near East over an extended period of time. It is possible that the cultic and court musicians of Israel/Palestine were acquainted with them and used them.

The principal structural elements are traditional repertories of short melodic motifs (Dumbrill 2005: 17). In the case of the lyres, the motivic repertories would have been derived from the pitches available in each respective pattern of tuning; in the case of the human voice, they would have been derived from the pitch inflections suggested by the natural utterance of text. Motivic structure applied as much to vocal utterance at specific pitches as to instrumental sound.

The idea that motivic melodic figures were used as structural elements in ancient Near Eastern music confirms a finding that emerged from research into Near Eastern synagogue chants undertaken by the ethnomusicologist A. Z. Idelsohn in the early decades of the twentieth century.[6] Idelsohn noted that motivic melodic structure was typical of chants used in Babylonia, Persia and the Yemen, places of ancient Israelite dispersion, for reading the sacred scriptures in the synagogue (Idelsohn 1929: 24–5 [§a], 38). He seems to have assumed that what he heard was a rendering of the chants exactly as they would have sounded some two to two and a half millennia earlier. While this would have been an unrealistic assumption as far as melodic identity is concerned, there seems no reason to doubt, given the insights provided by the cuneiform tablets discussed above, that the motivic melodic structure noted by Idelsohn was a very ancient traditional feature of chants used for formal scripture reading in the Near East.

Idelsohn's research revealed several additional features which can perhaps provide deeper insights into the idiom of ancient Near Eastern music than do the features revealed in the above groups of tablets. The most significant features to which Idelsohn drew attention (1929: 24–8) are:[7]

- traditional melodic figures as structural elements (as noted already);
- microtonal intervals;
- monophonic style;
- improvised ornamentation following accepted conventions;
- oral tradition of transmission (no musical notation);
- unison or random parallel intervals in communal song;
- semi-melodic motivic recitative for formal reading or reciting to an audience.

The penultimate feature in the list is somewhat surprising in view of the third. However, the use of random parallel intervals should not be regarded as implying an interest in harmony; rather, it suggests that each participant, although singing simultaneously with the others, chose an individually convenient pitch. Microtonal intervals are not likely to have been uniform (Smith 2011: 227). The first five features were probably also evident in renditions by melodic instruments harp, lyre and pipe.

It is not known how instrumental sound and vocal utterance at specific pitches related to each other when they occurred together. It cannot be automatically assumed that there was any requirement for them to begin or end simultaneously, for melodic instruments and voice(s) to use the same melodic figures as each other, or for melodic instruments to follow vocal pitches exactly, or in heterophony, or at all (Smith 2017).

Interim summary and remarks

The discussions above point to the existence of two basic musical idioms at the time and in the regions of Christianity's beginnings and early growth. One was a Hellenistic idiom; the other a general Near Eastern, non-Greek idiom. An actual example of Hellenistic Christian music is extant from the late third century CE, but it is isolated in time, place and genre, and therefore uninformative about the possible broader Christian use of Greek musical idiom.

The non-Greek, Near Eastern idiom, on the other hand, is broadly attested as far as its main features are concerned. However, the bulk of direct evidence covers a long period prior to the beginning of the Christian era; there is therefore uncertainty about the extent to which musical features evident in cuneiform tablets discussed earlier, and the purportedly ancient musical features observed in the early twentieth century, were current in the early centuries CE. It is nevertheless noteworthy that six of the seven features listed near the end of the previous subsection (the exception is the penultimate item) belong also to Arab maqāmāt (Smith 2011: 226–7), Jewish cantillation (Katz 2000: 63) and Christian chants, as they were employed for the reading of sacred scriptures in the central Middle Ages.[8] Thus the musical features of Medieval Arab and Semitic chant can be seen as forming a chronological 'stepping stone' between the musical features observed by Idelsohn in the early twentieth century and those revealed in ancient cuneiform tablets. There is therefore a strong likelihood, given the tenacity of oral tradition in relation to sacred texts, that what may be termed a Near Eastern Arab–Semitic musical idiom, possessing the features listed above, existed alongside certain elements of Hellenistic musical idiom, and that together – perhaps in various degrees of hybridity as well as discretely – they constituted the sound-world of early Christianity.

The substance of early Christian music

Musical styles

Several different musical styles are evident during the period. In the absence of actual musical evidence (except in the case of the Oxyrhynchus hymn), the existence of a plurality of musical styles can be read out of contemporary historiography and the literary styles of texts that were uttered at specific pitches. Of course, a text is not its music; but something of the likely character of its music may be deduced from the nature of the text and the circumstances in which it would have been uttered.

Many of the earliest adherents of the new movement were ethnic or proselyte Jews and would have been familiar with a variety of musical styles from their Jewish background. Scriptural cantillation, lamentation and wailing, and song that belonged with dances, weddings and work, all had their musical styles which, it is reasonable to suppose, continued in use among those Jews who added a Christological dimension to their traditional beliefs.

Among adherents in communities where Jewish influence was not predominant, other musical styles are evident. Greek styles are widely attested. Ignatius of Antioch (c. 35–c. 107), for example, in his valedictory letters of encouragement to Christian communities in Ephesus and Rome, employs metaphors that make use of imagery drawn from Greek musical culture. He writes of the 'harmony [harmonoia] and symphonic [sumphōnō] love' of the Ephesian Christians, and exhorts them to 'join the chorus [choros]' and take up 'God's pitch [chrōma theou] in unison' (Ignatius, Ephesians 4.1, 2). He exhorts the Roman Christians to become a 'chorus [choros] in love [agapē]' in order to 'sing forth [asēte] to the Father in Jesus Christ' (Ignatius, Romans 2.2). The terminology and the context of its usage imply that the recipients of the letters would have been familiar with Greek musical practice and may have adopted it in their gatherings (Smith 2011: 176–7). As has been noted earlier, the Oxyrhynchus hymn (late third century) provides evidence of the early Christian use of the musical style of Greek hymns in Upper Egypt.

However, the Greek musical style did not find favour among all Christians. The Assyrian Christian writer Tatian (c. 120–c. 185), who spent most of his life in Rome, expressed a strong aversion to the Greek chorus (the implication being that in Christian gatherings song was not, or should not be, rendered in that way): 'I do not wish to gape at many singers nor do I care to look benignly upon a man who is nodding and motioning in an unnatural way' (Tatian, [Tatianou] pros Hellēnas 22; PG 6: 857; McKinnon 1993: 22 §30; Cain 2010; Smith 2011: 178).

An anecdote about Hilary of Poitiers (c. 310–368), related by Jerome in the Preface to Book 2 of his Commentary on the Letter to the Galatians, suggests that the styles of hymnody in Western Gaul and Asia Minor in the latter half of the fourth century were somewhat different from each other (Jerome, Comm. Gal. 2, praefatio; CCL 77A: 80; Cain 2010: 131; Smith 2011: 235). Writing of the time when Hilary began to compose hymns after his return in 360 from exile and sojourn in Phrygia, Jerome says: 'Hilary, the Rhone [sic] River of Latin eloquence, and himself a Gaul born at Poitiers, called the Gauls unteachable in the hymns he composed' (Cain 2010: 131). It is supposed that Hilary's hymns, although composed in Latin, exhibited a number of Eastern characteristics – perhaps including the melodic style – to which the Gauls were resistant.

While the historicity of Jerome's anecdote may be doubtful, the likelihood of considerable musical differences between Eastern and Western hymnody is supported by a comparison of the literary styles of the Syriac hymns of Ephrem the Syrian (c. 306–373) and the Latin hymns of Ambrose of Milan (c. 340–397). In addition to different languages of composition, the hymns display different approaches to the use of language. Immediacy of expression and vividness of imagery characterise the 400 or so extant hymns and other religious poems of Ephrem. The four hymns generally regarded as genuine compositions of Ambrose, on the other hand, are notable for their elegant, simple and restrained linguistic style. Furthermore, the formal structures and metrical patterns employed by the two authors differ considerably. Ambrose's hymns are much the simpler in both respects. Each hymn normally consists of multiple four-line stanzas, without rhyme and without refrains. Each line has eight syllables paired accentually weak–strong, producing iambic tetrameter. Ephrem's hymns, by contrast, are of two types: metrical homilies (mēmrē) and didactic hymns (madrāshē). Hymns of the former type consist of multiple two-line stanzas without refrains, each stanza being a heptosyllabic couplet. Hymns of the latter type are more varied in structure and metre although each item is also consistently isosyllabic. It was normal for a refrain to be sung after each stanza. But while each madrāshā had its own refrain text, the melody to which it was sung might also have been used for the refrains of other madrāshē. The melodies have not survived.[9]

Remarks by Augustine of Hippo (354–430) point to differences in the style of psalmody in Greek-speaking Alexandria compared with Latin-speaking Milan. In Book 10 of his Confessions he says that he was frequently told that Athanasius of Alexandria (c. 296/298–373) required the reader of Psalms to employ a modest melodic inflection 'closer to speaking [pronuntianti] than to singing [canenti]' (Augustine, Conf. 10.33.50; CCL 27: 181–2; McKinnon 1993: 154–5 §352; Smith 2011: 210). This contrasts with the impression he gives of a more mellifluous style for the rendering of psalms and canticles in Milan, which he experienced during his sojourn there in 384 to 388, writing: 'How much I wept at your hymns and canticles, deeply moved by the voices of your sweetly singing church' (Conf. 9.6.14; CCL 27: 141–2; McKinnon 1993: 154 §351) and subsequently referring to the 'melody of the sweet songs to which the Davidic Psalter is usually set' (Conf. 10.33.50; CCL 27: 181–2; McKinnon 1993: 154–5 §352; Smith 2011: 211).

A literary phenomenon found in several tractates in the Nag Hammadi scriptures suggests yet a further style of musical rendition. This large collection of Coptic scriptures (52 tractates gathered in 13 codices), compiled perhaps in the first half of the fourth century, embodies the teachings of several mystical cults loosely described as 'gnostic'. From the end of the first century CE onwards, gnostic elements were present to some extent in all religions in the lands around the Eastern Mediterranean.

The phenomenon in question consists of strings of vowels grouped in multiple repetitions of first one vowel then another. The following is an extreme example from the tractate The Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth:

A Ō EE
Ō ĒĒĒ
ŌŌŌ III
ŌŌŌŌ OOOOO
ŌŌŌŌŌ UUUUUU
ŌŌŌŌŌŌ ŌŌŌŌŌ
ŌŌŌŌŌŌŌ ŌŌŌŌ

(Meyer 2007: 417–18)

There are similar examples elsewhere in the same tractate, and similar as well as shorter examples in four other tractates. The literary contexts imply that the passages of vowels were intended to be uttered, and in some cases uttered as song, but they do not indicate the method of utterance – whether each written vowel was iterated separately (producing a 'stuttering' effect when one vowel is written several times in succession), or whether the number of successive written repetitions of a vowel represents a duration for which its sound is held. It is possible that the vowels indicate the respective mouth shapes to be formed while vocalising on a low monotone; the changing mouth shapes would then give rise to changing vocal harmonics, a style of singing known as 'overtone singing' or 'throat singing'. It is a very ancient vocal technique used by, among others, Buddhist monks in Mongolia, Tibet, Tuva (southern Russia) and northern India, regions whence gnostic teachings percolated westward a little before the beginning of the Common Era (Smith 2011: 219–20).

Musical instruments

There is no clear evidence that Christians played musical instruments at their sacred gatherings or in their private devotions. Indeed, many of the Church Fathers expressed strong disapproval of Christians playing musical instruments at all.[10] There are overlapping ideological, social and political reasons why this was so. Paramount among them seems to have been that in Greco-Roman society musical instruments were associated with decadence, moral laxity, superstition, polytheistic religious rituals and war, and were thus symbols of a lifestyle abhorrent to the believers. Rejecting musical instruments belonged with rejecting that lifestyle (McKinnon 2000: 774–9; Smith 2011: 169–74).

It is also possible that the believers in Jesus wished to demonstrate to their detractors that they posed no threat to the state or to society generally,[11] but that the sober lifestyle they espoused was one of pacifism, moral rectitude, humanity and social good. Their rejection of musical instruments was an outward symbol of the inherent peaceable goodness of their way of life.

In addition, it may be noted that for the Jewish believers in Jesus the absence of musical instruments in religious gatherings was nothing new. It was part of their Jewish heritage that religious gatherings away from the Temple – especially those of local communities at their synagogues, but also those of families and households in domestic settings – took place typically without the sound of instruments, except for the occasional shofar call used for signalling in connection with religious observances at the synagogue (Smith 2011: 117–21, 132).

Although musical instruments of many types are referred to in the HB and the LXX as being played by the ancient Israelites and the early Jews, Christians chose not to play them, but allowed themselves to refer to them allegorically, metaphorically or in similes, as a poetic enrichment of their expression of faith (Smith 2011: 169–74).

What the early Christians sang

During the first five centuries or so CE, as well as later, Christian song is most usually referred to by the Greek terms psalmos, humnos and asma/ōdē and their cognates, and by their respective Latin equivalents psalmus, hymnus and canticum/cantus/carmen. In English those terms are commonly rendered 'psalm', 'hymn' and 'song' respectively, where 'psalm' is generally taken to mean a text from OT Psalms, 'hymn' a free poetic text in praise of God or Jesus, and 'song' a free poetic text of a general religious nature or a biblical poetic text from outside Psalms. However, the common translations and their generally accepted meanings can be unreliable guides as to the nature of the material referred to in the Greek and Latin texts.

Psalmos and psalmus

The Codex Vaticanus (fourth century) and the codex Alexandrinus (fifth century), two of the earliest extant comprehensive manuscripts of the LXX, provide the Book of Psalms with the titles psalmoi 'psalms' and psaltērion 'for [performance to] the psaltery', respectively. The first perhaps emphasises the literary genre, the second the association of the genre with the sound of plucked strings. The earliest extant titles of the two versions of Psalms in the Vulgate designate the contents as psalmi 'psalms' (Weber and Gryson 2007: 770, 771).[12] In addition to the overall titles of the collection, 66 individual items in LXX Psalms are designated in their superscriptions by various forms of the word psalmos. In Vulgate Psalms, the Latin designation 'psalmus' correlates with 65 of the LXX Greek designations (the exception is Vulg. Ps. 80 which lacks a musical term in its superscription).

In the NT, two quotations are specified as originating en biblō psalmōn 'in the Book of Psalms' (Luke 20:42; Acts 1:20). Comparison with the text of LXX Psalms verifies this. Generic references to Psalms are observable in, for example, the apocryphal Acts of Paul where it is reported that believers feasted 'amid the singing of psalms of David and of hymns' (Acts Paul 9; NTApoc 2: 258), and in the quotations from Augustine's Confessions given above. A passage providing a generic reference followed by reference to a specific group of items from Psalms is found in what is probably an early third-century work, the Apostolic Tradition, which says:

> And then, when they get up after the dinner, they shall pray, and the children and the virgins shall say psalms. And afterwards the deacon . . . shall say one of the psalms in which 'alleluia' is written. After that . . . again from the same psalms.
> *(*Trad. ap. 25.11–13; SC 11 bis; Stewart 2015: 165)[13]

However, during the early centuries CE, many psalms outside those of the biblical canon were in circulation. The LXX's supernumerary psalm, Ps. 151, is designated psalmos in its superscription. Among the Dead Sea Scrolls, the Psalms Scroll from Qumran (11QPs^a) contains, besides several canonical psalms, the underlying Hebrew texts of three of five apocryphal Syriac psalm-like religious poems (DJD 4.53–76). There existed in addition a collection of 18 pseudepigraphical psalms, written perhaps in the first century BCE, known as the Psalms of Solomon. The text, originally Hebrew, is extant in Greek and Syriac. The Pss. Sol. may have been styled in imitation of the canonical Psalms (Rahlfs 1935: II, 471–89; OTP 2: 639–70; Smith 2011: 90; Schreiber 2014). The collection as a whole is entitled Psalmoi 'psalms'; six of its individual items are designated psalmos 'psalm' in their superscriptions.

Humnos and hymnus

Ancient Greek culture defined the humnos fairly strictly as a regularly metrical strophic composition in praise of a deity, deities, heroes of the past (historical and mythological) or great men of the time of composition. It also prescribed the hymnic styles appropriate to circumstances of use such as sympotic, funerary, sacred ritual and so on (Pralon 2014). In later antiquity the formal strictures were relaxed (West 1992: 132 n. 11), and the resultant style is reflected in the earliest extant Christian hymns in Greek such as the Oxyrhynchus hymn, Phōs hilaron (see Figure 36.2) and Doxa en hupsistois theō / Gloria in excelsis Deo 'Glory to God in the highest' (a free poetic extension of Luke 2:14) superscribed humnos heōthinos 'dawn hymn' in an early collection of Greek Ōdai. The terms humnos and hymnus are also used to refer to religious poetry that does not belong to the Greek tradition but which is called 'hymn' because of its laudatory character. This applies most often to religious poetry in languages other than Greek (for example, the ancient Syriac and Latin hymnography referred to earlier), but also to some examples in Greek, especially Greek translations from other languages.

However, LXX Psalms contains six items designated in their superscriptions by the term humnos (alone and with one or more additional terms; LXX Pss. 6; 53; 54; 60; 66; 75) of which two instances correlate with hymnus in the superscriptions of Vulgate Psalms 60 and 66.

Asma/ōdē and canticum/cantus/carmen

In the LXX, 35 psalms are designated ōdē in their superscriptions: 22 by ōdē alone, 13 by ōdē and one or two additional terms. These correlate almost completely with canticum in the superscriptions of Vulgate Psalms (the sole exception is Vulg. Ps. 4 where carmen is the Latin equivalent of Greek ōdē).

In other ancient sources several poetic items are designated or referred to by one or other of the Greek and Latin words for song. The following poetic sections of the OT, outside Psalms, are so designated in the LXX and the Vulgate:

- Exodus 15:1–19 (the Song of the Sea), ōdē / carmen;
- Numbers 21:17–18 (the Song of the Well), asma / carmen;
- Deuteronomy 32:1–43 (the Song of Moses), ōdē / carmen (see 31:19, 21, 22, 30; 32:44);
- Judges 5:1–31 (the Song of Deborah), ōdē / canticum (at 5:12; compare 5:1);
- 2 Samuel 22:1–51 (David's song of thanks and praise), ōdē / carmen (also as Ps. 17 [HB 18] with variants, the superscription of which has ōdē / canticum);

Phōs hilaron / Cheering light

Phōs hilaron hagias doxēs, athanatou Patros, ouraniou, hagiou, makaros, Iēsou Christe, elthontes epi tēn hēliou dusin, idontes phōs hesperinon, humnoumen Patera, Huion, kai hagion Pneuma, Theon.
Axion se en pasi kairois humneisthai phōnais aisiais,
Huie Theou, zoēn ho didous· dio ho kosmos se doxazei.

Cheering light of the holy glory of the immortal Father, heavenly, holy, blessed, Jesus Christ, having come to the setting of the sun, having seen the evening light, we hymn [humnoumen] the Father, the Son, and the holy Spirit, God.
You are worthy at all times to be hymned [humneisthai] with happy voices,
Son of God, giver of life; therefore all creation glorifies you.

My translation. Greek text from <https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Phos_Hilaron> with accents removed.

Figure 36.2 Anonymous early Christian hymn Phōs hilaron/'Cheering light', c. third or early fourth century CE

- Song of Songs 1:1 (title of the Book), asma/canticum (each term appears twice);
- Isaiah 5:1–2 (an allegorical song about a vineyard), asma/canticum;
- Isaiah 26:1–12 (a song of hope for Jerusalem), asma/canticum.

In the NT, the text at Rev. 5:9–10 is presented as a 'new song' (ōdēn kainēn/novum canticum), and the text at Rev. 15:3b–4 is described in 15:3a as 'the song of Moses . . . and the song of the lamb' using ōdē/canticum twice.

Certain early manuscripts of the LXX preserve a collection of poetic items drawn from the OT and NT and traditionally known as Ōdai 'odes, songs'. In the four earliest manuscript sources, the number and order of individual 'odes' varies; the conflated total is 14. The collection has no title in those four manuscript sources, but many of its component items were sung liturgically in the Office of the Eastern Church, which seems to have justified the name 'odes' for the collection (Rahlfs 1935: II, 164–83, 1967: 78–80, 340–65). Only three of the items are actually designated 'song' (ōdē for all three): the first (Exod. 15:1–19, the Song of the Sea), the second (Deut. 32:1–43, the Song of Moses), and the tenth (Isa. 5:1–9, an allegorical song and its continuation). The last-mentioned item, in addition to being designated ōdē, is referred to as asma in its opening line.

A collection of 42 pseudepigraphical Christian religious poems known as the Odes of Solomon, dating from some time during the first three centuries CE, are reckoned to have circulated in Jewish-Christian milieux in Syria (their likely region of origin) and perhaps in Israel/Palestine. Several of the Odes of Solomon mention or imply the singing of 'odes' ('songs') (e.g. Odes Sol. 7.22–23; 14.7; 26.2; 36.2), suggesting that the present compositions are meant. Some also mention the playing of the 'harp' (kithara) in relation to the singing (e.g. Odes Sol. 14.7–8; 26.2–3). However, the instrumental references may be metaphorical (OTP, 2: 725–71; McKinnon 1993: 23–4; Smith 2011: 170–1).

Remarks

The terms 'hymn', 'psalm' and 'song' were not applied consistently in the early centuries of Christianity. In some instances, twofold or even threefold designations could occur, especially in Psalms. In LXX Psalms 66 and 75, the Greek superscriptions add en humnois 'among the hymns' to the existing twofold designations in the equivalent Hebrew psalms (Pss. 67 and 76). Those anomalies were already present in two of the earliest biblical codices, the mid fourth-century Codex Sinaiticus (LXX) and the early tenth-century Aleppo Codex (HB), as is shown for Psalm 66/67 in Figures 36.3 and 36.4. The terms ōdē/carmen (and so on) are most often used generically to mean 'song' in the sense of something sung as opposed to something spoken. Clearly, where any of these terms occur without pertinent defining information, their interpretation must be approached with caution.
Figure 36.3 Opening of Psalm 66 (LXX) in Codex Sinaiticus (330–360 CE). © The British Library Board, Add. MS43725, Quire 6, f. lv. The superscription (the first two lines in the image) may be translated: 'for the end among the hymns a psalm of a song'
Figure 36.4 Superscription to Psalm 67 (Hebrew Bible) in Aleppo Codex (c. 920 CE). After Aleppo Codex Online, Ben-Zvi Institute, Jerusalem, © 2007. The text may be translated: 'for the leaders [?] on stringed instruments psalm song'

Embedded poetic texts

The question of whether any of the poetic material embedded in the NT, its Apocrypha and the patristic literature was sung by the early Christians has received noteworthy attention in recent years (Cosgrove 2006: 266–8; Smith 2011: 182–7; Brucker 2014; Leonhard 2014; Löhr 2014). Inasmuch as poetic texts in antiquity were naturally susceptible of utterance at specific pitches, and it is known from the contents of the collection of Ōdai discussed earlier that both OT and NT canticles came to be used liturgically,[14] the question is more one of chronology than feasibility. Indeed, there is no immediate reason why the poetic material in the NT, including acclamations and encomia (but excluding three quotations from Greek pagan poetry),[15] should not have been part of early Christian song. Similarly with passages such as Anna's song of thanksgiving on the first birthday of her daughter Mary, in the Eastern-Christian Protevangelium of James 6 (second half of second century; Smith 2011: 143 n. 21, 148–9), and the hymnic conclusion to Clement of Alexandria's Paedagogus (end of second century; Cosgrove 2006: 266–8; but compare Smith 2011: 211 n. 86) (see Figure 36.5).

Hymn to Christ the Saviour by Holy Clement

Bridle of untamed colts, | wing of static birds, | firm rudder of ships, | shepherd of royal sheep; | these your simple | children gather, | to sing [ainein] holily, | to hymn [humnein] guilelessly | with innocent mouths |
Christ guide of children. | King of saints, | word almighty | father in the highest, | wise ruler, | support in sorrow | source of endless joy, | of the human race |
saviour Jesus, | shepherd, husbandman, | rudder, bridle, | wing to heaven | for the all-holy flock, | fisher of mortals | drawn safely in | from ocean of sin, |
the chaste fish | from the dreaded swell | by the bait of sweet life. |
sheep of the word | holy shepherd, | guide [us], king | innocent children; | footsteps of Christ | pathway to heaven. | Eternal word, | everlasting age, | eternal light, | fount of mercy, | agent of virtue | noble [their] lives | who hymn [humnountōn] God. | Christ Jesus, | heavenly milk | from the sweet breasts | of the favoured virgin | given of your wisdom, |
under the burden of sorrow. | The little children | with tender mouths |
suckle at the breast, | of the maternal word | the dewy spirit | until sated, |
[in] simple praises [ainous], | upright hymns [humnous] |
[to] the kingship of Christ, | let us pay what is due | for the teaching of life, | singing [melpōmen] together, | united in purpose | [to(?)] the mighty child, | in a chorus [choros] of peace | followers of Christ, | chaste people, |
let us together praise [psallōmen] | the God of peace.

Clement of Alexandria, Paedagogus 3.12.101. The translation above is mine, based on that in Wood 1954: 276–8, and that in SC 158 (1970): 193–203. Editions of the Greek text are available in PG 8: 681–4 (which adds a poetic text 'To the Instructor' after the hymn), and (with parallel French translation) in SC 158 (1970): 192–202 (without additional poetic material). Those two texts have a number of additional variant readings; these and manuscript variants are noted in the critical apparatus in SC 158. Lineation and punctuation follow the Greek text in SC 158.

Figure 36.5 Hymn from Clement of Alexandria, Paedogogus, c. 198 CE

How early such items might have been in use cannot be determined precisely. The date of composition of the literature in which they are embedded can be taken as a reasonable earliest possible date. Nevertheless, it is highly likely that Clement's hymn had an independent prior existence (Cosgrove 2006: 266–7). It is also possible that some of the poetic material in the canonical and apocryphal NT (perhaps including some of the encomia, such as Phil. 2:6–11; Eph. 5:14; Col. 1:15–20; 1 Tim. 3:16; 2 Tim. 2:11–13), existed independently of and prior to its appearance in the literary sources (contra Brucker 2014),[16] but this is speculation.

The form of early Christian song in its settings

Christian literature of the first five centuries CE witnesses a variety of forms of both plain and responsive song among believers. Such forms were common throughout the Mediterranean lands and the Near East in antiquity and are well attested in the Bible.

Plain forms may have been rendered collectively or by a soloist. In narrative texts, the singing could be shared between several singers in turn, representing different characters or groups. Examples might be the Song of Deborah in Judges 5:2–31 (Deborah, Barak, Narrator; Smith 2011: 99–100) and the Song of Songs.

Biblical Psalms contain several items for which responsive performance is implied by a superscribed 'Hallelujah' or an embedded liturgical instruction (LXX Ps. 117 [HB 118]:1–4, 29), and one for which it is explicit at every verse (LXX Ps. 135 [HB 136]). Curiously, the Greek text of LXX Ps. 135 (HB 136), in addition to giving the response material at each verse, has 'allelouia' as a superscription. If this is not an accidental addition, it suggests a number of possible performance variants. Certain of the canticles of the OT and its Apocrypha suggest responsive performance by the presence of periodic or changing refrains, as, for example, in David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1:19–27) and the Song of the Three (LXX Sg Three [= NRSV The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Jews, verses 28–68]).

First to early third centuries

The settings for Christian song during the early centuries of the Jesus movement were typically local gatherings of believers, more or less domestic in character. Christian sources from the first to the early third centuries provide only occasional insights into the form of singing. Remarks such as 'When you assemble, each one has a psalm [psalmōn] . . . ' (NT 1 Cor. 14:26) and, 'each is urged to come into the middle and sing to God, either from the sacred scriptures or from his own invention' (Tertullian [c. 155–c. 240], Apology 39.18; McKinnon 1993: 43 §74) imply solo song, as does a passage in the Odes of Solomon where the author says that his love of the Lord causes him to 'sing unto him [the Lord]' (Odes Sol. 16.1–2; OTP 2: 749).

A background of collective plain singing is perhaps the basis for the metaphors of 'chorus' and 'unison' used by Ignatius of Antioch in his letters to the Ephesians and the Romans. Collective song is also implied in the Odes of Solomon 7.22–23 and 41.1–2.

Responsive song is implied in the passage from the Apostolic Tradition 25:11–13, cited earlier, the continuation of which says, 'And afterwards, the bishop, having offered the cup, he shall say a psalm proper to the cup, while all say "alleluia". And all of them, as he recites the psalms, shall say "alleluia"' (Trad. ap. 25.13–14; Stewart 2015: 165).

The psalms with 'alleluia' were also a feature of private prayer. Tertullian, for example, in his work Prayer, recommended five times of prayer each day, adding 'The more exacting in their prayer are accustomed to add to their prayers an Alleluia and that sort of psalm in which those present respond with the closing verses [clausulis respondeant]' (Tertullian, De oratione 27; CCL 1: 273; McKinnon 1993: 44 §78).

Parallels with the singing of skolia at Hellenistic banquets are noticeable in several early glimpses of Christian song. The skolion was a strophic song each verse of which was composed spontaneously and sung by each participant in turn as a lyre (for accompaniment) was passed to him; there was a strong element of rivalry attached to the cleverness of the verses (Collins 2005). In the Christian parallels there is no hint of rivalry, and the lyre is absent, but the idea of each participant coming forward and offering an oral contribution – sometimes a song from 'the sacred scriptures' or 'from his own invention' – is evident in NT 1 Cor. 14:26, in the Bithynian Christians' song to Christ which they reportedly sang secum invicem 'among themselves in turn' (Pliny the Younger, Letters [to Trajan], 10.96:7; McKinnon 1993: 27 §41; Smith 2011: 177), and in Tertullian's Apology 39.18, referred to earlier, which says that during an agapē (a type of Christian banquet), when the evening meal is finished and the lamps are lit, 'each [participant] is urged to come into the middle and sing to God' (McKinnon 1993: 43 §74).

Late third to fifth centuries

As Christianity developed from a regionally dispersed new religion to the cohesive institutionalised state religion of the Roman empire, additional settings for Christian song came into being. Two are especially noteworthy: one is coenobitic worship offered by ascetics in their communal seclusion; the other is public worship offered by Christian communities in their basilicas, churches and other places of Christian assembly which by the end of the third century Christians had begun to own, and which after the Edict of Milan of 313 proliferated in urban areas. Both types of setting witnessed to considerably developed forms of worship and to the establishment of various categories of liturgical officiants, including 'singers' and 'readers'.[17]

Among anchoritic and coenobitic ascetics, the principal form of worship was prayer using the biblical psalms as its main vehicle. Many coenobitic establishments had strict regimes of daily prayer at set hours (the Offices). The use of psalms and canticles as material for prayer, devotion and liturgy became widespread in public assemblies. Biblical psalms and canticles were favoured since they were scriptural and therefore automatically orthodox. Freely composed hymns were also sung in coenobitic and public worship, although in the region of Hippo Regius in North Africa, such hymns may not have been customary in public worship until after the beginning of Augustine's episcopacy there in 396 (Ghisalberti 2015).

Three forms of responsive psalmody are identifiable and are applicable to all biblical poetry in psalmodic style. The term 'responsive' as used here implies the recitation of a psalmodic text by two or more vocal units in such a way that one or other vocal unit is perceived as 'responding' to another. The three forms are: (1) simple responsive psalmody: a group interjects a brief acclamation repeatedly at intervals as a soloist recites the verses; (2) antiphonal psalmody: two groups of approximately equal numbers alternate in reciting successive verses of text; and (3) responsorial psalmody: either (a) a group regularly interpolates a refrain as a soloist recites the psalm verses, or (b) two approximately balanced groups alternate in reciting the verses but combine at regular intervals to interpolate a refrain. Alternative (3a) resembles simple responsive psalmody; alternative (3b) is a kind of hybrid of simple responsive and antiphonal psalmody. The important point here, however, is that the material of the 'refrain' is a substantial portion of text, typically a whole psalm verse. Confusingly, the refrain material (normally a verse taken from the psalm being recited) is called an 'antiphon', a feature which sometimes makes the source texts unclear; for example, when Egeria writes of antiphonae being sung in the Jerusalem liturgies (Egeria, Itinerarium 24.1, 4, 8; Smith 2011: 202–3), it is usually impossible to determine whether she means antiphonal psalmody, responsorial psalmody (psalms with antiphons) or antiphon texts alone.

Antiphonal and responsorial psalmody were 'learned' forms, requiring all participants to have considerable knowledge of the texts. They were particularly appropriate for ascetics and clergy. Simple responsive psalmody, however, was a popular form in which laity could participate without prior knowledge. The simple responsive style was not confined to psalmodic material. Egeria, for example, writes of an Office in Jerusalem during which people were commemorated by name, to which young boys responded 'Kyrie eleison' as each name was read out (Egeria, Itinerarium 24.5; Smith 2011: 203).

Freely composed hymns were for popular use in domestic settings and in vigils, processions and the public Office. Many seem to have been written – or at least used – to counter heretical doctrines disseminated in hymnic form. Arianism in particular posed a threat to orthodox Christianity because it numbered wealthy and influential representatives of both church and state among its adherents. Hymns were important weapons in what became a political as well as a doctrinal battle (Smith 2011: 198–9). The hymns, such as those of Ambrose of Milan and Ephrem the Syrian, were couched in simple, regular strophic forms, in regular metre (often isosyllabic), which facilitated learning. Some had refrains, thereby opening for simple responsive performance and ease of lay participation.

Not all early Christian free hymns originated as weapons in ideological conflict. The text of the hymn Phōs hilaron (reputedly used in the home and the Office as an evening hymn when lamps were lit and is one of the earliest hymns; see Figure 36.2) is devotional, and that of Doxa en hupsistois theō (used in the early morning Office) is both prayerful and hymnic (Smith 2011: 200–1). Many Ambrosian style hymns were probably intended for devotional rather than polemical purposes.

Concluding remarks

It is clearly impossible to know for certain what the music of the early Christians was like. Nevertheless, reasonable conjectures may be made based on an understanding of the musical concepts and idioms prevalent in the regions where Christianity had its origin and early development, and the literary styles of the kinds of item the earliest believers in Jesus would have uttered at specific pitches.

The discussions in the foregoing pages suggest that the music of early Christianity consisted of unaccompanied monophonic motivic chant ranging from simple, almost monotone recitative to mellifluous song. Simple recitative would have been appropriate for the delivery of non-poetic prose; poetic prose is likely to have engendered more expansive musical styles. Strophic texts – with and without interpolated refrains – would have naturally generated regularly repetitive musical forms.

Pitch-specific delivery of a text could be undertaken by an individual or a group. Delivery by a group made possible various responsive styles of presentation, especially where strophic texts with refrains were concerned.

Hymnody and psalmody were the most prominent types of early Christian music. They, together with the simple recitative formulas used for reading scriptures and reciting liturgy, were to characterise Christian worship for many centuries to come.

Abbreviations

CCL	Corpus Christianorum Series Latina
Grove Music Online	Grove Music Online. Oxford Music Online. Oxford University Press: 2001–. www.oxfordmusiconline.com/public/book/omo_gmo (subscription)
DJD	Discoveries in the Judaean Desert. 40 vols. Oxford, UK: Clarendon: 1951–2009
HB	Hebrew Bible
LCL	Loeb Classical Library
LXX	Septuagint (cited here in the edition Rahlfs 1935)
MGG	Die Musik i Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. Finscher. 2nd edn. 29 vols. Bärenreiter/Metzler: 1994–2008

MGG Online	Die Musik i Geschichte und Gegenwart. Online edn., ed. Lütteken. Bärenreiter/Metzler/RILM: 2014–. https://www.baerenreiter.com/en/program/mgg-online/ (subscription)
New Grove	The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. Sadie and Tyrrell. 2nd edn. 29 vols. Macmillan/Grove: 2001
NT	New Testament
NTApoc	New Testament Apocrypha, ed. Schneemelcher, trans. Wilson. Rev. ed. 2 vols. James Clarke and Westminster/John Knox Press: 1991, 1992
OT	Old Testament
OTP	The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, ed. Charlesworth. 2 vols. Darton, Longman & Todd: 1983, 1985
PG	Patrologia Graeca
PL	Patrologia Latina
SC	Sources chrétiennes

Notes

1 What follows in this section is expanded from ideas presented in Smith 2017.

2 In addition to biblical and Bible-related texts, see the iconographic material and information in Manniche 1991; Kilmer 1998; Braun 2002 (includes a chapter on 'The Hellenistic–Roman Period'); Dumbrill 2005; Burgh 2006; Kolyada 2009; Teeter 2011; and under appropriate headings in New Grove (updated online as Grove Music Online) and MGG Sachteil (updated online as MGG Online).

3 Recent monographs on ancient Greek music include: West 1992; Levin 2009 (but see the review in Holford-Strevens 2010: 325–34); Hagel 2010. Transcriptions from Greek musical notation: e.g. West 1992: 283–326. Collected ancient Greek writings on music, in English translation with commentary and notes: Barker 1984, 1989. The ancient Greeks are also noted for their theoretical investigations into the properties of sound; but even in antiquity there was an acknowledged gap between theory and practice (Holford-Strevens 2010: 328 and n. 9 there).

4 Dumbrill (2005: 111–74) presents a detailed, illustrated catalogue raisonné of the extant Hurrian hymn tablets, including the fragments. Dumbrill also presents reproductions and discussions of five different transcriptions (four previously published, and a new one by Dumbrill himself) of the most substantial and best preserved of the Hurrian hymns/songs: that designated h.6 (2005: 118–20, 122, 130), and black-and-white photographs and hand drawn copies of h.6 (2005: 115–16, 133). See also Smith 2011: 115.

5 The term 'scale' used by modern commentators in connection with ancient Near Eastern music should be understood as referring to a product of theoretical analysis: an extrapolation of each of the different pitches playable with a given tuning pattern, arranged in ascending or descending order. Thus 'scale' serves to identify the individual pitches available in a designated 'area' of sound, but without hierarchical tonal implications.

6 The material results of Idelsohn's research appeared in his monumental collection of Near Eastern ('Oriental' in Idelsohn's terminology) synagogue chants published as a ten-volume thesaurus, first in German (= Idelsohn 1914–1932). The publication history of the thesaurus is complex; some volumes were also published in English. The first five volumes provide material for the early chapters of Idelsohn 1929; they are also the most relevant in the present context.

7 Idelsohn's own interpretations and use of his findings raise many issues, especially with regard to the process of oral transmission, the preservation of melodic identity and relative chronology. Given the passage of time since Idelsohn wrote, it is inevitable that some aspects of his work have been superseded (see my critique in Smith 2011: 225–7). The following list itemises the objective results of Idelsohn's research, concentrating on the methods, principles and procedures to which he drew attention.

8 McGowan 2014: 86, citing Foley 1996: 65 n. 68. This is not to suggest that there was necessarily a material historical connection between any of the central Medieval manifestations of pitch-specific oral delivery of sacred texts, or between any one of those manifestations and possible earlier manifestations, although there was clearly an outward similarity of purpose, which can hardly have been a matter of chance (see further, Smith 2011: 224–34). The central Medieval Jewish, Islamic and Christian manifestations of the phenomenon referred to here were highly developed, incorporating syntactic, exegetical and interpretive elements. It is an open question how far such features were present in the pitch-specific oral delivery of sacred texts in earlier times.

9 Details and relevant bibliography in Smith 2011: 211–14. The four hymns generally acknowledged as genuine compositions of Ambrose are Aeterne rerum conditor, Deus creator omnium, Jam surgit hora tertia and Veni redemptor gentium. Several other hymns in Ambrosian style are possibly by Ambrose, but certainty is elusive since the style became popular and widely imitated. While Ephrem wrote in Syriac, many of his hymns were translated, especially into Greek. There are many false attributions. Further on Ambrose of Milan and Ephrem the Syrian, see, in the present volume, Chapter 57 (by Ivor Davidson), and Chapter 59 (by Kathleen McVey), respectively.

10 There has been speculation that in the early centuries CE Coptic Christians used instruments (perhaps bells, drums, finger cymbals and sistrums) in their assemblies, in common with their non-Christian Egyptian contemporaries, as they have done since at least the late Middle Ages (Maftah et al. 1991). However, confirmatory evidence is lacking. Clement of Alexandria's apparent condoning of lyre playing by Christians (Paed. 2, 4.43.3) almost certainly applies to circumstances other than sacred assemblies and devotions (Cosgrove 2006: 260–1).

11 They were accused of political subversion and gross anti-social behaviour, including cannibalism (as a result of misunderstanding about the nature of the Last Supper and the Eucharist). See, e.g. Minucius Felix, Octavius, Randall 1931, LCL 250 (1931): 304–437.

12 References to Vulg. Psalms herein are to the version Psalmi iuxta LXX (Weber and Gryson 2007: 767–955).

13 On Trad. ap., see Stewart 2015. The authorship and date of Trad. ap. as a whole, and the section 25.10–15 in particular, have been the subject of considerable debate (Stewart 2015: 15–63, 167–8). Here Stewart (2015) and the majority of scholars are followed in viewing Trad. ap. as a collection of material from the Christian community in Rome in the late second and early third centuries, and assembled in its present form in the early third century. The LXX/Vulg. Psalms furnished with 'allēlouia/alleluia' are 104–6; 110; 111; 112–17 (the Hallel of Jewish tradition); 118; 134; 135; 145–150.

14 Ōdai contains three NT canticles: Luke 1:46–55; 68–79; 2:29–32.

15 Acts 17:28 is from a hymn to Zeus; 1 Cor. 15:33 and Titus 1:12 are most likely from Menander and Epimenides, respectively (Brucker 2014: 10).

16 Brucker (2014: 11) characterises the NT encomia as 'epideictic passages' and on that basis discounts them as examples of texts quoted from prior usage. However, overt displays of authorial skill do not in themselves preclude the possibility that these passages are quotations from, or allusions to, pre-existent material.

17 Most of what follows is distilled from Smith 2011: 193–216. On the development of the liturgical roles of singers and readers, see especially Page 2010: 89–171.

Bibliography

Barker, A. (ed.) (trans.) (1984/1989) Greek Musical Writings, 2 vols. Cambridge Readings in the Literature of Music. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Botterweck, G. J. and Ringgren, H. (eds) (1995) Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament, vol. 7. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans [ET of German edn. of 1986].

Braun, J. (2002) Music in Ancient Israel/Palestine: Archaeological, Written, and Comparative Sources. Grand Rapids, MI; Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans.

Brucker, R. (2014) '"Songs," "hymns," and "encomia" in the New Testament?', in Leonhard and Löhr 2014: 1–14.

Burgh, T. W. (2006) Listening to the Artifacts: Music Culture in Ancient Palestine. London and New York: T&T Clark.

Cain, A. (trans.) (2010) St. Jerome: Commentary on Galatians, Fathers of the Church Patristic Series 121. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Collins, D. (2005) Master of the Game: Competition and Performance in Greek Poetry, Center for Hellenic Studies/ Hellenic Studies 7. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Cosgrove, C. H. (2006) 'Clement of Alexandria and early Christian music', Journal of Early Christian Studies 14(3): 255–82.

Cosgrove, C. H. (2011) An Ancient Christian Hymn with Musical Notation: Papyrus Oxyrhynchus 1786: Text and Commentary, Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Dumbrill, R. J. (2005) The Archaeomusicology of the Ancient Near East. Victoria, BC; Crewe, UK: Trafford.

Foley, E. (1996) Foundations of Christian Music: The Music of Pre-Constantinian Christianity. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press.

Ghisalberti, G. (2015) 'Listening to hymns and tears of mourning in Augustine's Confessions, Book 9', Early Music 43(2): 247–53.

Görg, M. and Botterweck, G. J. (1995) 'Kinnôr', in Botterweck and Ringgren 1995: 197–204.

Hagel, S. (2010) Ancient Greek Music: A New Technical History. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Holford-Strevens, L. (2010) Review of Levin 2009 and Hagel 2010, Early Music History 29: 325–44.

Idelsohn, I. (1914–1932) Hebraïsch-orientalischer Melodienschatz [Thesaurus of Hebrew-Oriental Melodies], 10 vols. Jerusalem and Leipzig.

Idelsohn, I. (1929) Jewish Music in its Historical Development. New York: Holt, Rinehart, & Winston; repr. Shocken Books.

Katz, D. S. (2000) 'Biblische Kantillation und Musik der Synagoge: Ein Rückblick auf die ältesten Quellen', Musiktheorie 15: 57–78.

Kilmer, A. D. (1998) 'The musical instruments from Ur and ancient Mesopotamian music', Expedition 40(2): 12–19.

Kolyada, Y. (2009) A Compendium of Musical Instruments and Instrumental Terminology in the Bible. London, UK: Equinox.

Leonhard, C. (2014) 'Which hymns were sung in ancient Christian liturgies?', in Leonhard and Löhr 2014: 175–94.

Leonhard, C. and Löhr, H. (eds) (2014) Literature or Liturgy? Early Christian Hymns and Prayers in their Literary and Liturgical Context in Antiquity, Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament, 2. Reihe/363. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Levin, F. R. (2009) Greek Reflections on the Nature of Music. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Löhr, H. (2014) 'What can we know about the beginnings of Christian hymnody?', in Leonhard and Löhr 2014: 158–74.

Maftah, R., Robertson, M. and Roy, M. (1991) 'Music, Coptic', 'Musical instruments', The Coptic Encyclopedia, vol. 6. New York City: Macmillan. Also published in a digital web version: Claremont Coptic Encyclopedia (Claremont Graduate University School of Religion, 2009–), ccdl.libraries.claremont.edu/col/cce (accessed 25 July 2015).

Manniche, L. (1991) Music and Musicians in Ancient Egypt. London: British Museum.

McGowan, A. B. (2014) Ancient Christian Worship: Early Church Practices in Social, Historical, and Theological Perspective. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

McKinnon, J. W. (1993) Music in Early Christian Literature. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

McKinnon, J. W. (2000) 'Music', in Esler, P. F. (ed.) The Early Christian World. London and New York: Routledge, Taylor & Francis, 773–90.

Meyer, M. (ed.) (joint trans.) (2007) The Nag Hammadi Scriptures. New York: HarperOne.

Page, C. (2010) The Christian West and Its Singers: The First Thousand Years. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Pralon, D. (2014) 'Les hymnes grecs païens de l'époque hellénistique et romaine', in Leonhard and Löhr 2014: 127–55.

Quasten, J. (1983) Music and Worship in Pagan and Christian Antiquity, trans. B. Ramsey. Washington, DC: National Association of Pastoral Musicians.

Rahlfs, A. (1935) Septuaginta: Id est Vetus Testamentum graece iuxta lxx interpretes, 2 vols. Stuttgart, Germany: Württembergische Bibelanstalt Stuttgart.

Rahlfs, A. (1967) Psalmi cum Odis. Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum graecum, vol. 10. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2nd. rev. ed.

Randall, G. H. (trans.) (1931) Minucius Felix, Octavius, in Tertullian, Apology, De spectaculis, with an English Translation by T. R. Glover; Minucius Felix, with an English Translation by Gerald H. Randall, LCL 250. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press, 304–437.

Schreiber, S. (2014) 'Can wisdom be prayer? Form and function of the Psalms of Solomon', in Leonhard and Löhr 2014: 89–106.

Smith, J. A. (2011) Music in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity. Farnham, UK: Ashgate.

Smith, J. A. (2017) 'Music', in Thatcher, T., Keith, C., Person, R. F. Jr. and Stern, E. (eds) The Dictionary of the Bible and Ancient Media. London: Bloomsbury.

Stewart, A. C. (2015) Hippolytus: On the Apostolic Tradition, 2nd ed. Yonkers, NY: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Teeter, E. (2011) Religion and Ritual in Ancient Egypt. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press.

Weber, R. and Gryson, R. (eds) (2007) Biblia sacra iuxta vulgatam versionem [Editio quinta]. Stuttgart, Germany: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft.

West, M. L. (1992) Ancient Greek Music. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

West, M. L. (1994) 'The Babylonian musical notation and the Hurrian melodic texts', Music and Letters 75: 161–79.

Wood, S., CP, (trans.) (1954) Clement of Alexandria: Christ the Educator. Washington DC: Catholic University of America Press.

37

IMAGINATIVE LITERATURE

Richard Bauckham

Introduction

Most early Christian literature was didactic, devotional or theological. But there is also imaginative literature, some examples of which we shall consider in this chapter. Such works, of course, had religious aims, but aims which were fulfilled by the telling of imaginative stories. Works of the narrative imagination are found especially among some of the so-called apocryphal works produced from the second century onwards. In this connection, the term 'apocryphal' should not be given much weight. These were not necessarily works which might have been included in the canon of the New Testament, but in fact were excluded. Most were never candidates for canonicity. They were not necessarily works condemned as heretical by the emerging orthodoxy of the Catholic Church, though some of them were. Many were widely read in thoroughly orthodox circles as edifying and entertaining literature, and some, even when roundly condemned by councils and theologians, were thought too good to lose by scholars and monks who preserved them, and much too interesting to abandon by ordinary readers with whom they remained popular. English translations of the Christian apocryphal works discussed in this chapter can be found in Elliott 1993 and Schneemelcher 1991–1992.

We might expect apocryphal gospels to be prominent among works of the Christian narrative imagination, but in fact no non-canonical gospel of the type that narrates the story of Jesus, as the canonical gospels do, survives in more than fragments. Surviving apocryphal gospels (mostly Gnostic) are collections of sayings of Jesus or dialogues between the risen Jesus and his disciples, not narratives. For stories of Jesus we must turn to more specialized off-shoots of the gospel genre: 'proto-gospels' and gospels of the Passion and Resurrection. The latter type (including especially the cycle of narratives known either as the Gospel of Nicodemus or as the Acts of Pilate), though important for its medieval influence, developed only in the later patristic period and will not be studied here. But 'proto-gospels' (often called birth and infancy gospels) which narrate Jesus' background (from before the birth of his mother), birth and childhood began to be written in the second century. We shall comment on the two second-century works of this type, from which all later such works developed: the Protevangelium of James and the Infancy Gospel of Thomas.

These works illustrate how the Christian narrative imagination blossomed especially in the gaps left by the Christian story as the New Testament itself told it. This also happened in the case of stories about the apostles. The canonical Acts of the Apostles, the only canonical narrative about the early church, leaves a great deal untold. Even Paul's story is cut off at an indeterminate time before his death.

The other most famous apostle, Peter, drops out of the narrative of Acts half way through the book, and not even his later presence in Rome, well known to all later Christians, is mentioned. About the ministries of most of the twelve apostles, all of whom the risen Jesus commissions, at the begin-ning of Acts, to take the gospel to the ends of the earth, Acts has practically nothing to say. For this reason – and other reasons which will become apparent – apocryphal narratives of the deeds and deaths of individual apostles flourished from the second century onwards. We shall study the five oldest of these apocryphal Acts of apostles.

The Protevangelium of James

The Protevangelium of James is one of the most attractive of the early Christian apocryphal works, as well as one of the most influential (see Cothenet 1988; Vorster 1988). It tells a delightful story with considerable narrative skill. The title Protevangelium is not ancient, but is reasonably apt in that it describes the work as the beginning of the gospel story. It begins in fact at a chronological starting point prior even to that of Luke's Gospel, with a story about Mary's parents that leads to her birth, and ends shortly after the birth of Jesus. But the ascription of the work to James is probably original. He is James the brother of Jesus, here understood (as in other Christian literature of the second and third centuries) as one of Joseph's children by his first marriage. Already adult at the time of Jesus' birth, James was an eyewitness of the later parts of the narrative, though only in the conclusion does he reveal his authorship. Pseudonymity presumably supports one purpose of the work, which, as we shall see, is apologetic against derogatory stories of Jesus' birth and background. The Protevangelium was written in the second century.

The narrative

Like the first two chapters of Luke's Gospel, the narrative strongly evokes a Palestinian Jewish con-text, with an emphasis on the Temple in Jerusalem, though, unlike Luke's Gospel, much of the Jewish detail is fanciful rather than historically informed. At the outset of the work, Mary's parents, Joachim and Anna, a wealthy couple resident in Jerusalem, are childless. Their sorrow over this is poignantly described. Joachim retires to the wilderness, apparently with his flocks (Protoevangelium of James 1.2 and 4.2; see Figure 37.1).

In response to their prayers, an angel informs them that they are to have a child who will become world famous. Like her Old Testament prototype and namesake Hannah, Anna vows to give the child to God, and so at three years old Mary leaves her parents to live in the Temple, where she is miraculously fed by an angel. This part of the story, known as 'the presentation of Mary in the Temple', has inspired numerous artistic renditions (see Figure 37.2).

At twelve, approaching puberty, Mary cannot stay in the Temple without defiling it, and so an angel instructs the high priest Zechariah (evidently the Zechariah of Luke 1, the father of John the Baptist) to assemble the widowers of Judea, so that by a miraculous sign one may be selected to take Mary as his wife. Widowers are specified because it is intended that Mary remain a virgin and her husband be in reality a guardian. The choice goes to Joseph.

At the age of sixteen, Mary is addressed by an angel, as in Luke's annunciation story, and visits her kinswoman Elizabeth, as in Luke's Gospel. When she returns home, Joseph's reaction to her evi-dent pregnancy and the angelic explanation to him in a dream are expansions of Matthew's account. When Mary's pregnancy becomes known to an outsider, Joseph is accused by the high priest of having defiled the virgin in his care. Both Mary and Joseph protest their innocence, and they are vindicated when the high priest puts them through the ordeal of drinking water that would harm them were they guilty.

Joseph and Mary appear to be living in Jerusalem, from where they set off for Bethlehem when the census is decreed. In one of its permanent contributions to the Christian imagination, the Protevangelium depicts Joseph seating the heavily pregnant Mary on a donkey for the journey. Another such contribution is its location of the birth of Jesus in a cave (a detail also found in Justin Martyr, writing at about the same time). They are only halfway to Bethlehem when Mary is about to give birth. Joseph leaves her with his sons in the cave, the only shelter in this desert region, while he goes to seek a midwife. He soon meets one who, entering the cave, witnesses the miraculous birth of Jesus. A cloud overshadows the cave; then an unbearably bright light appears in the cave; the child appears as the light withdraws. The midwife, deeply impressed, meets Salome outside the cave and tells her she has witnessed a virgin give birth. (Salome is probably Joseph's daughter, though in later versions of the story she becomes a second midwife.) The sceptical Salome refuses to believe unless she can put her finger on Mary's intact flesh. (There is clearly an echo of the Gospel of John's story of Thomas refusing to believe without himself touching the risen Christ.) Because she has tempted God with it, Salome's hand is consumed, but is healed when she prays and touches the new-born child.
Figure 37.1   Joachim Retires to the Sheepfold; Giotto, the Arena chapel in Padua; Wikicommons;
        Source: Web Gallery of Art

The story of the visit of the magi is then told, following Matthew's account. When Herod decrees the slaughter of the children, Mary hides Jesus by wrapping him in swaddling clothes and laying him in a manger. Elizabeth flees from her home in fear with her son John, and a mountain opens to receive and to hide them. When Herod's officers can get no information from Zechariah as to the whereabouts of his son, Herod orders his death. He is murdered in the Temple, where the priests later find his blood petrified, though his body has vanished.

Figure 37.2   The Presentation of Mary, Aged Three in the Temple; Giotto, the Arena chapel in Padua; Wikicommons; Source: wga.hu

Literary character

The literary tradition to which the Protevangelium most obviously belongs is that of Jewish narrative works (sometimes called 'rewritten Bible' or, less accurately, 'midrash') which retell the biblical histories, expanding on the biblical versions in order to explain problems raised by the biblical texts, to fill in the gaps, to satisfy curiosity, to put a particular theological or ideological slant on the stories, and to enable readers imaginatively to enter the world of the biblical stories and characters more fully (see Cothenet 1988). Such works often create new stories inspired by – though deliberately also differing from – those told in the Bible about other characters. This is what happens in the Protevangelium when the story of Mary's conception and birth echoes those of Isaac, Samson and especially Samuel, or when the story of Salome's scepticism about the virgin birth parallels the Gospel of John's story of Thomas's scepticism about the resurrection. The imaginative account of Mary's birth and childhood satisfies the sense that someone of such significance as Mary in the history of salvation must have been marked out and prepared for this role from before her birth, just as Jewish literature told extra-biblical stories about the births of Noah (1 Enoch 106), Melchizedek (2 Enoch 71) and Moses (Pseudo-Philo, Biblical Antiquities 9). The later part of the Protevangelium is the first literary attempt to reconcile the two canonical narratives about Jesus' birth in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. The freedom with which it sometimes treats these latter (especially in matters of geography) is surprising, but not entirely unparalleled in the Jewish 'rewritten Bible' texts. Typical of Jewish exegetical method is the way the Protevangelium creates stories which explain some feature of the scriptural text. For example, Luke's statement that Mary laid the child Jesus in a manger (Luke 2:7) is explained as a way of hiding the child from Herod's soldiers. The gospels' reference to the murder of Zechariah in the Temple (Matt. 23:35; Luke 11:51) seemed to imply that this was a recent event (rather than the event narrated in 2 Chron. 24:19–22) and so required a story to explain it. The Protevangelium, following the common exegetical technique of assuming characters with the same name to be identical, therefore tells a story of the murder of Zechariah the father of John the Baptist, in consequence of Herod's attempt to destroy the messianic child.

Apologetic and polemic

Several features of the narrative suggest that it was at least partly designed to deflect charges made about Jesus' background and origins in Jewish polemic against Christians, which we know to have been current in the second century, principally from the citation of them in the work of the pagan anti-Christian writer Celsus. Since both Jews and pagans were contemptuous of Jesus' humble origins, the Protevangelium begins by pointing out that his grandfather Joachim was very wealthy, while Joseph's trade is portrayed as that of a master builder. The fact that no mention is made of Nazareth is probably due to a concern to deny that Jesus' origins were obscure. Mary was not a girl forced to earn her living by spinning, as the polemic asserted; she did spin, but what she made, according to the Protevangelium, was the curtain for the Temple. Against the slander that Jesus was conceived through extra-marital union, the Protevangelium is at great pains to relate how Mary's virginity was safeguarded and her innocence demonstrated in a way the Temple authorities themselves accepted. It may not be accidental that the flight into Egypt goes unmentioned, since Jewish polemic portrayed Jesus as a magician who learned his magic in Egypt.

   Along with these responses to Jewish polemic goes a Christian counter-polemic against the Jews. On the way to Bethlehem, Joseph is puzzled that Mary appears to be mourning and laughing at the same time. She explains: 'I see with my eyes two peoples, one weeping and lamenting and one rejoicing and exulting'. While the passage echoes Genesis 25:23, it evidently means that Mary's son is to be the occasion for the sorrow of the Jews as well as for the rejoicing of Christians. From this perspective, the way the Protevangelium ends, with the story of the murder of Zechariah, often thought to be a later addition, is appropriate and effective. When Zechariah's blood is found in the Temple, a voice declares that it will not be wiped away until his avenger comes, referring no doubt to the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE.

Mariology

The way the Protevangelium develops the theme of Mary's virginity is a major step on the way to the mariological doctrines of a later period. To the canonical gospels' claim that Mary was a virgin when she conceived Jesus, the Protevangelium adds the claim that Jesus' birth was miraculous, such that Mary's virginity was preserved through it (the virginitas in partu), while it also implies that Mary remained a virgin thereafter, in that it depicts Joseph's children as those of his first wife, not Mary. These ideas are found in other second-century texts and so were not original to the Protevangelium, but it undoubtedly promoted them. It is not clear that they constitute an idealization of virginity as such. The idea of the miraculous birth probably has a scriptural origin (Isa. 66:7), while the emphasis on Mary's virginity seems related to her consecration for a unique role. That she remained a lifelong virgin may reflect a sense that the womb which had borne the Son of God should not be subsequently used for other and ordinary births (cf. 1 Sam. 6:7). Mary's special consecration for her extraordinary role in God's purposes is the focus of the work, rather than her lifelong virginity as an example to be imitated. On the other hand, sexual asceticism was certainly already current as an ideal in some Christian circles in the later second century, as the apocryphal Acts testify, and so the Protevangelium may owe something to that context.

It is noteworthy that the Protevangelium's interest in Mary is not properly biographical (by contrast with medieval lives of the Virgin). It does not continue her story beyond her role in salvation history, which it does not extend beyond the birth of Jesus. Its interest is solely in the way Mary was prepared for and fulfilled her unique vocation to be the virgin mother of the Saviour.

The Infancy Gospel of Thomas

Both curiosity and convention required appropriate stories, not only about the background and birth of a great man, but also about his childhood. Such stories, like the only one the canonical gospels tell about the boy Jesus (Luke 2:41–51) or one which Jewish tradition told about the young Abraham (Jubilees 11.18–24), should prefigure the role the adult is going to play in history. The Infancy Gospel of Thomas, also from the second century, complements the Protevangelium of James by telling stories of the miracles done by Jesus between the ages of five and twelve, concluding by reproducing Luke's story of the 12-year-old Jesus in the Temple, thereby attaching itself to the canonical gospel story (see Gero 1971).

The fact that a non-biblical character, Annas the scribe, appears in both the Protevangelium and the Infancy Gospel of Thomas suggests that the author of the latter knew the former and deliberately filled the chronological gap left between the Protevangelium and the canonical Gospel story. The title Infancy Gospel is modern, but the attribution to the apostle Thomas is ancient and may indicate that the work derives from the Christian tradition of the east Syrian area, which connected itself especially with Thomas (cf. the Acts of Thomas, discussed later). However, it displays none of the special theological characteristics of that tradition.

This work has none of the literary sophistication of the Protevangelium of James. What literary skill it displays consists in the telling of stories concisely and vividly. The miracles the boy Jesus performs anticipate, within the world of Jesus' childhood in Nazareth, the kinds of miracles he would perform in his adult ministry. Miracles of cursing and destruction occur disproportionately often, but there are also, for example, a miracle of raising the dead and a miracle of multiplication of wheat. The effect these miracles have in the stories corresponds to the way the gospel miracles were commonly understood in the patristic period: they demonstrate to people that Jesus is no mere human. One of the more sophisticated and attractive is the first story, in which the 5-year-old Jesus, playing at the ford of a brook, 'gathered together into pools the water that flowed by, and made it once clean, and commanded it by his word alone'. Then 'he made soft clay and fashioned from it twelve sparrows', who later, at his word, flew away. Jesus thus imitates his Father's work in creation, gathering the waters and creating living things. The fact that these miracles occur on a Sabbath indicates that he claims his Father's prerogative to give life on the Sabbath, as the adult Jesus does in John 5.

Later writings in the tradition of the Protevangelium of James and the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, especially the Latin apocryphal Gospel of Matthew (usually known as Pseudo-Matthew) which was very influential in the medieval west, drew on both works, taking over most of their contents and supplementing them in order to tell a continuous story from the birth of Mary through the childhood of Jesus. Thus, even where the two second-century works themselves were not known, the stories they told continued to be told, as well as illustrated in art, throughout the medieval period and later.

Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles

The literary genre in which the narrative imagination of early Christianity was most extensively expressed was that of apostolic Acts (see Findlay 1923; Bovon 1981). The earliest of the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles date from the mid second century or even a little earlier, and such works continued to be written for centuries in a tradition continued also to some extent in the lives of post-apostolic saints. Here we shall focus on the five oldest of these Acts, written between the early second and early third centuries: the Acts of John (Bremmer 1995), Andrew (Prieur 1989; Pao 1995; Bremmer 2000), Peter (Perkins 1994; Bremmer 1998), Paul (Brock 1994; Bremmer 1996) and Thomas (Tissot 1988; Bremmer 2001). (This may be the chronological order, but, although there are undoubtedly literary connections between some of these works and influences of some on others, the directions of dependence and influence are not agreed, and the chronological sequence is therefore quite debatable.) Only in the case of the Acts of Thomas has the complete text survived (probably best in the Greek version, although the work was probably composed in Syriac). In the other four cases, the text has to be reconstructed – with more or less confidence and with larger or smaller lacunae – from fragments and later adaptations of parts of the text, so that in no case do we have a complete text, though in most cases a large proportion is reasonably secure. These five texts were put together as a corpus only in the fourth century by the Manicheans, but they have evident affinities.

These various Acts are similar in that each narrates the final part of the apostolic ministry of the apostle in question, ending with his death (martyrdom except in the case of John, who dies peacefully). The Acts of Thomas begins with a scene in Jerusalem in which the nations of the world are divided among the apostles and India is allotted to Thomas. Thomas, despite his initial unwillingness to accept this allocation, travels by sea to India, where the rest of the work is set. The Acts of Andrew probably began with the same scene in Jerusalem, with Andrew receiving Achaea as his allotted mission field, and went on to describe Andrew's travels in northern Asia Minor and Greece, especially Philippi, Corinth and Patras, where he suffers martyrdom. The original form of the Acts of Peter evidently also began in Jerusalem, where Peter is said to have stayed for twelve years after the resurrection; in the surviving text, we are told only of his voyage to Rome and his ministry there. The Acts of Paul relates the apostle's travels in much the same areas as those which feature in the account of Paul in the canonical Acts, ending with a journey from Corinth to Italy and Paul's martyrdom in Rome. This has usually been understood as an alternative account of Paul's missionary career, paralleling that of the canonical Acts, but it can also plausibly be seen as a sequel to Acts, narrating travels Paul was believed to have undertaken between the end of Luke's narrative and his later return to Rome (see Bauckham 1993). Finally, the Acts of John tells of the apostle's ministry in Ephesus and other cities of the province of Asia, concluding with his death in Ephesus. The beginning of the narrative is lost, but the fact that John is depicted as an older man implies that only the final period of his life was covered.

The apocryphal Acts and the canonical Acts of the Apostles

These five works are each distinctive in structure, style, content and ideology, but they also have much in common and clearly constitute a genre of literature not quite like anything else, although they have been and can be profitably compared with several other types of ancient literature. They are certainly modelled to varying degrees on the canonical Acts of the Apostles. It was Luke's work, especially when read as a work distinct from Luke's Gospel, that structured salvation history in such a way as to make the missionary activity of an apostle, beginning at some point after the resurrection, readily conceivable as a narrative unity. None of the apocryphal Acts narrate – except in flashbacks in speeches – either the early lives of the apostles or their time with the earthly Jesus. For this reason, they cannot be classified simply as biographies. They are biographical only in a special sense determined by the Christian concept of the role of an apostle in salvation history. On the other hand, they are more biographical than is the canonical Acts. Even though Luke's narrative focuses almost exclusively on Paul in the second half of Acts, the fact that it ends at the point it does shows that the interest in Paul is subordinated to a non-biographical conception of the work as a whole. The fact that each of the apocryphal Acts tells one apostle's story and ends it with his death demonstrates a more biographical interest, which is in line with the growing popularity of biographical works in the period when the apocryphal Acts were written. To second-century Christians, the canonical Acts seemed unfinished in that it did not continue its story as far as Paul's death, while Peter and John both disappear from its narrative at early stages without explanation. It is easy to see how, to a more biographical interest than Luke's, his Acts seemed in need of completion and supplementation.

A striking feature which distinguishes the Acts of Paul in particular from Luke's narrative of Paul and aligns the former with Graeco-Roman biography in a way that is not true of Acts, is the inclusion of a physical description of Paul. Such descriptions were a standard feature of Greek and Roman biography. They are often conventional to some degree, reflecting the theories of physiognomics, which were popular in the second century and understood physical features as revelatory of character and aptitudes (see Malherbe 1986; Malina and Neyrey 1996: 100–52). The Roman historian Suetonius' physical descriptions of the emperors, for example, are determined as much by physiognomical theory as by the actual appearances of the emperors, even when these were readily available in the form of statues and images on coins. The description of Paul in the Acts of Paul – short, bald, bowlegged, with meeting eyebrows and a somewhat hooked nose – is to a large extent conventional and was certainly not unflattering as it appears to modern readers. Bowleggedness and meeting eyebrows were admired, the hooked nose was a sign of magnanimity, and a moderately small stature indicated quickness of intelligence (since the blood flowed more quickly around a small area and more quickly reached the heart, the seat of intelligence). The only feature which is surprising is the bald head, which might therefore reflect an historical reminiscence.

Despite the more biographical character of the apocryphal Acts, it was the Lukan Acts that provided for them the model of an episodic travel-narrative, including the deeds, especially miracles, and the words of an apostle, which all the apocryphal Acts follow to some extent, those of Paul and Andrew most fully. It is not surprising that the Acts of Paul resembles the canonical Acts more than any other of the apocryphal Acts, but in one respect the Acts of John is more similar. While its narrative is for the most part told in the third person, there are passages in the first-person plural, which begin and end unaccountably in the midst of third-person narrative. This phenomenon is not easily explicable except as a deliberate imitation of the 'we-passages' of Acts. Unlike Acts, the Acts of John also uses the first-person singular, though only on two or three occasions (61; 73; 86?). The implied author is evidently one of John's close companions who travel with him, much like Luke's role in the canonical Acts according to the traditional understanding of the 'we-passages'. The beginning of the Acts of John, which might have identified the pseudonym to whom the first-person accounts were attributed, is not extant, but this supposed disciple of John may well have been Leucius, to whom all five of the apocryphal Acts were later attributed, but who is also attested as particularly related to John. (It has been suggested that the name was chosen for its similarity to the name Luke, suggesting a role parallel to that of Luke in his Acts.) The Acts of Peter also contains very brief occurrences of the first-person plural in the midst of third-person narrative, which are probably remnants of a wider usage in the original text. While the Acts of Peter differs both from the canonical Acts and from the other apocryphal Acts in that it seems to have contained only one journey by the apostle – from Jerusalem to Rome – it is related to the canonical Acts in a different way: Peter's conflict with Simon Magus (Acts 8) is continued and brought to a dramatic climax in Rome. The work ends with the crucifixion of Peter – but upside down at his request, a scene commemorated in many European paintings (see Figure 37.3).

Alongside these forms of dependence on the Lukan Acts, the apocryphal Acts also share significant differences from the canonical Acts. Their more biographical character has already been noticed. The miracles the apostles perform are, in general, more dramatic and impressive than those of the canonical Acts. Miracles of resurrection are especially common, and seem to be related to an understanding of conversion as rising to new life, which is not to be found in the canonical Acts. The predominance of upper-class characters, among both converts and opponents of the apostles, is not paralleled in Luke's Acts, neither are the stories, recurrent in the apocryphal Acts, of betrothed or married people, especially women, who practise sexual abstinence as part of their new Christian lifestyle. While the canonical Acts contains episodes of excitement and adventure, such as Peter's escape from prison or Paul's sea voyage and shipwreck, intended to entertain while also instructing readers, the stories in the apocryphal Acts have far more sensational and fantastic elements: murder, parricide, self-castration, necrophilia, suicide, murderous demons, talking animals (even converted ones), a flying magician, a visit to hell, close encounters with wild animals in the amphitheatre, miraculous escape from execution by fire. Readerly pleasure is served by both melodramatic and humorous episodes, sometimes deliberately alternated. Among the light-hearted stories are the tale of the bed-bugs in the Acts of John, in which the apostle procures an uninterrupted night's sleep at an inn by banishing the bed-bugs temporarily from the bed, and the story which the Acts of Andrew, employing a stock motif, tells of a wife who abstained from sexual relations with her husband by substituting her maid for herself in the marital bed.

Figure 37.3   The martyrdom of Peter, detail from a painting by Filippino Lippi in the Brancacci Chapel, Santa Maria del Carmine, Florence; Wikicommons

The apocryphal Acts and the Greek novel

The elements of travel, upper-class setting, prominent female characters, adventure and excitement have prompted comparison with the Greek novel (or romance). The novel proper, i.e. the erotic novel (such as Chariton's Chaereas and Callirhoe or Xenophon's Ephesiaca), whose popularity seems to have been at its height in the period when the apocryphal Acts were written, tells a story of two lovers who remain faithful to each other through separations, trials and dangerous adventures, before arriving at a happy and final reunion. To some degree these novels carry a moral message as well as being designed for maximum entertainment. In that sense, the combination of entertainment and edification at which the apocryphal Acts seem to aim brings them close to the erotic novel. Moreover, the stories – to be found in all the apocryphal Acts – of upper-class women who forsake their husbands or deny conjugal rights to their husbands in order to follow the apostle's teaching, employ an erotic motif which could be seen as paralleling and subverting the themes of faithful love and sexual consummation around which the plots of the novels revolve. But these similarities are not sufficient to place the apocryphal Acts in the genre of the novel. Travel, for example, which in the plots of the novels functions to separate the lovers, serves a quite different purpose in the apocryphal Acts, where the travels are those of a Christian apostle charged with a mission of evangelism and care of the churches. More generally, the novels concern individuals in their private capacities, and their plots are limited to the personal lives and emotions of these individuals, whereas the apocryphal Acts portray the apostles as public figures, whose mission belongs to the purpose of God for the world and affects whole populations and regions. However much the emotions and aspirations of individuals are stressed in the stories these Acts tell, especially of conversions, such private affairs take their place in an overall story of public significance.

What we can conclude, from the features they share with the Greek novels, is that the apocryphal Acts may well have appealed – and were designed to appeal – to a readership similar to that of the novels. Unfortunately, the nature of that readership is debatable. The view that the novels were a relatively popular literature, circulating more widely than other literary works, and attracting especially a female audience, has been challenged by the evidence of surviving papyrus fragments, whose relative numbers do not support the hypothesis of wide circulation, and by the observation that the literary sophistication of the novels presupposes not only a literate audience, but an educated one. On the other hand, it is likely that the novels which have survived are those of higher literary quality and sophistication, while the relatively unsophisticated apocryphal Acts (with the exception of the Acts of Thomas) resemble, in this respect, a somewhat more popular level of novelistic writing. The prominence of upper-class characters, including women who exercise considerable initiative and independence, cannot prove that either the novels or the apocryphal Acts were intended to appeal only to readers of the same class and gender. Popular literature often features characters from the social élite. (Marcellus, the Christian senator who appears prominently in the Acts of Peter is unlikely to correspond to any historical Christians who were members of the Roman senate at the time of writing.) But it is reasonable to assume that the target audience included women who would find a variety of strong female characters to identify with, and who, in households wealthy enough to have educated slaves, would have slaves to read to them for entertainment.

If we envisage the apocryphal Acts as intended primarily to attract outsiders to the faith, and only secondarily to edify believers, we can easily understand the literary resemblances to the novels. If the targeted audience were primarily the literate élite, this does not mean that the apocryphal Acts pander to aristocratic prejudice. On the contrary, such frequent themes as the disobedience of upper-class Christian wives to their husbands, and the apostle's conflict with civil and religious authorities, usually ending in martyrdom, are aimed against established order, while some of the Acts, especially those of Peter, encourage a kind of solidarity with the poor and marginal that was both alien to the élite of the Greco-Roman world and also early Christianity's most distinctive socio-economic concern. Unlike the Protevangelium of James, the Acts of Peter provides no refutation of the dismissive description of Jesus it puts on the lips of Simon Magus: 'Jesus the Nazarene, the son of a carpenter and a carpenter himself'.

Before leaving the subject of the resemblances between the apocryphal Acts and the Greek novel, we should observe that one section of one of these Acts bears a much closer resemblance. The story of Thecla in the Acts of Paul (which later circulated as an independent narrative work, the Acts of Paul and Thecla, no doubt in the interests of the cult of Thecla) must be seen as a deliberate small-scale equivalent to one of the erotic novels. Thecla, like the heroines of the novels, is a beautiful young woman of aristocratic birth who preserves her chastity and remains faithful to her beloved through trials and dangers in which she comes close to death but experiences divine deliverance. She escapes two unwanted and malevolent suitors, Thamyris and Alexander, as do the heroines of the novels. Unlike these heroines, her chastity is not, of course, temporary but permanent, and represents her total devotion to God. But her devotion to God is also devotion to his apostle Paul, who preaches sexual abstinence as essential to the Christian way. This devotion to Paul is depicted in terms which are certainly not to be read as sexual, but nevertheless parallel erotic passion. As in the case of the heroes and heroines of the novels, the plot partly turns on the separation of Paul and Thecla, her search for and reunion with him. When she offers to cut her hair short in order to follow him everywhere and when she adopts male dress to travel in search of Paul, these may not be primarily signs of her liberation from patriarchal structures, though there is no doubt that she is so liberated, but rather echoes of the novelistic theme of a woman travelling in male disguise in order to escape detection. It seems clear that Thecla's story has been directly modelled on the Greek novel, both in order to entertain a readership similar to that enjoyed by the novels but also in order to express the message of sexual continence for the sake of devotion to God in an attractively symbolic way.

The apocryphal Acts and novelistic biography

The Greek novels were pure fiction, even if they originated as imitations of historiography and were apt to use some of the conventions of historiography (Morgan and Stoneman 1994; Holzberg 1995). While it is hard to believe that the frequently tall stories of the apocryphal Acts were taken entirely literally by, at least, their more sophisticated readers, nevertheless it seems unlikely that their authors would have been happy for them to be regarded as wholly fictional. At least the apostles themselves were real historical figures. This suggests that in search of the literary affinities of the apocryphal Acts, we should return to the category of biography, which we introduced when observing that these Acts are more biographical in form than the canonical Acts.

Momigliano makes this important comment on ancient biography:

> The borderline between fiction and reality was thinner in biography than in ordinary historiography. What readers expected in biography was probably different from what they expected in political history. They wanted information about the education, the love affairs, and the character of their heroes. But these things are less easily documented than wars and political reforms. If biographers wanted to keep their public, they had to resort to fiction.
>
> (Momigliano 1971: 56–57)

This comment needs qualification in the sense that some biographies were as scrupulously historical as the best ancient historiography. Indeed, one can perhaps speak of the emergence, by the time of writing of the apocryphal Acts, of two genres of biography: the historical, which remained close to good historical method, and the (for want of a better word) novelistic, which, while using sources, allowed more or less freedom to creative imagination. It is instructive to compare the works of a contemporary of some of the authors of the apocryphal Acts: Flavius Philostratus. His Lives of the Sophists, dependent on oral sources, no doubt share the limitations of the sources, but in these Philostratus does not indulge in free invention. Quite different is his Life of Apollonius of Tyana. Here the point where novelistic creativity takes over from history is impossible to determine, and scholars differ over whether even Philostratus' supposed source, Damis, is a novelistic invention. A quite different example of the same kind of contrast is between the histories of Alexander the Great and the freely imaginative Alexander romance.

There is no doubt that if we are to associate the apocryphal Acts with ancient biography, then it is with the semi-fictional, novelistic biography that we should associate them. This is a category which made some claim to be historiography, but which allowed very wide scope for various kinds of historical imagination. Readers who put the apocryphal Acts in this category would expect them to be biographies of real historical persons, but would also expect a considerable and indeterminate admixture of fiction. Given only sparse historical details for their imagination to work on, authors of such works would be expected to make the most of these but not to be constrained by them. Entertainment and edification required an approach much more flexible than the methods of more scrupulous kinds of historiography.

Scholars have found it difficult to classify Philostratus' Life of Apollonius generically. It seems to be a combination of biography with the novel. But, rather than confusing its genre with that of the novel proper, it would be more appropriate to say that this example of novelistic biography borrows themes from the novel proper, just as the Acts of Paul does. The way in which erotic subplots are included in the story of the ascetic philosopher Apollonius, presumably to appeal to the same kind of readership as enjoyed the novels, is parallel to, though not the same as, the way erotic themes are introduced into the apocryphal Acts. The semi-fictional or novelistic biography can be influenced by the novel proper, but it is not this influence that makes it semi-fictional. It is in any case a semi-fictional genre, novelistic in its own way. What the influence of the novel in this case illustrates is the way the novelistic biography was a genre particularly hospitable to influence from other genres. Such hospitality helps us to understand the variety of literary elements that go to make up the various apocryphal Acts (e.g. the Acts of Paul contains letters passed between Paul and the Corinthian church; the Acts of John contains virtually a short gospel; the Acts of Thomas contains poems and hymns; the Acts of Andrew shows particular affinities with the biographies of philosophers; folktale motifs are evident in some of the stories in the various Acts).

The Life of Apollonius, written in the early third century, tells the story of a first-century philosopher in a way which is based in history but is also freely imaginative. Another example is the Life of Secundus the Philosopher (Perry 1964). Secundus, put to death by Hadrian for keeping to his vow of silence in defiance of the emperor's command to speak, also lived at roughly the same chronological remove from his biography as the apostles did from the time of composition of their apocryphal Acts. The plainly novelistic story which his Life tells to explain his vow of silence is plausibly understood as a sensational story woven around the historical fact of the philosopher's silence, which would no doubt have been actually connected with Pythagorean asceticism. That Secundus is portrayed, like the apostles, as a martyr also illustrates how in this period stories of heroic deaths for philosophical or religious principle appealed to both pagans and Christians. The martyrdoms of the apostles at the conclusions of the apocryphal Acts could serve the propagandist aims of these Acts, just as historical martyrdoms in the amphitheatres and elsewhere did.

The apocryphal Acts are best described, then, as works of novelistic biographical character (not strictly biographies) suited to the telling of the story of a Christian apostle and defined as the semi-fictional narrative of the missionary activity of an apostle subsequent to the resurrection of Jesus and ending with the apostle's death. While modelled in part on the canonical Acts, they are at once more biographical and more fictional than the canonical Acts. They partake in several ways in the literary currents of the period in which they originated, a period in which biography in general and the novelistic biography in particular were popular, as was the erotic novel and the martyrology (whether as an element in biography or as a distinct genre).

Apocryphal Acts and Jewish 'rewritten' Bible texts

One further category of literature belongs to the literary context which accounts for the particular features of the apocryphal Acts. In discussion of the Protevangelium of James we have already encountered the tradition of Jewish narrative works which retell the biblical histories, explaining and expanding the biblical text with the imaginative development of stories about the biblical characters. Such works include both those which retell the biblical story with creative expansions (e.g. Jubilees, Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities, Artapanus) and those which tell largely extra-biblical stories about biblical characters (e.g. Joseph and Aseneth, Jannes and Jambres). This Jewish literature was widely read by Christians in the early centuries of Christianity. (In fact, most of it has been preserved only through Christian channels of transmission.) Most Christians who read, enjoyed and were instructed by it did not regard it as canonical scripture, as they regarded the Old Testament. Such Jewish works could well have suggested how the writings of the emerging New Testament canon could be extended (as by the Acts of Paul and the Acts of Peter) or supplemented (as by the Acts of John and the Acts of Andrew) by extra-canonical stories about the apostles. Some of these Jewish works use various forms of exegesis of the biblical text as the starting point and stimulus for exercises in historical imagination, while others are more straightforwardly fictional creations.

We can observe both types among the apocryphal Acts. When its relationship to the canonical Acts of the Apostles and the Pauline letter corpus (including the Pastorals) is carefully studied, it becomes evident that the Acts of Paul uses many of the usual Jewish exegetical practices to explain and to expand the available information about the period of Paul's missionary activity the author believed to have intervened between the end of Acts and the apostle's martyrdom (see Bauckham 1993). (It should also be noted that some of these techniques were also used by hellenistic biographers of writers, faced with the need to eke out the minimal historical data available to them and to develop entertaining stories about their subjects: see Lefkowitz 1981.) The same kinds of methods as we observed in the case of the Protevangelium of James can also be identified in the Acts of Paul. References to persons and events in the Pastoral epistles, for example, are the basis for the creation of stories which explain them. Persons with the same names are identified. Metaphorical references, such as Paul's references to fighting with wild animals in Ephesus (1 Cor. 15:32) and being delivered from the lion's mouth (2 Tim. 4:17), are taken literally and an appropriate story created to explain them (Paul is thrown to the wild animals in the amphitheatre of Ephesus and escapes death when the lion turns out to be one he had befriended on an earlier occasion). New stories are formed on the model of existing ones, similar but also deliberately different. For example, Luke's story about Eutychus (Acts 20:7–12) inspires another story about the emperor's cup-bearer Patroclus in the Acts of Paul. The latter is not, as some have argued, a variant of the same oral tradition as Luke knew, but an example of a well-evidenced literary practice of modelling new stories on old, especially new stories about biblical characters on biblical stories about the same or other characters. While this practice is rare in the other apocryphal Acts, the comparable practice of modelling a new story about one apostle on a story about another apostle in his apocryphal Acts is common, and accounts for the various narrative motifs which, unknown elsewhere, recur in these texts. (Of course, the repetition of narrative motifs was common in all forms of ancient narrative literature, and, when used in historiography, did not impair historical credibility as it would for modern readers.) In comparison with the Acts of Paul, the other apocryphal Acts clearly had far less biographical data about their respective apostles already available to base their creative storytelling on, but there are a few other examples of exegetical imagination. The famous 'Quo Vadis?' story in the Acts of Peter is probably inspired by John 13:36–37. In the main, the non-Pauline apocryphal Acts resorted to narrative invention unrelated to New Testament texts.

Evangelism or edification

We have already raised the question whether the apocryphal Acts are evangelistic works envisaging pagan readers and seeking their conversion, or whether they are edificatory works for established believers. There are several indications of the former. The entertaining nature of these works as narrative literature may well be calculated to appeal to outsiders who enjoyed similarly entertaining narrative literature of other types, though there is no reason to think that Christian readers would not also appreciate this feature of the Acts. Many of the stories in the Acts are stories of the conversion of individuals or a group of related individuals to faith. There are more than thirty such stories in the five apocryphal Acts (including the restoration of apostate believers in the Acts of Peter), as well as general references to the conversions of large numbers of people through the miracles and preaching of the apostles. In many cases, the miracle stories, which are so plentiful in the apocryphal Acts, function as demonstrations of the Christian God's power to deliver, to heal, to raise the dead, to outdo his demonic or human opponents, in such a way as to lead to the conversion of people who experience or witness these miracles.

This is probably the main reason why miracles of resurrection are so common in the apocryphal Acts (at least twelve such miracles in conversion stories). It is not simply that they are a particularly impressive form of miracle, but that they demonstrate the Christian God's power over life and death, and point to the eternal life that he gives to those who believe in Jesus. Like the raising of Lazarus in John 11, the miracles of resurrection point beyond the mere resuscitation to mortal life which is their physical effect, and function as signs of resurrection to eternal life, effected by God for the convert. As in John 11 (which has probably influenced the Acts of John), this coheres with the emphasis, in the Acts of John and the Acts of Thomas, on eternal life as Christian experience in the present. The Acts of John in particular interprets its resurrection stories with a theological understanding of conversion as resurrection from the state of death in which the sinful and unconverted person is. They are parables of the need to die in order to live. As the characters in the story recognize this, we should expect that the implied reader should also understand and experience conversion.

However, while many of the conversion stories seem designed for outsiders to the faith, it is not clear that we can generalize about the aims of the apocryphal Acts. Conversion stories are less prominent in the Acts of Paul, which often portrays Paul ministering to established churches. The Acts of Thomas is a work of considerable literary sophistication and theological depth, whose seemingly simple narratives are packed with symbolic and typological significance. It may well be a work designed to be read at more than one level or in a process of increasing penetration through the entertaining surface to the profounder message. Lallemann (1998) argues that while the miracles stories and missionary preaching in the Acts of John aim at the conversion of outsiders, the Gnostic section which is not original to the work (chapters 97–102) aims to initiate readers, who may well be non-Gnostic Christians, into a Gnostic understanding of Christ and salvation.

This Gnostic section of the Acts of John is polemical in the sense that it expresses contempt for the non-Gnostic Christians who do not – and, indeed, cannot – understand the true mystery. Only one other section of the apocryphal Acts seems to be written as propaganda for one form of Christianity against another. This is the correspondence between Paul and the Corinthian church in the Acts of Paul, whose polemic runs in the exact opposite direction from that of the Acts of John. The Corinthians are troubled by teachers of Gnostic heresy which Paul rejects and refutes. But this polemic against Gnosticism is confined to this section of the Acts of Paul, and cannot be understood as the overall aim of the work. The Acts of Peter gives much attention to Peter's restoration of Christians who have been led into apostasy by Simon Magus, but since there is virtually no account of Simon's teaching the work can scarcely be understood as polemic against heresy. In general, the apocryphal Acts do not seem to aim at winning Christians of a different persuasion to their own brand of Christianity. Their polemic is confined to paganism, and their aims seem to be the conversion of pagans to the faith and the (non-polemical) edification of believers in the faith. The balance of these two elements evidently varies from one work to another.

Asceticism and dualism

The Christian way entails the renunciation of the things of this world. This theme is common to all the apocryphal Acts, as to most Christianity of the period in which they were written. Such renunciation includes contempt for wealth and luxury and worldly honour, and may also include frugality in diet (it is a peculiarity of eucharistic celebrations in the apocryphal Acts that wine is not used), but its most prominent feature in the apocryphal Acts is sexual abstinence. Most of the apostles in them preach the ideal of complete celibacy, and many stories illustrate this preaching and its socially disruptive effects.

A story which survives only as a fragment but probably belonged to the lost first part of the original Acts of Peter tells of the apostle's daughter. To save her from an unwanted suitor who abducted her, she was miraculously paralysed on one side of her body from head to toe. She remains so until someone asks Peter, who heals all others brought to him for healing, why he does not heal his own daughter. Peter does then heal her in order to show that God is able to do so, but at once restores the paralysis. The reason is that the girl is too beautiful for her own good, and needs the paralysis to protect her. Extreme as this story is, it should be remembered as counter-evidence to the claim that sexual abstinence functions in the apocryphal Acts as a form of female autonomy and liberation from male dominance.

More typical are stories of women who, under the influence of the apostle's preaching, abandon sexual relations with their husbands. In some cases, the husband is won over to the same practice, but in three cases (Andrew, Peter, Thomas) it is a story of this kind that leads to the apostle's martyrdom. Thecla is the most prominent example of an unmarried woman who, against all the pressures of family and society, succeeds in remaining unmarried, as the apostle's teaching requires of her. The extent to which the Acts regard such sexual abstinence as necessary is debatable, and probably varies to some extent from one work to another. The Acts of Thomas seems the most emphatic in considering sexual activity wholly incompatible with Christian faith and salvation, and in this it reflects the encratite (from enkrateia, continence) Christianity of its context of origin, the second-century Christian tradition of the east Syrian area. In other Acts, there are married couples who do not seem to be required to abstain from normal marital relations, but there is no doubt that celibacy is an ideal expressing the Christian's absolute devotion to God.

It is important to notice, however, that the theological context in which this sexual asceticism is understood is different in each case. The stories of sexual abstinence are a prime example of the way narrative motifs pass from one to another of these works, but serve subtly or even obviously different theological agendas in each case. In the Acts of Paul, the theological context is a kind of eschatological radicalism based especially on 1 Corinthians 7 ('Blessed are those who have wives as if they had them not'). The dualism involved is the eschatological dualism of this world and the next, not at all a matter-spirit dualism. Sexual abstinence implies no depreciation of the body. On the contrary, it keeps the body pure ('Blessed are they who have kept the flesh pure, for they shall become a temple of God'). Not the body but passions that defile the body are evil. So there is no contradiction involved when the Paul of the Acts of Paul also, in correspondence with the Corinthians, decisively condemns the Gnostic dualism which denies that God created the human body, that Christ has come in the flesh and that there will be a resurrection of the flesh.

The much more developed theology of the Acts of Thomas is not dissimilar. Sexuality is bound up not with the body as such, but with death (since it is death that makes procreation necessary), sickness and other evils of the flesh which became part of human life at the fall. Sexual continence is restoration of the condition of Adam and Eve in paradise, and is associated with immortality. Enormous importance is attached to enkrateia because it is the key point in human life at which the forces of evil, which plague human life, can be resisted and overcome. The dualism here is between the transitory and the eternal, but not between the material and spiritual. In the Acts of Andrew, on the other hand, there is clear influence from the matter-spirit dualism with which the transitory-eternal dualism was associated in Greek philosophical traditions: Platonism and neo-Pythagoreanism. Salvation is the liberation of the soul, which is of divine origin, from the captivity of the body, and its reunion with God. Only through common affinities with Platonism does the Acts of Andrew resemble Gnosticism, but its Greek philosophical flavour, distinctive among the apocryphal Acts, differs markedly from the mythological idiom of Gnosticism.

Gnosticism itself is found only in that section of the Acts of John that is probably to be regarded as an addition to the original text: chapters 97–102. Here the cosmos is not the creation of the high and good God, but of an evil demiurge, who is identified with the God of the Old Testament, while the human spirit of the Gnostic is alien to the body and the material world, discovering in gnosis its true home in the world above. This radical cosmic dualism, which characterizes Gnosticism in the useful sense of that term, is confined, among the apocryphal Acts, to this section of the Acts of John. While the rest of the Acts of John displays a spiritualizing tendency, stressing the new life of the spirit rather than the flesh, and so would have been congenial to a Gnostic editor, it does not espouse the radical cosmic dualism of the Gnostic section. On the other hand, there are no allusions to the Old Testament in the whole of the Acts of John, and thorough-going rejection of the Old Testament was distinctive of Gnosticism. The Gnostic character of the form of the Acts of John that we have may not be entirely confined to the clearly Gnostic section.

With these various forms of dualism are associated a variety of christologies in the various Acts. In the Acts of Andrew, insofar as the text can be reconstructed, there is no reference at all to the life, death and resurrection of Jesus. Christ is indistinguishable from God, and it is the apostle Andrew who is both the revealer and the embodiment of salvation. In the Acts of John and (probably derivatively) in the Acts of Peter, with some traces also in the Acts of Thomas, is found a distinctive polymorphous Christology, which attributes to Christ no fixed form of earthly appearance, but one that changes at will, so that he is seen, even in his earthly life and even at the same time, in different forms by different people. The function of this in the Acts of John is clearly to remove the divine Christ from any real incarnation. This is a fully docetic Christology, whose Christ is explicitly not human at all. However, the same motif is differently interpreted in the much more 'orthodox' but rather eclectic Acts of Peter. Here the milder docetism that is found also in the Alexandrian Fathers – a Jesus who did not need to eat or drink but did so for our sakes – understands the polymorphy as Christ's accommodation of himself to the capacities of the people he met. Once again, we see a literary motif passed from one of the apocryphal Acts to another, but its significance shifting according to the theological outlook of the work in question.

Women in the apocryphal Acts

We have already noted the prominence of women, especially aristocratic women, among the converts to Christian faith in all of the apocryphal Acts, and the adoption of sexual continence by many of them. Some recent scholarship (see Davies 1980; MacDonald 1983; Burrus 1987) has given this feature of the Acts a strongly feminist interpretation, understanding celibacy as a form of liberation for women from the patriarchal structures of marriage and the family. It was the one way in which women could exercise autonomy and independence. The Acts are then thought to reflect circles of female ascetics in second-century Christianity, whose form of Christian life ran deliberately counter both to the patriarchal structures of society in general and to male-dominated forms of Christianity. Female authorship of some of the Acts, notably the Acts of Paul, or oral storytelling in circles of Christian women as the source of the stories about women in the apocryphal Acts, have been postulated (Kaestli 1990). These latter hypotheses are particularly fragile, since there is no good reason to doubt Tertullian's evidence that the author of the Acts of Paul was male, while our observations earlier about the literary modelling of stories on other stories in the apocryphal Acts themselves and the difficulty of detecting oral forms behind literary versions of stories, make guesses about traditions behind them perilous.

The general approach of the apocryphal Acts to marriage does not, in fact, seem to be opposed to the patriarchal structure of marriage as such but to the sexual relationship within marriage. Certainly, Christian wives intent on sexual continence are defying their husbands' authority in a way that the narratives approve. We should not forget that being a Christian wife to a non-Christian husband was itself a quite serious defiance of the patriarchal structure of marriage and one to which all forms of Christianity were committed. In the stories in the apocryphal Acts, this assertion of the right to be a Christian by the wife of an unconverted husband is intensified and dramatized (in a way that makes for engaging narratives) by giving it the form of refusing sexual relations. That women among the social élite converted more readily than their husbands (for whom social impediments were a greater obstacle) is true to the social realities of Christianity at the time, and the narratives of the apocryphal Acts no doubt encourage such women to persevere bravely and to hope for their husbands' conversion. But it must also be noticed that in the apocryphal Acts marriage is no longer a problem when both partners are Christian and both agree to live together without sexual relations. This shows that the authority structure of marriage is seen as problematic only when profession and faithful practice of the Christian way by the wife are opposed by the husband.

However, in the case of Thecla, we can find some truth in the feminist interpretation. This story instantiates the preference for the unmarried state for the sake of the gospel and the equal rights of women and men to remain unmarried that Paul, at his most socially radical, expresses in 1 Corinthians 7. (The influence of this text on the Thecla story has not been sufficiently appreciated.) As an independent, unmarried woman she is no more subordinated to Paul's authority than his male disciples are, and she soon moves on to her own mission field and a lifetime of 'enlightening many with the word of God'. It was to this feature of the Acts of Paul that Tertullian objected, complaining of women who appealed to Thecla's example in order to defend the right of women to teach and to baptize (De baptismo 17). Whether this was the reason why, as he relates, the presbyter who wrote the work was condemned and deposed, is not clear. It certainly did not prevent the Acts of Paul remaining a popular work among Christians in general for quite some time after Tertullian wrote.

Bibliography

Baars, W. and Helderman, J. (1993–1994) 'Neue Materialien zum Text und zur Interpretation des Kindheitevangeliums des Pseudo-Thomas', Oriens Christianus 77: 191–226; 78: 1–32.

Bauckham, R. (1993) 'The Acts of Paul as a sequel to Acts', in Winter, B. C. and Clarke, A. D. (eds) The Book of Acts in Its Ancient Literary Setting. Grand Rapids, MI; Eerdmans and Carlisle, UK: Paternoster Press, 105–152.

Beyers, R. and Gijsel, J. (1997) Libri de natiuitate Mariae. 2 vols. Corpus Christianorum Series Apocryphorum 9–10. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Bovon, F. (ed.) (1981) Les Actes apocryphes des Apôtres. Geneva, Switzerland: Labor et Fides.

Bremmer, J. N. (ed.) (1995) The Apocryphal Acts of John. Studies on the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 1. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos.

Bremmer, J. N. (ed.) (1996) The Apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla. Studies on the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 2. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos.

Bremmer, J. N. (ed.) (1998) The Apocryphal Acts of Peter. Studies on the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 3. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Bremmer, J. N. (ed.) (2000) The Apocryphal Acts of Andrew. Studies on the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 5. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Bremmer, J. N. (ed.) (2001) The Apocryphal Acts of Thomas. Studies on the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 6. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Brock, A. G. (1994) 'Genre of the Acts of Paul: One tradition enhancing another', Apocrypha 5: 119–36.

Burrus, V. (1987) Chastity as Autonomy: Women in the Stories of the Apocryphal Acts. New York and Queenston, ON: Mellen.

Clivaz, C., Dettwiler, A., Devillers, L. and Norelli, E. (eds) (2012) Infancy Gospels: Stories and Identity. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 281. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Cothenet, E. (1988) 'Le Protévangile de Jacques: Origine, genre et signification d'un premier midrash chrétien sur la Nativité de Marie', in Haase, W. (ed.) Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt volume 2.25.6. Berlin/New York: De Gruyter, 4252–69.

Davies, S. L. (1980) The Revolt of the Widows: The Social World of the Apocryphal Acts. New York: Seabury.

Dunn, P. W. (1993) 'Women's liberation, the Acts of Paul, and other apocryphal Acts of the Apostles', Apocrypha 4: 245–61.

Elliott, J. K. (1993) The Apocryphal New Testament. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Findlay, A. F. (1923) Byways in Early Christian Literature: Studies in the Uncanonical Gospels and Acts. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Gallagher, E. V. (1991) 'Conversion and salvation in the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles', Second Century 8: 13–29.

Gero, S. (1971) 'The infancy gospel of Thomas: A study of the textual and literary problems', Novum Testamentum 13: 46–84.

Gregory, A. and Tuckett, C. (eds) (2015) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Apocrypha. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Holzberg, N. (1995) The Ancient Novel. London and New York: Routledge.

Horner, T. J. (2004) 'Jewish aspects of the Protevangelium of James', Journal of Early Christian Studies 12: 313–35.

Junod, E. and Kaestli, J.-D. (1982) L'Histoire des Actes apocryphes des apôtres du IIIᵉ au IXᵉ siècles. Cahiers de la Revue de théologie et de philosophie 7. Lausanne, Switzerland: Labor et Fides.

Junod, E. and Kaestli, J.-D. (1984) Acta Johannis. 2 vols. Corpus Christianorum Series Apocryphorum 1–2. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Kaestli, J.-D. (1990) 'Fiction littérarire et réalité sociale: que peut-on savoir de la place des femmes dans le milieu de production des Actes apocryphes des Apôtres?', Apocrypha 1: 279–302.

Klauck, H.-J. (2008) The Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles: An Introduction. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press.

Lallemann, P. J. (1998) The Acts of John: A Two-Stage Initiation into Johannine Gnosticism. Studies on the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 4. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Lefkowitz, M. R. (1981) The Lives of the Greek Poets. London: Duckworth.

MacDonald, D. R. (1983) The Legend and the Apostle: The Battle for Paul in Story and Canon. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press.

Malherbe, A. J. (1986) 'A physical description of Paul', Harvard Theological Journal 79: 170–75.

Malina, B. J. and Neyrey, J. H. (1996) Portraits of Paul: An Archaeology of Ancient Personality. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox.

Momigliano, A. (1971) The Development of Greek Biography. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Morgan, J. R. and Stoneman, R. (eds) (1994) Greek Fiction: The Greek Novel in Context. London and New York: Routledge.

Pao, D. W. (1995) 'The genre of the Acts of Andrew', Apocrypha 6: 179–202.

Perkins, J. (1994) 'The social world of the Acts of Peter', in Tatum, J. (ed.) The Search for the Ancient Novel. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 296–307.

Perry, B. E. (1964) Secundus the Silent Philosopher. Philological Monographs 23. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press for the American Philological Association.

Phillimore, C. M. (1881) Fra Angelico. London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle and Rivington.

Prieur, J.-M. (1989) Acta Andreae. 2 vols. Corpus Christianorum Series Apocryphorum 5–6. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Schneemelcher, W. (ed.) (1991–1992) New Testament Apocrypha. 2 vols. Trans. and ed. by Wilson, R. M. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press and Cambridge, UK: James Clarke.

Tissot, Y. (1988) 'L'encratisme des Actes de Thomas', in Haase, W. (ed.) Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt. Volume 2.25.6. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter, 4415–30.

Toepel, A. (2014) Das Protevangelium des Jakobus: Ein Beitrag zur neueren Diskussion um Herkunft, Auslegung und theologische Einordnung. Frankfurter theologische Studien 71. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff.

Vorster, W. S. (1988) 'The Protevangelium of James and intertextuality', in Baarda, T., Hilhorst, A., Luttikhuizen, G. P. and Van der Woude, A. S. (eds) Text and Testimony: Essays in Honour of A. F. J. Klijn. Kampen, The Netherlands: K. H. Kok, 262–75.

Vuong, L. C. (2013) Gender and Purity in the Protevangelium of James. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2/358. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

PART VIII

External challenges

38

POLITICAL OPPRESSION AND MARTYRDOM

Candida R. Moss

Throughout the Christian era it has baffled many that the normally reserved and well-thought-of Romans could ever have persecuted the Christians. As Ludwig Mosheim put it in the eighteenth century, 'How it was that the excellent nature of the Christian religion, its admirable tendency to promote both the welfare of the state and the private felicity of individuals' should have invited persecution rather than protection and admiration (1767: 48)? Not only were Romans known for their religious tolerance in general, but there is also considerable overlap between the ethics of both groups. Despite this it is true that, despite all apparent logic and good sense, Roman society marginalized Christians and occasionally targeted them.

Similarly befuddling, to modern readers, is the willingness and even eagerness to pursue martyrdom and purposefully alienate Roman authorities. The passion with which Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, wrote to the Christians of Rome beseeching them not to intervene to prevent his death evokes strong reactions from readers. It not only seems alien; it seems suicidal.

In describing the history of the political oppression and martyrdom of early Christians we are, therefore, faced with two tasks: the first is to explain the genesis of martyrdom in Christianity: how was martyrdom theologically powerful for early Christians? The second is to describe and account for the actions of the Romans: why, when, and under what circumstances did Romans target Christians?

This task is complicated by the nature of the evidence. The majority of Christian stories describing the deaths of Christians in the second to fourth centuries CE were edited, if not composed, after persecution had ended (Moss 2013). We are dealing not with eyewitness accounts of legal procedures, but with stories that shape memories and create identity for later generations of Christians. The prevalence of the refrain 'I am a Christian' demonstrates the extent to which Christian histories of martyrdom are about identity formation (Boyarin 1999; Castelli 2004).

Greco-Roman and Jewish influences

Among scholars there has been considerable debate about the wellspring of the ideology of martyrdom. Some argue that martyrdom is distinctive to Christianity; that while it has antecedents in Judaism, Greco-Roman philosophy, and epic myth, it took on a new form among the followers of Jesus. Classicist Glen Bowersock is typical when he says: 'Martyrdom was not something that the ancient world had seen from the beginning. What we can observe in the second, third, and fourth centuries of our era is something entirely new' (Bowersock 1995: 17).

The ancient Greek and Roman love of death is well documented in classical literature and modern historiography. This 'noble death tradition,' as it is frequently called, is often associated with philosophy. Certainly, the question: 'What makes a death good?' produced stimulating dinner party conversation among the intellectual elite, where it permeated discussions about honor, masculinity, and patriotism. Ideas about and examples of good death were not confined, however, to the academy: they are implicit in the rituals surrounding sacrifice, in which a compliant sacrificial animal was a good omen; in the dramatic deaths of the heroes and heroines of Greek theater and epic poetry; and in the anecdotes of the historians.

In an ambiguously apocryphal story from Herodotus's Histories (c. 425 BCE), Solon, the beloved founder of the Athenian laws, tells the hubristic Croesus that 'no man can be called happy until he is dead.' The prophetic warning is as much a statement about the role of death as it is a foreshadowing of Croesus's unhappy demise. Solon speaks of both the fragility of humankind on the unforgiving wheel of fortune and also the instrumental role that death plays in the evaluation of a person's life. Neither Herodotus nor Solon can be credited with the sentiment that lies behind this pithy turn of phrase. The pages of recorded Greek history are marked with the idea that a good death brings glory, memorialization, and immortality. The Homeric heroes of the Trojan War fight for honor and everlasting fame. As he slaughters the Trojan princes, Achilles schools them and the captivated Homeric audience that to die well they must not 'be piteous about it'; they must stand courageously, greeting the death that waits for every man. Even though the Odyssey's Achilles bemoans his fate in the underworld, it was his initial decision to choose a brief, fiery, glorious death that enthralled ancient audiences (Odyssey 11.489–91).

The good death also provided an opportunity to prove, decisively, one's worth and manliness. Dying well with dignified self-control was long considered the mark of a good soldier. As Achilles says to Lykaon, when the Trojan prince clasps Achilles's knees and begs for mercy: 'Come, friend, face your death you too. And why are you so piteous about it?' (Iliad 21.122–23). Courage in the face of death is expected of heroes. The notion of manliness implicit in Homer's formulation of the good death is one of self-control and courage, in contrast to cowardly displays on the battlefield that are associated with womanly tears and girlish displays of emotion. We might note Menelaus's rebuke to the Achaean troops who had greeted his encouragement to embrace their destiny and honor won in death with a shameful, cowardly silence. Menelaus responds by calling the soldiers 'women, not men' (Iliad 7.95). Apuleius's Fotis also emphasizes the importance of masculinity in battle and death when she instructs Lucius to 'fight vigorously, for I will not retreat before you or turn my back on you. Stiffen up and close in for a vigorous frontal assault—if you are a man! Slay, for you are about to die' (Metamorphoses 2.17). Seneca's Achilles, likewise, elects to assume the mantle of manhood; he 'chose the sword and professed himself a man' (Troades 214).

The idea that dying a courageous death is both a sign of one's character and worth and a mark of manliness is related to the wider discussion of virtue in antiquity. The content of virtue is theorized by Greek and Roman philosophers and moralists, who articulate taxonomies of virtue in which the association of masculinity and self-mastery is everywhere implied (Kelley 2006: 723–47). The relationship is explicit in Plato, who lists prudence, justice, manliness, and self-control as the four principal virtues (Phaed. 69C), and is implicit in condemnations of excessive mourning as 'womanly' behavior in the letters of Seneca and in Marcus Aurelius's Meditations. Plutarch labels anger unmanly and connects it to women (On Controlling Anger 475B), and Seneca agrees that anger is a womanish and childish weakness (On Anger 1.20). Certainly, for some authors, not emotion itself, but excessive emotion, is the larger problem. The salient point, however, is that virtus and manliness are inextricably linked.

The gendering of self-control provided a standard for the evaluation of the heroism of one's subjects. In Roman culture men were not born; they were made. It was the exercise of masculinity that distinguished the born male (mas) and the human (homo) from the man (vir). This distinction resonates strongly with the account of the death of the Christian bishop Polycarp, whose refusal of nails and easy embrace of suffering mark him as a hero. The heavenly voice that urges Polycarp to 'play the man' (Mart. Pol. 9.1) is greeted with a muscular display of Christianity. Dying nobly became the prime location for the display of virtus and, thus, of masculinity. In the Roman period, as Catharine Edwards has demonstrated, as an opportunity to demonstrate self-restraint, courage, and clear-headedness, the noble death came to supplant military victory as the finest articulation of virtue (Edwards 2007).

Even among women—their powers normally limited to the bedroom and the household—dying well could transform one into a model of patriotism or heroism. Judith Perkins argues that early Christians constructed death as a kind of 'happy ending' and that, by adapting and subverting the conventions of the romance novel, they wedded Christians to death (Perkins 1995). Yet the use of marital and romantic imagery to describe a longing for death and to subvert traditional marriage is not unprecedented in Greek literature. Antigone, the much-loved heroine of Sophocles's Theban play, eschews her fiancé, and states that she belongs as a bride to Acheron (Antigone 758–59).

The influence of Iphigeneia, Polyxena, and Antigone—to say nothing of Portia and Lucretia—is discernible in the depiction of female martyrs in early Christianity. Female martyrs constituted a significant proportion of early Christian martyrs and generated some of the most thought-provoking and dearly beloved narratives. Few can forget the moving 'diary' of Perpetua and her account of her relationship with her family members, Felicitas's labor pains, or the slave girl Blandina's triumphant leadership of the martyrs of Lyons, during the mass martyrdom in that city of 177 CE (see Figure 38.1).

The presentation of the female martyr and the manner in which her actions undermine, transgress, and reinscribe Roman family values and gender norms have rightly occupied a generation of scholars. The gendering of biologically female martyrs in their trials, contests, and visions has been variously interpreted as instances of masculinization, glorification of the feminine, and a movement from one pole to another. Placed within the context of Greek drama, the actions of the female martyr conform in many important ways to Greek dramatic topoi of female resistance. Thus, if the portrayal of female martyrs functions as resistance to Roman familial and social structures, it is stylized using Greco-Roman dramatic and literary conventions. Perpetua's conduct in the tribunal and arena reproduces the iconic image of the tragic heroine at odds with family and culture. Just as Antigone eloped with Acheron, so too Perpetua seeks union with Christ as wife of Christ (matrona Christi). At the same time, the masculine suicide of the Roman heroine was well established: Arria and Portia are level-headed and stout, and Portia's ability to withstand the blade is a gesture to ancient medical theories that viewed men as more capable of dealing with pain. Lucretia presents a more complicated example, as her depiction vacillates between the masculine and the feminine (Edwards 2007).

Figure 38.1   The amphitheatre at Lyons, scene of the mass martyrdom of Christians in 177 CE. Photo J. C. N. Coulston

Arguably the most famous of the Greek noble deaths, Socrates, has been called 'the world's first recorded martyr.' His legend was shaped by a succession of disciples and imitators, and his image was transformed by his biographers into a multifaceted figure molded by hearsay, slander, and adoration. As with all martyrs, Socrates's malleability makes it difficult to divorce man from myth. In his manner of dying, Socrates exhibited many of the qualities respected in men. During his trial and the days leading up to his execution, he displayed an intellectual detachment from his fate, berating his wife and friends for their emotional and irrational conduct (Phaed. 60A, 117E). In the Apology, the focus of his attention is not on death itself but on virtue: he states, 'a man who is doing good for anything ought not to calculate the chance of living or dying; he ought only to consider whether in doing anything he is doing right or wrong' (Apology 28B). In the Phaedo, as his mind turns to death, Socrates reveals that dying well is the habitus of the philosopher: 'the true philosophers practice dying, and death is less fearful to them than to any other man' (Phaed. 67E). In his final, methodically planned moments, Socrates converses cheerfully with his tearful jailor and allows adequate time to bathe before taking the poison. Socrates's composure has struck some commentators as sterile. This assessment, however, is grounded in modern constructions of masculinity; Socrates's passive countenance casts him as the classical embodiment of masculine self-control. While his friends weep tears like women, Socrates is composed, and arguably joyful. Even this joy, however, is predicated on rationality, as it is grounded in a well-reasoned argument about death as freedom from the body.

Scholars, those of ancient Christianity in particular, tend to focus on the portraits of the death of Socrates recorded by Plato, but even before Justin claimed Socrates as a 'Christian before Christ,' his person and death had been adapted and reinterpreted by generations of Greek and Roman philosophers, biographers, poets, and moralists. The influence of the philosophical death—of which Socrates is the chief exemplar—in Christianity is felt both in the Gospel of Luke's redaction of the death of Jesus as well as in more traditional martyrs like Polycarp (Sterling 2001: 383–402). That Socrates serves in part as a blueprint for Polycarp does not mean that the imitatio Christi motif is somehow unimportant. Jesus and Socrates interpret one another and Polycarp in this account. The co-production of these two figures is further evident in the account of the late second-century Martyrdom of Apollonius, in which the protagonist—a philosophically styled martyr—compares the deaths of Jesus and Polycarp in the following way: 'Just as the Athenian informers convinced the people and then unjustly condemned Socrates; so too our Savior and teacher was condemned by a few malefactors after being bound.' The comparison here is much blunter than in Polycarp, but it illustrates the ways in which the figure of Socrates was explicitly invoked as a comparandum for the art of dying well.

The deaths of the 'Maccabean martyrs' have also served as a perpetual crux in scholarly accounts of the history of martyrdom. Their presentation fits in many ways the traditional scholarly definition of what makes a martyr. The classic treatment of Wilhelm Bousset and Hugo Gressmann describes the Jewish religion characterized by these texts as a religion of martyrdom (Religion des Martyriums). Even the skeptical Glenn Bowersock, who is loath to view martyrdom as a pre-Christian phenomenon, remarks that the accounts of the Maccabees are altogether another matter. Many scholars dub the mother with her seven sons and the elderly Eleazar, from the book of 2 Maccabees, as the first martyrs. W. H. C. Frend's classic history of martyrdom, for instance, begins with a chapter on the Maccabees before moving to the Jesus movement and early church, and Jan Willem van Henten's influential study of 2 and 4 Maccabees similarly traces martyrdom to the distinguished deaths of the Maccabees, the saviors of the Jewish people.

The portrayal of the Jews as a people ready to suffer in obedience to God and to the laws reified what it meant to be Jewish during the Hellenistic period and beyond. Defense of this ideal intersected with non-Jewish value systems and ideologies of nationhood. Writing in the first century CE, Josephus proposes in Against Apion that the Jewish attitude to death and suffering was comparable to that of the Spartans. The Spartans were highly regarded for their military reputation, their contempt of death, and their obedience to the laws. Josephus claims that Jews surpass the loyalty of the Spartans in being obedient to their laws even when a conquered people, whereas the Spartans exhibited fidelity only when independent (2.226–28). Josephus's contrast between Jewish and Spartan attitudes to death anticipates the argument of Eusebius in book 5 of his Church History, that the spiritual contests fought by Christians outstrip those of earlier generations because martyrdoms—those 'battles waged for the peace of the soul'—are qualitatively better than those fought for 'children, possessions, and country.'

The narratives situate the deaths of Eleazar, the Maccabean mother and her seven sons, and Razis during the rule of Antiochus and his suppression of many Jewish religious practices. These events form part of a history of the Jewish people between the reign of Seleucus IV (187–175 BCE) and the defeat of the Seleucid general Nicanor in 161 BCE. Within this history of political liberation the martyrs play pivotal roles. Within the individual episodes of persecution, the deaths of the martyrs are turning points in the struggle for emancipation: they restore the ruptured relationship with God and initiate periods of renewed military success and eventual triumph for the Jewish people. These triumphs are incorporated into sacred history as decisive moments that, in turn, punctuate the liturgical calendar. Moments of political resistance help create a particular sense of Jewish identity, an identity forged, tested, and proved in struggles with Greek administrators and embodied in the actions of the martyrs.

The influence of the Maccabees was self-consciously embraced by early Christian writers. In the Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (177 CE), Blandina is compared to 'the noble mother who had encouraged her children and sent them forth triumphant to the king, having endured all the tortures of her children, hastened to them' (Eusebius, HE 5.1.55) In 236, Origen too recounts the details of the torture and execution of the Maccabees as 'an example of courageous martyrdom' to his friend Ambrosius (Exhortation to Martyrdom 22–3; Oulton and Chadwick 1954: 408–9) He then recalls the story of the three young men in the fiery furnace (Exhortation 33) Similar comparisons are made in North Africa by Cyprian (Epistle 58.6 and Ad Fortunatum 11) and by Augustine, who recalls that during the Great Persecution Secudus of Tigisis, the primate of Numidia, compared his own conduct with that of Eleazar of 2 Maccabees 6 (Augustine, Breviculus Collationis cum Donatistis 3.13.25). Among the so-called Donatist Christians of North Africa, the biblical heroes proved especially popular (Acta Saturnini 16).

Without a doubt, however, the most influential model for the formation of theologies of martyrdom was the death of Jesus himself. The idea of the crucifixion as an example for others is found throughout the pages of the canonical New Testament. In Luke-Acts the death of Jesus is presented as that of a prophet martyr who follows in the footsteps of the Biblical prophets and implicitly beckons others to follow him (Frend 1965: 79–83). The idea that the conduct of Jesus at death was a model is evident not only in the death of Jesus but in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, which explicitly assimilates its protagonist to Christ (Moss 2010: 46–8).

There were many reasons, therefore, for Christians to embrace martyrdom: as a means of following Jesus, achieving honor, dying nobly, and following God. And in its inception and development, early Christian martyrdom was a broad and diverse phenomenon. Even if many Christians valued dying for Christ, their explanations for their actions varied from the sacrificial deaths of Ignatius and Polycarp to the cosmic battle between good and evil envisioned in the Passion of Perpetua to the philosophical statements of Justin and Apollonius that their deaths were in keeping with their idea of how to live the virtuous life. In the courtroom and the arena, the martyr's resistance to authority could take the form of quiet composure and self-control, or brash antagonism, suicidal behavior, and even violence.

While some, like Saturus (d. 203 CE), a companion of Perpetua, looked forward to heavenly rewards and eschatological revenge, others, like Apollonius, professed that even if he were not resurrected from the dead it would be worth dying, as through death he had learned to live a virtuous life. Martyrs were cast as second Christs, soldiers, manly men, examples of virtue, philosophers, and sacrificial victims. In short, this was a practice and set of ideologies marked by considerable differences of interpretation. The commonly heard martyr's cry that he or she 'is a Christian' belies the contrasting ways in which death as a Christian was understood and practiced. What is constant is that the majority of Christians valued dying in this way, and that that state of affairs was fostered by more broadly held convictions about the noble death.

Political oppression in the empire

However virtuous and in-step with cultural conventions about noble death they appear, it is clear that Christians attracted a negative reputation among their non-Christian counterparts (Wilken 2003). In his correspondence with the emperor Trajan, the governor Pliny describes Christianity as 'contagious' (Ep. Tra. 10.96–97). Similarly, Tacitus, the Roman historian, describes Christians as a 'race of people hated for their abominations' and Christianity as a 'deadly superstitio' (Annals 15.44.3). Origen reports that Christians were suspected of magic (Origen, Contra Celsum 1.71).

They were especially well known for their enthusiasm for death. Celsus wrote that the Christians 'deliberately rush forward to arouse the wrath of an emperor which brings upon us blows and tortures and even death' (Contra Celsum 8.65). Christian writers themselves confirm the reputation: Tertullian writes in his address to the proconsul Scapula (c. 185) that a mob approached the proconsul of Asia, Arrius Antoninus, declared themselves Christians, and demanded to be put to death. The frustrated proconsul replied, 'You wretches, if you want to die, you have cliffs to leap from and ropes to hang by' (Ad Scapulam 5.1).

Similar events had occurred before. Philo describes how in 40 CE the Jews were willing to accept death in order to preserve their ancestral customs (Legatio ad Gaium 16.117). The Romans were magnanimously tolerant of dissent when it did not threaten structures of power (Francis 1995). But here was suspicion of those practices deemed superstition, and, unlike Judaism, Christianity was seen as contagious. Whereas the Jews had been tolerated as a small and ancient religion, the Christians were seen as subversive of familial and bureaucratic organizations.

For the duration of the first century Christians were regarded as Jews and presented themselves as such, albeit as the 'new Israel' or a superior form of Judaism. As Frend observed, two of the later books of the New Testament—1 Peter and the Letter of James—are addressed to diaspora Jews. And many early Christian writers claimed that they were the legitimate heirs to Abraham and Moses. They were described by Celsus as apostates from Judaism (cited in Origen, Contra Celsum 2.1.4).

And yet, according to the Christian narrative, the earliest persecutors of the Christians were Jews. According to the Acts of the Apostles, Stephen was the first Christian to die for Jesus (7:54–8:1), and the followers of Jesus became targets of organized persecution at the hands of religious and political leaders in Palestine during the reign of Herod Agrippa (Acts 12:1–5). For much of the twentieth century the depiction of a fledgling religious movement at war with its parent religion—Judaism—dominated scholarship. That narrative maintains that as Christianity grew and spread it encountered resistance and violent opposition at the hand of diaspora Jews. The majority of the evidence for this conflict comes from Acts and the Pauline Epistles and is predicated on the understanding that Paul viewed his movement as something distinct from Judaism. But recent analysis of the first-century Jesus movement has shown that Christians were indistinguishable from Jews for much of this period; that Paul conceived of himself and his group as Jews. First-century Jews did not have the political power or military means to organize any kind of persecution against Christians. To be sure, there was social friction that occasionally erupted into violence, but it is unlikely that Jewish authorities either in Palestine or outside it were systematically persecuting Christians.

At the same time, however, we have to consider whether intra-Jewish rivalry and concern had led some Jews or groups of Jews to target others, including the followers of Jesus. In his letter to the Galatians, Paul admits that he had a hand in the routing out of Jesus followers, telling his addressees, 'You have heard, no doubt, of my earlier life in Judaism. I was violently persecuting the church of God and was trying to destroy it' (Gal 1:13).

The historical period when Stephen died and Paul was writing cannot be considered a period in which Jews persecuted Christians, because Christians did not yet exist. At the very worst, and assuming that Luke is telling us the whole story, this was a situation of conflict and tension between various Jewish groups. Though written in the second century, the apocryphal acts of the apostles narrate the execution of the apostles by first-century Roman authorities. These martyrdom stories present their protagonists as innocent, but the crimes committed by them and the ahistorical manner of their representation make it difficult to ascertain the charges. The death of Antipas (Revelation 2:13) around 90 CE is also difficult to assess. He died, according to the Apocalypse, on account of the name, but it is Jews who are most clearly identified as Christian antagonists.

The social alienation of Christians leaps from the page of later first-century followers of Jesus. 1 Peter, likely written around the end of the first or the beginning of the second centuries, describes followers of Jesus as sojourners and aliens, maligned 'as criminals' (1 Peter 2:12) and encountering shame as Christians (4:16). Some have suggested that when Flavius Clemens was executed for atheism by Domitian in 95 he was charged with being a Christian, but there is no evidence to suggest that this was the case (Dio Cassius 67.14; pace Frend 1965: 212–3).

Clearly, between the death of Jesus and the second century, there was a subtle escalation of antipathy towards Christians. This could, in certain rare situations, erupt into violence and even bloodshed.

Arguably the most well known instance of Christian persecution in the first century is the aftermath of the Great Fire of Rome. One hot summer night in 64 CE, on the eve of the summer games, a fire began in a small shop under the Circus Maximus. The fire, called the Great Fire of Rome, burned for five days and left only four of Rome's fourteen quarters unscathed.

Writing some fifty years later (c. 115–20 CE), the Roman historian Tacitus describes how the people of Rome blamed Nero for the fire, and Nero, in turn, deflected responsibility onto the Christians. He explains, 'Nero fastened guilt and inflicted the most exquisite tortures on [the Christians who] were hated for their abominations' (Annals, 15.44–45). As a result, Christians were arrested and interrogated for information about others in the city. In the end 'an immense multitude' was convicted and condemned to die in all kinds of extraordinary ways. Nero devised particularly cruel forms of death for the Christians (see Figure 38.2). He had them dressed in animal skins and thrown to wild animals to be ripped apart; they were drenched in tar and burned alive as torches to light the night sky. According to much later Christian traditions (although not the second-century apocryphal Acts), it was in the aftermath of the Great Fire that Peter and Paul were sentenced to die.

Figure 38.2   A Christian Dirce, by Henrik Siemiradzki, 1897, National Museum, Warsaw. The image, possibly based on 1 Clement 6.2, portrays a Christian woman killed in a re-enactment of the myth of Dirce, who was killed by being tied to the horns of a bull. Photo Wikicommons

As deeply etched into the consciousness of later Christian historians as the Great Fire and its aftermath are, they left a curiously shallow imprint on literature at the time. As Brent Shaw has recently argued, apart from Tacitus there is very little reason to think that the Christians were ever blamed for the Great Fire (Shaw 2015: 73–100). This is in large part because Christians were not known as Christians in the early years of the 60s. To outsiders and, indeed, to themselves, they were Jews. Most remarkable, if Christians suffered so publicly so early, is the absence of explicit references to these events in extant Christian literature. The book of Revelation, composed around 90, refers only to a single martyr.

Even if Christians had been rounded up and executed in the aftermath of the Great Fire, Christianity was not an illegal religion in the first century (Barnes 1968; De Ste Croix 1964: 28–33). This much is clear from a set of correspondence that passed between Pliny the Younger, the proconsul of Bithynia-Pontus, and the Roman emperor Trajan c. 110. In book ten of his correspondence, Pliny writes to Trajan complaining about the Christians and enquiring about the best manner in which to proceed. He describes the religio-economic impact of Christian conversion on local religious practices prior to the measures he has taken. The temples, he records, had been deserted, and no one had been purchasing sacrificial meat. Christianity had won admirers from every quarter; its participants included 'persons of every age and every class, both genders . . . not only [in] the town but villages and countryside as well.' Pliny writes that he has examined the Christians and found them innocent of any real crime. All the same, he is exasperated by their 'stubbornness and inflexible obstinacy,' which he feels deserves punishment (Ep. Tra. 10.96).

As a result, he has devised a system to deal with the Christians. He asks the accused individuals three times if they are Christian, with a warning about the punishment that awaits them: if they continue to confess that they are Christian, he will have them executed or, if they are citizens, sent to Rome for trial. For those who deny being Christians he has devised what has become known as the sacrifice test, in which an accused person is instructed to offer wine and incense to an image of the emperor and to curse Christ. Pliny's letter asks Trajan for advice; he is unsure if the punishment should be the same for all and whether confessing to having been Christian in the past is sufficient for a guilty verdict. In his response, Trajan (if it is truly Trajan responding) commends Pliny for his work and insists that Christians should be neither hunted down nor accused anonymously. Trajan confirms that for an accused person to offer sacrifice is sufficient proof of innocence (Ep. Tra. 10.97).

Pliny's frustration with Christian obstinacy is almost palpable. Against De Ste. Croix, Sherwin-White argues that it was for their defiance (contumacia) that Christians were arrested and executed (1964: 23–7). Certainly, Christians attracted the derision and scorn of Roman writers and administrators, and the martyr acts present their protagonists as evasive and difficult in the courtroom. At the same time, however, as De Ste. Croix notes in his rejoinder to Sherwin-White, obstinacy (obstinatio) and defiance (contumacia) were separate charges and the latter is not mentioned in the Pliny-Trajan correspondence. Only once they were in the courtroom did Christians have the opportunity to display their obstinacy, and, therefore, it is unlikely that Christians were arrested for being defiant (De Ste. Croix 1964: 28–33).

By the mid second century, Christians began to be more vocal about their experience of social alienation and what they felt was unjust targeting. In the first half of the second century, Justin wrote an open letter to the emperor Marcus Aurelius defending Christians. He argued that Christians were arrested and condemned to die merely 'for their name,' not because of anything that the Christians themselves had done wrong (1 Apol. 4.2). Around 196 CE the Christian lawyer Tertullian complained that Roman hatred for the Christians was so great that they would use any excuse to persecute them. He wrote, 'If the Tiber rises to the walls, if the Nile fails to rise and flood the fields, if the sky withholds its rain, if there is earthquake or famine or plague, straightway the cry arises: "the Christians to the lions!"' Persecution, said Justin, did not originate only with Romans: he claims that Bar Kochba, leader of a Jewish revolt in Palestine around 132 CE, ordered that Christians should be subjected to cruel punishments unless they denied Christ (1 Apol. 1.31)

Mistrust of and prejudice towards Christians originated in a series of rumors that spanned the Roman empire. Marcus Cornelius Front, tutor to Marcus Aurelius (161–80), saw Christians as depraved (Minucius Felix, Octavius 9.5). The idea of Christian incest and cannibalism first appears explicitly in Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 66). Justin's version of the rumor describes how in the aftermath of a feast someone would conveniently 'knock over' a lamp, leaving the room in darkness, and the participants able to drink human blood and have sex with one another without repercussion. Tertullian repeats the same story in the third century, adding more detail about the logistics. He supplements Justin's version by saying that Christian men had to be careful to note where their mothers and sisters were positioned before the lights were extinguished (Tertullian, Ad Nationes 1).

Some pre-Decian literary accounts depict the impetus for execution as originating with the people. This is the case in the Martyrdom of Polycarp and the Letter of the Churches of Lyon and Vienne. In both instances the behavior of the crowd serves a concrete theological purpose: in the case of Polycarp the animosity of the crowd serves to assimilate the protagonist to Jesus, and in the Gallic letter the barbarousness of the crowd serves to amplify the contrast with the self-controlled Christians.

In North Africa, where a cluster of texts describe Christian attitudes to martyrdom, Tertullian describes them as 'ever ready for death' (Tertullian, De Spectaculis 1) and accompanied by the Holy Spirit to prison (Ad Martyras 1.3). Martyrdom began to serve an evangelical purpose: the blood of the Christians is 'seed' (Apol. 50.13) and the courage of the Christians inspired the philosophically minded to enquire into the religion (Apol. 50.3)

Roman proconsuls appear to have made sincere efforts to dissuade Christians from pursuing death: encouraging them to think of their age (Martyrdom of Polycarp) or of their families (Martyrdom of Irenaeus) and giving them opportunities to recant (Passion of Perpetua). Certainly, and despite any empire-wide state sponsored persecution, the threat to the lives of Christians was ever present. It was this threat and the memory of the deaths of Christians Basilides and Potamiaena in Alexandria around the turn of the third century that prompted Origen to dedicate his Exhortation to Martyrdom to his friend Ambrosius. It did not take many Christians to die for Christians to feel that they were under attack.

Until the mid third century, Christians did not fall foul of Roman legislation. This changed on 3 January 250 CE, when the emperor Decius ordered that the usual annual sacrifice to Jupiter and the Roman Gods on the Capitol should be rehearsed throughout the empire.[1] It required that the sacrifice be performed in the presence of a Roman magistrate; in return, each faithful subject would be provided with a libellus as proof of his or her participation. Forty-four copies of these have survived from antiquity. One example from Egypt reads:

> To those in charge of the sacrifices of the village Theadelphia, from Aurelia Bellias, daughter of Peteres, and her daughter, Kapinis. We have always been constant in sacrificing to the gods, and now too, in your presence, in accordance with the regulations, I have poured libations and sacrificed and tasted the offerings, and I ask you to certify this for us below. May you continue to prosper.
> (2nd hand) We, Aurelius Serenus and Aurelius Hermas, saw you sacrificing.
> (3rd hand) I, Hermas, certify.
> (1st hand) The 1st year of the Emperor Caesar Gaius Messius Quintus Traianus Decius Pius Felix Augustus, Pauni 27.[2]

The sacrifice test was in many ways a test of loyalty. The statement that a person had always been sacrificing to the gods emphasized continuity of religious and social conformity and unity over time. Even though Decius had gained power only shortly before, the language of the certificate appeals to the idea that Decius stood in a tradition of emperors.

The motivations for the legislation were largely political and certainly not intended to target Christians in particular. Nowhere in the libelli are the signatories required to confirm that they are not Christians or repudiate Christianity (Rives 1999: 135–54). At the time when Decius came to power in 249 CE, the Roman empire was under threat. The northern borders of the Roman empire were being constantly raided by the increasingly aggressive Goths, and there were a series of comparatively minor yet nonetheless bothersome rebellions for Decius to contend with. Thus, when Decius entered Rome as military victor and emperor, he still had political rivals to deal with, a divided empire to unite.

For some Christians, the prospect of choosing between hell or death proved too daunting. Whether out of fear of torture or fear of apostasy and damnation, they elected either to try and obtain a certificate by bribery or to follow a fourth path, exile.[3] While some, like Cyprian, went into exile, other ecclesiastical leaders were less fortunate. Fabian, bishop of Rome, was executed in January (Cyprian Ep. 55.9).

In North Africa, where the effects of the Decian decree were particularly severe, many Christians apostasized or went into exile. In many ways, Cyprian of Carthage managed to redeem himself only when he was finally martyred during the reign of Valerian in 258 CE. After the Decian persecution was over, these apostate Christians attempted to gain re-entry to the Christian churches in Carthage. In some cases exiled clergy assumed that they would be able to return to the leadership positions that they had occupied before the Decian persecution. Responses to the Decian persecution in Carthage sowed the seeds of the Donatist schism, treated elsewhere in this volume.

For approximately six years after the end of Decius's reign, in a period of peace and calm, the Church continued to grow. Meanwhile, in the east, the new emperor Valerian was struggling to regain Antioch from the Persians. The Persians had captured and sacked the city shortly before Valerian's ascent to power in late 253 CE, and Valerian travelled east in 254 to combat the eastern threat, staying there until his capture in 260. During this time Valerian composed two letters to the Senate about Christians. The first was issued in 257 and demanded that the Church leaders participate in pagan rituals and that Christians stop meeting en masse in cemeteries. After the first edict failed to make any sizeable impact, he issued a second, stronger statement about Christians in 258, in which he directed that bishops, priests, and deacons were to be put to death at once.[4] Additionally, Christian senators and high-ranking officials were to lose their status and property and, if they did not apostasize, be executed as well. Christian women of senatorial rank were to lose their properties, as were members of the imperial household who, additionally, were to be bundled off to the imperial estates where their views would make them less of a liability. Only a handful of Christians seem to have died as a result of Valerian's second letter in 258 CE; among them was Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage.

In 260, after several years defending the eastern parts of the empire from the Goths and the Persians, Valerian met with King Shapur I of Persia to arrange a truce. Shapur betrayed Valerian and seized him as a prisoner. After Valerian's death his son Gallienus revoked his legislation, and Christians enjoyed over forty years of undisrupted peace. They may have been disliked, but they were again able to climb the social ladder, accumulate wealth, build churches, and assemble in full view of everyone. In Rome the catacombs were expanded so that by 300 CE the Catacombs of Peter and Marcellinus contained about 11,000 burials in expansive galleries (Guyon 1987: 96–102). By 360 there would be at least forty churches in Rome (Optatus of Milevie, De Schismate Donatistarum 2.4.5).

In February 303 CE, after twenty years as one of Rome's most successful emperors, Diocletian, emperor of the eastern empire under the tetrarchy, produced the first legislation in decades targeting Christians. Like Decius, Diocletian's edicts were concerned with furthering a sense of imperial unity. Diocletian also had genuine religious concerns and a particular interest in sacrifice. Coins minted during his reign often depicted him sacrificing. Towards the end of the third century he had taken action against the Manicheans, a religion that he saw as deriving from Rome's enemies, the Persians.

Diocletian's regulations, known as the 'Great Persecution,' took the form of several increasingly severe pieces of legislation. These edicts gradually rescinded the legal rights of Christians in the Roman empire. The publication of the first edict in February 303 made the holding of Christian meetings illegal and ordered the destruction of Christian places of worship and the confiscation of Christian scriptures. Christians were denied the right either to petition the courts or to respond to legal actions brought against them, making them especially vulnerable in judicial contexts. Christians with distinguished social status lost their rank and imperial freedmen were enslaved. Everyone, including Christians, was now expected to sacrifice before engaging in any legal or official business.

The ferocity and extent of the persecution was very different in the Latin west than in the Greek east. In the west only a portion of the legislation was enforced, and even then somewhat sporadically. While in northern Africa executions began in Cirta, modern day Algeria, in May 303, the persecutions in Britain and Gaul, the area of the empire controlled by Constantius, were relatively mild. Lactantius tells us that things progressed no further than the destruction of Church buildings, while Eusebius protests that no buildings were destroyed there at all.[5] Persecution appears to have died out in the west during the year 304 CE and was officially ended by the emperor Constantius in July 306. Constantius went further, though: he not only granted Christians in Britain, Gaul, and Spain freedom, but he even restored their confiscated property to them.[6]

In the east, the region controlled by Galierus and Diocletian, the persecutions continued and progressed. In the fifteen days immediately after the publication of the first edict, the imperial palace in Nicomedia caught on fire twice. Whatever the actual cause of the fire—Lactantius tells us Galierius was trying to frame the Christians, while the future emperor Constantine credits a bolt of lightning from heaven—suspicion fell on the Christians. A second edict was published in the summer of 303, ordering the arrest of Christian clergy.[7] According to Eusebius, the impetus for the second edict was a series of political uprisings in Melitene and Syria in which Christians were believed to have been implicated.[8] Eusebius writes that so many priests were arrested that it put a strain on the entire prison system. Apparently, common criminals had to be released in order to deal with the over-crowding.

In November 303 CE, in preparation for the celebration of the twentieth anniversary of his reign the following year, Diocletian issued a third edict.[9] This edict provided amnesty for the imprisoned clergy, providing that they sacrificed. Christian writers are curiously silent on the subject of the fourth edict: it is never referred to by Christians in the west, by Lactantius in his On the Deaths of the Persecutors, or by Eusebius in his Church History. Eusebius only ever mentions this edict in his Martyrs of Palestine. It seems likely that, in its original form, the Great Persecution lasted until Diocletian's retirement in 305 CE and was briefly renewed by Maximinus Daia in 311–313.

With the rise of Constantine, the fortunes of mainstream Christians would change. The passing of the Edict of Milan in 313 ended persecution in the Roman empire, at least officially. At the borders of the empire it continued in Persia through the fourth and fifth centuries, where Christians were seen as pro-Roman and treacherous. Within the Church, and in North Africa in particular, Christians engaged in intra-ecclesial violence. The Donatists, who had rejected the Church and state's embrace of Caecilianist Christianity there, continued to protest their rightful status as the Church of the martyrs. The fourth and fifth centuries brought about an explosion in the composition of stories about the deaths of martyrs. Ironically, in the wake of a new era of peace and power for Christendom the art of narrating the stories of the martyrs began to truly take shape, and Christians began to use their experience of martyrdom as a political tool in the exclusion and oppression of others.

Notes

1 Because it does not survive there is some debate about the precise date of the decree. The date is inferred from a variety of potential occasions upon which Decius might have demanded a universal sacrifice from the people. January 3, 250 was the date when Roman officials would have offered their annual sacrifices and oaths for the health and safety of the emperor (pro salute imperatoris).
2 Transcriptions and translations of the libelli are found in Knipfling 1923.

3 Cyprian refers to libelli obtained by bribery in his On the Lapsed 27 and Letters 55.13.2.
4 Cyprian, Letter 80.2.
5 Lactantius On the Deaths of the Persecutors, 15.7. Eusebius, Church History, 8.13.13. Eusebius does, however, list Gaul as an area afflicted by persecutions in his Martyrs of Palestine 13.12. This has to be judged next to the claim of a group of bishops that Gaul was 'immune' to persecution (Optatus, 1.22).
6 Lactantius, 24.7.
7 Eusebius, Church History, 8.2.5.
8 Eusebius, Church History, 8.6.8–9 and Martyrs of Palestine, Praef. 2.
9 Eusebius, Church History, 8.2.5 and 6.10.

Bibliography

Ameling, W. (2008) 'The Christian lapsi in Smyrna, 250 A.D. (Martyrium Pionii 12–14),' Vigiliae Christianae
    62: 133–60.
Barnes, T. D. (1968) 'Legislation against the Christians,' Journal of Roman Studies 58: 32–50.
Barnes, T. D. (2010) Early Christian Hagiography and Roman History. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.
Bisbee, G. A. (1988) Pre-Decian Acts of Martyrs and Commentarii. Harvard Dissertations in Religion 22.
    Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.
Bovon, F. (2003) 'The dossier on Stephen, the first martyr,' Harvard Theological Review 96(3): 279–315.
Bowersock, G. W. (1995) Martyrdom and Rome. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
Boyarin, D. (1999) Dying for God: Martyrdom and the Making of Christianity and Judaism. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
Brox, N. (1961) Zeuge und Märtyrer: Untersuchungen zur frühchristlichen Zeugnis-Terminologie. Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament 5. Munich, Germany: Kösel-Verlag.
Castelli, E. A. (2004) Martyrdom and Memory: Early Christian Culture Making. Gender, Theory, and Religion.
    New York: Columbia University Press.
Dehandschutter, B. (1982) 'Le Martyre de Polycarpe et le développement de la conception du martyre au deuxième siècle,' Studia Patristica 17: 659–68.
Dehandschutter, B. (2005) 'The New Testament and the Martyrdom of Polycarp,' in Gregory, A. F. and Tuckett,
    C. M. (eds) Trajectories through the New Testament and the Apostolic Fathers. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 395–406.
De Ste. Croix, G. E. M. (1963) 'Why were the early Christians persecuted?,' Past and Present 26: 6–38; reprinted in pages 105–52 in De Ste. Croix, G. E. M. Christian Persecution, Martyrdom, and Orthodoxy. New York:
    Oxford University Press.
De Ste. Croix, G. E. M. (1964) 'Why were the early Christians persecuted?—A rejoinder,' Past and Present 27:
    28–33.
Edwards, C. (2007). Death in Ancient Rome. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
Francis, J. A. (1995) Subversive Virtue: Asceticism and Authority in the Second-Century Pagan World. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University.
Frend, W. H. C (1965) Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
Grig, L. (2004) Making Martyrs in Late Antiquity. London: Duckworth.
Guyon, J. (1987) Le cimetière aux deux lauriers: recheches sur les catacombs romaines. Rome: Ecole française de Rome.
Heyman, G. W. (2007) The Power of Sacrifice: Roman and Christian Discourses in Conflict. Washington, DC:
    Catholic University of America Press.
Kelley, N. (2006) 'Philosophy as training for death: Reading the ancient Christian martyr acts as spiritual exercises,' Church History 75(4): 723–47.
Knipfling, J. (1923) 'The Libelli of the Decian persecution,' Harvard Theological Review 16: 345–90.
Matthews, S. (2010) Perfect Martyr: The Stoning of Stephen and the Construction of Christian Identity. New York:
    Oxford University Press.
Moss, C. R. (2010) The Other Christs: Imitating Jesus in Ancient Christian Ideologies of Martyrdom. Oxford, UK:
    Oxford University Press.
Moss, C. R. (2012) Ancient Christian Martyrdom. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
Moss, C. R. (2013) The Myth of Persecution. San Francisco, CA: HarperOne.
Mosheim, L. (1767) Ecclesiastical History, trans. A. Maclaine. Dublin.
Musurillo, H. (1972) The Acts of the Christian Martyrs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.
Oulton, J. E. L. and Chadwick, H. (1954) Alexandrian Christianity: Selected Translations of Clement and Origen.
    Philadelphia, PA: Wesminster.
Perkins, J. (1995) The Suffering Self: Pain and Narrative Representation in the Early Christian Era. London: Routledge.
Rives, J. B. (1996) 'Piety of a Persecutor,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 4(1): 1–25.

Rives, J. B. (1999) 'The decree of Decius and the religion of the empire,' Journal of Roman Studies 89: 135–54.

Shaw, B. (2015) 'The myth of Neronian persecution,' Journal of Roman Studies 105: 73–100.

Sherwin-White, A. N. (1964) 'Why were the early Christians persecuted?—An amendment,' Past and Present 27: 23–7.

Sterling, G. (2001) 'Mors Philosophi: The death of Jesus in Luke,' Harvard Theological Review 94(4): 383–402.

Van Henten, J. W. (1997) The Maccabean Martyrs as Saviours of the Jewish People: A Study of 2 and 4 Maccabees. Supplements to the Journal for the Study of Judaism 5. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Van Henten, J. W. and Avemarie, F. (2002). Martyrdom and Noble Death: Selected Texts from the Graeco-Roman, Jewish, and Christian Antiquity. London and New York: Routledge.

Wilken, R. L. (2003) The Christians as the Romans Saw Them. 2nd ed. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Young, R. D. (2001) In Procession before the World: Martyrdom as Public Liturgy in Early Christianity. Milwaukee, WI: Marquette University Press.

39

GRAECO-ROMAN PHILOSOPHICAL OPPOSITION

Michael Bland Simmons

The hostile environment

Christianity was born and developed in a hostile environment. Though pregnant with a great deal of theological and spiritual meaning for many throughout the ages, the cross nonetheless symbolized the insoluble conflict between Christianity and paganism already present in the life and teaching of Jesus (Simmons 2015). Hostilities described in the Acts of the Apostles between Jews and Christians preceded the greater conflict between the early church and gentiles in the Greco-Roman world during the first-century missionary expansions (Frend 1984: 11–109; Chadwick 1992). The delineation of correct (orthodox) doctrines in the face of heretical teachings and the definition of a canon of scripture were two of the major challenges of the church beginning in the second century (Chadwick 1993: 32–83). As these issues of identity were being clarified, both the pagan intelligentsia and the political administration of the Roman empire were able, beginning with Nero (54–68), to distinguish between Judaism and Christianity as separate religious traditions (Suetonius, Caesar 16.25; Tacitus, Annals 15.44). Owing to such factors as the church's continued growth in the provinces, the belief in the deity of Christ and the exclusiveness of the Christians (which was unacceptable to the polytheists of the empire), an increasingly inimical attitude towards Christianity became inevitable (Daniélou 1973; Chadwick 1993: 66–131). Christian leaders were now thrown on the defensive and began to write apologies which had the twofold objective of offering reasonable explanations of doctrines and practices, and evangelistically attempting to convince the pagans that Christianity was the only true religion (see Chapter 28 of this volume and Frend 1984: 229–70). Thus by the second century there emerged such erudite apologists as Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Athenagoras, Theophilus and the Alexandrian theologians Clement and Origen. As we shall see, the latter wrote a refutation of the first work published against the Christians, The True Discourse by Celsus (henceforth Discourse).

Though official state persecutions of Christians had occurred as early as Nero (54–68) and Domitian (81–96), by the 250s under the emperors Decius (249–51) and Valerian (253–60), the first universal persecutions took place clearly indicating the perceived threat now posed by the church to the imperial pax deorum (Frend 1981)[1] which formed the conceptual basis of the empire's religious propaganda, and because it possessed theological and political implications, it was often used as a test of loyalty to the Roman government. Often associated with the imperial cult, it had been continuously developed and variously interpreted by Roman leaders since the time of Livy. Its central thesis posited that the right order and success of the empire would be maintained as long as the worship of the Roman deities was perpetuated. From Tertullian to Eusebius, the misfortunes which befell the empire, whether natural, economic, or military, were regularly blamed on the Christians for their refusal to worship the very deities held responsible for Rome's greatness (Tertullian, Apol. 40; Ad Scap. 3; Arnobius, Adv. nat. 1.1; Eusebius, HE 9.7.3–14). The church took maximum advantage of the cessation of persecutions between Gallienus (260) and Diocletian (284), but storm clouds soon gathered. Already by the 290s, beginning with the executions of Christians in the Roman army (Simmons 1995: 38–40), a very destructive two-edged sword was being prepared by the pagans for their upcoming unprecedented attack upon the church. This double threat came in the form of (a) the most damaging obloquies ever written (to date) against the Christians, and (b) the most formidable persecution ever launched against the church in its 300-year history (Barnes 1973; Davies 1989; Woods 1992; Simmons 1995: 22–46). Moreover, the Great Persecution which began in February 303 would not end until Constantine's victory in 311 at the Milvian Bridge in Rome and the subsequent 'Edict of Milan'.

The case of philosophical opposition

Yet we must keep in mind that within this hostile environment another kind of opposition developed. It was led by learned philosophers and communicated both in the formal debates and lectures of their schools in places like Rome, Athens and Alexandria and in their works which vituperated Christian beliefs and practices. Appearing for the first time in the late second century and continuing throughout the fourth, these writings served a twofold purpose. First, they contained well-reasoned arguments against such Christian doctrines as monotheism, the incarnation, Christ's deity and passion, and the resurrection of the flesh. Second, they attempted to prove the superiority of traditional polytheism and the Hellenic paideia upon which Graeco-Roman culture was founded.

During the period from 150–363 CE, the three philosophers whose anti-Christian works are examined in this chapter (Celsus, Sossianus Hierocles and Porphyry), and a fourth, Julian the Apostate, an emperor with philosophical interests whom I profile in Chapter 60 of this volume, contributed to this philosophical opposition to Jesus and his followers. In this chapter I shall outline the individual and collective contributions of the first three authors, consider the major themes of one of their works (Discourse of Celsus) and assess their significance for the conflict between Christianity and paganism in the Roman empire.

Celsus

It has been estimated that during the period in which Celsus wrote Discourse against Christianity (c. 178 CE), there were c. 100,000 Christians dispersed among 200 or more communities in the empire (Hopkins 1998). A concern about the growth of the church may have been a corollary factor that motivated Celsus to write his book (Frend 1984: 310f., 443), but the immediate cause appears to have been the need to write an erudite rejoinder to the apologies of Justin Martyr written c. 150.[2] We know nothing of Celsus beyond the pages of the Discourse, of which c. 70 per cent has been accurately preserved in Origen's Contra Celsum (Rougier 1977: 19; Hoffmann 1987: 45; Origen, C.Cels. 5.53). Its significance as the oldest literary attack upon Christianity by a member of the pagan intelligentsia of which details have survived reveals invaluable insight into the conflict that was occurring between Christianity and paganism during our period. The central thesis of my argument in this chapter will stress the truculent nature of the conflict between the two religious traditions.

Although Origen informs us that Celsus was a professed adversary of Christianity (C.Cels. 4.47; 8.62) and his erudition in pagan and Christian literature was noteworthy (C.Cels. 4.11; 2.76; 4.36), the school of philosophy which he espoused has been the focus of scholarly debate. Origen calls him an Epicurean (1.8) but elsewhere he expresses doubt (4.54; 4.75). It has been suggested that Celsus was the Epicurean who lived in the second century to whom Lucian of Samosata dedicated his Alexander the False Prophet,[3] but passages in the C.Cels. which betray either Stoic (4.67) or Platonic (1.32; Baumeister 1978) doctrines eliminate him as the anti-Christian author of the Discourse. It would therefore be prudent to conclude that Celsus was an unknown eclectic philosopher with strong Platonic leanings whose major focus was practical ethics rather than abstract metaphysical concepts (Chadwick 1947: 46f.).

Turning to the date of Discourse, Celsus (8.69) refers to contemporary Christians who were sought out and executed. This appears to be an allusion to the rescript of Marcus Aurelius which launched the persecution at Lyons and Vienne in 177 CE (Chadwick 1953: xiv). Also, in the preface to C.Cels., Origen remarks that Celsus had been dead a long time, and this makes sense in light of Eusebius' statement (HE 6.36.2) that Origen wrote his refutation during Philip the Arab's reign (244–9 CE; Chadwick 1953: xxv–xxvi; Borret 1967: 15–21). Finally, a reference to joint emperors in the Discourse (8.71) again strongly suggests the period of Marcus Aurelius. It appears therefore likely that Celsus wrote his True Discourse against the Christians c. 178 CE.

More difficult to answer is the question of Celsus' provenance. Suggestions have ranged from Rome to Alexandria as the place of origin for the Discourse (Chadwick 1953: xxviii–xxix), and it is quite possible that Celsus may have acquired knowledge of Christian heretical teaching by attending lectures given by, e.g. Marcion and Valentinus in Rome (Amphoux 1992: 250). A recent study argues that he was from Pergamum.[4] However, C.Cels. 7.3–11 undoubtedly reveals personal knowledge of contemporary Near Eastern prophetic practices, and this would appear to provide unambiguous evidence that Celsus most probably came from Syria (Burke 1984: 3; Frend 1984: 177).

With respect to the structure, method and style of the Discourse, we first note that Books 1–3 of the C.Cels. respond to the attacks of a Jew – presumably a literary device used to express Celsus' views – found in the early part of the work;[5] Books 4–5 give Celsus' criticism of the Jewish religion from which Christianity originated; Books 6–7 contain Celsus' argument that Christians borrowed from Greek culture and their religion encouraged sedition in the empire:

> For Celsus has quoted several passages especially from Plato, comparing them with extracts from the holy scriptures such as could impress an intelligent person, saying that those ideas have been better expressed among the Greeks, who refrained from making exalted claims and from asserting that they had been announced by a god or the son of a god.
>
> (C.Cels. 6.1)

Some of the basic components of classical anti-Christian polemics make their appearance here: the superiority of Graeco-Roman culture (including that Christian scriptures were written in inelegant style; see Figure 39.1), a criticism of scripture and a dependence upon Plato to prove the weakness of Christian doctrine.

In Book 7 Origen responds to Celsus' concept of demonology, divine providence and his poignant accusation that Christianity has caused sedition against the Roman government. Noteworthy here is Celsus' silence on such topics as cannibalism, incest, infanticide and orgies which were popular criticisms of Christianity during the second century (Fox 1987: 427). As a learned philosopher he evidently felt himself to be above the clamour of the ignorant masses, His overall method of argumentation seems to have been inspired by anti-Jewish writers like Lysimachus, Chaeremon and Apion (Feldman 1990: 106). Moreover, if we keep in mind the important fact that it was an enemy of Celsus (Origen) who edited the Discourse, it is obvious that we cannot always get a clear picture of the details of his argument (Hoffmann 1987: 44). Suffice it to say that the method and style of the Discourse can be generally characterized by (1) the use of historical and 'scientific' facts; (2) the use of irony (often humorous); (3) deliberate distortion of his enemies' beliefs; (4) literary retortion; (5) the allegorization of, e.g. Homer, but at the same time refusing to allow the Christians to allegorize the Bible; (6) the use of Stoic and Platonic doctrines to support his argument; and (7) criticism of scripture to show the superiority of pagan culture.[6] These salient features of Celsus' argument contributed to his major goal of converting the Christians 'by shaming them out of their religion' (Quasten 1953: 52).

Figure 39.1   A leaf from Bodmer Papyri 66; probably late second century CE, showing parts of John's Gospel; photo Wikicommons

Though he emphasized the superiority of Greek culture, Celsus nevertheless employed his knowledge of the Bible in his attack upon Christianity. It is true that Origen says he was not acquainted with the words of scripture (6.12), but this probably means that he was ignorant of the different levels of biblical interpretation (literal, moral, spiritual) used in the Alexandrical schools. Many passages in the Discourse quoted in the C.Cels. confirm Celsus' knowledge of scripture. The question is: how much of the Bible did he know? In beginning to answer this, we must remember that by 180 CE the New Testament canon had not been closed (Rougier 1977: 115–18), and we often find Celsus citing non-canonical books like the Epistle of Barnabas and the Book of Enoch (1.63; 5.54) along with canonical books. Origen is explicit that he knew Matthew (1.34) and the other gospels (6.16) very well, and many passages in the C.Cels. attest to this (e.g. 1.34–8). Origen also admits that Celsus had read Genesis (4.42), and one study has demonstrated that the text he used was the Septuagint, based on the verbal agreements between it and passages of Celsus quoted in C.Cels. (Burke 1986: 242). Of the rest of the Pentateuch, the books of the Prophets, the historical and wisdom literature, the Pauline corpus, Acts and Revelation, Celsus knew either little or nothing (Benko 1984: 148f.; Wilken 1984: 101; contra Rougier 1977: 113f.).

In order to give examples of Celsus' criticism of scripture, we begin by noting his great aversion for the allegorical method of interpretation. He denounces the Christian allegorization of the Mosaic histories (1.17) because the language of Moses, particularly the Genesis account of creation, will allow no such meaning for the text (1.20). In any event, he argues, Christians give an allegorical meaning to the creation story of Genesis 2:21f. because they are ashamed of it (4.38). Finally, this hermeneutical method produces an interpretation of passages more absurd than the fables themselves (4.51; 4.87). Often Celsus attacks the Bible by attempting to show the superiority of a philosophical doctrine, as he does in 1.19–20, where he rejects the Christian doctrine of creation by saying that the world is uncreated, basing his argument on the Platonic concept of the eternity of the world (Tim. 22f.) combined with the Stoic doctrine of cyclical conflagrations. Another contention is that the stories of the Bible are simply invented by its writers. Thus the 'twelve legions of angels' (Matt. 26:52–4) is a fiction of the evangelists (2.10). Jesus' genealogy was made up by Matthew to make it appear that he descended from royalty (2.32). Moses and the prophets have written pure nonsense (6.50). Celsus also accentuates the inconsistencies of the Bible. For example, Jesus' injunction to turn the other cheek is an infraction of the O.T. lex talionis (6.50). One Gospel says that one angel came to the tomb, another says two (5.52). Jesus forbade his disciples to be ambitious (Mark 10:44; Matt. 20:25; Luke 22:25), which contradicts his prophecy that they would rule over the nations (7.23). Celsus also attacks the style of scripture: its language lacks the elegance of Greek literature (6.2), it is very simple and commonplace (4.87), and even vulgar (3.68). Finally, even though the writers of the Bible borrowed from the wise men of antiquity, they often misunderstood and misconstrued what they wrote (1.21; 6.7). This critique may have been provoked by Justin Martyr who wrote that God's divine Logos had been revealed to the wise men of old like Socrates. They were in a true sense 'Christians before Christ'. Origen, moreover, following one of the basic arguments of Christian apologetics (e.g. 6.43), is determined to prove that Moses' writings are much older than Homer. The borrowing went in the opposite direction.

Although Celsus overwhelmingly reviled orthodox Christianity, his knowledge extended also to heretical groups or movements of the second century (Burke 1984: 5f.). In the Discourse reference is made to Gnostic sects, apocryphal works (e.g. Preaching of Peter), Marcionite doctrines (6.74; Jackson 1992), and sects founded by the women apostles, Helen of Samaria, the consort of Simon Magus, Marcellina, Salome, Mariamne and Martha. Even heresies that were unknown to the learned Origen are mentioned (8.16). It appears from this that Celsus had a broad knowledge of the religion that he was assailing, and his purpose for alluding to the diverse doctrines that were disseminated in the name of Christianity is clear. It appears from this that Celsus had a broad knowledge of the religion that he was assailing, and his purpose for alluding to the diverse doctrines that were disseminated in the name of Christianity is clear. By opposing heretical teachings to those of the orthodox, he was able to prove the disunity, and therefore falsity, to his readers of Jesus and his followers (Martinez 1990–1: 203).

In respect of Celsus' legacy, in the history of ancient thought, particularly as it relates to the conflict between Christianity and paganism in the Roman empire, Discourse and the Contra Celsum reveal the respective positions of the educated representatives of the old polytheism and the new monotheism. Celsus is important for our understanding of this conflict because he is the first learned pagan to write against Christianity, and the Discourse is significant for setting a precedent for later anti-Christian polemicists regarding scripture, the superiority of Graeco-Roman culture and the use of pagan philosophy, especially Platonism, to disprove the credibility of Christian doctrine. Even though some scholars question the influence of Celsus upon later periods (Quasten 1953: 52; Hauck 1985–6), others have equally argued that a number of Christian writers before Origen wrote in response to Discourse (Chadwick 1953: xiii; Baumeister 1978: 175; Benko 1984: 140; Burke 1984: 1–7). While it may be true that a direct influence cannot be established in many cases, it would certainly be rash to suggest later writers like Hierocles, Porphyry of Tyre and the emperor Julian, had not become familiar with many of the anti-Christian themes of the Discourse.

Sossianus Hierocles

Sossianus Hierocles was successively governor of the province in which Palmyra was located (c. 297), vicarious probably of the diocese of Oriens, praes of Bithynia (303) and Prefect of Egypt (310–11).[7] By 23 February 303 when Diocletian promulgated the first edict against the Christians, Hierocles had already exerted considerable influence upon imperial officials in Nicomedia to launch the 'Great Persecution'. Lactantius informs us that he was the author and instigator of the persecution (DMP 16). Christians who crossed themselves at Antioch during sacrifices ordered by Diocletian before the persecution interfered with the haruspices' ascertaining the proper omens (DMP 10.1–5; Eusebius, HE 8.4.3f.), and this precipitated the imperial concilium (late 302/early 303) at Nicomedia where Diocletian, Galerius and representatives from the government and the military met to decide what to do with the Christians. Hierocles was there persuading Diocletian to begin the persecution (DMP 11). After Diocletian consulted the oracle of Apollo at Didyma, he was convinced that it was the will of the gods to initiate the persecution (Eusebius, VC 2.50; Lactantius, DMP 2.7; Arnobius, Adv. nat. 1.26; Zosimus, Hist. nov. 2.12 and 2.36f.).

It may have been just before the outbreak of the persecution that Hierocles wrote the Philalethes (Lover of Truth), although this is debatable, some scholars dating the work to c. 311–13 (Barnes 1976: 240–3, 1981: 22; Forrat and Des Places 1986: 18, 23; Des Places 1989). However, an attempt to explain the contradictory descriptions of the Philalethes found in Lactantius and Eusebius, who were contemporaries of Hierocles and were familiar with his work, may help to solve the problem. Lactantius is explicit that Hierocles wrote it not against, but to the Christians (Div. inst. 5.2). Eusebius makes reference to the work written 'against us'.[8] Hierocles may have published two editions, one which possessed a more conciliatory tone (c. 303) to which Lactantius refers; and a later edition with an overt hostile message, perhaps when Hierocles was Prefect of Egypt (310–1). Eusebius' remark 'against us' may therefore refer to this later edition. Whether there were indeed two editions, it is clear that from c. 303 the Philalethes was circulating in the eastern provinces. Hierocles drew his materials from The Life of Apollonius of Tyana written by Philostratus (c. 217) at the request of Septimius Severus' wife, Julia Domna.[9] Apollonius appears to have been an ascetic who lived during the first century, but by Philostratus' time a rich hagiographic tradition had developed, and it is for this reason that the latter makes him not only a Greek hero but a wonder-working holy man possessed with divine qualities (Forrat and Des Places 1986: 53f.). Hierocles' Philalethes undoubtedly depended on earlier anti-Christian sources, and Celsus is a good possibility. Eusebius himself admits that Origen in the C. Cels. had so sufficiently answered Hierocles' criticisms that he only needed to focus on his comparison of Jesus and Apollonius (C.Hier. 1; Junod 1988: 41). Even though it was written hastily in the midst of controversy and is therefore lacking in style and orderly argumentation, the C.Hier. is a book-by-book criticism of the work of Philostratus[10] as it was used by Hierocles (C.Hier. 1). It would appear that the Philalethes was not published for the public, which may explain why it had apparently little influence upon later writers.

Though Hierocles was not a philosopher, it would be rash to discount the significance of the Philalethes for the philosophical opposition to Christianity during the early fourth century. First, this work reveals significant information about the intellectual background to the pagan-Christian conflict during the period immediately before the outbreak of the Great Persecution. Second, it reveals the close association between pagan intellectuals and the anti-Christian policies of the Tetrarchy (Simmons 1995: 24–46, 2015). Third, it is significant for the historical development of pagan and Christian apologetics and polemics as literary genres in the late Roman empire. Fourth, it gives us some understanding about developments in the history of comparative religions. Next, it helps us to understand the evolving concept of the 'Holy Man' in ancient Mediterranean society. Finally, it demonstrates the importance that both sides of the conflict placed upon such religious concerns as miracles, healings and prophecy (Gallagher 1982: 165f.). Note that after mentioning Apollonius, Hierocles informs us of his purpose for writing:

> What then is my reason for mentioning these facts? It was in order that you > may be able to contrast our own accurate and well-established judgment on > each point, with the easy credulity of the Christians. For whereas we reckon > him who wrought such feats not a god, but only a man pleasing to the gods, > they on the strength of a few miracles proclaim their Jesus a god.
>
> (C.Hier. 2)

In these lines we have the heart of Hierocles' message: (1) Jesus is not God, and (2) the basis of Christian faith cannot be proven. By constructing an argument that employs the same method of literary retortion which Pophyry used in his Contra Christianos, it is noteworthy that Eusebius says very little about Jesus and Christianity in general, but prefers to attack Hierocles by using his weapons against him. Its main themes are Apollonius, Jesus and his disciples, miracles (including healings and exorcisms), fideism, prophecy, and Fate and Free Will.

Porphyry of Tyre

Originally given the Semitic name Malchos ('King') after his father,[11] Porphyry (Figure 39.2) was born in the Phoenician city of Tyre in c. 232 CE.[12] By c. 250 he came to Caesarea in Palestine where for a period he probably studied biblical exegesis and hermeneutics, particularly the Alexandrian allegorical method of interpretation, under Origen.[13] Porphyry may have been a Christian at this time, and it may have been while he was in Caesarea that he was assaulted by Christian youths (Socrates, HE 3.23.37), which may have initiated the development of a hatred for Christianity which eventually gained for him a reputation as a 'defensor simulacrorum' (F. Maternus, De err. prof. relig. 13.4). Sometime later, Porphyry went to Athens where he studied philology and philosophy under Longinus. Here the critical, linguistic, literary, rhetorical and historical skills were developed that he would later successfully use against the Christians (Eunapius, Vit. phil. 456). Such works as the Epistle to Anebo and De antro nympharum belong to this period (Smith 1993). In 263 he left Athens for Rome, where he became the disciple of Plotinus and studied in his Neoplatonic school there. Sometime thereafter Porphyry became suicidal, and his master advised him to go on holiday (268). He travelled to Sicily (Eusebius, HE 6.19; Vit. Plot. 4, 11) and while there took at least one trip to Africa Proconsularis to do zoological research for the De abstinentia, and may have begun a Neoplatonic school in Carthage (Simmons 1995: 29, n. 310; 2015: 16f.). Plotinus died in 270, and Porphyry returned to Rome to assume leadership in the Neoplatonic school. Late in life he married a widow named Marcella who had seven children, and around the age of sixty-eight he had a mystical experience similar to those of his master which brought about the union of his soul with the One (Vit. Plot. 23; Simmons 1995: 219, nn. 24f.; 2015: 134–58). He completed the edition of the Enneads before his death which occurred sometime around 305.

Porphyry appears to have exerted significant influence upon the events at Diocletian's court which led to the outbreak of the Great Persecution in February 303 (Simmons 2015). In his Epistle to Marcella (4), he alludes to an important trip to the east because, he says, of 'a need of the Greeks', which took place around the time that Diocletian and Galerius were devising a programme for the persecution. Lactantius informs us that a 'priest of philosophy' who taught abstinence and wrote three books against the Christians dined regularly at Diocletian's palace in Nicomedia (Div. inst. 5.2). This is undoubtedly a reference to Porphyry, who in Abst. calls the philosopher 'a priest of the Supreme God' (2.49.1), and the three books refer to De philosophia ex oraculis which contained a number of anti-Christian oracles and was written most probably just before the persecution began (Simmons 2015).[14] Porphyry was probably in attendance at the same imperial conference that Hierocles and other magistrates attended in late 302. Porphyry was the ideal person to participate in the discussions about the Christians, and Diocletian will have listened to his advice about the impending persecution. He was the leading scholar of his day, concerned both about the decline of pagan culture and the increasing number of intellectuals going over to the church. He was the most famous anti-Christian activist who had already published several formidable works against Christianity. As noted, the Phil. orac. contained a number of oracles against the Christians, and a recent work argues that each of its three books delineates a soteriological path for each of the three parts of the soul: traditional cults and theurgy for the common masses, purification of the lower soul for the novice philosopher by means of continence, and Neoplatonic philosophy for the higher soul.[15] In Ad Marcellam 18 Porphyry asserted that the greatest expression of piety is to honour the gods according to ancestral customs. He also believed in the superiority of Graeco-Roman culture to the man-made ludicrous (so he claimed) fables of the Christians.[16] All of these sentiments will have suited Diocletian's policies against the Christians. Arnobius of Sicca, the first Christian author to write in response to Porphyry, provides evidence that the anti-Christian works of Porphyry were circulating in the western Roman empire by the late third century, and this may indeed indicate that Diocletian supported the dissemination of Porphyrian anti-Christian propaganda in association with the official imperial legislation of the Great Persecution (Beatrice 1988; Simmons 2015).[17]

PORPHIRE   SOPHISTE

Figure 39.2   Porphyry of Tyre, in a French sixteenth-century engraving; photo Wikicommons

Porphyry was a polymath whose scholarly interests led him to study history, philosophy, religion, theology, the natural and medical sciences, zoology, philology and rhetoric.[18] He wrote c. 80–100 works, and three of these, described recently as Porphyry's trilogy on soteriology (Simmons 2015), are particularly important for the present study: Contra Christianos, De philosophia ex oraculis and De regressu animae. The Contra Christianos was a systematic attack in 15 books upon Christian scripture, which provoked responses from, e.g. Arnobius, Methodius, Eusebius, Apollinaris, Philostorgius, Firmicus Maternus, Diodore of Tarsus, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Didymus the Blind, John Chrysostom, Severian, Cyril, Jerome and Augustine (Simmons 2015: 52–91). The latter admired Porphyry for his scholarly qualities, and he was highly respected in Roman North Africa during his episcopal career (Aug., Civ. Dei 7.25; 8.12; 10.10, 28, 29, 31). The Contra Christianos posed such a threat to the church that Constantine's edict of 333 refers to the Arians as 'Porphyrians' (Socrates, HE 1.9.30; Codex Theodosianus 15.5.66), and an edict issued in February 448 by Theodosius II and Valentinian III ordered all copies of it to be burned (Cod. Just. 1.1.3).[19] Fragments survive only in Christian writings. The Phil. orac. as noted above was a collection of oracles which offered a tripartite soteriology on the basis of Chaldaean-Neoplatonic teachings,[20] and the De regressu animae was a philosophical work about the ascent of the soul to God.

The themes of Discourse of Celsus

Jesus

The brunt of Celsus' attack focused upon the person and works of Jesus Christ principally to disprove his deity. Philosophically, the incarnation is impossible because this compromises the (Platonic) doctrine of divine immutability (Chadwick 1966: 101; Wallis 1972: 101). Rejecting the virgin birth as a fable invented by Jesus himself (C. Cels. 1.28), the Jew of Book I explains his birth as the result of Mary's affair with a Roman soldier named Panthera (1.39). Furthermore, if Jesus was really God, why was he forced to escape to Egypt (1.66)? True divinity does not possess physical characteristics: God cannot have been enclosed in Jesus' body, eaten food or spoken with a voice (1.69f.). Besides, why did God have to descend in the first place? To learn what goes on in the world? Does he not know all things (4.3)? The incarnation is not only illogical, it is also unnecessary: God did not have to breathe his spirit into a womb full of pollution, because he could have simply created a body for Jesus. More people would have believed in him because of his immediate existence from above (6.73). Underlying Celsus' attack upon the incarnation is Platonic soteriology which affirmed the affinity of the soul with God, disparaged corporeal and material existence, and placed first priority on purifying one's inner being with philosophy. Life in a physical body was depreciated and shameful. Even so, Christian doctrine was rejected for its particularity: why did God send His son to an obscure corner of earth to live as a Jew (6.78)? Finally, by relocating God, the incarnation would disrupt the natural order of things foreordained by providence (4.5).

To disprove the deity of Christ required an explanation of his miracles which were recorded in scripture. Celsus does not deny the fact of Jesus' miracles, but rather concentrates on the means by which they were performed. Perhaps influenced by rabbinical sources, Celsus attributes Jesus' miracles to his great skills as a magician (8.9).[21] By associating magic with ignorance and immorality (Gallagher 1982: 43–6), Celsus could prove to the educated classes of the empire that Jesus, who had learned sorcery in Egypt, and his followers, were deceived persons from the lowest classes of society (2.52f; Kee 1986: 121ff.). Magic cannot deceive true philosophers, who are educated and moral (6.41). But Jesus' magic was not just a result of innocence. His intentions were quite malicious and hypocritical because, although he performed miracles by sorcery, he excluded others from his kingdom who did (1.6). The miracles have nothing to do with God, therefore, neither do they benefit mankind (1.6; 1.46; 2.48; 2.51). Origen's response is that magicians do not call their audience to a reformation of character (1.38).

As the first writer of antiquity who criticized the central figure of Christianity, Celsus moved beyond the incarnation and miracles to discredit the belief in Christ's deity. Origen informs us that many times in the Discourse Celsus assailed the life of Jesus as being the most infamous (7.56), and his main goal was to prove that Jesus was a mere man (3.41). He asks, how could Jesus really be God when he tried to escape from the Jews disgracefully, he was betrayed by his own disciples, and he could not even save himself on the cross (2.9)? Why did Jesus, though challenged, not manifest any visible sign in the temple that he was God's son? Relying upon the belief in the superiority of Graeco-Roman religious mos maiorum which affirmed 'older is better', Celsus criticized the recent appearance of this 'God' in history (1.26). The moral turpitude of Jesus' character was a salient feature of Celsus' obloquy: Christ obtained his living, he says, in a shameful and importunate manner (1.62). God hated him for his sorcery (1.71); he deluded a few Jews of worthless character into following him (2.4). The crux of Celsus' argument here was important in the intellectual debates about the nature of the God-man in antiquity who was conceived as a person with an upright moral character whose miracles bestowed good things upon humanity. Celsus argues that because Jesus deceived people by sorcery, possessed a base character and could convert only the lowest classes in society, he could not be given the title God, Son of God, or even great man (1.57; 2.41; 2.76). And in order to strike at the foundation of Christian beliefs about Jesus (scripture), Celsus says that either the gospels were corrupted from their original meaning and rewritten to answer refutations (2.26f.), or that Jesus himself borrowed from, and perverted, Greek philosophy (6.16; 7.58). Celsus does not, however, leave his criticism at the historical level. Inquiring about the relevance of Christianity to contemporary society, he asks, why does Jesus not prove his deity now? Why is he not recognized by those (the Jews) who have been looking for a Messiah? Why do many people not believe in Jesus if indeed he came to earth as God (2.78; 7.35)?

Divine impassibility was a basic theological tenet of the kind of Middle Platonism espoused by Celsus (Gallagher 1982: 150), and thus the doctrine of the crucifixion which posited that Christ's death was efficacious for the salvation of all humanity was attacked vehemently by Celsus. We may give five major criticisms. First, since Jesus died the ignominious death of a criminal on a cross, he certainly was not God (2.5). Many robbers have died on crosses, he says, so why should we not call them 'God' (2.44). By stripping Christ's death of its theological interpretation, Celsus concluded that Jesus was sentenced by the Jews as one deserving of death (2.10). Second, the disciples betrayed Jesus at his death (2.11f.). Next, Jesus neither received help from God, nor was he able to save himself from the cross (1.54). To prove his deity, Jesus should have disappeared from the cross (2.68). Fourth, a true God feels no pain, and in any event, what father would allow his son's torture (8.41)? Opposing Gnostic with orthodox views of Christ's passion, Celsus will venture to say that Jesus only appeared to suffer on the cross (2.25). Finally, Celsus finds it strange, even if the crucifixion is accepted, that those who were responsible for Jesus' execution received no punishment from God (8.39). The notion of the 'suffering God' contradicted the Platonic doctrine of divine impassibility. Moreover, by basing the premises of his argument on the view that the Passion narratives in the gospels were inventions (2.10; 2.59), Celsus can conclude that the story of the cross concerns the death of a man who was a criminal (2.16).

Celsus had a special disdain for the resurrection of Christ. Owing to the Platonic doctrine of the dichotomy between soul and body, Celsus finds bodily resurrection philosophically impossible. It would have been impossible for God to receive back Jesus' spirit after being contaminated by contact with a body (6.72). As we have seen, Jesus only appeared to die, but he later reappeared and by the use of sorcery deceived an insane woman and others with good imaginations to believe that he had been raised from the dead (2.55f.). Anyway, if the story had been true, Jesus as God should have appeared to all men universally (2.63ff.). In reality, Celsus asserts that Jesus could not open his own tomb (2.54f.).

Another criticism of Celsus is associated with his belief that the exploits of the Greek heroes are superior to the miracles of Jesus (1.67). During this period both pagans and Christians believed in miracles (Dodds 1965: 84). Although Jesus performed miracles by magic for evil purposes (1.68), Celsus insists that many who lived before him performed wonders and foretold the future for the benefit of humanity. Asclepius, Cleomedes, the Dioscuri, Hercules and Dionysus are a few examples (3.3, 22). Besides, Aristeas of Proconnesus, Abaris the Hyperborean and the Clazomenian are much better candidates for divinity than Jesus (3.26–9, 32f.). The glorious deaths of Hercules, Orpheus, Anaxarchus and the Sibyl are superior to the ignoble demise of Jesus (7.53–5). If Asclepius heals, prophesies and does good to humanity (3.24), there is no room in Graeco-Roman religion for a deceiving magician who deluded the ignorant masses.

God

One of the greatest weaknesses of Christianity for Celsus was the concept of a God who constantly changed his mode of being. We have already seen how this relates to Celsus' argument about the crucifixion, but now it is necessary to observe how it relates to creation. Celsus relied on Marcionite teaching which distinguished between a superior God and an inferior God in several passages where he calls the Creator of the Old Testament an 'accursed divinity' (6.28, 51ff.). According to Plato in the Timaeus, the creation of mortal beings who descend into the World of Becoming is the work of the Demiurge. Following this academic doctrine, Celsus punctiliously disparages the stories of creation in Genesis (4.38f.). Christian teaching about a heavenly creator is thus a perversion of the Timaeus account which resulted from the biblical writers' borrowing from Plato (6.19). To the Christian views, Celsus opposes the Platonic doctrines of the eternity of the world and the Stoic concept of cyclical periods in time characterized by intermittent conflagrations (4.11, 65).

Teleology was an important aspect of the pagan-Christian debate about the nature of God and his relationship to the natural world. Celsus ridicules the Judaeo-Christian belief that God created the world for man (4.74). He asks how can anyone believe that man is superior to animals. They are intelligent (4.78–81), they converse and possess reason (4.84) and are more beloved by God (4.97). Divine providence has allocated a proper place for humans and animals, but man cannot claim superiority over other species in the world (4.99). Neither can man even boast of a better knowledge of God. Celsus bases his argument on Roman augury and divination and asseverates that serpents and eagles have the power of sorcery (4.86), birds can predict future events and elephants are observant of oaths (4.88).

With respect to God's nature, again Celsus adopts the standard teaching of the Academy: 'Ultimate being, colourless, formless and impalpable, visible only to the mind that is guide of the soul, round which is the species of true knowledge' (6.19). This quotation from Plato demonstrates that Celsus' understanding of God is permeated with a distinct apophatic meaning, and may be one reason for his abhorrence of Christian doctrines like the incarnation, divine intervention in human affairs and the ridiculous concept of God's chosen people. Hence God is unspeakable (7.43). He has neither mouth nor voice (6.62), no form or colour, neither does he partake of motion or substance (6.64). God cannot be reached by word, or expressed by nature. He is incorporeal and impassible (6.64f.). It is impossible to say, as Genesis 2 maintains, that God created man in his image because God is dissimilar to any other species of visible things (6.63). Yet the soul needed salvation (purification). Following Platonic soteriology which emphasized the need to purify the soul and flee the passions of corporeal existence, Celsus affirms that man 'ought never to forsake God at all, neither by day nor by night, neither in public nor in private. In every word and deed . . . let the soul be continually directed towards God' (8.63). There was already by the second century a development in philosophy towards a rational monotheism which attempted to accommodate the old polytheism (Chadwick 1953: xvi–xvii). While rejecting Christian notions of monotheism, Celsus insists that it makes no difference if we call the One God Zeus, Adonai or Sabaoth (5.41–5; Baumeister 1978: 163f.; Bregman 1984; Hovland 1984: 202). This concept of the One true God who is transcendent, conceived apophatically and approachable only through rational thought, forms an essential part of Celsus' central thesis: there has been handed down a True Doctrine from ancient times which is the foundation of Graeco-Roman civilization, and it has given to mankind a true understanding of God's nature.

Prophecy

By 150 CE the Christian apologetic tradition had already developed a cogent argument based on the belief that Christianity must be true because Jesus Christ fulfilled all the Old Testament prophecies about the Messiah (Hauck 1989: 137). Prophetic revelation, oral or written, was thought to provide a divine, secret and beneficial knowledge accessible only to a few qualified recipients (MacMullen 1984: 25). The argument from prophecy was central to the pagan-Christian conflict during our period (150–363), and we know of a few pagan philosophers, such as Justin Martyr (Dial. 8) and Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. 1.14), who were so convinced by it that they converted to Christianity. Both Christians and pagans believed in their respective prophetic traditions, and each in turn attempted to prove the falsity of their opponents' positions.

Origen's argument, which followed second-century apologetics, maintained that the O.T. prophets were inspired by the One true God, they spoke the truth, antedated the wise men of Greece, possessed honourable characters and their prophecies were fulfilled in the life and death of Jesus Christ (7.4–42). Celsus ridicules the idea of a particular revelation, bases his argument on Stoic premises, and vehemently attacks the Christian fulfillment-from-prophecy argument (2.30; 3.1; 4.28; 7.36). His primary objective was to disprove the deity of Christ based on O.T. prophecies. There are five major points in his argument.

First, Celsus maintains that the O.T. prophecies are illogical and contradictory. This became an important theme in classical anti-Christian polemics, influencing later writers like Porphyry and Julian. Celsus says that the prophecies depict God as favouring evil (7.13). The prediction that the Jews will fill the earth and slay their enemies is ridiculous (7.19). Concerning the contradictions of the prophets, he asks if they really foretold that the son of the same Hebrew God would come into the world, how could he command one law through Moses and a different one through Jesus? Either he forgot what he had told Moses, or changed his mind with Jesus (7.18, 20, 25).

Second, Celsus rejects the claim that Jesus fulfilled O.T. Messianic prophecies primarily because they can easily be applied to many other men more credible than Jesus (2.28), they are inconsistent with the character of God (7.15ff.), and they are more suitable to events other than those of Jesus' life (1.50). If the prophecies were so clearly fulfilled in Jesus, why have the Jews not received him as their Messiah (1.52)? Philosophically the heart of Celsus' argument here is based on Stoic epistemology, which held that reality is material and knowledge is derived from sense-perception. Inasmuch as Christian prophetic revelation was produced by sense-perception, it was carnal, unreliable and certainly not divine (7.33–40; Hauck 1988: 242–9, 1989: 121–9).

Celsus' third point is that Jesus himself was not a prophet. Miracles and prophecy were signs of genuine divine power in Graeco-Roman religions, and consequently Celsus attempts to discredit Jesus as a wonder-working prophet. Christ did not foreknow all that happened to him (2.13). The prophecies about Judas and Peter at the Last Supper are ludicrous (2.19): a man who banquets with a god will not plot against him (2.21)! And even if the fictions about Jesus' foreknowledge are accepted as true (2.15), one must keep in mind that Jesus deceived people by sorcery to believe that he was the one predicted by the O.T. prophets (3.1). Not only does Celsus attempt to destroy the credibility of Christian prophetic revelation, he also demonstrates the superiority of pagan oracles. Civilization, he asserts, has benefitted greatly from oracles given at Delphi, Dodonna, Clarus and other sites throughout the empire's history (7.3). As a result of obeying these oracles, many have been miraculously healed, magnificent cities have been built, colonies were established, rulers have prospered and barren women have given birth (C.Cels. 8.45). Furthermore, the oracular responses were given by priests and priestesses who were under divine influence. To some of these the gods appeared in visible form. Conversely, it is historical fact that those who disregarded the oracles have brought divine disfavour on themselves, causing entire cities to perish and individuals to suffer (8.45).

Celsus' fifth point is very significant for our study here and in relation to Porphyry and Julian as well. In C.Cels., Celsus derides contemporary prophetic experiences in Syria:

> As Celsus professes to describe the style of prophecy in Phoenicia and Palestine as though he had heard it and had a thorough first-hand knowledge of it, let us also consider this . . . There are many, he says, who are nameless, who prophesy at the slightest excuse for some trivial cause both inside and outside temples; and there are some who wander about begging and roaming around cities and military camps; and they pretend to be moved as if giving some oracular utterance. It is an ordinary and common custom for each to say: 'I am God (or a son of God, or a divine Spirit). And I have come. Already the world is being destroyed. And you, O men, are to perish because of your iniquities. But I wish to save you. And you shall see me returning again with heavenly power. Blessed is he who has worshipped me now! But I will cast everlasting fire upon all the rest, both on cities and on country places. And men who fail to realize the penalties in store for them in vain repent and groan. But I will preserve for ever those who have been convinced by me'.

Then after that he says:

> Having brandished these threats they then go on to add incomprehensible, incoherent, and utterly obscure utterances, the meaning of which no intelligent person could discover; for they are meaningless and nonsensical, and give a chance for any fool or sorcerer to take the words in whatever sense he likes.

Noteworthy is Origen's remark about first-hand knowledge, the reference to many of these Syrian prophets during the period, and the apparent continuation of the charismata mentioned in 1 Corinthians 12 and 14, especially the gifts of prophecy and glossolalia (Aune 1983: 359, n. 221). And even though Origen attests to a few in the third-century church who possessed prophetic gifts, he nonetheless rejects the claim that prophets similar to those of the O.T. lived in Celsus' day (7.8f.). Celsus' principal purpose in mocking these fanatical practices was to show how contemporary Christian prophets deceived weak people just as their leader had done in Palestine many years before (Chadwick 1953: 406, n. 6; 1966).

Eschatology

The Christian belief that the future life of blessedness is reserved only for those who live according to Christ's teaching was greatly ridiculed by Celsus (3.81). Doctrines concerning the blessed life and communion with God are vain hopes (3.80), and the biblical writers borrowed the idea of heaven as the soul's eternal resting place from Homer and Plato (7.28). Origen retorts that these borrowed the idea from Moses and the prophets. Celsus did believe in life after death, for as a Platonist his eschatological soteriology affirmed the belief in the immortality of the soul, the ability of philosophy to purify the soul, the need to escape from corporeal contamination, a release from the cycles of reincarnation and being with God in the afterlife (Simmons 1995: 264–303, 2015: 159–86). Where Celsus parts company with the Christians is the doctrine of the resurrection of the flesh. Platonism could teach a final salvation in and from the body, but never, as Christians professed, of the body. Bodily resurrection was philosophically impossible. God indeed may give immortality to the soul, but he will not raise to life flesh which is, as Heraclitus taught, more worthless than dung (5.14). Finally, calling the Christian God a 'cook', Celsus mocks the belief in an eternal hell where all except Christians will burn with fire (5.15ff.). The Christians again borrowed this from Homer, he asserts, and besides, more noble doctrines about eternal punishments are found in the Mystery Religions (8.39f., 48). Furthermore, the idea of hell is used by Christians to scare people into becoming believers in Jesus. Christian eschatology is untenable because it is philosophically deficient in the 'true doctrine' of cyclical time – the same things happen in predetermined cycles, and God does not amend his work anew – and the correct theodicy posits that the same number of evils remain constant in the world at all times.

Jesus' followers: the church

Celsus had much to criticize about the church. To cast aspersions on the origins of Christianity, its doctrines and practices, he uses a Jew (1.28). And although he finds the Jews contemptible for having forsaken polytheism and for other reasons (1.2, 22; 3.6; 4.36; 5.59),[22] at least they worship according to their ancestral customs (5.25f.). On the other hand, Christians revolted from Hebrew traditions and became apostates (5.33). His objective in assailing the Jews was to show that Christianity must not be true because it derived from the false religion of the Hebrews (2.11). Connected with the charge of apostasy is the allegation that Christians hold secret associations which violate Roman law (1.1; 8.39).[23] Christianity is therefore an illegal religion.

Throughout the C.Cels, Origen informs us that his opponent consistently attacked the doctrines of the church. Celsus primarily argues that Christianity is based on a corruption of the True Doctrine passed down from ancient times by ignorant and superstitious men who misunderstood what they had received (5.65). Comparing Christian teaching with the silly theriomorphic religion of Egypt (3.17–21), Celsus concludes that it is vulgar, unreasonable and it easily persuades the illiterate masses (1.27). He will also rather frequently stress the variety of heretical doctrines circulating in the church to prove the disunity of the Christians. If they really possessed the truth, should they not all profess the same beliefs (5.62–5; 6.30–5; 7.53)? Many Christian doctrines resulted from the corruption of ancient Greek authors, especially Plato (6.17f.; 7.14). It is therefore not surprising for Celsus to find inconsistencies in such teachings as cosmology (6.49), soteriology (6.68f.), pneumatology (6.70–2; 7.45) and universalism.

As a Platonic philosopher who emphasized the importance of living in accordance with reason, Celsus regularly attacks the faith of Christians, and this eventually developed into a major criticism in pagan polemics by the time of Porphyry. Hence he says that men should follow reason to acquire wisdom which comes from the World of Being after the soul is purified by philosophy. Otherwise opinions from the World of Becoming will impede his attainment of the truth. Because Christians follow opinions, they are ignorant and easily deceived (1.9). Wisdom is thus foolishness to those who say 'only believe' and 'don't ask any questions' (6.12). Christian believe erroneous and make-believe doctrines about Jesus because they cannot offer any sound reason for their 'faith' (1.13; 3.39; 4.11; 6.10, 12). Inasmuch as faith is inferior to reason, it is no wonder to Celsus that ignorant people are easily converted (6.12).

The new religion begun by a Jewish carpenter's son has borrowed many things from the Greeks and lacks the authority of antiquity: 'For Celsus it is axiomatic that nothing can be both new and true' (Chadwick 1966: 23). The novelty of Christianity was a major criticism found frequently in the Discourse (7.53; 8.12, 41ff.). Celsus' central thesis is the belief in an ancient doctrine passed down by wise men of old which contains the True Doctrine for humanity and has had a great civilizing influence upon the Mediterranean world. Without a foundation in truth, Christian worship and ritual are demonic in origin and worse than the practices of barbarian nations (1.5f., 6, 8; 7.62; 8.48).

The character and social status of Christians is the final criticism of the church made by Celsus. He maintains that Jesus' disciples were notorious and wicked (1.62), and contemporary believers are ignorant, unintelligent, carnal and win over no one to their cause who is wise or prudent (3.44–9; 7.39). Only low-class persons from the markets easily deceived by sorcery and who would never associate with cultured people, are converted to Christianity (3.50–4). The church welcomes 'sinners' because it cannot appeal to the righteous (3.65).

Christians and the Roman empire

Celsus argues that a disregard for Discourse passed down from antiquity which has preserved polytheistic culture can only lead to rebellion against the empire. Traditional polytheism is justified according to the divine providence which governs all things through the mediation of angels, demons and heroes. To these are assigned various geographical areas, so whoever worships God should also worship his subordinate powers (7.68–70). Christians cause sedition against the Roman government in the same way that the Hebrews originated in rebellion against Egypt (3.8). The Christians' rebellion stems from refusing to honour the daemons in the lower atmosphere who belong to God (8.2), assist him in governing the world in their assigned territories (8.33–5), receive sacrifices and prayers (8.24–7) and bless those under their care in conjunction with providence (8.7, 9, 34–8). History informs us that many have become sick, mad or committed suicide for disregarding polytheistic worship (8.45).

If Christians accepted these polytheistic customs, they would be tolerated (8.12), but since they worship a dead man who only recently lived, who was the leader of a seditious movement (8.14), they revolt without reason from the common belief (8.49). Christianity divides the 'Kingdom of God', raises factions and worships one who is God's enemy (9.11). If on the other hand the Romans abandoned their ancestral religious customs, their world would disintegrate because it is the worship of the gods that made the empire great (8.69). All people should swear by the emperor, for the material and spiritual fortunes from the gods come through him (8.63–68). Christians should support the emperor to maintain justice (8.73), serve in the army to defend their country (8.74), and hold public offices in the government for the maintenance of the laws and the support of religion (8.74f.). But since they stand aloof from the government, the military and society generally, they provoke the gods' wrath and anarchy, and should therefore be executed and driven to extinction (8.56).[24]

The superiority of Greek culture

As we have observed already, Celsus believed that Jesus and his followers borrowed many of their doctrines from the wise men of the Greeks who passed down the True Doctrine to posterity. This cultural mos maiorum contained the truth in such areas as philosophy, religion and literature, its claim to authority was found in its antiquity, and it has formed the basis for the high culture (paideia) of the Greeks. It has preserved Roman civilization. Celsus goes further, however, by explaining the affinities between Christianity and Graeco-Roman culture on the basis not only of the new borrowing from the old, but also of corrupting the Discourse by the use of sorcery. Hence there may be found a few admirable things about Christianity, but on the whole, because of its ludicrous practices and doctrines, this new and strange religion is greatly inferior to the traditional polytheism of the empire.

Celsus initially develops his argument by saying that Greek culture is superior to the customs of the barbarian nations (1.2). Since Christianity has much in common with barbarous customs, it too is inferior to Greek culture. Owing to its style and accuracy, Greek literature is superior to Christian scripture (6.1). And many of the writings of the Greeks are more ancient than those of Moses and the prophets (7.31). Celsus consistently relies upon Plato to prove his thesis (6.6ff.). For example, he says that Plato taught many great theological truths, yet he never espoused a belief in a particular God who descended to earth to talk with him (6.8). Plato is a more effective teacher of the problems of theology, and Celsus' proof text is Timaeus 28C: 'Now to find the Maker and Father of this universe is difficult, and after finding him it is impossible to declare him to all men' (6.42). Greek philosophers have demonstrated that God is knowable by synthesis, analysis and analogy, but the Christians cannot comprehend him because their theological epistemology is based on sense-perception (7.36), and their Logos concept is wedded to the flesh (7.42).

Celsus here follows the Platonic doctrine which affirmed that things are either intelligible, originating in the realm of Being; or sensible-visible, deriving from the realm of Becoming. Truth comes from Being which is apprehended by pure thought. Error, which is based on opinion, derives from Becoming. Intelligible objects are known by the soul trained in philosophy. If the Christians believe that a divine spirit came to earth in order to reveal truths to men, it was the same spirit that announced these Platonic truths long ago. But in fact the Christians are really lamed in mind, follow errors newly created by the magician Jesus, and live a sensual-carnal life far removed from Discourse passed down from antiquity.

Conclusions

The anti-Christian works published from 150–363 CE were characterized by an increasingly hostile attack upon Christianity by some of the best representatives of the cultured classes of the Roman empire. This description of the relationship between paganism and Christianity takes issue with current trends in modern scholarship which have often reinterpreted the conflict along the lines of pluralism and syncretism rather than accepting the argument presented in this chapter. There is no doubt that there were areas where the pagans and Christians cooperated and collaborated with each other, and because of this more conciliatory ambience, relatively speaking, we may in a limited sense define the pagan-Christian relationship based upon a pluralistic or syncretistic ideological matrix. We began with a rather dispassionate critic of Christianity (Celsus), then moved to a magistrate in the Roman imperial government who claimed to be benevolently correcting the errors of a man-made myth (Hierocles), and who at the same time 'behind closed doors' energetically persuaded Diocletian to launch the Great Persecution in February 303. The double threat posed by Porphyry to the Christians was his widely circulated anti-Christian works, one of which (Contra Christianos) appears to have exclusively used the scriptures against his enemies; and his apparently close collaboration with Diocletianic officials to initiate the persecution. Neoplatonic philosophers like Porphyry particularly opposed the Christian doctrines of revelation, eschatology, creation, God, soteriology and Christology. The latter's tenets of the incarnation, the passion of Christ and the resurrection of the body grossly contradicted such cardinal Platonic teachings as divine immutability and impassibility, and simply seemed absurd to many philosophers who conceived reality as hierarchical and the cosmos as being divided into distinct ontological levels with the highly transcendent supreme principle at the top, and the material world at the bottom. As we will see in the final chapter of this volume, with the advent of an apostate emperor (Julian), we witness an anti-Christian programme which began with a number of non-aggressive policies, predominantly in favour of the pagans, but which over a short period of time continued to develop into an increasingly hostile move against the Christians. One can only imagine what Julian would have done if he had not been killed during his Persian campaign. What we do know is that during its most critical period when the pagan intelligentsia excoriated the doctrines of the church and caricatured the Christians as ignorant, gullible and demonized, the church was consistently growing throughout the empire, and this may indeed be the principal reason why the pagan attack became increasingly hostile.

The philosophical opposition to Christianity analysed in this chapter is significant for a number of reasons. First, it reveals something of the truculent nature of the intellectual conflict between pagans and Christians in the Roman empire. Second, it demonstrates the struggle with the meaning of a truly universal religion,[25] and whether this would be defined as a tolerant and inclusive polytheism supported by ancient religious customs, or as an intolerant and exclusive monotheism characterized by its particularity and a strong conviction that a recent and new divine revelation had been given to humanity. Third, the importance of the belief in divine revelation, espoused and defended by both pagan and Christian writers and focusing upon prophetic revelation, was one of the most important aspects of the pagan-Christian debate in antiquity, as has emerged in the discussion of Discourse of Celsus. Fourth, we have shown that there was a continual debate between both groups concerning the true nature of the God-man as he was perceived in classical Mediterranean spirituality. Finally, the close collaboration between Neoplatonic philosophers and the Roman government, represented in the writings of Hierocles, Porphyry and Julian, but hinted at in Discourse of Celsus, accentuates the hostile nature of the opposition to Christianity during the period. Considering both the intensity of the criticism and the superb literary skills of the critics of Christianity that we have surveyed in this chapter, the most fascinating fact of all is not that the church eventually survived among so many cults in the Graeco-Roman world, but that it eventually emerged triumphant. The calm on the face of the famous fresco of Christ between an alpha and an omega in the Catacomb of Commodilla from the fourth century CE, one of the first images of Christ with a beard (Figure 39.3), perhaps reflects the growing confidence of the church in the century after Constantine in spite of philosophical opposition.

Figure 39.3　The image of the bearded Christ from the Catacomb of Commodilla in Rome, fourth century CE; photo Wikicommons

Notes

1 See Michael Bland Simmons (forthcoming 2017a), 'Persecutions of the Christians in the Roman Empire', Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden: Brill.
2 The thesis of Andresen (1955) is that Celsus develops a philosophy of history to oppose that of Justin. Some scholars concur: Chadwick (1966: 22), Hovland (1984), Wilken (1984: 101), Hauck (1985–6: 211–25, 220) and Amphoux (1992: 251). On the other hand, Burke (1985: 107–16) seeks to refute Andresen's thesis.
3 Most scholars reject this: Chadwick (1953: xxiv–xxv, whose trans. is used herein), Gallagher (1982: 115), Benko (1984: 108), Wilken (1984: 95), Hoffmann (1987: 31) and Lanata (1987: 12f.).
4 Goranson (2007).
5 For a different view, see Blumell (2007).
6 See Chadwick (1947: 43). Chadwick (1953: x) observes when Celsus uses Platonic arguments, Origen relies on Stoic refutations and vice versa. Cf. Hovland (1984: 210).
7 Lact., Div. inst. 5.2; Eusebius, C.Hier. 4.19; Mar. Pal. 5.3; See also Barnes (1976, 1981: 21–3, 165), Forrat and Des Places (1986: 1–14, 17), Junod (1988), Speyer (1989) and Simmons (1995: 32–46). I rely upon these secondary sources extensively in the following analysis.
8 Contra Hieroclem 1. Hägg (1992) argues that the author was not Eusebius of Caesarea but Eusebius the Sophist. For a different view, see Jones (2006).
9 See Conybeare (1912) for the Greek text and English translation.
10 The structure is: Chapters 1–6 (Introduction); 7–12 (Philostratus, Bk. 1); 13–15 (Bk. 2); 16–22 (Bk. 3); 23–26 (Bk. 4); 27–29 (Bk. 5); 30–32 (Bk. 6); 33–40 (Bks. 7–8); 41–42 (on Fate & Necessity). See Campanini (1991: 20).
11 See now Simmons (2015). Porph., Vit. Plot. 17; 23.12ff.; cf. Rinaldi (1982). Since the first edition of the present volume there has been an increasing number of works published on Porphyry, on which see the bibliography of Simmons (2015).
12 For his life and works, see Kroll (1894), Bidez (1913), Courcelle (1953), O'Meara (1959), Wolff (1962), Hadot (1968), Demarolle (1972), Smith (1974), Bouffartigue and Patillon (1977), Geffcken (1978), Meredith (1980), Des Places (1982), Croke (1983, 1984), Frend (1987), Evangeliou (1989), Edwards (1990, 1991), Simmons (1995: 1–46, 216–27), Beatrice (1996), Simmons (1997), Berchman (2005), Jurado et al. (2006), Karamanolis and Sheppard (2007), Schott (2008), Morlet (2011), Johnson (2013), Digeser (2012) and Simmons (2015).
13 Eusebius, HE 6.19; Porph., Vit. Plot. 3, 14, 20; Hoffmann (1994) 16, 155), De Labriolle (1929), Hadot (1960), Pezella (1962).
14 For the Phil. orac. see Aug., Civ. Dei 10.32; also, e.g. Bidez (1913: 20–36), Hadot (1960: 240), Dodds (1961), Pezella (1962: 303), Wolff (1962), Rist (1964), O'Meara (1969), Des Places (1971), Majercik (1989), Busine (2005) and Simmons (2015)
15 See Simmons (2015).
16 See Simmons (forthcoming 2017c), 'Porphyry of Tyre'.
17 On Arnobius see Simmons (1995, 2015, forthcoming 2017a).
18 There is a huge literature on his scholarly achievements. See, e.g. Bidez (1913), O'Meara (1969), Hadot (1968), De Labriolle (1929: 386), Frassinetti (1953), Pezella (1962: 302–5), Dodds (1965: 126), Hadot (1960: 244), Demarolle (1972: 120), Meredith (1980: 1123ff.), Beatrice (1989: 267), Smith (1993), Karamanolis and Sheppard (2007), Morlet (2011), Johnson (2013) and Simmons (1995: 18–32, 218–22; 2015; forthcoming 2017c).
19 See, e.g. Harnack (1916), Hulen (1933), Frassinetti (1953), Schröder (1957), Anastos (1966), den Boer (1974), Casey (1976, 1990), Ferch (1982), Evangeliou (1989: 55), Beatrice (1993), and the pertinent works cited in Simmons (2015).
20 See Simmons (1995, 2001, 2002, 2009, 2015, forthcoming 2017c).
21 See Feldman (1990: 122), Benko (1984: 150), Borret (1984: 175f.), Mosetto (1986) and Puiggali (1987).

22 For Celsus' criticism of the Jews, see, e.g. Chadwick (1953: xx), Frend (1984: 163), Wilken (1984: 112–17), Hoffmann (1987: 36) and Martinez (1990–1: 201f.).

23 On illegal associations, see, e.g. Chadwick (1953: xvi) and Hoffmann (1987: 35).

24 On the charge of sedition, see, e.g. Chadwick (1953: xix), Dal Covolo (1979), Benko (1984: 46f., 56), Frend (1984: 177f.), Hovland (1984: 194ff.), Wilken (1984: 117–25), Hoffmann (1987: 34) and Feldman (1990: 124f.).

25 See now Simmons (2015).

Bibliography

Amphoux, C.-B. (1992) 'Un Echo de la Devise de l'Académie de Plton chez Celse?', Revue des Études Greques 105: 247–52.

Anastos, M. V. (1966) 'Porphyry's attack on the Bible', in Wallach, L. (ed.) The Classical Tradition. Ithaca, NY: Cornell, 42–50.

Andresen, C. (1955) Logos und Nomos. Die Polemik des Kelsos Wider das Christentum. Berlin: W. De Gruyter.

Aune, D. E. (1983) Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Barnes, T. D. (1973) 'Porphyry against the Christians: Date and attribution of fragments', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 24: 424–42.

Barnes, T. D. (1976) 'Sossianus Hierocles and the antecedents of the Great Persecution', Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 80: 239–52.

Barnes, T. D. (1981) Constantine and Eusebius. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Baumeister, T. (1978) 'Gottesglaube und Staatsauffassung – ihre Interdependenz bei Celsus und Origenes', Theologie und Philosophie 53: 161–78.

Beatrice, P. F. (1988) 'Un oracle antichrétien chez Arnobe', in De Andia, Y. et al. (eds) Memorial Dom Jean Gribomont. Rome: Institutum patristicum Augustinianum, 248–81.

Beatrice, P. F. (1989) 'Quosdam Platonicorum Libros', Vigiliae Christianae 43: 248–81.

Beatrice, P. F. (1993) 'Pagans and Christians on the Book of Daniel', Studia Patristica 25: 27–45.

Beatrice, P. F. (1996) 'Porphyrius', Theologische Realenzyklopädie 27. Berlin: W. De Gruyter, 54–9.

Benko, S. (1984) Pagan Rome and the Early Christians. London: Batsford.

Berchman, R. M. (2005) Porphyry against the Christians. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Bergjan, S.-P. (2001) 'Celsus the Epicurean? The interpretation of an argument in Origen, Contra Celsum', Harvard Theological Review 94(2): 179–204.

Bidez, J. (1913) Vie de Porphyre. Gand and Leipzig: Librairie scientifique E. Van Goethem (= Hildesheim 1964).

Blumell, L. (2007) 'A Jew in Celsus' True Doctrine?: An examination of Jewish anti-Christian polemic in the second century C.E.', Studies in Religion 36(2): 297–315.

Borret, M. (1967) Origène Contre Celse Tome I. Sources Chrétiennes 132. Paris: Editions du Cerf.

Borret, M. (1984) 'L'Ecriture d'après le païen Celse', in Mondésert, C. (ed.) Le monde grec ancien et la Bible. Paris: Beauchesne, 171–193.

Bouffartigue, J. and Patillon, M. (1977) Porphyre De l'Abstinence Tome I Livre I. Paris: Belles Lettres.

Bregman, J. (1984) 'Logismos and Pistis', in Smith, R. C. and Lounibos, J. (eds) Pagan and Christian Anxiety. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 217–31.

Burke, G. T. (1984) 'Walter Bauer and Celsus', Sources Chrétiennes 4: 1–7.

Burke, G. T. (1985) 'Celsus and Justin: Carl Andresen revisited', Zeitschrift für Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde des Urchristentums 76: 107–16.

Burke, G. T. (1986) 'Celsus and the Old Testament', Vetus Testamentum 36: 241–5.

Busine, A. (2005) Paroles d'Apollon. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Campanini, S. (1991) 'Un Cristiano e l'irrazionale: Il Contra Hieroclem di Eusebio di Cesarea', Giornale Ferrarese di Retorica e Filologia I: 17–25.

Casey, P. M. (1976) 'Porphyry and the origin of the Book of Daniel', Journal of Theological Studies 27: 15–33.

Casey, P. M. (1990) 'Porphyry and Syrian exegesis of the Book of Daniel', Zeitschrift für Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde des Urchristentums 81: 139–42.

Chadwick, H. (1947) 'Origen, Celsus, and the Stoa', Journal of Theological Studies 8: 43–9.

Chadwick, H. (1953) Origen. Contra Celsum. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Chadwick, H. (1966) Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Chadwick, H. (1992) 'The early Christian community', in McManners, J. (ed.) The Oxford Illustrated History of Christianity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 21–61.

Chadwick, H. (1993) The Early Church. London: Penguin.

Conybeare, F. C. (1912) Philostratus. The Life of Apollonius of Tyana. 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Courcelle, P. (1953) 'Les Sages de Porphyre et les "uiri noui" d'Arnobe', Religion 31: 257–71.

Croke, B. (1983) 'Porphyry's anti-Christian chronology', Journal of Theological Studies 34: 168–85.

Croke, B. (1984) 'The era of Porphyry's anti–Christian polemic', Journal of Religious History 13: 1–14.

Dal Covolo, E. (1979) 'Il Regno di Dio in Alcune Testimonianze del Secondo Secolo', Rivista Biblica 27: 313–24.

Daniélou, J. (1973) A History of Early Church Doctrine Before the Council of Nicaea. vol. II. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster.

Davies, P. S. (1989) 'The origin and purpose of the Persecution of 303', Journal of Theological Studies 40: 66–94.

De Labriolle, P. (1929) 'Porphyre et le Christianisme', Revue d'Histoire de la Philosophie 3: 385–440.

Demarolle, J.-M. (1972) 'Un aspect de la polémique païenne à la fin du IIIe siècle: Le vocabulaire chrétien de Porphyre', Vigiliae Christianae 26: 117–29.

Den Boer, W. (1974) 'A pagan historian and his enemies', Classical Philology 69: 198–208.

Des Places, E. (1971) Oracles Chaldaïques. Paris: Belles Lettres.

Des Places, E. (1982) Vie de Pythagore. Lettre à Marcella. Paris: Belles Lettres.

Des Places, E. (1989) 'Le Contre Hiéroclès d'Eusèbe de Césarée à la lumiere d'une édition récente', Studia Patristica 19: 37–42.

Digeser, E. D. (2012) A Threat to Public Piety. Christians, Platonists, and the Great Persecution. Ithaca, NY and London: Cornell University Press.

Dodds, E. R. (1961) 'New light on the Chaldaean Oracles', Harvard Theological Review 54: 263–73.

Dodds, E. R. (1965) Pagan and Christian in an Age of Anxiety. New York: Norton.

Edwards, M. J. (1990) 'Porphyry and the intelligible triad', Journal of Hellenic Studies 110: 14–25.

Edwards, M. J. (1991) 'Two episodes in the life of Plotinus', Historia 40: 456–64.

Evangeliou, C. (1989) 'Porphyry's criticism of Christianity and the problem of Augustine's Platonism', Dionysius 13: 51–70.

Feldman, L. H. (1990) 'Origen's Contra Celsum and Josephus' Contra Apionem: The issue of Jewish origins', Vigiliae Christianae 44: 105–35.

Ferch, A. J. (1982) 'Porphyry: An heir to Christian exegesis?', Zeitschrift für Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde des Urchristentums 73: 141–7.

Fernández, S. (2004) 'El Discurso verídico de Celso contra los cristianos. Críticas de un pagano del siglo II a la credibilidad del cristianismo', Teología y Vida XLV: 238–57.

Forrat, M. and Des Places, E. (1986) Eusèbe de Césarée. Contre Hiéroclès. Paris: Editions du Cerf.

Fox, R. L. (1987) Pagans and Christians. New York: Knopf.

Frassinetti, P. (1953) 'Porfirio esegeta del profeta Daniele', Rendiconti Classe di Lettere e Scienze Morali e Storiche 86: 194–210.

Frede, M. (1999) 'Celsus' attack on the Christians', in Barnes, J. and Griffin, M. (eds) Philosophia Togata II. Plato and Aristotle at Rome. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1981) Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Frend, W. H. C. (1984) The Rise of Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Frend, W. H. C. (1987) 'Prelude to the Great Persecution: The propaganda war', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 38: 1–18.

Gallagher, E. V. (1982) Divine Man or Magician? Celsus and Origen on Jesus. Chico, CA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Galli, S. (2001) 'Il Discorso Vero di Celso: una risposta alla dottrina escatologica cristiana', Nuova Rivista Storica 85(3): 599–618.

Geffcken, J. (1978) The Last Days of Greco-Roman Paganism. Amsterdam: North Holland.

Goranson, S. (2007) 'Celsus of Pergamum; Locating a critic of early Christianity', in Edwards, D. R. and McCollough, C. T. (eds) The Archaeology of Difference. Boston, MA: American Schools of Oriental Research, 363–9.

Greenwood, D. N. (2014) 'The Alethes Logos of Celsus and the historicity of Christ', Anglican Theological Review 96(4): 705–13.

Hadot, P. (1960) 'Citations de Porphyre chez Augustin', Revue des Études Augustiniennes 6: 205–44.

Hadot, P. (1968) Porphyre et Victorinus. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

Hägg, T. (1992) 'Hierocles the love of truth and Eusebius the sophist', Symbolae Osloenses 67: 138–50.

Harnack, A. (1916) Porphyrius Gegen die Christen. Berlin: Akademie der Wissenschaften.

Hartog, P. (2010) 'Greco-Roman understanding of Christianity,' in Bingham, D. J. (ed.) Routledge Companion to Early Christian Thought. New York and London: Routledge, 51–67.

Hauck, R. J. (1985–6) 'Omnes Contra Celsum', The Second Century 5: 211–25.

Hauck, R. J. (1988) 'They saw what they said they saw: Sense knowledge in early Christian polemic', Harvard Theological Review 81: 239–49.

Hauck, R. J. (1989) The More Divine Proof. Prophecy and Inspiration in Celsus and Origen. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Hoffmann, R. J. (1987) Celsus on the True Doctrine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hoffmann, R. J. (1994) Porphyry's Against the Christians. The Literary Remains. Amherst, NY: Prometheus.

Hopkins, K. (1998) 'Christian number and its implications', Journal of Early Christian Studies 6(2): 185–226.

Hovland, C. W. (1984) 'The dialogue between Origen and Celsus', in Smith, R. C. and Lounibos, J. (eds) Pagan and Christian Anxiety. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 191–216.

Hulen, A. B. (1933) Porphyry's Work Against the Christians: An Interpretation. Scottdale, PA: Mennonite Press.

Jackson, H. M. (1992) 'The setting and sectarian provenance of the fragment of the "celestial dialogue" preserved by Origen from Celsus', Harvard Theological Review 85: 273–305.

Johnson, A. P. (2013) Religion and Identity in Porphyry of Tyre. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Jones, C. P. (2006) 'Apollonius of Tyana in late Antiquity', in Johnson, S. F. (ed.) Greek Literature in Late Antiquity. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 49–64.

Junod, E. (1988) 'Polémique Chrétienne Contre Apollonius de Tyana', Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie 120: 475–82.

Jurado, E. A. R., Poncé, J. R., Vázquez, A. C., Moreno, I. R., Salas, J. O. and Calvo, J. M. Z. (eds) (2006) Contra los Cristianos. Porfirio de Tiro. Cádiz, Spain: University of Cádiz.

Karamanolis, G. E. and Sheppard, A. (eds) (2007) Studies on Porphyry. London: University of London, Institute of Classical Studies.

Kee, H. C. (1986) Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Kroll, W. (1894) De Oraculis Chaldaicis. Breslau, Poland: Vratislaviae.

Lanata, G. (1987) Celso, Il vero discorso. Milan: Adelphi.

MacMullen, R. (1984) Christianizing the Roman Empire. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Majercik, R. (1989) The Chaldean Oracles. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Martinez, M. G. (1990–1) 'En torno a la polémica entre cristianos y paganos a través de la obra de Celso', Memorias de Historia Antigua 9–10: 199–212.

Meredith, A. (1980) 'Porphyry and Julian against the Christians', ANRW II. 23(2): 1119–49.

Morlet, S. (ed.) (2011) Le traité de Porphyre contre les chrétiens. Paris: Institut d'Études Augustiniennes.

Mosetto, F. (1986) I miracoli evangelici nel dibattito tra Celso e Origene. Rome: Libreria Ateneo Slesiano.

Muscolino, G. (2015) 'Gesù non è il figlio di Dio. L'attacco di Porfirio alla divinità del Cristo', Henoch 37(2): 222–35.

O'Meara, J. J. (1959) Porphyry's Philosophy from Oracles in Augustine. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

O'Meara, J. J. (1969) 'Porphyry's philosophy from oracles in Eusebius's Praeparatio Evangelica and Augustine's Dialogues of Cassiacum', Études Augustiniennes 6: 103–39.

Pezella, S. (1962) 'Note sul pensiero filosofico e sociale di Porfirio', Eos 52: 299–307.

Puiggali, J. (1987) 'La démonologie de Celse penseur Médio-Paltonicien', Études Classiques 55: 17–40.

Quasten, J. (1953) Patrology. Vol. II. Utrecht, The Netherlands and Antwerp, Belgium: Spectrum.

Rinaldi, G. (1982) 'L'Antico Testamento nella polemica anticristiana di Porfirio di Tirio', Augustinianum 22: 97–111.

Rist, J. M. (1964) 'Mysticism and transcendence in later Neoplatonism', Hermes 92: 213–25.

Rougier, L. (1977) Celse contre les Chrétiens. Paris: Éditions Copernic.

Schott, J. M. (2008) Christianity, Empire, and the Making of Religion in Late Antiquity. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Schröder, H. (1957) 'Celsus und Porphyrius als Christengegner', Die Welt als Geschichte 17: 190–202.

Simmons, M. B. (1995) Arnobius of Sicca. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Simmons, M. B. (1997) 'The function of oracles in the Pagan-Christian conflict during the age of Diocletian: The case of Arnobius and Porphyry', Studia Patristica XXXI: 49–56.

Simmons, M. B. (2001) 'The eschatological aspects of Porphyry's anti-Christian polemics in a Chaldaean-Neoplatonic context', Classica et Mediaevalia 52: 193–215.

Simmons, M. B. (2002) 'Porphyry of Tyre's biblical criticism: A historical and theological appraisal', in Bobertz, C. A. and Brakke, D. (eds) Readings in Christian Communities. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Simmons, M. B. (2009) 'Porphyrian universalism: A tripartite soteriology and Eusebius' response', Harvard Theological Review 102(2): 169–92.

Simmons, M. B. (2015) Universal Salvation in Late Antiquity. Porphyry of Tyre and the Pagan-Christian Debate. Oxford Studies in Late Antiquity. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press.

Simmons, M. B. (forthcoming 2017a) 'Arnobius of Sicca', Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Simmons, M. B. (forthcoming 2017b) 'Persecutions of the Christians in the Roman empire', Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Simmons, M. B. (forthcoming 2017c) 'Porphyry of Tyre', Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Smith, A. (1974) Porphyry's Place in the Neoplatonic Tradition. The Hague, The Netherlands: Martinns Nijhoff.

Smith, A. (1993) Porphyrii Philosophi Fragmenta. Leipzig, Germany: Teubner.

Speyer, W. (1989) 'Hierocles I', Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum 15: 103–9.

Spléndido, M. (2013) 'Soldados, ángeles y mujeres: el episodio de la tumba vacía en el cristianismo de los siglos I y II', Studia Historica 31: 35–57.

Troiani, L. (1992) 'Celso, gli eroi greci e Gesu', Ricerche Storico Bibliche 4(1): 65–76.

Wallis, R. T. (1972) Neoplatonism. London: Duckworth.

Wilken, R. L. (1984) The Christians as the Romans Saw Them. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Wolff, G. (1962) Porphyrii de Philosophia ex oraculis haurienda librorum reliquiae. Heldesheim, Germany: Georg Olms.

Woods, D. (1992) 'Two notes on the Great Persecution', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 43(1): 128–43.

40

POPULAR GRAECO-ROMAN RESPONSES TO CHRISTIANITY

Craig de Vos

Modern historians have noted that there was no official persecution of Christians before the mid third century. In other words, there was no empire-wide ban on Christianity that was enforced from the top down, even if being a Christian was considered a criminal offence. Rather, prior to that time, any actions that were taken against Christians were local and sporadic. As such, they would have been largely due to public opinion.[1]

The Roman legal system was accusatorial. It relied upon an accuser, who laid the charge and presented the case, rather than upon official investigation.[2] Consequently, for a Christian to be charged before a provincial governor meant that he or she would have been denounced and prosecuted by neighbours, family or friends (e.g. Pliny, Epistulae 10.96.2; 10.97.2; Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 4.9; Justin Martyr, Apology 2.2). That such a major step would be taken suggests that Christians would have been disliked, resented and/or feared. Indeed, for neighbours, family or friends to bring them to trial suggests that animosity and resentment would have built up over a considerable period.

This is consistent with social-scientific analysis of conflict. 'Conflict' is understood as a process that involves 'an escalating sequence of responses between two disputants'. It begins with the recognition of differences in attitudes, norms, values and beliefs between those concerned, which may be accompanied by feelings of resentment. Conflict-proper only occurs when these differences become intolerable. For this second step to occur, some sort of 'trigger' (that is some significant incident or event) is normally required (de Vos 1999a: 11–12). However, whether or not overt conflict occurs also depends on other social factors, especially the nature of social ties within that society. For example, if a Christian community was itself socially diverse and its members had significant ties to the different social strata of its local society (especially if there were strong and positive ties to the ruling elite), then the incidence of conflict with non-Christians would have been much less than a Christian community that had a much more restricted pattern of social ties (de Vos 1999a).

Consequently, the incidence of recorded conflict does not necessarily have any bearing on the general perception of Christians. In other words, the fact that actual cases of harassment of Christians are recorded only infrequently does not weaken the assertion that the Christians were the subject of popular resentment. Such accusations are quite literally the 'tip of the iceberg'. Apart from feelings of resentment that were not acted upon, there also would have been a spate of (unofficial) social and economic sanctions, and verbal and physical abuse that simply would not have been recorded. Presumably this would have occurred before Christians were ever brought before magistrates.[3] After all, history tends to preserve the unusual and the extreme, not the ordinary, average and everyday.

Therefore, the question that we face is, 'What did the average person in the Graeco-Roman world dislike about Christians?' or, to put it another way, 'What did Christians do, or not do, that elicited such resentment and hostility?' We will begin our exploration of this issue by looking for traces of popular opinion in the later New Testament, followed by Christian and non-Christian sources from the second and subsequent centuries. Following that, we will seek to answer the question of why they perceived Christians in this light.

Evidence from the later New Testament

The author of 1 Peter suggests that his readers are experiencing conflict and oppression because of their severance of social ties and their generally separatist way of life (Elliott 1986: 67–8; Goppelt 1993: 39–40; Achtemeier 1996: 177; Kraybill 1996: 44; Carter 2009: 44; Caulley 2011: 205; Cook 2011: 222). Indeed, he specifically asserts that 'they are surprised that you do not now join them in the same wild profligacy, and they abuse you' (1 Pet. 4:4; see also 1:14–19; 2:11–12; 4:2–4). Given John's emphasis on a similar withdrawal and separatism in the Letters to the Seven Churches (Revelation 2–3), it is likely that this also lay behind the sufferings that his readers were experiencing or that he expected that they would experience if they were living out their faith (Kraybill 1996: 42; Blount 2009: 8–11, 50–84; Carter 2009). In other words, Christians were being harassed by their neighbours because they were seen as anti-social. They had stopped taking part in normal social activities (which were now considered immoral from a Christian perspective) and they had thereby strained their relations with family, friends and neighbours.

Intimately linked to this separatism and social withdrawal was the Christians' withdrawal from the traditional cults of their cities. After all, religion was completely integrated in Graeco-Roman society. Temples and shrines were ubiquitous, and they performed a range of religious, political, economic and social functions. For example, the major religious festivals (which included public feasts and often gladiatorial or athletic games) were the high-points of the city's social calendar. It is quite clear that 'everyone' ordinarily participated in these festivals (see, for example, Pausanias, 10.32.8ff; Xenophon, Ephesiaca 1.2.2–3; Augustine, De civitate Dei 2.26; MacMullen and Lane 1992: 45–9; Koester 2009: 10–11; Caulley 2011: 199). Apart from joining the processions, it was customary for small altars to be set up outside houses, and households would offer sacrifices as the processions passed by (Price 1984: 111–12; Kraybill 1996: 53 n.97). Although participation was not 'compulsory', as such, there generally was no good reason not to take part. Therefore, when Christians stopped doing so their changed behaviour must have been immediately noticeable to their family, friends and neighbours (Oakes 2001: 89–91; see also De Ste. Croix 1963: 25; Price 1984: 123; Clark 2004: 6–9; Carter 2009: 36–7).

In addition, travelling markets and fairs were often held in temple precincts and in conjunction with religious festivals. Presumably, a Christian would not take part in these if she or he took seriously the requirement to avoid idolatry. Similarly, Christians would no longer belong to a social club or a trade guild (thiasos/collegium) since this would mean participating in religious rites in honour of its patron deity. Consequently, withdrawal from these activities because of their cultic association would have meant an almost complete non-participation in society. In other words, not to take part in processions, sacrifices, feasts, fairs, and clubs and guilds would have meant shunning their neighbours.[4]

This Christian attitude of separatism and socio-religious exclusivity is quite explicit in 1 Peter:

> As obedient children, do not be conformed to the passions of your former ignorance, but as he who called you is holy, be holy yourselves in all your conduct . . . You know that you were ransomed from the futile ways inherited from your fathers, not with perishable things such as silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ.
>
> (1:14–15, 18–19a)

> Let the time that is past suffice for doing what the Gentiles like to do, living in licentiousness, passions, drunkenness, revels, carousing, and lawless idolatry. They are surprised that you do not now join them in the same wild profligacy, and they abuse you.
>
> (4:13–14)

Indeed, the New Testament is full of exhortations to avoid 'idolatry' (for example, Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; 1 Cor. 6:9–11; 10:7–14; 2 Cor. 6:16; Gal. 5:20–21; Eph. 5:5; 1 Thess. 1:9–10; 1 John 5:21; Rev. 2:14–16, 20–5; 21:8; 22:15). If involvement in 'idolatrous' practices were avoided, this would have meant social withdrawal and offence to ordinary Greeks and Romans. Obviously some early Christians, such as the more well-to-do Christians at Corinth (1 Cor. 8:1–11:1) and some among the seven churches in Revelation (Rev. 3:1–4), did not. Where Christians did not withdraw from 'idolatrous practices', conflict with non-Christians does not appear to have been a significant issue (Kraybill 1996: 44; De Vos 1999a: 205–31, 271–5; Blount 2009: 9–10; Carter 2009: 34–9). This, in itself, attests to the connection between the early Christian tendency towards socio-religious exclusivity (as reflected in the majority of the New Testament authors), and the reprisals that were exacted against Christians.

Added to this, of course, would be the Christians' offence to Graeco-Roman religious sensibilities. Rejection of the gods and their cults was greatly resented by the common people (de Vos 1999a: 46–8; see also Stoops 1989: 83; Caulley 2011: 204–5). It would have been a personal affront to their values and beliefs, indeed to their whole world view. The traditional gods and their cults were still held in high esteem, and were the subject of strong personal devotion among the common people (de Vos 1999a: 43–5, 48–50). Furthermore, the people's relationship with the gods was understood in a contractual sense. This relationship was described by the Romans as pax deorum – the belief that they had peace with the gods provided that they kept up their end of the contract. In reality, this meant that their personal safety and well-being, along with that of their town, depended upon them maintaining the good favour of the gods by correctly performing the appropriate rites (Garnsey and Saller 1987: 163, 175; de Vos 1999a: 43–56; Clark 2004: 20; Green 2010: 123–4).

Consequently, since the gods were understood to protect the town and its inhabitants, the behaviour of the Christians was seen as a direct threat to their welfare and safety (Janssen 1979: 141; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 203; de Vos 1999a: 51–3; Carter 2009: 38; Green 2010: 123–4; Wagemakers 2010: 341; Caulley 2011: 200). This alone would have been sufficient to provoke considerable hostility against Christians.

Such resentment would have been even greater due to the increase in popularity and importance of the imperial cult. Although the imperial cult predated Domitian (81–96 CE), and it is unclear to what extent Domitian himself demanded the use of divine addresses, it appears that there was a change or growth in the cult during his reign (Collins 1984: 71–2; Thompson 1990: 96–116, 159; Friesen 1993: 165–6, 249, 2001: 147–9; Slater 1998: 233–8; Cook 2011: 113–7, 136; contra Cuss 1974: 57–8). Many remains exist of temples built for the cult, especially in Asia Minor (see Figure 40.2 for Pisidian Antioch). Indeed, we know that under Domitian a new provincial imperial cult was established at Ephesus and the Ephesian Olympics were instituted in his honour (Kraybill 1996: 27–8; see also Friesen 1993: 147–9, 160–4, 2001: 43–6; Cook 2011: 116–7). Furthermore, imperial cult images were quite frequent on coins from the latter half of the first century (see Figures 40.1a, b and c).

As it happens, the seven churches of Revelation 2–3 were all located in major imperial cult centres. Revelation 13 strongly suggests that the imperial cult, described as the worship of a haughty and blasphemous beast (Rev. 13:1–10), was both prevalent and popular in the late first century.[5] Therefore, when John attacked the cult (as he did, for example, in Rev. 14:6–12) he was attacking something that was a major socio-religious institution, a significant vehicle for the expression of loyalty to Rome by provincials (Friesen 1995: 249), and the product of local, popular enthusiasm (Price 1984: 78–9; Garnsey and Saller 1987: 165; Frilingos 2004: 22–5; Koester 2009: 15–6).

Figures 40.1a and b   Coins of Tiberius and Gaius (Caligula), in which each is described as the 'son of the divine Augustus'

Figure 40.1c   A coin issued by Titus, commemorating Vespasian as 'divine'

Figure 40.2 Remains of the Temple of Augustus and Rome at Pisidian Antioch. Photo J. C. Coulston

Furthermore, even as early as Tiberius' reign (14–37 CE), Tacitus claims that 'the town of Cyzicus was charged with neglecting the cult of the deified Augustus' (Annals 4.36). So criticism of and opposition to this institution would also have been perceived as a threat to the city's welfare. If John's attitude was at all common among Christians in this period, then an apparent increase in anti-Christian sentiment should not be surprising.[6]

At the same time, rejection of the traditional gods and cults, as well as the imperial cult, could have had a significant impact on the local economy. Cult festivals, with their processions, sacrifices, feasts, fairs and games, were a major source of revenue.[7] Resentment of Christian practices due to loss of income is quite apparent in Acts 16:19–21 and especially in Acts 19:23–41 (see de Vos 1999b; Gaventa 2003: 275–6). In the latter, the Ephesian silversmiths feared the impact of the preaching of Paul and his companions on their livelihoods, which were intimately associated with the cult of Ephesian Artemis. Indeed, the temple and its cult was the linchpin of the Ephesian economy. Therefore, the silversmiths incited the mob to gather in the theatre (see Figure 40.3), dragging two companions of Paul and Barnabas along with them. After much confusion, the town clerk managed to quiet them down and the crowd left the theatre (Stoops 1989: 73, 83–4; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 203; Gaventa 2003: 269–76; Brinks 2009: 781–2). It is likely that such a scenario would have been repeated in many other cities.

In summary, then, it would seem that the Christians were resented because they refused to take a full part in society, snubbed their neighbours, spurned the gods and thereby threatened their neighbours' livelihoods and the safety of their towns, and offended their neighbours' social, political and religious values and beliefs. Consequently, it is not surprising that Christians were abused and harassed. Neither is it surprising that they were denounced to the authorities, even if this is recorded somewhat infrequently.

At the same time, it is clear that the Christians were denounced for what they perceived to be trumped-up charges. For example, the author of 1 Peter suggests that his readers were the subject of abuse and slanderous accusations. Unfortunately, he does not explicitly indicate what these accusations might have been, except that he repeatedly uses the terms 'to do wrong' and 'wrongdoers' (2:12; 3:16–17; 4:14). The fact that both his readers, and some among the readers of Revelation, are denounced and suffer for the 'name' of 'Christ' or 'as a Christian' (1 Pet. 4:14–16; Rev. 2:17; 3:5, 10, 12) would suggest that there was some overwhelming stigma or crime associated with belonging to the Christian community.[8] But the nature of these charges is not explicit. Given the circumstances that Luke describes in Acts 16:19–21, the most likely accusation against the historical Paul and Silas at Philippi would have been one of practising magic or witchcraft (de Vos 1999b; Reimer 2003: 133–6). However, due to Luke's apologetic agenda, this charge is down-played. Instead, the charge that Luke records (or constructs), namely, 'they advocate customs which it is not lawful for us Romans to accept or practice' (Acts 16:21), is quite ambiguous. Therefore, while it is clear that Christians were denounced simply for being Christians, and this was due to an association with some crime or stigma, the nature of this is nowhere explicit in the New Testament. It only becomes explicit when we turn to subsequent writers.

Figure 40.3   The theatre in Ephesus. Photo Philip F. Esler

Evidence from other sources

Tacitus claims that Nero blamed the Christians for the Great Fire of Rome in 64 CE because they were 'hated for their atrocities' by the mob (Ann. 15.44).[9] Suetonius also describes the Christians as a group 'given to a new and vile superstition', and records Nero's harassment of them. But he does not specifically link this to the fire (Nero 16.2; see also Cuss 1974: 150). Therefore, although a connection between actions against Christians and the fire may be somewhat tenuous, there is little doubt that in the later half of the first century and the first half of the second century the Roman mob disliked Christians because they believed them to be guilty of a range of anti-social vices (Clark 2004: 39; Green 2010: 51; Wagemakers 2010). This is most apparent in the 'lynching' at Lyons in 177 CE (see Figure 40.4). On this occasion, Eusebius tells us that the local Christians:

> [e]ndured the attacks which the whole mass of the people heaped upon them, clamours, blows, hailings, plunderings, stonings and confinements, and all that an infuriated mob is wont to employ against foes and enemies. Then they were conducted to the market-place by the tribune and the authorities presiding over the city; and when they had been questioned before the whole multitude, and given their testimony, they were shut up in prison . . . From that time on the holy martyrs endured punishments beyond all description . . . Maturus, then, and Sanctus and Blandina and Attalus were led to contend with wild beasts to the amphitheatre, and to the public spectacle of heathen inhumanity . . . they ran the gauntlet of scourgings, as is the custom of the place; they were dragged by wild beasts; they endured all that the cries of a maddened populace ordered, now from this side, now from that; and last of all, the iron chair, which fried their bodies and choked them with smoke. Nor even at this point did the heathen stop . . . Blandina, suspended on a stake, was exposed as food to the wild beasts which were let loose against her . . . And after the scourging, after the wild beasts, after the frying-pan, she was at last thrown into a basket and presented to a bull. For a time the animal tossed her . . . Then she too was sacrificed.
>
> (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.1.7–8, 16, 37–8, 41, 56; Stevenson 1957: 31–9)

What is significant, however, is that Christians at Lyons who denied their faith were not spared. Eusebius notes that 'those who had denied when the Christians were first arrested were also imprisoned with them and shared the same fate; for on this occasion their denial had profited them nothing' (Hist. Eccl. 5.1.33). This strongly suggests that they were specifically executed because they were thought to be guilty of various anti-social crimes. Indeed, Eusebius himself suggests that the fury of the crowd was a result of rumours of 'Thyestean feasts and Oedipdean intercourse, and things which it is not possible to say aloud or to think' (Hist. Eccl. 5.1.14; cf. Athenagoras, Leg. pro Christ. 3; see also Green 2010: 123; Wagemakers 2010: 337–9).

Figure 40.4   Amphitheatre at Lyons, scene of the martyrdom of Christians in 177 CE. Photo Everett Ferguson

Similarly, when the magistrate reads out the charge of 'being a Christian' against Polycarp, the crowd immediately demands his execution (Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.2). Even at the end of the second century, Tertullian can still exclaim that in trials of Christians 'only one thing is looked for, and only one, what is needful for popular hatred is the confession of the name' (Apol. 2.3).

From this it seems likely that to be a Christian in the second century meant that one was perceived to be some sort of criminal or engaged in illicit, anti-social, immoral activity. This is no different from what we saw in relation to the later New Testament. However, in the second century the nature of such accusations does become explicit. Indeed, it is clear that, for the common people at least, Christianity was strongly associated with crimes such as ritual murder and the sacrifice of infants, cannibalism, incest and other illicit sexual activity, conspiracy to commit arson, 'hatred of humanity', and the practice of magic (Justin Martyr, Apol. 1.26; Minucius Felix, Octavius 8.4–5; 9.2–5; Tert., Apology 7.1; Athenagoras, Leg. pro Christ. 3; Acts of Paul and Thecla 15, 20; Pliny, Ep. 10.96).[10] For example, Tertullian sarcastically exclaims that Christians ought to be tortured to find out 'how many butchered babies each of us had eaten, how many acts of incest each had performed in the dark' (Apol. 2.5). Minucius Felix has an imaginary 'pagan' critic describe Christians as a 'band of questionable and illegal outlaws' who 'unite themselves against the gods'. Furthermore, he claims they are:

> [p]eople who assemble illiterates from the dregs of society . . . and so organise a rabble of impious conspirators, banded together by nocturnal meetings, ritual fasts and abnormal feasts, not for any religious devotion but for superstitious rites . . . everywhere they introduce a 'so-called' religion of lust, a promiscuous fraternity by which promiscuous behaviour becomes incest, under the guise of a sacred title.
>
> (Octavius 8.4–9.3)

Apuleius says of one woman, whom most scholars consider a Christian, that:

> She was like a filthy toilet into which virtually every vice had flowed. She was cruel and debauched, addicted to sex and wine, recalcitrant and stubborn, greedy in her petty thievery and extravagant in her loathsome excesses, an enemy of fidelity and a foe to chastity . . . she despised and mocked all of the gods, and, instead of following true piety, she hid behind a false and wicked god, whom she called 'the one and only god', to create hollow rites in order to deceive everyone, including her wretched husband. She gave herself over to liquor from day-break and to licentiousness until sunset.
>
> (Metamorphoses 9.14)

In this regard, Christians were also thought to worship the head of an ass (Tert., Apol. 16; Damocritus, Fr. Hist. Gr. 4.377; see also McGowan 1994: 417). For example, the imaginary pagan critic of Christianity in Minucius Felix's Octavius claims that:

> [t]heir empty and idiotic superstition actually boasts of criminal activity . . . unless there was some foundation to it, perceptive rumour would not associate it with blatant and shameful forms of depravity. I am led to believe that by some stupid impulse they consecrate and worship the head of an ass, the basest of all beasts, a religion worthy of the morals that sired it.
>
> (9.3)

This accusation, which is also reflected in a famous graffito from the Palatine area of Rome (see Figure 9.6 in this volume), would appear to be linked to a similar accusation made against the Jews by several Hellenistic writers. In particular, Apion specifically linked worship of an ass's head to ritual murder and cannibalism (Josephus, Against Apion 2.79–80, 91–102), and this link may be implied in the passage just cited from Minucius Felix (McGowan 1994: 417). It is possible that this derogatory scrawling was also intended to convey this same accusation.

Not surprisingly, given the nature of these accusations, Christians were seen as a threat or danger to society. In particular, they were thought to be corrupt teachers who deceived women and young people. They were also accused of undermining family life, that is, of seeking to split households (Acts of Paul and Thecla 8–15, 20).[11] In this regard, it is possible that heads of households may have become suspicious of adulterous affairs if their wives were entertaining strange men in their homes during the day, or they were getting up early to go to secretive pre-dawn rituals (MacDonald 1997: 71; see also Benko 1984: 126).

Although we cannot be certain how much the average Greek or Roman knew of Christian rituals, certain practices, such as exorcism, speaking in tongues, praying 'in the name of Jesus', and the sign of the cross, could have been seen as magical rites.[12] Accusations of practising magic would have been particularly important given that there appears to have been a growing fear of harmful magic over the course of the second and third centuries (Wypustek 1997: 283, 287; Rives 2003). Such a fear may indeed be implied by Suetonius' reference to Christianity as a 'wicked' or 'criminal' superstition (malefica superstitio; Suetonius, Nero 16.2; see also Janssen 1979: 157).

In the second and subsequent centuries, the refusal of Christians to worship the traditional gods is also very prominent. They are frequently accused of 'atheism' (Justin Martyr, Apol. 1.5–6; Tert., Apol. 10.1; Martyrdom of Polycarp 12.2; Lucian, Alexander the False Prophet 38; Apul., Met. 9.14).[13] For example, Minucius Felix's imaginary pagan critic claims that 'they disdain shrines as if tombs; they mock the gods; they ridicule at our most sacred rituals; deserving sympathy themselves, they pity our priests (if you can believe it)' (Min. Fel., Oct. 8.4). Indeed, such a complaint was probably the primary problem, as everything else stemmed from it (Benko 1984: 4; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 160; MacDonald 1997: 59; Green 2010: 122). This would also explain why Pliny only dismissed charges against people who denied they were Christians 'once they had recited after me a prayer of invocation to the gods and had made wine and incense offerings to your statue' (Ep. 10.96; cf. Green 2010: 122–3). Correspondingly, they became the scapegoats for the natural disasters experienced by local communities (De Ste. Croix 1963: 24–6; Frend 1967: 177; Janssen 1979: 132–3; Wilken 1984: 63; Lane Fox 1986: 425–6; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 56–7, 70, 160; Clark 2004: 47; Wagemakers 2010: 341). Although somewhat sarcastic, Tertullian's famous jibe is not an outrageous exaggeration:

> If the Tiber rises to the city walls, if the Nile does not cover the flood-plains, if the heavens don't move or if the earth does, if there is a famine or a plague, the roar is at once: 'The Christians to the lion!' Really! All of them to one lion?
>
> (Apol. 40.2)

Indeed, there was mob violence against Christians in Asia Minor during the reign of Antoninus Pius (138–61) as a result of natural disasters (Williams 1997: 897; see also Justin Martyr, Apol. 1.68; Euseb., Hist. Eccl. 4.26.10). They were blamed for earthquakes in about 152, and plagues and a Parthian attack in about 165. Christians were also blamed for earthquakes in the 230s.[14] Frend even suggests that the Decian persecutions (250–1) can largely be attributed to this popular reaction against Christians in the face of natural disasters (1987: 6).

Popular resentment of Christians in this period can also be linked to the increasing importance of the imperial cult (McGowan 1994: 440; Caulley 2011: 198–200). Thompson, however, contends that the role of the cult should not be overemphasised, because the issue of adherence to traditional cults was the main issue (1990: 164).[15] Yet, in a sense, the cult was traditional – at least in the Hellenistic east. As we have seen, even in the first century it was both widespread and popular. Furthermore, there is evidence to suggest that mob violence towards Christians was more pronounced during the major imperial festivals.[16] This is not surprising if observance of the cult was seen as a direct expression of loyalty to Rome and the emperor, upon whose goodwill the cities in the Hellenistic east relied for their stability and prosperity.

Finally, ordinary people may also have denounced Christians to the authorities for economic reasons. Some, conceivably, may have denounced relatives, friends or neighbours in the hope of gaining their goods. After all, that was the reward under Roman law for those who could successfully prosecute another (Lane Fox 1986: 425; see, for example, Suetonius, Nero 10.1). It is more likely, however, that economic motivation was linked to the impact of Christian attitudes and practices on people's livelihoods, as we saw earlier in the case at Ephesus (Acts 19:23–41). For example, Pliny notes that following his actions against Christians 'meat from sacrifices is again being sold everywhere, although until recently hardly anyone seemed to be buying it' (Ep. 10.96). In other words, there had been a decline in the sale of meat left over from sacrifices that he directly attributed to the Christians. In the context of the numerous denunciations he mentions, it would not be surprising if many of the informers had been those most affected by this (Thompson 1990: 131; Kraybill 1996: 52–3; Caulley 2011: 198). Anyone whose occupation was associated with temple practice would have been disadvantaged by Christian non-participation.

As we saw in relation to the New Testament writings, it seems quite clear from later Christian and non-Christian sources that Christians were disliked, or even feared, because of the threat that they were deemed to pose to society. They rejected the gods, which was believed to harm people's very livelihoods and welfare. Christians destroyed families and households, thus also weakening the very fabric of society. They were thought to engage in magic, and they were suspected and accused of engaging in a range of illicit, immoral and criminal acts. Indeed, by the end of the second century, such anti-social attitudes and activities had become synonymous with the very name of 'Christian'.

Why were the Christians resented?

It seems quite clear that Christians were the objects of popular resentment. On the surface this appears to derive from their separatist and anti-social tendencies, and their failure to worship the traditional gods. However, scholars generally argue that the popular belief that Christians were involved in immoral or illicit activity arose from misunderstandings of the Christians' practices, liturgies and language. For example, it is suggested that the accusations of cannibalism arose from outsiders misinterpreting the words of the Eucharist. Expressions such as 'this is my body . . . this is my blood' would have naturally led to the assumption that Christians practised cannibalism. Similarly, the Christian ban on abortion and the exposure of infants was linked to this accusation of cannibalism, that is, the ban was introduced so that there would be excess infants for their cannibalistic practices (Benko 1984: 60; Goppelt 1993: 41; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 32–3, 197; Wagner 1994: 133; Wagemakers 2010: 343).

Accusations of incest are said to have arisen from a misunderstanding of the Christians' use of terms such as 'brother' and 'sister' or 'love' (Wagner 1994: 133; see also Sordi 1994 [1988]: 32–3; Clark 2004: 20; Wagemakers 2010: 343), and the practice of kissing one another (Benko 1984: 79, 98; Wagemakers 2010: 343).[17] Similarly, accusations of adultery are attributed to women entertaining strange men in their homes during the day (MacDonald 1997: 71), and the closed, nocturnal nature of their meetings (Wagemakers 2010: 343).

Accusations of magic are said to have arisen from the way that Christians sang hymns, spoke in tongues, prayed 'in the name of Jesus', made the sign of the cross and engaged in exorcism. All such activities would have been seen as 'magical' by outsiders. Indeed, the use of gesture, speaking in gibberish and invoking the name of a powerful god were all common in magical incantations.[18] Furthermore, accusations of practising magic also could have been linked to the Christian practice of holding secretive nocturnal rituals.[19] Some have even suggested that these accusations arose because outsiders confused Christians with Gnostics or Montanists, who possibly did engage in such activities (Benko 1984: 67; Wypustek 1997: 277–9; cf. Wagemakers 2010: 344–5).

Can this popular perception of illicit and immoral activity be attributed simply to misunder-standing? In the first place, if accusations of immoral and illicit activity were simply based on misunderstanding, how do we account for the fact that the same accusations were made repeatedly over a very long span of time? As we saw, such accusations may have been made in the time of the later New Testament. Even if they were not, they certainly were by the time of Pliny (early second century), and they continued until at least the early third century (De Ste Croix 1963: 20–1; Krodel 1971: 261; Wagemakers 2010). Surely it is unreasonable to attribute a belief that is sustained over a period of more than a century (if not two centuries) simply to a misunderstanding.

Furthermore, the claim of misunderstanding assumes that ordinary outsiders had little substantial knowledge of Christian beliefs and practices. Given the nature of life in ancient cities, however, this is highly questionable. The common people in Graeco-Roman cities spent much of their time in communal spaces and in public activities, because their places of residence were very small. An average flat or apartment was really used only for sleeping and storing possessions – people relied upon baths, public latrines, temples, shops, cafes and inns for everything else. At the same time, streets were generally very narrow (seldom more than a few metres wide) and there was an extremely high population density. Consequently, Graeco-Roman cities were face-to-face com-munities, that is, they lived very public lives. Gossip was rampant. There was little privacy and few secrets, especially as town-planning, social structures and social institutions specifically sought to minimise them (de Vos 1999a: 28–37).

In light of this, it is hard to imagine that outsiders did not know a considerable amount about Christian practices and beliefs. Since early churches generally met in houses, workshops and apartments (de Vos 1999a: 147–50, 258–61; Balch 2004; Horrell 2004), streets were very nar-row (see Figures 40.5 and 40.6 as an indication of how narrow the streets were and how closely people lived together), and housing was very dense, many outsiders would have heard quite a lot of Christian preaching and teaching.

For example, in the Acts of Paul and Thecla, Thecla sat at her window across the street listening as Paul preached to the church that met in the house of Onesiphorus. She became a Christian as a direct result of what she heard. On the other hand, Thecla's mother (who no doubt also heard Paul's preaching) announced to Thecla's husband-to-be that 'she is obsessed with a foreigner teaching deceptive and crafty teachings . . . He claims we must fear only one God and live in abstinence' (Acts of Paul and Thecla 7–9). This is hardly a gross misunderstanding or misrepresentation of early Christian beliefs. Given the communal nature of city life, Christian beliefs and practices no doubt became a topic of conversation when people met at the local wells, the baths, the latrines, the shops, the cafes and so on.

Figure 40.5 First-century street from Jerusalem. Photo Merrill Kitchen

Figure 40.6   Part of the Via Dolorosa in Jerusalem. Photo Merrill Kitchen

Therefore, the argument that the popular accusations arose from misunderstanding due to ignorance or limited knowledge is hard to sustain, even if the Christians continually protested that their teachings and practices were being misunderstood (for example, Justin Martyr, Apol.; Min. Fel., Oct.; Tert., Apol.; Origen, Contra Celsum). After all, people could have made inquiries about the Christians, as Pliny did of those brought before him (Ep. 10.96), if they were concerned and wanted to get all of the facts. Consequently, if there was any 'misunderstanding' it must have been because outsiders were quite satisfied that they already knew the truth. They did not feel any need to investigate. Rather, as a number of scholars have suggested, because the Christians were seen as anti-social (both withdrawing from normal socio-religious activities and engaging in secret nocturnal gatherings) and they refused to worship the gods, it was simply assumed that they must have been involved in immoral and illicit activity (Krodel 1971: 261; Frend 1979: 35; Phillips 1991: 262; McGowan 1994: 437; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 31, 202). People who did such things were surely capable of doing anything!

This popular assumption that the Christians must have been involved in a range of immoral and illicit activity is consistent with social-scientific analyses of Graeco-Roman society. As a number of scholars have noted (for example Malina and Neyrey 1996; Crook 2004), the ancient Mediterranean world appears to have been a group-oriented or 'collectivist' society. In other words, Greeks and Romans gave priority to group rather than personal goals and their sense of identity was largely dependant upon the groups to which they belonged. Within such cultures people tended to think 'sociologically' rather than psychologically. As such, they were not really concerned with understanding each other in terms of the 'introspective, psychological ways' characteristic of modern Western cultures (Malina and Neyrey 1996: xiii). Rather, they assessed themselves and others in terms of group-determined stereotypes. People were classified according to their family, race, place of origin and class. Indeed, if you knew these, you knew the person (Malina and Neyrey 1996: 7–17).

This 'stereotypic' approach is also very evident in the body of ancient work known as the 'physiognomic' literature. Such literature assumed that one could tell another person's character from the way that he or she looked (Malina and Neyrey 1996: 100–8; Parsons 2006). In other words, it assumed that 'all internal qualities may be known rather easily from external traits and behaviors', which were held to be fixed and unchanging (Malina and Neyrey 1996: 149–50; de Vos 2001). Consequently, from their observation of Christian beliefs, values and practices it could be concluded that Christians were anti-social. And if they were anti-social then it was to be expected that they would be capable of any manner of anti-social activity. Furthermore, if one Christian was an anti-social atheist, then they all were.

This use of stereotypic accusations is also consistent with a sociological understanding of deviance, specifically, the labelling theory of deviance. According to this theory, 'deviance' is behaviour that is perceived to violate a group's norms and values. As such, deviance is not so much an inherent characteristic as a reaction. A person becomes a deviant via a 'labelling process' such that the person's behaviour is perceived to violate the group's norms and values, this perception is disseminated within the group, and the person is subjected to a status degradation ritual and receives the appropriate punishment.[20] Deviance labelling is particularly common in collectivist societies (de Vos 1999b), where it serves to establish and maintain social boundaries (Esler 1994: 141; with some modification also Barclay 1995: 117). This particular theory is helpful because it shows that people can be labelled as deviants, and treated as such, simply based on the way that their actions are perceived. Provided that their actions are seen to violate the norms and values of the dominant group, so that they constitute a threat to that group, it does not matter whether they have actually done what they are said to have done.

In light of this, it would appear that the popular perception of Christians as engaged in immoral and illicit activity involves stereotypic thinking. The specific accusations (such as cannibalism, incest and magic) should be seen as examples of deviance labels. As such, they do not require any basis in 'reality'. Rather, they simply function to label those so accused as anti-social, in order to strengthen the boundaries within society and exert social control. That these accusations against the Christians are deviance labels becomes quite apparent when we look at the similar accusations that were made against other individuals and groups. These same accusations were extremely common, and in many cases it is quite apparent that they were levelled in the absence of any teachings or practices that could have been misunderstood (see McGowan 1994: 413–14).

For example, Lucius Catilinus and his co-conspirators were accused of incest, human sacrifice and cannibalism. Sallust claims that they drank blood to seal their conspiracy, whereas Dio Cassius accuses them of sacrificing a child and eating his intestines (Sallust, Catiline 22; Dio, 37.30; see also Benko 1984: 61; McGowan 1994: 431). Plutarch goes even further. He claims that Catilinus had 'once been accused of raping his own daughter and of murdering his own brother' and 'had corrupted a large number of the city's youth', but together with his co-conspirators had taken oaths among themselves, one of which involved sacrificing a man and eating his flesh (Cic. 865–6).

Such accusations were common against those suspected of conspiracy (Corbett 1997: 849; MacDonald 1997: 60; Wagemakers 2010: 352–3). Cicero makes an accusation of cannibalism against another political opponent (Cic., In Vatinium interrogatio 6.14; see McGowan 1994: 432). Such accusations were also levelled against Apollonius of Tyana who, with his associates, was said by Domitian to have 'sacrificed a boy in order to foresee the future' (Philostr., Vita Apollonii 7.9; see also McGowan 1994: 432). Apuleius was brought to trial on charges of practising magic simply because he had married a wealthy widow in a town where he was an outsider (Apul., Apologia 25–8, 42–7; see also Kolenkow 1976: 108–9; Remus 1983: 70; de Vos 1999b). Agrippina was accused of adultery and using magic by someone who, Tacitus suggests, was simply trying to make a name for himself (Tac., Annals 4.52). It is doubtful that these accusation can be attributed to 'misunderstanding'.

Furthermore, other religious groups were accused of cannibalism (Wagemakers 2010: 351–2). Many foreign nations were suspected of practices such as human sacrifice, cannibalism and incest – especially those on the fringes of the civilised (that is, the Graeco-Roman) world. For example, accusations of cannibalism and/or child sacrifice were levelled against most African tribes, some Egyptian tribes, some Gallic tribes (especially the Druids), Scythians, Carthaginians and the people of the Caucuses region.[21] Indeed, Aristotle claimed that 'there are many foreign races that tend toward murder and cannibalism' (Politics 8.3.4). Similarly, Pliny the Elder asserts that:

> [s]ome Scythian tribes, indeed most of them, feed on human flesh – a > claim that may seem unbelievable if we do not consider that races of > this ominous character have lived in the central part of the world, > named Cyclopes and Laestrygones, and that until relatively recently the > tribes just beyond the Alps routinely practised human sacrifice.
>
> (N.H. 7.9–10)

Accusations of incest were made against most devotees of eastern religions (Benko 1984: 22, 62). Christians also made these same accusations against heterodox groups in the second century, particularly Gnostics (Iren., Adversus Haereses 1.25; 2.31; Hippolytus, Refutation of All Heresies 7.32; Clement, Str. 3.2.10; see also De Ste. Croix 1963: 20–1; Frend 1967: 188; Benko 1984: 65–6, 71; MacDonald 1997: 59–64; Wagemakers 2010: 344–5).

There are also numerous examples of individuals or groups who were accused of practising magic.[22] Furthermore, ritual murder was also commonly associated with the practice of magic (Benko 1984: 60–1). In fact, accusations of magic and conspiracy were traditionally linked in Graeco-Roman thought with secret nocturnal rituals. Since the Christians practised the latter, it would simply have been assumed that they practised the former.[23]

Rather than attributing many of the popular Graeco-Roman accusations against Christians (such as incest, illicit sexual behaviour, cannibalism, human sacrifice and the practice of magic) to mis-understanding, they should be seen as the stereotypic charges levelled against those who were perceived to threaten society. In other words, they were used to label those perceived to be devi-ants (Salzman 2010: 189). Therefore, while those who claim that the accusations against the early Christians were based on misunderstanding and assumed that they were regarded as anti-social because they were thought to engage in such activity, it is more likely that because the Christians were regarded as anti-social it was assumed that they would engage in such activity. The popular perception of and accusations against Christians simply reflect the stereotypic way that Graeco-Roman society described those who were perceived to be 'outsiders' and threats to their society.[24] Overall, it seems quite clear that Christians were resented by ordinary Greeks and Romans because they were dangerously deviant.

Conclusion

On the whole, it would appear that ordinary Greeks and Romans disliked and resented Christians because of the threat that they posed to society. Christians rejected the traditional gods and cults (including the imperial cult), an action that was believed to harm people's very livelihoods and welfare. They split families and households, thereby damaging the fundamental building-block of society. They were suspected (and accused) of engaging in magic and a range of illicit, immoral and criminal acts. Indeed, such anti-social attitudes and activities became synonymous with the very name of 'Christian'.

While scholars have attributed many of these accusations to misunderstanding, it is more likely that these were stereotypic accusations applied to those who were considered dangerous deviants. After all, these accusations were made over a long period of time – too long to be explained away as misunderstandings. Furthermore, similar accusations were also made against other individuals and groups who were perceived to be threats to Graeco-Roman society. When understood in terms of deviance labels, it is also clear that there need not have been any specific basis to these accusations, apart from the perception of anti-social behaviour on the part of ordinary Greeks and Romans who made them.

Notes

1 De Ste. Croix 1963: 6–7; Krodel 1971: 261; Lane Fox 1986: 423, 450; Garnsey and Saller 1987: 174; Barnes 1991: 236–7; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 194–5; Williams 1997: 896; Williams 2012: 282–5; Wypustek 1997: 276; Friesen 2001: 143–4; Clark 2004: 6; Blount 2009: 11; Koester 2009: 6; Salzman 2010: 186, 190.

2 Benko 1984: 7–8; Lane Fox 1986: 425; Johnson 1988: 417; Phillips 1991: 263–4; de Vos 1999b; Williams 2012: 284–5.

3 See Frend 1967: 156–7; Collins 1984: 98; Downing 1988: 115; Slater 1998: 245; see also Euseb., Hist. Eccl. 5.1.7; Athenagoras, Leg. pro Christ. 1.

4 See de Vos 1999a: 35–8; see also Wilken 1984: 63–5; Goppelt 1993: 39–40; Achtemeier 1996: 282–5; Kraybill 1996: 52; Slater 1998: 244, 250–1; Oakes 2001: 89–91; Blount 2009: 8–14; Carter 2009: 36–7, 44.

5 See Cuss 1974: 96–101; Price 1984: 252–65; Esler 1994: 132; Slater 1998: 253; Friesen 2001: 145–6; Blount 2009: 249; Cook 2011: 249.

6 See Cuss 1974: 77, 84; Collins 1984: 101; Price 1984: 78–9; Friesen 1995: 249–50; Achtemeier 1996: 285; Kraybill 1996: 29–34; Slater 1998: 238.

7 Thompson 1990: 161–2; Kraybill 1996: 29, 53; de Vos 1999a: 35–6.

8 Downing 1988: 115; Goppelt 1993: 39–41, 327; Achtemeier 1996: 28–9; Slater 1998: 243; Blount 2009: 71; Cook 2011: 223.

9 See De Ste. Croix 1963: 8; MacMullen 1992 [1966]: 142; Frend 1967: 124, 155; Krodel 1971: 259; Cuss 1974: 149; Barnes 1991: 231; Goppelt 1993: 43; Sordi 1994 [1988]: 31; Slater 1998: 247–8; Green 2010: 50–1; Williams 2012: 279–83.

10 See also De Ste. Croix 1964: 31; Frend 1967: 195; Krodel 1971: 259; Janssen 1979: 151–4; Benko 1980: 1090–1, 1984: 24, 60–70, 98; Cunningham 1982: 8; Lane Fox 1986: 427; Wagner 1994: 133; MacDonald 1997: 64–72; Reasoner 1997: 911; Wypustek 1997: 277; Clark 2004: 20; Wagemakers 2010: 337–8.

11 See also Frend 1979: 35; Benko 1984: 46; MacDonald 1997: 64; Clark 2004: 20.

12 See Aune 1980: 1545; Remus 1983: 60; Benko 1984: 113–19; Wypustek 1997: 282; de Vos 1999b; see also Tertullian, Ad Uxorem 2.5.

13 See also Frend 1967: 200; Janssen 1979: 151–4; Cunningham 1982: 8; Wagner 1994: 132; Wypustek 1997: 277; Clark 2004: 6–9.

14 So Frend 1967: 177, 198; Reasoner 1997: 912; Williams 1997: 897.

15 See also De Ste. Croix 1963: 10; Lane Fox 1986: 426; even Price 1984: 221.

16 Cuss 1974: 158; Friesen 1993: 154, 166; Bowersock 1995: 48; see also Price 1984: 73–83, 111–12, 123–4.

17 See also Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14.

18 Aune 1980: 1545; Remus 1983: 60; Benko 1984: 12, 24, 113–19; Wypustek 1997: 282.

19 Minucius Felix, Oct. 8.4–5; 9.4; see also Remus 1983: 60; Benko 1984: 10–12, 125–6.

20 See, for example, Malina and Neyrey 1991: 97–122; Barclay 1995: 114–27; de Vos 1999b; Still 1999: 94–104.

21 See Min. Fel., Oct. 30.3–4; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. 6.25; Herodotus, Histories 1.216; 3.38, 99; 4.26, 64, 106; Strabo, Geog. 15.1.56; and also Benko 1984: 17, 61–6; Collins 1984: 87; McGowan 1994: 425–6, 431.

22 For example, Tert., De virginibus velandis 15.1; De spectaculis 2.8; De pudicitia 5.11; Tacit., Ann. 2.69; Plut., Conjug. praec. 141B; Dion. 3.3; see also Aune 1980: 1523; Remus 1983: 52.

23 Min. Fel., Oct. 8.4–5; 9.4; Pliny, Ep. 10.96; Apul., Met. 9.14; see also Remus 1983: 60; Benko 1984: 10–12, 125–6.

24 See Wilken 1984: 31–2; McGowan 1994: 433–4; MacDonald 1997: 60; Slater 1998: 246.

Bibliography

Primary sources

Ehrman, B. D. (1998) The New Testament and Other Early Christian Writings: A Reader. New York: Oxford University Press.

MacMullen, R. and Lane, E. N. (eds) (1992) Paganism and Christianity 100–425 C.E.: A Sourcebook. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Shelton, J.-A. (ed.) (1988) As the Romans Did: A Sourcebook in Roman Social History. New York: Oxford University Press.

Stevenson, J. (ed.) (1957) A New Eusebius: Documents Illustrative of the History of the Church to A.D. 337. London: SPCK.

Secondary sources

Achtemeier, P. J. (1996) 1 Peter. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Aune, D. E. (1980) 'Magic in early Christianity', in Haase, W. and Temporini, H. (eds) Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt 2. 23(2): 1507–57. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Baker, D. (ed.) (1979) The Church in Town and Countryside. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Balch, D. L. (2004) 'Rich Pompeiian houses, shops for rent, and the huge apartment building in Herculaneum as typical spaces for Pauline house churches', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 27: 27–46.

Barclay, J. M. G. (1995) 'Deviance and apostasy: Some applications of deviance theory to first-century Judaism and Christianity', in Esler 1995: 114–27.

Barnes, T. D. (1991) 'Pagan perceptions of Christianity', in Hazlett 1991: 231–43.

Benko, S. (1980) 'Pagan criticism of Christianity during the first two centuries AD', in Haase, W. and Temporini, H. (eds) Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt 2. 23(2): 1055–118. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Benko, S. (1984) Pagan Rome and the Early Christians. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press.

Benko, S. and O'Rourke, J. J. (eds) (1971) The Catacombs and the Colosseum. Valley Forge, PA: Judson.

Blount, B. K. (2009) Revelation: A Commentary. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox.

Bowersock, G. W. (1995) Martyrdom and Rome. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Brinks, C. L. (2009) '"Great is Artemis of the Ephesians": Acts 19:23–41 in light of goddess worship in Ephesus', Catholic Biblical Quarterly 71: 776–94.

Carter, W. C. (2009) 'Accommodating "Jezebel" and withdrawing John: Negotiating empire in Revelation then and now', Interpretation 63: 32–47.

Caulley, T. S. (2011) 'The title Christianos and Roman imperial cult', Restoration Quarterly 53: 193–206.

Clark, G. (2004) Christianity and Roman Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Collins, A. Y. (1984) Crisis and Catharsis: The Power of the Apocalypse. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster.

Cook, J. G. (2011) Roman Attitudes towards the Christians: From Claudius to Hadrian. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Corbett, J. H. (1997) 'Paganism and Christianity', in Ferguson and McHugh 1997: 848–51.

Crook, Z. A. (2004) Reconceptualising Conversion: Patronage, Loyalty, and Conversion in the Religions of the Ancient Mediterranean. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter.

Cunningham, A. (1982) The Early Church and State. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Cuss, D. (1974) Imperial Cult and Honorary Terms in the New Testament. Fribourg, Switzerland: Fribourg University Press.

De Ste. Croix, G. E. M. (1963) 'Why were the early Christians persecuted?', Past and Present 26: 6–31.

De Ste. Croix, G. E. M. (1964) 'Why were the early Christians persecuted – A rejoinder', Past and Present 27: 28–33.

de Vos, C. S. (1999a) Church and Community Conflicts: The Relationships of the Thessalonian, Corinthian and Philippian Churches with their Wider Civic Communities. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

de Vos, C. S. (1999b) 'Finding a charge that fits: The accusation against Paul and Silas at Philippi (Acts 16.19–21)', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 74: 51–63.

de Vos, C. S. (2001) 'Once a slave, always a slave?: Slavery, manumission, and relational patterns in Paul's letter to Philemon', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 82: 89–105.

Downing, F. G. (1988) 'Pliny's prosecutions of Christians: Revelation and 1 Peter', Journal for the Study of the New Testament 34: 105–23.

Elliott, J. H. (1986) '1 Peter, its situation and strategy: A discussion with David Balch', in Talbert 1986: 61–78.

Esler, P. F. (1994) The First Christians in their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. London: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (ed.) (1995) Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context. London: Routledge.

Faraone, C. A. and Obbink, D. (eds) (1991) Magika Hiera: Ancient Greek Magic and Religion. New York: Oxford University Press.

Ferguson, E. and McHugh, M. P. (eds) (1997) Encyclopaedia of Early Christianity. 2nd ed. vol. 2. New York: Garland.

Frend, W. H. C. (1967) Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church. New York: New York University Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1979) 'Town and countryside in early Christianity', in Baker 1979: 25–42.

Frend, W. H. C. (1987) 'Prelude to the Great Persecution', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 38: 1–18.

Friesen, S. J. (1993) Twice Neokoros: Ephesus, Asia and the Cult of the Flavian Imperial Family. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Friesen, S. J. (1995) 'The cult of the Roman emperors in Ephesos: Temple wardens, city titles, and the interpretation of the Revelation of John', in Koester 1995: 229–50.

Friesen, S. J. (2001) Imperial Cults and the Apocalypse of John. New York: Oxford University Press.

Frilingos, C. A. (2004) Spectacles of Empire: Monsters, Martyrs, and the Book of Revelation. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Garnsey, P. and Saller, R. P. (1987) The Roman Empire: Economy, Society and Culture. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Gaventa, B. R. (2003) Acts. Nashville, TN: Abingdon.

Goppelt, L. (1993) A Commentary on 1 Peter. Trans J. E. Alsup. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Green, B. (2010) Christianity in Ancient Rome: The First Three Centuries. London: T&T Clark.

Harvey, S. A. and Hunter, D. G. (eds) (2010) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hazlett, I. (ed.) (1991) Early Christianity: Origins and Evolution to AD 600. London: SPCK.

Horrell, D. G. (2004) 'Domestic space and Christian meetings at Corinth: Imagining new contexts and the buildings east of the theatre', New Testament Studies 50: 349–69.

Janssen, L. F. (1979) '"Superstitio" and the persecutions of the Christians', Vigiliae Christianae 33: 131–59.

Johnson, G. J. (1988) 'De conspiratione delatorum: Pliny and the Christians revisited', Latomus 47: 417–22.

Klutz, T. E. (ed.) (2003) Magic in the Biblical World. London: T&T Clark.

Koester, C. R. (2009) 'Revelation's visionary challenge to ordinary empire', Interpretation 63: 5–18.

Koester, H. (ed.) (1995) Ephesos: Metropolis of Asia. An Interdisciplinary Approach to its Archaeology, Religion, and Culture. Valley Forge, PA: TPI.

Kolenkow, A. B. (1976) 'A problem of power: How miracle-doers counter charges of magic in the Hellenistic world', Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers 1976: 105–10.

Kraybill, J. N. (1996) Imperial Cult and Commerce in John's Apocalypse. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press.

Krodel, G. (1971) 'Persecution and toleration of Christianity until Hadrian', in Benko and O'Rourke 1971: 255–67.

Lane Fox, R. (1986) Pagans and Christians. New York: Viking.

MacDonald, M. Y. (1997) Early Christian Women and Pagan Opinion: The Power of the Hysterical Woman. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

MacMullen, R. (1992 [1966]) Enemies of the Roman Order: Treason, Unrest and Alienation in the Empire. London: Routledge.

Malina, B. J. and Neyrey, J. H. (1991) 'Conflict in Luke-Acts: Labelling and deviance theory', in Neyrey 1991: 97–122.

Malina, B. J. and Neyrey, J. H. (1996) Portraits of Paul: An Archaeology of Ancient Personality. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Martin, R. P. and Davids, P. H. (eds) (1997) Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Development. Downer's Grove, IL: IVP.

McGowan, A. B. (1994) 'Eating people: Accusations of cannibalism against Christians in the second century', Journal of Early Christian Studies 2: 413–42.

Neyrey, J. H. (ed.) (1991) The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Oakes, P. (2001) Philippians: From People to Letter. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Parsons, M. C. (2006) Body and Character in Luke and Acts. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker.

Phillips, C. R. (1991) 'Nullum Crimen sine Lege: Socioreligious Sanctions on Magic', in Faraone and Obbink 1991: 260–76.

Price, S. R. F. (1984) Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Reasoner, M. (1997) 'Persecution', in Martin and Davids 1997: 907–14.

Reimer, A. (2003) 'Virtual prison breaks: Non-escape narratives and the definition of "magic"', in Klutz 2003: 125–39.

Remus, H. (1983) Pagan-Christian Conflict over Miracle in the Second-Century. Cambridge, MA: Philadelphia Patristics Foundation.

Rives, J. B. (2003) 'Magic in Roman law: The reconstruction of a crime', Classical Antiquity 22: 313–39.

Salzman, M. R. (2010) 'Pagans and Christians', in Harvey and Hunter 2010: 186–202.

Slater, T. B. (1998) 'On the social setting of the Revelation to John', New Testament Studies 44: 232–56.

Sordi, M. (1994 [1988]) The Christians and the Roman Empire. Trans A. Bedini. London: Routledge.

Still, T. D. (1999) Conflict at Thessalonica: A Pauline Church and its Neighbours. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press.

Stoops Jr., R. F. (1989) 'Riot and assembly: The social context of Acts 19:23–41', Journal of Biblical Literature 108: 73–91.

Talbert, C. H. (ed.) (1986) Perspectives on First Peter. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Thompson, L. L. (1990) The Book of Revelation: Apocalypse and Empire. New York: Oxford University Press.

Wagemakers, B. (2010) 'Incest, infanticide and cannibalism: Anti-Christian imputations in the Roman empire', Greece and Rome 57: 337–54.

Wagner, W. H. (1994) After the Apostles: Christianity in the Second Century. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Wilken, R. L. (1984) The Christians as the Romans Saw Them. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Williams, R. L. (1997) 'Persecution', in Ferguson and McHugh 1997: 895–9.

Williams, T. B. (2012) 'Suffering from a critical oversight: The persecutions of I Peter within modern scholarship', Currents in Biblical Research 10: 275–92.

Wypustek, A. (1997) 'Magic, Montanism, Perpetua, and the Severan Persecution', Vigiliae Christianae 51: 276–97.

PART IX

Internal challenges

41

INTERNAL RENEWAL AND DISSENT IN THE EARLY CHRISTIAN WORLD

Sheila E. McGinn

Perhaps one of the most significant debates of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries among scholars of early Christianity is the extent to which it is appropriate to speak of 'orthodoxy' and 'heresy' before the Council of Nicea (325 CE). The rise of historical criticism and its application to the development of doctrine shattered scholars' former straightforward assumption of the canon of Vincent of Lerins—that orthodoxy is what was believed by everyone, everywhere, at every time. Before many had come to terms with the evidence calling this assumption into question, a second and more significant challenge was raised by the German scholar Walter Bauer. In his Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum (Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, 1934), Bauer called into question even the more modest assumption retained by late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century scholars that orthodoxy was the common faith from which heretics then diverged. On the contrary, Bauer argued, heresy came first and then orthodoxy.

The working assumption of the priority of orthodoxy, however, was not easily unseated. Its durability is illustrated by the fact that it took an entire generation before Bauer's challenge really gained much attention. Not until the mid 1960s did Bauer's work reach international recognition with its second German edition (1964), and then its English translation (1971). Prior to this, most scholars seem to have ignored it in the hope that its challenge would go away.

Such a substantial critique of the former scholarly approach could not be brushed aside forever. With the rise of 'engaged' scholarship in the seventies (for example, in liberation theology and feminist hermeneutics), many began to press the question of what social, economic, and political factors may have influenced the doctrinal controversies of the first Christian centuries. Ecclesiastical decisions privileging certain doctrines over others were no longer viewed in a theological vacuum, but came to be seen in the context of wider social processes. All this transpired just as Bauer's work was finding a wider audience.

The title of this essay illustrates how far the pendulum has swung. Less than a generation ago, this section of a volume on the early Christian world would have been entitled 'Heresy and heresies.' Now the discussion is set in the framework of 'Internal renewal and dissent in the early Christian world.' Individual movements still are given their traditional names—Gnosticism, Montanism, Donatism, and Arianism—although without attempting to prejudge the question of their propriety, which currently itself is a matter of considerable debate, as the subsequent four essays in this volume will show. On the other hand, Darrell Bock recently argued (2006) against the notion that Gnostic gospels represent an original Christianity that was later suppressed. The positive reception for this book suggests a continuing reticence on the part of many scholars when it comes to redefining early Christian 'boundaries'.

While 'renewal' (a revival of a previously accepted practice) is a less controversial subject, some scholars of early Christianity (traditionally known as 'patristics') bemoan the recent interest in 'heresy.' The scholarly shift away from privileging conciliar decisions and statements of the 'Fathers of the Church' is seen as bad enough, but at least it is understandable given the application of historical–critical methods to studies of this early literature. However, what has developed, they claim, is not an even–handed historical analysis, but rather the privileging of the heretics (e.g., Henry 1982: 124).

Given the significance of the present debate and the breadth of evidence being adduced, attempting to summarize the sea of current thinking feels somewhat like walking on water. Nevertheless, a few broad strokes can be drawn, as long as one remembers that such generalizations will always have their exceptions in specific cases.

Insiders and outsiders

'Heretics,' according to the traditional definition, are 'outsiders,' those who have gone beyond the boundaries of the true faith. The Vincentian canon stipulated that 'orthodoxy' is what has been believed in the church by everyone, in every place, throughout time. Thus, if one adheres to some other kind of belief, by definition that places the person 'outside' the church. According to this view, there can be no such thing as 'internal dissent' in doctrinal matters, since a belief contrary to the established or majority view defines a person as 'outside' the church. Even after the rise of modern historical methods and the advent of a critical approach to doctrinal developments, this canon remained unchallenged for quite some time. Throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Church historians often simply repeated the sentence of their uncritical forebears when it came to determining 'orthodoxy' of insiders and the 'heterodoxy' or 'heresy' of 'outsiders.'

One of the first signs that this uncritical dike was beginning to leak came in 1881 with G. Nathanael Bonwetsch's Die Geschichte des Montanismus (The History of Montanism). Bonwetsch noted a shift in scholarly assessment of whether Tertullian had been a heretic, and he attributed this shift as sparking a reassessment of whether the Montanist movement was heretical or not. The question itself attested to an increasing awareness that ancient authors labeled as 'heretical' both

Degeneration/Departure

HERESY/
'OUTSIDERS'

ORTHODOXY/'INSIDERS'
Figure 41.1　Orthodoxy and heresy in early Christianity as constituted by insiders and outsiders movements that were doctrinally at variance with 'the great church' as well as ones that evidenced no such doctrinal variations, but rather showed variations in ecclesiastical practice or discipline. Hence, scholars began to distinguish between 'heresy' as divergences from the belief system of 'the great church' and 'schism' as divergences in practice or discipline. Of course, at the same time, although they were often not cognizant of the significance of this language shift, they began to develop a new mapping of 'insiders' and 'outsiders' in the history of early Christianity. And with this boundary shift began a new paradigm shift in the historical approach to opposing views in early Christianity.

The recognition of 'schism' as a distinct category from 'heresy' blurred the once clear boundary between 'insiders' and 'outsiders.' In the past, it was assumed that all those who were 'insiders' must have believed the same doctrines, worshiped in the same ways, followed the same disciplinary practices, and accepted the same leadership models. Any recognizable variation on these points was taken as a sign of being an 'outsider' to the great church—a heretic. Now it was argued that doctrine alone provided the dividing line between the 'insiders' versus the 'outsiders.' One potentially could find a set of believers who engaged in different rituals, followed different disciplinary practices and also lived under a totally different ecclesiastical leadership structure than the great church, and yet evaluate them as 'insiders'—as long as there was no evidence of doctrinal disagreement. Thus was born the notion of internal 'dissent' or renewal as an historical reality for early Christianity.

It is perhaps not coincidental that this paradigm shift in evaluating early Christianity occurred toward the middle of the twentieth century, when there was a concomitant shift taking place in the relationships among major Christian denominations. The rise of the 'ecumenical' movement and of 'interfaith' dialogue among Catholics, Orthodox, Anglicans, and Lutherans, among others, shows the fruits of the ressourcement movement, where historians took a fresh look at Christian origins and what light the historical sources from the formative period might be able to provide for the life of the contemporary church. The pastoral effect of the historians' paradigm shift was the eventual recognition among different Christian groups that this is precisely what they were—different groups within Christianity, rather than one Christian Church assailed by many heretical groups.

The post-war period also evidenced a growing awareness of the social and political uses (and abuses) of religion. The manipulation of the German ecclesiastical structure by the Nazi powers was lamented as one of the more serious causes of the Holocaust. The devastating, immoral, social, and political effects of the branding of one group as 'heretics' and 'outsiders' could no longer be ignored. This gave church historians an added impetus to seek out the origins of such labels, as well as their social and political uses, and reassess their validity.

Early Christian trajectories

A watershed of this new discussion was the 1971 work of James M. Robinson and Helmut Koester, Trajectories Through Early Christianity, where they laid out the evidence for early Christianity being a multiform reality, with differing characteristics dependent upon the geographical, social, and cultural location in which it was found. At almost the same time, Robert Wilken directly confronted the Vincentian canon in The Myth of Christian Beginnings (1971). These studies were followed almost immediately by a wave of discussions of diversity in the early church, and even in the New Testament itself, as in James Dunn's 1977 work, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament. Koester furthered the argument for the diversity of the early Christian movement in his two-volume New Testament introduction (1982), breaking one further barrier by including apocryphal writings contemporaneous to the New Testament materials. Within two decades, what was taken for granted in discussions of the New Testament texts was no longer their consistency, but rather their variety; the unity of their thought was what required an argument (see Reumann 1991 and Achtemeier 1987).

Perhaps the most significant feature thereby raised in the 'orthodoxy v. heresy' discussions in the last quarter of the twentieth century has been the oft-repeated question of 'by whom are they considered heretics?' None of the extant literature of early Christianity claims the title heretic for its author; on the contrary, each author views her/himself as teaching true doctrine. If a 'false doctrine, is in view, it is that taught by others who are stigmatized as 'outsiders' to the teacher's group. The dynamic of 'insiders' (those who know the truth) versus 'outsiders' (those who teach and believe falsely) has been previously noted. These categories remained unquestioned before the late nineteenth century. Even when the categories began to be challenged, the 'insider' v. 'outsider' distinction remained inviolate; for decades afterwards, it was still taken by most scholars as descriptive of the historical situation rather than being viewed as prescriptive for the ancient audience. But eventually the socio-logical and political dimensions of this language were noticed, and scholars began to undertake a serious analysis of its significance.
Figure 41.2   Christianities in the New Testament and related literature

The new 'theologies of liberation' both arose out of and expanded upon this social and political analysis. Sociologist George Zito summarizes the common view of liberation theologians, as well as of many contemporary historians of early Christianity, when he explains that the heretical status of an articulated opinion is determined by an institutional process of legitimation by the discourse within which a heresy is voiced (1983). 'Heresy' is a thought-world that threatens established power rela-tions, whether ecclesiastical or political. In short, scholars must recognize that speech is contextual and perspectival; whether overtly or covertly, it both expresses and reinforces group boundaries. One can no longer speak simply of orthodoxy and heresy without defining whose orthodoxy or whose her-esy. And the determination of which view will become orthodoxy is not only a theological process, but a social and political one as well.

Framing the discussion of theological trends or movements within early Christianity as a question of 'internal renewal and dissent'—rather than of 'orthodoxy versus heresy'—presumes this paradigm shift from the notion of a universal Christianity with uniformity of belief and practice to that of an ecumenical Christianity with some consistent patterns as well as distinctive features in every place where it was found. The boundaries between 'insider' and 'outsider' become very hazy indeed. If we suspect as prescriptive, rather than descriptive, the statements of ancient authors who charge another group with 'heresy,' then the only boundary guidelines that remain are those that are self-selected by the groups themselves. This shift of the burden of proof is one of the developments that troubles scholars such as Henry (1982). And unsettling it well may be, for it certainly has complicated the issues. It has broadened the scope of early Christianity so much that most scholars today speak of 'early Christianities' rather than referring to a singular, univocal description of the movement.
Figure 41.3 Christianities in the first four Roman centuries

In this context, the notion of 'internal renewal and dissent' comes to have two meanings. In the broadest sense, it simply refers to the pluralism that we find among these different trajectories of early Christianity due to their varied geographical, social, and cultural contexts—whether or not there actually seems to have been any overt historical conflict over these different developments of the Christian movement. In the second place, it refers to the actual differences of opinion that did indeed arise among various sectors of Christianity in its formative period.

Re-visioning the past

While the terms 'renewal' and 'dissent' may imply a prior standard to which one wants to return or from which one wishes to diverge, they need not be read that way. On the contrary, the scholarly consensus at this point seems to be that variety preceded the development of a universal standard among the early churches. Taking into account the gradual development of agreement on issues of doctrine and practice, what appears in retrospect as 'dissent' originated as one option among many, each of which over time rose or fell in popularity and persuasiveness. Only after one of these alternatives becomes the dominant view can we see the other alternatives as 'dissenting' (see Bauer 1972). Similarly, what in retrospect appears as an 'internal renewal' movement (e.g., the New Prophecy or 'Montanism') may well have begun as one viable option maintained by one group within the many churches, or dominant in one particular geographical region, and then later to have spread to other sectors of the church. Each case must be decided on its own grounds.

The remainder of this chapter is devoted to four examples of how such alternative approaches might change the way we envision the earliest history of Christianity. To attain a sense of how powerful this paradigm shift might be, I have taken examples from across the spectrum of the early Christian movement: a case of orthodoxy, a case of heresy, a case of schism and a true 'outsider' group.

The first example is from an 'orthodox' movement and leader, to see how our picture of orthodoxy changes if we re-contextualize this particular trajectory within it. Paul of Tarsus and Pauline Christianity (considered in detail in Chapter 7 of this volume) provide a perfect case study, because Paul's teaching often is seen as the hallmark of orthodoxy; indeed, Paul sometimes has been considered 'the founder of Christianity' itself. If Paulinism is viewed as one of the many choices in first-century Christianity, how does this change our understanding of Paul's teaching and practice? What if Paulinism is no longer the hallmark of the 'insider' but rather a version of Christianity that may have been 'outside' the mainstream?

The second example is Gnosticism (see Chapter 42 of this volume), a movement traditionally understood as a heresy. But what would we find if we tried to understand Gnosticism as simply one of the many alternatives available during the formative period of Christianity? What would the Christians labeled as Gnostics tell us about Christian faith and life if we viewed them as Christians rather than as 'Gnostics?'

Next, we will turn to Montanism (see Chapter 43 of this volume), a late second-century prophetic movement which its earliest opponents labeled a heresy, but which since has been understood as a schism. What difference does it make if we construe Montanism as a renewal movement within early Christianity, rather than a movement breaking away from early Christianity? Renewal means a revival of some lost practice and/or belief from the past. If Montanism really was a renewal movement, what was it that the Montanists saw being lost to early Christianity that needed to be recovered? Finally, Manichaeism represents the example of a true 'outsider' group, a distinctive religion in its own right, which provides competition for Christianity in the third century and beyond.

Paul of Tarsus, the first dissident

Antique historians and heresiologists (e.g., Irenaeus of Lyons, Eusebius of Caesarea) viewed Simon Magus as 'the first author of all heresy' (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 2.13.5; cf. Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses 1.23.1) but Gerd Lüdemann (1996) was among the first to challenge this view. Following up on a comment of Walter Bauer (1971: 236, n.83), Lüdemann named Paul of Tarsus as 'The only heretic of the earliest period' (1996: 61). What he meant to emphasize, of course, is that the notion of 'heresy' is perspectival and contextual. Furthermore, given Paul's context in the first decades of the Christian movement, his views were divergent from the 'mainstream' understanding of what it meant to be a follower of the Messiah Jesus—assuming that one defines the 'mainstream' from the viewpoint of the mother church of Christianity, the Jerusalem church.

Figure 41.4   Paul, from a fourth-century fresco in a cave in Ephesus; Photo Sheila McGinn

Although we may demur from his label for Paul, Lüdemann's basic point is well taken. If we take into account the New Testament materials that pertain to Paul and his teachings, including Paul's own letters, it becomes clear that Paul is arguing for an alternative understanding of Christianity from what was dominant in the Jerusalem church of the 40s and 50s, and probably also in Rome as well. According to both Acts 15 and Galatians 2, the 'Council of Jerusalem' was convened at least in part to adjudicate between these two divergent presentations of the gospel. Acts 15:2 mentions that the reason for the meeting is 'dissension' between Paul and others. (Luke uses the term stasis, which can even mean 'revolt.') Clearly Paul believes that some Christians from Jerusalem are behind the 'Judaizing' troubles in Galatia, and he goes to great lengths to refute their position. In Galatians 2:11–14, Paul even mentions a later public confrontation with Peter in Antioch about the proper behavior in fellowship meetings, possibly indicating deep division between Paul on the one hand and Peter and James on the other (Esler 1998: 126–40). Whether Paul was successful among the Galatians, we do not know; but he seems never to have returned to Antioch after this incident with Peter, which suggests that Paul's view was not the winner in Syria. Neither does his apparent foreboding about his return to Jerusalem (in Rom. 15:30–32) bespeak a victory there.

We are left with a picture not of Paul as a spokesperson for the 'orthodox' or 'mainstream' view, but rather a marginalized Paul dissenting from the prevailing view, working from within—or perhaps along the fringes—for reform of an apparently well-established practice of having two ranks of converts, the first for men of Jewish origin and the second for women and Gentile men. This dissident Paul is castigated by many of his contemporaries for teaching an inadequate gospel and is even rejected for engaging in practices that are called idolatrous (e.g., Rev 2:14, 20; cf. 1 Corinthians 8)!

One hundred years later, this picture is dramatically changed (see, e.g., Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 19; 43; Tertullian, On Baptism 12:1; cf. Col 2:11–12). The gospel message was winning many more adherents among the Gentiles than the Jews, especially in regions like Roman Asia Minor and Egypt. No longer the minority voice, Paul's view on church practice has become the dominant one and the Jewish-Christian view has become the one marginalized. To achieve membership in the Christian movement, one must accept the faith of Christ and receive baptism; circumcision is no longer an issue. The question of male-female relations in the church is not so easily resolved, but Paul's argument for equal treatment of Jews and Gentile converts in the church has won the day. In fact, it is nearly a moot point given that the overwhelming majority of new Christians come from Gentile origins. Eventually, the hard-liners who want to retain a more Jewish identity as Christians, rather than labeling Paul, are themselves the ones who are labeled, and these 'Ebionites' gradually fade out of our historical picture.

Which is it to be, Paul as 'apostle to the Gentiles' or 'first among the heretics'? Was Paul of Tarsus an 'insider' or an 'outsider'? If we follow this new paradigm, then the answer must be 'both.' This is no mere equivocation, but rather a judgement imposed on us by the facts of the case. How we will use Paul's teachings in our time is a decision open to Christians of all stripes—laity, clerics, and theologians—but how to evaluate Paul in his own time is a historical judgement that must be faithful to the historical data. And, as discomfiting as it may be to us, the data do not agree. To many of his contemporaries, Paul was a dissident and troublemaker. Later believers saw him rather as a great teacher and visionary. They can both be 'right.' John Barclay (1995) has argued for the need to take the perspective of the observer into account in assessing how Paul (and other ancient Jews of questionable status) were regarded by their contemporaries.

For the most part, Paul's proponents were looking at the same features of Paul's theology as his detractors (e.g., the relationship between Torah and gospel; the circumcision question), but they evaluated these features differently because they came from different social and cultural contexts and, hence, were interested in fostering different social relations. Uncovering the context of their evaluations has provided greater depth and breadth to the historical understanding of early Christianity. This same kind of 'contextualizing' approach also is underway in the study of such movements as Gnosticism, Montanism, Donatism, and Arianism—movements that once were known as 'heresies.' If the first dissident, Paul, can become a valuable resource for later believers, perhaps we may yet glean at least some small insights from these other dissenting groups as well. And we certainly can discover why these groups, who viewed themselves as Christians, believed that their particular understanding of Christianity was preferable to the other options of the time.

What was it that the Gnostics knew?

One of the earliest attempts to read dissenting voices from their own point of view was Elaine Pagels' study of the Gnostics.[1] Most well known for her study, The Gnostic Gospels (1982), she already had published two earlier studies of Gnostic exegesis of New Testament materials (1973, 1975). In The Gnostic Gospels, Pagels begins with the assertion that, in addition to its religious or theological content, 'the doctrine of bodily resurrection also serves an essential political function: it legitimizes the authority of certain men who claim to exercise exclusive leadership over the churches as the successors of the apostle Peter' (Pagels 1982: 38; original emphasis). This is not because the resurrection per se supports a particular leadership structure, but because the canonical traditions show the resurrection message being validated by the witness of particular leading men (e.g., 1 Corinthians 15:3–8; Acts 1:21–22). The Gnostic gospels, on the other hand, promote a spiritualized understanding of Christ's resurrection that involves a 'direct, personal contact with the "living One" . . . [which] offers the ultimate criterion of truth, taking precedence over all second-hand testimony and all tradition' (Pagels 1982: 53). This notion of the resurrection, in giving pride of place to direct experience, thereby undercuts any possibility of developing an institutional structure of authority. The 'orthodox' view, on the other hand, centers on the validity of a past historical experience granted to certain of Jesus' earliest disciples; this necessarily makes those disciples and their experience an external criterion of truth, and thereby provides a solid ground on which to establish an institutional authority structure.

This notion that there are socio-political dynamics involved in 'heresy-making' has by now become commonplace in early Christian studies. This does not mean, however, that the only dynamics involved in these early Christian debates were social and or political in nature. Pagels, for example, certainly overstated the case in attributing exclusively political motives to the proponents of the 'bodily resurrection' view versus the Gnostics. Her assumption that the claim of bodily resurrection necessarily supports an androcentric, patriarchal church structure cannot be supported in the face of the resurrection stories in the canonical gospels, all of which have women witnesses. Furthermore, the original ending of Mark's Gospel (16:1–8a) reports the empty tomb, which presumably indicates a belief in the bodily resurrection of Christ, yet the only witnesses are said to have 'said nothing to anyone' (16:8) and no post-resurrection appearances of Jesus are reported. Hence, it seems possible to hold to the 'orthodox' view of bodily resurrection without the political motives Pagels outlines. Still, if somewhat reductionistic in her conclusions, nevertheless Pagels' point is well taken that more than theology was at stake in these debates. Religions are human social organizations and, as such, they include human structures of power that are legitimated by the religious ideology. Scholars now recognize that early Christianity is not an exception but rather a clear example of this rule.

So, what did the Gnostics know? First of all, they recognized that repeating stories of post-resurrection appearances of Jesus to certain individuals made those few individuals privileged witnesses to the resurrection event. Hence, telling such stories would be a means to proclaim the resurrection while also proclaiming the authority of those witnesses. Second, it seems reasonable to infer that the Gnostics recognized such a privileged status would generalize beyond authority concerning this one event to authority for interpreting the entire body of Jesus' teaching; no one else could experience the resurrected Lord the way these witnesses did, thus no one else could understand or teach the Lord's message as thoroughly as they did. Did they also envision that, third, this generalized authority would lead to a permanent, hierarchical rank for those witnesses—and, fourth, a similar authority for their 'successors' as well? This is less certain, although also possible—and they would have been right on all four points (see, e.g., Acts 2).

The Gnostics provided the following alternative to this scenario: (1) individuals become witnesses to the resurrection by means of a direct encounter with the Risen One; (2) thereby they become reliable witnesses both to the resurrection and to the entire body of Jesus' teaching; (3) although Pagels seems not to think so, it is possible that some individuals might even be granted a rank above others in the Gnostic church, due to the depth of their spiritual experience, their teaching ability, or some other distinguishing feature (cf. the importance of demonstrating charismatic gifts in 1 Corinthians 12–14). However, stage four in the preceding scenario could never take place; no one could 'succeed' someone in such an office, precisely because the office was based upon a direct experience of the foundational event of Christianity—the resurrection of the Lord. Each leader must begin with step one. And the leadership rank would not mean the same thing in the Gnostic church, for any member could become a leader; they all could expect to experience the resurrection in a direct and immediate way, regardless of teacher or training.

As with Paul, there are lessons to be learned from the Gnostics. The following are four that in fact have been taken up by different trajectories within Christianity, perhaps most noticeably since the Reformation period. First, the most powerful and compelling religious experience is 'unmediated'; it is an experience that believers have for themselves, rather than one that is reported to them. Second, for authenticity as a religious leader, it is necessary to have had this kind of compelling, first-hand experience. For example, to speak with authority as a leader of a Christian community, one must have had a personal experience of the Risen One. Third, hierarchical leadership is one model, but not the only model of leadership. Finally, leadership need not be limited on the basis of sex or other physical traits.

What did the New Prophecy reclaim?

The New Prophecy of Asia Minor (called 'Montanism' by its opponents—see Chapter 43 in this volume) was one example of a Christian movement that seems to have taken hold of these four lessons from Gnosticism, but without adopting the Gnostic context for them. Montanism appears on the scene in Asia Minor sometime during the third quarter of the second century. The movement originated in Phrygia, a region in the southwestern portion of the Roman province of Asia.[2] Three initial leaders are known by name: Maximilla, Montanus, and Priscilla. All three were prophets who seem to have had ecstatic experiences during worship, and who also gave prophetic speeches in discursive language. Several of their oracles survive, but none in their original context. A few are recorded by Tertullian of North Africa, but most appear only as fragments reported by anti-Montanist writers in order to refute them.

Montanism arose as a 'renewal movement' within the church to combat at least some of the teachings of Gnosticism. Over against a denial of the full humanity of Christ and of the historical reality of the resurrection, the surviving oracles proclaim the reality of Christ's incarnation and affirm a Trinitarian view of the Godhead (McGinn-Moorer 1989: 312–4). They insist on the salvation of 'the little ones' (not just a 'Gnostic' elect), the importance of moral discipline in the Christian life, and the value of martyrdom as a share in the power of Christ. Both of these latter were viewed by libertarian Gnostics as pointless acts, since they had to do with the flesh rather than the spirit.

The New Prophecy often was linked by its opponents with Gnosticism, however, because of the prophetic and gender-inclusive leadership patterns noted above. Also, like the Gnostics, the leaders of the New Prophecy cherished 'unmediated' religious experience, for their leadership roles were based upon their prophetic gifts. Most scholars of Montanism view their leadership structure as more egalitarian than hierarchical, particularly given that leaders were selected based upon a charismatic gift. Their leadership consisted in the ability to share that gift of prophecy with the Montanist community, not on any kind of inherited rank. Two of the three prophets were women, which illustrates that sex was not a criterion for selection of Montanist leaders. Neither do other inherent physical traits appear to have been used as selection criteria. We do find that Maximilla and Priscilla separated from their husbands, presumably to lead a celibate lifestyle, but this is a status choice rather than an inherent physical characteristic.

Figure 41.5   Rock-cut Byzantine monastery near Pepouza which may be the site of an ancient Montanist enclave; Photo Peter Lampe and Bill Tabbernee; for an enlarged view, see Figure 43.4, this volume

The New Prophecy looks like a 'renewal movement' in its lively worship, and especially in its focus on the continuing revelation of God through prophetic speech and visions, precisely because this is not an innovation but a return to (or continuation of) an earlier tradition. Many first- and second-century Christian texts speak of prophets, prophecy, preachers speaking under the influence of the Spirit of God, worship in the Spirit, and similar themes (see 1 Corinthians 11–14; Acts 2, 4, 9, etc.; Didache 10.7; 11.7). Clement of Rome (fl. 92–101) insists that his letter to Corinth is prompted by the Holy Spirit (First Epistle to the Corinthians 63.2); in the opening greeting of each of his letters, Ignatius of Antioch (35?–107) claims the title 'Theophorus'—God-bearer—because of his prophetic gifts (cf. his Epistle to the Philadelphians 7.2), and he encourages Polycarp of Smyrna (c. 70–156) to seek spiritual revelations (Epistle to Polycarp 2.2); the martyrs were known to have visions and revelations of Christ in their last hours (Martyrdom of Polycarp 2.2; 9.1), and even crowds of on-lookers were said to see miraculous visions (Martyrdom of Polycarp 15.1–2). The Shepherd of Hermas is even a full-blown second-century apocalypse, including visions and revelations. In such a context, the prophetic activity found in Montanism can certainly be no novelty. However, it can be a revival of prophecy and other manifestations of the Spirit in the face of a rising emphasis on an authoritative teaching tradition that is 'handed down' by word-of-mouth.

The New Prophecy may have been a threat to the 'orthodox' church not because of its novelty but precisely because it maintained or revived an older, prophetic tradition rather than giving way to the new hierarchical tradition of authoritative teachers. Montanist insistence on prophecy posed a similar threat as did Gnosticism because of its understanding of leadership as arising out of a specific and immediate religious experience—in this case, the experience of prophetic revelation. The charismatic nature of this experience did not lend itself to the kind of control which was sought by those who claimed the name 'orthodox.' Direct and new revelation could threaten the existing beliefs of the church, and certainly could not be controlled by human agents in the same way that a teaching tradition could be. In addition, the Montanists permitted women to lead prayer and worship, whereas the orthodox increasingly wanted to restrict these roles to influential men.

'Thus I refute the Manichees!'[3]

Manichæism arose during the mid third century CE in Sassanid Persia (see Chapter 46 of this work). Founded by the prophet Mani (c. 216–276 CE), the doctrine of the sect drew from various religious sources in the east, including Zoroastrianism, Gnosticism, and the Elkasaite sect of Christianity, in which Mani himself was raised. Mani seems to have viewed himself as the fulfillment of the Johannine promise of 'another Paraclete' (John 14:16) and his revelation as the ultimate religion, which encompassed and completed all the preceding revelations from Jesus, the Buddha, and Zoroaster. Thus, Manichæism likely represents the first syncretistic universalist religion in human history.

Like Zoroastrianism before it, Manichæism addressed the theodicy question basic to monotheistic religions by adopting a dualistic worldview. Monotheistic religions envision one good, just, and all-powerful deity. However, this construction of the divine reality tends to shipwreck on the problem of Evil: if God is all-powerful, good, and just, then why do the good suffer and the evil prosper? Is God incapable of eliminating evil? Then God is not all-powerful. If God has the power but permits evil to flourish, then God is not all-good or just. Religious dualism, on the other hand, resolves this conundrum by positing two divine principles, one good and one evil.

The good God (the 'Father of Greatness'), in Mani's understanding, is not all-powerful, but rather is engaged in an ongoing conflict with primal evil ('the King of Darkness'). This conflict plays out in the heavenly realm as well as on earth, which is why even good people experience evil. Such a dualist system provides a logical (if not very comforting) solution to the theodicy problem endemic to traditional monotheistic systems.

Such dualism on the divine level correlates to an ontological dualism whereby spiritual reality is viewed as good and material reality is viewed as evil. (As is common in dualistic systems, this dualism also is gendered, with the 'spiritual' realm viewed as masculine and the 'material' realm as 'feminine.') The material world comes about not as an act of free creation on the part of the one good God (as, for example, in Judaism) but rather as 'fallout' from the conflict between the two divine principles. That conflict continues to perdure in both the human and divine realms. The struggle between Good and Evil in the human realm reflects the same type of ongoing battle on the divine level.

Because material reality comprises the fallout from the conflict between Good and Evil, material objects are composed of 'evil' matter, but a spark of the Divine Good remains trapped within those material objects. The object of Manichæism is to liberate oneself from the grasp of materiality, and also to help liberate these divine sparks that are trapped in non-sentient material objects. All of life thereby becomes imbued with this divine task, so that even eating serves to liberate the divine sparks trapped in the fruits and vegetables consumed by the Manichæan elect. Eventually, the forces of good will be able to overthrow the forces of evil, but meanwhile the struggle rages on.

Manichæism spread to both east and west over the fourth through seventh centuries. In the west, it traversed the Roman empire and went so far as Spain, Dalmatia, and France; the medieval Cathars and Albigensians were the spiritual descendents of Manichæism. In the east, it became popular as far as China, where it lasted at least into the fourteenth century.[4]

Augustine of Hippo (354–430 CE), the most famous of erstwhile Manichees, initially was attracted by their rigorous lifestyle of abstinence and their philosophical interpretations of scriptural texts, especially those pertaining to cosmology. Eventually, however, he became disenchanted with many aspects of Manichæism, including their neglect of scientific evidence when it disagreed with their cosmology and their identification of the God of the Old Testament with the Evil Deity.[5]

Manichæism was never a Christian 'heresy' or even a dissenting movement; it began as and remained an independent, competing religious movement. Manichæism prompted Christians to reaffirm the goodness of the created realm, including human sexuality, and the dogma of the incarnation of the Divine Word in the fully human person of Jesus Christ. This notion of the Divine assuming 'fleshly' existence, abominable to Manichees and Gnostics alike, provided the Christian foundation for affirmation of the goodness of all creation and the value of the human body in the economy of salvation. It eventually provides the grounding for the entire sacramental system of Catholic Christianity, and the creation-centered spirituality of such figures as Francis of Assisi as well as contemporary eco-spirituality.

Something old, something new, something borrowed: which is true?

As can be seen from the preceding examples, the paradigm shift represented by this discussion of 'internal renewal and dissent' will have a profound impact on how we understand the development of 'the early Christian world.' Particularly in regard to doctrinal and institutional developments, the most significant difference which results from this change in assumptions—i.e., that there were a variety of early Christian models from the very beginning, rather than one, static reality—is that early Christians become much less alien than we thought. The history of early Christianity is a history of choices amid pluralism, not of a deus ex machina and an unthinking mob response. Some of these choices were later evaluated as orthodoxy, some as heresy, some as schism and some as another religion altogether. But such evaluative hindsight does not mean that any Christian chose heresy or schism. As today, believers followed their best lights, disagreed on significant issues, argued about them, and sometimes castigated, stereotyped, and marginalized those who disagreed with them. It remains important to learn what these early Christian groups borrowed from outsiders, revived from older traditions, or generated anew in light of their changing circumstances. Yet perhaps the most important thing we gain from this paradigm shift is that we now can learn how these diverse early Christian groups negotiated their differences, and what criteria they used to determine which of their old, new, and borrowed traditions would be retained for posterity. Whether we agree or disagree with their selections, whether we judge their decisions ultimately to be 'heresy' or 'orthodoxy,' understanding the decision-making process is at least as important as recognizing its outcome.

Whether or not we know this history, contemporary Christians are not merely repeating but also continuing this process of negotiating difference. We can do so blindly, or we can do it intentionally, with openness to the lessons of these early Christian 'dissenters' and innovators. Perhaps we can arrive not at the divisive judgements of 'heresy' or 'orthodoxy,' but rather at a unity of purpose and understanding that might have been—and still might be.

Notes

1 The term 'Gnosticism' derives from the Greek word, gnosis (knowledge), and refers to a religious–philosophical movement of pre-Christian origins that influenced formative Judaism and early Christianity in the first two centuries CE. While there appear to have been several strands of Gnosticism with somewhat divergent cosmologies and theologies, generally speaking the movement was marked by a radically dualistic worldview, with material reality classified as evil and spiritual reality as good. The Gnostic ideal was to gain spiritual enlightenment and escape from the evils of material existence.

2 Through the collaborative efforts of several scholars, the site of the Montanist Pepouza may have recently been discovered: see Tabbernee and Lampe 2008.

3 A popular story of Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274 CE) has him seated with guests at a banquet hosted by King Louis IX of France and interrupting the amiable conversation by slamming his fist on the table shouting, 'thus I refute the Manichees!' Apparently, the table conversation was not as interesting to Thomas as the centuries-old library debate about this eastern alternative to Christianity.

4 See Chapter 11, Herbert Christian Merillat, The Gnostic Apostle Thomas: 'Twin' of Jesus (1997), gnosis.org/thomasbook/ch11.html, hosted at the The Gnostic Society Library.

5 Ibid.

Bibliography

Achtemeier, P. J. (1987) The Quest for Unity in the New Testament Church. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Barclay, J. (1995) 'Deviance and apostasy: Some applications of deviance theory to first-century Judaism and Christianity,' in Esler 1995: 114–27.

Bauer, W. (1934) Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum. Tübingen, Germany. 2nd German ed., Strecker, G. (ed.), Tübingen: Mohr, 1964. English translation, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, Kraft, R. A. and Krodel, G. (eds) Philadelphia, PA, 1971; London, 1972.

Bock, D. L. (2006) The Missing Gospels: Unearthing the Truth Behind Alternative Christianities. Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson.

Bonwetsch, G. N. (1881) Die Geschichte des Montanismus. Erlangen, Germany: Andreas Deichert.

Dunn, J. D. G. (1977) Unity and Diversity in the New Testament. London: SCM Press.

Esler, P. F. (ed.) (1995) Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context. London and New York: Routledge.

Esler, P. F. (1998) Galatians. New Testament Readings. London and New York: Routledge.

Henry, P. (1982) 'Why is contemporary scholarship so enamored of ancient heretics?,' in Livingstone, E. A. (ed.) Studia Patristica 17, no. 1. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press, 123–6.

Koester, H. (1982) Introduction to the New Testament. Two volumes. New York: Walter de Gruyter.

Lüdemann, G. (1996), Heretics: The Other Side of Early Christianity. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox. (ET from the German Ketzer. Die Andere Seite des frühens Christentums. Stuttgart, Germany: Radius, 1995.)

McGinn, S. E. (1994) 'The Acts of Thecla,' in Fiorenza, E. S. (ed.) Searching the Scriptures, Vol. 2: A Feminist Commentary. 2 vols. New York: Crossroad, 800–28.

McGinn-Moorer, S. E. (1989) The new prophecy of Asia Minor and the rise of ecclesiastical patriarchy in second century Pauline traditions. PhD dissertation. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University.

Pagels, E. (1973) The Johannine Gospel in Gnostic Exegesis: Heracleon's Commentary on John. Nashville, TN: Abingdon.

Pagels, E. (1975) The Gnostic Paul: Gnostic Exegesis of the Pauline Letters. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Pagels, E. (1982) The Gnostic Gospels. Harmondsworth, UK and New York: Penguin; repr. from Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1980.

Reumann, J. (1991) Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Robinson, J. M. and Koester, H. (1971) Trajectories through Early Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Tabbernee, W. and Lampe, P. (2008) Pepouza and Tymion: The Discovery and Archaeological Exploration of a Lost Ancient City and an Imperial Estate. Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter.

Wilken, R. (1971) The Myth of Christian Beginnings. Garden City, NY: Doubleday; repr. The University of Notre Dame Press, 1980.

Zito, G. V. (1983) 'Toward a sociology of heresy,' Sociological Analysis 44: 123–30.

42

GNOSTICISM

Alastair H. B. Logan

Introduction

The early meanings of 'Gnosticism'

'Gnosticism' is the modern designation, coined by the English divine, Henry More (1614–87), for a religious movement or movements of late antiquity which claimed to possess a specific and superior type of knowledge, gnosis. This knowledge was of their origin in a heavenly world and fall into this lower world of evil, error and illusion, the handiwork of subordinate heavenly beings, and their awakening and return to that transcendent world through a saving call issued by a heavenly revealer. Knowledge is thus essentially saving knowledge, salvation is through self-acquaintance, and this knowledge tends to be reserved for an élite. Proponents of such a view seem first to have been identified and attacked by Christian writers of the middle to late second century, such as Justin Martyr and Irenaeus of Lyons, as representing a form of Christian 'heresy' deriving from Simon Magus (Acts 8:9–24), although, as we shall see, there existed contemporary pagan forms of such gnosis, e.g. the Poimandres of the Corpus Hermeticum, and what has been argued to be evidence of pre-Christian, Jewish forms of it. However, we do also have evidence from pagan Platonists attacking such Christian movements in the late second and mid third centuries, such as Celsus, Plotinus and Porphyry.

Justin Martyr seems to have been the first Christian author to write a treatise against all heresies (Apology 1.26.5), and the parallel he draws between heresies and the philosophical schools named after their founders, with their successions of teachers and pupils, developing novel lines of interpretation and thus increasingly disagreeing among themselves and departing further from the truth, seems to have profoundly influenced all later heresiology. Thus, echoing Justin, the major heresiologists, Irenaeus in his Adversus haereses of around 185, Pseudo-Hippolytus of Rome in his Refutation of All Heresies of the second decade of the third century, Hippolytus (–235), in his lost Syntagma against thirty-two heresies,[1] and Epiphanius of Salamis in his Panarion against eighty heresies of 375–7, reflect an increasingly stereotyped catalogue of Jewish and Christian heresies which includes groups called 'Gnostics', seeing them as inspired by the Devil and Greek philosophy.

Now Justin himself does not mention a sect which called itself or was called 'Gnostic', but simply refers to groups who claimed to be Christians, but who were in fact heretics, followers of and named after Simon Magus, his pupil Menander and Marcion, or who were called Marcionites, Valentinians, Basilidians and Saturnilians, etc. like the philosophical schools of Platonists, Stoics, Peripatetics and Pythagoreans (Apol. 1.26; Dialogue with Trypho 35, 80). It is Irenaeus writing his five books of detection and refutation (Adversus haereses) of the 'falsely so-called gnosis' (cf. 1 Tim. 6:20) in the 180s who seems to identify groups who called themselves 'Gnostics/gnostikoi' in his additions to the heretical catalogue in Book 1 (chs 23–31) whose kernel ultimately derives from Justin. Thus at the end of Book 1, he deals at some length, apparently on the basis of written texts, with two mythological systems of a 'mass of Gnostics' (multitudo Gnosticorum) who he claims have arisen from the Simonians.

The first group are usually known as 'Barbelognostics', a secondary designation evidently derived from the name of the supreme female aeon of the myth, and the second as 'Ophites', again a later appellation derived from the prominence of the snake in their system, but Irenaeus plainly considers both to belong to the collective 'Gnostikoi', from whom he claims his chief targets, the Valentinians, derive (Adv. haer. 1.30.15; 2 Praef.). Indeed his polemic against 'the falsely so-called gnosis' is directed against those who distinguish the supreme God and father of Christ from the Creator God of the Old Testament, the heavenly Christ from Jesus (or at least teach a docetic Christology), and claim only a part of us is saved (soul or spirit), denying the resurrection of the body, whom he repeatedly identifies as Valentinians, Basilidians, Gnostics and Marcionites. His somewhat loose use of the term 'Gnostic' has been the object of vigorous debate; does it apply to an actual group or is it just a general term for all the heretics of his catalogue as descendants of Simon Magus (Logan 1996, Chapter 1; Brakke 2010: 29–35)? I have argued that Irenaeus does have a particular group in mind, whose myth and initiation ritual profoundly influenced the Valentinians, and who are also represented by the Naassenes (from the Hebrew for snake) of Pseudo-Hippolytus, who called themselves 'Gnostikoi' (Refutation 5.6.4), by the Christian sectarians of Celsus whom he calls 'Gnostikoi' (Origen, Contra Celsum 5.61; 6.28–41) and whom Origen dubs 'Ophians', and the Christian 'heretics' whom Porphyry calls 'Gnostikoi' who attended Plotinus' philosophy seminars in Rome in the 260s (Ennead 2.9.2) (Logan 2006, Chapter 2).

However, the problem is that such 'Gnostics' seem to disappear in the later heresiologists such as Epiphanius, among whom the sects who seem to correspond most closely to Irenaeus' 'Gnostics' are called by different names ('Sethians' and 'Archontics'), while the so-called 'Gnostics' apparently represent a licentious branch of a predominantly ascetic movement (Porphyry, Vita Plotini 16). Furthermore, although Clement of Alexandria in the early third century can appeal to the ideal of the true Christian Gnostic,[2] and preserve valuable fragments of Basilides and Valentinus, he makes only fleeting references to the false, heretical gnosis, which he attributes to a certain Prodicus.[3] Conversely, it is Clement who preserves in a collection of fragments attributed to Theodotus, a disciple of Valentinus, a famous formula which many take as the key to Gnosticism and which would confirm Irenaeus' portrayal of Valentinians as representatives of the falsely so-called gnosis:

> Until baptism, they say, Fate is effective, but after it the astrologers > no longer speak the truth. It is not the bath alone that makes us free, > but also the knowledge (gnosis): who were we? What have we become?
> Where were we? Into what places have we been cast? Whither are we > hastening? From what are we delivered? What is birth? What is rebirth?
>
> (Excerpta ex Theodoto 78.1–2)

It is this kind of knowledge, of our ultimate origin, our fall into this world and its hostile powers and rescue from it, which seems to underlie the mythological schemes of Irenaeus' Gnostics and Valentinians (as well as Basilidians and even perhaps Simonians), which we might take as characteristic of the falsely so-called gnosis attacked by Irenaeus and his successors. It is the lack of such a scheme that tends to rule out Marcion as a proper representative of gnosis.

The problem of the definition of gnosis, Gnostics and Gnosticism

Such then is the evidence about the Gnostics and gnosis found in their opponents, Christian and pagan, with the former still ambiguous about the existence and variety of groups of Christians who can be classed as 'Gnostics' – for example do they really all hark back to Simon? Do they include Marcion? What of the amazing variety of groups and systems in Pseudo-Hippolytus' Refutation?[4] What happens to them after the third century? Until recently, the patristic evidence tended to determine the way we saw such groups and defined Gnosticism, since the primary evidence to supplement the picture that emerged in the eighteenth century reflected an evidently late and degenerate form.[5]

But the discovery first of the Berlin Codex BG 8502 in 1896 (although not published till 1955), then of the Nag Hammadi Library of Coptic texts in December 1945, contained in twelve codices still in their leather covers (see Figure 42.1) and leaves of a thirteenth, and including most sensationally The Gospel of Thomas, transformed the situation by its infusion of primary texts, the vast majority hitherto unknown, some possibly dating back in their original form to the second century or earlier. Here at last was a chance to put the fathers' and pagans' claims and judgments to the test. The Nag Hammadi and Berlin texts are conveniently available in English translation (Robinson 1996; Meyer 2007).

Now the striking thing about the Berlin Codex and Nag Hammadi Library was the existence in them of no less than four versions of a post-resurrection revelation discourse of the Saviour to his disciples, the Apocryphon (or Secret Book) of John (see Figure 42.2, showing the end of this document and beginning of The Gospel of Thomas), whose first part bore a remarkable resemblance to Irenaeus' account of the 'Barbelognostics', while its second part was related, if more indirectly, to his account of the 'Ophites' in the following chapter. Further, the Nag Hammadi Library contained treatises of apparently Valentinian provenance which tended to confirm both the overall picture and certain divergent details of the Valentinian systems built up from study of Irenaeus, Pseudo-Hippolytus and Clement.[6]

None of these texts, however, contained the self-designation 'Gnostic', and both discoveries contained works which did not seem compatible either with the heretical classification of the fathers or with their categorisation of gnosis. Thus we find in the collection some works which seem at first sight to bear no trace of Christian influence,[7] some clearly pagan works, philosophical, ascetic and hermetic,[8] and the rest with varying degrees of Christian colouring, including one, The Sophia of Jesus Christ, which was an unmistakable Christianisation of the apparently non-Christian Eugnostos. However, two of the texts, Zostrianos and Allogenes, are in all probability very similar, if not identical, to those mentioned by Porphyry as the recent concoctions of Plotinus' Christian 'Gnostic' friends, the former rebutted in forty books(!) by his pupil, Amelius.[9] The first western scholar to examine and publicise the texts, Jean Doresse, tried to identify them as the library of Epiphanius' 'Sethians' (Doresse 1960), but his interpretation was not widely accepted.

Figure 42.1   The Nag Hammadi Codices, with their original leather covers, from a photo taken by Jean Doresse in Cairo in 1949. Photo courtesy of The Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, Claremont, California

Nevertheless, the publication of the most well-preserved and interesting texts such as The Gospel of Truth, evidently Valentinian and echoing Irenaeus' lapidary summary of that form of gnosis,[10] The Apocryphon of John and The Sophia of Jesus Christ, supplementing the information Doresse was able to provide from his cursory examination of the bulk of the Nag Hammadi texts, allowed a major colloquium on the origins of Gnosticism to take place in Messina in 1966 (Bianchi 1967). Building, if critically, on the scholarship of the German History of Religions School, which had sought to see Gnosticism (Gnosis in German) as a relatively independent Hellenistic religion of salvation emanating from the Orient, with a developed Redeemed Redeemer myth which had influenced Christianity (Reitzenstein 1904, 1921; Bousset 1907; Bultmann 1962), the Colloquium attempted to produce a definition of the phenomenon. It sought to differentiate between the more general term 'gnosis' defined as 'knowledge of divine mysteries reserved for an élite', and 'Gnosticism' as applied more specifically to an assortment of religious systems beginning in the second century CE as attested by the heresiologists.

Figure 42.2   The end of The Apocryphon of John and beginning of The Gospel of Thomas from the Nag Hammadi Codices. Photo courtesy of The Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, Claremont, California

Building on the evidence from the Nag Hammadi texts, coupled with Epiphanius' account of the Sethians, Hans-Martin Schenke claimed to detect the existence of a group of Sethian Gnostics with their distinctive treatises, on the basis of certain shared characteristics and features (Schenke 1974, 1981). The category of 'Sethian' he expanded to include not only Christian groups (such as Irenaeus' Barbelognostics, Epiphanius' Gnostics, Sethians and Archontics and the Christian 'heretics' of Plotinus), and Christian texts (such as The Apocryphon of John, The Gospel of the Egyptians, Trimorphic Protennoia and the Untitled Text from the Bruce Codex), but apparently non-Christian texts (such as The Apocalypse of Adam, The Three Steles of Seth, Zostrianos and Marsanes), even when such texts did not feature heavenly Seth. He suggested that such a group of pre-Christian Gnostics could well have arisen in a Samaritan milieu, and then in encounter with Christianity have given their texts a superficial Christianisation, while still retaining their distinct and alien essence and not ultimately synthesising with Christianity (Schenke 1981: 607–13).

The severest critic of Schenke's 'Sethian Gnostic' hypothesis was Frederik Wisse (1971, 1981), who was also the most sceptical about the classifications of the heresiologists and saw the Nag Hammadi texts not as evidence for the teaching of a sect or sects, but rather as the inspired creations of individuals who did not feel bound by the opinions of a religious community (1981: 585). However, Wisse's sceptical essay was published in a two-volume treatment (Layton 1980, 1981) of what had come to be accepted by many as the two main schools of Gnosticism, the (Christian) Valentinians and the (pre-Christian) Sethians. Indeed, what the editor of the volumes, Bentley Layton, has identified as Gnostic scripture with its 'classic Gnostic myth' is virtually identical to Schenke's 'Sethian' texts (Layton 1987: xiif.; 1995). More recently, the Tchacos Codex containing The Gospel of Judas, discovered in Middle Egypt in the 1970s but only published after painstaking restoration work in 2007 (Kasser et al. 2007), has been argued to be another collection made by Gnostics, particularly since The Gospel of Judas contains a version of the 'classic myth' found in The Apocryphon of John (Logan 2009: 13–19).

There have been two recent significant contributions to the problem of defining Gnosticism: Tuomas Rasimus's attempt (2009) to improve on Schenke's 'Sethian Gnostic' hypothesis and David Brakke's attempt (2010) to define Gnostics more precisely in terms of Layton's 'classic myth'. Rasimus identifies three types of Gnostic thought, the earliest 'Ophite' as attested by Irenaeus, Celsus and Origen, 'Barbeloite' which focuses on the divine realm, and 'Sethite' which focuses on biblical Seth and was introduced later into Ophite and Barbeloite myths. These three systems are fused in various ways to form what he designates as 'classic Gnostic'. Thus he seeks to enlarge the corpus of Schenke's 'Sethian Gnostic' texts to include his 'Ophite' texts.[11] Brakke, a pupil of Layton, seeks to identify the Gnostics by focusing only on texts which display the Barbelognostic myth and reflect its rituals, particularly baptism.[12] Both approaches, as well as my 2006 book, sought to deal with a radical questioning, not only of the Messina definitions and the suggested classification of main Gnostic schools but of the entire concept of 'Gnosticism' (Williams 1996; King 2003). Williams argues that since there is no true consensus even among experts on a definition of the category 'Gnosticism', and since it has only succeeded in generating greater confusion, it should be abandoned. Thus although there is some agreement about certain features, such as that the material cosmos was created by one or more lower demiurges, other claimed defining features are much more problematic. They usually include the idea of a radically new attitude to the created order, one of 'protest' or 'revolt', an 'anti-cosmic attitude', as illustrated in the way Gnostics treated scripture (by reversing its sense in a kind of 'protest exegesis', particularly of Genesis), viewed the cosmos (by allegedly rejecting it), looked at society (supposedly despising it), and felt about their own bodies (hating them). Apparently lacking any ethical concern, their view of themselves as 'saved by nature' by their inner spiritual character is supposed to have led to two characteristic responses, either of fanatical ascetic renunciation of the world, sex and the body, or of unrestrained licence and lawlessness (Williams 1996: 4f.).

Williams tests each of these defining characteristics and concludes that none of them adequately corresponds to the sheer diversity of the evidence. He suggests as a more suitable and less restrictive category, 'biblical demiurgical', which avoids the misinterpretations bound up with 'Gnosticism', and does more justice to what for him are a series of related religious innovations and new religious movements. King's 2003 book, What is Gnosticism?, exposes how much modern scholarship on 'Gnosticism' is based on a mistaken reification of what was a polemical construct designed by the heresiologists as a way of defining themselves as 'true' Christians over against a heretical 'Other'. Thus modern scholars have inadvertently reinforced the polemical agenda of hostile witnesses such as Irenaeus and Epiphanius.

Is 'Gnosticism' as a category therefore simply to be abandoned as too vague and misleading? Williams's case that too wide and vague a definition has been offered in the past is convincing, but it has been effectively countered by a much narrower focus on those who called themselves or were designated 'Gnostics' (Layton, Brakke, myself), had a characteristic myth (Brakke) or set of related myths (Rasimus, myself), and practised a distinct initiation ritual (Brakke, myself). However, one of the strengths of Williams's book is his utilisation of insights from sociologists of religion such as Rodney Stark to cast light on the way new religious movements arise and grow or decline. Thus although he would argue that we should not think of a single phenomenon, Gnosticism or the Gnostic religion, and try to define a single essence or seek a single origin for it, he does allow the validity of exploring individual traditions such as the 'Sethian', and the way they tend to resemble the schismatic 'church movements' or 'sect movements' identified by Stark and other sociologists of religion.

Williams here primarily refers to the distinction between church and sect in terms of 'ideal types' pioneered by Ernst Troeltsch, a pupil of Max Weber (Troeltsch 1931: 331–43). But Troeltsch's 'ideal types' with their half a dozen characteristics have proved impossible to use for theorising. Thus Stark, building on the narrower definition that churches accept their social environment while sects reject it, suggests that churches are nearer the low tension pole and sects to the high, with the latter becoming more church-like and sparking off new sects desiring greater tension with their social environment (Stark and Bainbridge 1985: 19–67). On this basis, Williams would see the Valentinians and Basilidians as 'church movements' aiming to reduce tension, and the Marcionites as 'sect movements'.

More promisingly perhaps, he also draws attention to Stark and Bainbridge's use of the term 'cult' as distinct from church and sect. They define cults as non-schismatic deviant groups which are innovatory, introducing an alien (external) religion or inventing a new indigenous one. They distinguish three types of contemporary cults: audience cults, client cults and cult movements. The first are literary, involving no formal organisation or group commitment to a dogma (e.g. astrology); the second involve a therapist–client relationship (e.g. psychoanalysis), while only the third are genuinely religious, seeking to satisfy the religious needs of believers (Stark and Bainbridge 1985: 24–30). However, Williams does not appear to have sufficiently taken in the full import of these definitions, still treating his biblical demiurgical movements as basically sects, of which some are more church-like than others, rather than as cults. Indeed, one only has to ask the question in terms of the Stark-Bainbridge definitions of sect and cult to see that 'cult movements' seem most appropriate. To supporters of the majority opinion that Gnosticism emerged from Judaism (e.g. Rudolph 1984: 276ff; Pearson 1990), and of the minority view that sees it as an offshoot of Christianity (e.g. Pétrement 1991), one has to pose the question: is it then a schismatic, revival movement or movements harking back to the past (a sect), or not rather a new religious movement or movements offering new answers to old problems (a cult)? Are such movements exclusivist, cutting themselves off from the Catholics, establishing a rival church (like the Marcionites), or do they not rather seek to mingle with the Catholics while claiming to be the true, perfect Christians? Is it not instructive in this regard that while Marcion was excommunicated and expelled from the Roman church, Valentinus was not, and even almost became a bishop?[13]

The Gnostics, their beliefs and practices

So perhaps the most promising approach to the questions of defining Gnosticism, identifying its adherents and illuminating its origins, lies in seeing the phenomenon as involving a series of related cults rather than sect movements, which arose within the general religious milieu of Judaism and Christianity, and sought to answer pressing questions within that milieu in new ways. Stark has suggested the key role played by religious geniuses, unusually creative individuals with deep religious concerns who perceive shortcomings in conventional faiths, as something which increases during periods of social crisis. During such periods, the numbers of people who receive novel revelations and the number willing to receive them is maximised. The more reinforcement the recipient receives, the more likely they are to have more revelations. And the interaction between successful founder and their followers tends to amplify heresy. The result of these interactions is more radical revelations (Stark 1992: 19–34).

Such a scenario of visionary geniuses founding cults to offer new solutions to pressing problems, arising out of social, political and cultural pressures but expressed in predominantly religious terms, may go a long way to account for movements labelled 'Gnostic', and to help distinguish them from other, more sectarian movements such as Marcionitism. Such cult movements may have arisen in Judaism and may be reflected in such phenomena as the minim of the rabbis and belief in two powers in heaven, or in paganism as with the Jewish-influenced Hermetic gnosis of the Poimandres (Pearson 1990: 139–47), but we have insufficient evidence to work with in such cases, and are soon led into uncontrolled speculation. We are on much firmer ground if, mindful of Williams's strictures, we confine ourselves to those movements from the late first century which either call themselves 'Gnostic' or appeal to a higher, saving knowledge, knowledge of the divine self, which embrace a Platonic hierarchical world view and myth and related ritual of fall and restoration of the divine, and which seem to arise in a dialectic with a Judaism in crisis over its identity.

Thus it is surely no coincidence that the earliest movements which appear to meet our criteria of what is 'Gnostic' seem to occur in areas where there is longstanding opposition to Judaism, such as Samaria in the first century (Simon and Menander), or in communities in which emergent Christianity is locked in conflict with a dominant Judaism, such as Antioch in the early second century (Ignatius, Saturninus, Irenaeus' Gnostics), or where Jews were facing the threat of extinction, such as Egypt, and Alexandria in particular, in the wake of the great Jewish revolt under Trajan (Basilides and Valentinus). Stark and Bainbridge have drawn attention to the fact that increasingly secularised Jews, of whatever era, are strikingly more liable to join cult movements (Stark and Bainbridge 1985: 400–3). The other feature they isolate as significant for the rise of cults is also characteristic of these places and this period, namely the lack of a dominant religion, something also true of Rome (Simonians, Gnostics, Valentinus).

When, where and why did such Gnostic cult movements originate? The picture of the phenomenon I have presented so far suggests that if we are to continue to speak of 'Gnosticism', it can only accurately be applied to cult movements within a general Jewish and Christian milieu which called themselves 'Gnostic' or understood salvation in terms of self-knowledge, awareness of the essential kinship between the inner self, soul or spirit, and the divine. Such movements only make sense in the light of an overall myth or system which consciously reflects a Platonic world view with its hierarchical levels of reality and myth of the soul and its fall and reascent. Further, such movements, if we accept the Stark-Bainbridge thesis, tend to emerge as novel attempts to resolve pressing problems, social, political, religious, in a period of crisis.

This would seem to suggest that although elements which later became 'Gnostic' in the above sense were undoubtedly present in the first century when Christianity was emerging, they cannot be said to be 'Gnostic' in the strict sense, and thus one is not entitled to speak of a pre-Christian 'Gnosticism' or of 'Gnosticism' in Corinth. If therefore we exclude pre-Christian and first-century phenomena, we come to figures and movements at the beginning of the second century, such as Saturninus, Basilides and the shadowy opponents of Ignatius and also perhaps of the writers of Colossians and the Pastorals. Irenaeus' summary of Saturninus' views includes a single Father, unknown to all, seven angelic creators of the world and humanity, made after the image of the supreme power (cf. Gen. 1:26), but inferior until animated because of the likeness by that power with a divine spark which ascends to the supreme Father at death. To this hierarchical and dualistic picture are added a certain anti-Jewish animus and a docetic Christology: the unbegotten and incorporeal Saviour, Christ, appears like a human being to destroy the creator angels, including the God of the Jews, for their enmity to the Father, and to wipe out the evil class of humans and their assisting demons, while saving the other, good, class, those with the divine spark. The final element is an ascetic rejection of marriage, procreation and animal food. All this is based on a distinctive critical interpretation of the Old Testament prophecies: some were spoken by the world-creating angels, some by Satan, an apostate angel resisting the seven, and the Jewish God in particular (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 1.24.1–3).

In view of this, it is no wonder that Layton, who includes Saturninus in his section on classic Gnostic scripture, has remarked that despite its extreme compression, it refers to almost all parts of the Gnostic myth and related topics, including anthropology, principles of biblical interpretation, Christology and ethics (Layton 1987: 159). Saturninus' system seems to reflect controversies between Jews and Christians in Antioch over vexed topics such as the proper interpretation of scripture on issues like the origin of evil and the goodness of the created order, the meaning of humanity being made in the image and likeness of God, the accuracy of messianic prophecy, etc. And even if we cannot identify Saturninus and his followers as among the direct targets of Ignatius in his letters, the same range of issues seems to be involved, as he battles with Judaisers who reject his Christological interpretation of the Septuagint and docetists who deny the reality of Christ's humanity and suffering and reject the materiality of the Eucharist.

But Saturninus' system has inbuilt tensions and inconsistencies, especially between the idea of the spark in all and the idea of two races (Logan 1996: 168f.), no real explanation of how everything originated, no proper myth, or developed assimilation of Platonic philosophy, and he does not seem to have engendered a lasting movement. Basilides, associated with him by Irenaeus but based in Alexandria, goes some way to make up those deficiencies. Irenaeus' account, again based on Justin, begins with a cosmogonic myth: from the supreme unengendered Father is engendered Intellect (nous), from Intellect Word (logos), from Word Prudence, from Prudence Wisdom (sophia) and Power. Wisdom and Power produce powers, rulers and angels who create the first of 365 heavens by a series of emissions, corresponding to the number of days in the year. The last heaven, this visible one of ours, was created by angels, of whom the god of the Jews was chief.

Here Basilides' anti-Jewish animus becomes evident in what may be a veiled allusion to the Jewish revolt of 115–17 CE: because the Jews' god wished to subject all nations to them, the rest opposed him and the Jewish nation. This provoked the nameless Father to send his firstborn, Intellect, called Christ, to save those who believed in him from the world-creating powers. Again the Christology is docetic: Christ appeared on earth as a man, but did not suffer; Simon of Cyrene was crucified in his stead, while Jesus, in his form, stood by laughing. As an incorporeal power, he could transform himself as he liked. He ascended to the Father unimpeded and invisible. So those who have this knowledge(!) have been liberated from the world and its rulers (archons), and should not confess the man who was crucified, but the one who came in human form to destroy the works of the creator powers. Thus salvation involves only the soul; the body is by nature corruptible. Basilides too has a distinctive, anti-Jewish way of interpreting scripture: the prophets were created by the world-creating powers while the law was the special handiwork of the god of the Jews. Finally, his ethical stance was reportedly one of indifference both regarding meat offered to idols and other kinds of behaviour and pleasure (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 1.24.4–6).

Irenaeus' sketch is complemented by Clement of Alexandria, writing at the turn of the second century CE. He is quite sympathetic at times and offers perhaps the most accurate, if limited, information.[14] He implies that Basilides taught an original ogdoad, and was an eclectic Christian philosopher blending Stoic ethical concerns with a Platonic and Pythagorean belief in reincarnation (Layton 1987: 415–44). But our knowledge of Basilides remains fragmentary and we cannot reconstruct his myth in any detail, although we do have evidence of a continuing movement, and Basilidians are one of the very few groups named in the Nag Hammadi texts, criticised along with Simonians and Valentinians for their liberal attitude towards marriage.[15] Moreover, Basilides is also clearly relevant for our definition of what constitutes 'Gnostic' in that he seems among the first to have properly assimilated Platonic philosophy, its hierarchy and emanative system, its belief in the superiority of the soul and its reincarnation.

But it is with the Gnostics of Irenaeus that we can confidently speak of a group or groups that did call themselves and fully deserve the title 'Gnostic', that do represent a successful cult movement which developed a 'classic myth' and ritual of initiation which profoundly influenced the greatest and most Christian Gnostic movement of all, that of the Valentinians. Indeed, I would contend that this cult movement embraces all the phenomena which Schenke classes as 'Sethian' and also takes in the 'Ophians' of Celsus and Origen, the Naassenes, the Aurelii with their mysterious hypogeum in Rome (Logan 2006, chapter 5), the Gnostics of Plotinus and Porphyry as well as the Borborites and other related groups. Furthermore, members of this movement I would claim were responsible both for collecting the Nag Hammadi texts as their library and for the Tchacos Codex (Logan 2006: 12–29, 2009: 3–21).

But can we determine where, when and why the Gnostics began? Although Justin does not seem to be aware of them, I have argued that behind the shadowy figures in Antioch targeted by Ignatius, particularly in his Ephesian, Trallian and Smyrnaean letters, may lie the pioneers of the Gnostic cult. Ignatius implies that the group he is combatting claims to be Christian, has shared with the community in the initiation rite of chrismation, but rejects the reality of the incarnation, cross and resurrection of Christ, as attested by law, prophets and gospel, and does not recognise or share in the Eucharist (Ephesians 7–9, 14, 17–20; Trallians 6–7, 9–11; Smyrnaeans 1–7). Now the key to understanding the identity of the Gnostics and the factor which unites the varied phenomena would appear to lie in the interaction of myth and ritual which underlies such disparate texts as The Apocryphon of John and the Naassene Preaching.

The creative genius behind the Gnostic myth and ritual clearly shared the concerns of Saturninus and Basilides, the proper interpretation of scripture as regards creation, humanity, the messiah, law and ethics, etc. in opposition both to the Jews who had expelled Christians from their synagogues, and to Judaising Christians, but he/she seems to have started with the intoxicating experience of being born again as a Christian in the initiation rite of baptism and chrismation. What he/she adds seems to have been developed out of that culminating saving experience in which the Gnostic initiate imitates the birth, naming and chrismation of the heavenly Son in the rite of baptism in the name of the Gnostic triad followed by the five seals rite of chrismation (Logan 1997: 188–93, 2006: 78–81). This frees him/her from the consequences of a primal fall, that of heavenly Wisdom/ Sophia. The new elements are thus the heavenly triad and related ritual of Father, Mother and Son, and the myth of Sophia, but they are evidently based on the same Old Testament evidence used by mainstream Christians to construct their theologies (i.e. Prov. 3:19; 8:22ff.; Wisd. 7:25f.; Pss 2, 8, 45, 110) and on existing initiation rites. The other key element, alluded to in Saturninus, but given a fundamental role reflecting the greater assimilation of Platonic ideas, is that of heavenly archetype and earthly copy.

The myth, whose first, theo- and cosmogonic part is summarised in Irenaeus' Adv. haer. 1.29, occurs in full in The Apocryphon of John, supplemented by other Nag Hammadi treatises such as The Gospel of the Egyptians and Trimorphic Protennoia (Logan 1996). It first relates the origin of the heavenly triad, Father, Mother and Son, and traces the development of the heavenly world by male-female pairs of aeons, culminating in the appearance of heavenly Adamas, the archetype of humanity. It then recounts the genesis of this visible world through the error of the lowest aeon, Sophia. She tries to produce without her partner and without the consent of the supreme Father, the result being the ignorant and arrogant Demiurge, Ialdabaoth, creator and ruler of this world and Old Testament God. His hybristic claim to be the only God results in the appearance of heavenly Adamas, whom he then gets his seven archons to copy (Gen. 1:26f.).

Genesis 1–4, suitably reinterpreted, thus becomes the second act of the cosmic drama. Earthly man is made after the heavenly image, but his/her essence is the divine power of Sophia inbreathed by the Demiurge (Gen. 2:7) to enable him to stand upright. Alarmed by such autonomy, Ialdabaoth plots to recover the divine power, and the events of Genesis and the rest of human history till the coming of the Saviour are represented as a series of moves by Sophia and countermoves by Ialdabaoth and his seven archons, rulers of the planets. Thus, the human fleshly body, the division of the sexes, life in this world, law and ethics, sexual intercourse, fate itself, the efforts of the angels to mate with human women (Gen. 6:4) and in these last days the counterfeit spirit (i.e. the anti-Christ), are all devices of Ialdabaoth to keep the Gnostics trapped in this world and rob them of their divine power.

Salvation, as with Basilides, only involves the soul, not the spiritual element, as with the Valentinians, as we shall see. The present versions of the Apocryphon, particularly the long recension with its triple descent of a female Saviour figure, seem to have obscured the original pattern suggested by the 'Ophite' version, of Sophia's interim intervention to ensure the survival of the divine power until the Saviour's final saving descent and revelation. The dialogue on the fates of different souls, however, better preserves the basic Gnostic understanding of salvation in its intriguing and subtle solution to the classic dilemma faced by all Christians: how to balance divine initiative (the promise of universal salvation and the irresistibility of divine grace) and human response (the reality of human free will and human refusal). Thus they were able to avoid both the terrible predestinarian tangles of a salvation by nature approach (with which Valentinians were charged) or an appeal to the irresistibility of grace (to which Augustine was forced), on the one hand, and the unrealistic perfectionism of Pelagius, on the other.

The Gnostic solution is to understand the light power of the Mother present in all humanity as the capacity for salvation, which yet needs the descent of the Father's Holy Spirit in the rite of sealing/chrismation for completion. Salvation depends on which spirit dominates; the Holy Spirit or its demonic counterpart, the counterfeit spirit. Those souls on whom the Holy Spirit descends will be saved; all they need is ascetic freedom from the passions, using the flesh as a mere vehicle until on death they ascend to heaven. But those souls on whom the counterfeit spirit descends will be led astray, although there is always the possibility, via transmigration, of gaining the saving knowledge and ascending. Nevertheless, not all souls will be saved; those who had the saving knowledge but rejected it and repudiated the descent of the Spirit in the five seals rite of chrismation (the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit) will suffer eternal punishment.[16]

One of the major problems posed by the Gnostics, partly perhaps because of their ability to disguise themselves as mainstream Christians, partly perhaps because of the paucity of evidence about the early Christians and the increasing success of the mainstream over against their rivals, whose texts were either suppressed or ceased to be copied and transmitted, is the lack of concrete evidence about their communities. All we appear to have, by chance or through their preservation by opponents, are the texts. However, I have argued that the mysterious early third-century hypogeum of the Aurelii in Rome (Figure 42.3), with its fascinating wall paintings, does represent the burial place of a Roman Gnostic community (Logan 2006, Chapter 5). Certain key paintings, particularly of Adam, Eve and the serpent and the naked Adam and his disconsolate creator of chamber A and of the mysterious triad of older and younger males and veiled female in the vault of chamber B, as well as other features of the hypogeum, seem best explained in terms of a Roman Gnostic community similar to the Naassenes.

What is more, even if these Gnostics tend to disappear as such in the later heresiological accounts, there is plenty of evidence of the spread and success of movements inspired by them right on into the eighth century (Layton 1987: 6f.). It is in the very nature of such cult movements, after all, to change and transmute, a charge brought against them by Irenaeus himself. Indeed the very prominence of the figure of heavenly Seth in the Nag Hammadi documents, which contributed both to modern arguments for the pre-Christian Jewish character of 'Gnosticism' and to Schenke's 'Sethian' hypothesis is, I have argued, in fact the result of a Sethianising reinterpretation at the end of the second and beginning of the third centuries, in response both to Catholic criticism of the novelty of the Gnostic claims, and to the general rise of interest in the figure of Seth (Logan 1996: 47f.). But what is striking about the evidence from Nag Hammadi and elsewhere, is the way that despite such reinterpretation, basic features and figures recur, even in such distant and degenerate forms of the myth as the Untitled Text from the Bruce Codex and the Gnostic (or Borborite), Sethian and Archontic systems described by Epiphanius.

What then of Valentinus and the Valentinians, the most Christian of the Gnostic movements? Irenaeus speaks of Valentinus as the first to adapt the fundamental principles of the so-called Gnostic sect (hairesis) to his own brand of teaching (Adv. haer. 1.11.1), while at the end of his sections on the Gnostics he remarks that from these teachings, like the Lernaean hydra, was born the many-headed wild beast of the school of Valentinus.[17] This is not just another piece of heresiological rhetoric, for we do indeed find remarkable similarities between the two systems, particularly as regards the heavenly world of the aeons, the Sophia myth and the ritual of initiation, but Valentinus was a great poetic genius in his own right, a visionary who attracted creative pupils, more of whose names have been preserved than of any other such cult founder. Thus the heresiologists tell us of the Italian school of Ptolemy (whose system is summarised by Irenaeus at length) and Heracleon, the first to write a scriptural commentary (on John, first accepted by Gnostics as authoritative), of Secundus, Marcus the magus (whose followers were active in the Rhone valley in Irenaeus' time), of Theotimus and Theodotus (from whom Clement collected valuable excerpts), and of the eastern school of Axionicus of Antioch and Ardesianes, who saw the Saviour's body as spiritual (like Valentinus, but unlike the Italian school which considered it psychic).[18] Thomassen (2006) considers this distinction to be of major soteriological significance.

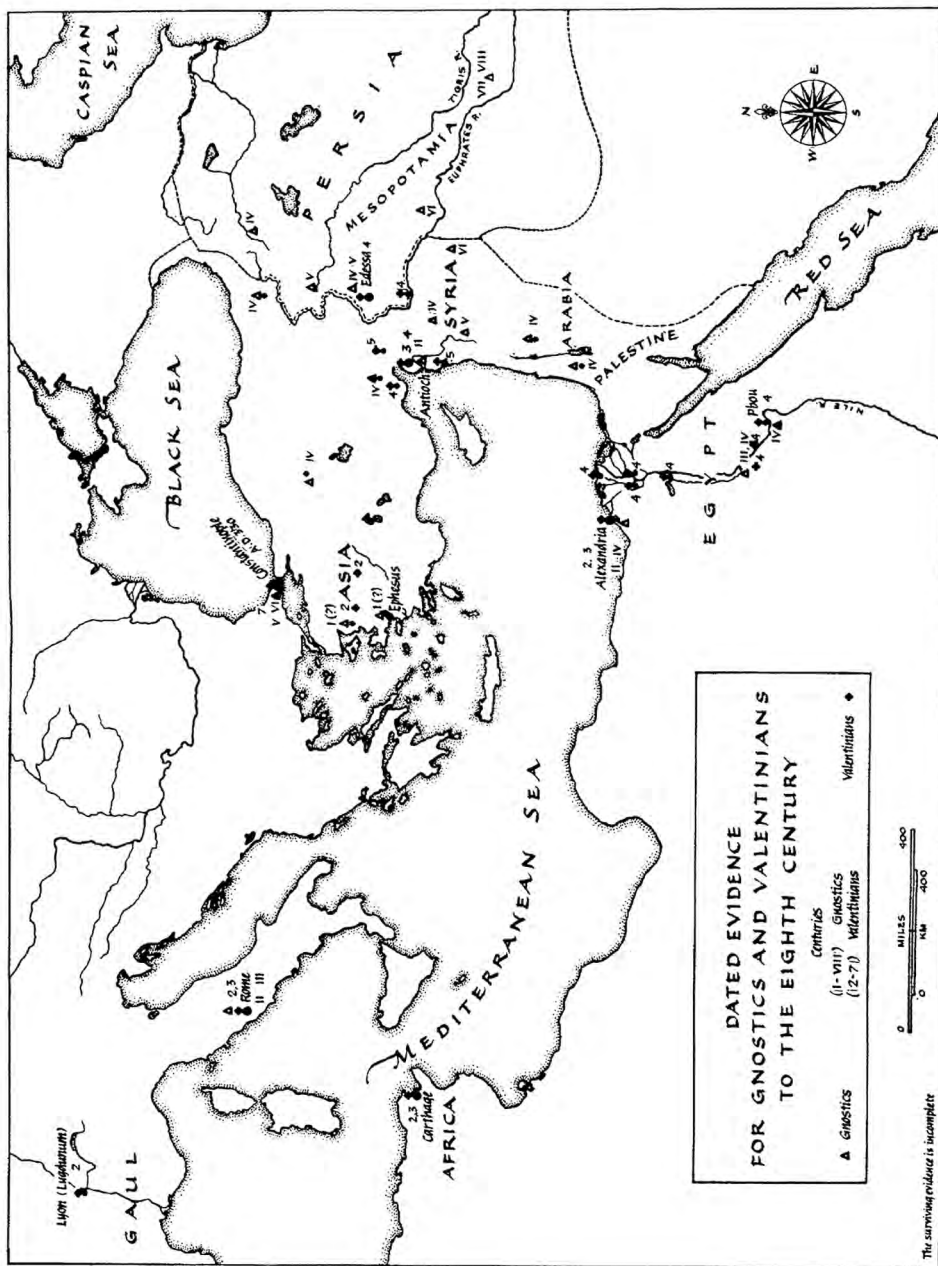
Figure 42.3   The hypogeum of the Aurelii, ceiling of chamber B. Photo by permission of the Pontificia Commissione di Archeologia Sacra, Rome


Figure 42.4 A map of dated evidence for the Gnostics and Valentinians to the eighth century; from The Gnostic Scriptures by Bentley Layton. Copyright ©1987 by Bentley Layton; used by permission of Yale University Press

Valentinians crop up all over the ancient world, from Lyons to the valley of the Tigris, from the second to the eighth centuries (Layton 1987: 10f.; see Figure 42.4), and the Nag Hammadi Library has contributed several texts which appear to be Valentinian,[19] adding priceless original material to the few fragments in the fathers, and thereby helping us to assess with much greater confidence the accuracy and objectivity of their accounts. Unfortunately, besides the Justin/Irenaeus material, we only have fragments of Valentinus himself, largely preserved by Clement of Alexandria and more concerned with his ethics than his theology. Christoph Markschies, basing himself on the fragments, denies that Valentinus was responsible for the Valentinian myth; he was a Christian Platonist whose followers developed the characteristic myth Irenaeus describes (Markschies 1992).

But over against such a judgment based on such limited evidence we have to set, on the one hand, the picture we get from other sources of a visionary, founder of a cult with one of the most evocative myths of all time, and, on the other, the fact that even the fragments seem to hint at the myth (Logan 1994: 310–13) and to contain numerous Valentinian ideas (Thomassen 2006: 430–90). Thus Pseudo-Hippolytus records how Valentinus saw a tiny child, newly born, and asked him who he was, and he answered that he was the Logos. Then he added to this an imposing myth and on this wants to base the sect (hairesis) founded by him (Ref. haer. 6.42.2). The 'imposing myth' evidently reflects that of the Gnostics, particularly as it centres on Sophia. The Valentinus of the fragments comes over as a very winning personality, author of letters, homilies and books. And what is striking about Valentinianism, which must be due in no small part to the character and contributions of its founder, is the way that his pupils, despite all their variations and innovations gleefully charted by the heresiologists and present in original texts, retain key features and do not break away to form rival cults.

So what was Valentinus' contribution? What was the crisis to which he creatively responded? We have noted Basilides' likely response to the Jewish revolt and his assimilation of contemporary philosophy, Stoic and Platonic. Valentinus, a younger fellow Alexandrian, seems to have followed a similar path. Colin Roberts has drawn attention to the vacuum in Egypt caused by the virtual extinction of Judaism and the Jewish Christianity associated with it (Roberts 1979). The failure of yet another Jewish messianic uprising and, by implication, of their understanding of their God, may have represented that crisis. Valentinus seems to have sought to fill that vacuum by the introduction of a Pauline theology of divine grace and election, of spiritual versus psychic, with further assimilation to pagan thought, particularly Platonism. His theogony involves a sophisticated reworking of the Gnostic scheme, borrowing Pythagorean categories (dyad, tetrad, ogdoad) to produce a heavenly world or Pleroma of thirty aeons as mental aspects of God, and developing the Gnostic pairing of male and female aeons into the fundamental ontological and soteriological principle of syzygy.

Irenaeus' account has Valentinus start from an original dyad of Father and Silence who emanate the remaining twenty-eight aeons, which Tertullian notes were entirely in the mind of God (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 1.11.1; Tertullian, Adv. Val. 4). One of the final twelve falls away (i.e. Sophia) and produces Christ outside the Pleroma. He immediately returns within, while she, bereft of spiritual substance, produces the Demiurge and a left-hand ruler (i.e. Satan), as with the Gnostics, comments Irenaeus. He notes Valentinus' distinction between Christ and Jesus (as with the 'Ophites'), and the role of the Holy Spirit fructifying the aeons of the Pleroma. The rest of Valentinus' system has to be conjectured from the fragments and the systems of his pupils, but what does emerge seems to be a systematic expansion of the Platonic theme of archetype and image, a rather hostile view of the Demiurge and his creator angels (like Saturninus, Basilides and the Gnostics), a development of the idea of the divine as spiritual seed rather than a power, as with the Gnostics, an emphasis on Pauline themes of the grace of God and the law written on the heart, and an understanding of Christ as entirely spiritual, body and all.[20]

The remaining accounts of Valentinian theology and original texts seem to represent variations on these themes, often in an attempt to soften the monstrous claim of a divine error or fall by positing two Sophias (Ptolemy), or in a very sophisticated exculpation of God for allowing the whole process (The Tripartite Tractate), or in a mystical meditation demythologising the all-too-ugly details, which has been attributed to Valentinus (The Gospel of Truth). Finally, the Valentinian treatise from Codex XI, while presenting certain idiosyncratic features, does roughly correspond to the picture presented by the heresiologists, being often close to what we have attributed to Valentinus himself.

What is new in all this is the sophisticated treatment of the themes of fullness and deficiency as ontological principles, of male angel and female elect, of the derivation of the cosmos from the emotions of fallen Sophia and the consequent division of reality into three categories and types of humanity; the spiritual (Sophia's seed sown in the world through the Demiurge, which alone is subject to salvation, according to Valentinus and the more original eastern school), the psychic (the handiwork of the Demiurge and consubstantial (homoousios!) with him, which is the subject of salvation according to the Italian school, who thus teach that the spiritual are 'saved by nature'[21]), and the hylic or material (the work of Satan and incapable of salvation). Thus at the heart of the developed myth as found, e.g. in Ptolemy is the repeated pattern of fall and restoration at successively lower levels, first of Sophia, then of her offspring Achamoth, then of the spiritual seed, sown in this world, and the salvation or rescue of what is fallen by a series of Christ figures, the last being Jesus, supplying form and knowledge to remove the deficiency. Salvation into the Pleroma seems ultimately only for the spiritual seed which is depicted as female, united in marriage with its male angelic counterpart in the Valentinian sacrament of the bridal chamber. The psychics, to whom the ordinary Christians belong, are the creatures of the Demiurge and may attain a middle level of salvation by good works, while the hylics are doomed to destruction.

But despite the deterministic sounding language, grace seems to be the keynote and 'become what you are' the motto.[22] And the Valentinians seem increasingly keen to be accepted both by Catholic Christians and by pagan society, forming a kind of bridge, modifying the fierce extremes of Christian asceticism and denial of the world, by seeing it, fallen as it is, as nevertheless the theatre for the formation and salvation of the elect seed, with a Demiurge who is ignorant, not evil, even attaining a degree of salvation. Their cultic rather than sectarian character and their ability to assimilate to Catholic Christianity enabled them to survive for centuries as a kind of fifth column, and this perhaps helps to explain both the apparent lack of evidence of distinctive Valentinian hierarchies and forms of organisation, on the one hand, but also the continuing obsession of Church and State with trying to flush them out, on the other. The similarities with modern 'New Age' movements are evident here as elsewhere.

But what of the other texts found at Nag Hammadi, neither Gnostic nor Valentinian? What of the most sensational find there which has generated more debate and literature than the rest put together, The Gospel of Thomas? How does it fit in? The best solution seems to be to see the whole collection as the library or libraries of a Gnostic cult movement, containing their classic myth and scripture as well as authoritative works and fragments of whatever provenance on the soul, its nature, vicissitudes and salvation, reflecting a basically ascetic standpoint. Hence the inclusion both of Gnosticised Christian ascetic works of the Syrian Thomas tradition such as the Gospel and Book of Thomas, of pagan ascetic literature like The Sentences of Sextus and pagan gnosis such as the Hermetic works, as well as appropriate Valentinian material, mythological and liturgical. We find a similar mixture in the Tchacos Codex.[23] However the absence both of any sign of sexual exclusiveness (e.g. in the salvation of souls) as of any scriptural commentaries, and the relative sophistication of the texts might suggest a mixed, well-educated community like Lampe's Roman Valentinians (2003, chapter 27), my Roman Aurelii, Plotinus' and Porphyry's Roman 'Gnostics' or Epiphanius' 'Gnostics' or 'Archontics', as the likely owners, undercutting the popular hypothesis that the texts were preserved and copied by Pachomian monks in their monasteries in the areas of Achmim and Chenoboskia (Logan 2006: 15–18).

Conclusion

'Gnosticism' and 'Gnostic' as designations of a clearly defined religious phenomenon of late antiquity have rightly been criticised for being too vague and misleading, unable to contain the great variety of phenomena usually so described. But if understood of and restricted to a related family of cult movements springing up within the religious milieu of Judaism and Christianity of the late first century on, which either used the self-designation 'Gnostic' or understood themselves within a Platonically influenced mythological scheme of 'fall' and restoration through a heavenly revealer-redeemer, then both can still be valid and useful. If such an understanding focusses primarily on the Gnostic and Valentinian movements described earlier, it can also embrace, as the Gnostics and their libraries did, the Jewish-influenced pagan gnosis of the Corpus Hermeticum. As cult movements seeking new answers to old problems and perhaps in the end alien to the spirit of Christianity, they yet were able to operate within it and exert a powerful influence on the emergence of what came to be 'orthodoxy'. They forced opponents like Irenaeus to develop an even better, more adequate, biblical and incarnational theology, and, in turn, as so often in the history of Christian doctrine, were plundered by mainstream figures like Clement and Origen for good ideas.[24]

Notes

1 Cf. Photius, Bibliotheca, 121. The work is perhaps reconstructable from Pseudo-Tertullian, Adversus omnes haereses and Epiphanius, Panarion, etc. On the distinction between the two, see Brent 1995.
2 Cf. Stromateis 2.11; 4.4.8f., 21ff.; 6–7 passim on the true Gnostic.
3 Cf. Strom. 2.11; 4.30.1; 7.7.41.1. On Prodicus, see Tertullian, Scorpiace.
4 Cf. Foerster 1972, who includes alongside the Barbelognostics, Naassenes and Valentinians, Simon, Saturninus, Basilides, the Carpocratians and the systems of Pseudo-Hippolytus as well as the pagan Hermetic Poimandres and the Christian encratite Acts of Thomas.
5 It consisted of three Coptic works of the fourth to fifth centuries CE: the treatise Pistis Sophia of the Codex Askewianus, a third-century revelation discourse of Jesus to his disciples about the fate of Pistis Sophia (Faith–Wisdom), and the two Books of Jeu and Untitled Text of the Bruce Codex, the former another revelation discourse of Jesus about the heavenly world illustrated by a series of enigmatic diagrams, the latter an account of the topography of the heavenly world involving aeons mentioned in Irenaeus' account of the Barbelognostic system.
6 For the latter, see Sagnard 1947 and Thomassen 2006.
7 E.g. The Apocalypse of Adam, The Paraphrase of Shem, Marsanes, etc.
8 E.g. Plato, Republic 588A–589B, The Sentences of Sextus, and the Hermetic works On the Eighth and Ninth, a Prayer of Thanksgiving and part of the Asclepius.
9 Cf. Porph. Vita Plot. 16.
10 Cf. The Gospel of Truth, Nag Hammadi Codex (NHC) I 18.7–11; 24.28–25.19 and Adv. haer. 1.21.4. See Jonas 1992: 309ff.
11 His 'Ophite' texts include The Hypostasis of the Archons, the second part of The Apocryphon of John, On the Origin of the World, Eugnostos and The Sophia of Jesus Christ as well as Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 1.30, and Origen, C. Cels. 6.24–38.
12 Thus he identifies as Gnostic (50–1) (1) the groups described by Irenaeus and Porphyry; (2) works ascribed to them by Irenaeus and Porphyry, including The Apocryphon of John, Zostrianos, Allogenes and The Gospel of Judas; (3A) works widely accepted by scholars, The Apocalypse of Adam, The Hypostasis of the Archons, Trimorphic Protennoia, The Gospel of the Egyptians, The Three Steles of Seth, Marsanes, Melchizedek, The Thought of Norea; (3B) disputed works, The Gospel of Judas, The Thunder and the Untitled Text in the Bruce Codex; (4) other groups perhaps reflecting the Gnostic myth, the Saturninians of Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 1.24.1–2, and Epiphanius' Gnostics, Sethians and Archontics.
13 Cf. Tertullian, Adversus Valentinianos 4.

14 Winrich Löhr (1996), in appealing only to Clement of Alexandria's fragments of Basilides, is perhaps too negative about Irenaeus' evidence.

15 Cf. Testament of Truth NHC IX 56.1–58.6.

16 NHC II 25.16–27.31; Berlin Codex (BG) 64.14–71.2.

17 Adv. Haer. 1.30.15. Pétrement (1991) tries to derive the Gnostics from the Valentinians. See Logan 1996, chapter 1.

18 Cf. Ps.–Hipp. Ref. haer. 6.35.5–7; Tert. Adv. Val. 4.

19 E.g. The Gospel of Truth, On the Resurrection and The Tripartite Tractate from Codex I, The Gospel of Philip from Codex II and the Valentinian treatise and liturgical fragments from Codex XI.

20 On Valentinus, see Quispel 1947; Stead 1969, 1980; Thomassen 2006.

21 Cf. Iren. Adv. haer. 1.6.2; Clem. Alex. Exc. ex Theod. 56.3. On this distinction based on the soteriological principle of 'mutual participation', see Thomassen 2006.

22 On Valentinian theology, see especially Pagels 1972 and Thomassen 2006.

23 It seems a collection of authoritative pseudepigrapha, Gnostic, Valentinian(?), Hermetic.

24 For an intriguing linking of the Gnostics, Valentinians and Origen, see Quispel 1980.

Bibliography

Bianchi, U. (ed.) (1967) Le origini dello Gnosticismo / The Origins of Gnosticism. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Bousset, W. (1907) Hauptprobleme der Gnosis. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Brakke, D. (2010) The Gnostics. Myth, Ritual and Diversity in Early Christianity. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Brent, A. (1995) Hippolytus & the Roman Church in the Third Century. Leiden, The Netherlands; New York and Cologne, Germany: Brill.

Bultmann, R. (1962) Primitive Christianity in its Contemporary Setting. London: Collins.

Doresse, J. (1960) The Secret Books of the Egyptian Gnostics. London: Hollis & Carter.

Foerster, W. (ed.) (1972) Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts. 1. Patristic Evidence. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Jonas, H. (1992) The Gnostic Religion. London: Routledge.

Kasser, R., Meyer, M. and Wurst, G. (eds) (2007) The Gospel of Judas. Critical Edition. Washington, DC: National Geographic Society.

King, K. (2003) What is Gnosticism? Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.

Lampe, P. (2003) From Paul to Valentinus: Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Layton, B. (1980) The Rediscovery of Gnosticism 1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Layton, B. (1981) The Rediscovery of Gnosticism 2. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Layton, B. (1987) The Gnostic Scriptures. Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co.

Layton, B. (1995) 'Prolegomena to the study of ancient gnosticism', in White, L. M. and Yarborough, L. O. (eds) The Social World of the First Christians. Essays in Honor of Wayne A. Meeks. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 334–50.

Logan, A. H. B. (1994) 'Review of Markschies 1992', Journal of Theological Studies 45: 310–13.

Logan, A. H. B. (1996) Gnostic Truth and Christian Heresy. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Logan, A. H. B. (1997) 'The mystery of the five seals: Gnostic initiation reconsidered', Vigiliae Christianae 51: 188–206.

Logan, A. H. B. (2006) The Gnostics. Identifying an Early Christian Cult. London: T&T Clark.

Logan, A. H. B. (2009) 'The Tchacos Codex; another document of the gnostics?', in DeConick, A. (ed.) The Codex Judas Papers. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 3–21.

Löhr, W. (1996) Basilides und seine Schule. Tübingen, Germany: J.C.B. Mohr.

Markschies, C. (1992) Valentinus Gnosticus? Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Meyer, M. (2007) The Nag Hammadi Scriptures. The International Edition. New York: HarperOne.

Pagels, E. H. (1972) 'The Valentinian claim to esoteric exegesis of Romans as basis for anthropological theory', Vigiliae Christianae 26: 241–58.

Pearson, B. A. (1990) Gnosticism, Judaism, and Egyptian Christianity. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Pétrement, S. (1991) A Separate God. London: Darton, Longman and Todd.

Quispel, G. (1947) 'The original doctrine of Valentine', Vigiliae Christianae 1: 43–73.

Quispel, G. (1980) 'Valentinian gnosis and the Apocryphon of John', in Layton 1980: 118–32.

Rasimus, T. (2009) Paradise Reconsidered in Gnostic Mythmaking: Rethinking Sethianism in Light of the Ophite Evidence. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Reitzenstein, R. (1904) Poimandres. Leipzig, Germany: B. G. Teubner.

Reitzenstein, R. (1921) Das iranische Erlösungsmysterium. Bonn: Marcus & Weber.

Roberts, C. H. (1979) Manuscript, Society and Belief in Early Christian Egypt. London: Oxford University Press.

Robinson, J. M. (ed.) (1996) The Nag Hammadi Library in English. 4th ed. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Rudolph, K. (1984) Gnosis. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Sagnard, F. L. M. M. (1947) La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de saint Irénée. Paris: J. Vrin.

Schenke, H.-M. (1974) 'Das Sethianische System nach Nag-Hammadi-Handschriften', in Nagel, P. (ed.) Studia Coptica. Berlin: Akademie, 165–73.

Schenke, H.-M. (1981) 'The phenomenon and significance of gnostic Sethianism', in Layton 1981: 588–616.

Stark, R. (1992) 'How sane people talk to the gods: A rational theory of revelations', in Williams, M. A., Cox, C. and Jaffee, M. S. (eds) Innovations in Religious Traditions. Berlin: De Gruyter, 19–34.

Stark, R. (1996) The Rise of Christianity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Stark, R. and Bainbridge, W. S. (1985) The Future of Religion. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.

Stead, G. C. (1969) 'The Valentinian myth of Sophia', Journal of Theological Studies 20: 75–104.

Stead, G. C. (1980) 'In search of Valentinus', in Layton 1980: 75–102.

Thomassen, E. (2006) The Spiritual Seed. The Church of the 'Valentinians'. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Troeltsch, E. (1931) The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches 1. London: Allen & Unwin.

Williams, M. A. (1996) Rethinking 'Gnosticism'. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Wisse, F. (1971) 'The Nag Hammadi Library and the heresiologists', Vigiliae Christianae 25: 205–23.

Wisse, F. (1981) 'Stalking those elusive Sethians', in Layton 1981: 563–78.

43

MONTANISM

Christine Trevett

Montanism, a movement of prophesying and continuing revelation, originated in second-century Phrygia. Its hub was in Pepouza. Its earliest followers may have called it 'the Prophecy' or 'the New Prophecy',[1] which is what Tertullian its best-known advocate called it.[2] The term 'Montanism' is anachronistic for its earliest phase and appears first in Cyril of Jerusalem's fourth-century Catachetical Lectures (16.8).

Montanism has often been misunderstood and misrepresented, sometimes due to the conflation of disparate elements in opponents' accounts, taken from different periods and places. A 'Montanism' results which never existed. It was not a single, simple phenomenon, and understanding it requires careful distinction between geographical areas and between sources reflecting early and later dates in its history.

Evidence to the decade of the 230s is provided by Eusebius (the Anonymous and Apollonius among others); by Epiphanius (Panarion 48.1–13) using an Anonymous early source (Nasrallah 2003: 155–96; Tabbernee 2007: 50–3; Mader 2012); by Clement of Alexandria (Stromateis 4.13.93.1; 7.17.108.1); Origen (De principiis 2.7.3 and in the Catenae on Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians [Heine 1989a: 99]), as well as by the much-debated 'Hippolytus' in Rome (Brent 1995; Tabbernee 2007: 70–9), in Commentary on Daniel 4.20; Refutatio omnium haeresium 8.19; 10.25–6. Some of Tertullian's writings reflect the New Prophecy's influence.

Although Montanism was mentioned but not condemned at Nicea,[3] 'literary warfare from a distance continued and increased' post 324 CE (Tabbernee 2007: 407).[4] Some later writers were depending on other anti-Montanist sources and/or including Montanism in lists of what by then were deemed heresies, more for completeness than because it was local reality. Later descriptions (Praedestinatus, Epiphanius, Jerome, Augustine and others) included tales of Montanists' infant-defiling rites and bloody Eucharistic offerings.

Knowledge of Montanism continues to advance, not least through study of epigraphy (some inscriptions once reckoned Montanist are now thought not to be); through fresh regional studies of religion in Asia Minor and elsewhere; through research on sources and authors and due to archaeological discovery.

The beginnings of Montanism

'Montanism' derives from the name of Montanus, a prophet who with two female prophets called Prisca/Priscilla and Maximilla initiated a movement within Christianity which spread quickly and came into conflict with the developing catholic tradition. It survived longest in its area of origin and some opponents dubbed it the 'Phrygian/Cataphrygian' heresy (e.g. Eusebius H.E. 5.16.1).

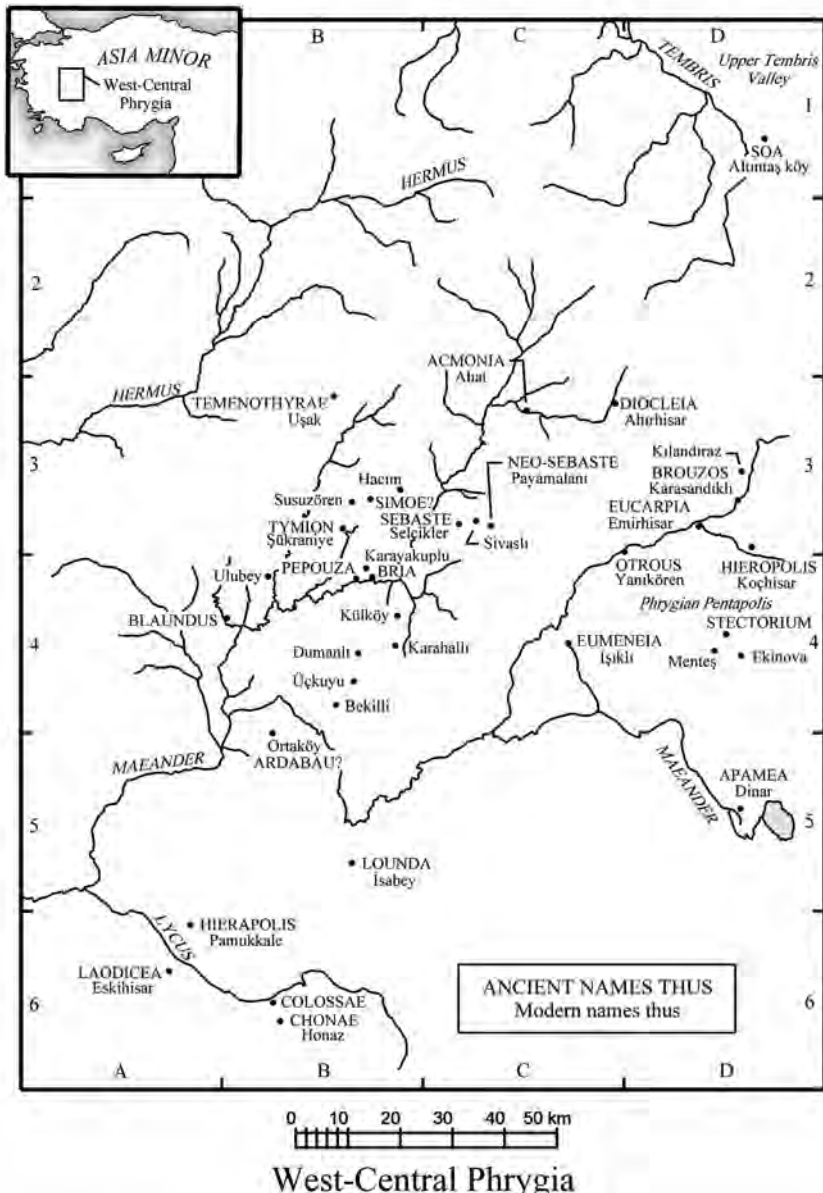
Eusebius of Caesarea in the Chronicon and Epiphanius of Salamis in Pan. 48.1.2 offered conflicting dates for its beginnings: the latter c. 157 CE, the nineteenth year of Antoninus Pius, and Eusebius 171–2, the twelfth year of Marcus Aurelius. The issue is confused by these writers' vagueness or self-contradiction about other dates and events, and by the claim that Thyatira fell to the Prophecy at some point hard to establish (Epiphanius Pan. 51.33 being so opaque). Conclusions vary as to whether the Martyrdom of Polycarp (dated either 150s or 160s) includes a critique of New Prophets (Kraft 1955; Frend 1964; Buschmann 1998; Hirschmann 2005; Dehandschutter 2007; Hartog 2013).


Figure 43.1   Map of west central Phrygia. Courtesy of William Tabbernee

Figure 43.2   Remains of a basilica bath converted to a church, Hierapolis. Photo Christine Trevett

If Maximilla was the last of the three to die, and she was dead by c. 180 CE, then 172–80 CE seems too short a time-span for the rise, expansion and condemnation of the New Prophecy. Its origins may indeed go back to the 150s (Trevett 1996; Hirschmann 2005; Tabbernee 2007; see too, Barnes 2010). Its significance would have become clear in the 160s (Trevett 1996). Asia provides evidence for the kinds of eschatological expectation which fuelled the New Prophecy (the revelation and Papias of Hierapolis, for example). Events of the 160s onward, including famine, warfare, occasional persecution, plague, may have been elements in that eschatological suffering (ponos) of which Maximilla spoke (Epiphanius, Pan. 48.13.1) when describing herself as revealer and interpreter of suffering, covenant and promise (Trevett 1997; Mader 2012).

This movement of renewal stressing spiritual gifts, increased rigour and the promises of God (H.E. 5.16.9 [Anonymous]; Epiphanius, Pan. 48.1.3; 48.13.1 [Maximilla]) spread beyond Phrygia and divided congregations of developing catholic kind (H.E. 5.16.4 [Anonymous]). Christian leaders from Otrous, Cumane, Hierapolis and Apamea challenged it (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.16; 5.19), as did others eastwards in Antioch as well as westwards in Thrace, where Priscilla was confronted (H.E. 5.19.1–3). Quickly it reached Rome and North Africa.

Claudius Apolinarius spearheaded opposition in Hierapolis (H.E. 4.27; 5.16.1; 5.19.2; cf. Jerome, De viris illustribus 26). The relics of some of Philip's daughters were there and the prophets claimed them as foremothers in prophecy.[5] Fourth-century and later epigraphy suggests a continued Montanist presence in Hierapolis as also in the Philadelphia region, home to Ammia and Quadratus (Calder 1923; Trevett 1996: 20–6; Tabbernee 1997a: 53–4, 495–511). The prophets claimed to be successors to them also (Eusebius H.E. 5.17.4).

Ardabau and Pepouza

Montanus first prophesied in a backwater somewhere in 'Phrygian-Mysia' (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.7 [Anonymous]), at a place known as Ardabau. Ardabau has not been located but Mitchell (2013: 169) thinks that plausibly it lay 'a little to the west or north-west of the modern city of Uşak, ancient Temenouthyrai' (Drew-Bear 1979; Mitchell 2013: 169–70). The area has yielded inscriptions which Tabbernee thinks 'likely' to be Montanist (1997a: 61–86).[6] Possibly the name Ardabau had symbolic significance. A similar name features in 4 Ezra/2 Esdras 9:26 (Ardab: Latin, Armenian; Ardap in Syriac and other variants), as the site of a vision and appearance of the city of Zion (Preuschen 1900; Trevett 1996: 21–6; contrast Tabbernee 1997a: 18). Ardabau/'Ardabau' did not become the Prophecy's centre, however. Montanus identified Tymion and Pepouza as 'Jerusalem' places (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.2 [Apollonius and cf. Cyprian Ep. 75.10]; Epiphanius Pan. 49.1) and encouraged people to gather there, perhaps in expectation of descent of the promised Jerusalem (Kraft 1955) or perhaps for creating communities committed to the Prophecy's Christian lifestyle.

Pepouza became administratively and spiritually Montanism's centre. In the sixth century (c. 550 CE under Justinian 1), the soldiery of John of Ephesus destroyed its central shrine to the prophets and Montanist churches were confiscated. Pepouza was mentioned in sources not concerned with Montanism: when its orthodox ecclesiastical representatives went to the second Council of Nicea (787 CE) and to a synod in Constantinople (879 CE). Tymion, however, was known only from the single Eusebian anti-Montanist source.

Where were these places? Was Pepouza near Hierapolis, modern Pamukkale (Eusebius H.E. 5.19.1–4) or north-east/north-west towards Apamea or near Philadelphia (modern Alaşehir)? New Prophecy teaching echoed themes in the letter to Philadelphia which had the 'open door' before it (Revelation 3:7–13), and Quadratus and Ammia (H.E. 5.17.4) were linked with Philadelphia (Calder 1923; Trevett 1996: 20–6; Tabbernee 1997a: 53–4). Other Turkish towns and villages were mooted: Hocalar, Üçkuyu or Yanıkören (ancient Otrous), or perhaps Bekilli, Dumanlı, Uşak, Delihıdırlı and Karahallı.[7]

Figure 43.3   The Tymion inscription. Photo courtesy of William Tabbernee

In July 2000 there emerged the first epigraphy mentioning Tymion (Latinised Tymium)[8]: an imperial rescript from the joint consulships of Antoninus Pius and Septimius Geta (perhaps their first, in 205 CE). A farmer had dug up this item while ploughing, for decades using it as a step at the entrance to his house until its deposit in the Uşak Archaeological Museum in 1998 (Tabbernee and Lampe 2008: 69).

It recorded the response to a local petition and in Latin mentioned the coloni of Tymium and Simoe. Tenants on settlements on an imperial estate had petitioned against their exploitation. It is probably contemporaneous with the anti-Montanist Apollonius.

The region is that of present-day Susuzören, west of Sebaste and south-east of Temenouthyrae (modern Uşak), farther north than scholars surmised. On the assumption that where Tymion was Pepouza could not be far away, an extensive site was soon identified southwards, which matched a variety of criteria for what was known of Pepouza. These included remoteness and in having signs of a Byzantine monastery (Tabbernee and Lampe 2008: 100–7, 251–3). This probable Pepouza lies c. 80 km east of Philadelphia and 'on almost exactly the same latitude' (Tabbernee 2007: 116–17).

Archaeological survey has identified a substantial Roman site. Though not wholly verified, there is growing confidence that Pepouza has been discovered. Tabbernee believes the evidence is 'overwhelming' (Tabbernee and Lampe 2008: 106). Table land stands between Tymion and the site now being excavated – the landing site, perhaps, for the promised Jerusalem (Rev. 3:12–13 [to Philadelphia]; Rev. 21; Epiphanius Pan. 49.1).

Its character

Prophesying had existed among Christians from the outset. Prophecy carried social and political significance and involved claims to authority (Potter 1990, 1995; Trevett 1996; Nasrallah 2003). Questions of authority were at the root of many of the disputes between catholic Christians and Montanists.
Figure 43.4   Remains of a Byzantine monastery, Pepouza. Photo courtesy of Peter Lampe and Bill Tabbernee; for a panoramic view of this site, see Figure 41.5

As the early prophecy spread, church leaders in Asia closed ranks. Its followers seceded from, or were rejected from, congregations. Yet 'Phrygians' shared catholic Christians' understanding of Father, Son and Holy Spirit according to Epiphanius, while also they argued (Pan. 48.1.4; 48.12.1) that 'We too must receive the spiritual gifts'. Such gifts lay behind their separation from catholic Christianity (Nasrallah 2003; Mader 2012: 41–57). Past commentators assumed that claims to charismatic authority versus developing institutional forms of authority explained the disputes (contrast Stewart-Sykes 2005), but institutional forms of authority were not foreign to Montanism. Pneumatology was certainly key to its claims, however, and to its rejection.

The New Prophets had appropriated to their own age the Johannine promise of the Paraclete[9] and fresh revelation. Tertullian saw the Paraclete promise fulfilled through them, with the Holy Spirit continuing the work of ethical renewal and with fresh leadings on discipline (Tabbernee 2007: 158–61). Those who rejected the New Prophecy's 'spiritual' Christians (Tabbernee 2001: 110–12, 2007: 418, 423) came to be labelled unspiritual 'psychics' (psychici), not least by Tertullian (Iei. 1.1; 3.1; 11.1; 16.8; Pud. 21–2; Marc. 4.22.5; Mon. 1.1; see too, Clement of Alexandria Strom. 4.13.93.1). Some 'spiritual' Christians figured in epigraphy at a later date (Tabbernee 1997a: 401–6, 544–6, 550–2).

Montanism's opponents saw matters differently. The original prophesying had involved ecstasy, irrationality and was contrary to the traditional Christian kind. Unbridled, noisy and accompanied by unintelligible speech (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.6–9 [Anonymous], perhaps glossolalia requiring interpretation[10]), they labelled such prophesying false, demonically-inspired, deceitful (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.4; 5.16.7–8; Epiphanius Pan. 48.1.4–5, 48.2.3, 5; Cyprian Ep. 75.10).

Prophecy and receipt of visions remained characteristic of Montanists nevertheless. Evidence from Tertullian, Origen, Firmilian, Epiphanius (Pan. 49.2.3–4) and others point to their continuation,[11] as perhaps does the stele for the fourth-century prophetess Nanas of Kotiaeion.[12] Notably, there was Quintilla, probably a third-century prophet. She left the legacy of the New Prophecy's most famous vision, received in Pepouza (either by her or Priscilla, Epiphanius said uncertainly: Pan. 49.1). Christ in female form had endowed her with wisdom and had spoken of Jerusalem descending at that place (Poirier 1999, cf. Sirach 24:11; Tabbernee 2012a). The Quintillian Montanist sub-sect (Epiphanius Pan. 48.14; 49.1–2; cf. 51.33; Augustine De haeresibus 27) took her name and continued to be interested in matters eschatological (Trevett 1995, 1996: 167–70; Elm 1996).

Post-Constantine, many accusations revolved around Montanus' alleged (and improbable) self-identification as the Paraclete, rather than as the mouthpiece of its revelation.[13] Catholics highlighted pneumatological wrong-thinking of that kind when they were arguing for the divinity of the Holy Spirit (Tabbernee 2012b). Now what had probably been declarations of the source and authority for Montanus' prophetic utterances ('I am . . . ') were being presented as his own self-glorifying claims, e.g. 'I am the Lord God Pantocratōr dwelling in man' (Epiphanius Pan. 48.11.1–7) and 'Neither angel nor envoy, but I the Lord God the Father have come' (Epiphanius Pan. 48.11; cf. Isa. 63.9).

Earlier sources suggested the prophets' conformity with 'mainstream' Christian thinking: they accepted the same scriptures (of both covenants) as other Christians and held the same view of Father, Son and Holy Spirit and the resurrection of the dead (Pan 48.1.3–4), just as Hippolytus wrote that they maintained the same views about Christ and the creator as did his co-religionists (Refut. omn. haer. 8.19; 10.25). Firmilian's letter to Cyprian described a probably Montanist female prophet evangelising and baptising in the 230s CE[14] and told of her using familiar Christian language of Trinitarian type and not diverging from the usual liturgy (Cyprian Ep. 75.10–11). Such common heritage apart though, for him she was a false prophet whose 'Cataphrygian' baptisms would be invalid (Trevett 1999a). A gathering of Asian bishops in Iconium had determined that re-baptism would be needed for turning to the catholic fold (Cyprian Ep. 75.7.1–4 cf. 75.19.4). Cataphrygians 'recognise the same Father and Son with us', Firmilian wrote (Cyprian Ep. 75.19). The bone of contention was the spirit.

Catholic opponents complained about innovations born of the Prophecy's revelation and about the questionable probity of its spokespersons. New Prophets collected and circulated the leaders' teachings. Themiso, a second-generation leader, had penned a general epistle (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.5).

In Rome there were references to their 'countless books' and 'new scriptures' (Hippolytus Refut. omn. haer. 8.19; Eusebius H.E. 6.20.3). In what was probably a war of words and writings, Eusebius' Anonymous hesitated to write against them lest he too be thought to be adding to the New Covenant writings (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.3). Others did write (Tabbernee 2007: 7–18). Concern about hermeneutics, plus the publicity accorded to the female prophets' teachings perhaps added fuel to the debate (Thomas 2003; Pastorelli 2008). Some have seen the New Prophecy's rise as a catalyst for the creation of a Christian canon.[15]

Yet little written by New Prophets/Montanists themselves has survived. Constantine and later imperial legislation ensured the destruction of their literature (Eusebius Vita Const. 3.66; Cod. Theod. xvi. 534) and almost all that is known about them derives from their opponents.

The Prophecy took a harder line on penance and absolution, remarriage and in prescribing more fasts and a dry diet (Trevett 2004, 2007; Ameling 2008; Pastorelli 2008). Tertullian, a rigorist by instinct, responded against accusations of innovation nevertheless: in essentials, the New Prophecy was restorative not innovative. The Paraclete brought teaching formerly deferred and a clear exposition of Scripture's meaning (John 16: 12–14; Virg. 1.4–7; Mon. 2.4 and see 2.2, 4.1; Res. 63). Its discipline was a via media between a catholic tendency to self-gratification and a gnostic or encratite hostility to the gifts of God, and New Prophets merely made obligatory what others left to choice. In the age of the Paraclete and of Christian maturity, believers could now choose to live according to the highest standards, Tertullian thought.[16]

Catholic accusations also related to money and possessions. Montanus organised collectors of contributions and Apollonius told of salaried people spreading the message (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.2). Men of good social standing and sound education were the public face of the churches (Stewart-Sykes 1999) and giving financial support to the New Prophecy's ambassadors might have empowered for ministry people of the lower orders, women among them perhaps. It would also have diverted money and gifts from catholic churches (Trevett 2011). Stephen Mitchell took Montanus', Prisca and Maximilla to have been 'from wealthy Phrygian families' (Mitchell 2013: 191, 194–5, citing a late fourth-century accusation by Jerome [Ep. 133.4 to Ctesipon]). Organised accumulation of money and other contributions pointed to 'excessive reliance on wealth and money', he suggested (Mitchell 2013: 192). I doubt this, but certainly Montanism's followers were not the poor alone. Later epigraphy testifies to loyalists in socio-economic groups which could afford tombstones and sarcophagi (Tabbernee 1997a: 564–9; Mitchell 2013).

Accounts bolstered by gossip and innuendo claimed that Montanus and Maximilla had died by suicide (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.13 [Anonymous]); that a certain Alexander and an unnamed female prophet were blameworthy (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.5–11 [Apollonius]); that Themiso, a confessor, bribed his way from prison (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.5 [Apollonius]); that Theodotus, who experienced heavenly ascents, had died as the result of an unspecified accident (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.4 [Anonymous]). Yet even the Anonymous would not vouch for the truth of such tales.

As it developed, Montanism retained and expanded officialdom. It should not be understood as a reaction against increased clericalisation in churches, for Jerome (Ep. 41 Ad Marcellam) told of a revised and larger Montanist order of clergy: a patriarch (only at Pepouza?), another new office of koinōnos beneath him (Tabbernee 2007: 372–3) in which Hirschmann (2005: 137–8, 143–4) discerned the influence of Phrygian paganism, and with bishops in third place. The tombstone of Praÿlios discovered c. 15 km from Philadelphia, is one of several items which refer to a koinōnos.

There were female as well as male bishops, presbyters and deacons (Epiphanius, Pan. 49.3; cf. John of Damascus, De haeresibus 87; Ambrosiaster, Comm. in Ep. 1 ad Tim. 3.8–11). Epiphanius knew that female roles might be defended by appeal to Miriam, Eve and Galatians 3:28 (Epiphanius, Pan. 49.2 [Quintillianists]) and that lamp-bearing virgins, dressed in white, prophesied during Quintillianist worship (Pan. 49.2.3–4). The tombstone from Ancyra of Stephania, 'one of the five lamp-bearing virgins' and their leader seems to support this (Mitchell 1997: 101 no. 49; Tabbernee 1997a: 518–25) just as other epigraphy confirms a range of Montanist personnel (see, e.g. Tabbernee 1997a: 509–18; Hirschmann 2004: 160–7 [interpreting the Nanas inscription as that of a female bishop]; Mitchell 2005, 2013: 184–6). It was not unknown for women to hold office in churches (Eisen 2000; Madigan and Osiek 2005), though from the outset Montanist women as well as men were in the public eye.

Tertullian's conservative views on women seem to have remained largely unmodified, despite acknowledging and quoting Prisca and Maximilla. He described an orderly female visionary who did not impinge on the worship pattern of the church and who, despite ecstasy, visions, auditions and knowledge of healing, shared her insights after the service and in a less public context (Anima 9.4). Congregational prophecy, receipt of visions and even children speaking words of warning 'filled with the Holy Spirit and in ecstasy' (Trevett 1999a) were nevertheless realities in Carthage in Cyprian's day (Cyprian, Ep. 16.41).

Montanist zeal for martyrdom has often been over-estimated, possibly due to Tertullian's stance (Fuga; Ad Martyras) and given references to mass suicides in Montanism's death throes, when its followers were greatly pressurised (Procopius Hist. arc. 11.23; Theophanes Chron. AM 6214 [722 CE]; Turtledove 1982: 93). For Klawiter, persecution and its teaching on martyrdom had been key factors in the New Prophecy's rise and condemnation. He associated reverence for confessors' 'power of the keys' with Montanist women's clerical office (Klawiter 1975, 1980; contrast McGinn-Moorer 1989: 9–11; Trevett 1996: 190–5). Pre Constantine, some Montanists did suffer (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.20–22) and eagerness for death would not have been a novelty or peculiar to them (Powell 1975; Trevett 1996: 95–105, 121–9; Birley 2006) but on review of the evidence Tabbernee has discerned no substantial difference between Montanists and others in attitudes to martyrdom and flight in persecution (Tabbernee 2007: 167–260).

Expectation of the End had figured in the Prophecy's earliest teachings. It owed much to the kinds of ideas preserved in the book of Revelation, 4 Ezra and other sources (Trevett 1996: 95–105; Stewart-Sykes 1997, but note Hill 2001; Mitchell 2013: 194–6). Maximilla, who was probably the longest surviving of the three, predicted the end of prophecy and the End after her death. Neither a successor of note nor the promised End followed it (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.18–19; Epiphanius Pan. 48.2.4) and the movement accommodated. It did not abandon the expectation, though. In Book 11 of the Chronicle, Michael the Syrian gave an account of the sixth-century destruction of the reliquary and bones of the prophets in Pepouza. Montanists grieved and expected that the world was about to be destroyed (Chron. 9.33).

In many respects, the Prophecy had been more a determined and discomforting statement of emphases present already in Asian Christianity than something wholly novel (Aland 1955, 1960a; Trevett 1989). Opposition clarified and sharpened its distinctiveness, however. Pacian of Barcelona (in Ep. 1 Ad Sympronianum [PL 13.1053]) listed its dissenting views about repentance, apostolic and prophetic succession, 'the day of the Passover' (Quartodeciman in sympathy and see Sozomon H.E. 7.18.12–14), authoritative writings, the name 'catholic', and more. The evidence of Epiphanius, Augustine, Jerome and others suggests that millenarian ideology and respect for the ministries of women survived in later groups (Trevett 1995, 1999b; Elm 1996). Groups were now referred to by places of origin: Phrygians/Cataphrygians, Pepouzians, or by names recalling figures of the past: Priscillians, Quintillians, Montanists.

Aberrant Trinitarian theology was a recurring accusation against later Montanists and affinity with various brands of Monarchianism. Earlier though, in the third century, Hippolytus had recounted that one group among Roman Montanists had been influenced by the theology of Noetus (Adv. omn. haer. 8.19; 10.26; cf. later Theodoret, Haereticarum fabularum compendium 3.2 [PG 83, 401–4]). It seems unlikely that just decades after the Prophecy's beginnings, Tertullian (McGowan 2006) would have aligned himself with a group which in general held to such an understanding of God at that time.

Fragmentation and decline, persecution and seizure of its assets were factors in the eventual demise of the New Prophecy/Montanism, long after what De Labriolle (1913b) dubbed La Crise Montaniste.

Montanus, Priscilla, Maximilla

Jensen argued that Montanus should be seen as literally the 'advocate' (paraklētos) for the two females (Jensen 1996: 135–8) and that Priscilla had been the movement's leader. Her case does not convince, though the women seem to have been no less influential than Montanus. He was accused of lust for leadership (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.7 [Anonymous]), but the attributable prophetic sayings in early anti-Montanist sources and in Tertullian came mostly from the women (Trevett 1996: 159–62; Tabbernee 1997a: 19). Later writers did portray the women as spiritual dependants or lesser associates of Montanus. Indeed as Montanism joined lists of heresies, so Christian rhetoric turned the same women into madwomen and whores, or into the noble rich who had seduced Christian communities with money (Chronicon Pascale 240 [PG 92.641–44]; Timothy of Constantinople De iis qui ad ecclesiam accedunt [PG 86.20]; Jerome, Ep. 33.4 Ad Ctesiphon). Montanus' reputation fared no better. Such descriptions must be treated with caution, however.

The so-called 'oracles' of these three prophets[17] are in some cases only attenuated sayings or prophetic self-designation formulae. Stewart-Sykes (1999) regards lack of wordiness as evidence that sometimes a complete saying has been recorded, from what were rural types with little education. As preserved, though, mostly within hostile sources, sayings stand divorced from their original contexts, sometimes seeming to be a riposte in an extended but unpreserved debate. Mostly (Tertullian Pud. 21.7; Fuga 9.4; Anima 55.5 being exceptions), they are presented to seem ludicrous or evidence of hubris. In the past, scholars showed relatively little interest in their form, content and likeness to other prophetic work. That has changed.[18]

Montanus

Montanus had the Pauline charism of administration as well as being a teacher and prophet (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.2), orchestrating gatherings at Pepouza and Tymion, and organising a system for collections in money and kind (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.2; cf. 1 Cor. 12:28). One early anti-Montanist claimed he was a recent convert to Christianity (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.7) and later Jerome portrayed him as 'a castrated and emasculated man' (ubscisum et semivirum: [Ep. 41.4]), suggestive of devotion to the goddess Cybele. Alternatively, he was said to have been a priest of Apollo (the latter according to the Dialexis or Debate of a Montanist and an Orthodox Christian [Ficker 1905; Heine 1989a: 123; Berruto Martone 1999: 82–3, 156–7]).[19] Tabbernee and Lampe (2008: 4–5) are sympathetic to the latter claim. Yet had it been so, I would have expected the earliest opponents of Montanus to have seized on the fact.

Montanus' best-known utterance (paralleled elsewhere) suggests a context of debate about the nature of inspiration: 'Behold, man is like a lyre, and I flit about like a plectron; man sleeps, and I awaken him; behold it is the Lord who changes the hearts of men and gives men a heart' (Epiphanius, Pan. 48.4.1. Mader 2012: 190–8).

Priscilla

Tertullian called her Prisca, the non-diminutive form of the name, and wrote of her as a mouthpiece of the Paraclete (Res. 11.2). Some of her sayings are preserved in his work and some unattributed ones may be hers: about death by martyrdom being preferable to other deaths, such as pregnancy-related kinds, and in exhortation against fearing exposure to public gaze and praise (Fuga 9.4). Her parenetic words on those who ministered in holiness told of a church rightly guided by the 'spiritual' (pneumatikos) rather than 'psychic' individual: 'For purification produces harmony' and visions and auditions followed (Tertullian, Cast. 10.5). Her statement that 'they are flesh yet they hate the flesh' (Tertullian, Res. 11) may have originated in an anti-gnostic or anti-docetic context.[20]

Maximilla

For Epiphanius' early anti-Phrygian source, the names of these prophets spoke of their barbarous cradling (Pan. 48.12.3). Maximilla's death by c. 179–80 has come to be regarded as an important point of division between the original New Prophecy and subsequent developments. Epiphanius' anti-Phrygian wrote of her dismissively (Pan. 48.13.1) as allegedly a fount of exhortation (parakalouthia) and teaching (Mader 2012: 145–50, 186–9) but the saying, 'Do not hear me but hear Christ' (Epiphanius, Pan. 48.12.4) states her claim to being a prophetic mouthpiece.

Maximilla's utterances about eschatology and her interpretation of 'signs of the times' proved troublesome. The saying on being an interpreter of covenant and suffering has been noted already.

Figure 43.5   Saints Perpetua and Felicity. Icon by Br. Robert Lenz OFM, photo courtesy of Trinity Stores

She also predicted future wars and revolutions (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.18 [Anonymous]) and that 'After me there will no longer be a prophet but the end' (Epiphanius, Pan. 48.2.4). She was a focus for opposition and amid allegations of false prophecy and possession, female prophets (but no men in the surviving records) attracted the attention of exorcists. Maximilla and an unnamed later prophetess were so confronted (Eusebius H.E. 5.18.13; cf. 5.19.3; Cyprian Ep. 75 [Firmilian]; Trevett 1996: 153–8, 1999a).

Maximilla's best-known saying reflects these tensions in Asia Minor: 'I am driven away like a wolf from the sheep', she complained (Eusebius H.E. 5.16.17). 'I am not a wolf. I am word and spirit and power'. The language is reminiscent both of Matthew (7:15) and of Paul's words about his own power in weakness (1 Cor. 2:4).

Ultimately, Maximilla was the only one of the original prophets whose name was not appended to some form of the movement.

Montanism in North Africa

The New Prophecy of North Africa was a second phase of the movement. Carthage and the idiosyncratic Tertullian were significant (Schöllgen 1984; Robeck 1992; Rankin 1995). He had espoused the Prophecy by 207 CE. Far from being driven out, as had happened in Asia (Fischer 1974, 1977), its followers seem to have remained integrated in Carthage's congregations so that Powell (1975) wrote of a Montanist ecclesiola in ecclesia.[21]

The Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis described martyrdoms in the year 203. The document was redacted by someone sympathetic to Montanism and in the past some believed that to have been Tertullian.[22] Writers are divided on whether the martyrs themselves, among them Perpetua, of good family, and the slave Felicitas, were of the New Prophecy. Perpetua's visions and dreams included being a male gladiator for Christ and receiving curds from a shepherd, suggestive of Artotyrites' practice mentioned in some later sources (Epiphanius Pan. 49.1–2 and Augustine Haer. 28). In the arena, Perpetua appeared 'in spirit and in ecstasy' (Pass. Perp. 20.8).

Post-Tertullian we know little of how loyalists of the Prophecy/Montanism stood in relation to catholic congregations. Augustine (Haer. 86) claimed that Tertullian had seceded both from Montanism and the catholic faith and had created his own 'Tertullianist' sect. Alternatively, 'Tertullianists' have been taken as simply synonymous with Montanists in Africa (Barnes 1971: 258–9; cf. Aland 1960b: 161–3; Powell 1975) or perhaps as a group post both Tertullian and Cyprian, a group which had left the catholic mainstream in Carthage (see Tabbernee 1997a: 475–6, 2007: 266–9). Praedestinatus (Haer. 1.86) claimed that 'Tertullianists' became catholic Christians in Augustine's time.

Augustine himself mentioned Cataphrygians, Quintillians and Pepouzians, but he probably had no direct experience of Montanist groups (Tabbernee 2007: 266–71), though he knew of their well-documented views on the Paraclete, digamy, etc. and of tales of bloody rites involving infants (Contra Faustum 32.17; Haer. 26–7, 86).[23] Decades earlier though, in the 360s CE, Optatus of Milevis in Numidia had said that there were no Montanists in Africa (Schism. Donat. 1.9.1). There were plenty of Donatists, and some Montanists may have slid sideways into their ranks.[24]

Tabbernee discussed epigraphy suggestive of Montanist presence there even to the sixth century. Some of it may be Donatist, he acknowledges, and reverence for north African martyrs who were called Montanus/Muntanus further clouds the issue (Frend 1980 [1940]; Tabbernee 1997a: 105–23, 444–51, 534–44).

Montanism in Rome

The New Prophecy, like most things, gravitated to Rome[25] and Asiatics were probably well-represented among its followers there. The claim by Praedestinatus that bishop Soter condemned Rome's 'Tertullianists' (Haer. 1.26; 1.86) is anachronistic, though the New Prophecy may have reached Rome during his leadership.

Tertullian (Prax. 1.5) claimed that one Roman bishop had recognised the New Prophecy and had penned letters of peace, before being persuaded against it by 'Praxeas' ('busybody'), an Asian anti-Montanist and modalistic Monarchian. Would the bishop have been Eleutherus (c. 174–189) or Victor (c. 189–199)? The former had received letters of embassy from confessing Christians in Gaul in 177 CE, such as were also sent to establish peace in churches in Asia and Phrygia (Eusebius H.E. 5.3.4). Tabbernee thinks the bishop's action related to Asian/Phrygian adherents of the Prophecy in Rome (Tabbernee 2007: 36–40) and that he was Victor. The debate between the 'Phrygian' Proclus and the Roman catholic Gaius (Eusebius H.E. 2.25.5–7; 3.28.2; 3.31.4; 6.20.3 cf. Pseudo-Tertullian, Adv. omn. haer. 7) is probably to be dated under bishop Zephyrinus, around the turn of the second and third centuries.

Heine took the prophets' teaching on the Paraclete to have been a Roman Montanist innovation (Heine 1987, 1989b), which does not convince.[26] Rome may have become a seat of opposition to Johannine writings, however. Gaius attributed the Johannine Gospel and the Apocalypse to Cerinthus, according to 'Hippolytus' (as cited by the twelfth-century Dionysius Barsalibi, Comm. Apoc. 1). Then in Pan. 51.3.1–2, Epiphanius made an association between the anti-Montanist Gaius and so-called 'Alogi' who rejected John's Gospel and the Apocalypse.[27] The New Prophets valued both writings, yet 'Alogism', if a response to them, might have stemmed from Asia or Rome. Tabbernee doubts that a verifiable group is being talked about and thinks that 'Alogi' may be a product of Epiphanius' imagination (Tabbernee 2007: 68–9).

Questions of authority (prophetic and apostolic) and heritage were in the air. Romans and Asiatics declared the merits and relics of their predecessors (Tabbernee 1997b) and defended their traditions (Eusebius H.E. 2.25.6–7; 6.20.3; cf. 3.31.2–5; 5.24). 'Hippolytus' (Brent 1995; Pastorelli 2008) wrote of Montanists' 'countless books' and of their reverence for women's utterances. It was in response to these, he wrote, that they had devised 'new feasts, fasts and the eating of dry food and cabbage' (Refut. omn. haer. 8.19).

Montanists survived longer in the east. Rome excepted, they had probably disappeared in the west by the end of the fourth century (contrast in the east, Sozomen Hist. eccl. 2.32.5; Theodoret Haer. 3.6). Tabbernee argued for a thriving community in Rome, especially in the region of the Via Aurelia and with the likes of the Galatian Ablabes, a pneumatikos ('spiritual' Christian) buried there.[28] Epigraphy suggests they would have survived the fourth century (Tabbernee 1997a: 452–62, 544–7), and Jerome sought to arm the Roman Marcella with theological ammunition against their teachings (Ep. 41.1).

Honorius the western emperor (393–423) passed legislation against Montanists among others, and ordered the burning of books (Cod. Theod. 16.5.34; 16.5.40; 16.5.43), and under bishop Innocent I (402–17) some Cataphrygians were exiled to an unnamed monastery (Liber Pontificalis 57.1–2).

What writers have said about Montanism

McGinn-Moorer (1989), Trevett (1996), Tabbernee (1997a, 2007) and Doherty (2011) reflect on trends in scholarship and historiography. The Christian and more specifically Asian Christian characteristics of the early New Prophecy have often been highlighted.[29] Since Arnold in the seventeenth century, the New Prophecy has sometimes been seen as an attempt to stem secularisation in the churches (De Soyres 1878; Bonwetsch 1881; Von Harnack 1883), others stressing a struggle of prophetic power against that of the increasingly entrenched clerical kind. Women's roles have figured in many studies of Montanism.[30] Its indebtedness (or otherwise) to Phrygian paganism has been explored regularly, since the writing of August Neander, e.g. by Ramsay (1895–7), by Klawiter (1975: 129–41; cf. Ramelli 2005) who noted parallels between descriptions of Montanus and the language and ideas of Lucian's satire of Alexander of Abonuteichos (similarly active in the 160s) and with varying conclusions by Schepelern (1929), Hirschmann (2005) and others who touched on local influences.[31]

Prophets were no novelty in Asia Minor (Mitchell 1993; Huttner 2013 on the Lycus valley) but for this writer, as others, Montanism was not an alliance with Phrygian paganism generally and the cult of Cybele in particular. It had no deep roots in paganism (Mitchell 1993: II. 40), despite 'a few interesting parallels' between some of its characteristics and native pagan practices (Tabbernee 2007: 421–2).

Was Montanism a Jewish Christian phenomenon or a product of competing trajectories of Pauline Christianity (McGinn-Moorer 1989)? Did it emerge from conflicts of culture, nationalism or a revolt of the 'rural uneducated' (Frend 1980, 1988a, 1988b; Stewart-Sykes 1999)? Such questions figured. Increasingly, though, scholarship moved to examination of primary data rather than positing overarching historical schema. The body of epigraphy grows and is being (re)assessed (Mitchell 1993, 2013; Tabbernee 1997a). Studies of religion in Asia Minor continue (Mitchell 1993; Mitchell and Van Nuffelen 2010; Huttner 2013). Twenty-first century research is reaping the benefits of the digital age and of international scholarly co-operation (Breytenbach 2011; Markschies 2011).

Notes

1 Eusebius, H.E. 5.16.4; cf. 14 (Anonymous); 5.11.2 (Serapion of Antioch).

2 Adversus Marcionem 3.24.4; 4.22.4; De resurrectione carnis 63.9; Adversus Praxean 30.5; De monogamia 14.4.

3 See Jerome, Ep. 84.4; Socrates, Historia Ecclesiastica 1.13.7; Sozomen, Historia Ecclesiastica 2.18. Also Sozomen, H.E. 2.32.2; Eusebius, Vita Const. 3.64–5; Canon 8 of the Council of Laodicea; Codex Theod. 16.

4 Tabbernee discusses ecclesiastical and state opposition c. 165–324 CE and c. 324–550 (2007: 1–124, 263–388).

5 See H.E. 5.17.2–3 (Alcibiades but Miltiades is intended) cf. too Origen, Catenae (Heine 1989a: 99); Didymus, Trin. 3.41.3; Epiphanius, Pan. 49.2.

6 On Ardabau Strobel (1980: 38–49), Mitchell (1984: 226–7), Trevett (1996: 19–26), Tabbernee (1997a: 18, 53) and Hirschmann (2005: 50–1). Another suggested site, near Ortaköy, is under a reservoir (Tabbernee 2007: 5 n. 8).

7 Calder (1931), Strobel (1980), Markschies (1994), Tabbernee (1997a: 27–8, 359, 477), Tabbernee and Lampe (2008: 15–29, 39–44).

8 See Lampe (2002, 2004), Lampe and Tabbernee (2004), Tabbernee and Lampe (2008: 50–74), Hauken et al. (2003).

9 Epiphanius' Anonymous in Pan. 48.11.5–6; Hippolytus, Refut. omn. haer. 8.19; Tertullian, De anima 55.5; De virginibus velandis 1.8 and 10; De res. carn. 11.2; Pseudo-Tertullian, Adv. omn. haer. 7; Origen, Princ. 2.7.3; Didymus, De trinitate 3.41.1 and also Tabbernee (2001), Wilhite (2013).

10 See Von Campenhausen (1969: 18), Ash (1976), Burghardt (1979), McGinn-Moorer (1989: 3–6), Trevett (1996: 90–1) and Tabbernee 2007: 92–8.

11 Firmilian of (Cappadocian) Caesarea to Cyprian in Carthage (Cyprian, Epistula 75 [74 in some editions]) dates from the 250s CE (Trevett 1999a) and comments on a prophesying woman and those 'who are called Cataphrygians and attempt to employ new prophecies' (Epistula 75.7).

12 Discussed by Trevett (1999b), Eisen (2000), Poirier (2001), Hirschmann (2004), Tabbernee (2007: 375–6).

13 Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. 16.8; Pseudo-Jerome, Haer. 9; Augustine, Bon. viduit. 4.6; Theodoret, Haer. 3.1. See Pelikan (1956: 102–4), De Soyres (1878: 68–75), Trevett (1996: 214–23) and Tabbernee (2001, 2007: 119–24, 377–83).

14 On this woman, Trevett (1999a), Tabbernee (2007: 80), pace Jensen (1996: 182–6), Eisen (2000: 72, 87).

15 For discussion, see Goodspeed (1926: 67, 78–9), Walls (1964), Paulsen (1978), Robeck (1987 cf. also Denzey 2001), Thomas (2003), Marjanen (2005), Tabbernee (2007: 106–110) and Pastorelli (2008).

16 Tertullian, e.g. Virg. 1.5 and 8; Res. 11; Mon. 2.1.4 and 10; 15.1–3; De pudicitia 1; De exhortatione castitatis 6.2; De ieiunio 15.

17 Sayings of the three appear in a number of collections of Montanist Testimonia, sometimes enumerated differently (Trevett 1996: 248–9, after Froehlich 1973: 96), including De Labriolle (1913a), Heine (1989a), Huber (1985: 218–22) and Aland (1960a).

18 See Blanchetière (1978, 1979), Aune (1983), Groh (1985), Forbes (1986), Elm (1994), Trevett (1996), McGinn-Moorer (1997), Stewart-Sykes (1999), Mader (2012).

19 Strobel (1980: 34–8, 45); Trevett (1996: 8–10, 77–9); Berruto Martone (1999: 82–3, 156–7); Hirschmann (2005: 40, 117–19). Hirschmann points to the interrelation of the cults of Apollo and Cybele in the region of Phrygia concerned.

20 Montanism's relations with Gnosticism figure with differing emphases and conclusions in Neander (1842–47), Davies (1955), Froehlich (1973) and Denzey (2001).

21 See Lawlor (1908), Robeck (1992), Van der Lof (1991), Rankin (1995) and Tabbernee (1997a: 54–5, 142).

22 On Tertullian and the Passio see Trevett (1996: 176–84), Tabbernee (1997a: 57–9), Butler (2006: 49–58), Markschies (2012) and Kitzler (2015: 29–34).

23 See Augustine, Haer. 26–7; cf. Epiphanius, Pan. 48.14–15 and also Trevett (1995), Elm (1996) and Tabbernee (2007: 266–71) for discussion of Augustine and Montanism.

24 In other times and places some Montanists may have moved to the rigorist Novatianists rather than conform to orthodoxy (Tabbernee 2007: 396–7; Hirschmann 2008, 2015).

25 See Klawiter (1975: 191–243), La Piana (1925), Lampe (2003) and Trevett (1996: 55–66).

26 See variously, Trevett (1996: 62–6); Stewart-Sykes (1997: 482–30); Pastorelli (2008); Seim (2010).

27 See De Labriolle (1913a: lxxii–lxxiii), Bludau (1925), Paulsen (1978: 25–7), Heine (1987, 1989b) and Trevett (1996: 139–41).

28 Tabbernee (1997a: 452–6). See too pp. 456–62 and 544–7 for similar Roman inscriptional material of this period.

29 See Kraft (1955), Aland (1955, 1960a), McGinn-Moorer (1989), Trevett (1996), Tabbernee (1997a) and Stewart-Sykes (1999).

30 Examples are Fiorenza (1983: 300–3), Huber (1985), McGinn-Moorer (1989: 276–329), Jensen (1996) and Trevett (1996).

31 See Freeman (1950), Strobel (1980), Daunton-Fear (1982), Frend (1988b) and Elm (1996).

Bibliography

Aland, K. (1955) 'Der Montanismus und die kleinasiatische Theologie', Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 46: 109–16.

Aland, K. (1960a) 'Bemerkungen zum Montanismus und zur frühchristlichen Eschatologie', in Kirchengeschichtliche Entwürfe: Alte Kirche, Reformation und Lutherthum, Pietismus und Erweckungsbewegung. Gütersloh, Germany: Gerd Mohn, 105–48.

Aland, K. (1960b) 'Augustin und der Montanismus', in Aland 1960a: 149–64.

Ameling, W. (2008) 'The Christian lapsi in Smyrna 250 A.D. (Martyrium Pionii 12–14)', Vigiliae Christianae 62: 133–60.

Arnold, G. (1699–1700) Unparteiische Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie: vom Anfang des Neuen Testaments bis auf das Jahr Christi 1688. 2 vols. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Fritsch.

Ash, J. L. (1976) 'The decline of ecstatic prophecy in the early church', Theological Studies 37: 227–52.

Aune, D. E. (1983) Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Barnes, T. D. (1971) Tertullian: A Historical and Literary Study. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Barnes, T. D. (2010) 'William Tabbernee and Montanism', Cristianesimo nella storia 31: 945–56.

Berruto Martone, A. M. (ed.) (1999) Dialogo di un montanista con un ortodosi. Bologna, Italy: Edizioni Dehoniane.

Birley, A. (2006) 'Voluntary martyrs in the early church: Heroes or heretics?', Cristianesimo nella storia 27: 99–127.

Blanchetière F. (1978, 1979) 'Le montanism originel', Revue des Sciences Religieuses 52: 118–34 and 53: 1–22.

Bludau, A. (1925) Die ersten Gegner der Johannesschriften (Bib. St. 22). Freiburg, Germany: Herder.

Bonwetsch, G. N. (1881) Die Geschichte des Montanismus. Erlangen, Germany: Andreas Deichert (1972 reprint Hildesheim: Gersternberg).

Brent, A. (1995) Hippolytus and the Roman Church in the Third Century: Communities in Tension Before the Emergence of a Monarch Bishop. Supplements to VigiliaeChristianae 31. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Breytenbach, C. (2011) 'The rise and expansion of Christianity in Asia Minor: First steps towards a new Harnack', Early Christianity 2: 547–52.

Burghardt, W. J. (1979) 'Primitive Montanism: Why condemned?', in Hadidian, D. Y. (ed.) From Faith to Faith: Essays in Honor of Donald G. Miller. Pittsburgh, PA: The Pickwick Press, 339–56.

Buschmann, G. (1998) Das Martyrium des Polykarp. Kommentar zu den Apostolischen Vaetern, Band 6. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Butler, R. D. (2006) The New Prophecy and 'New Visions'. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Calder, W. M. (1923) 'Philadelphia and Montanism', Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 7: 309–53.

Calder, W. M. (1931) 'The New Jerusalem of the Montanists', Byzantion 6: 421–5.

Daunton-Fear, A. (1982) 'The ecstasies of Montanus', Studia Patristica 17: 648–51.

Davies, J. G. (1955) 'De resurrectione carnis LXIII: A note on the origins of Montanism', Journal of Theological Studies 6: 90–4.

Dehandschutter, B. (2007) Polycarpiana. Studies on Martyrdom and Persecution in Early Christianity. Collected Essays (ed. J. Leemans). Louvain, Belgium: Louvain University Press/Peeters.

De Labriolle, P. H. M. C. (1913a) Les Sources de l'Histoire du Montanisme Textes Grecs, Latins, Syriaques. Paris: Ernest Leroux.

De Labriolle, P. H. M. C. (1913b) La Crise Montaniste. Paris: Ernest Leroux.

Denzey, N. (2001) 'What did the Montanists read?', Harvard Theological Review 94: 427–48 journals.cambridge.org/action/displayIssue?jid=HTR&volumeId=94&seriesId=0&issueId=04.

De Soyres, J. (1878) Montanism and the Primitive Church: A Study in the Ecclesiastical History of the Second Century. Cambridge, UK: Deighton Bell & Co. (1965 reprint, London: George Bell & Sons).

Doherty, B. G. F. (2011) 'The Montanist milieu: History and historiography in the study of Montanism'. PhD Dissertation. Sydney: Macquarie University.

Drew-Bear, T. (1979) 'The city of Temenouthyrae in Phrygia', Chiron 19: 275–302.

Eisen, U. E. (2000, German original 1996) 'The tomb epigraph of the prophet Nanas', in Women Officeholders in Early Christianity: Epigraphal and Literary Studies. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 63–87.

Elm, S. (1994) 'Montanist oracles', in Fiorenza, E. S. (ed.) Searching the Scriptures. vol. 2: A Feminist Commentary. New York: Crossroad, 131–8.

Elm, S. (1996) '"Pierced by bronze needles": Anti-Montanist charges of ritual stigmatization in their fourth century context', Journal of Early Christian Studies 4: 409–40.

Ficker, G. (1905) 'Widerlegung eines Montanisten', Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 26: 447–63.

Fiorenza, E. S. (1983), In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins. London: SCM Press.

Fischer, J. A. (1974) 'Die antimontanistischen Synoden des 2./3. Jahrhunderts', Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum 6(2): 241–73.

Fischer, J. A. (1977) 'Angebliche Synoden des 2. Jahrhunderts', Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum 9(2): 231–52.

Forbes, C. (1986) 'Early Christian inspired speech and Hellenistic popular religion', Novum Testamentum 28: 257–68.

Freeman, G. (1950) 'Montanism and the pagan cults of Phrygia', Dominican Studies 3: 297–316.

Frend, W. H. C. (1964) 'A note on the chronology of the martyrdom of Polycarp and the outbreak of Montanism', in Courcelle, J. et al. (eds) Oikumene: Studi Paleocristiani pubblicati in onore del Concilio Ecumenico Vaticano II. Catania, Sicily: Universitá di Catania.

Frend, W. H. C. (1980 [1979 and 1940]) 'Town and countryside in early Christianity' [1979] and 'The memoriae apostolorum in Roman North Africa' [1940] in Town and Country in the Early Christian Centuries. London: Variorum Reprints: chs. 1 and 8.

Frend, W. H. C. (1988a) 'Montanism: Research and problems', in Archaeology and History in the Study of Early Christianity. London: Variorum Reprints: ch. 6.

Frend, W. H. C. (1988b) 'Montanism: A movement of prophecy and regional identity in the early church', Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 70: 25–34.

Froehlich, K. (1973) 'Montanism and Gnosis', in Neiman, D. and Schatkind, M. (eds) The Heritage of the Early Church: Essays in Honour of G.V. Florovsky. Orientalia Christiana Analecta. Rome: Pont. Inst. Stud. Or.: 91–111.

Goodspeed, E. J. (1926) The Formation of the New Testament. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Groh, D. E. (1985) 'Utterance and exegesis: Biblical interpretation in the Montanist crisis', in Groh, D. and Jewett, R. (eds) The Living Text: Essays in Honour of Ernest W. Saunders. Lanham, MD and London: University Press of America, 73–95.

Hartog, P. (2013) Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians and the Martyrdom of Polycarp. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Heine, R. E. (1987) 'The role of the Gospel of John in the Montanist controversy', The Second Century 6: 1–19.

Heine, R. E. (1989a) The Montanist Oracles and Testimonia. Macon, GA.: Mercer University Press.

Heine, R. E. (1989b) 'The Gospel of John and the Montanist debate at Rome', Studia Patristica 21: 95–100.

Hill, C. E. (2001) Regnum Caelorum: Patterns of Millennial Thought in Early Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Hirschmann, V.-E. (2004) '"Nach Arte der Engel": Die phrygische Prophetin Nanas', Epigraphica Anatolica 37: 160–7.

Hirschmann, V.-E. (2005) Horrenda Secta: Untersuchungen zum frühchristlichen Montanismus und seinen Verbindungen zur paganen Religion Phrygiens. Stuttgart, Germany: Franz Steiner Verlag.

Hirschmann, V.-E. (2008) 'Die phrygische Opposition. Zu Novatianern und Montanisten im westlichen Kleinasien', in Schellenberg, H. M., Hirschmann, V. E. and Krieckhaus, A. (eds) A Roman Miscellany: Essays in Honour of Anthony R. Birley on His Seventieth Birthday. Gdansk, Poland: Akanthina, 42–8.

Hirschmann, V.-E. (2015) Die Kirche der Reinen Kirchen- und sozialhistorische Studie zu den Novatianern im 3. bis 5. Jahrhundert. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr-Siebeck.

Huber, E. C. (1985) Women and the Authority of Inspiration: A Re-examination of Two Prophetic Movements from a Contemporary Feminist Perspective. New York and London: University Press of America.

Huttner, U. (2013) Early Christianity in the Lycus Valley. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Jensen, A. (1996) God's Self-Confident Daughters: Early Christianity and the Liberation of Women, trans. O. C. Dean, Jr. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos.

Kitzler, P. (2015) From 'Passio Perpetuae' to 'Acta Perpetuae': Recontextualizing a Martyr Story in the Literature of the Early Church. Trans. J. Šrejber and R. Thompson. Berlin: de Gruyter.

Klawiter, F. C. (1975) The new prophecy and early Christianity: The origin, nature and development of Montanism AD 165–220. PhD dissertation. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago.

Klawiter, F. C. (1980) 'The role of martyrdom and persecution in developing the priestly office of women in early Christianity: A case study of Montanism', Church History 49: 251–61.

Kraft, H. (1955) 'Die altkirchliche Prophetie und die Entstehung des Montanismus', Theologische Zeitschrift 11: 249–71.

Lampe, P. (2002) 'The Phrygian Archaeological Surface Survey Project of the University of Heidelberg and the discovery of Pepouza and Tymion', Zeitschrift für antikes Christentum 6: 117–20.

Lampe, P. (2003) From Paul to Valentinus: Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries. London: T&T Clark (trans. from Die Stadtrömischen Christen 1989).

Lampe, P. (2004) 'Die montanistischen Tymion und Pepouza im Lichte der neuen Tymioninschrift', Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum/Journal of Ancient Christianity 8: 498–512.

Lampe, P. and Tabbernee, W. (2004) 'Das Reskript von Septimius Severus und Caracalla an die Kolonen der kaiserlichen Domäne von Tymion und Simoe', Epigraphica Anatolica: Zeitschrift für Epigraphik und historische Geographie Anatoliens 37: 169–78.

La Piana, G. (1925) 'The Roman church at the end of the second century', Harvard Theological Review 18: 201–77.

Lawlor, H. J. (1908) 'The heresy of the Phrygians', Journal of Theological Studies 9: 481–99.

Mader, H. E. (2012) Montanistische Orakel und kirchliche Opposition: Der frühe Streit zwischen den phrygischen 'neuen Propheten' und dem Autor der vorepiphanischen Quelle als biblische Wirkungsgeschichte des 2. Jh. n.Chr. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Madigan, K. and Osiek, C. (eds) (trans.) 2005), Ordained Women in the Early Church: A Documentary History. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Marjanen, A. (2005) 'Montanism and the formation of the New Testament canon', in Ådna, J. (ed.) The Formation of the Early Church (WUNT 183). Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 239–63.

Markschies, C. (1994) 'Nochmals: Wo lag Pepuza? Wo lag Tymion? Nebsteinigen Bemerkungen zur Frühgeschichte des Montanismus', Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum 37: 7–28.

Markschies, C. (2011) 'Plenary agenda report for research group B-III-2: "The organization of diversity in the ecclesiastical space of antiquity"'. eTopoi Journal for Ancient Studies Special Volume 1.

Markschies, C. (2012) 'The Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis and Montanism?', in Bremmer, J. N. and Formisano, M. (eds) Perpetua's Passions: Multidisciplinary Approaches to the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 277–90.

McGinn-Moorer, S. E. (1989) 'The new prophecy of Asia Minor and the rise of ecclesiastical patriarchy in second century Pauline traditions'. PhD Dissertation. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University.

McGinn-Moorer, S. E. (1997) 'The "Montanist" oracles and prophetic theology', Studia Patristica 31: 128–35.

McGowan, A. B. (2006), 'Tertullian and the "heretical" origins of the "orthodox" trinity', Journal of Early Christian Studies 14: 437–57.

Mitchell, S. (1984) Review of August Strobel Das heilige Land der Montanisten [1980]', Journal of Theological Studies, n.s. 35: 225–7.

Mitchell, S. (1993) Anatolia: Land, Men and Gods in Asia Minor Vol II: The Rise of the Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Mitchell, S. (1997) 'R.E.C.A.M. notes and studies No. 1: Inscriptions from Ancyra', Anatolian Studies 27: 63–103.

Mitchell, S. (2005) 'An apostle to Ankara from the new Jerusalem: Montanists and Jews in late Roman Asia', Scripta classica Israelica 25: 207–23.

Mitchell, S. (2013) 'An epigraphic probe into the origins of Montanism', in Thonemann, P. (ed.) Roman Phrygia: Culture and Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 168–97.

Mitchell, S. and Van Nuffelen, P. (eds) (2010) One God: Pagan Monotheism in the Roman Empire. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Nasrallah, L. (2003) An Ecstasy of Folly: Prophecy and Authority in Early Christianity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Neander, A. (1828) Allgemeine Geschichte der christlichen Religion und Kultur. Vol. 1.3. Hamburg: Perthes.

Neander, A. (1842–47) Allgemeine Geschichte der christlichen Religion und Kultur. 2nd exp. ed. 4 vols. Hamburg: Perthes.

Pastorelli, D. (2008) 'Le Paraclet dans la notice antimontaniste du Pseudo Hippolyte, Refutatio omnium haeresium VIII, 19 Les commentaires prophétiques de Priscilla et Maximilla', Vigiliae Christianae 62: 261–84.

Paulsen, H. (1978) 'Die Bedeutung des Montanismus für die Herausbildung des Kanons', Vigiliae Christianae 32: 19–52.

Pelikan, J. (1956) 'Montanism and its trinitarian significance', Church History 25: 99–109.

Poirier, J. C. (1999) 'Montanist Pepuza-Jerusalem and the dwelling-place of wisdom', Journal of Early Christian Studies 7: 491–507.

Poirier, J. C. (2001), 'The Montanist nature of the Nanas inscription', Epigraphica Anatolica 37: 151–9.

Potter, D. S. (1990) Prophecy and History in the Crisis of the Roman Empire. A Historical Commentary on the Thirteenth Sibylline Oracle. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Potter, D. S. (1995) Prophets and Emperors, Human and Divine Authority from Augustus to Theodosius. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Powell, D. (1975) 'Tertullianists and Cataphrygians', Vigiliae Christianae 29: 33–54.

Preuschen, E. (1900) 'Ardaf IV. Esra 9.26 und der Montanismus', Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 1: 265–6.

Ramelli, I. (2005) 'Traces of Montanism in Luciano's "Peregrino"?', Aevum – Rassegna di Scienze Storiche Linguistiche e Filologiche 79: 79–94.

Ramsay, W. M. (1895–7) The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, Being an Essay on the Local History of Phrygia from the Earliest Times to the Turkish Conquest, 2 vols. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

Rankin, D. (1995) Tertullian and the Church. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Robeck, C. M. Jr. (1987) 'Canon, regula fidei, and continuing revelation in the early church', in Bradley, J. E. and Muller, R. A. (eds) Church, Word and Spirit: Historical and Theological Essays in Hon. Geoffrey W. Bromily. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 65–91.

Robeck, C. M. Jr. (1992) Prophecy in Carthage: Perpetua Tertullan and Cyprian. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim.

Schepelern, W. (1929) Der Montanismus und die phrygische Kulte: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Schöllgen, G. (1984) Ecclesia Sordida? Zur Frage der sozialen Schichtung frühchristlicher Gemeinden am Beispiel Karthagos zur Zeit Tertullians. Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum: Ergänzungsband 12. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff.

Seim, T. K. (2010), 'Johannine echoes in early Montanism', in Rasimus, T. (ed.) The Legacy of John: Second-Century Reception of the Fourth Gospel. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 345–64.

Stewart-Sykes, A. (1997) 'The Asian context of the Epistula Apostolorum and the new prophecy', Vigiliae Christianae 51: 416–38.

Stewart-Sykes, A. (1999) 'The original condemnation of Asian Montanism', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 50: 1–22.

Stewart-Sykes, A. (2005) 'Prophecy and patronage: The relationship between charismatic functionaries and household officers in early Christianity', in Gregory, A. F. and Tuckett, C. M. (eds) Trajectories through the New Testament and the Apostolic Fathers. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 167–89.

Strobel, A. (1980) Das heilige Land der Montanisten: Eine religions-geographische Untersuchung. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Tabbernee, W. (1997a) Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia: Epigaphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Tabbernee, W. (1997b) '"Our trophies are better then your trophies": The appeal to tombs and reliquaries in Montanist-Orthodox relations', Studia Patristica 33: 206–17.

Tabbernee, W. (2001) '"Will the real Paraclete please speak forth!": The Catholic-Montanist conflict over pneumatology', in Hinze, B. E. and Dabney, D. L. (eds) Advents of the Spirit: An Introduction to the Current Study of Pneumatology. Milwaukee, WI: Marquette University Press, 97–118.

Tabbernee, W. (2003) 'Portals of the Montanist New Jerusalem: The discovery of Pepouza and Tymion', Journal of Early Christian Studies 11: 87–93.

Tabbernee, W. (2007) Fake Prophecy and Polluted Sacraments: Ecclesiastical and Imperial Reactions to Montanism. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Tabbernee, W. (2012a) 'The appearance of New Jerusalem in Montanist interpretation and the Revelation of John', in Frey, J., Kelhoffer, J. A. and Tóth, F. (eds) Die Johannesapokalypse: Kontexte – Konzepte – Rezeption. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 651–75.

Tabbernee, W. (2012b) 'Gregory of Nazianzus, Montanism and the Holy Spirit', in Beeley, C. A. (ed.) Re-Reading Gregory of Nazianzus: Essays on History, Theology and Culture. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 84–102.

Tabbernee, W. and Lampe, P. (2008) Pepouza and Tymion: The Discovery and Archaeological Exploration of a Lost Ancient City and an Imperial Estate. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter.

Tanriver, C., Hauken, T. and Akbıyıkoğlu, K (2003) 'A new inscription from Phrygia: A rescript of Septimius Severus and Caracalla to the coloni of the imperial estate at Tymion', Epigraphica Anatolica: Zeitschrift für Epigraphik und historische Geographie Anatoliens 36: 33–44.

Thomas, C. M. (2003) 'The scriptures and the new prophecy: Montanism as exegetical crisis', in Warren, D. H., Brock, A. G. and Pao, D. W. (eds) Early Christian Voices in Texts, Traditions and Symbols. Essays in Honor of François Bovon. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 155–65.

Thonemann, P. (ed.) (2013) Roman Phrygia: Culture and Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Trevett, C. (1989) 'Apocalypse, Ignatius, Montanism: Seeking the seeds', Vigiliae Christianae 43: 313–38.

Trevett, C. (1995) 'Fingers up noses and pricking with needles: Possible reminiscences of revelation in later Montanism', Vigiliae Christianae 49: 258–69.

Trevett, C. (1996) Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Trevett, C. (1997) 'Eschatological timetabling and the Montanist prophet Maximilla', Studia Patristica 31: 218–24.

Trevett, C. (1999a) 'Spiritual authority and the "heretical" woman: Firmilian's word to the church in Carthage', in Watt, J. W. and Drijvers, J. W. (eds) Portraits of Spiritual Authority: Religious Power in Early Christianity: Religious Power in Early Christianity, Byzantium and the Christian Orient. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 45–62.

Trevett, C. (1999b) '"Angelic visitations and speech she had": Nanas of Kotiaeion', in Allen, P. et al. (eds) Prayer and Spirituality in the Early Church, Vol. 2. Brisbane: Australian Catholic University, 259–78.

Trevett, C. (2004) '"I have heard from some teachers": The second-century struggle for forgiveness and reconciliation', in Cooper, K. and Gregory, J. (eds) Retribution, Repentance and Reconciliation (SCH 40). Woodbridge, UK and Rochester, NY: Boydell and Brewer, 5–28.

Trevett, C. (2007) 'Hippolytus and the cabbage question: Beyond acceptable discipline and diversity', in Cooper, K. and Gregory, J. (eds) Discipline and Diversity (SCH 43). Woodbridge, UK and Rochester, NY: Boydell and Brewer, 36–45.

Trevett, C. (2011) 'Prophets, economics and the rites of man', in Townsend, P. and Vidas, M. (eds) Revelation, Literature, and Community in Late Antiquity. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 43–63.

Turtledove, H. (1982) The Chronicle of Theophanes: an English Translation of anni mundi 6095–6305 (A.D. 602–813). Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Van der Lof, L. G. (1991) 'The plebs of the Psychici: Are the Psychics of De Monogamia Fellow-Catholics of Tertullian?', in Bartelink, G. J. M. et al. (eds) Eulogia: Mélanges offerts à Antoon A.R. Bastiaensen. Instrumenta Patristica 24. The Hague, The Netherlands: Nijhoff International, 353–63.

Von Campenhausen, H. (1969) Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries, ed. and trans. J. A. Baker. London: A. & C. Black.

Von Harnack, A. (1883) 'Montanism', Encyclopaedia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. 16, pp. 774–7.

Walls, A. F. (1964) 'The Montanist "Catholic epistle" and its New Testament prototype', Studia Evangelica 3, 2 (Texte und Untersuchungen 88): 437–46.

Wilhite, D. R. (2013) 'The spirit of prophecy: Tertullian's Pauline pneumatology', in Still, T. D. and Wilhite, D. E. (eds) Tertullian and Paul. New York and London: Bloomsbury T & T Clark, 45–71.

Wright, D. F. (1976) 'Why were the Montanists condemned?', Themelios 2: 15–22.

44

DONATISM

Jakob Engberg

Introduction: Victor's perspective, Christianity in North Africa

In 303 CE, the emperor Diocletian initiated a persecution of the Christians in the Roman empire. One edict followed another, and the Great Persecution, as it became known, was continued by (some of) Diocletian's co-emperors and successors until 311 and 313. Some co-emperors and successors and some of their provincial governors proved zealous, while others were reluctant – in Africa the persecutions effectively came to a halt in 305.

This persecution, and Christian responses to it, resulted, like the persecutions in the mid third century, in strife and schisms between Christians. One of these schisms, the Catholic-Donatist, divided the Church in Africa for more than a century and with effects lasting into the seventh century and beyond. The two sides in this conflict both claimed to be Catholics and labelled their opponents (among other things): pars Donati and filii Caeciliani. I will for purely pragmatic reasons use the terms Donatist and Catholic to designate the two factions.

This chapter will introduce the main sources to the Catholic-Donatist schism. It will subsequently discuss its origin and outline its history with an emphasis on confrontation. Following this, I will discuss to what extent the Donatists and Catholics were in debate with each other and saw a need to protect their own communities from the influence of protagonists from the other party. This discussion paves the way for a discussion of what have been seen in scholarship as the key issues in the schism.[1]

Most of the chapter will deal with strife among Christians in fourth- to early fifth-century Africa. There was, however, much more to church life (and Donatism) in Africa in the fourth-fifth centuries than strife. An anecdotal piece of evidence derived from a source relating one of the dramatic episodes in this strife may remind us of that.

The Donatist bishop Silvanus had been one of the accusers of the Catholic bishop of Carthage, Caecilian. Silvanus himself was in 320 brought to trial and exiled.[2] During the proceedings, the Donatist grammarian, Victor from Cirta, gave testimony. Questioned about the origin of the schism, he replied (Optatus, App. 1.1):

> I cannot be fully acquainted with the origin of the dispute, since our city has always had one church, and if it ever had a dispute, we are totally unaware of it.[3]

Victor is testifying in a court case where he might fear to be implicated. He has reason to appear ignorant and to offer an apology. However, when Victor could claim such ignorance, many other Christians were likely also caught up in a conflict where they followed their family, their pater familias, their neighbours, their leaders or their clerics into whatever camp they opted for, many of them barely noticing the schism for years. In time, however, many such Christians would also be affected and prompted to take sides.

Victor's testimony exemplifies the fact that many fourth-century African Christians could have lived much of their lives without giving much thought to the schism or to its consequences. They likely considered themselves simply Christians. In many places there would only have been one community and no need for identity markers. Other Christians would in due course have grown up in areas, villages, towns or cities with two communities, but would have taken this as a fact of life.[4]

For most of the chapter I will leave 'Victor's perspective' and such 'normality' aside and focus on the Catholic-Donatist schism. From Victor's perspective, one could have written either an article on 'African Christianity' (emphasizing aspects peculiar to Christianity in an African form) or on 'Christianity in Africa' (emphasizing developments in Africa that followed or influenced developments elsewhere).[5]

Sources

The cliché that 'history is written by the winners' is to some degree confirmed by the preserved sources for the Catholic-Donatist schism.[6] Catholic sources dominate. This dominance has until recently been compounded, first, by a widespread scholarly tendency to ignore the relatively few Donatist sources available to us and, second, by a widespread tendency for scholars to be unsympathetic towards the Donatists.

Two aspects of the Donatist-Catholic schism have left their clearest marks in the preserved sources: first, the violence of both sides, the instances where force was utilized against the Donatists, the occasionally violent Donatist resistance to such oppression, the instances where Donatists encroached on the rights or property of a Catholic minority,[7] and the instances where social and religious unrest mingled to produce outbursts of violence; and, second, the vivid polemic, theological controversy and debate that raged externally between Catholics and Donatists and internally in both camps. Each side tried to blame the other for violence and claim for themselves the label of Catholics, the right interpretations of scripture, and the true inheritance from Cyprian. The Donatists blamed the Catholics for the authorities' persecutions and prided themselves in their martyrs, while the Catholics argued that it was not dying per se that created the martyr, but dying for and in Christ – and here, in their view, the Donatists did not qualify.

The relevant sources are scattered, but modern collections, editions and translations provide access to the most frequently cited evidence.[8]

From the Catholic side, the most important sources were written by the bishops Optatus and Augustine. Optatus wrote in the 360s to 380s a polemic work in seven books against the Donatists.[9] He frequently argued against a now lost work of the Donatist bishop of Carthage, Parmenian.[10] Optatus' importance is enhanced by his provision of a collection of ten documents from the early history of the schism. Most of these documents are letters of Constantine or his magistrates, but there is also a letter from the bishops gathered for the conference in Arles.

There is no indication that the Donatist-Catholic schism impressed Augustine in his youth.[11] Soon after his ordination, and as a priest and bishop, he engaged himself in writing more than a score of anti-Donatist tracts.[12] Many of these were written in response to Donatist writings, while others were written without such prompting.[13] Further, several of his letters and sermons address the Donatist controversy either as the main issue, or an issue mentioned in passing. Finally, some of his biblical commentaries also explicitly or implicitly confront Donatists.[14]

Donatism was thus a major concern to Augustine. It is, however, clear that not all of Augustine's time was consumed by this conflict. Indirectly, through Optatus and Augustine, it may be seen that they had opponents on the Donatist side with whom they were in debate. These Donatist protagonists are primarily known to us for their role in the Catholic-Donatist controversy and mostly through what Optatus or Augustine reveals. Here the example of Augustine and the perspective of Victor should make it clear that these Donatist champions would likely have had other concerns.

A few examples of Donatist writing focused on issues other than the controversy with the Catholics are preserved: first, Tyconius' Book of Rules (Liber regularum) laying out seven rules for scriptural exegesis that influenced Augustine.[15] Tyconius also wrote a commentary on Revelation (of which fragments are preserved) and two other works (known only by their title). Second, a work from the early fifth century (Liber genealogus) discussing the genealogies of Matthew and Luke and culminating with a summary of the persecution of Christians up to and including Honorius' persecution of the Donatists in 405. Third, a few martyr-stories describing events under the Great Persecution and identified as Donatist because of anti-Catholic polemic; among these are The Acts of the Abitinian Martyrs. In this text, Mensurius, the bishop of Carthage, is blamed for handing over scriptures and for preventing, with his deacon Caecilian, Christians from bringing provisions to the imprisoned confessors.[16] None of these texts has anti-Catholic polemic as their chief agenda. This testifies to Victor's perspective, i.e. that fourth to fifth-century Donatists were concerned with other issues besides the Catholic-Donatist schism.

The other preserved Donatist writings are more directly related to the conflict. The Passion of Maximian and Isaac and The Passion of Marculus both deal with the Marcarian persecution in the mid fourth century, while a sermon (Sermo Donati) from around 317–321 deals with the early repressions.[17]

Figure 44.1   Cresconia's tomb in Ammaedare in Byzacena, in situ in the floor of the sixth-century Basilica of Mellus. As with the vast majority of Christian inscriptions, tombs and churches, nothing marked Cresconia as either Catholic or Donatist. Christians in Ammaedare had been represented at the Council of Carthage of 255 and had sent both a Catholic and Donatist bishop to the Conference of Carthage in 411. Photo R. M. Jensen

Church Councils and the minutes from the Conference of Carthage in 411 provide another valuable perspective on the schism. In some cases, we know of only the number of bishops attending; in others we know names and where they came from; in yet others (most importantly the Conference of Carthage), central decisions or even most of the deliberations are preserved.[18] The last-mentioned source is unique. Catholics, Donatists and officials took great care to ensure that the words of the speakers were accurately recorded in the minutes.[19]

There is a strong tradition for using epigraphy and archeological evidence in the study of the Catholic-Donatist schism.[20] The epigraphic evidence includes anything from stylish inscriptions carved or set in mosaic to the crudest carvings on boulders. Remains of thousands of churches, from grand basilicas (more than 300) to humble chapels and found in cities, towns, villages, on estates and at pilgrimage-sites have been identified.[21] Some have preserved baptismal pools, tombs, mosaics, inscriptions, etc. Of artefacts, some preserved everyday objects such as tableware, lamps, seals, etc. were adorned with Christian symbols or motives. Such material evidence is crucial for understanding Christianity in Africa,[22] but it is questionable whether the material provides much direct information on the Catholic-Donatist schism, since very little material is identifiable as either Donatist or Catholic.

The origin of the Catholic-Donatist schism

A distinction should be drawn between the origin of Donatism and the origin of the Catholic-Donatist split. Rather than seeing Donatism as a new schism, it is more accurate to see a pre-schism (African) Christianity that then split and emerged as two distinct branches that could (and did) lay equal claim to being traditional and rooted in history, scriptures and doctrines that both branches considered authoritative.

The origin of the split was connected to the Great Persecution. As such, its history reaches back to 303 and beyond. The split only emerged, however, with the ordination (sometime between 307 and 311) of Caecilian as the successor of Mensurius as bishop of Carthage.[23]

The Great Persecution resulted, as earlier persecutions, in arrests, confiscations, tortures, imprisonments, mutilations, exiles, confessions and martyrdoms, but also in different degrees of apostasy, compromise and collaboration.[24] As in other provinces, and as under earlier persecutions, there emerged different Christian positions on how to handle collaborators and apostates. Clerics who were compromised, but had continued in office, presented a particular problem. What was the status of those who had been baptized or ordained by such compromised clerics? Was their ordination or baptism valid (such as had been in the mid third century the position of the bishop of Rome), or was it invalid and were the baptized required to undergo a new baptism (such as had been the position of Cyprian)? One edict had required Christians to hand over their scriptures to the authorities. A Christian who obliged came to be designated a traditor, 'the one who had handed over'. Caecilian's opponents alleged that one of the bishops who had ordained him was a traditor and that this rendered Caecilian's ordination illegitimate.

A simple explanation of the origin of the schism would be to say that Donatists took a harsh position, demanding tough penance prior to re-admittance to communion, banning compromised clerics from being re-admitted to office and refusing to recognize the ordinations and baptisms performed by them after their lapse; whereas the Catholics would be more lenient in their demands. While such an explanation has merit,[25] it is overly simplifying. First, the debate of the mid third century shows that both positions were traditionally present in the (African) church. Second, there is evidence that the Donatists too were willing to forgive and recognize less than ideal baptisms and ordinations, while the Catholics on their side also regarded apostasy as a serious offence requiring penance and were unwilling to accept Donatist ordinations.[26] Third, while the ordination of Caecilian was challenged early on with the argument that one of the bishops who had ordained him was a traditor and that his ordination was thus invalid, the initial Catholic defence indicates that this line of reasoning was not foreign to them. The Catholic defence centred on proving the innocence of this bishop (a controversia facti).[27] There is not a trace of the claim being made by any contemporary Catholic that the whole question was inconsequential, since the ordination or baptism performed by a lapsed cleric remained valid. This argument from silence carries weight since Optatus and Augustine had access to documents from the early years of the schism, and it would have been strange for them to silence such an argument had it been made by the first Catholic protagonists, because it corresponded to their own arguments. The image of uncompromising (or untainted) Donatists and forgiving (or tainted) Catholics has much to do with the identity-formation and othering of both the communities over against each other developing in the decades following the split and relatively little to do with the initial split.[28]

In the dispute over the origin of the split, the Catholics and Donatists offered alternative explanations of the root causes of why Caecilian's ordination was challenged and Maiorinus ordained against him. According to Optatus, several persons conspired against Caecilian for personal and reprehensible reasons.[29] First, a wealthy woman, Lucilla, had been rebuked by Caecilian while he was a deacon for her excessive devotion to a martyr's bone, a rebuke that enraged her. Second, two local Christians, Botrus and Celestius, had both coveted to be bishops of Carthage. They had tried to increase their chances by conspiring to ensure that no Numidian bishops would take part in the ordination. With Caecilan's election their hopes were frustrated. Third, Mensurius had entrusted a group of seniors with church riches. They treated these riches as 'prey', so when Caecilian took office and demanded back the treasures, they too opposed him. Lucilla, Botrus, Celestius and the seniors withdrew from communion and Optatus concludes:

> The schism of that time, then, was brought forth by the anger of a humiliated woman, nourished by ambition, strengthened by avarice.[30]

The main blame is laid on Lucilla as seductress. Secundus, the bishop of Tigisis in Numidia, was summoned and arrived with other Numidian clerics whom Optatus labelled as collaborators with the authorities during the persecutions. In Carthage they were housed with the conspirators and manipulated to disown Caecilian and ordain Maiorinus, who was allegedly a member of Lucilla's household. Augustine and Jerome also blame Lucilla for having conspired against Caecilian.[31]

While it is not unlikely that women could exert influence on the election of bishops, there is no way of knowing whether it was the case in the election of Maiorinus. Further, while it is likely that some women and men would have pursued selfish goals in relation to elections of bishops, there is no way of knowing whether those who opposed Caecilian were thus motivated. It is however clear that there were good reasons for some to oppose his ordination. From Optatus we see that the ordination of Caecilian without the participation of Numidian bishops was somehow improper. Optatus is admitting this by placing the blame for their absence on Botrus and Celestius. Further, the Donatists alleged of Mensurius and Caecilian that they had prevented provisions from being brought to imprisoned confessors during the persecution, causing some to starve. According to a letter of Mensurius written to Secundus (a letter discussed at the Conference of Carthage), Mensurius did prevent provisions from being brought to prison (the defence was not conducted as a controversia facti). This action was justified by alleging that some of the prisoners were ordinary criminals or debtors who were unjustly profiting from such provisions (a controversia generis).[32] Thus, Mensurius and his deacon Caecilian did on Mensurius' own admission and as alleged in The Acts of the Abitinian Martyrs, prevent provision of Christian prisoners.[33] Mensurius and Caecilian's motives are, however, puzzling. Frend argued that Mensurius and Caecilian pursued a policy of discouraging veneration of martyrs, and that this act brought their policy to its logical conclusion.[34] Tilley suggests that Mensurius and Caecilian were overzealously obeying a law promulgated by the emperor Licinius according to which it was forbidden to bring supplies to prisoners who had been sentenced to death by starvation.[35] Whatever the motives, it is easy to understand that the ordination as bishop of a person who was considered partly responsible for the plight and death of a number of confessors provoked an outrage that resulted in the election of a rival bishop.[36]

An outline of the history of the schism with an emphasis on violence

The (not unheard of) anomaly of two rival bishops in one city might have remained a local nuisance. In the present case, and with the conflict emerging in Carthage, other bishops were prompted to take sides, and the cleavage widened and spread.[37] Constantine's policy of compensating the church for property destroyed and confiscated by his predecessors and his subsequent policy of financial support for churches and legal privileges for clergy might have been, in this African context, an Apple of Discord. The support was forwarded to Caecilian and reserved for Catholics and this may have prompted the Donatists to approach the emperor.[38] In any case, a number of Donatist bishops petitioned Constantine and asked him to appoint judges from Gaul, because of, in their words, 'dissensions between us and other bishops'. The letter as quoted by Optatus has an open agenda, but according to a preserved letter from Constantine to Rome's bishop Miltiades, where Constantine calls the council, accusations against Caecilian is a central concern.[39] The case was tried in Rome in 313 by a council of fifteen Italic and Gallic bishops and Miltiades.[40] They pronounced Caecilian innocent and Donatus guilty of re-baptisms and re-ordinations – ordinations performed by the opponents of Caecilian were, however, declared valid. The Donatist bishops appealed and the case was heard again in Arles by a council of Gallic bishops, with the council pronouncing Caecilian innocent and condemning his opponents.[41] The Donatists appealed a second time, Constantine dispatched two bishops to Africa and finally in 316 Constantine heard the case at his court and ruled in favour of Caecilian.[42] That Constantine recognized these repeated appeals has been interpreted as a wavering attitude, diligence in seeking the most just verdict, or an attempt to bring stability to Africa; perhaps he just liked the fact that the repeated appeals and cases kept troublemakers out of Africa.[43]

As a result of Constantine's rulings in favour of Caecilian and of a subsequent persecution a number of Donatists were exiled in the years up to 321.[44] Meanwhile in Africa, the first blood was drawn in 315, and violence continued on and off in the following years.[45] It is unclear whether the violence was provoked or fuelled by a number of edicts issued by Constantine. One Donatist martyr-text suggests this, as do a number of passages in Augustine and the Theodosian Code.[46] Alternatively Caecilian and other Catholic bishops simply took courage from the imperial backing and persuaded local and regional Roman authorities to provide troops to seize Donatist church property, while the Donatists (on occasions violently) resisted. There survive two letters from Constantine written in 313 and 314, one to Caecilian, the other to Catholic bishops in Africa. Both letters state that Caecilian and these bishops could expect support from Constantine in any strife with deranged persons who were endangering the peace. This, along with the rulings from Rome and Arles, might have given such courage.[47] In any case, violence ensued and resulted most notoriously in the clubbing to death by Roman soldiers of a number of Donatists gathered for worship.[48] In an anonymous Donatist sermon from around 317–321, the preacher frowned at Caecilian's followers, who were responsible for the defilement of virgins, slaughter of priests, assaults and pillage, the corruption of holy discipline, and the violation of the chastity of faith. The violence failed however to bring the Donatists into the Catholic camp. In 321, with war with Licinius imminent, Constantine recalled the Donatist clerics from exile. Constantine seems to have resolved that the coexistence of two rival communities in Africa was better than continuous and fruitless turmoil.[49] Constantine's attitude to the Donatists was, according to a letter he wrote in 324, still hostile.[50] Similarly, Donatists were not given back confiscated property, neither were their clerics given the same immunity from municipal duties as their Catholic 'colleagues'.[51]

Constantine's reversal of policy appears successful. The following years were likely relatively tranquil, with both factions accommodating themselves to the existence of the other. The decades were not without incident, and in some of these the Donatists seem, in spite of continued imperial support for the Catholics, to have held the upper hand, with for example Catholic clergy being forced to shoulder municipal burdens.[52] Evidence to adduce the relative (numerical) strength and geographic spread of the two communities is however insufficient for any coherent picture.[53]

Continued religious strife, however, fuelled and was fuelled by other conflicts. From the year 340, our sources begin to mention a loosely defined group called the Circumcellions.[54] The movement was associated with farmhands, debtors, displaced farmers, etc. According to the always hostile sources, Circumcellions would roam the countryside, plunder travellers and prevent creditors from exacting payments. So far, the descriptions do not differ from descriptions of poorly armed bands in other provinces. Our sources, however, further allege an affinity between Circumcellions and Donatists. It is reasonable to assume that the Circumcellions, being Christians, would have found identity in the confrontation between Donatists and authorities and the ideology of martyrdom – the Circumcellions were alleged to desire a violent death at the hand of any magistrate.[55] It is equally likely that Donatist clerics in times of confrontations with authorities or Catholics would have found it opportune to appeal to the Circumcellions – their existence made it difficult for the authorities to control the lands. The relationship was, however, never easy. The Donatist church, even more so than the Catholic, because of the absence of imperial patronage, depended on the support of wealthy Africans, the very segment of the population which had most to lose from Circumcellion activities.[56] Our sources suggest, not unreasonably, that Donatist clerics oscillated between encouraging and chastising Circumcellions.[57] On occasions, Donatist clerics would even call upon soldiers for protection against agitated Circumcellions.[58] Do such loose connections and such overlapping (and conflicting) ideological and practical interests of Donatists and Circumcellions make the Donatist church a social–political movement in disguise or the Circumcellions a band of religious terrorists? Not likely. It rather shows that a century-long and violent religious conflict was bound to be intermingled with other conflicts.

In the mid 340s, Donatus was still bishop in Carthage, while Gratus had replaced the deceased Caecilian. In 346 Donatus petitioned the emperor Constans and requested that he should be recognized as the sole bishop of Carthage.[59] Constans might have seen this as a chance for compromise and unification. In early 347, he dispatched two emissaries, Macarius and Paul, to Africa. They brought with them funds to help the needy and adorn churches. The mission ended in the most violent and infamous oppression of the Donatists.[60] Soon after arriving in Carthage, Macarius and Paul showed sympathy for the Catholics and tried to persuade Donatists into communion with Catholics.[61] The Donatists were alarmed and it was rumoured that Macarius had brought images to the altar. In this climate, Macarius travelled into Numidia under military escort. The violence that followed was an embarrassment for many Catholics. Optatus offered an apology and argued that the violence resulted from unfounded Donatist rumours and fear. Optatus wrote:

> At first there was no intimidation; no-one has seen a rod, no-one had seen a place of detention; as I said above, there were only exhortations. You were all afraid, you fled, you quailed . . . Therefore, all the bishops fled with their clergy, and some died; those who were stronger were caught and banished to far places.[62]

Donatists thus fled from Macarius with some dying on the road. According to Optatus, there was no need for this flight, but he contradicts himself when stating that those caught were banished to distant places – if the refuges had nothing to fear, why would those caught be exiled? The uneasiness of Optatus in defending all of this is evident. After having laboured at defending Macarius, Optatus turns around and distances Macarius' violent actions from the wishes of the Catholics.[63]

Donatist perspectives on this persecution are found in two contemporary martyr-texts, The Passion of Maximian and Isaac and The Passion of Marculus as well as in the minutes from the Conference of Carthage. According to these texts, Macarius had issued severe decrees calling for unity and stipulating torture and exile for persisting Donatists. Maximian and Isaac did persist, were tortured, and 'in

Figure 44.2   May near Tiddis, Algeria. In the spring of 347, Donatists fled through these lush landscapes on an equal destiny bound . . . over for exile'. Isaac died in prison. Maximian along with other confessors awaited his exile in prison. However, the magistrate became afraid of the crowds gathered outside the prison. Consequently, he brought both living confessors and dead martyrs aboard a ship and dumped them at sea. Many leading Donatists, including Donatus himself, were exiled – Donatus' appeal to the emperor had (again) backfired. Most of the exiled clerics would return after yet another appeal to an emperor, this time Julian the Apostate, who gave them back their confiscated churches and permitted their return.[64] Donatus had died in exile around 355 and was replaced by Parmenian.[65] The years in exile of many Donatist leaders did not bring the movement to its knees. Their return was deemed a triumph.[66]
the approach of Macarius. Photo B. Poulsen

Julian's death in 363 resulted in a change of fortune for the Donatists, either immediately or after seven years. The Donatists described and remembered Romanus, who was comes in Africa from 363 to 373 as their persecutor, and Augustine indicates that he punished the Donatists, according to the laws.[67] According to the Theodosian Code, however, it was only in 370 that earlier anti-Donatist laws, repealed by Julian, were re-instated.[68] It is possible to harmonize this chronological contradiction if we assume that Romanus only initiated his persecution after 370. It is equally possible, however, that he initiated a persecution earlier without the support of anti-Donatist legislation. In non-Christian sources, his extortions and corruption are blamed for leading to the rebellion of Firmus in 372.[69] As for this rebellion – and to a lesser degree the subsequent and more long-lived rebellion of his brother Gildo – the Donatists were blamed for giving support; likely the blame was partly justified.[70] Again, this does not make the Donatist movement an ethnic movement in support of political independence from Rome (even Firmus and Gildo were unlikely to have been driven by such motives) – conceivably, however, some Donatists saw these rebellions as chances to be relieved from persecution and, in the case of the Donatist bishop Optatus of Thamugadi, to get support against Catholics and Maximianists.[71]

In the late fourth century CE, numerous imperial edicts were issued against heretic and schismatic movements.[72] Donatists are not mentioned explicitly in any of these, but since some edicts targeted re-baptism, they were likely also aimed at Donatists. Meanwhile, the Donatists were troubled by internal dissent. They concluded that those who had dissented but returned to the communion with other Donatists were not in need of re-baptism. Augustine saw this as Donatist self-contradiction. For the Donatists, this lenience was probably in line with a council decision from around 330. In 405, for the first time in 35 years, the Donatists were explicitly singled out in four edicts issued by the emperor Honorius – ominously they were now declared heretics.[73] Five further edicts followed in 407–409.[74] Throughout the years 370 to 410, the punishments prescribed for heresy and schism became more severe, and whereas the first edicts targeted church property, clerics and higher orders, increasingly the lower orders were included.

Figure 44.3   The sarcophagus of Optatus of Thamugadi? The placement in the main nave and in front of the apse in (the ruins) of the largest basilica in Thamugadi suggests the burial of an important person. Photo R. M. Jensen

In 410, with the usurper Maximus Tyrannus in tentative control of Spain, with Constantine III (untrustworthy co-emperor) precariously ruling Britain and Gaul, and with Alaric threatening and then invading Italy, Honorius suspended his five-year-old anti-Donatist legislation and called both sides of the schism to a conference. In August 410 Rome was sacked by the Visigoths. With Africa being the only one of Honorius' provinces under stable government, the conference met in Carthage in 411 presided over by the comes of Africa, Flavius Marcellinus. Almost 300 Donatist and 300 Catholic bishops appeared for what was a trial, not a synod.[75] The Donatist delegates were obliged to appear. The conference ended with the complete vindication of Catholics and condemnation of Donatists. The full force of Honorius' anti-Donatist legislation was again brought to bear and new edicts followed.

As Augustine's continued polemic shows, this did not spell the end of Donatism, but the movement was now on the defensive and would never again be able to claim to represent a majority of Christians in Africa. When the (Arian) Vandals invaded and ruled Africa, the Catholics re-experienced what the Donatists knew all too well: hostile authorities.[76] Some Catholic-Donatist unity against a common Arian foe might at places have been achieved.[77] Gregory the Great, however, still confronted Donatists in Africa.[78]

Over 100 years, with intervals and varying intensity, the authorities punished Donatists with fines, confiscations, floggings, exile and, although rarely, formal death sentences.[79] In the same period, both parties in the conflict engaged on occasions in mob violence, pillaging and killing. Catholic violence was sometimes backed by Roman soldiers. To some degree, the Donatists reacted in kind; to some degree, they developed the ideological claim that the true church is persecuted and persecutes no-one.

Debate and polemic

To what degree do the sources point to a real debate between Catholics and Donatists? Were the two communities influencing each other? To what degree were Catholics and Donatists reading each other's texts, responding to each other's allegations and arguments? Was there a direct interchange of views? Were protagonists on each side trying to persuade, convince and convert their opponents or members of the out-group? Alternatively, did each side isolate itself in an internal debate? If the former was the case, we would likely see in the sources a need for protagonists to define and maintain the borders of their community. I will now discuss related issues in regard to archeological remains and epigraphy. Does this evidence indicate that the two factions developed different and distinct artistic, architectural or epigraphic traditions? If yes, is there any indication that the polemic found in literature was mirrored by a similar polemic in stone?

These are important questions in their own right, but the analysis also prepares us for a discussion of the schism's theological issues. With little debate between the two sides, it would be easy for a protagonist to grossly misrepresent the other faction's position. No outsider would read the work and be able to challenge such misrepresentation, and with few from the author's own in-group having any first-hand acquaintance with the out-group's positions, few in-group readers would notice any misrepresentation. Conversely, a direct debate and a real ambition on both sides for winning the hearts and minds of those in the out-group and maintaining and patrolling one's own boundaries, set limits for the level of misrepresentation.

The literary debate: the examples of Optatus and Augustine

Of the available evidence, Optatus' and Augustine's writings represent the most important Catholic contributions to the schism's literary debate. Further, it is mostly through these texts that we know of the Donatist contribution and contributors.

Optatus often argues against a (now lost) work of Parmenian, Donatist bishop of Carthage.[80] Further claims to be responding to Donatist reactions and arguments is made in the opening of book seven. Book seven is perhaps a later addition by Optatus to his original six books, and the opening passage might indicate that the six books had provoked a Donatist rejoinder, to which Optatus now responded.[81] Augustine's earliest preserved work against the Donatists was the poetic call for unity in Psalmus contra partem Donati (393). Its form and crude imagery indicate that Augustine was concerned with mobilizing common Christians. Since Augustine would hardly expect a Donatist congregation to sing an anti-Donatist psalm, the work must have been aimed at Catholics. This psalm was followed by other works which are now lost and then in 400–405 by three works in which Augustine responded directly to Donatist writings. First, Augustine wrote three books against the letters of the Donatist bishop Petillian (Contra Litteras Petilliani). The first two books were written in sequence, but book three was written after Augustine received a reply to the first two books by Petillian himself. Next, Augustine wrote the Contra epistulam Parmeniani, which was inspired by the (originally) Donatist (later excommunicated) theologian Tyconius. Last, the Donatist grammarian Cresconius wrote an apologetic tract answering Augustine's allegations against Petillian. Augustine came upon this response and answered in 405 with four books against Cresconius (Contra Cresconium). Augustine later wrote other rejoinders to Donatist writings. For example, in 410–411 he wrote a tract on the one baptism (De unico baptism), which responded to an anonymous Donatist tract. The Donatists were facing their own (internal) schism, the so-called Maximianists, and a favourite argument of Augustine works was to point to what he perceived as Donatist inconsistency in demanding no re-baptism of Maximianists who joined the Donatists, while they did require baptism of Catholics. This part of Augustine's anti-Donatist corpus clearly indicates a lively interchange of ideas, apology and polemic between Donatists and Catholics.

Augustine did, however, also set his own agenda. In 400–401 he wrote seven books on baptism against the Donatists (De Baptismo, contra Donatistas), the lost work, Contra quod adtulit Centurius a Donatistas and the preserved De unitate ecclesia, a letter where he instructed fellow Catholic bishops on how to argue against the Donatists. Augustine thus wished to equip the pastors of his party for direct debate with Donatists. As Augustine's theology developed but remained unable to carry the day, he began to advocate the use of force. His argument is most fully developed in a letter addressed in 417 to the comes of Africa (De Correctione Donatistarum).[82] Augustine argued that Donatist victims of such persecutions were not martyrs; these arguments were fully developed in two books (Contra Gaudentium) written in 420 against the Donatist bishop Gaudentius of Thamugadi.

Several of Augustine's (other) letters deal either in the main or in part with Donatism.[83] Further, several of Augustine's sermons admonish Donatists to repent, or instruct Catholics on how to think of the Donatists and receive them upon their repentance. The occasional direct address to Donatists in these sermons suggests that some Donatists might have attended services in Catholic churches. On one level, this shows that there was much else to life in fourth- and fifth-century Africa than the Catholic–Donatist schism (cf. Victor's perspective). On another level, Augustine's addressing of Donatists in his sermons points to a direct contact and direct exposure to each other's arguments. Vivid imagery and application of biblical prophecy to present-day situations dominate the sermons.[84] Finally, several passages in his biblical commentaries address the Donatist issue or challenge their interpretations of scripture.[85] This, along with his use of scripture in his works that focus on the Donatists, shows that there was no difference between Catholics and Donatists in their use and regard for scripture, just as there was no difference of opinion concerning the composition of the canon. That two conflicting branches of the church were in such agreement on which scriptures to use as authoritative, even in an age that preceded or coincided with more formal decisions and lists on the composition of the canon, suggests that the canon-issue, at least in Africa, was largely settled in what we might call an anonymous process, before more formal decisions codified the result. This subject would merit a closer examination.[86]

Figure 44.4   Baptistery in Thamugadi, Algeria. Archeologists have so far discovered seventeen churches and church complexes in Thamugadi. This baptistery (one of three) was attached to the largest basilica (1409 m²). Perhaps it was this basilica that Gaudentius threatened to barricade and torch in order to resist persecution. Photo R. M. Jensen

A polemic set in stone?

The rather rich Christian epigraphic and archeological remains have successfully been used to discuss the life of African Christians, including their church-architecture, art, rituals, burial customs, etc.[87] The material is well suited for a study of 'Christianity in Africa' or 'African Christianity'.

However, scholars have also used material evidence to study the Catholic-Donatist schism, more particularly the proliferation of the two factions, and to interpret this dissemination as a result of competition and as evidence for the two communities' relative strength in different geographic areas. Peter Brown has argued that the astonishing number of African church ruins is evidence for an intense Catholic-Donatist building contest. Brown writes 'Each church was an argument in stone in favor of one church or the other'.[88] This interpretation entails that the fourth and fifth centuries were dominated in Africa by the Catholic-Donatist schism. Further, the claim that each church was 'an argument in stone', would require that each church was easily identifiable as either Catholic or Donatist. Elsewhere, Brown argues that fourth- and fifth-century Africa was not dominated by the schism and states that it is only extremely rarely possible to identify churches as either Catholic or Donatist.[89]

Many of the few churches that have been identified have been so using a set of criteria developed a century ago by Paul Monceaux.[90] His criteria for distinguishing Catholic from Donatist inscriptions proved highly influential. Following Monceaux and Brown, the polemic, visible in our literary sources, also manifested itself in the erection of churches, in architecture, art and inscriptions.[91]

In 1989, however, Harding challenged Monceaux's criteria and argued that most of his supposed epigraphic and architectural identity markers are in fact not partisan. For example, according to Augustine's polemic the Donatists used an exclamation, deo laudes ('praise be to God') almost as a battle-cry when roaming the land or when celebrating their drunken rites. In contrast, the Catholics exclaimed deo gratias ('thanks be to God'). Deo laudes is found on 21 inscriptions and deo gratias on six and Monceaux concluded that these inscriptions were without doubt Donatist and Catholic respectively and could be used to identify churches and burial grounds as belonging to one or the other party.[92] There are several problems. First, Augustine is the only witness for these practices. Second, the difficulty of dating: with no firm dating on most of these inscriptions and with the few inscriptions that are relatively fixed in their dating ranging from the fourth to the sixth centuries, are we to believe that the Donatists for all this time were able to monopolize for themselves and all over Africa the use of the phrase deo laudes – and the Catholics deo gratias, when even Augustine never claims this? Third, Augustine himself in one sermon instructs his congregation to say deo laudes, and there is no indication that he wants his congregation to appropriate a Donatist exclamation. His point is simply that the congregation ought to thank God.[93] Similarly, Harding provides numerous references to passages in Augustine's commentaries on the Psalms, where he exhorts his readers to praise the Lord/God (laudare dominum/deum).[94] Fourth, Augustine relates an episode where his congregation in Hippo, gathered for the service on Easter Sunday, celebrates the miraculous healing of a certain Paulus by shouting deo gratias, deo laudes. There is no hint that one part of the congregation was Catholics and the other Donatists and that they engaged in a shouting contest; rather the whole church is celebrating together and Augustine is happy.[95] Fifth, in Chapter 5 of the Abitinian Martyrs, a martyr used in prayer the (supposedly Catholic) slogan deo gratias – the supposedly Donatist slogan deo laudes does not appear in any Donatist martyr-texts. Sixth, Optatus relates that twelve bishops, who became Donatist leaders, gathered in Cirta during the reign of Maximian (i.e. before May 305) and decided to show clemency towards apostates – most of the bishops confessed to having collaborated with the authorities. Optatus claims to build on the minutes of the meeting produced by Nundinarius, and quotes from the conclusion of the meeting that all the bishops said deo gratias.[96] Nundinarius is not to be trusted, but that is unimportant here. Crucially, there is no indication in Optatus that the Donatists should thereby have been using what Optatus or his readers – or Nundinarius and his readers – would have perceived as a distinctly Catholic 'slogan'. On the contrary, the passage in Optatus shows that such a slogan in his times (360s) could equally well be envisaged in the mouth of Donatists. We can thus not assume (expanding recklessly on Augustine) that there were distinct Donatist and Catholic slogans in use (and set in stone) as identity markers all over Africa for decades.

Accordingly, if the conflict ever manifested itself significantly in epigraphy, in art or in architecture with distinct (and mutually polemic) traditions and forms developing in the two communities, then this is no longer in evidence. Cautiously, this confirms Victor's perspective. Additionally, with so few examples of remains that can be positively identified as either Catholic or Donatist, it is impossible to draw any conclusions from the epigraphic and archeological material regarding the geographical dissemination of Donatism and Catholicism.

The archeological and epigraphic material is thus well suited to studying Christianity in Africa, but unsuitable for a direct study of the Catholic-Donatist schism.

Main issues in the Catholic-Donatist conflict

In Chapter 69 of Augustine's handbook on heresies from 428 he addressed Donatism. According to Augustine, then in his old age, Donatism is a schism that emerged from the challenge to Caecilian's ordination and the subsequent election of Maiorinus and then Donatus. Augustine finds no room to describe any dogmatic flaw in Donatist theology. On the contrary, he is even apologetically, on behalf of the Donatists, stating that their doctrines on the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are soundly Trinitarian and that any apparent (subordinate) deviation from Catholic doctrine in their writings is unintended and due to imprecision in expression. Coming from a bishop who had vehemently fought Donatism, such a summary of the essence of the dispute is remarkable. Was it really all due to the ordination of Caecilian and the counter-ordination of Maiorinus? Scholars find this hard to accept and, quoting R.A. Marcus, look for explanations at 'deeper, and more intractable' levels.[97] Such a search is justified. An original strife over an issue of two clerics, however intense, could hardly have engaged thousands of people for hundreds of years without 'fuel' being added to the 'fire'.[98] Scholars have brought forward two different 'sets' of issues, either as root causes, or as fuel feeding the already burning fire. I will label the first set of issues theological; the second political–ethnic and social–economic.

Theological issues

Augustine and Optatus contributed to a Donatist-Catholic debate, where appeals to conversion were being made and where theologians on both sides erected and patrolled their own communities' boundaries. This context limited the degree to which the two Catholic authors could misrepresent the positions of their opponents. On the other hand, it also meant that they saw a need to differentiate the Catholic position from that of the Donatists. Augustine and Optatus may therefore be used, in combination with other sources, including the minutes from the conference in Carthage, to see at least the main issues that were being discussed.[99]

Based on these sources, scholarship has identified two clusters of theological issues in the Donatist-Catholic controversy. The first cluster of issues included questions of apostasy, re-baptism and ecclesiology.[100] How was the church to view, treat and potentially re-integrate or acknowledge those who apostatized, handed over scriptures, or otherwise compromised themselves during the Great Persecution? A Donatist sermon from around 317–321 discusses how lapsed clerics might be re-integrated. The text implies that humility placates God, but that specific clerics were instead ensnared by the Devil to be proud.[101] The sermon's idea of forgiveness and reintegration is thus at odds with later Catholic polemic representation of Donatist theology, which is not to say that the later polemic was necessarily at odds with a more developed Donatist position.[102] Connected to this issue, there surfaced the question of how to view, treat and potentially re-integrate or acknowledge those who were baptized or ordained by clerics after these clerics had compromised themselves.[103] Here the Donatists argued, following Cyprian, that re-baptism was required, while the Catholics argued, following Rome, that the original baptism was valid and not to be repeated. This theological difference surfaced already at the council in Arles.

Figure 44.5   Thamugadi, baptismal font of the second largest basilica (Catholic?). While the Catholic and Donatist rite of baptism was identical, they disagreed on whether a baptism performed by a lapsed cleric was valid. Photo R. M. Jensen

The Donatists, however, would not be unwavering in their attitude to this question. Around 330, a council of 270 Donatist bishops presided over by Donatus agreed that whole Mauretanian congregations, who had hitherto been in communion with Caecilian, could join the Donatist church without re-baptism and that their clerics could continue in office.[104] While Augustine frowned upon this as hypocrisy, it might equally indicate that the Donatist position was nuanced, palpable and developing with events as they unfolded over the decades. Equally, the Catholic position on the validity of ordinations performed outside the Catholic Church was not without its inconsistencies. As Mark Edwards has observed, the Catholics were willing to acknowledge clerics ordained by Arians. However, as the Catholic–Donatist schism hardened, Catholics were for most of the fourth century, and in contrast to the decisions in Arles, unwilling to recognize Donatist ordinations.[105] Connected to this was the question of ecclesiology. In the debate between Donatists and Catholics, the Donatists gradually stressed the purity of the church, with its members being the holy and the elect, while the Catholics gradually stressed that the visible church was comprised of both sinners and saints with only God being able to differentiate.[106] Tyconius was a major inspiration behind the development of the Catholic positon. Tyconius was in turn condemned by other Donatists, but himself insisted on being Donatist.[107] All of this suggests nuances and mutual inspiration in the development of ecclesiology.

The second cluster of theological issues was comprised of the question of church-empire relation-ship and martyrdom.[108] Donatus allegedly said, 'What has the church to do with the Emperor'.[109]

This catch-phrase is put into his mouth by Optatus in a context in 347 where Optatus blames the Donatists for bringing on themselves Macarius' persecution.[110] Optatus' narrative shows that Donatus' attitude to emperor and empire was more nuanced. Optatus relates how Donatus and other Donatists repeatedly appealed to emperors and magistrates. This, in the context of Optatus' polemic, is used to portray Donatus as a hypocrite. Assuming that Donatus ever claimed that church and emperor had nothing to do with each other, this attitude might have been shaped and developed in accord with the numerous occasions on which Donatus experienced persecutions and saw his hopes for support (or reversal of policy) from emperors and magistrates shattered.[111] The different views on church–empire relations between Catholics and Donatists that our sources portray probably developed from the experiences of the two communities in the fourth and fifth centuries and with the two communities' needs to maintain their identities. The perception that Catholic theology on church–empire relations was inherently more positive than the Donatist, cannot stand for a comparison with Catholic polemic against Julian and Constantius. There was in 307–311 no empire-friendly party in the African Christian community that separated itself from an empire-hostile party on account of such conflicting ideologies.

Following the polemic in Optatus and Augustine on Donatist devotion to martyrs, it has been assumed that Catholics were moderate in their devotion, while Donatists were enthusiastic and fuelled this enthusiasm with fresh stories of martyrs of Catholic oppression. Based on the Lucialla story and the tradition that Mensurius and Caecilian prevented Christians from supplying the confessors in prison during the Great Persecution, Frend has even argued that Mensurius and Caecilian discouraged martyr-cult and that this was one of the main reasons why some opposed Caecilian's ordination. Frend argues that there were two parties in the African church: a traditional, native party committed to martyrs, and a more moderate, Romanized party with stronger links to the Roman church. Lucialla, the poor Christians in Carthage and the Numidian bishops belonged to the first party; Mensurius, Caecilian and the sophisticated Carthaginian Christians to the latter.[112] Such a neat distinction cannot be maintained. Catholics celebrated with equal enthusiasm most of the same martyrs as the Donatists.[113] Both Catholics and Donatists claimed that their victims were martyrs while the other side vehemently contested this.[114] Furthermore, Donatists were not willing to confer the title of martyr on just any victim within their own rank. A Donatist sermon from around 317–321 testifies that there was reservation about acknowledging that Donatists who had been clubbed to death by soldiers were true martyrs since there was no (or limited) shedding of blood.[115] Further, while language of martyrdom was elsewhere frequently used (by exiles and their supporters) to describe the bravery and tribulations of exiled clerics, the limited available evidence suggests that Donatists took pride in exile, but carefully avoided using language of martyrdom for this.[116] On the whole, Donatist attitudes to martyrdom seem to have been multifaceted with strong cautious, traditional and conservative 'voices'.[117]

Spectra of positions on these and other issues probably co-existed (latently) in the (African) church prior to the split without causing any division. The division in 307–311 was caused, as the old Augustine concluded, by Caecilian and Maiorinus' ordinations. Further, it is unlikely that clerics, congregations and 'ordinary' Christians in 307–311 and subsequent years would have opted to join one or the other faction based on their prior opinions on one or more of the issues of baptism, church–empire relationship, martyr-ideology, etc. with all the 'rigorists' becoming Donatists and all the 'slackers' Catholics. This is not to suggest that the disputed issues were unimportant; they would indeed surface and be developed in the processes whereby the two communities identified themselves over against each other.

No root cause of the conflict, no core and no deeper level has been uncovered. No central initiating grievances of the two parties remained divisive and decisive for decades. Rather, the two parties were dynamically in debate with each other and, in their efforts to mobilize and justify their own community and position, they developed and refined positions. Augustine's old-age conclusion, where he found no other core or no other origin to the conflict besides the ordination of the two rival bishops, is vindicated.

A political-ethnic or social-economic movement?

From at least as early as 1898 there have been numerous attempts in scholarship to argue that the core in the Donatist schism, or at least the fuel of the conflict once it was started, was nationalist, ethnic or political aspirations for independence from Rome and a Romanized local elite or a social protest movement of the oppressed poor.[118] With Frend's The Donatist Church (1952), such theories found their ablest champion. The political-ethnic, social-economic explanations came to dominate in the 1960s and 1970s to an extent where some scholars treated theological issues in the conflict as mere pretexts covering the real underlying causes.[119] Underpinning these theories were speculations that the Donatist church should have differed significantly from the Catholic in its social, cultural or ethnic make-up and that the two churches were represented unequally in different geographic regions of Africa. The Donatist church, according to such theories, was made up of native, un-Romanized Berbers or Punics, of the poorer segments of the population. The Catholics in contrast were more Romanized and, on average, more well to do. Further, Donatists were supposed to have been in the majority in Numidia and in the countryside, with Catholics in the majority in Africa Proconsularis and in cities.

Later critics of the political-ethnic or social-economic theories have raised a number of objections to these theories and have reasserted the centrality of the theological issues:[120]

- There was empirical deconstruction of the various theories (ethnic, geographic, cultural or economic) that the Donatist church should have attracted or gathered one kind of Christians and the Catholics another. For example, without support from the emperor, and even in spite of occasional persecutions resulting in exile and confiscations, the Donatists were able for decades to muster significant financial resources, a fact that indicates that there would have been wealthy members able to support the movement.[121]
- It was observed that the Roman authorities for most of the fourth century were restrained and hesitant in persecuting the Donatists. This included Constantine, who during his persecution of the Donatists prior to 321 used exile as the hardest punishment, and who in 321 called off the persecution and offered, for the rest of his reign, tolerance for the Donatists. Such restraint would hardly have been exercised had Donatism been, as some scholars have contested, a nationalistic movement aspiring to African independence or a social movement fighting for a major redistribution of wealth and property.[122]

Conclusion: a derogatory term and rich legacy

Donatus, the bishop of Carthage, was an important figure for the Donatists. In spite of this, they never took to heart and used about themselves the most popular exonym applied to their church by their opponents, Donatists; the term remained derogatory. As such, it was readily available for much later Christian polemicists when they wanted to slander their Christian opponents. At the time of the Reformation, the term re-emerged as a designation for Protestants. Donatism, however, left behind a surprisingly rich legacy in the form of literary, epigraphic and archeological remains. As for the literary legacy, not all of it was filtered through the polemic texts of the Donatists' opponents, which leaves the Donatists with a still engaging voice to be studied. As for the epigraphy and archeology, we are rarely able to distinguish Catholic from Donatist remains. In the tranquility of the thousands of church ruins still scattered in the African landscape, we finally find Victor's perspective of one church vindicated, and here at last we see the unity of the African church that so eluded zealous protagonists from Donatus to Augustine.

Notes

1 I thank Nicholas A. Marshall for valuable comments and Robin M. Jensen and Birte Poulsen for allowing me to use their photos.
2 Aug. Contra Cresconium 3.30.34.

3 Optatus, Appendix 1.1. Translations from Optatus from Edwards 1997.

4 Brown 2012: 330.

5 Burns and Jensen 2014; Van Oort and Wischmeyer 2011.

6 Kaufman 2009: 131

7 Frend 1997: 611, 626

8 Petschenig 1908–1910, Labrousse 1995–1996, Maier 1987–1989, Lancel 1972–1991, Edwards 1997, Tilley 1996 and Coleman-Norton 1966.

9 Jerome, Vil.ill. knows of only six books. Optatus 2.3 speaks of the Diocletian persecution as happening 60 years ago, but mentions Siricius as bishop of Rome (in office from 384). A publication in the 360s followed by a 380s edition adding also Book 7 could account for this. Edwards 1997: xvi–xviii, 33, Evers 2010: 167–72 and Monceaux 1901–1923: 4.450–3.

10 Optatus 1.4, 1.6, 1.10, 1.21, 1.28, 2.10, 2.19, 4.9.

11 Fox 2015: 26–7.

12 Monceaux 1901–1923: 7.275–92.

13 Tilley 1999: 34–9.

14 E.g. In. Ioh. Evang. 6.25 and 13.17.

15 Babcock 1989.

16 Tilley 1996: 26, 1997: 49 date the text to the early fourth century; Dearn 2004 to the late fourth or early fifth.

17 Maier 1987–1989: 1.201–11 and Tilley 1997: 51–60.

18 Council of Cebarussi in Aug. En. In Ps. 36.2.20 (cf. Maier 1987–1989: 2.73–82).

19 Gesta 1.55, 1.133, 2.43–8. Tilley 1991: 7–8 and Evers 2010: 161.

20 Frend 1952 and Harding 1989: 74–138.

21 Frend 1952: 52–5, 1997: 613, Raven 1993: 178–9, Brown 2012: 334–8 and Harding 1989: 117–20.

22 Burns and Jensen 2014: li–lii, 87–163, 224–32, 287–8, 354–5, 432–3, 484–5, 548, 596.

23 Edwards 1997: 16–17, Frend and Clancy 1977: 104–9, Barnes 1975: 18–20 and Alexander 2000: 952.

24 Optatus 1.13. Engberg 2007, Shaw 2011: 591–7, Burns and Jensen 2014: 7–25, 38–41.

25 Frend 1952: 142–3 and Burns and Jensen 2014: 195–201.

26 Optatus 1.13–15 for polemic against apostates.

27 Optatus, 1.24 and Appendix 2, and Aug. Ep. 43.13.

28 Burns and Jensen 2014: 332–3.

29 Optatus 1.18.

30 Optatus 1.19.

31 Aug. Ep. Ad Cath. 25.73 and C. ep. Parm. 1.3.5 and Hier. Ep. 133.4. Harding 1989: 27–8.

32 Aug. Breviculus Collationis cum Donatistis 3.13.25

33 Frend 1952: 7, 142; Tilley 1997 and Ubiña 2013: 31.

34 Frend 1952: 142.

35 Tilley 1997.

36 Ubiña 2013: 32–3.

37 Optatus 1.22.

38 Frend 1952: 146 and Harding 1989: 186.

39 Eusebius, H.E. 10.5.18–20, Optatus 1.22, Aug. Ep. 88.2. Frend 1952: 147 and Harding 1989: 186.

40 Optatus 1.23–4 and Aug. Brev. Coll. 3.12.24 and 3.15.17. Frend 1952: 148–9 and Harding 1989: 187.

41 Optatus Appendix 3 and 4, Eusebius H.E. 10.5.21–4, Concilium Arelatense. Frend 1952: 151–2 and Harding 1989: 188.

42 Optatus, Appendix 2 and 6, and Aug. C. Cresc. 3.71.82. Harding 1989: 188.

43 Harding 1989: 189 and Engberg 2016.

44 Aug. Ad Don. Post Coll. 31.54. Engberg 2016 and Grasmück 1964: 79–108.

45 Gesta 3.258, Eusebius, Vita Constantini 1.45, Optatus 1.26, 3.1–10 and Appendix 7. Frend 1952: 156–62.

46 Sermo Donati 2, Aug. Ep. 88.3, 93.14, 105.9, C. litt. Petil. 2.92.205 and C.Th. 16.6.2, a later law against re-baptisers claiming a base in laws back to Constantine. Harding 1989: 188–92.

47 Eusebius, H.E. 10.6.5 and Optatus, Appendix 5.

48 Sermo Donati 6–8 and Aug. C. litt. Petil. 2.92.202.

49 Perhaps the changed policy was occasioned by a Donatist petition, Capit. 3.543–7, Aug. Brev. Coll. 3.21.39 and Ep. 141.9 and Optatus, Appendix 9. Harding 1989: 193

50 Eusebius, Vita Constantini.

51 C.Th. 16.5.1. Grasmück 1964: 90 and Harding 1989: 194.

52 Optatus, Appendix 10. Frend 1952: 162–8.

53 Aug. Ep. 93.43.

54 Optatus 3.4 and Aug. Contra Gaudentium 1.28.32. Frend 1952: 171–6, Tengström 1964: 24–78, Shaw 2004, Brown 2012: 328–9, Kaufman 2009: 133–9, Alexander 2000: 958–62 and Harding 1989: 68–73.

55 Aug. Contra Epistolam Parmeniani 1.10.16, Contra Gaudentium 1.22–32, Ep. 88.8, 185.3.12 and Ep. Ad cath. 19.50.
56 Raven 1993: 180–1.
57 Aug. C. litt. Petil. 1.24.26 and Gesta cap. 297.
58 Optatus 3.4.
59 Optatus 3.1–3. Frend 1952: 177–82 and Harding 1989: 195–7.
60 Gesta 3.30 and 1.188–92.
61 Optatus 3.12 and 7.6.
62 Optatus 3.1.
63 Optatus 3.2, see however 7.6.
64 Optatus 2.16, Ammianus Marcellinus 22.5.4, Aug. Ep. 93.12, 105.9 and C. litt. Petil. 2.92.203–5 and 97.224. Harding 1989: 198–200.
65 Optatus 2.7. Frend 1952: 181.
66 Grasmück 1964: 132–9 and Raven 1993: 180.
67 Gesta 3.258 and Aug. C. litt. Petil. 3.25.29. Monceaux 1901–1923: 5.208, Harding 1989: 200–1 and Grasmück 1964: 139–58.
68 C. Th. 16.2.18 and 16.5.37.
69 Ammianus Marcellinus 26.4.5, 27.9.1–5, 28.6, 29.5 and Zosimus 4.16.3.
70 Aug. Ep. 87.4–10, Contra Cresconium 3.60.66 and C. litt. Petil 1.24–6, Frend 1952: 171, Tilley 1997: 94, Raven 1993: 181–5 and Blackhurst 2004: 62–73.
71 Frend 1952: 198, 224–5, Warmington 1954: 10–11, Tengstöm 1964: 79–90 and Alexander 2000: 221–2.
72 Noethlichs 1971: 80–191 and Harding 1989: 201–2.
73 C. Th. 16.5.38–9 and 16.6.4–5. Morgenstern 1993.
74 C. Th. 16.5.40–1, 16.5.43–4, 16.5.46.
75 Tilley 1991.
76 Tilley 2001: 9–13 and Whelan 2014: 506.
77 Burns and Jensen 2014: 61–75 and Whelan 2014: 506–8.
78 Greg. Mag., Ep. 1.72, 1.75, 1.82, 2.39, 4.32, 4.35, 6.36; Burns and Jensen 2014: 80–2 and Tilley 2001: 20–1.
79 Passio Marculi and Passio Maximiani et Isaac.
80 Optatus 1.4, 1.6, 1.10, 1.21, 1.28, 2.10, 2.19, 4.9.
81 Optatus, 7.1.1.; Evers 2010: 171.
82 Aug. Retractiones 1.19, 1.20, 2.31, 2.43, 2.45, 2.48, 2.51, 2.85.
83 E.g. Aug., Ep. 23, 86, 87, 89, 93, 97, 100, 105, 133, 134, 149, 173, 204.
84 E.g. Sermo ad Caesariensis ecclesiae 2–3, 7–8.
85 Cf. for example Augustine's Commentary on the Galatians 15.12.
86 It could build on and expand Stuhlhofer 1988.
87 Burns and Jensen 2014.
88 Brown 2012: 334.
89 Harding 1989 : 115–38.
90 Monceaux 1901–1923: 4.436–84 and Harding 1989: 74–5.
91 Frend 1952: 54–7 and Brown 2012: 326–31.
92 Monceaux 1901–1923: 4.439–42 and Frend 1997: 614.
93 Aug., Serm 64,1,104. Shaw claims that this sermon is wrongly attributed to Augustine arguing that 'its injunction to shout "Deo Laudes" is absolutely un-Augustinian' (Shaw 2011: 470). There is no reference to other scholars questioning the sermon's attribution to Augustine.
94 Harding 1989: 83: Aug. Enarr. in ps. 144, 145, 146, 149, 150.
95 Aug. Civ. Dei 22.8.
96 Optatus 1.14.
97 Marcus 1999: 286 and Alexander 2000: 962.
98 Dearn 2004: 2.
99 Tilley 1997: 4–6 on methodology.
100 Alexander 2000: 962–3.
101 Sermo Donati 2
102 Optatus 2.24.
103 Schima 2011: 68.
104 Aug. Ep. 93.43. Frend 1952: 167.
105 Edwards 1997: 53.
106 Burns and Jensen 2014: 606–20.
107 Gaw 2013: 52–6 and Grasmück 1964: 158–9.
108 Alexander 2000: 221.
109 Optatus 3.3.

110 Optatus 3.1–4.
111 Shaw 2011: 517 and Frend 1952: 171.
112 Frend 1952: 142–3.
113 Shaw 2011: 587–8, 598–612, Burns and Jensen 2014: 541–50.
114 Aug. Sermo 285.2 and 328.8, Shaw 2011: 513–23.
115 Sermo Donati 6.
116 Engberg 2016.
117 Alexander 2000: 957.
118 Some combined multiple factors, others opposed some theories while arguing for one or two others.
119 For critique of this Tilley 1997: 11–21, Evers 2010: 156–7 and Harding 1989: 25–73, 139–73, 265–335.
120 Evers 2010: 158.
121 Tilley 1997: 13 and Evers 2010: 156.
122 Kriegbaum 1986.

Bibliography

Alexander, J. (2000) 'Donatism', in Esler 2000: 952–74.

Babcock, W. (ed.) (1989) Tyconius: The Book of Rules. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press.

Barnes, T. (1975) 'The beginnings of Donatism', Journal of Theological Studies 26: 13–22.

Blackhurst, A. (2004) 'The house of Nubel: Rebels or players?', in Merrills 2004: 59–75.

Brown, P. (2012) Through the Eye of a Needle. Wealth, the Fall of Rome, and the Making of Christianity in the West, 350–550 AD. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Burns, J. P. and Jensen, R. M. (2014) Christianity in Roman Africa – The Development of Its Practices and Beliefs. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Coleman-Norton, P. R. (ed.) (1966) Roman State and Christian Church. A Collection of Legal Documents to AD 535, 1–3. London: The Johns Hopkins University Press.

Dearn, A. (2004) 'The Abitinian martyrs and the outbreak of the Donatist schism', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 55: 1–18.

Edwards, M. (ed.) (1997) Optatus: Against the Donatists. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Engberg, J. (2007) Impulsore Chresto. Opposition to Christianity in the Roman Empire. Frankfurt: Peter Lang.

Engberg, J. (2016) 'Exile and the Dissemination of Donatist Congregation', in Hillner, Ulrich and Engberg, 145–64.

Esler, P. F. (ed.) (2000), The Early Christian World. London: Routledge.

Evers, A. (2010) Church, Cities and People: A Study of the Plebs in the Church and Cities of Roman Africa in Late Antiquity. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Fear, A., Ubiña, J. and Marcos, M. (eds) (2013) The Role of the Bishop in Late Antiquity. London: Bloomsbury.

Fitzgerald, A. (ed.) (1999) Augustine through the Ages. An Encyclopedia. Cambridge, MA: Eerdmans.

Fox, R. L. (2015) Augustine. Conversions and Confessions. London: Allen Lane.

Frend, W. H. C. (1952) The Donatist Church. A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1997) 'Donatus "paene totam Africam decepit". How?', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 48: 611–27.

Frend, W. H. C. and Clancy, K. (1977) 'When did the Donatist schism begin?', Journal of Theological Studies 28: 104–9.

Gaw, C. (2013) 'Ius et religio: The Conference of Carthage and the end of the Donatis schism, 411 AD', in Fear, Ubiña and Marcos 2013: 47–62.

Grasmück, E. (1964) Coercitio. Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit. Bonn, Germany: Röhrscheid.

Harding, M. (1989) 'Salige er de, som er forfulgte for retfærdighedens skyld'. Studier i donatismens historie. Unpublished dissertation. Copenhagen University.

Hillner, J., Ulirch, J. and Engberg, J. (eds) (2016) Clerical Exile in Late Antiquity. Frankfurt, Germany: Peter Lang.

Kaufman, P. (2009) 'Donatism revisited: Moderates and militants in late antique north Africa', Journal of Late Antiquity 2: 131–42.

Kriegbaum, B. (1986) Kirche der Traditoren oder Kirche der Märtyrer. Die Vorgeschichte des Donatismus. Innsbruck, Austria: IST 16.

Labrousse, M. (ed.) (1995–1996) Optat de Milève: Traité Contre les Donatistes, 1–2. Paris: Sources Chrétiennes, 412–3.

Lancel, S. (ed.) (1972–1991) Acta Concilii Carthaginensis, 1–4. Paris: Sources Chrétiennes 194–195, 224, 373.

Maier, J.-L. (ed.) (1987–1989) Le Dossier du donatisme, 1–2. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.

Marcus, R. (1999) 'Donatus, Donatism', in Fitzgerald 1999: 284–7.

Merrills, A. H. (ed.) (2004) Vandals, Romans and Berbers. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate.

Monceaux, P. (1901–1923) Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne depuis les origins jusqu'a l'invasion Arabe, 1–7. Paris : Editions Ernest Leroux.

Morgenstern, F. (1993) 'Die Kaisergesetze gegen die Donatisten in Nordafrika (Mitte 4. Jh. Bis 429)', Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte. Romanistitische Abteilung, 103–23.

Noethlichs, K.-L. (1971) Die gesetzgeberischen Massnahmen der christlichen Kaiser des vierten Jahrhunderts gegen Häretiker, Heiden und Juden. Cologne, Germany: A. Wasmund-Bothmann.

Petschenig, M. (ed.) (1908–1910) Sancti Aureli Augustini. Scripta Contra Donatistas, 1–3. Vienna, Austria: Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, 51–3.

Raven, S. (1993) Rome in Africa, 3rd ed. London: Routledge (1st ed. 1969).

Schima, S. (2011) 'Carthagine locuta – causa finita? Afrikanisches Selbstbewusstsein und römischer Eigensinn', in Van Oort and Wischmeyer 2011: 59–92.

Shaw, B. (2004) 'Who were the Circumcellions?', in Merrills 2004: 227–58.

Shaw, B. (2011) Sacred Violence. African Christians and Sectarian Hatred in the Age of Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Stuhlhofer, F. (1988) Der Gebrauch der Bibel von Jesus bis Euseb. Eine statistische Untersuchung zur Kanongeschichte. Wuppertal, Germany: SCM R. Brockhaus.

Tengstöm, E. (1964) Donatisten un Katholiken. Soziale, wirtschaftliche und politische Aspecte einer nordafrikanischen Kirchenspaltung. Gothenburg, Sweden: Elanders.

Tilley, M. (1991) 'Dilatory Donatists or procrastinating Catholics: The trial at the Conference of Carthage', Church History 60: 7–19.

Tilley, M. (ed.) (1996) Donatist Martyr Stories. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Tilley, M. (1997) The Bible in Christian North Africa. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Tilley, M. (1999) 'Donatist works', in Fitzgerald 1999: 34–9.

Tilley, M. (2001) 'The collapse of collegial church: North African Christianity on the eve of Islam', Theological Studies 62: 3–22.

Ubiña, J. (2013) 'The Donatist conflict as seen by Constantine and the bishops', in Fear, Ubiña and Marcos, 31–46.

Van Oort, J. and Wischmeyer, W. (eds) (2011) Die spätantike Kirche Nordafrikas im Umbruch. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Warmington, B. (1954) The North African Provinces from Diocletian to the Vandal Conquest. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Whelan, R. (2014) 'African controversy: The inheritance of the Donatist schism in Vandal Africa', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 65: 504–21.

45

ARIANISM

David Rankin

Contemporary interest/scholarship in 'Arianism'

Since the late 1980s, scholarship dealing with the Trinitarian debates of the fourth century has largely shifted from a reading of the period as a struggle between a claimed orthodoxy, supposedly represented by the Creed of Nicaea and Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria from 328, and a heterodoxy, represented by Arius, presbyter of Alexandria, and the bishops Eusebii of Caesarea and Nicomedia respectively, to one by the whole church of that period to come to terms with how the Son of God might be understood as God in the same way as the Father had been traditionally so understood. A further shift since the mid 1990s has seen the emergence of a scholarly near consensus that we cannot, and indeed should not, speak any longer of 'Arianism' in any meaningful way – or of any of its correlates, 'Semi-Arianism' or 'Neo-Arianism' among them – or of Homoousian, Homoiousian, Homoian, Heteroousian or Anomoian 'parties' in this context, so that even the title of this chapter might seem both inappropriate and unhelpful, if not indeed simply wrong. Contemporary scholarship suggests that even to speak of an 'Arian' heresy makes impossible any attempt to get at the truth of what took place from the early 320s until the later fourth century over this matter. Indeed, much contemporary scholarship suggests that even the notion of an 'Arian controversy' is a construct developed by Athanasius to provide for his own political and theological rehabilitation from the mid 330s until his own death thirty years later. As I indicated in my 2000 essay 'the charge of espousing "Arian" views remains a potent and potentially damaging one even in modern times' (Rankin 2000: 975).

Michel Barnes, writing in 1998, believed that 'the last fifteen years or so have seen a major re-evaluation of "Arianism"; not the least of these re-evaluations is new doubt about the authenticity of the traditional category and designation "Arian(ism)"' (1998: 47); he recognised there that 'Arius' theology is now rehabilitated to this extent: it is clear that Arius' theology was not an alien theology, but a Christian theology which would have appeared familiar even to those who profoundly disagreed with it' (1998: 47). Such a re-evaluation has continued in the decades and more since then. Barnes continues by declaring that 'the idea that there was a post-Nicene "Arian conspiracy" run by closeted Arians who secretly believed that the Son was a creature seems initially to have been promoted by Marcellus in his polemic against those who opposed him' and that 'Nicaea slowly acquired its authority only after shedding its modalist associations' (1998: 53). 'The Nicene creed became normative only through the process of excluding the modalist content' (1998: 62). Modalism or Sabellianism (in the east) or Patripassianism (in the west) was a belief – common in the second and third centuries and opposed to the view that God is one being eternally existing in three distinct persons or existents or entities – that God is simply one person or existent or entity who has revealed or manifested himself in three forms or modes at various times, but never as Father, Son or Holy Spirit at the same time.

Ayres declares that 'Arius' own theology is of little importance in understanding the major debates of the rest of the [fourth] century' (2004: 56). He also comments that 'it is not at all clear that at Nicaea [in 325] the term homoousios was understood to be the technical focus of the creed [promulgated there]' (2004: 93).

> In the context of Nicaea's creed . . . all the theologians mentioned in this paragraph [Alexander, Marcellus, Eustathius, Eusebius of Caesarea, and Athanasius] also probably saw homoousios as expanding on and secondary to the phrase 'from the ousia of the Father', the sense of the term thus being governed by the generic relationship indicated there.
>
> (2004: 96)

This is a crucial matter for exploring much of the debate in the fourth century in this matter. Ayres comments that 'during the years 325–42 neither Arius nor the particular terminology used at Nicaea were at the heart of theological controversy' (2004: 100). And what is more – and he is almost certainly right – that 'for many Eastern bishops the controversy over Marcellus is much more foundational than prior conflict over Arius' (2004: 102). The potential modalist reading of Nicaea cannot be brushed aside. Thus, he concludes, 'Athanasius' decision to make Nicaea and homoousios central to his theology [and to the shape and contours and parameters of the whole debate in the fourth century and its reading in modern times] has its origins in the shifting climate of the 350s and the structure of emerging Homoian theology' (2004: 144).

Gwynn declares it to be 'difficult to distinguish possible fact from polemical rhetoric' (2007: 132) and that 'it is difficult to exaggerate the influence that these Athanasian passages have exerted upon later reconstructions of the period following the Council of Nicaea' (2007: 139). This alone remains a good reason for re-visiting and re-exploring traditional understandings of fourth-century debates and, if necessary, revising these so that, at the very least, our modern Trinitarian conversations are not tainted by past misunderstandings. Gwynn does say, however, that he does not 'deny that a "Eusebian party" in some form might actually exist, for a number of the individuals whom Athanasius condemns certainly knew and corresponded with each other' (2007: 167). He does say, nevertheless, that 'it is Athanasius' construction of the "Arianism" of the "Eusebians" that reveals most explicitly the degree to which Athanasius has distorted our understanding of his foes, of himself, and of the fourth-century theological controversies' (2007: 169). Indeed he demonstrates that the heresy of which Athanasius speaks – Gwynn calls it 'Athanasian Arianism' – 'does not derive from the writings of Arius or of the individuals who allegedly comprise the "Eusebians"' (2007: 169). Some scholars indeed would suggest that the primary heresies combatted in the fourth century were those of Marcellus of Ancyra (and of Athanasius himself!). Gwynn concludes that:

> [t]he 'Arian party' of the 'Eusebians' never existed as a distinct ecclesiastical or theological entity, and that the 'Arianism' that Athanasius attributes to those men does not reflect either the doctrines of Arius himself [from his own writings] or the known writings of any of the individual 'Eusebians'.
>
> (2007: 245)

Gwynn points to the value in 'the removal of polemical labels like "Arian" or "Nicene", and the abandonment of the polarization inherent in such language' (2007: 249). Lyman declares that 'historically, this polarized theological tradition has made the origins and significance of Arius and the later opponents of Nicaea difficult to reconstruct' (2008: 238). She observes that 'scholars have begun to unravel the assumed theological ties between Arius and those later called "Arians"'.

They now reject a coherent movement called 'Arianism', but rather study the variety of doctrines and alliances of those opposed to Nicaea, i.e. 'non-Nicenes' (2008: 238). 'If we discard the label "Arian"', she declares:

> [a]s a collective for those who opposed Nicaea or Athanasius, we are returned to the complex theological negotiations of varied authors. In the East, the polemical title of 'Arian' did not even figure in all controversies or was used as a theoretical boundary in contradistinction to modalism.
>
> (2008: 247)

This shift in the reading of the fourth-century conversation about the nature of the triune God will, I hope, be evident in this chapter.

Arius and early 'Arianism' (318–325)

The precise order of events surrounding the outbreak of the 'Arian controversy' has been the subject of intense debate for as long as scholars have studied the period. The contemporary consensus on dating events – which is not significantly affected by major changes in the way most scholars now read the period – has it that at some time around 320 CE, Arius (256–336 CE), a presbyter in Alexandria and native of Libya, took exception to the teachings of his bishop Alexander concerning the relationship of the Son to the Father. Now while Alexander does not in his encyclical traditionally dated to 319 (although it must be later) (Urkunde 4b) – where the chief target is not Eusebius of Nicomedia but that of its anathema Arius himself – tell us much of what he believes, he does tell us what he believes Arius and others allegedly aligned with him do. This is that 'God was not always Father, that the Word of God was not from eternity but was made (by God) out of nothing, out of the non-existent'. And while Arius himself, in his own letter to his bishop (Urkunde 6) (Williams suggests 321 as the date), does not tell us what he reckons that that bishop believes but only what he himself teaches, in his letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, written in the same year (Urkunde 1), he does say what Alexander 'publicly teaches', that God has always been and the Son has always been, that Father and Son exist together, that the Son has his existence unbegotten along with God, and is both 'ever begotten', 'without having been begotten, that God [the Father] does not precede the Son by thought or interval however small, that both God and Son have always been, and that the Son is from God himself'. Arius is here the traditionalist monotheist whose fear is that his bishop is not so, and perhaps even a modalist. Arius' letter to his own bishop makes clear that he, Arius, maintains that there are three distinct hypostaseis, that God [the Father] is alone unbegun and that the Son was 'begotten apart from time by the Father, and being created and found before the ages, was not before his generation', but 'being begotten apart from time before all things, he was alone made to subsist by the Father'. The Son 'is not eternal or co-eternal or co-originate with the Father' neither does he have his being together with the Father. God the Father alone is Monad and Beginning of all. At the same time, Arius rules out, among other things, the notion that the Son might be homoousios with the Father as a portion of the Father.

Figure 45.1   Late Roman mosaic representation of Alexandria from Jerash in Jordan. Photo J. C. N. Coulston

Alexander then took formal action against Arius and some others, and this action in its turn occasioned the letter of Arius to Eusebius of Nicomedia, complaining of his treatment at the hands of Alexander (Williams dates this letter to 321/2). Alexander then advised the wider church of his action in anathematising Arius (Urkunde 4b).

Arius himself and 'Arianism': documentary evidence

There are a number of extant documents which relate to the early period of the controversy, particularly to those events involving Arius himself, and which give us some idea about Arius' own theology. We have looked above at Arius' letter to his bishop preserved by both Athanasius and (thankfully) Epiphanius; at Arius' letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia preserved by both Theodoret and Epiphanius; and at the encyclical letter of Alexander, announcing Arius' anathematisation, preserved by the historian Socrates. There is also Arius' confession of faith addressed to the emperor preserved by both Socrates and Sozomen. In this confession, Arius claims both to have been vindicated by recent events and to have held faithfully to the teaching of the church and, more importantly, of the scriptures.

The actual letters of Arius – in which we can place trust as being accurate representations of his beliefs – are, of course, the most helpful when examining his thoughts. Also of some value – although this is increasingly questioned by scholars given that they do not stand up particularly well when compared with the letters and therefore should be employed only for verification – are the extracts which Athanasius claims to have lifted from Arius' metrical piece, the Thalia, and which can be found at both the De Synodis (15) and the Orationes contra Arianos (1.5–6). While Kannengiesser has argued rather strongly (1983: 467) that the Thalia were written in the 360s by a later sympathiser rather than by Arius himself, the contemporary consensus is that both sets of extracts, however refashioned or represented by Athanasius or by his own source, originated with Arius himself (Williams 1987: 65–6). While differing in particular, and some contemporary scholars would say significant, respects from the more easily verifiable works of Arius – particularly Urkunden 1, 6 and 30 – they yet contain some useful points of similarity in language and thought. They must, however, as already noted, only be employed to confirm, never to prove.

The traditional view that Arius' monotheism was philosophical and not biblical, metaphysical and not ethical, and his God the Absolute of the philosophical schools – a view held quite widely until even recently – is now properly discounted. Gwynn provides a most useful summary of the thought of Arius in which he contrasts the words from his own letters with Athanasius' 'construction'. He notes with qualified approval Williams' observation that 'it is perhaps a mistake to look for one self-contained and exclusive "theological school" to which to assign [Arius]' (Williams 1987: 115) and Hanson's that Arius was 'basically eclectic' (Hanson 1988: 88) (Gwynn 2007: 187). He acknowledges that the extant writings of Arius do not provide much material to show us what he actually believed, given that his letter to Eusebius is brief and designed more to refute Alexander than to promote his own views, and his two creeds are intended to secure recognition and reconciliation and therefore may, in Gwynn's words, 'tone down' his actual views in order to present himself in the best possible light (2007: 187). While not suggesting that the alleged extracts from the Thalia in Athanasius' writings are a foolproof guide to Arius' views, Gwynn looks at a number of claims in the De Synodis 15 accounts – which Gwynn regards as more reliable than those from the Orationes – and then compares them with what we do know from Arius' own hand.

Athanasius' claim that Arius taught that God was not always Father is not supported by the Arius documents. The Athanasian claim, however, that the Son was not always and that he was not until he was begotten is supported by reference to the letter to Eusebius where Arius declares that '[the Son] was not, before he was begotten' and repeats this in his letter to Alexandria. The claim that Arius taught the Son was not from the Father but came also into existence out of nothing is said only once by Arius, in the letter to Eusebius; yet he does say it there and does not contradict it elsewhere. He says that the Son 'is neither part of God nor from any existing being'. The claim that the Son is not proper to the ousia of the Father is thereby also confirmed from that same letter. Yet the claim of Athanasius that for Arius the Son is a creature (ktisma) and a thing made (poiēma) cannot be supported, at least not in the bare terms that Athanasius insists. For while Arius did teach that in some sense the Son is a creature, he also makes clear, in the letter to Alexander, that the Son ' is the perfect creature of God, but not as one of the creatures'. Athanasius' claim that Arius taught Christ 'is not true God' is probably true given that Arius avoids such language for the Son (Gwynn 2007: 192), but that 'by participation [he] was made God' is nowhere supported in Arius' extant writings. The Athanasian claim that the Arian Son had an incomplete knowledge of the Father – The Son does not know the Father exactly, the Son does not see the Father perfectly, the Word does not understand nor know the Father exactly – is absent from the extant letters of Arius. The Athanasian claim that the Arian Son is not the true and only Word of the Father but by no name only is called Word and Wisdom, and by grace Son and Power has a 'degree of truth' to it according to Gwynn (2007: 193). Yet Gwynn acknowledges that this is only an Athanasian reading of Arius, for not even in the Thalia fragments does Arius suggest that the Son 'is therefore only Word and Wisdom "by name" or "by grace"'. Athanasius merely assumes that 'if the Son is not essentially God, then he cannot truly be called the Word, Wisdom or Power of God' (2007: 194). The Athanasian claim that the Son is not unchangeable like the Father but is changeable by nature like the creatures – what Gwynn calls 'this last and most controversial element of the construction of "Arianism" that both Alexander and Athanasius attribute to Arius' – is 'at face value openly false' (2007: 194). In his letters [to both Alexander and Eusebius of Nicomedia], Arius consistently distinguishes the Son from the other creatures and 'repeatedly and explicitly insists that the Son is "unchangeable"'. Gwynn concludes that while 'there are considerable elements of truth in Athanasius' construction of "Arianism"' – Arius does deny the eternity of the Son, he does describe the Son as a creature, he does 'explicitly reject' that the Son could be proper to the ousia of the Father, 'at least in one letter' refers to the Son as created out of nothing and avoids referring to the Son as 'true God', while the councils of both Antioch and Nicaea 325 seem to support some of these claims through their anathemas (not eternal, out of nothing, alterable) – there are 'an equally significant number of allegedly "Arian" principles that in fact derive not from Arius' words but from the polemical interpretations of Athanasius and Alexander' (Gwynn 2007: 195).

These include the claims that Arius taught the Son was God only 'by participation' and Word and Wisdom 'only by name and grace', and – 'most importantly' – the 'repeated charge that Arius rendered the Son mutable and reduced Him to the level of all other created beings' (2007: 195f.).

Gwynn concludes that while we can never know fully what Arius believed or taught, we can know that he did believe in the One God, alone begotten, alone eternal, that the Son is God but not eternal and only-begotten, and that he cannot share in the essence of the Father (2007: 201). For Arius the Son is a creature but not like any other. Arius' concern, says Gwynn in support of Christopher Stead, is 'to uphold the divinity of God the Father in the face of attempts to glorify the Logos . . . unduly' (2007: 202).

The 'Eusebians': the early period II (325–337)

A number of other gatherings, both in Alexandria and beyond, were then held to discuss the matter and the most important, before that of Nicaea itself, was a synod at Antioch in early 325. A letter from this council to Alexander of Thessalonica advised that 'Arius and his friends' were guilty of 'blasphemy . . . directed against our Saviour' and proceeded to advise what, for the synod, comprised 'the faith' (Opitz, Urkunde 18). This was to believe in:

> [o]ne God, Father almighty . . . and in one Lord Jesus Christ, only begotten Son, begotten not from that which is not but from the Father, not as made but as properly an offspring, but begotten in an ineffable, indescribable manner . . . who exists everlastingly and did not at one time not exist.

By way of a reversal of this language we can surmise what the synod thought Arius 'and his friends' taught. The synod went to anathematise all those 'who say or think or preach that the Son of God is a creature or has come into being or has been made and is not truly begotten, or that there was when he was not'. Those anathematised at Antioch for thereby 'having the same views as Arius' included Eusebius of Caesarea in Palestine. Then at Nicaea, not in its own time as pivotal as it was to become in later centuries, Arius was repudiated and the term homoousios introduced in its Creed, although whether this term was in 325 as central as it eventually became later – or merely an explanatory term for the (at the time) more controversial phrase 'from the substance of the Father' – must await further discussion in this chapter.
Figure 45.2   The Synod of Nicaea of 325 CE depicted in an icon from the Mégalo Metéoron Monastery in Greece, with the condemned Arius in the bottom of the image. Photo Wikimedia Commons; author Jensen

Almost immediately after Nicaea, the tide began to turn for the foremost proponents of the Creed from there and its language – people like Eustathius of Antioch and Marcellus – and the growing fear that this language, particularly phrases such as 'from the substance of the Father' and homoousios, were open to modalist interpretation. This raises the question as to whether in the first half of the fourth century the centre of the so-called 'controversy' was actually opposition to the thought of Arius 'and his (powerful) friends' or to that of Marcellus, Eustathius and their 'friends', such as Athanasius. By the end of the 330s, Athanasius had begun to identify and to name those whom he claimed were the instigators and drivers of a theology which stood over against Nicaea as participants in an 'Arian conspiracy' (Epistula Encyclica of 339). Those whom Alexander, a decade or more earlier, had described as 'apostates', instigators of a 'Christ-fighting' and 'Arian' heresy (Urkunde 4b), Athanasius identifies as 'gathered around the Eusebii'. Alexander, in his encyclical, had himself referred to both the 'associates of Arius' and those 'of Eusebius [of Nicomedia]' – Alexander makes no reference in this letter to Eusebius of Caesarea – but as two distinct, though associated, groupings. And yet, even here, as Gwynn makes clear, Alexander's focus, unlike that of Athanasius, is on the one Eusebius and not both (2007: 68f.). Athanasius himself does not begin to reference 'the Eusebians [plural]' until after Tyre 335 (Gwynn 2007: 69). Athanasius' construction of an 'Arian-Eusebian party', however, soon begins in part to shape the way in which the period is explored, both in the fourth century itself and into modern times. Who then were these 'Eusebians', or were they a construct of Athanasius' own imagination? Gwynn makes clear that every use of the term 'the Eusebians' is in a polemical context (2007: 104); this does not make the existence of such a group in the fourth century unlikely, of course, but it does lay it at least open to serious question. Three passages in the Apologia Contra Arianos offer some names of those, almost exclusively bishops, whom Athanasius regards as the 'Eusebians', or 'those gathered around Eusebius' of Nicomedia. They include Eusebius himself, Ursacius of Singidunum and Valens of Mursa. Strangely perhaps, the 'other' Eusebius, of Caesarea, never appears in any of the 'catalogues' of those persons whom Athanasius condemns for their 'Eusebian' or 'Arian' sympathies. His reference to 'associates of the Eusebii [the plural]' must point to the bishop of Caesarea as one target, albeit an understated one. Yet there is no 'party' here; merely a collection of bishops and theologians concerned at the way in which the relationship between Father and Son was articulated by some of the more radical supporters of the language of Nicaea in 325 – from the being of the Father and homoousios – as close to if not outright Sabellianism/modalism. While some little is known of those whom Athanasius names as 'Eusebian' at various points, it might be particularly useful at this point to look at what the two Eusebii and perhaps Asterius, the Sophist, alleged members of the so-called 'School of Lucian', taught.

The 'School of Lucian'

In his letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, Arius refers to Eusebius as a 'fellow-disciple of Lucian'. This, and sundry references in later writings, has led some scholars to speculate about a 'Lucianist School', one based on the teachings of this Lucian (born c. 230, martyred in 312). Williams remarks that those identified in 'Nicene' writings as the 'Eusebians' are 'roughly the same group as the group identified as pupils of Lucian of Antioch' (1987: 63). Gwynn points out that 'surprisingly little is actually known about Lucian of Antioch or his teachings' (2007: 203). His identity itself, Gwynn points out, 'is a controversial subject' and our knowledge of his teaching 'derives from later sources of highly doubtful value' (2007: 203). None of those, with the exception of Arius, makes any claim to be his 'disciple' and Lucian himself remains an enigmatic figure and his significance for this crisis is unknown. My own view is that Arius himself – as part of his desire to present himself as a traditionalist standing in a clear, historical line – attached his own name, and that of the bishop whose support and protection he sought, to that of a revered martyr.

Asterius the Sophist

While for most of those named as 'Eusebians' very little evidence of their teachings remains, this is not true for either Asterius, the so-called 'Sophist' (d. 341), or for Eusebius of Nicomedia himself. That there are similarities between what we know of Arius' actual beliefs and those of Asterius and Eusebius is clear; that there are significant differences is also true. Much of what we might know of Asterius' thought stems from fragments preserved by both Athanasius and Marcellus, with the former focussing on his alleged teaching of the priority of the Father and the latter on his teaching of the three hypostases (Gwynn 2007: 207). Yet evidence coming from hostile sources is potentially tainted and I am less comfortable than Gwynn might seem in his reconstruction of Asterius' thought. Both 'Arianism' and the thought of Asterius as we might know them are largely constructions of their enemies. Gwynn sees no explicit evidence that Asterius ever used the phrase 'there was when [the Son] was not' yet he clearly shared Arius' view that 'the Son is not eternal as is the Father, but is generated "before the ages"' (2007: 207). And like Arius he argued that even if the Son were not eternal the Father might yet always be Father, if only in potentia. He also shared Arius' notion that Christ was not 'true God' and the doctrine that 'the Son could not be materially generated from the Father's essence' (2007: 207). Asterius did, however, speak of the Son as a creature (poiēma) – unlike Arius – but also spoke of Him as unique as the only-begotten of the Father. Neither is there any evidence that Asterius spoke of the Son as mutable or as created out of nothing. His 'most notorious doctrine', however – and one not taught by Arius – was that the Son was not the true Wisdom and Power of God. Yet even this, as Gwynn acknowledges, is the interpretation of Athanasius and Asterius' supporters later defended him on this matter. The Son is still exalted above all other creatures, consistent with the known teaching of Arius. Yet, what Gwynn sees as significant differences with Arius – that Asterius did not teach 'there was when [the Son] was not', '[the Son] came to be out of nothing', and that the Son did not perfectly know the Father' – may not have been taught by Arius. Asterius' teaching that there are three hypostases, and that 'the Father is truly Father and the Son truly Son, and the Holy Spirit likewise' would sit, however, quite comfortably with what we know of Arius' thought.

Eusebius of Caesarea

Following his anathematisation by his bishop, Arius fled to Nicomedia and his teachings were declared orthodox by a synod in Caesarea of Palestine. This Eusebius initially pleaded with Alexander to take Arius back. He clearly saw himself as a conservative defender of a traditional theology, much as Arius himself did. His theological reflection and activity were, like those again of Arius, as much reactive as proactive. He had been condemned at Antioch 325 and, perhaps defensively, formally supported the declaration at Nicaea 325 which he immediately, and with some trepidation, justified to his congregation at home. His theological work after Nicaea was more directed against Marcellus and Eustathius than against the language of Nicaea itself. If he seemed to support an 'Origenist' subordination of the Son as a 'second God', he had many colleagues. For many at the time, this was the only way to protect and defend the integrity of the Godhead in the distinction of Persons. He did not absolutely oppose the use of the homoousian but would not allow it to be understood in a material or modalist sense.

His letter to his congregation is important for it perhaps reflects what the original 'Arianism' was about. Here he says that at Nicaea he presented his own creedal statement which spoke of the Son as God from God, and before all the ages begotten from the Father, and of the Father being 'truly Father', and the Son 'truly Son', and the Holy Spirit 'truly Holy Spirit'. He says that then the emperor himself asked the council to support this Creed as orthodox with the sole insertion of 'the single word homoousios' (which is unlikely). He then gives the Creed of Nicaea itself which shows that it is significantly different from his own and that it involves more than the single insertion of the homoousian. It includes not only that but also the 'from the ousia of the Father', 'begotten, not made', and eight propositions anathematised. He defensively assures his congregation how these were to be understood. That of 'from the ousia of the Father' was to be understood as 'indicative of the Son's being indeed from the Father, yet without being as if a part of him'. 'Begotten, not made' he accepted, he said, because 'made' is an appellation common to the other creatures who came into being through the Son and to whom the Son had no likeness. The homoousian was accepted because it implied no division in the Monad, no alteration in the Father's ousia, and suggests 'that the Son of God bears no resemblance to the originated creatures'. The anathema against 'before his generation he was not' made clear that 'before he was generated in actuality, he was potentially with the Father ingenerately'. Eusebius could not accept the notion that the Father had created the Son. The Logos was, however, the first product (gennema) of all beings. The hypostasis of the Son is divine, but subordinate to the Supreme God. The Son worships the Father as God; therefore, the Father is God of the Son. The Son is God solely as the image of the true God though not in his own right (De ecclesiastica theologia 2.23). The Logos functions also as the intermediary of the Father for creating and governing the universe. For Eusebius, unlike for Origen, there is no eternal begetting and thus the begetting of the Son is not without beginning. The Son is not co-eternal with the Father (De ecclesiastica theologia 5.1.20). The Father is alone unoriginated. Yet the Son was not created 'out of the non-existent' (De ecclesiastica theologia 1.10) but is, somewhat vaguely, 'from the Father'. Eusebius clearly prefers the expression of the Son's divinity, however understood, to be in purely biblical terms.

Eusebius' view of God 'was especially informed by his radical understanding of the divine transcendence' (Robertson 2007: 39) and God's 'utter simplicity and otherness' mean that he can have nothing to do with the material world and, therefore, by implication, a Son who cannot be properly God. The Logos is, for Eusebius, only entitled to the name 'God' in a derivative sense (Robertson 2007: 52).

Eusebius of Nicomedia

The only extant letter from Eusebius that we have is that sent to Paulinus of Tyre in c. 323 (Urkunde 8) and all other fragments come from the writings of Athanasius whose trustworthiness in this is dubious. Eusebius clearly denies the eternity of the Son though this is found not in the letter to Paulinus but in the fragment from his reply to Arius and contained in Athanasius De Synodis 17. It can, however, be implied in the letter where the Son's beginning is incomprehensible but real. In what we have from his pen – either directly or through Athanasius – he does not employ the sentence 'There was when He was not' of the Son nor describe the Son as created 'out of nothing'. In the letter, however, he is clear that the Son was created – and therefore has a beginning – and cannot derive from the ousia of the Father, of the unbegotten, but is 'entirely distinct in nature and in power'. He is clear there that the Son cannot come from the ousia of the Father. Thus for this Eusebius, unlike for his namesake at Caesarea, the employment of the homoousios to define the relationship between the Father and the Son could never be acceptable. He is, as Gwynn remarks, opposed to any language which might 'compromise the immaterial nature of God' (2007: 214). Gwynn also comments that his denial, like those of both Arius and Asterius, that the Son can derive from the ousia of the Father is tied to his 'affirmation of the Son as a "created" being' (2007: 214). In the letter, Eusebius makes constant reference to the Son being 'created' and employs Proverbs 8.22 as a basic proof-text. As a creature, the Son cannot be from the ousia of the Father and must have been created solely by the Father's will. His status as a creature rules out any ontological union with the Father. His argument, however, is not that the Son as creature is as all other creatures, but that the Son must be created from the will of the Father and not from his ousia. The Son is a ktisma but is also set apart from the rest of creation. His nature is 'unchanging and inexpressible'. He speaks of his 'likeness' to the Father and of the Son as an 'icon' of the Father. This idea of the Son as 'icon' is shared with Asterius. There are thus both similarities and differences with and from Arius. As Gwynn points out, Eusebius [of Nicomedia], Asterius and Arius 'uniformly and consistently subordinate the Son and deny that he is eternal or from the Father's ousia' (2007: 217). He further remarks that both Eusebius and Asterius 'avoid' Arius' description of the Son as created out of nothing and his alleged claim that the Son did not fully know the Father (2007: 218). They also place more emphasis on the unique divinity of the Son than does Arius. Both Asterius and Eusebius have more in common with Eusebius of Caesarea: they deny that the Son could exist co-eternally with the Father and describe the Son as the perfect creature apart from all other creatures.

Later 'Arianism': Arians, Semi-Arians and Neo-Arians (337–381)

In 337 Constantine died and was succeeded by his sons Constantius II in the east and Constantine II and Constans in the west. Constantius was a supporter of those who held reservations about the central language of Nicaea 325, and of Eusebius of Nicomedia in particular, while the western emperors were broadly supportive of those associated with Athanasius. Within a few years, most of the original protagonists were dead: Alexander by 328, Arius in 336, Eusebius of Caesarea by 340, and Eusebius of Nicomedia by 342.

In 341 a synod meeting at Antioch produced a number of statements, among them the so-called Second Antiochene or Dedication Creed. This Creed repudiated Arius – though neither he nor any alleged associates are actually named – and what he was alleged to have taught (especially the notions that time or season either is or has been before the generation of the Son, and that the Son is a creature as one of the creatures or an offspring as one of the offsprings). It spoke itself of the Son as 'only-begotten God' and as 'God from God', as 'both unalterable and unchangeable', of three hypostaseis – 'a Father who is truly Father, and a Son who is truly Son, and the Holy Spirit who is truly Holy Spirit' – and of these being 'three in subsistence and in agreement one'. There was no homoousios, no 'from the ousia of the Father', no 'begotten, not made'. Yet these should not necessarily be characterised as deliberate 'omissions' as this would imply that Nicaea 325 was the yardstick against which all other fourth-century documents until 381 were to be measured. Antioch 2 is subordinationist and anti-Arius, but also anti-Marcellan. Its authors struggle, like their predecessors, to make sense of the relationship of the Son to the Father.

In 343, at a synod meeting at Sardica in the west, the council condemned two bishops – Ursacius and Valens – whom it describes as 'born from the Arian asp' and alleges that these have claimed that both Son and Holy Spirit 'were crucified and slain . . . and died and rose again' and that they 'perniciously maintain' that Father, Son and Holy Spirit are 'of diverse and distinct hypostaseis'. The council itself declares that the 'Father has never been without the Son, nor the Son without the Father', and that it is 'absurd to affirm that the Father ever existed without the Son'. The Son 'was begotten' but 'before all things' and the 'ever-existent Word does not have a beginning'. The Word is 'true God, wisdom and power' and 'truly Son'. There is, they say, one God, for the Father and the Son are 'one [hypostasis]'. The Father is 'greater' than the Son but this is simply because the 'name' of the Father is greater than that of the Son. Socrates reports that the eastern bishops who had come to Sardica returned to Philippopolis and anathematised the term homoousios and 'inserted the anomoean opinion' into their correspondence. In return, those at Sardica condemned them, confirmed the Creed of Nicaea, rejected the term 'unlike', and 'recognised' the consubstantiality of the Persons (HE, 2.20.7–11).

A Creed adopted at Antioch in 345 – the so-called Macrostich or Long-lined Creed – sought to find a middle path and to repudiate what it saw as all extremist positions. It anathematised any suggestion that there were three Gods, or that Christ is not God, or that before the ages he was neither Christ nor Son, or that he is unbegotten, or that the Father begat the Son not by choice or will. It repudiates the notion that the Son is from nothing or from any subsistence before existing beside the Father, but that the Son comes from the Father alone. But it also makes clear that the Son is neither co-unbegun nor co-ingenerate with the Father, for the latter is these alone. It speaks not of three hypostaseis but of three prosopa and pragmata. But this, it says, does not make three Gods, for God the Father is alone self-complete and unbegun and unbegotten and invisible. The Son is subordinate to his Father and God, yet is himself God perfect according to nature and true God. The Creed specifically condemns both Marcellus and Scotinus. This synod does not embrace all that Nicaea offered – and clearly repudiates any modalist tendencies – but it also repudiates what Arius was regarded – without naming him – as having taught as placing the Son too far from the Father and bringing into question his complete, if subordinate, divinity.

In 350 Constans died and Constantius became sole emperor. What has been called the 'Arian ascendancy' – or rather that which involved those who were, for the most part, most comfortable with speaking only of the Son as 'like' the Father – had begun and this lasted until the late 370s. But it is no longer helpful or correct to label these as 'Arian' or 'Semi-Arian'. In 351 a synod at Sirmium produced twenty-six anathemas; more than half (fourteen) were clearly anti-Sabellian, five 'anti-Nicene' and three opposed what have been termed extreme variations of Arianism. This in itself demonstrates that what concerned many of those in the 'ascendant' at this time was not the particular language of Nicaea in itself, but how that language might be employed to support a modalist understanding of the Trinity in that its advocates seemed to regard 'sameness' with less horror than they did utter separation. In 357, the Second Creed of Sirmium – called 'the Blasphemy' by Hilary (De Synodis 10) – shows these issues becoming clearer. Its authors claimed primarily scriptural authority for its language, made the claim that many are 'disturbed' by ousia language and declared that there should be 'no mention of ousia at all' as unscriptural. The Father is greater than the Son in honour, dignity, splendour, majesty and his very name. There are two prosopa of Father and Son and the Son is 'subordinated' to the Father. The Father [alone?] has no beginning and is invisible, immortal and impassible, while the Son has been begotten of the Father and is God from God. 'The Trinity must always be preserved' and 'complete and perfect is the number of the Trinity'. The issue is not so much homoousios or homoiousios but ousia. The underlying enemy is modalism. But if those associated with Basil of Ancyra – and primarily concerned with the potential modalism of the homoousian – were for a time allied loosely with the anti-ousia crowd, they now begin, for fear of what they see emerging among the latter, leaning back towards those gathered around Athanasius.

In 358, a gathering associated with Basil of Ancyra anathematised the phrase 'unlike in essence' depicting the Father-Son relationship. This grouping were clearly less troubled by the dangers of modalism than by the apparent separateness espoused by those now associated with Aetius and Eunomius for whom ousia language for the Father-Son relationship is not only unhelpful and misleading, but simply wrong. In 359, at Sirmium, under Valens, a fourth (or dated) Creed declared the Son to be 'like the Father in all things (homoios kata panta)' and it did so to make clear that ousia language for the Father-Son relationship had given 'offence' as it was not contained in scripture; for the scriptures do not refer to the ousia of Father or Son but do teach that the Son is 'like the Father in all things'. This formulation was confirmed at Seleucia in the same year and presented to the emperor at Nike and Constantinople in 359/360. The latter synod – allegedly under the influence of Valens, Aetius and Eunomius – adopted the phrase, but without the 'all things'. 'The world groaned', declared Jerome, 'to find itself Arian'! From now on, it seems, an alliance of the 'Athanasians' and the 'Basilians' – the former agreeing to live with trihypostatic language and the latter with the homoousian, each agreeably qualifying the other – led the way to Constantinople in 381.

In 361, Constantius died and was succeeded briefly by the pagan Julian. He was succeeded in 363 by the 'Nicaea'-leaning Jovian and he, in turn, by the 'religiously neutral' Valentinian I in 364 in the west and by the 'Homoian' Valens in the east. The target of the now homoousian/trihypostatic grouping was clearly Eunomius and this is evident from the significant number of Contra Eunomium writings. The Cappadocian Fathers – led by Basil of Caesarea – also now become major players on the anti-Eunomian side.

In 378, Valens was succeeded by Theodosius. The latter supported the language of Nicaea 325, and via Antioch in 379 and then Constantinople in 381, the terms and phrases 'begotten not made' and 'homoousios with the Father' were enshrined and the full divinity of the Holy Spirit established, though without the homoousian. Those previously associated with Aetius and Eunomius and their teachings – the so-called Neo-Arians – were marginalised and pushed to the geographical margins of the empire. We look now to the so-called 'Neo-Arians' beyond even the Homoian range.

Arian and Neo-Arian documents of the later period

Like those of Arius himself, the extant works of those claimed to be associated with his thinking in the later fourth century – Acacius of Caesarea, Eudoxius, Aetius or Eunomius – are few in number. The Syntagmation of Aetius, written towards the end of the 350s, defends the notion of a fundamental 'unlikeness' between Father and Son, while the extant writings of Eunomius – the First and Second Apology and the Confession of Faith – written between 359 and 383, are all that we have.

Those called the homoians

Those who found particular favour with emperor Valens and whom their opponents called homoians were really those – of generally moderate theological tendency – who believed that the use of any ousia language to describe the relationship between Father and Son, with its materialist, divisive and potentially modalist overtones, was always unhelpful; and that this was so whether it was the homoousios, the homoiousios (which no-one may have actually used), the 'from the ousia of the Father', or the heteroousios which was employed. They did not want to identify the Son particularly with the rest of creaturely existence, but did want to see in the Son an image or icon of the Father, properly if not essentially named 'God' but little more. They were generally not much interested in philosophical speculation but were most inclined to read the scriptures simply as had Arius himself. Apart from Acacius and Eudoxius, others identified with this tendency – for that it is all that it can be called – included Valens, Ursacius, Palladius of Ratiara and Auxentius of Milan. This tendency is best expressed in the Second Creed of Sirmium and that of Nike-Constantinople. In the west, the Rule of Faith of Ulfilas, the great missionary to the Goths, and the Creed supplied by Auxentius, were very influential among advocates of this leaning. They have some affinity with the thought of Eusebius of Caesarea. They disavowed the label of 'Arian' and claimed, as Arius had, to be upholders of the traditional faith of the Church. They held generally that the Son was begotten by the Father's will, that the praying of the Son to the Father demonstrated very clearly their relationship of subordination, and that the Father is simply Incomparable. They were, above all, in their own view, strict monotheists. Like Arius, they were concerned more to defend the status of the Father than to demote the Son's. For Acacius, the Son was the exact image of the Father in all respects save one; he is not unbegotten. And being the image he is 'like' the Father. But the Son is not God as the Father is God. Palladius spoke of a Trinity comprising the one high-God, one demi-God and a superior angel (the Holy Spirit), and of there being an ontological distinction between them. The Son was not created out of nothing but from the Father's will. There is a drastic subordinationism here. The Father is the God of the Son and the Son worships the Father. The Son is properly High Priest of the Father. Father and Son are alike in energy, power and activity but not in substance.

Those named as Neo-Arians

It can be said quite safely that it is no longer appropriate to name the group of churchmen and theologians associated with Aetius and Eunomius as 'Neo-Arian'. Neither is it helpful to label them 'Anomoian' or 'Heteroousian'. While both of these labels may say something apt of the tendency, neither says it all. And, indeed, many explicitly repudiated both 'anomoian' and any ousia label as defining the relationship between the Father and the Son. It is widely said that with both thinkers, 'non-Nicene' theology became a form of 'technology'.

Aetius

Aetius was the pupil of Paulinus of Tyre and came to Alexandria in 348 where he taught a young Eunomius. He associated with those opposed to Marcellus and Athanasius. He was famous for his use of syllogisms. With Aetius the central problem in the matter of the Father–Son relationship was whether a created ingenerate was logically possible, given that 'being caused' belonged to the very essence of the Son and that God's being named as 'Father' did not imply any participation by the Son

Figure 45.3 Sites and dates of councils and other major centres during the Arian controversy of the eastern empire in his essence. The essential contrast was between the Ingenerate One (God) and the created/generated Son. Ingeneracy was, as for Eunomius, the very essence of God; that is, it is God. Therefore the Son, not being Ingenerate, cannot be God, and not being God, cannot be Ingenerate. Therefore the Son can be neither homoousios nor homoiousios to the Father. What matters above all else is 'knowing God'. Different names, e.g. Father and Son – indicate different natures. Names express realities and are not mere conventional symbols. The word 'Ingenerate' is not just one name among others for the Father, but his very essence. Neither is the word a mere privative, for then the Father would be non-existent, which would be absurd, or there would have to be a prior status – generatedness – which the Father would then lack. Aetius rarely mentions the Bible and the Syntagmation itself has only the one recognisable scriptural reference, that to John 17.3 at Proposition 37. The true God cannot beget and so cannot have a true Son. And God can only be known intellectually and cannot communicate himself. He is known only by being the Ingenerate One. Aetius primarily employs logic and employs neither anomoios nor – unlike Eunomius – heteroousios. All thirty-seven propositions in the Syntagmation concern the relationship of the Father and the Son. His is a radical monotheism. The Father alone is truly God.

Eunomius

Eunomius did not slavishly ape his teacher. He was not a strict believer in the Son being 'unlike' the Father – unlike Aetius who seems to imply it – but thought the Son like the Father 'according to the scriptures' but not in ousia. In his Confession, penned for the synod held in Constantinople in 360, he declares that the Son 'resembles his begetter with a most exact likeness in accordance with the meaning which is proper to himself' (3.27–28). He was apparently comfortable with the term heteroousios according to Kopecek who sees this implied in the First Apology 20 (1979: 330). As with Aetius, the true name and thus the true nature of the true divinity is the Ungenerated (Second Apology 382). God is therefore the Incomparable. This Ingenerate One cannot be compared with the Generate One and therefore the latter cannot be described even as homoiousios to the former (First Apology 9). The name Ingenerate, as with Aetius, is no mere privative. The Son is related only to the Father by the activity that produced him and is similar only to this. His likeness, therefore, is to the Father's activity and will, but not to his essence (First Apology 24). Father and Son are then 'alike'; but God and the Son can only be 'unlike'. But this activity of God is temporary and when it ceases so will its product. Every act of begetting has both a beginning and an end (Second Apology 224). God exists both apart and prior to the Begotten One and therefore the latter was not before his begetting (Second Apology 224). For Eunomius, God is the cause of all things and a cause must pre-exist what it causes. And, indeed, God cannot actually beget – for the agennetos cannot beget gennetos – but only create. The essence of the Son is begotten(ness) and this is both his ousia and hypostasis. Thus he cannot be either homoousios or homoiousios with the Father. Yet he was not, like other things brought into being, brought into existence 'out of nothing' (First Apology 15). The Son is alone 'direct' from the Father's hand, the 'perfect minister' of the whole creative purpose of the Father (First Apology 18), and 'like' the Father as to will but not as to essence (First Apology 18) and therefore not a real Son. The Fatherhood of God is an energeia and therefore separate from the Father's essence and temporary. There is therefore a fundamental distinction between God's ousia and his energeia. Thus, for Eunomius, the purpose is to protect the status of the true God, not to undermine the Son or reduce him to mere or ordinary creaturely status. Different names mean different realities. For Eunomius, not God but only the Son/Word became man. An interesting feature of Eunomian thought is that God can know no more than we can of his own essence. Thus God – and neither Athanasius nor Arius would say this – is knowable. Reason can tell us what we need to know. Yet Eunomius is deeply committed to scripture. Much of his work – unlike for Aetius – is exegetical.

Figure 45.4 Sites and dates of councils and other major centres during the Arian controversy of the western empire

Conclusions

An 'Arian' is either someone who – in apparent response to the modalist tendencies of some in the fourth century like Marcellus, Eustathius or Athanasius with their opposition to multi-hypostatic language, or to those synodal creeds the language of which left them open to a modalist interpretation like Nicaea 325 with its homoousios, or its 'from the ousia of the Father' – emphasised the primacy and fullness of the divinity of the Father, or a number of hypostaseis, or a 'beginning' for the Son and so on; or it is someone like Aetius or Eunomius who wished to emphasise the utter 'otherness' of the Father from the Son, or no-one at all! Is 'Arianism' merely a theological tendency? Is it merely a label with which to tar an opponent? Is it in fact even legitimate to talk of 'Arianism' at all? Is it time to consign it to the dustbin of history?

Bibliography

Ayres, L. (2004) Nicaea and its Legacy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Barnes, M. R. (1998) 'The fourth century as Trinitarian canon', in Ayres, L. and Jones, G. (eds) Christian Origins: Theology, Rhetoric and Community. London and New York: Routledge, 47–67.

Barnes, M. R. and Williams, D. (eds) (1993) Arianism after Arius: Essays on the Development of the Fourth Century Trinitarian Conflicts. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Behr, J. (2004) The Nicene Faith. Part One: True God of True God. Crestwood, NY: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Gregg, R. (1985) Arianism: Historical and Theological Reassessments. Patristic Monograph Series No. 11. Philadelphia, PA: Philadelphia Patristic Foundation.

Gregg, R. and Groh, D. (1981) Early Arianism: A View of Salvation. London: SCM.

Gwynn, D. M (2007) The Eusebeians: The Polemic of Athanasius of Alexandria and the Construction of the 'Arian Controversy'. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hanson, R. (1988) The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Kannengiesser, C. (1983) 'Current theology: Arius and the Arians', Theological Studies 44: 456–75.

Kopecek, T. A (1979) A History of Neo-Arianism. 2 vols. Philadelphia, PA: The Philadelphia Patristic Foundation.

Lyman, J. R. (2008) 'Arius and Arians', in Harvey, S. A. and Hunter, D. G. (eds) The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Opitz, H. (1934–5) Urkunden zur Geschichte des arianischen Streites 318–328 (Athanasius' Werke, Band III,i). Berlin: De Gruyter.

Rankin, D. (2000) 'Arianism', in Esler, P. F. (ed.) The Early Christian World, vol. 2. London and New York: Routledge, 975–1001.

Robertson, J. M. (2007) Christ as Mediator: A Study of the Theologies of Eusebius of Caesarea, Marcellus of Ancyra and Athanasius of Alexandria. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Stead, C. (1997) 'Was Arius a Neoplatonist?', Studia Patristica 32: 39–52.

Vaggione, R. (2001) Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Wiles, M. (2000) Archetypal Heresy: Arianism through the Centuries. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Williams, R. (1983) 'The logic of Arianism', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 34: 56–81.

Williams, R. (1987) Arius: Heresy and Tradition. London: Darton, Longman and Todd.

Williams, R. (2001) Arius: Heresy and Tradition. Rev. ed. Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans Publishing.

46

MANICHAEISM

Jason David BeDuhn

Introduction

Although in many respects Manichaeism can and should be considered a distinct world religion, it belongs to the larger Christian tradition, broadly construed, through the special place it accords Jesus Christ in its ideology and devotional practices. Arising from the confluence of the early Christian mission with indigenous religious elements of third-century CE Mesopotamia, the Manichaean religion can be understood as a distinctively 'oriental' or 'Asiatic' expression of the Christian tradition, and therefore as an alternative form of the faith in comparison with the western, Hellenized version which has been historically regarded as the Christian mainstream. From these parallel processes of regional formation emerged a battle over the legacy of Jesus as both of these Christianities sent missions into the territory of the other, each claiming to be the true disciples of Jesus. In its ideological, liturgical, and institutional independence from other forms of Christianity, as well as in its remarkable geographic and historical extent, Manichaeism can be considered the great divergent offspring of the Christian tradition.

Mani (216–277 CE), the Aramaic-speaking founder of Manichaeism, consistently identified himself as 'the apostle of Jesus Christ' in his own writings. This is just a handy example of a much larger set of data that makes it unquestionable that one of the key catalysts in the formation of Manichaeism was the initial Christian missionary enterprise in Mesopotamia. Mani's father joined a sectarian community connected to the Elchasaite tradition, and Mani was raised in that environment in the 220s and 230s CE. He would come to identify himself in some contrast to this prior local Christian hybrid, as he made contact with other Christian communities that had formed differently in neighboring environments. These included Marcionites, to be sure, as well as adherents of Bardaisan. The presence and influence of 'gnostic' forms of Christianity in Mani's world is more difficult to establish, and the few points of contact between them and Mani's own system are more likely to go back to regional and parabiblical mythologies serving as antecedents to these two distinct Christian movements.

Mani's novel understanding of the Christian traditions he had been exposed to, informed by personal visionary experiences, along with his evident leadership and organizational skills, ultimately produced a solidification and institutionalization of a form of Christianity fitted to its cultural environment. Crucially, Mani endeavored to extend the range of the environment within which his form of faith would be accepted. He journeyed out of Mesopotamia onto the Iranian plateau, coming into contact with Zoroastrians, as well as by sea to India, where he encountered Hindus, Buddhists, and Jains. As a consequence of this extension of Mani's missionary field, these other religions provided the cultural milieu within which Mani construed the Christian tradition, just as other Christian leaders of the time worked within a milieu informed by Jewish and Greco-Roman religious cultures. Mani's particular synthesis stabilized and became a new 'norm,' a new 'orthodoxy' capable of resisting and rivaling the claims coming from the west, and in turn colonized the west as a rival claimant to Christian identity.

Mani, therefore, did not reject some existing 'orthodox' Christianity and impetuously veer off into innovation. By the time something like a proto-Nicene Christian orthodoxy came into Mani's field of vision, his own church was already far along in its institutional development. That first encounter likely resulted from the forced relocation of inhabitants of Antioch to Mesopotamia following successive sacks of the city by the Persian emperor Shapur I in 256 and 260 CE. As these displaced Christians began to organize themselves in their new homes, they ran up against the locally dominant form of Christianity headed by Mani, and the two groups began to circle and assess each other in terms of rival orthodoxies. Hence, two forms of Christian faith spread along-side one another in competing missionary enterprises that eventually took both groups across the Asian continent to the Pacific shore of China. Along the way, both the 'Nestorian' Church of the east and the Manichaean church enjoyed periods of regional political support and sponsorship, the Manichaeans most especially from the successive Uygur empires in Central Asia from the mid eighth to the eleventh centuries. Reaching China, the Manichaeans survived a major persecution in the mid ninth century to establish a thriving Sinicized community in southern China. Driven out of Europe, North Africa, and West Asia by state persecution encouraged by Christian, Zoroastrian, and Islamic authorities, the Manichaeans persisted in China until the seventeenth century, when the last traces of organized Manichaeism fade away.

Jesus in Manichaeism

Manichaeism belongs to the larger Christian tradition not only in its historical origins, but also in its continued attention to Jesus as a central figure of its ideology and devotional culture. The complexity of Jesus' place in Manichaean tradition should not obscure the overall unity of the various ways he appears there, rooted in their common derivation from the Jesus narrative known to mainstream Christians and Manichaeans alike, combining both suffering and exaltation, victimization and triumph (Gardner 1991: 85).[1] In the historical development of Manichaeism and its regional variation, we see the figure of Jesus expanding and contracting in its roles, depending on the setting and the manner of synthesis with local religious traditions. In the increasingly Christianized west, the Manichaean Jesus absorbed attributes and functions that in other regions were parceled out among a dozen or so divine figures (Sundermann 1992: 85). Nonetheless, devotion to Jesus in one form or another is a constant. Manichaeans consistently prayed to Jesus as an active savior, and so came to associate him with the sun and moon towards which they faced in their daily prayers.[2] Evidence for reverential devotion to Jesus on the part of the Manichaean faithful comes not only from hymns and the adopted religious names of adherents, but also from newly identified Manichaean devotional paintings of Jesus from Central Asia and from China, the latter showing his continued prominent place in the latest, most far-flung Manichaean community a millennium after the religion's foundation (Gulácsi 2009; Figure 46.1).

Mani saw the figure and story of Jesus reflected at every stage of salvation history. Jesus' suffering and crucifixion—a narrative well-known and often repeated in Manichaean texts (Morano 1998)—provided the imagery for a mythological drama of cosmic proportions, even as his instructions offered the formula by which Manichaeans believed world suffering could be resolved. In the words of Iain Gardner, in Manichaeism 'historical features of Christ have become universalized out of specific time and space, and made applicable to the totality of the divinity, whether needing to be redeemed or redeeming' (Gardner 1983: 32–33; cf. Böhlig 1983). This dual attention to Jesus as both paradigmatic victim and foremost liberator provides the foundation of a Manichaean Christology that finds its elaboration in the idea of Jesus as salvator salvandus, the savior who is himself saved (Franzmann 2003: 48).

Figure 46.1   Manichaean silk painting of Jesus, twelfth- to thirteenth-century southern China. Seiun-ji, Kofu, Japan. After Gulácsi 2009

At several points, these conceptions of Jesus as both savior and saved make contact with beliefs about him found in mainstream Christianity at either the official or popular level. Yet collectively they form a unique and strikingly alternative understanding of the nature and purpose of Jesus in the universe and in the life of the individual Manichaean believer. Manichaeism shares with mainstream Christianity an interest in Jesus' intimate identification with those who need to be saved, 'not unable to sympathize with our weakness, but tested in every way like us, apart from sin' (Hebrews 4:15). But from that common concern arise two radically different Christologies: on the one hand, the ortho-dox 'Two-Nature' Christology by which the transcendent Son of God 'assumes' the human Jesus; on the other, the Manichaean belief that no difference in kind exists between the divine nature and the soul in need of salvation. The latter, resident in all living things, belongs in its essence to the heavenly realm and shares a common nature with the forces sent from heaven to rescue it. Manichaeism in this way erases the gulf separating God and creatures, savior and saved, insisted upon by mainstream Christian dogma. In his one single nature, Jesus both encapsulates the plight of the imprisoned soul in this world and represents the totality of divine power active in redeeming it.

As salvandus, the saved, Jesus shares a common nature with all living things, the essence of life. This divine life-force has entered into a condition of mixture with contrary negative forces in the creation of the cosmos, as part of the conflict of Good and Evil within which Manichaeism inter-prets all experience. The mixture of these two antithetical properties yields the material world as we experience it, in which we suffer in our true divine identities as we are afflicted by contact with and dominated by Evil. Manichaeans at times characterize this state as one of 'crucifixion,' and refer to the soul entrapped everywhere on earth as the 'light cross' (Böhlig 1978; Klimkeit 1979; Gardner 1991: 80–82). 'The cross of light that gives life to the universe, I have known it and believed in it; for it is my dear soul, which nourishes every man, at which the blind are offended because they know it not' (Psalm-Book 86.27–29). Similarly, the Coptic Manichaean Sunday Psalms state: 'He was suspended on the cross in the likeness of the soul that is in the universe,' and 'When Christ rose from the dead, he revealed the type of the soul that is in the whole world' (Wurst 1996). From the widespread use of crucifixion imagery in the religion's ideology, Enrico Morano has concluded that:

> It is evident that the suffering and death of Jesus were to the Manichaeans important images of the suffering of the Living Soul bound to the hyle, and his resurrection refers to the liberation of the soul and its return to the Realm of Light.
>
> (Morano 2000: 398)

Manichaeans regard the suffering and death of Jesus, therefore, as prototypical of the suffering of all living beings. Jesus is born, suffers, and dies in plants daily (Evodius, De fide 34); Jesus' silence before Pilate is said to be illustrative of the silence of plants as they are harvested, despite their suffering (Homilies 91.28–32). In the Cologne Mani Codex, Mani's prophetic predecessor Elchasai, 'having taken soil from that earth which spoke to him, wept; he kissed (it) and placed (it) upon his breast and began to say: "This is the flesh and blood of my lord"' (CMC 97.3–10). Far removed from an envi-ronment with a significant Christian cultural presence, the medieval Chinese Manichaean Hymnscroll reflects the same view when it identifies that the living elements constituting the divine soul trapped in the world are 'the flesh and blood of Yishu' (Hymnscroll 252–254). Consequently, the Manichaean Faustus explains to his Catholic opponents that 'you attach the same sacredness to the bread and wine that we do to everything' (Faust. 20.2). Faustus famously coined the expression Iesus patibilis, 'the vulnerable Jesus,'[3] to capture this aspect of Christ's identity.[4]

The Manichaeans gave a new understanding to human experience by assuming its close correla-tion to Christ's. The African Manichaean Fortunatus highlighted the instruction given by Paul in Philippians 2:5: 'Think with respect to yourselves that which also (you think) with respect to Christ Jesus,'[5] followed by an outline of Christ's descent into human form, his suffering and death, and his resurrection and ascent to glory. Fortunatus draws the inevitable conclusion:

> We have this same thought about ourselves, then, as about Christ who, though he was established in the form of God, became subject even to death in order to show his likeness to our souls. And just as he showed the likeness of death in himself and that, having been raised up from among them, he is in the Father and the Father is in him, so we think it will also be the same way with our souls. For we shall be able to be set free from this death through him.
>
> (Augustine, c. Fort. 7)

It followed for the Manichaeans that Jesus revealed an essential identification between the divine and the human when he, the Son of God, repeatedly referred to those he was calling as, likewise, sons and daughters of God.

As salvator, the savior, Jesus is the 'the releaser and redeemer [of] all souls' (Kephalaion 29, 82.20–21), and the personification of an awakening infused directly into the benighted fragments of divine light within us (Alexander of Lycopolis, 4; Augustine, c. Faust. 20.2). While other emanations of God undertook the initial defense of the Realm of Light, and the subsequent construction of the cosmos as the sphere in which the forces of Evil could be neutralized, Jesus oversees the final, salvational phase of cosmic history, assessing the state of mixture with Evil, and implanting in each fragment of divine light a potential responsiveness to its future summons to liberation (Kephalaion 19, 61.17–28). He served as the primordial revealer to the first human couple, Adam and Eve,[6] and continues as the inspiring force behind all subsequent messengers of God who have brought truth into the world throughout time (Franzmann 2003: 40ff.). As 'the introducer and guide and reliance, the original form and appearance of all the Buddhas, the king in the mind of all the wise, the real and true comprehension of all precious and solemn ones' (Hymnscroll, 16–19), as 'the father of all the apostles' (Kephalaion 28, 80.18–19; 73, 179.10–11), Jesus plays an active role throughout salvation history. Jesus stands apart from all such human teachers in Manichaean belief, even while serving himself as the historical prophet to 'the west' in the first century CE.

As the historical Jesus, he has the unique distinction among the historical messengers of coming as an entirely spiritual being, without the typical human body made up of a mixture of good and evil. Whereas in orthodox Christology Jesus' possession of a human physical existence served a vital function in the redemptive purpose of his atoning death, Manichaeans rejected the atonement theory of Jesus' death. The divine nature in human beings, along with all living things, is not alienated from God by sin, but victimized by sinful impulses resulting from entanglement of the two natures of Good and Evil. For that reason, Manichaean sources scoff at talk of 'two natures' in Jesus,[7] since they did not share the distinction of divine from human, creator from creature, and considered Good and Evil to constitute the only 'two natures.' Jesus took on the appearance (schēma) of a mortal body, mixing these two natures only in order to interact with human beings and effectively communicate his message and example to them. Yet, by this characterization, the Manichaeans apparently did not mean to deny that Jesus could suffer since, as we have seen, the divine nature itself is liable to suffering. In the words of Majella Franzmann, 'Otherness, in relation to ordinary humanity, is not a means by which Jesus avoids suffering' (Franzmann 2003: 75).

Despite this, some Manichaean texts speak as if Jesus did not possess the sort of body that could be grasped or injured, so no actual crucifixion took place. Other sources allude to the substitution of another on the cross, the worldly messiah Jesus son of Mary or even Satan himself (Evodius, De fide 964.7–10; Psalm-Book 123.5). Gardner has shown the complex pedigree of such alternative ideas of what really happened at the crucifixion in the diverse range of Christianities predating Manichaeism (Gardner 1988). Because Manichaeans viewed Jesus' suffering as primarily communicative and didactic, there was little pressure to resolve these inconsistencies, as it was irrelevant to this function whether the historical Jesus suffered in his own person as a divine being, or merely conveyed the suffering of those parts of the divine trapped in mixture with Evil. The true suffering of the 'Son of God' is the universal suffering of all souls, revealed to the world through 'the mystic nailing to the cross, emblematic of the wounds of the soul in its passion' (Augustine, c. Faust. 32.7).

Jesus also served as a moral preceptor in the Manichaean tradition. The mandatum Christi, mandate of Christ, provided the formula for living a holy life guided by love, compassion, and service that remains always valid, even if the community he founded strays from them (Augustine, c. Faust. 32.7; Franzmann 2003: 61–62). The African Manichaean leader Faustus staked his claim to be an upholder of 'true Christianity' on his literal adherence to the values of the Sermon on the Mount (Augustine, c. Faust. 5.1–3), which the Manichaeans developed into a detailed code of conduct for their sacerdotal class, the Elect. In doing so, he was issuing a challenge to others who laid claim to being the 'church' of Christ. According to Manichaean teaching, that separate church had already run its course by the time Mani received his calling as Jesus' successor in 240 CE. Now the new church of Mani would 'complete the work,' drawing to it the heritage of all former messengers and their communities. Mani was the 'great interpreter' who gave definitive understanding to the teachings of Jesus, and henceforth Christ's revealing activity would operate through the Manichaean community, until the world's end.

Mani the 'apostle of Jesus Christ'

Efforts to recover the historical Mani must contend with the natural processes of idealization which take hold of every founder of a religious community. Through the ironic loss of most of his own writings, which he hoped would safeguard his teachings from alteration, the Mani available to modern history is mostly the Mani imagined by the subsequent Manichaean church, which undoubtedly elevated him to a status well beyond his own self-understanding. Mani saw himself as 'the apostle of Jesus Christ,' an epithet employed in his letters and carved on the crystal seal, recently argued to be the very one with which he would have authenticated those letters (Gulácsi 2010; Figure 46.2):

He desired to conduct his life 'according to the image of our lord Jesus' (CMC 107.12–14), and in an unintended way completed that imitation in his martyrdom. Yet Mani expanded his apostleship in two key ways: first, by understanding himself as the unique interpreter and reformer of a Christian tradition already mired in corruption two centuries after its founding, and second, by placing the Christian tradition within a universal history of divine revelation, for whose interpretation and reform he likewise had responsibility.

According to a well-known and widely distributed prophecy, Jesus had promised to enrich and safeguard the truth he had begun to impart to his followers by sending them the Paraclete. Mani believed that he had been the recipient of the fulfillment of this prophecy:

> The living Paraclete came down to me. He spoke with me. He unveiled to me the hidden mystery, the one that is hidden from the worlds and the generations, the mystery of the depths and the heights. He unveiled to me the mystery of the light and the darkness; the mystery of the calamity of conflict, and the war, and the great . . . battle that the darkness spread about. Afterwards, he unveiled to me also how . . . through their mingling this universe was set up . . . He opened my eyes also to the way that the ships were constructed, to enable the gods of light to be in them, to purify the light from creation. Conversely the dregs and the effluent . . . to the abyss . . . Also the mystery of the apostles who were sent to the world, to enable them to choose the churches. The mystery of the Elect, with their commandments; the mystery of the catechumens their helpers, with their commandments; the mystery of the sinners with their deeds, and the punishing that lies hidden for them.

> This is how everything that has happened and that will happen was unveiled to me by > the Paraclete . . . everything the eye shall see, and the ear hear, and the thought think . . .
> I have understood by him everything. I have seen the totality through him.
>
> (Kephalaion 1, 14.32–15.23)

Called in this way to be 'the apostle of Jesus Christ,' Mani broke with the Elchasaite community of his youth, and sought to guide an initially small circle of followers in the true religion.

Yet Mani broadened his concept of prophetic succession in a manner unknown in other forms of Christianity, and comparable instead to later Islamic views. He proposed that all regions of the earth had received revelation from God through prophetic spokesmen, including Zarathustra in Iran and the Buddha in India. Mani apparently saw himself as the last of these figures, and the one destined to explain previous revelation and purge it of error accumulated in the course of its transmission. He came to be seen by his followers as the fulfillment of promises made by Jesus, Zoroaster, and the Buddha of a future reformer and perfecter of their respective teachings. Despite his own words of being guided himself by the Paraclete, he was identified with the Paraclete after his death (Psalm-Book 3.21; 9.3; 17.28; 20.21; 22.28; 24.14, 17; etc.), as well as with the future Buddha Maitreya looked for in Buddhism (Klimkeit 1993: 162–163), and probably also the Zoroastrian Soshyans, although an explicit statement to that effect is lacking in the known sources. There is room in Manichaeism for literature about prior religious heroes, and for religious art portraying these great forebears, both reflecting a degree of reverence. Yet since those messengers before Mani did not write down their teachings, but instead trusted to oral transmission, the forces of Evil found an opportunity to corrupt and distort their message. Thus it fell to Mani to provide the final and definitive rendition of truth, safeguarded by his own writings and works of art.

Flat side with positive image

Figure 46.2　Crystal seal stone of Mani, with inscription m'ni šlyḥ' dyyšw' mšyḥ' ('Mani apostle of Jesus Messiah'), mid third-century Mesopotamia. INT. 1384 BIS. Bibliothèque nationale de France, Paris, France. After Gulácsi 2010

Intrinsic to Mani's place as the successor of previous prophets is the claim that he is the guardian of their teachings and their legitimate interpreter. Mani himself enunciated the limitations and short-comings of prior religious traditions, and offered Manichaeism as a correction and perfection of them:

> First, the religions of the ancients were (spread) in one land and one language. But my religion is such that it will be manifest in all lands and in all languages and will be taught in distant lands. Second, the older religions were (in order) as long as there were holy leaders in them . . . but when the leaders were raised up, their religions became confused, and they became slack in (observing the) precepts and in works . . . But my religion, by virtue of its living scriptures, (its) teachers, bishops, elect and auditors, and by its wisdom and deeds will endure to the end. Third, those souls of the ancients who did not complete (good) works in their own religion will come to my religion, and for them it will truly become the door of salvation. Fourth, this revelation of the two principles and my living scriptures, my wisdom and my knowledge, are more encompassing and better than those of the former religions. Fifth, as all scriptures, (all) wisdom and (all) parables of the former religions [have been added] to my religion.
>
> (Klimkeit 1993: 216–217)

The errors that crept into the teachings of the Buddha, Zarathustra, and Jesus as they were transmitted from one generation to the next were the result of the fact that these prophets spoke metaphorically and figuratively, and that they trusted their words to the oral medium. These circumstances left it to Mani to reform world religion by rendering its truths in precise, plain, literal language, and to commit this language to the written page. Mani's instruction renders the teachings of the past fully comprehensible for the first time. In praise of Mani, it is said:

> The beloved son, Jesus Christ, sets a garland on thy head in great joy, because his building that was destroyed thou didst build it, his way which was hidden thou didst illumine it, his scriptures which were confused thou didst set them in order again, his wisdom which was hidden thou didst interpret it.
>
> *(*Psalm-Book 12.26–33)

But, of course, Mani's effort at a grand systematization of prior revelation had the ambition to follow Paul's dictum to take possession of all that was good in human wisdom:

> The writings, wisdoms, apocalypses, parables and psalms of the earlier churches are from all parts reunited in my church to the wisdom which I have revealed to you. As a river is joined to another river to form a powerful current, just so are the ancient books joined in my writings; and they form one great wisdom, such as has not existed in preceding generations.
>
> *(Kephalaion 151, 372.11–19)*

Needless to say, by uniting this great body of wisdom in his own system, he saw to it that its meaning was 'altered to the flavor' of the system as a whole (Sundermann 1985: 58–68).

As the 'great interpreter' who made all things plain and understandable, Mani used every means at his disposal to reach out and to inform. The Manichaean tradition is a religion of the book because Mani himself was a writer of books, something the Buddha and Jesus never did. 'For all the [apostles], my brothers, who have come before me, [have not written] their wisdom in books, as I have written it; [neither have] they painted their wisdom in the Hikon, as [I have painted] it' (Kephalaion 151, 371.25–30). As this passage indicates, Mani's religious revolution from the oral to the written medium was not his only didactic innovation; he also sought to convey his teachings in a visual medium, as Ephrem Syrus quotes him saying:

> I have written them in books and illustrated them with colors. Let the one who hears about them verbally also see them in visual form, and the one who is unable to learn them from [words] learn them from picture(s).
>
> (Ephrem Syrus, Hypatius 127, quoted in Reeves 1997: 262–263)

Mani did not just paint individual pictures; he compiled a picture book that came to be treated as part of Mani's canon of scriptures, and its existence fostered and legitimated the Manichaean artistic tradition (Gulácsi 2015). At the same time, some Manichaean images (see Figure 46.3) illustrate the extent to which Manichaeism was also a 'religion of the book.'

Figure 46.3   Manichaean codex folio illuminated with Elect copying books, shown in picture-viewing direction, tenth-century Kocho. MIK III 6368 recto. Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, Museum für Asiatische Kunst/Iris Papadopoulos

The Manichaean community incorporated Mani's martyrdom into its ideology and commemorated it in its practices. We find religious literature devoted to the subject, both poetic and prose, across the Manichaean tradition from North Africa to China. The details of Mani's last days are meticulously recorded: his journey to the Persian court, his audience with the shah Bahram, his imprisonment and suffering, the final visits of his disciples, the moment of his death, and its immediate aftermath. In its description of these events, the Manichaean tradition itself draws parallels to the death of Jesus. It likens the Zoroastrian priests to the Jewish leaders, Bahram to Pilate or Herod, Mani's death to Jesus' crucifixion, and Mani's apotheosis to Jesus' ascent (Psalm-Book, 43.5–44.1). The whole scenario comes across as a momentous clash of Good and Evil, and highlights the tragedy of Evil's great earthly power (Psalm-Book, 23.20–29). Yet Mani's martyrdom is ultimately a triumph and a liberation, just as Jesus' resurrection is a victory over death. Despite the literary convergence of Mani and Jesus, and the many analogies made to this end, Mani did not die by execution. Primary Manichaean sources agree that Mani died in prison, before Bahram could fully vent his hate upon him. In fact, Bahram is described as enraged that Mani has, as it were, slipped through his clutches, and he is suspicious of some sort of drug-induced deception being worked upon him (Psalm-Book, 17.4–17). Bahram is left only with Mani's body on which to work his rage (Psalm-Book, 23.32–24.3):

> You left them your body and ascended [to your] kingdom. The lawless ones were con> founded, they brought their wrath upon your body. They shed your blood in the midst of > the street of their city. They struck off your head and set it on high upon their gate.
>
> *(*Psalm-Book 44.13–20)

Hence, Mani achieves a little victory in the long, painful struggle with Evil. Nearly crushed by his iron chains, the sixty-year-old apostle of light prays to God for a much earned release from his battles, and departs his body precisely at sunset after twenty-six days of imprisonment (Psalm-Book 17.21–28).

Mani's continued proximity to his beloved flock of followers is conveyed in the idea that he abides in the moon, and from there looks down upon the works and sufferings of his church. According to this tradition, 'the Parinirvana of the Apostle' was 'when he was raised up into the chariot of the moon and found peace with the Father, the God Ohrmizd' (Klimkeit 1993: 87):

> And in great joy he flew up, together with the bright gods that accompanied him on the > right and the left . . . to the chariot of the Moon, the meeting-place of the gods. And he > stayed there with God Ohrmizd, the Father.
>
> (Klimkeit 1993: 215)

Mani's presence in the moon was a powerful symbol of his lasting care and watchful gaze. The idea provided comfort to the Manichaean community in its travails, offered a sense of Mani's accessibility, and held out hope of his future return by what must have appeared to be a rather short and easy descent:

> The noble Lord fulfilled the promise which he gave us (when he said): 'For your sake
> I will wait above in the water chariot; I will send you help at all times.' Lo, already 110 years > have now passed, since you, (oh) God, ascended to the assembly of Peace. Now the time > has come that you should raise up the righteous and should establish your throne on high.
>
> (Klimkeit 1993: 85–86)

Mani's location in the moon meant that every Manichaean would face him in nighttime prayers, which were directed to the moon. In this way, Mani was the object of a daily practice of veneration and prayer.

The connections between the believer and the prophet received heightened emphasis on certain high holy days of the Manichaean liturgical year, in particular at the annual Bema festival, when the community commemorated Mani's release from the world. Mani's continued proximity in the moon was drawn even closer at this ceremony by the invocation of his presence into the community, and onto the judgment seat set up for him from which the ritual took its name. The community interacted with the seat as if he were truly present: he was addressed directly, and his all-seeing gaze was acknowledged in the community's confession of sin:

> The great exalted king is seated upon his Bema, he sees the deeds of each one of us . . . Our Lord the Paraclete has come, he has sat down upon his Bema; let us all pray, my brethren, that he may forgive us our sins.
>
> *(*Psalm-Book 21.27–32; 22.28–30)

Iranian hymns show the same conception: 'You are come, lord Mani, on the throne he sits himself'; 'the noble apostle sits himself on the . . . throne' (Reck 2004: 144, 147). These hymns bear the unusual feature of being dated according to the number of years that had transpired since Mani's departure. The community was counting the years until their guide returned and brought an end to their earthly struggles in a glorious triumph. At that time, Mani's descent onto the Bema would simply be a prelude to his surrendering of authority to the true judge, Jesus.

The numerous accomplishments and roles of Mani pertinent to Manichaean belief and practice provided the impetus and content of a vast body of poetry and prose used in the worship of the Manichaean church. This literature recounts and celebrates Mani's teaching and guidance, both in person during his earthly career and less directly through his writings or supernatural influence after his ascent. In reciting his work as interpreter and reformer, author and illuminator, healer and ritual authority, as well as guardian and judge of his religious community, this literature makes a case for Mani as a savior figure who has fundamentally changed the world and made salvation possible (Psalm-Book 13.6–13):

> Lo, thy holy churches have spread out to the four corners of the world. Lo, thy vine-trees have filled every place. Lo, thy sons have become famous in all lands. Lo, thy Bema has been firmly established in every place [like a] river now that flows in the whole earth.
>
> *(*Psalm-Book 13.20–24)

Manichaean biblical interpretation

Mani did not know or recognize the Bible as we now think of it; he lived before the fixing of a Christian canon, and was exposed to a broader, fluid Christian movement with a variety of written and unwritten authoritative traditions. Moreover, he critiqued the transmission of the Christian kerygma in a manner reminiscent of, and probably influenced by, Marcion. Consequently, Christian biblical literature held an ambivalent status within Manichaeism. Mani himself quoted the words of Jesus from the Diatessaron and other gospel sources, as well as making use of the writings of Paul. Werner Sundermann identified quotations from the Diatessaron's Passion narrative in Iranian Manichaean sermons comparing Mani's suffering and death to Jesus' (Sundermann 1968). Zsuzsanna Gulácsi has demonstrated that painted scenes of the life of Jesus based on the Diatessaron were being copied and probably used in connection with the sermons like those identified by Sundermann in medieval Central Asia (Gulácsi 2008; Figure 46.4).

Yet these authorities came to be subordinated to Mani's own compositions as Manichaeism developed after him. Among Asian Manichaeans for the next thousand years, Jesus and Paul continue to be quoted in the form of isolated agrapha mostly dependent on Mani's own application and interpretation of this material. Only in the Roman empire did Manichaeans maintain and expand their founder's direct engagement with the emerging biblical canon, and come to terms with it as the battlefield on which to carry out their apologetic and polemical efforts to prove Manichaeism to be the true Christian faith.
Figure 46.4   Manichaean codex folio illuminated with 'Judas Paid by Caiaphas' and 'Jesus Washing Peter's Feet,' two vignettes from the life of Jesus based on the Diatessaron, tenth-century Kocho. Detail of MIK III 4967a recto, with background and frames digitally enhanced. Museum für Asiatische Kunst, Berlin, Germany. After Gulácsi 2008

Manichaean leaders within the Roman empire built on Mani's substantial foundation to produce a body of exegetical work that moves throughout the entire New Testament, and often shows remarkable facility and coherence.[8] Indeed, Manichaean biblical interpretation typically departs from orthodox readings precisely in those passages where ambiguity and multivalence have given rise to competing interpretations throughout Christian history. As we have seen, Mani articulated a programmatic reception of the world's sacred scriptures into a single 'great wisdom.' This position carried a key corollary: the individual scriptural traditions cannot be interpreted properly in isolation, but only when brought together and read through Mani's dualistic exegetical lens. Working from a self-consciously literate vantage point, Mani understood his role as God's messenger to entail a hermeneutical responsibility to clarify the meaning of prior scriptures. His followers stressed and perhaps expanded this character of Mani's mission, as Augustine of Hippo characterized their views:

> They say that the divine mysteries which the ancient writers set forth in figures in the scriptures were left to be resolved and revealed by this man who was going to come last. And they say that no teacher will come from God after him precisely for the reason that Manichaeus said nothing in figures and allegories. For he had made clear what the ancients had said in that way and plainly and openly revealed his own thoughts.
>
> (Augustine, c. Epist. fund. 23.25)

As the promised Paraclete, Mani had the function to fill the deficit indicated by Paul's admission of incomplete knowledge (1 Cor 13:9f.).[9]

Mani shows no direct engagement with the Jewish Tanakh in any of the surviving passages certain to come from his own compositions. Unlike 'gnostic' writers, his creation account is not based on a direct exegesis of Genesis. Instead, Mani knew various parabiblical Jewish texts and traditions, especially the Enoch literature (Reeves 1992). This material supplied many details of Mani's rich mythology and complex cosmology: a dualistic conflict between Good and Evil throughout world history, armies of angels, multiple heavenly firmaments with God remotely transcendent above subordinate god-like authorities, beings imprisoned in the firmaments and falling from them to earth, and so forth. From such literature, Mani accepted the Jewish patriarchs Adam, Seth, Enosh, Enoch, Noah, and Shem as messengers of God, with accounts taken from apocryphal developments of the spare biblical narratives, rather than directly from the latter.[10] Criticism of the Genesis creation account, and of the values reflected in the Tanakh generally, is a product of the Manichaean mission to the Roman empire, where it formed part of a polemic against a form of Christianity that had adopted the Tanakh as the Christian Old Testament.

Manichaeans followed Marcion in attributing the authorship of the Tanakh to a being different from and at odds with the God of Truth who sent Jesus.[11] Their critique rested upon a literal reading of the text, which yielded both logical and moral criticisms, as well as points of contradiction to positions taken by Jesus and other New Testament authorities. Manichaeans cited (1) New Testament passages critical of Old Testament principles, values, or doctrines (Augustine, c. Fort. 16; c. Faust. 8.1; 14.1; 32.1; c. Felix 2.10; Acts of Archelaus 44); (2) Old Testament passages incongruent with New Testament principles, values, or doctrines;[12] and (3) Old and New Testament passages juxtaposed in a way to illustrate antithetical positions (Augustine, c. Faust. 4.1). They also noted that, despite the avid avowal by orthodox Christians of the scriptural status of the Old Testament, these 'semi-Christians' hypocritically failed to actually keep its commandments (Augustine c. Faust. 6.1; cf. 22.2). Augustine of Hippo and other orthodox writers found it necessary to defend the Genesis creation account against a well-developed Manichaean critical analysis of it. In a missionary context, they could use this same analysis to raise problems in the narrative to which they proposed dualistic solutions. Contending that a good God would not create an evidently flawed world entirely on his own initiative, the Manichaeans argued that creation must be some sort of necessary response to an external stimulus that presented an even less satisfactory alternative. Such an external stimulus to creation explained why God, after an immeasurable eternity, suddenly created the world at a specific point in time (Augustine, Gen. c. man. 1.2.3, 1.4.7, 1.5.9; cf. Conf. 11.12.14).

New Testament texts fared much better in Manichaean estimation. Quotations from or allusions to gospel traditions and Paul's letters permeate the surviving fragments of Mani's own writings, and Paul's influence is evident as well in Mani's own epistolary style. Secondary scholastic literature such as the immense collection of kephalaia, preserved mostly in Coptic but also in important fragments of Iranian versions, attribute to Mani more discussions of biblical themes. New Testament passages are rarely cited verbatim, but form the subtext and provide language and imagery taken up into discussions of theology, creation, cosmology, and religious practice (Böhlig 2013: 65–71). The preserved fragments of the closing sections of Mani's Šābuhragān provide perhaps the most lengthy example of his reading and application of gospel material (MacKenzie 1979–80). This composition represents a conscious attempt by Mani to convey Jesus' eschatological teachings (including verbatim quotations of the Diatesseron passage corresponding to Matt 24:29–31; 25:31–46) through Iranian concepts and terminology.

While the Manichaeans recognized the authority of the words of Jesus, they did not extend the same status to the narrative frame within which they were embedded in gospel texts. This principle reflects the continuation within third-century Manichaeism of the attitude that had generally prevailed in Christianity as a whole in the second century. Early Christian writers cite the logia of Jesus as independent agrapha, without relying on the authority of gospel texts to lend them legitimacy (Petersen 2006). Mani did have access to written gospel material, such as the Diatessaron, but he and other Manichaeans questioned the authorship and reliability of this written gospel tradition. Anticipating the work of modern biblical scholars, they pointed to the period of orality in which the sayings of Jesus could have been altered in the course of transmission (Kephalaia Prologue 7.18–26; Augustine, c. Faust. 33.3), and questioned the motives and intentions of those who committed the traditions to writing (Augustine, c. Faust. 32.2). These same concerns applied to the scriptural texts of all prior religious traditions, and served to explain the differences among religious communities that Manichaeans believed went back to founders inspired by the same God with the same essential teachings (Kephalaia Prologue 8.8–10).

Consequently, Manichaean exegesis and application of gospel material centered almost exclusively on the words of Jesus. These provided what Faustus calls the mandatum Christi, a set of primarily moral guidelines, interpreted according to Mani's ascetical understanding.[13] For Faustus, the ethical precepts of the Sermon on the Mount, encapsulated in the beatitudes, constitute the 'gospel' in its essence and are the hallmark of the true Christian (Augustine, c. Faust. 5.1). This argument equated Christian identity with an ascetical ethic seen widely in second-century Christian literature, which Manichaeans could claim to carry forward with greater zeal than seen in the 'broad path' of the now established and ethically mainstream Catholic Church Faustus confronted, where orthodox belief took precedence over a distinctively Christian way of life.

Of course, Manichaeans found proof-texts for dualism in biblical literature, including Matt. 7:17f. (the two trees), Matt. 13:24ff. (the enemy who sows weeds among the wheat), John 1:5 (the blindness of darkness to the light sent into the world), and 2 Cor. 4:4 (the god of this world who blinds people's minds) (Psalm-Book 56.31; 172.26f.; Acts of Archelaus 15; Augustine, c. Fel. 2.2; c. Faust. 21.1). Kephalaion 2 is entirely devoted to elaborating the two trees image in terms of the full Manichaean mythology, and Psalm-Book 134.11–20 interprets the root, trunk, branches, and fruit of the Good tree according to the Manichaean theology.[14] Manichaeans noted that the bad tree is said explicitly by Jesus to be 'not planted by my heavenly Father,' and to be destined to be rooted up and cast into the fire (Matt. 3:10; 15:13; Augustine, c. Fort. 14; Acts of Archelaus 15). The 'fruits' of Evil are distinguished from those of Good with reference to Gal. 5:19–22 (Letter to Menoch 177; Acts of Archelaus 19). The Gospel of John's sharp opposition of light to darkness finds repeated use in Manichaean texts.[15] Likewise, Paul's expressions of interior conflict (e.g., Romans 7–8; Gal. 5:17; Eph. 2:1ff.) were taken as confirmations of the dualistic underpinnings of human nature (Augustine, c. Fort. 16–17, 21; c. Fel. 2.2). The Manichaeans offered their unique view of human creation (fashioned by the forces of Evil in imitation of the divine image) as a reconciliation of Jesus' declaration of humans as the Devil's children (John 8:44) with Paul's affirmation that they bore the image of God (1 Cor. 11:7; Col. 3:9–10).

Manichaeans shared with their orthodox rivals a valuation of Paul above any other Christian authority other than Jesus, despite concerns over corrupting interpolation of his letters. When New Testament interpretation entered its Pauline era in the mid fourth century, the Manichaeans represented the major alternative reading of the apostle that orthodox exegetes confronted (Decret 1989). Every orthodox commentary on Paul from this period should be assumed to be responding to the Manichaeans either directly or indirectly. Paul supplied the Manichaeans with the terminology for and the characterization of their dualistic anthropology in such passages as Romans 6–7; Eph. 3–4; 1 Cor. 15; 2 Cor. 4:16; and Col. 3:9–10 (Böhlig 2013: 45–46). Manichaeans made much of Paul's rhetoric of rejection and condemnation of parts of our human identity, which he commands to be 'put off,' as only explicable in a dualist world view (e.g., Augustine, c. Faust. 24.1).

Paul's rhetoric of moral disability in such passages as Romans 7 set the terms for the distinctive Manichaean position on grace (Böhlig 2013: 44–45). In the pre-Augustinian period, the Manichaeans confronted an orthodox Christianity that emphasized free will. By comparison, the Manichaeans were charged with denying the freedom of the will and falling into a kind of determinism. A more careful reading of the Manichaean position reveals that it stressed the necessity of divine grace to overcome the inherent moral deficits of human nature, stemming from its 'mixed' pedigree from both Good and Evil (Augustine c. Fort. 11, 16, 21; Nat. boni 41). The Manichaeans cited Paul to this effect, and found correlations to other scriptures, such as John 15:22 (Augustine, c. Fort. 21), and Augustine was forced to yield ground to their reading, albeit reframed within a Nicene world view (BeDuhn 2013). The objections of his contemporaries within the Catholic Church highlight the degree to which this reading of Paul was seen as an innovation with suspect Manichaean roots.

Manichaeans constituted major players in Christian biblical interpretation between the third and sixth centuries, producing many intriguing readings of the New Testament, a number of which must be assessed as astute and insightful. Some of those readings even managed to work their way into the orthodox interpretive tradition, not surreptitiously, but because major authorities such as Augustine of Hippo were forced to accept that their opponents had the better interpretation in spite of being 'heretics.'

Manichaean ecclesial life and organization

Mani set about creating the organization of his church by explicit imitation of Jesus, whose selection of twelve and seventy-two apostles was known to him through the Diatessaron. Mani invokes this precedent in the still unpublished Kephalaion 337 in the Chester Beatty Kephalaia codex. He explains there, moreover, how these numbers correspond to heavenly realities, as discerned on the basis of other sources by Claudia Leurini (Leurini 2009). On the basis of such models, Mani appointed 12 'Teachers' with authority over 72 'Bishops,' who in turn supervised 360 'Presbyters.' These church leaders in theory managed the entire network of Manichaean communities stretching across thousands of miles and multiple political territories. They answered to a supreme head of the church, the direct successor of Mani, situated in Mesopotamia until the late eighth century. The survival of this pope-like office thereafter is difficult to trace.

This church hierarchy oversaw a variety of liturgical offices, as well as the entire number of ascetic, itinerant 'Elect.' Men and women Elect eschewed family, home, sex, and property to carry forward the Manichaean mission, to hear confession and grant absolution, and to serve a key ritual function in the daily sacred meal. At times invoking the Sermon on the Mount as the foundation of their way of life, they followed a strict code of absolute non-harm, not only of their fellow human beings, but also of animals and plants. Only in the ritual context of the sacred meal were they allowed to eat vegetarian food harvested and prepared by others. The vast majority of Manichaean adherents did not seek Elect status, but remained 'Auditors' or 'Catechumens,' in which role they undertook periodic fasts and vigils, regular confession of sins, and support of the church and its ritual observances. Through a belief in reincarnation, they could aspire to find the self-discipline to become Elect in a future life. In the meantime, they adhered to a moral code compatible with family life and commerce, yet containing ideals that discouraged, among other things, reproduction (though not sex itself) and animal husbandry (specifically butchery, though not the raising and care of animals for other products).

Manichaean ritual

In the Manichaean tradition, Mani appears as a reformer of ritual practice. Prior messengers of God established the same cultic tradition, Manichaeans believed, but their earlier institutions became corrupted and misappropriated in the course of time. Mani's break with the Elchasaites, reported in the Cologne Mani Codex, is in itself a cultic reform (Buckley 1983). In this instance, ritual purity is at issue, and Mani denies the effectiveness of external baptisms of the body, replacing them with an internal realignment of the body's functioning. Manichaean ideology developed the role of the spirit in transforming the recipient of God's call, but abandoned the ritual of baptism entirely.

In the same way that Mani detected an underlying unity in the corrupted teachings of all religions, so he discovered a hidden 'ritual idiom' shared among the distorted practices of all ritual traditions: a food ritual buried beneath layers of distortion and misapplication, which the Manichaeans felt competent to restore to its pristine effectiveness. Mani saw ritual sacrifice as a misdirected and ineffective effort to return the essence of living things to their heavenly source:

> All of the alms that are given in the world because of the name of God, by every creed to the universe in his name, which their catechumens give because of the name of God— every place to which they bring these alms they lead them to affliction and hardship and wickedness. There is no rest or open gate through which they emerge and find occasion to ascend to God, because of whose name they are given, except only in the holy church.
>
> (Kephalaion 87, 217.2–8)

Mani was familiar with the establishment of a food ritual with sacrificial symbolism in the life of Jesus and its affirmation by the apostle Paul, and he explicitly identified the ritual he was instituting with this antecedent (Cologne Mani Codex 91.20ff.). By accepting the eucharistic transformation of sacrificial symbolism, and understanding it as a redirection of offerings from being burned on an altar to being consumed by holy men and women, Mani believed he had recovered the true and effective form of sacrificial ritual:

> The time, then, when these alms will reach the holy church, they are saved in it, and become pure and rest in it. They emerge from it and go to the God of truth, because of whose name they are given. The holy church itself, moreover, is the place of rest for all these alms that rest in it. It itself becomes a door to them and a ferrying place to that country of rest.
>
> *(Kephalaion 87, 217.12–20)*

This meal ritual, typically called 'The Table' (trapeza) in Greek and Coptic sources (CMC 35.1ff.; Psalm-Book 221–222; Homilies 16.18–21, 28.7–12), became the centerpiece of Manichaean daily ritual life, and the axis through which the community's celibate Elect interacted with its lay members, the Auditors (BeDuhn 2000).

Mani instituted other rituals for his church. He composed prayers and hymns that belong to the rich tradition of Semitic poetry shared with Jewish and Syriac Christian communities (Durkin-Meisterernst and Morano 2010). Manichaeans followed a set schedule of daily prayers possibly derived from Jewish practice. They emulated their founder by producing an extensive hymnic repertoire, examples of which are preserved in Coptic, Iranian, Turkic, and Chinese collections. Mani also introduced rites of confession and absolution, in both private and collective forms (BeDuhn 2004). He likewise believed himself to have been endowed with the gift of 'laying-on of hands' (cheirothesia), and passed it on to his followers as a means of healing, a conveyer of absolution, and an act of ordination (CMC 70.3).

Manichaean eschatology

Manichaeans did not believe in a physical resurrection of the dead at the end of the world. Instead, they expected an immediate post-mortem judgment, as did Zoroastrians. With words of encouragement as well as active protection, Jesus is portrayed guiding the soul out of its post-mortem anxiety and towards the light (Boyce 1954). Only the Elect could achieve full salvation at this critical moment; laypeople faced a kind of reincarnation—called 'decantation' or 'transfusion' (metaggismos)—that would continue to filter and refine their divine light from the pollution of darkness with which it was mixed. Nevertheless, ideas of a final judgment at the end of the world are prominent in early Manichaean literature, such as Mani's own Šābuhragān, and in the Coptic Manichaean Homilies, both of which draw on the Last Judgment scene of Matthew 25. Jesus, as 'Lord of the Realm of Wisdom,' the 'Great Shining One,' or 'Judge of Truth,' (Homilies 35.12ff.), 'will descend and set up his Bema (judgment seat) in the midst of the great inhabited world' (Homilies 36.30–31); from there he proceeds to judge the 'sheep' and 'goats' according to their deeds. 'For I was hungry and thirsty, [and] not one of [you] helped [me]' (Homilies 38.22–23). The judgment seat was a central symbol of the Manichaean community, with its eye always upon the eschaton. At its annual Bema ceremony, while looking back to Mani's death and imagining him to momentarily occupy the judgment seat in order to receive the confession and repentance of the community of believers, that same community looked forward to the return of Jesus: 'Thou art glorious, blessed Bema, that shall reign unto the end of the world, until Jesus shall come and sit upon it and judge all races' (Psalm-Book 25.24–26). Following a millennial restoration of true religion in its Manichaean form, the cosmos will be dissolved in a cataclysmic fire, which will refine out of mixture the final portions of trapped divine light, liberating it for ascent to its original home in the Realm of Light. Evil will be reduced to an inert lump (bolos), from which it never again will be able to mount an assault on the Good.

Conclusion

Born of one man's visionary experiences and creative intellect, Manichaeism continued to develop after his death as a rich, vibrant religious tradition, constantly creating new forms of expression and engagement with the many other religions with which it came into contact. It enjoyed a brilliant history of literary, artistic, and musical production while providing a spiritual culture of persistent attraction to converts for over a millennium. Although in some regional forms Mani eclipsed Jesus as the primary savior figure and object of devotion, no Manichaean community forgot the place Jesus held in the tradition as a divine revealer and guide to salvation. Perhaps no other offshoot of the Christian movement divaricated further from the main stock of the Christian tradition, and in this respect Manichaeism can be understood to have become a distinct religion in its own right. Yet we must consider its place as the earliest expression of Christianity in Asian cultures largely untouched by the Hellenism that established the assumptions and expectations through which Christianity was interpreted and adapted in the Roman world. Having never acknowledged that western variety as the norm, Manichaeans could with clear conscience claim to represent an equally authentic under-standing of the Christian kerygma. Most remarkable of all, they could see the doctrines and practices of their church as 'true Christianity,' and at the same time 'true Zoroastrianism' and 'true Buddhism.' The breadth of spiritual vision expressed in this Manichaean self-image is unique in the annals of Christian history.

Notes

1 See also Rose 1979: 67–69; Gardner 1988: 67; Franzmann 2003: 133ff.; BeDuhn 2009: 51–70.
2 From the Latin west, Faustus in Faust. 20.2; from Iranian Manichaeism, in the account of Mani's disci-ple Gabriab standing before the rising Jesus, i.e., the moon, in the evening to pray in TM 389a.R.23ff. (Sundermann 1981: 47); in Turkic Central Asia, his identification as Kun Ai Tengri, the god of sun and moon.
3 Wurst 2000: 649, draws attention to this correct rendering of the Latin patibilis as 'vulnerable' ('leidens-fähiger'), not 'suffering' ('leidender') as it is often given in secondary literature.
4 Wurst 2000: 653, considers Faustus' coinage as 'eine ad hoc-Bildung' that can 'schwerlich als integraler Bestandteil manichäischer Christologie gewertet werden'; cf. Franzmann 2003: 142. Gardner 1991: 77, how-ever, maintains that the identification of Jesus and the imprisoned living soul can be regarded neither as 'a later accretion nor a regional variant.' Faustus simply applied a new term to an essential part of the Manichaean conception of Christ.
5 It is clear that this is the meaning Fortunatus takes from the Latin hoc sentite in vobis, quod et in Christo Iesu.
6 Numerous versions of his appearance to them survive. In some of them, Jesus warns Adam away from Eve, since sexuality will perpetuate the imprisonment of light through reproduction of 'mixed' human beings. In others, he apparently works through Eve to enlighten Adam (Kephalaion 16, 54.2–9; 38.94.3–4).
7 The most direct rejection of 'two-nature' language is found in isolated passages quoted from supposed let-ters of Mani, long thought to be later Christian polemical forgeries; but close examination of their ideas and expression gives reason to regard them as genuinely Manichaean, even if not genuinely from the pen of Mani. See Gardner and Lieu 2004: 174–175.
8 For example, Allberry 1938 identified 123 New Testament allusions in the half of the Coptic Psalm-Book he edited. Several times that number are found in the Latin Manichaean literature preserved in Augustine of Hippo. See Böhlig 2013, which, however, reflects the state of knowledge at the time of the 1947 dissertation on which it is based.
9 Acts of Archelaus 15; Augustine, c. Fel. 1.9; c. Faust. 15.6; cf. the citation of John 16:13 on the same subject in c. Fel. 1.2 and, along with John 14:26 to the same effect, in c. Faust. 32.
10 Cologne Mani Codex 48–61 quotes apocalyptic texts attributed to each of these figures with the excep-tion of Noah, but the latter appears in Manichaean lists of prior prophets (e.g., Psalm-Book 142.4–9). The Manichaean Faustus of Milevis mentions Seth and Enoch (Augustine, c. Faust. 19.3) and more generally the pre-Mosaic patriarchs (22.2).

11 'One of the princes of darkness' (Augustine, c. Faust. 15.8; Gen. c. man. 2.26.39; Ep. 236.2), the 'demon of the Jews' (c. Faust. 18.2; cf. Ephrem [Mitchell 1912: xci]), or Satan (Kephalaion 2, 21.15–23; 65, 159.108; Acta Archelai 15.8–11).

12 Especially the conduct of the deity portrayed there, as well as of the biblical heroes, e.g., Augustine, c. Faust. 12.1.

13 Cf. the same terminology employed by Fortunatus in Augustine, c. Fort. 3.

14 On the two tree theme generally, see Coyle 2009: 65–88.

15 E.g., John 3:19 in Kephalaion 76, 184.11–12 and 185.12–13; Psalm-Book 165.29–30; Letter to Menoch 177; Acts of Archelaus 15.

Bibliography

Manichaean and anti-Manichaean primary texts

Alexander of Lycopolis: Van der Horst, P. W. and Mansfeld, J. (1974) An Alexandrian Platonist against Dualism: Alexander of Lycopolis' Treatise 'Critique of the Doctrines of Manichaeus.' Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Augustine of Hippo, c. Faust: Teske, R. (2007) Answer to Faustus a Manichean. Hyde Park, NY: New City Press.

Augustine of Hippo, c. Fort: Teske, R. (2006) The Manichean Debate. Hyde Park, NY: New City Press.

Cologne Mani Codex (CMC): Koenen, L. and Römer, C. (1988) Der Kölner Mani-Kodex. Opladen, Germany: Westdeutscher Verlag.

Ephrem Syrus: Mitchell, C. W. (1912) St. Ephraim's Prose Refutations of Mani, Marcion and Bardaisan. Oxford, UK: Williams and Norgate.

Homilies: Pedersen, N.-A. (2006) Manichaean Homilies. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Hymnscroll: Tsui Chi (1943–46) 'Mo Ni Chiao Hsia Pu Tsan, The lower (second?) section of the Manichaean hymns,' Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 11: 174–219.

Kephalaia (Prologue-Kephalaion 122): Gardner, I. (1995) The Kephalaia of the Teacher. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Kephalaia (Kephalaion 123–173): Funk, W.-P. (1999–2000) Kephalaia I, Zweite Hälfte, Lieferung 13/14, Lieferung 15/16. Stuttgart, Germany: Kohlhammer.

Letter to Menoch: Harrison, G. and BeDuhn, J. (2001) 'The authenticity and doctrine of (Ps?)Mani's Letter to Menoch,' in Mirecki, P. and BeDuhn, J. (eds) The Light and the Darkness: Studies in Manichaeism and its World. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 128–172.

Psalm-Book: Allberry, C. R. C. (1938) A Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part II. Stuttgart, Germany: Kohlhammer.

Books and articles

BeDuhn, J. (2000) The Manichaean Body: In Discipline and Ritual. Baltimore, MD: The Johns Hopkins University Press.

BeDuhn, J. (2004) 'The near eastern connections of Manichaean confessionary practice,' Aram 16: 161–177.

BeDuhn, J. (2009) 'The Manichaean Jesus,' in Hammer, O. (ed.) Alternative Christs. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 51–70.

BeDuhn, J. (2013) Augustine's Manichaean Dilemma, 2: Making a 'Catholic' Self, 388–401 C.E. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Böhlig, A. (1978) 'Zur Vorstellung vom Lichtkreuz in Gnostizismus und Manichäismus,' in Aland, B. (ed.) Gnosis. Festschrift für Hans Jonas. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 473–491.

Böhlig, A. (1983) 'The New Testament and the concept of the Manichaean Myth,' in Logan, A. H. B. and Wedderburn, A. J. M. (eds) The New Testament and Gnosis. Essays in Honour of Robert McL. Wilson. Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 90–104.

Böhlig, A. (2013) Nagel, P. and Richter, S. G. (eds) Die Bibel bei den Manichäern und verwandte Studien. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Boyce, M. (1954) The Manichaean Hymn Cycles in Parthian. London: Oxford University Press.

Buckley, J. (1983) 'Mani's opposition to the Elchasaites: A question of ritual,' in Slater, P. and Wiebe, D. (eds) Traditions in Conflict and Change. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 323–336, 713–715.

Coyle, J. K. (2009) Manichaeism and Its Legacy. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Decret, F. (1989) 'L'utilisation des Épitres de Paul chez les Manichéens d'Afrique,' in Ries, J. et al. (eds) Le Epistole Paoline nei manichei, i donatisti e il primo Agostino. Rome: Istituto Patristico Augustinianum, 29–83.

Durkin-Meisterernst, D. and Morano, E. (2010) Mani's Psalms. Middle Persian, Parthian and Sogdian texts in the Turfan Collection. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Franzmann, M. (2003) Jesus in the Manichaean Writings. London: T&T Clark.

Gardner, I. (1983) Manichaean Christology. The historical Jesus and the suffering Jesus with particular reference to western texts (i.e., texts from a Christian environment), and illustrated by comparison with Marcionism and other related movements. PhD Thesis. Manchester University, UK.

Gardner, I. (1988) 'The Docetic Jesus,' in Gardner, I. (ed.) Coptic Theological Papyri II. Vienna, Austria: Hollinek, 57–85.

Gardner, I. (1991) 'The Manichaean account of Jesus and the passion of the living soul,' in Van Tongerloo, A. and Giversen, S. (eds) Manichaica Selecta: Studies Presented to Professor Julien Ries. Louvain, Belgium and Lund, Sweden: IAMS/CHR/BCMC, 71–86.

Gardner, I. and Lieu, S. N. C. (2004) Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Gulácsi, Z. (2008) 'The life of Jesus according to the Diatessaron in early Manichaean art and text,' Bulletin of the Asia Institute 22: 143–169.

Gulácsi, Z. (2009) 'A Manichaean 'portrait of the Buddha Jesus': Identifying a twelfth- or thirteenth-century Chinese painting from the collection of the Seiun-ji Zen Temple,' Artibus Asiae 69: 91–145.

Gulácsi, Z. (2010) 'The prophet's seal: A contextualized look at the crystal sealstone of Mani (216–276 C.E.) in the Bibliotheque nationale de France,' Bulletin of the Asia Institute 24: 161–185.

Gulácsi, Z. (2015) Mani's Pictures: The Didactic Images of the Manichaeans from Sasanian Mesopotamia to Uygur Central Asia and Tang-Ming China. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Klimkeit, H.-J. (1979) 'Das Kreuzessymbol in der zentralasiatischen Religionsbegegnung,' Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte 31: 99–115

Klimkeit, H.-J. (1993) Gnosis on the Silk Road. San Francisco, CA: HarperCollins.

Leurini, C. (2009) 'The Manichean church between earth and paradise,' in BeDuhn, J. (ed.) New Light on Manichaeism. Papers from the Sixth International Congress on Manichaeism. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 169–180.

MacKenzie, D. N. (1979–80) 'Mani's Šābuhragān,' Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 42: 500–534; 43: 288–310.

Morano, E. (1998) 'My kingdom is not of this world: Revisiting the great Parthian crucifixion hymn,' in Sims-Williams, N. (ed.) Proceedings of the Third European Conference of Iranian Studies, Part 1: Old and Middle Iranian Studies. Wiesbaden, Germany: Reichert, 131–145.

Morano, E. (2000) 'A survey of the extant Parthian crucifixion hymns,' in Emmerick, R. E., Sundermann, W. and Zieme, P. (eds) Studia Manichaica: IV. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.

Petersen, S. (2006) 'Die Evangelienüberschriften und die Entstehung des neutestamentlichen Kanons,' Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaften 97: 250–274.

Reck, C. (2004) Gesegnet sei dieser Tag: Manichäische Festtagslieder, Edition der mittelpersischen und parthischen Sonntags-, Montags- und Bemahymnen. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Reeves, J. C. (1992) Jewish Lore in Manichaean Cosmogony: Studies in the Book of Giants Traditions. Cincinnati, OH: Hebrew Union College Press.

Reeves, J. C. (1997) 'Manichaean citations from the Prose Refutations of Ephrem,' in Mirecki, P. and BeDuhn, J. (eds) Emerging from Darkness: Studies in the Recovery of Manichaean Sources. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 217–294.

Rose, E. (1979) Die Manichäische Christologie. Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz.

Sundermann, W. (1968) 'Christliche Evangelientextein der Überlieferung der iranisch-manichäischen Literatur,' Mitteilungen des Instituts für Orientforschung 14: 386–405.

Sundermann, W. (1981) Mitteliranische manichäische Texte kirchengeschichtlichen Inhalts. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.

Sundermann, W. (1985) Ein manichäisch-soghdisches Parabelbuch. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.

Sundermann, W. (1988) 'Der Paraklet in der ostmanichäischen Überlieferung,' in Bryder, P. (ed.) Manichaean Studies: Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism. Lund, Sweden: Plus Ultra, 201–212.

Sundermann, W. (1992) 'Christ in Manicheism,' Encyclopedia Iranica 5: 535–539.

Wurst, G. (1996) 'A dialogue between the Saviour and the soul,' Bulletin de la Société d'archéologie copte 35: 149–160.

Wurst, G. (2000) 'Bemerkungen zum Glaubensbekenntnis des Faustus von Mileve (Augustinus, Contra Faustum 20, 2),' in Emmerick, R. E., Sundermann, W. and Zieme, P. (eds) Studia Manichaica: IV. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus. Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 648–657.

PART X

Profiles

47

ORIGEN

Thomas P. Scheck

Survey of Origen's life

Many consider Origen of Alexandria (185–254) to be the most important and influential Christian theologian of the ancient church. The indispensable source of information about his life and works is Eusebius (d. 340), Historia Ecclesiastica (HE), book 6. Eusebius, the bishop of Caesarea, originally wrote in Greek, but his book was well known in the west as well thanks to Rufinus of Aquileia's (345–411) Latin translation of it. Thus Origen has always been well known to educated Christians of the east and west. Origen was born the eldest of seven children to Christian parents, apparently in Alexandria, Egypt. He received a thorough education in scripture and Greek literature from his father Leonides who in 202 suffered martyrdom by beheading after being imprisoned during a persecution that took place under the Emperor Septimus Severus (193–211). Thus he was the son of a saint and a martyr. Eusebius reports that the teenage Origen was zealous for martyrdom himself, even sending a letter to his imprisoned father exhorting him not to shrink back for the sake of his family from offering the supreme witness of the faith. Origen later preached: 'If God would consent to let me be washed in my blood, receiving a second baptism by accepting death for Christ, I would surely go from this world . . . But blessed are they who merit these things' (Homily 7.2 on Judges). A treatise by Origen on this subject survives, the Exhortation to Martyrdom, in which he exhorts perse-cuted Christians to remain steadfast in order to obtain their eternal reward and be united with God. Only those can be saved who confess their faith. Origen's enthusiasm for martyrdom is reminiscent of the outpourings of Ignatius of Antioch, with whose writings he was familiar.

After Leonides's death, the family's goods were confiscated. In order to support his mother and siblings, Origen became a teacher of Greek grammar and literature. He studied philosophy as well as other liberal subjects, eventually including the Hebrew language, and he gained a reputation for his learning, even in the pagan world. Demetrius the bishop of Alexandria then put him in charge of instructing catechumens, and for some time Origen maintained dual teaching responsibilities (both secular and ecclesial). He later gave up teaching secular literature, sold his library for a meager sum of money, and dedicated himself to Christian catechesis. In Alexandria this activity went on during the persecutions, and many of Origen's pupils and converts were persecuted and even killed, while he accompanied them to the execution site. Apparently, the imperial anti-Christian legislation only applied to converts, not to those who were already baptized. (See Historia Augusta, Severus 17.1). Later in Caesarea Origen's giftedness as a Christian teacher was remembered with nostalgia and great emotion by one of his most famous pupils, St. Gregory Thaumaturgus (the Wonderworker), in the Panegyric to Origen. Gregory highlighted the fact that Origen's mastery over the mysteries of divine scripture gave him perfect boldness to deal with all subjects. Origen's surviving letter to the historical critical scholar Julius Africanus impresses the reader with this same deep feeling of humble but intellectually well-grounded piety. At the beginning of the fourth century, the future martyr, Pamphilus of Caesarea (d. 310), assessed Origen's character similarly (cf. Apology for Origen 3).

Figure 47.1 Lithograph of Origen, after a relief by Michael Burghers. From Cave (1687: 213)

Origen lived an ascetic lifestyle in conscious imitation of Jesus and the apostles. He remained celibate. It is said that he slept on the hard ground, wore no shoes, had but a single tunic, ate meals very frugally and never without the oral reading of scripture, and maintained an income below the subsistence level. According to some reports, he took Matt. 19:12 literally and castrated himself in order to protect his chastity, since many of his students were female. The latter story is often doubted by modern scholars as second-hand hearsay, since it seems to contradict several passages in Origen's writings where he rejects such a crassly literal interpretation of Jesus's words. Yet the tradition about Origen's self-castration still seems likely, since it is recorded by Eusebius, who was a fervent admirer of Origen.

At some point, Origen is reported to have traveled to Rome to visit the famous church there. Jerome preserves the tradition that in Rome Origen heard Hippolytus preach a sermon, and the future martyr (Hippolytus) acknowledged the presence of his distinguished guest (cf. Jerome, De viris illustribus 61). Origen later moved to Palestine, where, Eusebius reports, bishop Theoctistus of Caesarea allowed him to preach, even though Origen was still a layman. This illustrates the relative freedom of the early church. A layman is recognized as a leading teacher. Later, Origen was ordained a priest in Palestine by the local bishops, a canonically irregular procedure in that it took place without permission from Demetrius (Origen's bishop in Alexandria) and it was carried out in spite of the mutilation he had deliberately undergone. According to Eusebius it was for these reasons, i.e., canonical irregularities, that Origen was expelled from the church of Alexandria. However, doctrinal issues seem to have been involved as well in Origen's excommunication which Eusebius may have suppressed out of his partiality for Origen. Yet they are attested by Origen himself in his own Letter to Friends in Alexandria, a fragment of which is cited by both Rufinus and Jerome, who were on opposite sides of the Origenist controversy in the late fourth century (cf. Jerome, Apology against Rufinus, 2.18). The doctrinal issue referred to in that letter was Origen's alleged belief that the devil would ultimately be saved, something Origen interestingly in the same letter repudiates as a misrepresentation of his teaching.

Origen was consulted in theological discussions, one of which survives, The Dialogue with Heraclides (although this work, as a recent discovery, does not appear in Migne). In this work he describes the Father and the Son as 'two gods, one power,' which some scholars take to be equivalent in meaning to the later formula: 'two persons, one nature.' Origen is said to have journeyed to Arabia and to Antioch, where he had been summoned by Julia Mammaea, the mother of the emperor Alexander Severus, who wanted to learn more about Christianity from him. In 250, shortly after completing his two longest works, his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans and the Contra Celsum, Origen was arrested during Decius's persecution. He was imprisoned and severely tortured. Based on Origen's own epistolary testimony (which no longer survives), Eusebius reports that in prison he underwent terrible sufferings and dreadful cruelties on the rack, chains, bodily torments, agony in iron, and the darkness of his cell. He responded with courage and determination. By refusing to execute him, the judge aimed without success to force Origen to commit apostasy. Finally, the emperor died and the anti-Christian measures expired. Origen was released, but in broken health. He died a few years later at the age of 69, probably in 254. Origen was thus initially ranked among the church's 'confessors' (a person who confesses and adheres to the Christian religion in spite of persecution).

One can readily understand why Origen would have been so admired by many Christians of subsequent generations. His life had been characterized by heroic Christian virtue and discipleship. His death was the nearest approach to martyrdom that one can make, and he died in the bosom of the church, as a priest who had been ordained by the holiest and most illustrious bishops in Palestine, Theoctistus of Caesarea (d. 259) and Alexander of Jerusalem (d. 250). He was a respected scripture scholar, catechist, and apologist, granting that some of his theological speculations had been deemed controversial even during his lifetime. He was revered by other bishops, such as Gregory Thaumaturgus (d. 270) and Firmilian of Caesarea in Cappadocia (d. 268). His substantial orthodoxy was defended a few decades after his death by the martyr Pamphilus (d. 310), as well as by bishops and theologians of later generations. Yet the very fact that a defense was called for indicates that some of Origen's teachings had evoked opposition.

Survey of Origen's surviving works

One of the great tragedies of church history is that the vast majority of Origen's writings did not survive. This owes to the condemnation of 'Origenism' at the Fifth Ecumenical Council in 553. Yet a large body of his writings does survive in both Greek and Latin. In light of the extensive influence of Origen's works upon subsequent Christian theologians, some have compared the destruction of Origen's writings to the shattering of a perfume vessel into a thousand pieces that filled the whole house (of the church) with its fragrance. Some of the missing titles are known from Jerome's Ep 33 to Paula. Of Origen's major extant works, the following list indicates their title, Latin translator in square brackets (for works that do not survive in Greek), and in parentheses their approximate length in Migne columns (PG 11–17): Against Celsus (493 cols.), Commentary on Romans [Rufinus] (455), Commentary on John (405), Commentary on Matthew (382), On First Principles I–IV [Rufinus] (296), Homilies on Numbers [Rufinus] (220), Commentary Series on Matthew (199), Homilies on Leviticus [Rufinus] (169), Commentary on the Song of Songs [Rufinus] (136), Homilies on Joshua [Rufinus] (123), Homilies on Genesis [Rufinus] (117), Homilies on Jeremiah [Jerome] (107), Homilies on Exodus [Rufinus] (100), Homilies on Luke [Jerome] (99), Homilies on Ezekiel [Jerome] (96), Homilies on Psalms 36–38 [Rufinus] (90), On Prayer (73), Pamphilus's Apology for Origen [Rufinus] (72), Homilies on Judges [Rufinus] (40), On Martyrdom (36), Homilies on Isaiah [Jerome] (35), Homilies on the Song of Songs [Jerome] (21), Homily on 1 Samuel [Rufinus?] (17). According to these estimates, Rufinus of Aquileia (345–411) was responsible for translating approximately 50 percent of the surviving works of Origen. Jerome (347–420) translated nearly 10 percent of the corpus that survives.

The Hexapla

Origen's massive text-critical project, the Hexapla (= sixfold [Bible]) displayed in parallel columns the Hebrew Old Testament with a Greek transliteration, the Greek translations of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, the LXX, and sometimes two or three other Greek versions where they were available. The Hebrew version in the first column was roughly equivalent to the Masoretic text (the medieval Hebrew text on which modern translations of the Old Testament are based). But unbeknownst to Origen, who lived before the science of textual criticism had been discovered, the Hebrew text he used was not the same one used by the third-century BC Septuagint translators, whose version was hundreds of years older than the other Greek translators. Symmachus, Theodotion, and Aquila had used a Hebrew text that approximates the Hexaplaric Hebrew text. Although Origen's work was never copied and subsequently perished, hundreds of its readings are preserved in Jerome's commentaries on the Old Testament. Thus Origen's incredible scholarly labour on scripture was not completely wasted. See the diagram of the Hexapla (Figure 47.2).

The LXX was displayed in the fifth column of the Hexapla. Using critical signs adapted from the great Homeric critic Aristarchus, Origen marked with an asterisk (∗) words or lines lacking in the Septuagint but present in the Hebrew (as attested by the other Greek versions). He marked with an obelus (†) words or lines which were lacking in the Hebrew. Origen was not thereby endeavoring to promote for public use a new version of scripture based on this reconstructed text, since he was always wary of displacing the old Bible (the LXX) with a new version. Rather, he desired merely to show Christians what readings obtained among contemporary Jews. Eusebius of Caesarea reproduced and published the Hexaplaric recension of the LXX, aided by Pamphilus, around 307 AD, at first with the critical signs included, but eventually they were deleted. This led to the circulation of a version which was not the original text of the LXX. In reality it consisted of a mixture of the LXX with Aquila and Theodotion. Modern textual critics recognize that this latter development was harmful to the science of text-criticism of the Septuagint.

In the fifth century Jerome translated the Hexaplaric recension of the LXX, and used that as the basis of his new translation of the Hebrew. He defended the 'Hebrew truth' over against the Septuagint version. However, he did not realize that the LXX translators had used a far older Hebrew text than that displayed in Origen's Hexapla. Jerome mistakenly presumed that that Septuagint's Vorlage is visible in the first column of Origen's Hexapla, and that divergences between that particular Hebrew text and the LXX translation must be explained by faulting either the LXX or its transmission. He thus vastly underestimated the value of the Greek Septuagint as a witness to the original Hebrew text. Jerome's Christian critics, such as Augustine and Rufinus (who were equally ignorant of the principles of textual transmission), defended the authority of the LXX in its Old Latin version over against the new Hebrew version being promoted by Jerome. In doing so, and unbeknownst to themselves, they were essentially defending very ancient Hebrew readings. Jerome's text-critical theory inherited the defective state of knowledge of his predecessors. His privileging of the Hebrew text used by contemporary Jews as the ultimate source of biblical truth was by no means a simple recognition of scientific fact, since he wrongly supposed that the Hexaplaric Hebrew text was the original. Thus did Origen's great Bible project lead to some unintended consequences.

Figure 47.2   Sample of a page in the Hexapla. From Swete 1914: 62–63

Origen's speculations and dogmatic errors

Origen's first book, On First Principles, became his most controversial treatise and was the main source of posthumous accusations against his orthodoxy. In this work Origen became the first Christian theologian to attempt a theological reflection on the essential doctrines of the Christian faith, beginning with the Holy Trinity, using the tools of reason, scripture, and apostolic tradition. His stated aim was to defend the church's faith against the heretics. In this work he speculates about an apokatastasis or universal restoration of all rational creatures. Origen's philosophical conjectures (which stand in tension with his exegesis) sometimes appear to resemble the Platonist theory of metempsychosis. He seems to speculate that since created spirits never lose their freedom, they may go on falling and rising and falling again for ever (On First Principles 3.1). Philosophically, he adheres to the idea that only the good can be eternal and that evil must eventually disappear altogether. If that is the case, universal salvation would become a matter of necessity, not negated by the long duration of the process that may be required. Yet since Origen admitted that a creature with freewill could always refuse to surrender to God, he drew the inference that it was possible for such creatures to go on falling and rising. His views are contrary to the doctrine that the choice made in this life, or the angels' choice at the beginning of the world, is decisive in character. Yet to my knowledge this element in Christian dogma was only developed and clarified after Origen's lifetime.

The weak point in Origen's philosophical theory is his idea that the soul will return to the purely spiritual state it was in before it came down into the body. In response to heretical accusations against the injustice of God's governance of humanity, Origen posited that human souls are pre-existent spirits who fell away from God in the preceding world and are therefore now enclosed in material bodies in accordance with their previously earned merits or demerits. The sins committed by the soul in the preceding world explain the different situations into which they are born, whether among the brutal Scythians or among the cultivated and civilized Romans. Thus there can be no injustice on God's part in assigning these souls to their lots in life. Origen's theory about pre-existence was condemned by the Fifth General Council. In 553 fifteen anathemas were laid down against Origenist doctrines (but apparently outside the official sessions of the Council). Some modern scholars claim that the action of Emperor Justinian was really directed against sixth-century 'Origenists,' and not against the historical Origen. This would mitigate the authority and relevance of the action with respect to Origen. The condemned doctrines included Origen's theories about the pre-existence of human souls and of Christ's soul, the spherical shape of resurrection bodies, the animate nature of the stars and heavenly bodies, the suggestion that Christ may have to be crucified in the future age on behalf of demons, the view that the power of God is limited, and the conjecture that the punishment of demons and impious men is only temporary (DS 403–411). The doctrine of apokatastasis was condemned in these words:

> If anyone says or holds that the punishment of the demons and of impious men is temporary, and that it will have an end at some time, that is to say, there will be a complete restoration (apokatastasis) of the demons or of impious men, let him be anathema.
>
> (DS 411)

It is questionable whether Origen dogmatically asserted any of these heterodox views, but he tentatively put them forward for the sake of discussion as interpretive possibilities in his attempt to refute the arguments of his Gnostic opponents. In any case, the result of the conciliar action was that Origen was declared a heretic in the Greek church and his writings were destroyed. Many modern scholars—in particular an impressive group of Catholic theologians in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, several of whom became cardinals—feel sympathy for Origen and would like to see him rehabilitated, in light of the Catholic spirit exhibited in statements like this:

> Although they (the heretics) seek to expound it, they will be unable to succeed. But I hope to be a man of the Church. I hope to be addressed not by the name of some heresiarch, but by the name of Christ. I hope to have his name, which is blessed upon the earth. I desire, both in deed and in thought, both to be and to be called a Christian.
>
> (Homily 16.6 on Luke)

Origen's defenders say that he was a pioneer with very little theological tradition to build upon. With scarcely any magisterial guidance to help him construct his views, he nevertheless manifested a docile and tentative spirit, in statements like this:

> I bear the title of priest and, as you see, I preach the word of God. But if I do anything contrary to the discipline of the Church or the rule laid down in the Gospels—if I give offence to you and to the Church—then I hope the whole Church will unite with one consent and cast me off.
>
> (Homily 7.6 on Joshua)

It is argued that Origen's strong desire to constantly observe the rule of faith, to follow the tradition, and be an obedient child of the church, is not the mark of an arch-heretic. For this reason,

Origen's name cannot justly be put alongside those who had made a conscious break with the church. Intention counts for something. In his Apologia, J. H. Newman said that he would not listen to the notion that so great a soul as Origen's was lost, even though from a doctrinal perspective Origen's ecclesiastical critics were mainly in the right. Newman adds: 'Yet who can speak with patience of his enemy and the enemy of St. John Chrysostom, that Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria [d. 412]? Who can admire or revere Pope Vigilius [d. 555]?'

The acceptance of the historical critical method in the Catholic Church after the Second Vatican Council has clearly brought great benefits. Modern scholars now recognize that Origen's position on universalism resists neat schematization. He seems to have affirmed the logical possibility of restoration of all rational creatures, but also of the possibility of failure of such a hope, and he did not assert its inevitability. It seems somewhat ironic that Origen would eventually be faulted for teaching universalism. For Origen, not Cyprian, is the oldest source of the theological axiom, 'Outside the church there is no salvation.' In his third homily on Joshua, Origen discusses Rahab, the harlot from Jericho who hid two of Joshua's spies at the time of the conquest of Canaan and who recognized the Lord's power and demanded from the spies the promise that she and her family would be spared when the Israelites conquered (cf. Jos. 1:10–2:24). Joshua (Greek: Jesus) was faithful to the pledge, and only Rabab and her family were spared after the city's capture (Jos. 6:22–23). Origen interprets the scarlet thread let down from Rahab's window as a pre-figuration of redemption by the blood of Christ; her house represents the church. Origen then gives the following striking warning concerning the believer's obligation not to depart from the Catholic Church: 'Let no one deceive himself. Outside this house, that is, outside the Church, no one is saved (Extra ecclesiam, nemo salvatur). If anyone goes outside, he is responsible for his own death.' Origen's philosophical speculations apparently did not negate his fundamental ecclesiological principle that salvation is solely by the blood of Christ and is accessible only through the instrumentality of the Catholic Church.

Origen's homilies

Of Origen's surviving writings, 33 percent are homilies on scripture, which illustrates how deeply he was connected to the church of his day, as a priest, catechist, and pastor of souls. Origen's homilies represent the oldest surviving corpus of Christian sermons. As such they were in their Latin translations a source of inspiration to Christians of later generations in the west. Origen's reflections on the institutional church in his homilies are very valuable as a sort of window into the rites and customs of the church of the third century. It is chiefly in these homilies that he practices his 'allegorical' method of interpretation. His Homilies on Numbers and Joshua emphasize that the struggles of the Israelites on the way to and in Canaan are the image of the struggles of the Christian on the way to the Promised Land. What matters to Origen is not to speculate on the profound meaning of the Bible, but to receive it with a living faith and to adapt one's conduct to it. Origen endeavors to equip his hearers for spiritual warfare against Satan's demons and the vices they incite. Under the symbols of the Old Testament, he preaches spiritual combat. From the day when the divine Word is introduced into a soul at baptism, the Christian must be engaged in the struggle of virtues against vices. Before the Word came to attack them, the vices remained in peace, but as soon as it undertook to judge them one by one, then a great movement arose and a merciless war was commenced. This became an influential theme in Christian morality and asceticism. A striking witness to the influence of Origen's spirituality is Erasmus of Rotterdam's Enchiridion of 1503.

Excursus: the fidelity of the Latin translations of Origen

Jerome criticized Rufinus's translation technique, particularly for the work On First Principles, in Ep 124 and in his Apology against Rufinus, works that were written at the height of the Origenist controversy in the final decade of the fourth century. By his own admission, Rufinus suspected that the Greek manuscripts of Origen's writings had been tampered with by heretics, an idea that Jerome reasonably doubted. Because of this suspicion, in his Latin translations Rufinus sometimes omitted or altered the wording of the original in order to make the text conform more adequately to Origen's plainly orthodox statements found elsewhere in his writings. For obvious reasons, Rufinus was concerned to defend Origen against the charge of 'proto-Arianism.' In response to Jerome, Rufinus does two things. First, he calls attention to the fact that Jerome is being hypocritical in accusing him, since Jerome had made use of the same techniques in translating Origen. In his Apology against Jerome 2.27, Rufinus has no difficulty showing that Jerome had glossed, paraphrased, and updated Origen when he translated Origen's Homilies on Isaiah into Latin. Evidently Jerome did this in order to protect Origen and prevent misrepresentation of his exegesis in the post-Nicene period. Rufinus shows not only that Jerome added clarifying glosses to Origen's original text, but he also omitted material that might have occasioned suspicion. Rufinus approves of Jerome's approach to translating Origen and says he took Jerome for his model in terms of translation technique. Until quite recently scholars have scarcely noticed the influence of Jerome's own translation technique upon Rufinus.

Second, Rufinus denies that he had added anything substantive of his own to his Latin translations of Origen. He says that he simply restored Origen to himself. On this point there are significant problems to be noted, since Rufinus mistakenly believed the spurious Dialogue of Adamantius on the Orthodox Faith was an authentic work of Origen. He had translated this work into Latin with the intention of exhibiting Origen as a champion in the fight against heresy. This spurious work contains statements such as 'I believe that . . . God the Word is consubstantial and eternal,' and 'the blessed Trinity is consubstantial and inseparable.' Such formulations seem to point to the recent determination of the Council of Nicaea (325). Yet Rufinus sincerely thought these were Origen's own expressions. He therefore evidently felt free to borrow such language and put it into Origen's mouth in certain thematically related texts, whenever he was convinced that heretics had inserted their own corruptions into Origen's original text. The technique itself was not so very different from what Jerome had done in his translation of Origen's Homilies on Isaiah. Yet the result is that passages in which Rufinus's Latin Origen speaks with the language of Nicaea are probably not to be trusted as literal representations of what Origen had written. Some modern scholars plausibly suggest that the historical Origen may have avoided homoousios-language entirely because it would have been reminiscent of the perceived materialism of some Gnostic writers. Ousia language may have seemed to the historical Origen unsuitable for application to the divine existence.

On the other hand, I. Ramelli has recently complicated the whole discussion of these matters by claiming that Origen was indeed the inspiration for the Nicene formula: one essence, three persons. She says that this is also consistent with Origen's designation of the Son as consubstantial with the Father. According to Ramelli, Origen's Trinitarian heritage is to be found, not in Arianism, but in Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra, Eusebius, Didymus, and above all Gregory of Nyssa and the Cappadocians. Ramelli's challenge to the modern discussion may end up undermining older approaches to these questions. At the very least it seems safe to say that apart from the Trinitarian/ consubstantiality passages that resonate with the language of Nicaea, Rufinus's and Jerome's Latin translations can be received as generally reliable. Modern experts now acknowledge that although Rufinus in his translations of Origen is speaking with his own voice to the readers of his time, nevertheless, it is to Origen's ideas that we are listening when we read these translations.

Against Celsus

Against Celsus (Contra Celsum), which survives intact in Greek, is Origen's magnum opus. As his longest extant writing and final work, it comprises the most important written defense of Christianity from antiquity. It is a work of Christian apologetics that retains its relevance, vitality, and interest even to modern readers. In it, the struggle between paganism and Christianity is visible. Intellectually, Origen towers over his opponent, though he wears his learning lightly and never descends into mockery, abuse, or excessive polemic. Eusebius and many other later Christian readers were convinced that Origen had silenced Christianity's opponents for all centuries to come.

Origen's method of exegesis: Old Testament

Origen's principles for interpreting the Old Testament derive from Christ himself, and therefore are quite complex. Jesus announced the beginning of his public ministry as a fulfillment of Isaiah 61 (cf. Luke 4:16–21), and related his miracles allusively to the literal fulfillment of prophecies made by the prophet Isaiah (Matt. 11:5; Luke 7:22; cf. Is 35:4–6). Jesus understood his own betrayal, suffering, death, and resurrection as the will of God that fulfills Old Testament predictions (cf. Matt. 14:27–28; Luke 22:37; 24:27). Though predicted and prefigured in the Old Testament, yet Jesus also claimed to surpass its greatest figures including Moses, David, Solomon, and Jonah (cf. Matt. 12:41–42; 22:45). Jesus explained the meaning of his life and death using the rites of the Sinai covenant (cf. Luke 22:20). He viewed the bronze serpent fashioned and lifted up by Moses in the wilderness as an allegory of his own death on the cross and ascension into heaven (cf. John 3:13–15). In respect to moral teaching, Jesus proclaimed that he had not come to destroy the law but to fulfill it (cf. Matt. 5:16–17); yet he was also critical of some of Moses' laws related to ritual defilement and tolerance of divorce (cf. Matt. 15:18–20; 19:8–9), which led to conflicts with his Jewish contemporaries. Origen endeavors to sit at Jesus' feet as a devoted pupil and to learn from him how to read and interpret the Old Testament.

In addition to the patterns laid down by Jesus, Origen regards Paul and the author of Hebrews as good examples of the Christian exegete. Paul in fact is the creator of the term 'allegorical exegesis.' In Gal. 4:21–31 Paul takes the famous story of Sarah and Hagar and superimposes new Christian meaning on top of it: the Jews saw themselves as God's chosen people, the children of Abraham and Isaac. Paul argues that actually those Jews who are now insisting on the law, given on Mount Sinai, correspond to Ishmael, son of the slave woman. Christians, on the other hand, who trust in the miracle-producing promises of God, correspond to Isaac. Paul sees the Christians, whether they descend from Jewish or Gentile backgrounds, as the true spiritual family of Abraham, as the true Israel (Gal. 6:16). For Paul, the Old Testament story is an allegory that bolsters his argument against the Judaizers. Paul's interpretation does not obliterate the literal meaning of the historical narrative but presupposes it.

The Jews and Judaizing Christians in the New Testament sought to hold Christians to the observances of circumcision, Passover, unleavened bread, rules about food and drink, feasts, new moons, and the Sabbath, by means of a literal interpretation of the Old Testament. They saw no meaning more profound than the immediate one in the Old Testament ceremonial law. Allegorical interpretation inaugurated by Jesus and Paul, equipped Christian interpreters to handle Jewish objections like this. Origen's principal objection to Jewish literal exegesis of scripture focuses on two issues in particular: the obligation to continue to adhere to Jewish ceremonial law (Sabbaths, sacrifices, food laws, etc.) and the identity of Jesus as the Messiah. Origen's critique of Jewish exegesis is not abstract and categorically dismissive of Jewish interpretation, but particular and focused on these specific dogmatic issues. To Christian interpreters, the practice of allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament is what distinguishes Christianity from Judaism, the New Covenant from the Old Mosaic Covenant. The Old Testament was never read by the ancient church as a separate body of texts; rather it was read through the interpretations already found in the New Testament. Jesus, Paul, and others had provided norms to be followed in the interpretation of sacred Old Testament scripture.

Scholars are now beginning to concede that Origen was not aiming to 'Hellenize' the biblical stories in the manner of neo-Platonic allegorizing of Homer, since he frequently tells his hearers to go back to the Gospels and to Paul to find examples of 'spiritual interpretation.' Programmatic texts for Origen's hermeneutics are: Matt. 5:17; Heb. 10:1; 1 Cor. 10:11; Rom. 15:4; 2 Tim. 3:16–17. Especially in light of Paul's claims about the Old Testament in these passages, Origen asks in his homilies: Why were the biblical narratives preserved by the Holy Spirit in the church?

What spiritual lessons and warnings do these stories offer the Christian? What foreshadowing, what admonition, what instruction, what encouragement, reproof, correction, or exhortation, do we find in these narratives? Origen maintains the history intact and defends it, but he seeks the spiritual truth of it in the light of Christ.

On the other hand, it seems clear that Origen had an almost excessive admiration for ancient Jewish methods of exegesis, especially those used by the renowned Philo of Alexandria. Admittedly, Philo made an enormous contribution to both Jewish and Christian theology by recognizing that the Bible depicts God anthropomorphically and anthropopathically. Philo clarified that God in his reality does not literally resemble the way he is depicted on the surface of the Old Testament. He is not an angry, repentant, physically embodied deity who is also ignorant of the future. Passages that describe him that way need to be interpreted in a way that is worthy of God. Origen completely embraced Philo's viewpoint on this important theological theme. Yet Origen seems to have been too much under Philo's influence when he proposed the idea that all passages of the Old Testament have a symbolic sense. Origen tries to find a practical and spiritually edifying use even for seemingly insignificant details in the text of the Old Testament.

This may have been partly an over-reaction to the way the followers of Marcion denied that the Old Testament narratives had any use whatsoever. But Origen clearly goes too far in his allegorical exegesis and offers far-fetched interpretations that sometimes needlessly overlook or even undermine the literal sense. Attacks on Origen's doctrine of history and allegory by orthodox churchmen began during his own lifetime. Origen's interpretation of the first three chapters of Genesis (again heavily influenced by Philo's recognition of the anthropomorphic depiction of the deity) leaves the reader with the impression that he utterly denies the historical factuality of the Garden of Eden, which is not quite true. His main concern in such texts is directed against an unbefitting interpretation of the narratives, as if God literally has a physical body, plants trees like a gardener, and walks around in the cool breeze like a man.

On the other hand, when Origen allegorizes narratives, it is noteworthy that he does not claim finality for his spiritual interpretations, and in fact he often offers more than one. Frequently, he challenges his hearers to pursue their own investigations into the mystical meaning. It is also evident that Origen's linguistic terminology is significantly different from that of moderns. His understanding of 'allegory' or 'spiritual understanding' is far more comprehensive than it is for modern scholars. It is virtually the equivalent of 'figurative.' When Origen encounters an anthropomorphism, a metaphor, a parable, a figurative expression, he says that it must be taken 'in the spiritual sense.' Origen's notion of 'literal' is diminutive in comparison with ours. Metaphorical meanings that modern exegetes would consider to be included in the literal sense, Origen identifies as allegorical or spiritual meanings. The benefit that came to the church from Origen's approach, whatever the excesses, was to assure the Old Testament a permanent place in the Christian liturgy. Origen did this not by an abstract theory but by working his way through the entire Old Testament, book by book, sentence by sentence, and word by word. Origen provided the church with the first Christian commentary on virtually the entire Old Testament. Seldom, if ever again, would voices be raised in dispute over whether the Old Testament had its proper and rightful place in the Christian church.

Origen's exegesis of the Gospels

About 42 percent of Origen's surviving works are commentaries on scripture. Origen's commentaries on Song of Songs and Romans became classics in the west, though there always remained theologians (such as Thomas Aquinas) who remained ignorant of them. Those on Matthew and John, which survived only in fragmentary form, seem to have been less well known, although Origen's exegesis of Matthew had been thoroughly assimilated into St. Jerome's Commentary on Matthew. Origen's Commentary on John was first edited by Daniel Huet in 1688. All four of these commentaries (Song of Songs, Romans, John, Matthew) show Origen 'at work' in the verse-by-verse exposition of individual books of the Bible. Of these great commentaries of Origen, all but the commentary on Romans place their main focus on bringing out the spiritual and allegorical meaning of the text. For even in his exegesis of the Gospels, Origen's interpretation focuses on the symbolism that he thinks is inherent in the narratives, not on the literal historical meaning. This is not to say that Origen denies the history of the Gospel narratives, but he seeks to transcend it when he expounds these texts in the church. Origen believed that Jesus wanted to make the actions reported to us by the evangelists symbolic of his own spiritual operations within us. He believed that everything in the Gospels, Christ's birth, his growth, his maturity, his passion, his descent to hell, his resurrection and ascension, not only took place at a given time, but also continues to act in us even today.

Origen's exegesis of Paul's writings

Since Origen's Commentary on Romans is his second longest extant work, it merits careful consideration. He adopts a more literal and historical approach in interpreting Paul's writings, since his 'allegorical' method of exegesis applies first and foremost to the interpretation of the Old Testament, secondarily to the Gospels, but it does not fundamentally apply to the letters of St. Paul. Scholars have observed that the basic divergence between an allegorical and a more literal approach to scripture is far less relevant to the interpretation of Paul's writings than it is to that of the Old Testament or of the Gospels. The epistles of Paul already are Christian theology, which is not the case for much of the Old Testament according to the letter. Paul's letter to the Romans, for example, offers a Christian theological interpretation of the Old Testament in its literal argument. Paul himself alludes to the Christian meaning of Abraham's faith and circumcision (chs. 2 and 4), of the propitiatory (ch. 3:25), of Adam (ch. 5), of the law (ch. 7), of God's choice of Jacob over Esau (ch. 9), of God's dealings with Pharaoh (ch. 9) and Elijah (ch. 11), of the offering of sacrifices (ch. 12), of the Hebrew prophecies concerning the identity of the Messiah and the inclusion of the Gentiles among God's people (ch. 15), etc. Elsewhere, Paul explains the allegorical significance of Abraham's wives Sarah and Hagar and their sons (cf. Galatians 4). Upon such Pauline material, Origen does not need to dig beneath the letter to find Christian meaning, since it is on the surface and of ready application.

Origen's Commentary on Romans is his only Scriptural commentary which is preserved in a coherent form from the beginning to the end of the Scriptural book on which he is writing an explanation. This feature distinguishes it from his commentaries on John and Matthew, which survive in fragmentary form on a very limited selection of texts from these Gospels. Originally written in Greek c. 244–246, it was known and used by numerous orthodox writers. When Origen's work was translated into Latin by Rufinus in 406, it was well received. Jerome (347–420) who knew the work in its Greek form sanctioned it by integrating its insights into his own Pauline exegesis. In its Latin form Origen's Commentary on Romans was used extensively by Pelagius; it may have been briefly consulted by St. Augustine; clearly Cassiodorus (490–583) commended Origen's work in his Institutiones, where he indicates the ecclesiastical authors who could provide the safest guidance for understanding the individual books of the Bible. In the medieval period Origen's work was utilized extensively, and in the sixteenth century, Erasmus of Rotterdam was heavily influenced by Origen's exegesis of Romans.

Origen's understanding of Romans

One of the central themes in Origen's Commentary on Romans is the relationship between Jews and Gentiles in the divine dispensation. Origen describes Paul's conduct as that of an arbiter sitting between the Jews and the Gentiles. The apostle invites both groups to faith in Christ in such a way as to not offend the Jews completely by destroying the Jewish ceremonies, or to cause despair in the Gentiles by affirming the observance of the law and of the letter. As Paul recalls the promises or the threats of punishment, he apportions the word to each people, being careful not to alienate members of either group. Thus he tempers and balances his discourse as a kind of mediator. Such an understanding of the basic message of Romans is strikingly modern and accordant with the 'New Perspective' of Pauline interpretation. It accords real value to Judaism while arguing for the superiority of the Christian revelation.

Origen's gives an all-important position to the salutary value of Christ's death on the cross with an abundance of detail lacking in any previous theologian. His theory of original sin may not be identical with Augustine's, but he clearly views all human beings as sinners who are unable to save themselves. For both Jews and Gentiles salvation comes only through God's mercy. Therefore all human boasting is excluded. Yet Origen does not view the gratuity of salvation as something that nullifies free human cooperation with divine grace. There is collaboration, even though the blood of Christ justifies us much more than our faith.

For Origen, the doctrine that Paul proclaims in his epistles must be harmonized with the teaching of Jesus of the Gospels. Some modern scholars influenced by Bultmann endeavor to minimize or even deny the influence of the Jesus tradition upon the apostle Paul. Origen thinks that Paul's meaning can be best expounded by shedding light upon it from the Gospel traditions. Commenting on the apostle's words in Rom. 5:2, Origen says that if anyone wants to have access through our Lord Jesus Christ to the grace of the Lord, he must be purged from all the vices. Otherwise Jesus as the door will not allow those who are doing things alien to him to enter through it. Origen explains Paul's meaning in Rom. 2:26–27 by referring to Ezek. 44:9: 'Therefore thus says the Lord God: No foreigner, uncircumcised in heart and flesh, of all the foreigners who are among the people of Israel, shall enter my sanctuary' (RSV). Origen says that those who show themselves to be uncircumcised either in faith (by holding base and unworthy opinions concerning the faith), or in works (by committing unclean and defiled actions), will be excluded from entering the sanctuary of God. Origen repeatedly affirms that faith and good works are both needed. One without the other is condemned, 'seeing that faith without works is called dead (Jas 2:17,26); and no one is justified before God by works without faith.' Origen cites Matt. 7:24 and Luke 6:46 to show that 'everywhere faith is joined with works and works are united with faith.' Faith and works cleave (adhaerens) to one another and are consummated. This is why Paul insists in Rom. 3.31 that Christians do not make void the law but establish it, just as Jesus had said in Matt. 5:17: 'I have not come to destroy the law but to fulfill it.'

Origen views faith as the beginning of being justified by God. It must go down deep into the soil of the soul, like a root that has received rain, so that when it begins to be cultivated through God's law, branches arise from it which bring forth the fruit of works. 'The root of justice, therefore, does not grow out of the works, but the fruit of works grows out of the root of justice, namely out of the root of justice, which God accepts even without works.' Thus faith obtains the justice out of which works emerge; and this relationship is not reversible. By faith alone does one receive forgiveness of sins and reconciliation with God. Works are thus not the cause of grace, but its outworking, because grace must be effective in the human being. Origen treats hope and love as virtues that cleave inseparably to faith. God's promise of salvation will be fulfilled only if faith, hope, and love abide in those who believe: faith is the initial foundation of salvation; hope is the progress and increase of the building; love is the perfection and culmination of the entire work. That is why love is said to be greater than everything else (cf. 1 Cor. 13:13).

Origen distinguishes post-baptismal works of justice, or the Christian virtues, from the Pauline term 'works of the law,' which he takes to be equivalent to the works of the Pharisees reproached by Jesus in the Gospels. He says that the works which Paul repudiates and frequently criticizes are not the works of justice (opera iustitiae) which are commanded in the law, but those in which they boast who keep the law according to the flesh; that is, the circumcision of the flesh, the sacrificial rituals, the observance of Sabbaths and new moon festivals (cf. Col. 2:18). Works like these are the ones by which no one can be saved. But one should take care that the grace he has received should not be in him 'in vain' (cf. 1 Cor. 15:10). Anyone who sins after having attained grace becomes ungrateful to him who offered the grace. Origen so wishes to safeguard the necessity of the Christian's post-baptismal good works that he sometimes delimits the 'works of the law' that Paul criticizes to Jewish ceremonial works apart from faith. It is not such ritual works that need to be added to faith for the grace of God not to be received in vain, but the moral works done in obedience to the law of Christ, for the doing of which Christians will most certainly be judged. Origen's interpretation here is another instance of an early precedent for the so-called 'new perspective' in Pauline interpretation. Many contemporary scholars now agree that Paul's words 'apart from works' normally mean: apart from those works of the law that visibly separate the Jewish people from the nations. They do not refer to the good works produced in obedience to the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus (cf. Rom. 8:2).

Interestingly, Origen exemplifies the necessity of the Christian's mortification to sin by citing the example of the thief on the cross who had been planted together in the likeness of Christ's death and of his resurrection, and for that reason he deserved paradise since he had been joined to the tree of life. By God's wonderful gift of life to him the thief had not only been declared just with respect to the past, with no antecedent works, but he had also become inherently just and worthy of paradise through his free and active adhesion to the living Christ. The meritorious character of his actions had its source in the grace of justification and completed the conception of it. He had been liberated from the death of sin; his soul was united to Christ who gave it new life. In interpreting Paul, Origen strives to achieve harmony with the words and actions of the Lord Jesus in the Gospels. Origen thinks that Paul, James, Jesus, the prophets, and the whole Bible are unified. They all tell one story about one subject.

Origen's legacy in the west

Origen's legacy in the west continues to be underestimated. Scholars often claim that Origen was seldom cited and little known in the medieval western tradition until Giovanni Pico della Mirandola (1463–1493) championed his work in the fifteenth century. De Lubac has provided the corrective to this widespread error. His studies have documented that the entire western tradition is witness to an extraordinary interest in the works of Origen, which were immensely popular. Origen was destined to be one of the foremost educators of the Latin Middle Ages. More than any other figure in the fields of hermeneutics, exegesis, and spirituality, Origen would be the grand master. De Lubac was speaking mainly of the direct influence of the Latin Origen upon writers in the Middle Ages. But there was also a very significant indirect influence. Hilary, Ambrose, and Jerome profoundly assimilated Origen's Greek Scriptural interpretations into their own Latin writings. No scholar familiar with their works would dare deny this. It is true that the Greekless Augustine was uninfluenced by Origen's exegesis in his own Scriptural commentaries, except for an accidental coincidence of thought here and there; but Augustine was also uninfluenced by Jerome's erudite Latin exegesis with which he was undoubtedly familiar. For example, in his own commentary on Galatians, Augustine completely ignored Jerome's linguistic and theological insights, even though Augustine clearly had full access to Jerome's commentary and had severely criticized some of Jerome's interpretations in his written correspondence.

Origen's influence on Jerome is comparable to the influence of Greek philosophers upon Cicero, Homer's influence on Virgil, or Menander's influence on Terence. It is impossible to conceive of these Latin authors apart from the influence of the Greek models. To begin with Jerome had inaugurated his scholarly career by translating Origen's Homilies on Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, Luke, and Song of Songs. His own Commentary on Ecclesiastes essentially reproduces Origen's interpretation of this book. In On Famous Men 75 Jerome reports that he possessed Origen's twenty-five-book Commentary on the Twelve [Minor] Prophets, transcribed by the hand of the martyr St. Pamphilus himself, 'which I hug and guard with such joy, that I deem myself to have the wealth of Croesus.' Jerome own commentaries on the twelve prophets are infused with Origen's exegesis, as are Jerome's Pauline commentaries. In 392 Jerome responded to critics who accused him of dependence on Origen in his own exegetical writings by saying that far from being insulted, he saw in this the highest praise, since his express desire was to follow Origen's example in exegesis, which all men of discernment commend. The fact that Jerome would come to reproach a handful of Origen's interpretations during the Origenist controversy of the late 390s does not nullify this. The range of Jerome's reading in Origen was extensive, and it lasted till the end of his life. He treats Origen as the indispensable source. If he writes a commentary on a book or a verse of scripture, he looks for material in Origen to help him. If by chance he cannot find Origenian material, he apologizes. Jerome is most content when he has at his disposal for a single subject (as in the case of the Psalms, Isaiah, and Hosea) a large amount of Origen's works to compile. Moreover, as mentioned earlier, Jerome's Old Testament commentaries incorporate hundreds of textual readings from Origen's Hexapla. Unsurprisingly, Jerome's contemporaries accused him of compiling Origen. He did not deny the charge.

The fact is, without Origen, there would have been no St. Jerome. Origen's exegetical work is the principal source of Jerome's commentaries. Since the Latin church came to recognize St. Jerome as its greatest exegete and scripture scholar, it is clear that Origen, both directly and indirectly, helped the church of the west to understand the Word of God. In his posthumously published edition of Origen's works, Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466–1536) described Origen as 'an outstanding doctor of the church,' 'a chosen instrument preserved by the providence of God to bring the fullest advantage of the Catholic church.' Many contemporary theologians agree with Erasmus on this.

Bibliography

Primary sources

Origen

Baehrens, W. A. (ed.) (1921) Die Homilien zu Numberi, Josua und Judices. GCS 30. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Baehrens, W. A. (ed.) (1925) Homilieae in Regn., Ez., Canticum Canticorum et al. GCS 33. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Bruce, B. (trans.) (2002) Homilies on Joshua. FC 105. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Butterworth, G. W. (trans.) (1966) On First Principles. New York: Harper & Row.

Chadwick, H. (trans.) (1965) Contra Celsum. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Daly, R. J. (trans.) (1992) Treatise on the Passover and Dialogue of Origen with Heraclides. ACW 54. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist/Newman.

Greer, R. (ed.) (1979) Origen: An Exhortation to Martyrdom, Prayer, First Principles: Book IV, Prologue to the Commentary on the Song of Songs, Homily XXVII on Numbers. The Classics of Western Spirituality. New York: Paulist Press.

Hammond Bammel, C. P. (ed.) (1990–98) Origenes, Der Römerbriefkommentar des Origenes: Kritische Ausgabe der Übersetzung Rufins. 3 vols. Aus der Geschichte der Lateinischen Bibel 16, 33, 34. Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder.

Heine, R. E. (trans.) (1989) Commentary on the Gospel according John. FC 80, 89. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Heine, R. E. (2002). The Commentaries of Origen and Jerome on St Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Heither, T. (trans.) (1990–96) Origenes, Commentarii in epistulam ad Romanos / Römerbriefkommentar. 5 vols. Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder.

Koetschau, P. (ed.) (1899a) De Oratione. GCS 3: 297–403. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Koetschau, P. (ed.) (1899b) Exhortatio ad martyrium. GCS 3: 1–47. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Koetschau, P. (ed.) (1913) De principiis. GCS 22. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Lienhard, J. T. (trans.) (1996) Homilies on Luke; Fragments on Luke. FC 54. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2001) Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, Books 1–5. FC 103. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2002) Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, Books 6–10. FC 104. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2009) Homilies on Numbers. Ancient Christian Texts. Downers Grove, IL: Intervarsity Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2010) Homilies 1–14 on Ezekiel. ACW 62. New York: The Newman Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2015) Homilies 1–9 on Isaiah. In St. Jerome: Commentary on Isaiah; Origen: Homilies 1–9 on Isaiah. ACW 68. New York: The Newman Press.

Von Balthasar, H. U. (ed.) (1984). Origen, Spirit and Fire: A Thematic Anthology of His Writings. Trans. R. Daly. Washington, DC: Catholic University Press.

Other sources

Denzinger, H. (2010) Compendium of Creeds, Definitions, and Declarations on Matters of Faith and Morals. Eds Hünermann, P., Fastiggi, R. and Nash, A. E. 43rd ed. San Francisco, CA: Ignatius. [abbreviated DS]

Desiderius Erasmus (1988) Spiritualia: Enchiridion, De Contemptu Mundi, De Vidua Christiana. Ed. O'Malley, J. CWE 66. Toronto, ON: University of Toronto Press.

Halton, T. (trans.) (1999) St. Jerome: On Illustrious Men. FC 100. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2008) St. Jerome. Commentary on Matthew. FC 117. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2010a) St. Jerome's Commentaries on Galatians, Titus and Philemon. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Scheck, T. P. (trans.) (2010b) St. Pamphilus: Apology for Origen. Rufinus: On the Falsification of the Books of Origen. FC 120. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Slusser, M (trans.) (1998) St. Gregory Thaumaturgus: Life and Works. FC 98. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Williamson, G. A. (trans.) (1965, 1989) Eusebius: The History of the Church from Christ to Constantine. Rev. and ed. Louth, A. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin Books.

Secondary literature

Beyer Moser, M. (2005) Teacher of Holiness: The Holy Spirit in Origen's Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Cave, W. (1687) Apostolici: or, the History of the Lives, Acts, Deaths and Martyrdoms of Those who were Contemporary with, or Immediately Succeeded the Apostles, as Also the Most Eminent of the Primitive Fathers for the First Three Hundred Years, to Which is Added, a Chronology of the Three First Ages of the Church. London: Richard Chiswell.

Clark, E. (1992) The Origenist Controversy: The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Cocchini, F. (1979) Origene: Commento alla Lettera ai Romani. Annuncio Pasquale, Polemica antieretica. L'Aquila and Rome: Japadre Editore.

Cohen, J. (2005) 'The mystery of Israel's salvation: Romans 11:25–26 in Patristic and Medieval exegesis,' Harvard Theological Review 98(3): 247–281.

Courcelle, P. (1969) Late Latin Writers and their Greek Sources. Trans. H. E. Wedeck. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Crouzel, H. (1973) 'A Letter from Origen to "Friends in Alexandria",' in Neiman, D. and Schatkin, M. (eds) The Heritage of the Early Church: Essays in Honor of George Vasilievich Florovsky. Trans. J. D. Gauthier. Rome: Pontificio Istituo Orientale. 135–150.

Crouzel, H. (1988) 'Theological construction and research: Origen on free-will,' in Bauckham, R. and Drewery, B. (eds) Scripture, Tradition and Reason: A Study in the Criteria of Christian Doctrine. Essays in Honor of R. P. C. Hanson. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 239–265.

Crouzel, H. (1989) Origen: The Life and Thought of the First Great Theologian. Trans. A. S. Worrall. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Daley, B. (1998) 'Origen's De Principiis: A guide to the principles of Christian scriptural interpretation,' in Petruccione, J. (ed.) Nova et Vetera: Patristic Studies in Honor of Thomas Patrick Halton. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press, 3–21.

Daniélou, J. (1955) Origen. Trans. W. Mitchell. New York: Sheed and Ward.

De Lubac, H. (1996) Theology in History. Part One: The Light of Christ. Part Two: Disputed Questions and Resistance to Nazism. Trans. A. E. Nash. San Francisco, CA: Ignatius.

De Lubac, H. (1998) Medieval Exegesis. Vol. 1. The Four Senses of Scripture. Trans. M. Sebanc. (Originally published as Exégèse médiévale, 1 Les quatre sens de l'écriture, 1959.) Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

De Lubac, H. (2000) Medieval Exegesis. Vol. 2. The Four Senses of Scripture. Trans. E. M. Macierowski. (Originally published as Exégèse médiévale, 2 Les quatre sens de l'écriture, 1959.) Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

De Lubac, H. (2007) History and Spirit: The Understanding of Scripture According to Origen. Trans. A. E. Nash with Greek and Latin translation by J. Merriell of the Oratory. San Francisco, CA: Ignatius. [French original: Histoire et esprit: L'Intelligence de l'Ecriture d'après Origène, Paris: éditions Montaigne, 1950].

De Lubac, H. (2009) Medieval Exegesis. Vol. 3. The Four Senses of Scripture. Trans. E. M. Macierowski. (Originally published as Exégèse médiévale, 2 Les quatre sens de l'écriture, 1959.) Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Edwards, M. (2015) 'One Origen or two? The Status Quaestionis.' Symbolae Osloenses: Norwegian Journal of Greek and Latin Studies. Published online: 2 June 2015. http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/00397679.2015.1030249.

Fürst, A. (2009) 'Jerome keeping silent: Origen and his exegesis of Isaiah,' in Cain, A. and Lössl, J. (eds) Jerome of Stridon: His Life, Writings and Legacy. Burlington, VT: Ashgate, 141–152.

Hammond Bammel, C. (1985) Der Römerbrieftext des Rufin und seine Origenes-Übersetzung. Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder.

Godin, A. (1982a) Erasme lecteur d'Origène. Geneva: Librarie Droz.

Godin, A. (1982b) 'The Enchiridion Militis Christiani: The modes of an Origenian appropriation.' Trans. H. Gibaud. Erasmus of Rotterdam Society Yearbook 2. 47–79. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Grech, P. (1996) 'Justification by faith in Origen's commentary on Romans,' Augustinianum 36: 337–359.

Harnack, A. (1919) Der kirchengeschichtliche Ertrag der exegetischen Arbeiten des Origenes. Leipzig, Germany: Hinrichs.

Heine, R. (2010) Origen: Scholarship in the Service of the Church. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Heither, T. (1990) Translatio Religionis: Die Paulusdeutung des Origenes in seinem Kommentar zum Römerbrief. Cologne, Germany: Böhlau.

Humphries, M. (2008) 'Rufinus's Eusebius: Translation, continuation, and edition in the Latin ecclesiastical history,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 16(2): 143–164.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1975) Jerome: His Life, Writings, and Controversies. New York: Harper & Row.

Ledegang, F. (2001) Mysterium Ecclesiae: Images of the Church and Its Members in Origen. BETL 156. Leuven, Belgium: Leuven University Press.

Lienhard, J. T. (2000) 'Origen and the crisis of the Old Testament in the early church,' Pro Ecclesia 9(3): 355–366.

Martens, P. (2012) Origen and Scripture: The Contours of the Exegetical Life. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Martin, R. (2012) Will Many Be Saved? What Vatican II Actually Teaches and Its Implications for the New Evangelization. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

McGuckin, J. (ed.) (2004) The Westminster Handbook to Origen. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Murphy, F. X. (1945) Rufinus of Aquileia (345–411): His Life and Works. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Nautin, P. (1977) Origène, sa vie et son oeuvre. Paris: Beauchesne.

Norris, F. (2000) 'Origen,' in Esler, P. F. (ed.) The Early Christian World. 2 vols. New York: Routledge, vol. 2: 1005–1026.

Oulton, J. (1929) 'Rufinus's translation of the church history of Eusebius,' Journal of Theological Studies 30: 150–174.

Quasten, J. (1975) Patrology. 4 vols. Utrecht, The Netherlands and Antwerp, Belgium: Spectrum.

Ramelli, I. (2011) 'Origen's anti-subordinationism and its heritage in the Nicene and Cappadocian line,' Vigiliae Christianae 65: 21–49.

Reasoner, M. (2005) Romans in Full Circle: A History of Interpretation. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Rivière, J. (1909) The Doctrine of the Atonement: A Historical Essay. Trans. L. Cappadelta. 2 vols. St. Louis, MO: Herder, I: 157–167.

Rombs, R. (2007) 'A note on the status of Origen's De Principiis in English,' Vigiliae Christianae 61: 21–29.

Scheck, T. P. (2008) Origen and the History of Justification. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Scheck, T. P. (2013) 'Origen's interpretation of Romans,' in Cartwright, S. (ed.) A Companion to St. Paul in the Middle Ages. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 15–49.

Scheck, T. P. (2016) Erasmus's Life of Origen: A New Annotated Translation of the Prefaces to Erasmus of Rotterdam's Edition of Origen's Writings. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press.

Scott, M. S. M. (2010) 'Guarding the mysteries of salvation: The pastoral pedagogy of Origen's universalism,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 18(3): 347–368.

Sheridan, M. (2015) Language for God in Patristic Tradition: Wrestling with Biblical Anthropomorphism. Downers Grove, IL: Intervarsity.

Swete, H. B. (1914) An Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Verfaillie, C. (1926) La doctrine de la justification dans Origène d'après son commentaire de l'Épître aux Romains. Thèse de la Faculté de théologie catholique de l'Université de Strasbourg, France.

Westcott, B. F. (1887) 'Origenes,' in Smith, W. and Wace, H. (eds) A Dictionary of Christian Biography. 4 vols. London: John Murray, IV: 96–142.

Widdicombe, P. (2011) 'Origen,' in Westerholm, S. (ed.) The Blackwell Companion to Paul. Chichester, UK: Wiley-Blackwell, 316–329.

Wiles, M. F. (1967) The Divine Apostle: The Interpretation of St Paul's Epistles in the Early Church. Cambridge, UK: University Press.

Williams, R. (1993). 'Damnosa hereditas: Pamphilus's Apology and the Reputation of Origen,' in Brennecke, H. C., Grasmück, E. L. and Markschies, C. (eds) Logos: Festschrift für Luise Abramowski zum 8. Juli 1993. Berlin: De Gruyter, 151–169.

48

TERTULLIAN

Geoffrey D. Dunn

Life of Tertullian

Quintus Septimus Florens Tertullianus (Tertullian) was a North African Christian of the Severan age (Septimius Severus 193–211, Geta 209–211, and Caracalla 198–217) at the end of the second and beginning of the third centuries in Carthage. He is significant in that he is virtually the first and the most prolific Latin writing Christian in the pre-Nicene period, and someone who contributed enormously to Latin theological terminology. He was erudite, highly opinionated, polemical, zealous, and a rigorist verging on the extreme in his approach to Christian life and thought. His works give us tremendous insight into the struggles of a Christian community to understand itself both in relation to the world around it and its own scriptural heritage.

Scholarship on Tertullian received a fresh lease of life, particularly in the English-speaking world, with the 1971 publication of Timothy Barnes' revisionist biography. In particular, he challenged the information contained in Jerome's brief account in De uiris illustribus 53 that Tertullian was a presbyter, the son of a centurion, and left the church to join the Montanists, and in Eusebius' Historia ecclesiastica (2.2.4), where Tertullian is described as well-versed in Roman law and distinguished in Rome. Earlier scholars had wanted to identify Tertullian as the same person as the jurist mentioned in Justinian's Digesta. Barnes rejects these pieces of evidence. Tertullian recognized the church as composed of clerics and laity and in De exhortatione castitatis 12.2 identified himself as a lay person. Indeed, in De ieiunio 11.4 when he referred to all of us who are priests of God, his reference is obviously to the common priesthood of all Christians found in 1 Pet. 2:9.

In terms of Tertullian's legal background there is much confusion in popular literature about him. If we understand the word jurist to mean someone who was a legal scholar or legal theorist who offered jurisprudential commentary about the law, then there is no evidence that this was Tertullian's occupation. Eusebius' comments may derive simply from having read Tertullian's Apologeticum and coming to the conclusion that Tertullian was well read in terms of legal pronouncements about Christians. If we understand lawyer to mean someone who practised the law and appeared in courts on behalf of clients, then it has to be understood that no such profession existed as such in the Roman world. There certainly were men who acted in legal proceedings on behalf of clients, but they were not professional or full-time barristers, solicitors, or lawyers as we understand them today. They were simply highly educated individuals well trained in classical rhetoric, a large part of which centred on the skills required for speaking persuasively in a forensic setting about whether or not something had happened in the past; they did not require a specialist background in statutes and legislation.

Such men trained in the art of public speaking might never have practised as advocates, and those that did were engaged in many other aspects of the public life of leading citizens, so that describing them as lawyers or having legal training would be anachronistic (Rankin 1997).

It is clearly evident, as the work of Fredouille, Sider, and Dunn has demonstrated, that Tertullian was trained in classical rhetoric. This high level of education, what we may today term a tertiary education, was only available to those in the upper echelons of society. As such, Tertullian knew the canon of classical literature, as his writings frequently reveal. The fact that he had more than basic literacy was a rarity in society in general, and his education, social position, and ability must have made him a figure of quite some significance within the Carthaginian Christian community.

Further scanty information on Tertullian's life comes from comments gleaned from his writings. He had converted to Christianity at some point in his life, repentant at his past life (De paenitentia 1.1), but what actually triggered his conversion is not clear. He seems to have participated fully in the Roman way of life in Carthage, if we take his statement in De spectaculis 19.4 as acknowledgement that once (before conversion presumably) he had attended the various entertainments available like the arena, theatre, amphitheatre, and circus. His confession to adultery (De resurrectione mortuorum 59.4) must be taken as a reference to something that happened before he became Christian (given his views on reconciliation of sinful Christians). He was a married man, presumably married before his conversion since he confessed to adultery, and his wife was a Christian (Ad uxorem), but whether she was Christian before they married or converted at the same time as her husband (or at any other time) is not clear. He acknowledged his own impatience (De patientia 1.1).

Something must be said of Tertullian's Montanism. This movement, which may be characterized as prophetic, charismatic, lay-centred, spiritualist, ascetical, and puritanical, emerged from Asia Minor in the middle of the second century (see Chapter 43 of this work). Although named today after one of its three founders, Montanus (the other two, Prisca or Priscilla and Maximilla, were women), Tertullian referred to the movement as New Prophecy. At its heart was a belief that divine revelation through the spirit (more commonly referred to as the Paraclete in Montanist circles) continued after the New Testament. It would seem that Tertullian associated more and more with them as his life progressed. Tertullian refers in De anima 9.4 to a woman who, during the liturgy, was possessed by an ecstatic vision from the spirit, and who shared that vision with her fellow New Prophecy adherents at the conclusion of the liturgy when everyone else had departed. He asserts that such visions are examined to determine their veracity. It seems clear that at this time these Montanists were not schismatic, were not rejected completely by their fellow Christians, and afforded women a leadership role (something with which Tertullian had no problem). Such private revelation increasingly threatened the authority of Scripture in the church and the authority of clerical leadership. Tertullian would argue that it complemented the Scriptures and cleared up ambiguities. We know most about Montanism through the writings of Tertullian and it is difficult to determine the extent to which he has recast the movement to reflect its reality within North Africa or his own conception of it. The point to which many scholars have recently drawn attention (Rankin, Trevett, Tabbernee, Dunn, and Wilhite) is that Tertullian never left the church nor was expelled from it. Some have even questioned whether Montanism in Carthage was even a movement rather than just the alignment of Tertullian's own thinking with that of the New Prophecy proponents in the east (Wilhite 2013). The fact that Cyprian read him on a daily basis (Jerome, De uiris illustribus 68) would indicate that he was not regarded as a heretic. Indeed, the fact that the African church always had a rigorist leaning (as evidenced by Cyprian's initial position in the Christian reaction to the Decian religious revival, even allowing for the popularity of the laxist reaction, and in Donatism) perhaps suggests that African churches were more comfortable with Tertullian's even more extreme opinions than might have been the case elsewhere in the Mediterranean world. The Tertullianists whom Augustine condemned (De haer. 86) as being separatists from Montanism might have been inspired by some of Tertullian's teaching, but there is no evidence that Tertullian himself was responsible for founding such a group (Powell 1975; Tabbernee 2007: 267–8).

We do not know much about Christianity in North Africa in the time before Tertullian. The first evidence comes from Passio sanctorum Scillitanorum and then Passio sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis (see Figure 48.1). It reveals a Christianity that prized martyrdom highly. Carthage, refounded as a Roman colony towards the end of the republican period, had become the second largest city in the western Mediterranean. It preserved some of its Punic heritage in its completely remade Roman guise, and its commercial port was key for the transport of its vast agricultural and manufactured products being sent to sustain and support Rome. It had all the trappings of Roman life: a regular grid street pattern, baths near the sea, imperial administrative buildings atop the Byrsa hill, a forum, temples, an amphitheatre, circus (see Figure 48.2), theatre, and odeon, and a military port.

Figure 48.1 Remains of the Basilica Maiorum to the north of Carthage, regarded as burial location of Perpetua and Felicitas. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

Figure 48.2 Theatre in Carthage. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

It is likely that Christianity arrived in Carthage from a variety of places and that perhaps small communities distinguished by their indigenous language identities did not even know of each other's existence for quite some time and that the coalescing into a single community with a single bishop was a very slow process, but we cannot be sure (Telfer 1961; Dunn 2004: 14–15). Tertullian himself offers Rome as the source of Carthage's Christianity (De praescr. 36.1–3), but this was in the context of him needing to assert that the Carthaginian church followed the same regula as believed in apostolic churches like Corinth, Philippi, and Rome (Dunn 2001). There may well be an element of truth in Tertullian's claim, as there was the most frequent and constant trading connection between Carthage and Rome, but it need not be the entire story.

The researcher on Tertullian is greatly assisted by a number of valuable tools. One is G. Claesson (1974–5) Index Tertullianeus, 3 vols, Collection des Études Augustiniennes Série Antiquité 62–4, Paris, Études Augustiniennes. Another is the Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea found in Revue d'Études Augustiniennes et Patristiques, from 1975 onwards for Tertullian, with many of the annual reviews found in R. Braun et al. (1999) Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea 1975–1994. Bibliographie critique de la première littérature latine chrétienne, Collection des Études Augustiniennes Série Antiquité 157, Paris, Institut d'Études Augustiniennes. Finally there is the website www.tertullian.org.

Interpretation of Tertullian

An appreciation of Tertullian's rhetorical abilities is essential when it comes to interpreting his writing. There are a number of points to be made here. One is that across the thirty-one surviving works of Tertullian it is clear that his opinions are not always consistent. How is this to be explained? While it is true that in some instances he has changed his mind over time and it is generally acknowledged that as he grew older and became more and more influenced by Montanism his views became increasingly rigorist and hardline, in other instances Tertullian has not changed his mind and he was targeting his arguments towards his particular and varying audiences. Any good orator had the skills to be able to argue for or against a particular position, depending upon an opponent's position and the needs of a case. Thus, although establishing a chronological sequence for Tertullian's works is important and may help in tracking changes in Tertullian's thinking over time, just as important is to consider the intended readership of a particular work and the rhetorical tactics he employed.

The second point to make is that in seeking to persuade his readers to believe his point of view and adopt his recommendations, Tertullian was writing with some contrary opinion or suggestion in mind. He wrote principally because he had some opponent with whom to disagree. Thus, he was not writing some cool and dispassionate treatise in a systematic or comprehensive manner; he was engaged in combat seeking to refute the views that he rejected. If a belief or practice was not a point of contention, he did not need to discuss it. For this reason I tend to refer to Tertullian's works as pamphlets rather than treatises. While he dealt with theological topics, Tertullian was primarily an apologist, polemicist, or even pugilist. He used his rhetoric to win arguments. Although one would hesitate to say that Tertullian lied to win or that he was a relativist, he was capable of downplaying certain inconvenient facts in any particular argument, depending on his opponent and his readers. As a champion of Christianity, he is not alone in having presented his case this way, either in antiquity or more modern times.

Thus, Evans has argued persuasively that when he was writing to imperial authorities seeking to persuade them to stop persecuting Christians, Tertullian could offer some positive arguments about the nature and role of the empire and Christian participation within it. For example, against the charges that Christians were cannibals, murderers and atheists, Tertullian could argue that they participated fully in the life of the empire, even being found serving in the military. In works like De corona militis, written for internal consumption only, Tertullian argued that Christians ought not to serve in the army (Dunn 2015), and in pamphlets like De idolatria and De spectaculis he argued that Christians needed to distance themselves from the pagan world around them and stay away from anything, including entertainment, that smacked of the worship of idols. Even though Tertullian wanted the empire to stop persecuting, he encouraged Christians to embrace martyrdom (Ad martyras and De fuga in persecutione) (Moss 2013). It was not that Tertullian had changed his mind on these questions, but that he presented those arguments likely to be the most persuasive to different audiences. If that meant that in order to save the lives of Christians from provincial persecution he had to hold back his own feelings, then he was prepared to do so.

When it comes to the interpretation of Scripture, the key source material for Tertullian in the construction of arguments against heretics or more moderate Christian opponents, this same point about Tertullian's rhetorical skill needs to be emphasized. While an older generation of scholars attempted unsuccessfully to find a single method of interpretation at work in Tertullian (Hanson, O'Malley, and Waszink), a better approach is to realize that Tertullian used whatever method suited his polemical and rhetorical purposes (Dunn 2006). Thus, if an opponent interpreted a passage allegorically or typologically, Tertullian would argue that it needed to be understood literally, while if the opponent argued for a literal reading, Tertullian would argue for a spiritual one. Sometimes he would appeal to the historical context of a passage to defend his own interpretation, and sometimes he would limit the relevance of a passage by insisting it was only relevant to its own historical context. He had the skills to make of a piece of evidence what he needed it to be.

Does this make Tertullian a relativist with no fixed beliefs? Not at all. His beliefs are revealed in the partitio or propositio, the position he takes in an argument. It was with the building blocks of arguments to support that thesis where he could be more flexible. The question of the correct interpretation of Scripture was central for Tertullian. The pamphlet in which we find the best exposition is De praescriptione haereticorum, in which Tertullian argues that because heretics are not Christian (for him, by definition, a Christian must only refer to one with correct belief), they have no right to argue from Scripture. How can one know if a particular interpretation or exegesis of a particular scriptural passage is correct or not? Tertullian's basic position is that of context: a correct reading of a particular passage is the one that aligns with the overall thrust of revelation. This revelation is what Tertullian terms the regula fidei ('rule of faith') (Countryman 1982; Ferguson 2013). It was taught by Christ, handed on by the apostles, recorded in Scripture, and lived in the church (De praescr. 13.6; 19.3; and 20.9). The regula is the Tradition by which any individual Christian claim or interpretation can be assessed and evaluated. We must not place Tertullian into a Reformation polemic that opposes Scripture (written revelation) with Tradition as unwritten revelation. Tradition is all revelation, written and unwritten, in such a way that the lived experience of Christian life must align with the privileged record in Scripture, and where any one passage of Scripture must be interpreted in the light of the totality of Scripture or the regula more generally as a whole (De praescr. 15–19). The task of being Christian was to embrace not question that regula. Here we find one of Tertullian's pithy and clever sayings: to know nothing against the regula is to know everything (De praescr. 14.5).

Tertullian's writing style in terms of the presentation and unfolding of arguments is frequently dense, concise, and obscure. It seems sometimes as though his mind is so much faster than his stylus that parts of his thought process never manage to get written down; his syllogisms often lack one of the necessary premises. He is often sarcastic and is possessed of a biting intellect and wit, inclined to ridicule, attracted to aphorism and a nice turn of phrase, more intent to dazzle his readers with his erudition than convince them to accept his argument. He often makes his point through exaggeration and overstatement rather than subtle logic. One wonders if much of what he wrote went over the heads of those who read or heard his works.

Tertullian and the world around him

We find Tertullian engaging with the world around him both directly in pamphlets written to provincial authorities (Ad nationes, Apologeticum, Ad Scapulam, and De testimonio animae) and indirectly in pamphlets written to fellow Christians about how they should engage with that world (De idololatria, De spectaculis, De corona militis, De pallio, Ad martyras, and De fuga in persecutione) or with non-Christian others like Jews (Aduersus Iudaeos).

A work like Apologeticum is well-known because it has been of some interest to ancient historians. It incorporated and expanded much of the material found in Ad nationes. It is a forensic defence (adopting Swift against Keresztes) of Christianity before Roman provincial administrators against the charges that justified the persecution of Christians (see Figure 48.3). Whether or not any non-Christian official ever read it is not known; no doubt Christians who read it could take some comfort that no matter how much they suffered they were in the right. It opens with a plea for a fair trial (Apol. 1–3): if Christians are to be condemned it must be for being proven guilty of an actual crime as other criminals are and not simply because of an ignorant and prejudicial association of guilt with the fact of being Christian. Not only are Christians innocent of the charges of infanticide, cannibalism, and incest, Tertullian wanted to prove that pagans were the ones guilty of such abominations (Apol. 7–9). With regard to charges of atheism and sacrilege (Apol. 10–28) and treason (Apol. 29–45), Tertullian admitted the charges but used qualitative arguments to justify Christian practice: pagan gods did not exist and so therefore could not be worshipped, and Christians did not offer sacrifice to idols for the emperor but did pray to God for his safety and contributed to the defence of the empire. Christianity was not a separatist sect but an integral part of their neighbourhoods.

Ad Scapulam, written in 212–213 to the local African proconsul Scapula took a more deliberative line: it argued that the provincial government needed to put an end to its sporadic outbursts of persecution (Waszink 1959; Dunn 2002). Christian prayers restrained the wrath of God against a wicked society, and Christians themselves were a harmless element in society. Governors who targeted Christians usually met a sticky end; Tertullian was not adverse to offering an argument for self-preservation if it would do the trick. With intentional cheek Tertullian suggested that the best way to protect himself was for Scapula to become a Christian.

In De testimonio animae, Tertullian cross-examines the human soul as a reliable witness to prove the basic truths of Christianity as known by all people, Christian and non-Christian alike, despite whatever philosophy a non-Christian might have learnt. Tertullian emphasizes a kind of natural revelation provided by the soul. It points to the fact that God is one, good, and just and that there is life after death where the soul will be reunited with the body. It is here we find Tertullian's statement that a Christian is made, not born as one (De test. 1.7), which he makes in order to show that the soul is not a biased witness in his favour.

So much for Tertullian's ostensible direct dealings with non-Christians. What did he say to his fellow Christians about how they should interact with that non-Christian world in which they lived?

Figure 48.3   Model of the Roman administrative complex on Byrsa Hill, Byrsa Museum, Carthage. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

The picture is rather different from what we find in Apologeticum. Tertullian warned his co-religionists in De idololatria that the world was full of idolatry and that as Christians they needed to avoid such threats to their faith. Almost every aspect of life had a religious dimension to it, and since idolatry was a sin of denying the one true God, Christians needed to disengage from the world around them as much as possible and not be seen in accepting the existence of false gods in any way. This extended to entertainment, which, in addition to being cruel, lewd, and profane, acknowledged the existence of a false religious disposition (De spectaculis). It also applied to the wearing of military crowns awarded to soldiers for gallantry, valour, or even loyalty. Not only was the wearing of such decorations a participation in idolatry, but it conflicted with the Christian calling to be non-violent. Being a soldier was incompatible with the Christian vocation (only being permissible for those who were solders before becoming Christian) (De corona militis; Rordorf 1969; Dunn 2015). If such an opting out of normal life as Tertullian advocated brought the Christian to the attention of the authorities, so much the better. This would give them the opportunity to witness to their faith by their refusal to compromise with the idolatry of everyday life. They were not to avoid the opportunity and test persecution presented. If this resulted in imprisonment or even execution, this was the ultimate reward for the Christian, as Ad martyras and De fuga in persecutione advocate. Christianity was not an easy option as Tertullian saw it, but one that demanded total commitment.

Figure 48.4　Statue of man wearing toga, Archaeological Museum Théo Desplans, Vaison-la-Romaine, France. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

In De pallio, Tertullian ostensibly praises the Greek pallium as the philosopher's garb over the Roman toga, while at the same time seeking to persuade his fellow Christians to adopt it (see Figure 48.4). Is this pamphlet, replete with reference to the classical canon and devoid of Scripture, for a Christian or non-Christian readership? Is it an example of his rejection of a Roman ethnic identity in favour of an African one (Wilhite 2007) or a Christian one? It is very much at home as a type of Second Sophistic piece of rhetoric in which Tertullian revels in his non-Christian learning. Is this a piece that offers a gendered piece of reasoning casting a new way to envisage Christian masculinity distinct from a Greek or even Roman feminism (Daniel-Hughes 2011)? Somehow the pallium is indicative of a superior Christian moral life and reveals the inner self.

Controversy has surrounded Aduersus Iudaeos with many scholars rejecting its attribution to Tertullian, or at least the attribution of the second half to him. Much of the argument there is also to be found in book four of Aduersus Marcionem, and the claim has been that someone plagiarized the material from the latter to add to an incomplete work of Tertullian's or else composed the whole thing as though it were Tertullian's. A recent investigation of the pamphlet from a rhetorical perspective (Dunn 2008) argues that the whole work has an integrity and coheres sufficiently to Tertullian's style as to warrant the attribution of the entire work to him, though as an unrevised draft. It is a piece of supersessionist literature arguing that God's covenant with the Jews has been replaced by the new covenant established in Jesus, a new covenant that was foretold in the old in terms of a new law, a new sacrifice, a new temple, a new Sabbath, and a new circumcision. This pamphlet is not a dialogue with a Jew, as many other anti-Judaic examples like Justin Martyr's was, but the revision of a failed dialogue as a kind of template for Christians to use in their own encounters and debates with Jews, presenting the Christian perspective. In book four of Aduersus Marcionem, Tertullian was not concerned to prove Judaism wrong, but to prove against Marcion that Christianity has emerged from and fulfilled Judaism rather than appearing unannounced (Dunn 2013).

Tertullian and heretics

Quite a number of Tertullian pamphlets are directed against heretics: Christians who taught such a twisted and perverted version of Christianity that they could no longer be considered Christian (Aduersus Marcionem, De praescriptione haereticorum, Aduersus Hermogenem, Aduersus Valentinianos, Aduersus Praxean, Scorpiace, De carne Christi, De resurrectione mortuorum, and De anima).

The five books of Aduersus Marcionem make it his largest composition by far. It was revised three times over the course of more than a decade. Montanist references must have been inserted late in the revision process and are not indicative of the whole work being written late in Tertullian's literary career. Marcion has recently received close attention from Judith Lieu, who presents him as a distinctive and creative figure within second-century Christianity (2015). Marcion was a dualist from Asia (and whether or not he was Gnostic is something still debated among scholars – see Gager – with Barnes for one rejecting some identification) who lived a couple of generations before Tertullian. He rejected the Hebrew Scriptures for presenting a picture of God as being vengeful and judgmental in contrast with the loving God revealed by Jesus. For him the God of the Hebrew Scriptures was a lesser god (a demiurge) who was responsible for the creation of the world, and the supreme God revealed by Jesus was previously unknown and is unknowable. It would seem that for Marcion, Jesus was docetic (only appearing to have a human nature) and that there was no resurrection of the flesh. When it came to the New Testament itself, Marcion would only accept as canonical a modified version of Luke and a number of the Pauline letters, largely because the other texts were too dependent upon a Jewish heritage. The question of the relationship between the Old and New Testaments was an important one for Christians to consider and Marcion's teaching made them do just that. Indeed, it remains important today when we find some Christian fundamentalists (at the opposite extreme to Marcion) preaching from the Old Testament as though it was of equal standing with the New.

In response to Marcion, Tertullian wanted to show that there is only one god and that the creator god is one and the same as the Father of Jesus and that the latter is not some previously unknown deity. Further, he wanted to show that the Jesus who came was precisely the messiah as promised by the creator god of the Hebrew Scriptures. In book one Tertullian deals with the question of the existence of Marcion's second god. Of course the god who is Father of Jesus exists but only as the same singular supreme deity who created the world and operated in the lives of the Jewish people. Tertullian offers rhetorical arguments from definition (Adu. Marc. 1.3–7), person and action (Adu. Marc. 1.8–21), and character or quality (Adu. Marc. 1.22–29) to show this. Marcion's supreme god cannot be God. In book two Tertullian shifted focus, to show that the creator god was indeed God, fulfilling all the conditions one would expect of a true deity. Book three links the prophecies of the Old Testament with their fulfilment in the person of Jesus (while at the same time Tertullian could be as critical of the Jews for failing to appreciate the fulfilment of these prophecies as he was of Marcion for refusing to accept that he had been prophesied). In books four and five Tertullian examines Marcion's mutilated gospel and letters to show that even here there still is a link between Jesus and Old Testament prophecy (Cooper 2013). Of course, one could turn some of these arguments back against Tertullian, arguing that he made Old Testament prophecy fit in with the life of Jesus, rather than actually showing that Jesus fits the prophecies.

We have already considered De praescriptione haereticorum in some detail above. Suffice it here to say that although Tertullian said that heretics (and he refers in particular to Marcion, Valentinus, and Apelles) had no right to argue using the Scriptures and that this made all their posturing invalid and not worth listening to, this did not stop him from then engaging in argument with them anyway. Even by the end of writing this pamphlet Tertullian realized that it was insufficient (De praescr. 44.14) and that he would need to write more detailed rebuttals against individual heretics.

Here I want to refer to one of the famous passages from this pamphlet (De praescr. 7.9): 'What has Athens in common with Jerusalem? What has the academy in common with the church? What have heretics in common with Christians?' Many interpreters have taken this as a simple rejection of philosophy (Athens) in favour of revelation (Jerusalem). In the context of arguing against heretics who appealed to the wisdom of the world (philosophy), Tertullian needed to downplay the relevance of philosophy. Human wisdom often failed to discern the truth that is contained in revelation. Tertullian's focus was not on philosophy itself but the heretics who made use of it in the form of Gnosticism. In line with the overall argument of the pamphlet, Tertullian's position was not that one needed philosophy to search after eternal and metaphysical truths; they had been provided already in the regula. What one needed was faith to accept what God had revealed (Osborn 1997). Philosophy could be helpful in explaining or defending such truth rather than in finding it. In other places, Tertullian appealed to natural reason (much as Paul did in Rom. 2:12–16) as being (at least sometimes) able to grasp the mysteries of God. Even if he did not allude often to it, it is clear sentence after sentence in his massive output that Tertullian knew and could use philosophical insight and reasoning if it helped his case. Indeed, in De praescr. 7.6 Tertullian criticized those who used Aristotelian dialectic to create clever arguments, which is just what he did at almost every opportunity! This is certainly an occasion where one should not take Tertullian at face value.

Possibly like Marcion, Hermogenes, a contemporary of Tertullian who might have lived in Carthage, postulated a dualistic divinity (Waszink 1955; Hiltbrunner 1956). However, it was not an Old Testament and a New Testament god for Hermogenes but God and pre-existent, uncreated matter out of which God fashioned the universe that formed the pairing. In Aduersus Hermogenem and the non-extant De censu animae Aduersus Hermogenem Tertullian argued that if matter were eternal it really would be a second god. Hermogenes, following Platonism and his own interpretation of Scripture, could not accept God creating ex nihilo since that would make God the author of evil and, since God is Lord, God needed to be lord of something from eternity. To preserve the oneness of God Tertullian asserts creation ex nihilo. He also has to assert that God must be responsible for the creation of evil as much as God is responsible for the creation of good (Adu. Herm. 16) but pointing out the inconsistencies in Hermogenes' reasoning.

De anima was also composed to confront Hermogenes. In the lost De censu animae Aduersus Hermogenem Tertullian had discussed the origins of the soul. Here he discussed the nature of the soul (Leal 2001). He was much influenced by Stoic concepts, as by his reading of Scripture and Montanist prophecy, and rejected Platonic ones, such as the idea that the soul is eternal and incorporeal. For Tertullian the soul is corporeal (but invisible), having its own type of body. Tertullian distinguished corporeality from materiality. It is not made from pre-existent matter as Hermogenes argued but is created at the same time as the flesh of the human person, such that flesh and soul derive from one's parents (traducianism) rather than being a new creation of God (creationism). The soul is the animating force of the flesh. The latter is the prevailing Christian view today, but different from the Platonic view of the eternal creation of all souls. It is the traducian view that enabled Tertullian to assert original sin as something deriving from Adam and not directly from God. While the soul is immortal (as distinct from eternal) and separates from the flesh at death – although traducianism does not explain how the soul can have immortality or any divine link, which has to come from a distinction between instrumental and efficient causes – they will be reunited.

Praxeas, like Sabellius, defending the oneness of God, had ended up so asserting the monarchia of God that the persons of the Trinity were modes of existence or guises of God who sometimes acted as Father, at other times as Son, and at other times as Spirit (Verhoeven 1951). In other words, in order not to separate God into three, thinkers like Praxeas denied any distinction within the Godhead. This modalist monarchianism is known as patripassianism, since, following Tertullian's rebuttal, thinkers like Praxeas ended up with the Father becoming incarnate and suffering on the cross, even though he admits that Praxeas tried to avoid this position. The problem was not with the idea of God suffering, but with the idea of the Father suffering. His response was that God is a trinity of persons, where unity is asserted on the level of substance, and distinction is asserted on the level of persons active in the divine economy. It is here that Tertullian contributed Latin terms such as substantia, persona, and trinitas to western Christian theology. The pamphlet also contains christological statements that we cannot accept Jesus is flesh and Christ is spirit, neither that humanity and divinity mixed to create a third reality, but that in the one person of the incarnate Son divine and human substances co-exist. Some have seen Praxeas as a pseudonym, possibly for Callistus, bishop of Rome (217–22) (Brent 1995: 525–35).

In Aduersus Valentinianos, Tertullian took issue with Valentinus, an Egyptian Gnostic who had ended up in Rome, and his followers for their Pythagorean cosmology. We know much more about their system of belief, which seemed to differ between east and west, since the discovery of Valentinian texts at Nag Hammadi (Thomassen 2008). Not only did Tertullian take issue with them, but he was following in the footsteps of Irenaeus who devoted much energy to combatting this heretical sect. This complicated system posits a series of divine emanations (the aeons) constituting the pleroma, the highest of whom is the unknowable God and one of whom, Sophia or Wisdom, who was ejected from the pleroma and was the mother of the Demiurge who created the world. In the world people contained a divine spark or spiritual seed (pneuma) trapped within matter, and the task for salvation was to free the spirit from its entrapment in matter, which could only be achieved through secret knowledge (gnosis) and a sinless existence based on that knowledge, which was passed on by Jesus who is distinct from the Son of the unknowable god. Tertullian did not so much argue with this Gnosticism as ridicule its complicated mythology, since the Valentinians held that their gnosis was not subject to rational understanding.

Scorpiace addressed for Christian readers the heretical belief that martyrdom was pointless. This idea, coming from the Valentinians, Tertullian describes as poison, like that from a scorpion (see Figure 48.5). For him, martyrdom is good because it is willed by God and is a consequence of resisting idolatry (Dunn 2004).

Tertullian also addressed docetic opinions that held that Jesus only seemed (in Greek dokei means 'he/she/it seems') to have human flesh. For Tertullian unless the flesh of Christ were real there was no possibility for human salvation and he devoted what amounts to a two-part pamphlet (De carne Christi and De resurrectione mortuorum) as his defence. Tertullian's targets were Marcion (De carn. 1–5), Apelles (De carn. 6–9), and Valentinus (De carn. 10–16). Tertullian sought to demonstrate that Jesus' body or flesh was real, earthly, and human (Otten 1997; Dunn 2007). The purpose of establishing the true human flesh of Jesus was because of what that meant for the rest of human flesh: the possibility of resurrection and salvation, which is what we find discussed in De resurrectione mortuorum (Sider 1969). Tertullian could point to Pythagoras, Empedocles, and Plato who all believed in some kind of life after death. The Scriptures too, in both testaments, point to the resurrection of the flesh provided that one does not try to allegorize the passages away. The revelation of the spirit in his own time has made clear how the Scriptures are to be interpreted correctly on this point.

It is in De carne Christi that we find another of Tertullian's well-known but perhaps frequently misinterpreted statements. The Son of God truly died in the flesh and rose again. Without this there is no Christian faith at all. Tertullian is not ashamed of what appears on the surface to be shameful: the Son of God died. It is credible because it is improbable (credibile est quia ineptum). He rose again. It is certain because it is impossible (certum est, quia impossibile) (De carn. 5.4). He did not write credo quia absurdum. He was not opposing faith with reason and opting for the former over the latter. The paradox is only apparent, not real (Décarie 1961; Osborn 1997). It is a rhetorical claim (much as we find in Aristotle, Rh. 2.23, 2400a5, although Osborn 1997: 53–4 finds it limited) that continues to be employed and believed in all kinds of circumstances today, when we find people asserting that something is so crazy it just may work, or that something has to be true because you cannot make this stuff up. Tertullian's position is that if Christians were making up their religion and wanted to win non-Christian adherents, they would have made up a story relatively easy to accept. The story of the Son of God taking on flesh, dying, and rising again is unlikely to be believed and is therefore more likely to be true. It is a form of argument commonly used and accepted; it is not an admission of fideism.

Figure 48.5   Mosaic of scorpion in Bardo Museum, Tunis. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

Tertullian and Christian practice

The remainder of Tertullian's pamphlets were directed to his fellow Christians, whose commitment to their faith in action was not as rigorous and fanatical as his own (De cultu feminarum, De uirginibus uelandis, De baptismo, De oratione, De paenitentia, De pudicitia, De patientia, Ad uxorem, De exhortatione castitatis, De monogamia, and De ieiunio). In some of these pamphlets, we shall notice a chronological hardening of attitudes over time as Tertullian gave full vent to his rigorist views. Within his sights were those Christians whose living of Christianity was not as fervent and zealous as his own.

Several of his works turned attention specifically to women. Since their world was more the domestic than the public sphere, I am considering them here. In part they were shaped in reaction to the world around him, but at their heart they do have an internal focus. In book two of De cultu feminarum, written first, Tertullian advised women to dress modestly and not surrender to vanity; it was a waste and promoted lust (see Figure 48.6). In the later book one, there is a more strident tone. It is here that Tertullian refers to women as the gateway of the devil (De cult. 1.1.1), just as Eve was, a statement that has drawn particular attention from modern feminist scholars, although such negativity is not the extent of Tertullian's evaluation of women (Turcan 1971, 1990; Forrester Church 1975; Daniel-Hughes 2011; Clark 2013). In the first book Tertullian also defended the notion that Enoch ought to be counted as a scriptural text.

In the two books of Ad uxorem, Tertullian advised his Christian wife in the first book not to remarry after his death and, in the second, to marry only another Christian if she had to remarry at all. Tertullian's ideas here were not his own, but came directly from Paul, particularly 1 Corinthians 7. Widowhood and celibacy were a better option than second marriage. Although the work ends with a great praise of the equality, unity, and beauty of the marriage partnership (Ad ux. 2.8), it is clear that he was restricting himself to a consideration of how it centred on the shared faith of a Christian couple. In De exhortatione castitatis Tertullian urged a Christian widower not to remarry after the recent death of his wife. Although it was permissible, it was an indulgence by God (De exhort. 3) and not an expression of the divine will, which is found in 1 Cor. 7:27. The practice found in the Hebrew Scriptures has been replaced with that found in the New Testament. Marriage itself flows from desire, which is sinful. The widower would be better living a life of continence. In the even later De monogamia, Tertullian rejected remarriage as serial polygamy.

Figure 48.6   The Lady of Carthage mosaic, Byrsa Museum, Carthage. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

In De oration, Tertullian examines the Lord's Prayer (De orat. 1–9) in order to make commentary about how a Christian ought to pray (De orat. 10–19, 23–9), particularly for the end of the world (in contrast with what he wrote in Apologeticum). For a Christian to pray effectively, they must be in a state of internal purity. Then the work deviates into a consideration of whether or not virgins are required to be veiled when in church (De orat. 20–2). 1 Corinthians 11 had demanded that women be veiled, and the argument was put that female virgins no matter what their age were not women, because 'woman' was understood to mean a married female. In De uirginibus uelandis, Tertullian revisited this question of the veiling of virgins and was insistent that from the time of puberty all Christian females needed to be veiled (Dunn 2004, 2005) (see Figure 48.7).

Figure 48.7   Statue of a veiled woman, Vatican Museum, Vatican City. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

Although in a pamphlet like De corona militis Tertullian could praise custom, in this work he condemned it, because the custom of mature virgins not being veiled, thinking that they were exempt, was one he rejected. For Tertullian the female virgins he referred to included anyone who was simply unmarried, but there is a sense that he had particular interest in those who had made some kind of vow to preserve their virginity. There is no doubt that Tertullian, even though his Montanist inclinations afforded women prophetic roles within the community (but, along with the rest of the church, denied them formal sacerdotal roles), shares with others of his time a view of women as second-class; but, given his personality, these views are expressed in a more extreme manner when compared with others.

De baptismo was written to refute a heretical woman (possibly a Marcionite or a Gnostic) who believed that baptism was unnecessary. Tertullian wrote to catechumens to insist on the necessity of baptism (see Figure 48.8). Like De oration, it shows no influence of Montanist thinking. Previously, Tertullian had written in Greek on why heretical baptism was insufficient for salvation. Here, Tertullian discussed the appropriateness of God's choice of water for initiation and the forgiveness of sins (De bapt. 1–9), two particular questions about the nature of John's baptism, which was about repentance rather than forgiveness or the imparting of the spirit, and the salvation of the apostles, since they did not seem to have been baptized (De bapt. 10–16), and practical considerations about the celebration of baptism (De bapt. 17–20).

Figure 48.8   Sixth-century basilica with attached baptistery, Carthage. Photo Geoffrey Dunn

In De paenitentia, Tertullian addressed the question of the forgiveness of post-baptismal sin. Tertullian was worried that too easy a process of reconciliation would mean that people would not take the baptismal promise to turn away from sin seriously enough. Tepid Christianity was his major concern. In baptism all sins were forgiven, yet baptism was not to be celebrated too readily – a person must have manifested growth in conversion so that there was a well-founded belief that they would persevere in living out their baptismal promises – yet it must not be put off too long in the false belief that one could go on sinning in the meantime. Yet, for those who did sin after baptism Tertullian did allow one opportunity for reconciliation for those who had manifested suitable repentance. In De pudicitia, in response to a bishop who saw himself as pontifex maximus or bishop of bishops (De pud. 1.6) – and unlike Brent, I would follow Barnes in seeing this as the bishop of Carthage not Rome – with the power to forgive all sins, even adultery and fornication, Tertullian argued that the single post-baptismal forgiveness that could be ritualized only applied to minor, not major, sins. It was to be left to God to judge how much a major sinner repented and to offer forgiveness; for the church to do so would be to risk its purity and integrity.

Bibliography

Primary sources

Braun, R. and Moreschini, C. (1991–2004) Tertullien. Contre Marcion, Sources Chrétiennes 365, 368, 399, 456, and 483. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Chapot, F. (1999) Tertullien. Contre Hermogène, Sources Chrétiennes 439. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Dekkers, E. et al. (1954) Quinti Septimi Florentis Tertulliani opera, 2 vols, CCL 1 and 2. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Fredouille, J.-C. (1980–1981) Tertullien. Contre les valentiniens, Sources Chrétiennes 280 and 281. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Fredouille, J.-C. (1984) Tertullien. De la patience, Sources Chrétiennes 310. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Le Saint, W. P. (1951) Tertullian: Treatises on Marriage and Remarriage: To his Wife, An Exhortation to Chastity, Monogamy, Ancient Christian Writers 13. New York: Newman Press.

Le Saint, W. P. (1959) Tertullian: Treatises on Penance: On Penitence and On Purity, Ancient Christian Writers 28. New York: Newman Press.

Mahé, J. P. (1975) Tertullien. La Chair du Christ, Sources Chrétiennes 216 and 217. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Mattei, P. (1988) Tertullien. Le Mariage unique, Sources Chrétiennes 343. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Mattei, P. and Schulz-Flugel, E. (1997) Tertullien. Le Voile des vierges, Sources Chrétiennes 424. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Micaelli, C. and Munier, C. (1993) Tertullien. Le Pudicité, Sources Chrétiennes 394 and 395. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Moreschini, C. and Fredouille, J.-C. (1985) Tertullien. Exhortation à la chasteté, Sources Chrétiennes 319. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Munier, C. (1980) Tertullien. Á son épouse, Sources Chrétiennes 273. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Munier, C. (1984) Tertullien. La Pénitence, Sources Chrétiennes 316. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Refoulé, R.-F. and De Labriolle, P. (1957) Tertullien. De la prescription contre les hérétiques, Sources Chrétiennes 46. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Refoulé, R.-F. and Drouzy, M. (2002) Tertullien. Traité du baptême, Sources Chrétiennes 35. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Turcan, M. (1971) Tertullien. La Toilette des femmes, Sources Chrétiennes 173. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Turcan, M. (1986) Tertullien. Les Spectacles, Sources Chrétiennes 332. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Turcan, M. (2007) Tertullien. Le Manteau, Sources Chrétiennes 513. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Waszink, J. H. (1956) Tertullian: The Treatise against Hermogenes, Ancient Christian Writers 24. New York: Newman Press.

Secondary sources

Barnes, T. D. (1971, 1985) Tertullian: A Historical and Literary Study. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Brent, A. (1995) Hippolytus and the Roman Church in the Third Century: Communities in Tension before the Emergence of a Monarch-Bishop, Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 31. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Clark, E. A. (2013) 'Status feminae: Tertullian and the uses of Paul', in Still, T. D. and Wilhite, D. E. (eds) Tertullian and Paul, Pauline and Patristic Scholars in Debate 1. London and New York: Bloomsbury, 127–55.

Cooper, S. (2013) 'Commus magister Paulus: Altercation over the gospel in Tertullian's Against Marcion', in Still, T. D. and Wilhite, D. E. (eds) Tertullian and Paul, Pauline and Patristic Scholars in Debate 1. London and New York: Bloomsbury, 224–46.

Countryman, L. W. (1982) 'Tertullian and the Regula Fidei', The Second Century 2: 208–27.

Daly, C. B. (1993) Tertullian the Puritan and His Influence. Dublin: Four Courts Press.

Daniel-Hughes, C. (2011) The Salvation of the Flesh in Tertullian of Carthage: Dressing for the Resurrection. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Décarie, V. (1961) 'Le Paradoxe de Tertullien', Vigiliae Christianae 15: 23–31.

Dunn, G. D. (2001) 'Peter and Paul in Rome: The perspective of the north African church', in Pietro e Paolo: Il loro rapporto con Roma nelle testimonianze antiche (xxix Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma 4–6 maggio 2000), Studia Ephemeridis Augustinianum 74. Rome: Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, 405–13.

Dunn, G. D. (2002) 'Rhetorical structure in Tertullian's Ad Scapulam', Vigiliae Christianae 56: 47–55.

Dunn, G. D. (2004) Tertullian. The Early Church Fathers. London and New York: Routledge.

Dunn, G. D. (2005) 'Rhetoric and Tertullian's de Virginibus Velandis', Vigiliae Christianae 59: 1–30.

Dunn, G. D. (2006) 'Tertullian's scriptural exegesis in de praescriptione haereticorum', Journal of Early Christian Studies 14: 141–55.

Dunn, G. D. (2007) 'Mary's virginity in partu and Tertullian's anti-Docetism reconsidered', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 58: 467–84.

Dunn, G. D. (2008) Tertullian's Aduersus Iudaeos: A Rhetorical Analysis, Patristic Monograph Series 19. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Dunn, G. D. (2013) 'Tertullian, Paul, and the nation of Israel', in Still, T. D. and Wilhite, D. E. (eds) Tertullian and Paul, Pauline and Patristic Scholars in Debate 1. London and New York: Bloomsbury, 79–97.

Dunn, G. D. (2015) 'Tertullian and military service: The scriptural arguments in De corona', in Meconi, D. V. (ed.) Sacred Scripture and Secular Struggles. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 87–103.

Evans, R. F. (1976) 'On the problem of church and empire in Tertullian's Apologeticum', in Livingstone, E. A. (ed.) Studia Patristica 14, Papers presented at the sixth International Conference on Patristic Studies, Oxford 1971, Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 117. Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 21–36.

Ferguson, E. (2013) 'Tertullian, scripture, rule of faith, and Paul', in Still, T. D. and Wilhite, D. E. (eds) Tertullian and Paul, Pauline and Patristic Scholars in Debate 1. London and New York: Bloomsbury, 22–33.

Forrester Church, F. (1975) 'Sex and salvation in Tertullian', Harvard Theological Review 68: 83–101.

Fredouille, J.-C. (1972) Tertullien et la conversion de la culture antique, Collection d'Études Augustiniennes Antiquité 47. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

Gager, J. G. (1972) 'Marcion and philosophy', Vigiliae Christianae 26: 53–9.

Hanson, R. P. C. (1961), 'Notes on Tertullian's interpretation of scripture', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 22: 273–9.

Hiltbrunner, O. (1956) 'Der Schluss von Tertullian's Schrift gegen Hermogenes', Vigiliae Christianae 10: 215–28.

Hunink, V. (ed.) (2005) Tertullian. De pallio. Amsterdam: J.C. Gieben.

Keresztes, P. (1966) 'Tertullian's Apologeticus: A historical and literary study', Latomus 25: 124–33.

Leal, J. (2001) La antropología de Tertuliano. Estudio de los tratados polémicos de los años 207–212 d.C., Studia Ephemeridis Augustinianum 76. Rome: Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum.

Lieu, J. (2015) Marcion and the Making of a Heretic: God and Scripture in the Second Century. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

McKechnie, P. (1992) 'Tertullian's De pallio and life in Roman Carthage', Prudentia 24: 44–66.

Moss, C. (2013) 'The justification of the martyrs', in Still, T. D. and Wilhite, D. E. (eds) Tertullian and Paul, Pauline and Patristic Scholars in Debate 1. London and New York: Bloomsbury, 104–18.

O'Malley, T. P. (1967) Tertullian and the Bible, Latinitas Christianorum Primaeva 21. Nijmegen and Utrecht, The Netherlands: Dekker and Van de Vegt.

Osborn, E. (1997) Tertullian: First Theologian of the West. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Otten, W. (1997) 'Christ's birth of a virgin who became a wife: Flesh and speech in Tertullian's De carne Christi', Vigiliae Christianae 51: 247–60.

Powell, D. (1975) 'Tertullianists and Cataphrygians', Vigiliae Christianae 29: 33–54.

Rankin, D. I. (1986) 'Was Tertullian a schismatic?', Prudentia 18: 73–9.

Rankin, D. I. (1995) Tertullian and the Church. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Rankin, D. I. (1997) 'Was Tertullian a jurist?', in Livingstone, E. A. (ed.) Studia Patristica 31: Papers Presented at the Twelfth International Conference on Patristic Studies, Oxford 1995. Leuven, The Netherlands: Peeters, 335–42.

Rordorf, W. (1969) 'Tertullians Beurteilung des Soldatenstandes', Vigiliae Christianae 23: 105–41.

Sider, R. D. (1969) 'Structure and design in the "De Resurrectione Morturorum" of Tertullian', Vigiliae Christianae 23: 177–96.

Sider, R. D. (1971) Ancient Rhetoric and the Art of Tertullian. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Sider, R. D. (1982) 'Approaches to Tertullian: A study of recent scholarship', Second Century 2: 228–60.

Swift, L. J. (1968) 'Forensic rhetoric in Tertullian's Apologeticum', Latomus 27: 864–77.

Tabbernee, W. (1989) 'Remnants of the new prophecy: Literary and epigraphical sources of the Montanist movement', in Livingstone, E. A. (ed.) Studia Patristica 21: Papers Presented at the Tenth International Conference on Patristic Studies, Oxford 1987. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters, 193–201.

Tabbernee, W. (1997) Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia: Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism, Patristic Monograph Series 16. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Tabbernee, W. (2007) Fake Prophecy and Polluted Sacraments: Ecclesiastical and Imperial Reactions to Montanism. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Tabbernee, W. (2009) Prophets and Gravestones: An Imaginative History of Montanists and Other Early Christians. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Telfer, W. (1961) 'The origins of Christianity in Africa', in Cross, F. L. (ed.) Studia Patristica 4, Papers presented at the Third International Conference on Patristic Studies, Oxford 1959. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 79. Berlin: Akademie-Verlag, 512–17.

Thomassen, E. (2008) The Spiritual Seed: The Church of the 'Valentinians'. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Trevett, C. (1996) Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Turcan, M. (1990) 'Être femme selon Tertullien', Vita Latina 119: 15–21.

Verhoeven, T. (1951) 'Monarchia dans Tertullien, Aduersus Praxean', Vigiliae Christianae 5: 43–8.

Waszink, J. H. (1955) 'Observations on Tertullian's treatise against Hermogenes', Vigiliae Christianae 9: 129–47.

Waszink, J. H. (1959) 'Some observations on Tertullian "Ad Scapulam"', Vigiliae Christianae 13: 46–57.

Waszink, J. H. (1979) 'Tertullian's principles and methods of exegesis', in Schoedel, W. R. and Wilken, R. L. (eds) Early Christian Literature and the Classical Intellectual Tradition: In Honorem Robert M. Grant. Paris: Beauchesne, 17–31.

Wilhite, D. (2007) Tertullian the African: An Anthropological Reading of Tertullian's Contexts and Identities, Millennium Studies 14. Berlin: De Gruyter.

Wilhite, D. E. (2013) 'The spirit of prophecy: Tertullian's Pauline pneumatology', in Still, T. D. and Wilhite, D. E. (eds) Tertullian and Paul, Pauline and Patristic Scholars in Debate 1. London and New York: Bloomsbury, 45–71.

49

PERPETUA AND FELICITAS

Shira L. Lander and Ross S. Kraemer

Introduction

The place of Perpetua and Felicitas within a series of profiles of prominent early Christians is unique in this collection of essays. First, and perhaps most obviously, they are the only women. Second, and perhaps more importantly, whereas all the men profiled here are well-known through their own extensive writings, or through the detailed writings of others, Perpetua and Felicitas are essentially known only from a work narrating their horrific martyrdom in North Africa in the early third century CE that claims to incorporate Perpetua's personal diary account of her imprisonment and divinely inspired visions.[1] Third, all of what scholars claim to know about these two women is gleaned from the so-called Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis (hereafter Passio), a martyrdom narrative concerned chiefly with their recent conversion to Christianity, their exemplary deaths, and in the case of Perpetua, but not Felicitas, her revelations.[2] The account offers scant biographical data for Perpetua, and virtually none for Felicitas. Thus, writing their 'profiles' is substantially different from writing a profile of an Origen, an Augustine or an Athanasius.

Perpetua and Felicitas are by no means the only female martyrs in early Christian traditions. The fourth-century church historian, Eusebius of Caesarea, includes a Letter of the Churches of Lyons and Viennes narrating the martyrdom of an enslaved woman named Blandina and three male companions in 177 CE (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 6.1.3–63). The so-called Acts of the Scilitan Martyrs appears to reproduce the trial account of six Christians, three women and three men, in Carthage, North Africa, in 180 CE. What distinguishes Perpetua, and Felicitas by association, is the claim that a portion of the Passio is written by Perpetua herself, manu sua, in her own hand.[3] If true, as contemporary scholarship generally takes it to be, Perpetua is the first and only known Christian woman to write in her own name before the fourth century CE.[4] Furthermore, because this portion of the Passio (re)presents Perpetua's experiences, emotions, and visions, it constitutes, if authentic, the only first-person account of a Christian woman's experiences. Its potential significance, then, is inestimable, and contemporary feminist scholarship in particular has been much taken with Perpetua for precisely these reasons.[5] A divide in Perpetua scholarship, however, aligns with the widening fault lines among historians between two types of historicism, the neo-traditional and the new.[6] While most scholars consider the Passio and its ancient secondary witnesses in patristic writings, other martyrdom accounts, martyrologies, and early Christian art to reflect actual historical persons whose historical experiences can be cautiously teased out of the narrative, others consider the history of those persons—if indeed they were historical—to be irretrievable. In this latter view, the Passio texts can only provide literary personae in their rhetorically constructed context for examination, including the possibility that the diary portions of the text are pseudonymous.[7]

Synopsis of the Passio

Two of the ten medieval manuscripts of the Passio open with a prologue in defense and praise of recent visions. All versions then give a brief narrative frame (2.1–2), relating that at an unspecified time and place, for an undisclosed reason, a number of catechumens (recent converts who had not yet been baptized) were placed under arrest. Three were men: Revocatus, Saturninus, and Secundulus. Two were women: Felicitas, described as the conserva (probably co-slave) of Revocatus, and Vibia Perpetua, described as well-educated (liberaliter instituta), elite (honesta), and properly married (matronaliter nupta). Both her parents were still living, as were two brothers, one a catechumen but himself inexplicably not arrested.[8] Although Perpetua was still nursing a baby boy, the entire Passio is silent on the identity and whereabouts of her husband.

It is difficult to reconstruct the specific experiences of the catechumens from the section attributed to Perpetua herself. It appears that between the time she was arrested and the time she and the others were incarcerated in a public prison, Perpetua had occasion both to argue with her father over her Christianity (3.1–3), and to receive formal baptism (3.5a). Once imprisoned, the catechumens are held in a particularly hellish location (3.5b–6), but move to a more comfortable place after the deacons Tertius and Pomponius bribe the prison guards. Perpetua takes advantage of the respite to nurse her famished baby and then hand him over temporarily to the care of her mother and brother until she receives permission to keep the child with her (3.8–9).

At this point, the first of four visions is related in Perpetua's voice (4.1–10). Prompted by her brother, Perpetua asks for and receives a vision in which she ascends a bronze ladder into heaven, together with Saturus, the catechumens' teacher who was not initially arrested with them, but who is also subsequently martyred. At the foot of the ladder lies an enormous dragon; all along the sides of the ladder are sharp weapons. Once safely in heaven, Perpetua encounters a gray-haired man in shepherd's clothing milking sheep in an immense garden populated with thousands of people in white garments. Welcoming Perpetua as his child, the man offers her some of the milk. When she consumes it, all present say 'amen,' and Perpetua wakes with a sweet taste in her mouth. Recounting the vision to her brother, Perpetua realizes that the Christians are fated to suffer and die.

Shortly thereafter, a rumor spreads that the catechumens are to have a hearing (5.1a). Perpetua's father appears just in time to beg his daughter once again to reconsider (5.1b–5). Although she claims to pity his old age, Perpetua regrets that he cannot fathom her decision to be martyred (5.6). Abruptly summoned sometime later to a formal hearing in the forum, she resists her father's importuning yet a third time, confesses to being a Christian and is sentenced, along with her companions, to fight with the beasts (6.1–6). Her father is subjected to a public beating (6.5).

Back in prison, Perpetua sends Pomponius, who seems to have free access to the prisoners, to fetch her baby. The child has apparently been returned to the care of Perpetua's father, although the account provides no explanation of when or how (6.7). Scholars have noted that the paternity rights of the child's father would only be superseded by Perpetua's father if the marriage was sine manu, or if he and Perpetua were not married at all.[9] Her father refuses to yield the child, but conveniently, if not miraculously, the child loses interest in nursing and Perpetua's milk supply dries up without causing her any discomfort (6.8).

Soon thereafter, Perpetua's second vision occurs (7.3–8), in which she sees her deceased younger brother Dinocrates suffering the traditional torments of the unfortunate dead. He is hot, thirsty, pale, and still bears the marks of the facial cancer that killed him. In front of the child she sees a pool of water, but the refreshment the dead seek is beyond his small reach. Perpetua prays for Dinocrates for days, until the prisoners are transferred to a military prison. That night, she has another vision (8.1–4), in which she sees Dinocrates clean and refreshed, a scar where the wound had been, and the rim of the pool now lowered to a height he can reach. Above the rim floats a golden bowl, from which she sees Dinocrates drink his fill and then go off to play. Waking, Perpetua realizes that Dinocrates suffers no more.

As the date of her contest approaches, Perpetua's father returns a fourth time. Perpetua repeats her sorrow for him, but does not relate her reply, if any, to him. Her fourth and final vision (10.1–13) is set the day before the contest. Led by Pomponius into the arena, Perpetua finds herself to be a man, set to fight a hideous-looking Egyptian. An immensely tall man clad in a purple tunic and marvelous sandals of gold and silver presides over the fight. Ultimately, Perpetua triumphs over the Egyptian: while her assistants sing psalms, she receives a branch with golden apples from the man. After he kisses her, saying 'Peace be with you, my daughter,' she walks out through the Gate of Life. Waking, she understands that she is to fight the devil and emerge victorious.

With this vision, the portion of the Passio ascribed to Perpetua ends and another vision, ascribed to Saturus, follows immediately (11.1–13.8). In this lengthiest of all the visions, Saturus and Perpetua, now dead, are carried by four angels to a heavenly garden, where they join other martyrs not mentioned in the account ascribed to Perpetua, and are greeted and kissed by the Lord himself, an aged man with white hair and a youthful face. Having been sent off by elders, Perpetua and Saturus find the bishop Optatus and the presbyter Aspasius feuding.[10] When the two men implore them to intervene, Perpetua and Saturus demur, but Perpetua then speaks with them in Greek. Ultimately, angels instruct Optatus and Aspasius to settle their own dispute.

The remainder of the Passio (14.1–21.11) recounts the deaths of the martyrs, with the most extensive description reserved for that of Perpetua and Felicitas. Only now does the reader learn that Felicitas was eight months pregnant, and that she and her companions prayed successfully that she might deliver early. Otherwise, she would have had to wait to die until the birth of her child, since Roman law forbade the execution of a pregnant woman.

On the birthday of the emperor's son Geta, the catechumens are sent into the arena to reenact some mythological drama. Despite Perpetua's final vision of her combat as a man with the Egyptian, she and Felicitas are stripped naked, clad in netting, and sent to fight a wild heifer, the sex of the animal matching the sex of the martyrs (the men fought an assortment of leopard, bear, and wild boar). Yet none of the martyrs dies of these wounds. Instead, all assent to the wishes of the perverse crowd and have their throats cut by the waiting gladiator. Perpetua herself must guide his hand into her throat after he initially misses and strikes a bone. The Passio concludes with a brief peroration comparable in style and theme to the more lengthy prologue.

Figure 49.1   Martyrdom of Perpetua, Felicity, Revocatus, Saturninus and Secundulus, from the Menologion of Basil II, c. 1000 CE, in the Vatican Library. Photo Wikimedia Commons

Assessing the historicity of the Passio and other Perpetua traditions

The accounts of Perpetua's arrest, last days, and martyrdom are usually titled Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis: some add their co-martyrs Saturus and Revocatus. The texts exist only in medieval manuscripts dating from the ninth through the seventeenth centuries. Apart from one Greek manuscript, all nine are Latin. The variety of the manuscripts presents obstacles to reconstructing a literary history for the Perpetua traditions. Moreover, their usefulness for reconstructing an historical account is hampered by conflicting and indeterminate historical references.

The situation is further complicated by the existence of another set of Perpetua materials, the Acta.[11] Five times more manuscripts of the Acta than the Passio survive, indicating that the medieval popularity of the Acta eclipsed the Passio (Kitzler 2015: 99). The relative brevity of the Acta (approximately one-quarter the length of the Passio), suggests they may have been composed for public recitation rather than private reading (LeClercq 1939: 409; Heffernan 2012: 442). Although the earliest extant Perpetua manuscript is of the Acta, scholars believe that the traditions contained in these manuscripts but not in the Passio are late (not before the fifth century) and factually unreliable, thereby justifying their omission from historical reconstructions of Perpetua's life and death (Van Beek 1936: 98; Amat 1996: 271; Kitzler 2015: 98).

A majority of scholars believe that Latin is the original language of the Passio.[12] All the traditions set Perpetua's martyrdom in North Africa, where Latin, Greek, and indigenous Punic were spoken. The texts either situate Perpetua's arrest in a small city about 30 miles southwest of Carthage called 'Thuburbo minor,' in what is modern Tunisia, or they give no location for the events of the story (Greek Passio 2.1; Acta 1.1). Many scholars take the amphitheatre description to refer to Carthage, since it would have been the only city large enough to contain an arena fully equipped with soldiers' quarters and a prison, and it was the seat of the provincial governor (Rives 1995: 78; Amat 1996: 22–5).

Figure 49.2 The amphitheatre at Carthage. Photo J. C. N. Coulston

The texts also do not agree on the precise dates of Perpetua's martyrdom. The title of the Latin Passio gives the nones of March (also Acta 9.5), while the Greek has early February. The earliest calendar on which Perpetua and Felicitas are listed, the Feriale Ecclesiae Romanae, dated 354, lists the March date (Mommsen 1891: 9.71). Scholars have tended to accept the date commemorated on the Roman calendar, 7 March, without historical warrant.[13] The fact that the February date corresponds to Perpetua's commemoration on the eastern calendar suggests that the traditions reflect alternative dates for commemorating Perpetua in different martyrological traditions rather than useful historical evidence for dating her martyrdom (Robinson 1891: 17).

Attempts to date the text are based on the assumption that Perpetua's martyrdom itself can be securely dated, accepting the historicity of the events as they are presented in the narrative. The only contemporaneous evidence for Perpetua outside the Passio is from the North African Christian writer, Tertullian, who adduces the heavenly vision of Perpetua, 'the most heroic martyr,' as evidence that only the privileged few can enter heaven before the Final Resurrection (Tertullian, De anima 55.4). Since Tertullian had died by the Valerian persecution, he could not have known a Perpetua tradition which placed the martyrdom in the mid third century.[14]

External verification of Perpetua's martyrdom relies both on Tertullian's witness and on historical evidence for persecutions that occurred during his lifetime. Thus, most scholars date the martyrdom to the reign of Septimius Severus.[15] The fourth-century church historian Eusebius relates a Severan persecution in Alexandria, yet he mentions neither North Africa nor Perpetua and her companions (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 6.4–5). The late and suspect Historia Augusta, a compilation of Roman history, relates a Severan edict that puts Christianity in the same category as Judaism: 'it is forbidden to become Jews,' but a prohibition against proselytism seems likely to be anachronistic.[16] Thus, even accepting the martyrdom's historicity, attempts to explain Perpetua's death as punishment for her conversion are unfounded.

If Severus had not issued a recent ban on conversion, he might have encouraged a climate of episodic persecution of Christians, similar to the situation reported by Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia-Pontus in the early second century CE, in his letter to Trajan (Pliny, Ep. 10.96–97). The Passio conveys a sense of randomness about Perpetua's arrest which would comport with such a climate. The arrest of the 'young catechumens' occurs without context or explanation and the passive construction (Passio 2.1) conceals those who may have ordered the arrest and why. There is no mention of mass arrests or widespread executions.[17] The friends and family who visit the martyrs in prison are not afraid to be associated with them. People are not fleeing to avoid arrest and persecution, or to avoid appearing before make-shift outdoor courts to prove their allegiance to the Roman deities, as is the case in representations of more systematic persecution (pace Cyprian, Lactantius, and Eusebius). When this group of Christians 'suddenly' receives a hearing at the forum (Passio 6.1), the governor merely asks Perpetua to perform a sacrifice 'for the health of the emperors.' When she demurs, he then asks, 'Christiana es?' to which she replies affirmatively (Passio 6.3–4).[18] The crime of being Christian, insofar as it prevents this Roman matron from performing her civic duty, is Hilarianus' reason for condemning her to the beasts (Passio 6.6). Like the court accounts of Pliny, the martyr's hearing seems to indicate that admitting to being Christian and refusing to sacrifice sufficed to incur punishment.[19]

An early dating for the martyrdom and the Passio depends not only on demonstrating the historical plausibility of these events.[20] It also depends on interpretations of seemingly historical references in the Passio. Many scholars identify the governor Hilarianus, successor of Minucius Timinianus (Passio 6.3–5, 18.8), with the P. Aelius Hilarianus mentioned by Tertullian (Ad Scapulam [To Scapula] 3.1), and the Caesar in celebration of whose birthday the martyrs are to be ceremonially killed (Passio 7.9) as Geta, the emperor's son, who received the title 'Caesar' in the year 198 (later rejected for the throne and ostracized by his brother, Caracalla; Heffernan 2012: 72–8). The problematic nature of each piece of evidence renders a Severan date tenuous at best.[21]

The problem of dating should itself alert the careful reader to the difficulty of identifying the extant medieval manuscripts with a text dating back to the early third century. Tertullian mentions Perpetua only in a passing reference and refers neither to a text nor to a commemoration. No other third-century literature, inscription, or author mentions her. Attempts to demonstrate the Passio's literary influence on other North African martyrdom narratives (of Montanus and Lucius and Marianus and Jacobus) as well as Pontius' Life of Cyprian, depend on an early dating of the Passio.[22] Despite the fact that Tertullian and Cyprian, the mid third-century Bishop of Carthage, both mention offerings and prayers on behalf of the departed (Tertullian, De corona militis 3; Cyprian, Ep. 12.2.1), neither mentions the practice of reading a text on the anniversary of a martyr's death. By itself, Tertullian's reference may merely evidence a local oral tradition and not acquaintance with the Passio, although many scholars read it this way. If an early literary tradition can be traced to the date of the martyrdom itself, that tradition may have only consisted of a transcription of Perpetua's visions as either written or dictated by her from prison. It is likely that the text as represented by the medieval manuscripts was shaped and reshaped by various editors over the centuries, and it is not until the fourth century that these artifacts of Perpetua's martyrdom, text, and commemoration, can be securely identified.

The earliest evidence of Perpetua's commemoration appears on the liturgical Calendar of Rome in 354.[23] The calendar attests to the saint's widespread popularity, indicated by a mid fourth-century anonymous Greek homily on the Armenian martyr Polyeuctus that compares the soldier's vision to that of Perpetua,[24] and a late fourth-century Spanish sarcophagus depicting scenes of Perpetua's visions and martyrdom (Figure 49.3).[25] Canon 36 of the 393 Synod of Hippo and subsequent canon 47 of the Council of Carthage (397) permits commemorative texts such as the Passio to be read even though they are not canonical writings, reflecting a trend also apparent in Palestine and Asia Minor toward a containment of saint veneration within the physical and temporal boundaries of the church.[26]

Figure 49.3   The Quintanabureba sarcophagus with Passio scenes. Museo de Burgos, Burgos, Spain. Photo courtesy of Miguel Zález

This institutionalization of saint devotion converges with the evidence provided by three sermons of Augustine, bishop of Hippo, perhaps delivered at the beginning of the fifth century.[27] Augustine marks the occasion as the anniversary of the martyrdoms (dies natales: literally birthdays) of Perpetua and Felicitas, and provides the first known reference to an actual text of the Passio which was read in his basilica.[28] Augustine's homilies contain many of the traditions preserved by the medieval manuscripts of the Passio. There are, however, unexplained discrepancies which suggest that his text is not identical to the Passio. Details of Augustine's discussions and those found in two fifth-century sermons, now referred to as 'pseudo-Augustine,' conflict with what has been preserved as the Passio text.[29]

According to Pseudo-Augustine sermon 394, when Perpetua hands over her son, she quotes Rom. 8:35, 'Who will separate us from the love of Christ?' which is not found in the Passio. When describing Perpetua's first vision, the homilist has Felicitas accompanying Perpetua up the ladder to the heavenly garden, not Saturus, as in the Passio. The image they see, of a shepherd milking his sheep, differs from the extant Passio. According to Pseudo-Augustine, it is Perpetua and Felicitas who see 'a shepherd both young and old' showing them vessels of milk. In the Passio, however, Perpetua describes the shepherd as merely 'white-haired' (canus) and 'large' (grandis; 4.8). The paradoxical image of a simultaneously 'aged man with white hair and a youthful face' (12.3), an image evoking Rev. 1.13–14 and Dan. 7.9, appears later in the Passio, in the vision of Saturus. Two manuscripts have Saturninus as Perpetua's colleague instead of Saturus.[30] It seems that the traditions about who appeared in Perpetua's first vision are confused.

Rather than suggesting these ancient commentators made a 'mistake' in their references to a Perpetua tradition, the evidence suggests that the attribution of the visions was not a consistent tradition.[31] All the visions of heavenly ascents may have originally been assigned to Perpetua and Felicitas alone, since the day of commemoration bears their names. Felicitas may have become a problematic figure for the post-Constantinian church. A pregnant slave who seemingly wills the life-threatening premature delivery of her own child so that she too may win the crown of martyrdom may have been written out of the vision by later editors or scribes.[32] As Brent Shaw has argued, the Acta give Felicitas a plebeian husband, whom she publicly rejects (5.2–6.1), to mitigate the scandal of her circumstances (Shaw 1993: 33–42).

In its final form, The Passio of Perpetua and Felicitas consists of three narrative layers. The middle core claims to be the original account of the martyr Perpetua herself, just as written by her hand and from her point of view: sicut conscriptum manu sua et suo sensu (Passio 2.3). This core relates the events from the arrest of Perpetua and her companions up to the day of her martyrdom, including the visions or dreams she has during this time. An editorial framework surrounds this core, which introduces the prison section, then continues the account of Perpetua's martyrdom from where she left off as well as that of her companions (presented as the editor's eyewitness account), and concludes with a doxological exhortation. An anomalous insertion after Perpetua's diary claims to be Saturus' account of his prison vision; as we have seen above, this dream, or some form of it, might well have been originally attributed to Perpetua herself. The differences in style and theme between this vision and those of Perpetua within the prison narrative may suggest, though, that the vision has undergone significant revision in the process of re-assignment.

The identity of the editor remains obscure as does his or her religious perspective, which we shall consider further later. The more interesting question, from the perspective of women's authorship and self-representation in antiquity, is whether Perpetua actually wrote the prison section of the Passio.

Writing something in someone else's name is a widespread practice in the ancient world, whether understood as intentional fraud or pious fiction. Tertullian himself denounces an anonymous presbyter in Asia Minor whom, he says, forged the story of Paul and Thecla, although he concedes that the presbyter claimed to do so out of love for Paul.[33] (Whether Tertullian is here correct is irrelevant for present purposes—De baptismo 17.5.) Further, the editor's claim, that Perpetua wrote it in her own hand, does not insure its authenticity for the modern scholar. The same assertion occurs, for instance, not only in several undisputed letters of Paul (1 Cor. 16.21; Gal. 6:11; Phlm 19) but in letters now thought to be pseudonymous (Col. 4.18; 2 Thess. 3.17, where the author's insistence on this point seems particularly telling).

Thomas Heffernan has critiqued the characterization of the prison narrative as a diary, the term regularly used by recent scholarship, and questioned the authenticity of Perpetua's section on philological grounds.[34] Heffernan argues that the prison narrative is a combination of genres, drawing from the epistolary, peripatetic, and consolation literature along with hypomnemata, a catch-all genre which encompassed many types of nonrhetorical writing, including 'memoir, memorandum, note, diary, or commentary on an author' (Heffernan 1995: 321, 2012: 4). Perpetua's dreams in particular, he argues, reflect a new emphasis on self-revelation emerging in the late second century.[35] Heffernan points out that the text violates an essential aspect of the diary form: it provides 'deliberate temporal continuity . . . [using] such expressions as "after a few days", or "many days", "a few hours later", to indicate the passage of time and to introduce a new narrative sequence' (Heffernan 1995: 322). Furthermore, he notes, the grammar lacks an additional feature typical of diary writing: the verbs are mainly not conjugated in the present tense. Although he believes the account to be a first-person narrative, Heffernan entertains the possibility that the prison narrative was 'first dictated, copied by a scribe, and then conflated by the Christian redactor.'[36]

Contemporary claims about the authenticity of the prison narrative often appeal to the controversial notion of a female rhetoric.[37] Emotional, personal, fragmented, and colloquial, the style of Perpetua's account is thought to prove the trustworthiness of the editor's claim. However, we are less confident that this style can be identified specifically with Perpetua herself and consider just as likely the possibility that this style is purposefully constructed by an ancient author to appear as a (female) martyr's diary.

The essentialist claim that women in antiquity wrote in a distinctive and detectable form and voice collapses in view of ancient sources. Pliny the Younger, for instance, writes about:

> [s]ome letters which he [Pliny's friend, Pompeius Saturninus] said were written by his wife, but sounded to me [Pliny] like Plautus or Terence being read in prose. Whether they are really his wife's, as he says, or his own (which he denies) one can only admire him either for what he writes, or the way he has cultivated and refined the taste of the girl he married.
> (Pliny Ep. 1.16.6, in Fantham et al. 1994: 349)

Pliny's identification of the style of the letters with that of Plautus and Terence, two male authors, leads him to conclude that either his friend's wife did not write them, or that she learned how to write in male rhetorical style from her husband. Implicit in Pliny's judgment may be a notion of a distinctive female writing style, to which these letters do not conform. Pliny ultimately concedes, despite his preconceptions, that a woman could be trained to write 'like a man.'

Furthermore, that a man could write like a woman, in a voice recognizable as female, is evident from the majority of ancient playwrights and novelists who devoted much of their work to constructing gendered representations not only of characters, but of their speeches and letters as well. In so doing, they appealed to assumptions about gendered language that may also be reflected in Pliny's remarks. Chariton, in his novel Chaereas and Callirhoe has Callirhoe write a letter, which he has, of course, composed himself. Chariton writes in the letter, 'this letter is written in my own hand' (Reardon 1989: 116). Likewise, Xenophon has Manto write a love letter in which she exclaims that she 'can no longer contain herself, improperly, perhaps for a girl' (Reardon 1989: 141). Additional evidence may be found in the intriguing but generally ignored pseudepigraphic correspondence allegedly between one Mary of Cassabola and Ignatius of Antioch (Kraemer 1991: 236–39). Both letters are clearly written by the same author, so either a woman has written in both male and female voices, or a man has done so. In either case, our dilemma is apparent, if its solution is not.

Thus, attempts to verify the authenticity of Perpetua's narrative on gendered stylistic grounds prove troubling.[38] Furthermore, the similarity of the section to other autobiographical narratives which are considered authentic but heavily edited and rewritten, such as Aelius Aristides' The Sacred Tales, should give us pause about identifying stylistic features as a sign of authenticity rather than as self-consciously constructed rhetorical devices. As Glen Bowersock has aptly stated, 'Whether Perpetua's words, in whatever language, allow us to hear an authentic and distinctive woman's voice . . . is much more doubtful. How would we tell?' (Bowersock 1995: 34).

Our skepticism about the diary's authorship draws further support from a comment made by Augustine in a refutation of Victor Vitensis' books about infant baptism.[39] Even considering the polemical edge designed to undercut his interlocutor's argument that Perpetua's ability to achieve her deceased brother's salvation renders infant baptism unnecessary, Augustine's characterization of the Passio text as 'not itself a canonical writing, whether she herself wrote it or whether anyone else wrote it,' is suggestive (De natura et origine animae 1.10.12; our translation). Without expressing a point of view, Augustine intimates that the authorship of the text is open to debate, raising the possibility that Perpetua did not write the account, yet his concerns pass unremarked through centuries of transmission.

Finally, the startling degree to which details of the Passio conform to the biblical citation of Joel 2:28–29/Acts 2:17–18 in the prologue, which is only extant in two manuscripts, contributes to our concerns. It is possible, indeed perhaps tempting, to read the Passio in its present form as a narrative dramatization of this citation, as it appears in here:

> For in the last [literally newest] days, says the Lord, I will pour out my spirit over all flesh and their sons and daughters will prophesy; and I will pour my spirit over my male servants and female servants (servos et ancillas meas) and the young shall see visions and the old shall dream dreams.
>
> (Acts 1.4)

Many elements of the Passio conform closely to the particulars of this prophecy. As the prologue makes clear, the events of the Passio take place in these newest days (1.1–3). The outpouring of the divine spirit over all flesh may be depicted in the catechumens as a whole, or even in the larger phenomenon of conversion to Christianity which they may represent, although admittedly, the Passio is not terribly specific on this point. Perpetua and probably Saturus demonstrate the prophesying daughters and sons. The extraordinary emphasis on Perpetua's role as a daughter, primarily through her relationship with her father, coheres exceedingly well with the characterization of the female prophets as daughters.

The precise citation of the biblical verses in the Passio does not correspond exactly to any other known ancient Latin translations of either Joel 2:28–29 or Acts 2:17–18. Where the Hebrew, Greek, and Vulgate all modify the sons, daughters, male servants, and female servants with the possessive 'your,' the Passio applies the third-person plural 'theirs' (eorum) to the sons and daughters, and lacks any possessive for the young visionaries and the old dreamers.[40] Applied to Perpetua, this adjective seems particularly apt. Born to pagan parents, she is 'their' daughter in at least two senses: she is not only of the gentiles, but the daughter of two living parents. Such a reading provides one way of making sense of the limited presence of her mother. The emphasis on Perpetua's noble birth and elite social status may also stem from the redactor's desire to characterize her as the daughter distinct from the female servants (ancillae).

While Acts 2:18 predicts that the servants will also prophesy, Joel limits this activity to the sons and daughters, as does the citation in the Passio. And not surprisingly, none of the slaves' prophesy. They seem only to receive the spirit, most notably perhaps in the response to their prayers for Felicitas' early delivery, and probably also in their baptism. Their very presence in the story enhances the conformity of the Passio to the biblical verses. Interestingly, apart from her description as the conserva of Revocatus, there is no reason to think that Felicitas is a slave.[41] Yet the characterization of Felicitas and Revocatus as conservi, construed as co-slaves, enhances the conformity of the Passio to the prophecy, which requires examples of slaves who receive the spirit, if not also who prophesy.

At several points, the redactor emphasizes both the youth of the catechumens as a whole, and that of Perpetua in particular. They are described as adolescentes (2.1), while she is twenty-two (2.3) and still called puella (20.1–2). The attention to her age and the emphasis on her visions coheres with the prediction of the young seeing visions. While the cultivation of visionary experience seems to have characterized much of North African Christianity, leading some scholars to posit a Montanist origin for the Passio, one might wonder whether the correspondence results from an existing tradition about Perpetua, or from the prophecy itself.[42]

Admittedly, several components of the biblical prophecy, as quoted in the Passio, are less apparent, including the pouring out of the divine spirit 'over all flesh,' the prophesying sons and the aged dreamers. The awkward integration of the figure and vision of Saturus into the text, which we noted earlier, may represent an attempt to offer an example of the prophesying son. It may also supply the old dreaming dreams, since his age is not specified, and he is not among the adolescent catechumens, but is rather their teacher, and therefore presumably somewhat older. Alternatively, the author of the Passio may find it sufficient to demonstrate partial fulfillment of the biblical text. In any case, the collective prophecies, visions, and reception of the divine spirit in the Passio clearly constitute fulfillment of this particular phrasing of ancient divine prophecy.

Thus, yet another explanation for the formation of the Passio is that its original core is an account of the imprisonment and visions of a martyr, Perpetua, with or without Felicitas, and that many of the additions function, intentionally, to demonstrate the fulfillment of the prophecy. If this reading has merit, it points to an author who looks for the fulfillment of biblical prophecies in the details of historical experience. Our discussion of the probable history of the traditions about Perpetua, and of the Passio itself, suggest that it is unlikely the entire martyrdom of Perpetua is generated out of the biblical passage(s), but it seems quite possible that both the general outline and many of the details of the prison narrative and the remaining sections are shaped to conform to the biblical text.[43]

In consideration of the myriad challenges the Passio poses to historical claims about the martyrdom of Perpetua, and the serious questions raised about the authenticity of the prison section, we consider it impossible to identify the original source of this martyrdom account. At some level, the account may reflect the experience of a young Carthaginian woman, an elite Roman matron, who was possibly executed for her adherence to Christianity, yet historical certainty is simply unattainable. While recent scholarship generally considers the prison account of Perpetua to be authentic and accurate, and the Passio as a whole to be a reasonably trustworthy representation of the martyrdom of Perpetua, Felicitas, and their male associates, it is our assessment that the hagiographic tradition may not be historically reliable to a sufficient degree to permit a profile of Perpetua and Felicitas comparable to what may be possible for other persons in the current section of this volume. Rather, what we may have is a 'representation' whose correspondence to actual persons and events cannot be determined. Nevertheless, if we assume for the sake of discussion that a sufficient amount of the Passio is rooted in actual historical events, we may explore a number of questions pertinent to a profile of the two women. The remainder of this chapter will endeavor to do just this.

Perpetua and Felicitas: a provisional profile

As we noted at the outset, the Passio as a whole is not much interested in the lives of these martyrs prior to their conversion to Christianity and their consequent arrest. In this regard, it appears to differ markedly from the genre of Christian biographies, or Lives, itself modelled on Greco-Roman forms, that flourishes from the fourth century on.[44] While hagiographic interests shape the use of biographic details in those accounts, the Lives nevertheless typically relate not only birth, education, and familial relationships, but also offer extended examples of piety and self-abnegation.

Scholars have heavily mined the significant amount of apparent biographical data about Perpetua condensed into the brief lines of Passio 2.1–3. Perpetua was a member of an old established family of Roman citizens, the Vibii, well-documented in North Africa.[45] According to one family of Latin manuscripts (identified by the Greek letter gamma) and the only extant Greek manuscript, she came from a town called Thuburbo Minor west of Carthage.[46] Shaw concludes that 'she came, therefore, from a solid municipal family, no doubt of some local wealth and prestige,' and not from the senatorial elite, as claimed by other scholars (Shaw 1993: 11). Her choice to breastfeed her infant son rather than employ a wet nurse, however, challenges the text's portrait.[47]

The narrator claims that Perpetua was not only born into the honestiores, but was the recipient of a liberal education (liberaliter instituta) that would have included training in Latin grammar and rhetoric. Citing Ovid, Amat proposes that young women would also have been schooled in music and singing (Amat 1996: 193; Ovid Ars Amatoria 3.35). Because the vision attributed to Saturus depicts Perpetua addressing the quarreling church leaders in Greek, some scholars have argued that she was literate in Greek as well (Potter 2010: 321), but the skepticism of both Amat and Shaw on this point seems well-taken (Shaw 1993: 12, n. 34; Amat 1996: 193).

That the daughters of citizen families would have been formally educated is substantiated by numerous ancient sources.[48] If Perpetua is indeed the author of the prison narrative, she was obviously sufficiently well-educated to compose it, and to write it in her own hand. In that portion of the Passio, scholars have seen allusions to Latin literature that bolster these claims.[49] The description of Perpetua as liberaliter instituta functions to affirm the claim that she is the writer of the prison account: it is precisely what we might expect from an author who wished to 'authenticate' the representation of a woman writer.

The narrator informs readers that Perpetua was matronaliter nupta, a phrase that appears to indicate that by virtue of her marriage, Perpetua attained the status of matrona (Amat 1996: 193). As numerous commentators have observed, neither the narrative frame, nor the prison account, provides any information regarding the identity or whereabouts of Perpetua's husband. Since she is not described as a widow, many scholars have assumed that her husband opposed her conversion to Christianity, and that this opposition accounts for his absence throughout the Passio. Such an interpretation accords well with numerous other early Christian representations of the dynamics of women's conversion to Christianity, from the story in Justin Martyr of the unnamed woman whose acceptance of ascetic Christianity causes her husband to bring charges against her and her Christian teachers (Second Apology 2.4ff., Kraemer 2011: 46–54), to the numerous tales in the Apocryphal Acts from Thecla on (Kraemer 2011: 117–52, 2012). Conceivably, then, the absent (and here anonymous) husband may be understood as a standard type in early Christian conversion narratives whose opposition requires no explanation. But equally possible, however, the troublingly absent husband may be viewed as evidence for some historical core of the narrative, on the logic that his absence creates more problems than it solves, and is thus unlikely to be fictive.[50]

According to the narrator, Perpetua's parents are both still living, as are two brothers, one of whom is said to be a catechumen as well (Passio 2.2). She is herself twenty-two, and the mother of a son young enough to be still nursing, which would probably make him less than three years old. Assuming the boy to be her first child, or at least her first living child, this would accord well with a marriage at about age eighteen, consistent with other evidence for the age at first marriage for elite Roman women (Shaw 1987).

This portrait of Perpetua is generally consistent with that of the account attributed to the martyr herself, although not completely. The prison narrative itself mentions (but never names) the father, the mother, at least one brother, and the baby boy. Perpetua at one point entrusts her baby to the care of her mother and a brother, which suggests that he is not imprisoned, neither is there any particular reason to think he is also a Christian (Passio 3.8). The fate of the catechumen brother is less clear, since he is unnamed and the term 'brother,' which appears subsequently in the narrative, can refer to a fellow Christian as well as a biological sibling. Perpetua relates that 'her brother' told her to ask for a vision about her fate (but not their fate; Passio 4.1), which she does. Coming to, Perpetua relates the vision of Saturus and the ladder to her 'brother.' Although the language of 4.10 suggests that this 'brother' is also a Christian, it is impossible to say whether the brother is with Perpetua in prison, or merely visiting. Perpetua's description of Dinocrates (the only member of her family to be named) as her brother 'in the flesh,' (7.5) may suggest that we should understand the unnamed brother in chapter 4 as simply another Christian.[51]

As many scholars have recently considered, the portrait of Perpetua's relationship with her father in the prison narrative is particularly fascinating. Of all Perpetua's familial relationships, this one receives the most extensive articulation. Perpetua's four visions are interwoven with four confrontations in which her father begs her to renounce her Christianity. The visions and the confrontations may well be interrelated: aspects of the father may be seen not only in the gray-haired old man milking sheep in the first vision, but in the enormous dragon in the same vision and the hideous Egyptian in the third vision, both of whose heads Perpetua steps on (4.7; 10.11; Lefkowitz 1976). By comparison, Perpetua's relationship with her mother receives short shrift. Only in 3.8 does Perpetua speak with her mother, concerning her anxiety for her infant son, and arrangements for his care. How Perpetua's mother felt about her conversion and impending martyrdom is never explicit. Nowhere does her mother implore her to desist, although in 5.3, Perpetua's father begs her to think of the pain her death will cause her mother. Shaw takes Perpetua's statement in 5.6 to mean that Perpetua's family in general opposed her Christianity, and thought her impending death appropriate punishment, but the words 'he [the father] alone of all my family would not rejoice to see me suffer,' (solus de passione mea gauisurus non esset de toto genere meo) could easily be construed to mean that Perpetua's other relatives would rejoice in her suffering because they knew that it would lead to her immediate glorification (Amat 1996: 31, 209). Whether this means that the mother and other relatives may have been Christians themselves, it seems at least that they sympathized with Perpetua's Christianity.

If the prison narrative is indeed autobiographical, it alludes to a complex father-daughter relationship common to the dynamics of elite citizen families, in which fathers lavished devotion and attention on their daughters, while the relationships of mothers and daughters were relatively minimal.[52] Imploring her to abandon her Christianity, Perpetua's father reminds her of how he favored her above all her brothers. Shaw, Perkins, and Cooper, in particular, have demonstrated the extent to which the interactions between father and daughter function as an apt expression of the Christian critique and inversion of Roman power relations.[53] They focus in particular on the exchange in chapter 5, where Perpetua's father calls her no longer filia (daughter) but domina (5.5), the feminine form of dominus, lord or master.[54] While Shaw (and many others) take these scenes to be more or less accurate, the utility of these interactions might suggest that their representation is a more deliberate artifice than might initially appear.

Virtually no biographical data is offered for Felicitas, who figures only in the narrative sections, and is never mentioned in the account attributed to Perpetua. All that we are told of her is that she was a slave, the conserva, or co-slave, of Revocatus,[55] and was many months pregnant at the time of her arrest. With Perpetua, she is described as puella (20.1) which may signify her relative youth. Nothing suggests that she and Perpetua had any relationship prior to their shared martyrdom, or at least to their conversion to Christianity. No visions are attributed to Felicitas, or any exercise of leadership or authority. Since, as we noted earlier, the fifth-century homily falsely attributed to Augustine has Felicitas, not Saturus, ascend the ladder to heaven with Perpetua, it may be that Felicitas' status as a slave lies behind eventual suppression of earlier traditions in which Felicitas fills a role subsequently appropriated by Saturus.[56] Interestingly, though, neither Augustine, Pseudo-Augustine, nor Quodvultdeus characterize Felicitas as enslaved, and we have already raised questions about the historicity of this claim.

What kind of Christian might Perpetua (and perhaps Felicitas) have been? The language of the prologue, with its citation of Joel 2:28–29/Acts 2:17–18, and its praise of new prophecies and visions, has long suggested an association with the Christian revivalist movement known as the New Prophecy, or Montanism (see Chapter 43 in this volume). Originating in Phrygia (in ancient Asia Minor; modern Turkey) around the third quarter of the second century CE, the movement appears to have been founded by a male prophet named Montanus, and two women prophets named Priscilla and Maximilla. It attracted significant support not only in Asia Minor, but in North Africa at the end of the second century: Tertullian himself was a Montanist for a significant period of his life.[57] Characteristic of the movement was a resurgence of charismatic activity, including prophecy, leadership roles for women based on such activity, and heightened eschatological expectation. The New Prophecy encountered considerable opposition from proto-orthodox and orthodox Christians for centuries; Montanists were still targeted in legislation by Christian emperors well into the fifth century.[58] The story of Perpetua, therefore, might have been transmitted within Montanist circles. The omission of the prologue in other Latin manuscripts may reflect an orthodoxing process that continued in the production of the Acta.

Numerous elements of the Passio would be consistent with what we know of the New Prophecy. Among these are Saturus' own vision, the authority Perpetua exercises there, the visions reported in her own voice, and even the citation of Joel 2:28–29/Acts 2:17–18. Numerous scholars have remarked on the possible correlation between Perpetua's consumption of a eucharistic cheese-like substance in her first vision, and reports that the Montanists celebrated a eucharist of bread and cheese.[59]

Yet the Montanist character of the Passio is not without problems. Nothing in the text is unambiguously Montanist. Precisely, the elements often adduced as indicators of Montanism, including an emphasis on prophecy and heightened eschatological interest, appear typical of North African Christianity in this period. So, too, the interpretation of dreams as divine revelations and an emphasis on their power, particularly for confessors (those prisoners willing to be martyred), appears to have been commonplace.[60] Cyprian describes his own actions as 'prompted by the Holy Spirit and counselled by the Lord through many explicit visions' (Cyprian, Ep. 57.5.1). He equates visions and revelations, and maintains their power to predict the future (Cyprian, Ep. 11.4.1–5.1). Furthermore, Maureen Tilley offers strong arguments that 'the Passion lacks the central and distinctive attributes of Montanist literature,' namely asceticism, millennarianism, and ecstatic prophecies (Tilley 1994: 835).

The question of martyrdom is particularly troublesome. Opponents of the New Prophecy accused its members of avoiding martyrdom, which, if true, would certainly weaken the identification of the Passio as Montanist. On the other hand, if members of the New Prophecy wished to represent themselves as exemplary martyrs, the Passio would certainly constitute an effective means of doing so.

Although one of us has earlier analyzed Perpetua and the Passio from the vantage point of Montanism, it seems wise to conclude that the matter cannot be resolved with any certainty (Kraemer 1992: 157–73). It is certainly possible that whoever composed the prologue was indeed a Montanist, and even intended both the quotation of Joel 2:28–29/Acts 2:17–18 and the defense of contemporary prophecy to signal this identity. Such an author may also have understood Perpetua to have been a member of the movement, as evidenced in particular by her consumption of the eucharistic cheese in her vision. If the visions are authentic, Perpetua may indeed have been a member of the New Prophecy. Were this to be the case, it might account for a puzzling aspect of the Passio that has never been adequately explained, namely why only a small group of catechumens were arrested, while other Christians, including the deacons Pomponius and Tertius, apparently came and went unhindered and unconcerned that they, too, might be arrested and condemned. Perhaps Perpetua and her companions were adherents of the New Prophecy, whose affiliation targeted them, but not other Christians, for prosecution.

Certain specific Christian characteristics may be deduced from the prison portion alone, although these are not without problems. Manifestly obvious is the emphasis on martyrdom, while less remarked is a noteworthy absence of miracles suspending the natural order, common to other second- and third-century Christian literature such as the Apocryphal Acts. Martyrdom appears to guarantee immediate entrance to heaven, consistent with a view Tertullian himself attests. Although this understanding is clearer in the vision of Saturus, it is also discernible in Perpetua's first vision, where she and Saturus ascend the ladder to heaven and are welcomed by the aged shepherd and the saints, a vision that as many scholars have observed, appears grounded in the predictions of Revelation (e.g., 7:9–17). Implicit in this dream may be precisely the belief that Christians who die ordinary deaths cannot ascend into heaven until the second coming.

The prison portion affords little insight into authoritative and organizational church structures. The only church leaders mentioned are the two male deacons, unless perhaps we include the reference to Saturus as a teacher. No women leaders appear, neither do any male presbyters or bishops. Nevertheless, Perpetua's effective prayers for the salvation of her brother, Dinocrates, have led at least one scholar to suggest that she effectively held the rank of presbyter (Klawiter 1980). In this period, Christians awaiting martyrdom (confessors) were thought to have great powers, a perception expressed in the prison account at 4.1 and 9.1.[61] Among these powers was the ability to forgive those who had denied their faith under pressure. Since this power was otherwise reserved for bishops and presbyters, the ability of confessors such as Perpetua to effect the forgiveness of others apparently entitled them to the equivalent ecclesiastical rank. Klawiter points out that since women as well as men were arrested in anticipation of martyrdom, the assignment of ministerial rank to confessors had the potential to enable women to attain offices otherwise prohibited.[62]

Apart from her intercession for Dinocrates, Perpetua exercises no leadership within the prison account. In the separate vision of Saturus, Perpetua finds herself mediating a dispute between a presbyter and a bishop said to be those of her own church (although one might suspect that the presence of these officials represents a deliberate attempt to respond to the absence of such authorities in the prison narrative). In the narration of the martyrdom itself, Perpetua twice intervened effectively with the Roman tribune, once to secure better treatment for the prisoners, and once to prevent them from having to dress up as priests of Saturn and priestesses of Cybele in the arena (16.2–4; 18:4–6).

Conclusion

Seen through the multiple prismatic lenses supplied by the accumulated layers of the Passio, a fuller version of Perpetua's Christianity becomes visible, although whether it says more about the subsequent redactors than about any historical Perpetua remains an important question. The Passio as a whole attests to a Christianity steeped in the cosmic framework of the Apocalypse of John, enamored of martyrdom, apparently positioned at the end of time (although the language of the prologue seems ambivalent on this point when it predicts that 'these [new manifestations] will one day become ancient and needful for the ages to come').

By the fourth century, Perpetua's fame had spread well beyond Carthage. Her image as martyred mother, unlike the Maccabean mother who exhorted her sons to martyrdom (2 Macc. 7.5, 29; 4 Macc. 15.12), uniquely exemplified the choice between the Roman family and the family of Christ, which was only paralleled in accounts of female asceticism. Whereas sexual abstinence had forced a wedge between Christian wives and non-Christian husbands, Perpetua's faith required her to give up her human father and son in exchange for a divine father and son (Tilley 1994: 839–40). The Passio shows how the conflict between Roman civic authority, reflected in the institution of the domus as a microcosm, and the church can be resolved in self-sacrifice or death. As this political struggle dissipated, the story of Perpetua's martyrdom came to represent the rejection of whatever interpreters deemed to be less worthy. For these Latin interpreters, the choice of martyrdom modelled obedience to Christian values.

In the fifth century, the remains of Perpetua and Felicitas were believed to be located in the main Basilica of Carthage, attested by both inscriptions and the comments of Victor Vitensis. Early sixth-century mosaics commemorate the martyrs in the Archiepiscopal Chapel of Ravenna, the basilica of Sant'Apollinare Nuovo, and the Eufrasiana Basilica in Poreč (Croatia). These monuments suggest that independent of the historical details of Perpetua's death, her martyrdom was a powerful symbol and her story continued to be read, translated, edited, and interpreted by Christians in the east as well as in the west, as can be seen in Figure 43.5 of this volume—a photograph of a contemporary icon of Saints Perpetua and Felicity.[63]

Notes

1 Perpetua receives some notice in the writings of Tertullian: as discussed below, it is unclear whether Tertullian knows the text of the martyrdom or some other version, oral or written, but in any case, he does not provide independent attestation of the life of either woman.

2 The later martyrdom account, Acta Brevia Perpetuae et Felicitatis, is derived from the Passio and heavily edited to conform to late antique Christian sensibilities; it is, therefore, not helpful for historical reconstruction.

3 Passio 2.3. Except where noted, all citations of the text follow the edition of Heffernan (2012), whose critical apparatus is more comprehensive than that of Amat (1996). English translations are generally our own. The standard English translation is that of Musurillo 1972: 106–31 (reproduced in Kraemer 1988: 96–107 and Kraemer 2004: 356–68), yet Heffernan's work will undoubtedly supersede it.

4 Kraemer (1991); Rader (1981); Snyder (1989); Heffernan (2012).

5 E.g., Burrus (2008); Bremmer and Formisano (2012); Castelli (2004); Cooper (2011); Von Franz (1980 [1949]); Kitzler (2015); Kraemer (1992); Maitland (1996); Miles (1989); Moss (2013, 2012, 2010); Perkins (2007, 1995); Rader (1981); Salisbury (1997); Shaw (2004, 1993); Streete (2009); Tilley (1994); Williams (2012).

6 Neo-traditional: Barnes (2010); New: Moss (2013).

7 Kraemer (2004: 5–6, 356–7; 2011: 244). While pseudepigraphy was common among Jews and Christians, the practice was otherwise rare, as Bart Ehrmann has recently shown (2011, 2013).

8 Amat thinks the text is ambiguous on this point: 'One of the two [brothers] is also a catechumen, the redactor tells us, but without specifying whether he was arrested or not' (1996: 31, our translation from the French).

9 Heffernan (2012: 165); Cooper (2011: 688–90).

10 The phrase ite et ludite (12.6) is ambiguous and unparalleled in Latin literature. For some discussion of the use of ludite here, see Amat (1996: 238); Heffernan (2012: 290).

11 Text and French translation in Amat (1996). Although scholars have followed Van Beek's original designation of this text as Acta, the manuscripts employ the title Passio (Kitzler 2015: 99).

12 Amat (1996: 66); Barnes (1968: 521); Bremmer (2003: 57–8); Dronke (1984: 1); Fridh (1968: 80–3), who maintains the original of the Saturus vision was Greek; Heffernan (2012: 61); Kitzler (2015: 26); Shaw (2004).

13 Robeck (1992: 13); Barnes (1968b: 523–5); Shaw (1993: 3). A sixth century inscription from Mçidfa's basilica maiorum gives the March 7 date (CIL VIII.4, 25038), conforming to the Roman calendar.

14 We use the term 'persecution' throughout this essay, fully aware that we are replicating a Christian perspective of Roman treatment of Christians in the early centuries. The term 'prosecution' replicates the Roman view. As Geoffrey de Ste. Croix argued in 1963, and Candida Moss has more recently maintained (2013), the idea that Christians were systematically targeted by the Roman administration is a Christian fiction.

15 Barnes (1968b: 522–3); Frend (1993: 87); Dronke (1984: 1); Amat (1997: 20–1); LeClercq (1939: 421); Van Beek (1938: 3).

16 Barnes (1968a: 40–1). For the opposite perspective, see Frend (1975).

17 That Perpetua is not presented as having been killed in a wave of systematic persecution supports an earlier date, before the mid third century, since the later persecutions were widespread.

18 Latin text per Amat (1996). Heffernan's text reads 'Christianus es.'

19 The editor of the Passio relates that the guard had received 'warnings from false witnesses (homines vanissimores)' about the prisoners (16.2), like Pliny's complaint that 'others who were named by the informer said that they were Christians and then denied it, explaining that they had been, but had ceased to be such, some three years ago' (Ep. 10.96, trans. H. M. Gwatkin in Stevenson 1987: 19).

20 Other martyr traditions present alternative dynamics of persecution. For example, the Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs presents the martyrdom of these six women and six men as essentially voluntary and initiated by the martyrs themselves. The proconsul Saturninus entreats the Christians to 'return to their senses [so that they might] obtain the pardon of our lord the emperor' (Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs 2; tr. Musurillo 1972: 87). Although Perpetua is not portrayed as an eager volunteer for martyrdom, the vague description of her arrest leaves open the possibility that she, like her predecessors, came forward to publicly bear witness.

21 Roman prosopographies do not link the praenomen 'Minucius' with the nomen 'Timinianus': see Harris and Gifford (1890: 9). Hilarianus is also a common name for North African procurators. Only one version of the Passio contains the name Geta (Heffernan 2012: 110; Amat 1996: 130), which is actually spelled in the manuscript with a 'C' instead of a 'G,' employing the archaic orthography for the velar plosive sound (before the voiced 'g' and voiceless 'k' sounds were distinguished by different letters). That this tradition is historically unreliable can be inferred from a note in the Latin historian Spartianus that Geta's birthday was in May, not February or March (Barnes 1968b: 523).

22 Amat (1999: 301–7); Aronen (1984: 67–76); Franchi de'Cavalieri (1962 [1896]: 199–262); Kitzler (2015: 66–9; Lomanto (1975: 566–86).

23 Thurston and Attwater (1956: I, 493). Barnes' attempt to verify the authenticity of the eyewitness account of the Passio relies solely on Roman dates for Geta's birth. He never considers the lack of textual evidence for the Geta reference itself, or the problems of competing dates in other calendars and versions (1968b: 521–5). Heffernan does evaluate these concerns, leading him to 'cautiously' suggest that the reference was added by the redactor for 'historical verisimilitude' (2012: 76–7). Not long after their appearance in the Roman calendar, the martyrs are listed in the Syriac martyrology.

24 BHG 1566, discussed in Kitzler (2015: 77).

25 Kitzler (2015: 76); Perraymond (1989: 560–3); Schlunk (1965: 139–66). There may also be a mid fourth-century fresco in the Roman Domitilla Catacomb depicting Perpetua's ladder vision, although its interpretation is debated due to its fragmentary state (Kitzler 2015: 76; Wilpert 1903: 485–6).

26 Conc. Hippon. A. 393: 5, canon 36 = Reg. Eccl. Carthag. Excerpt. c. 46 (CCL 149: 43, 186): De passionibus martyrum. Liceat etiam legi passiones martyrum, cum anniversarii dies eorum celebrantur (see also canon 5 of the original record in CCL 149: 21: Ab universis episcopis dictum est: Omnibus placet ut scripturae canonicae quae lectae sunt, sed et passiones martyrum, sui cuiusque locis, in ecclesiis praedicentur); Concilium Carthagensis, III. 47, quoted in Delehaye (1912: 423 n. 3): Ut praeter scripturas canonicas nihil in ecclesia legatur sub nomine divinarum scripturarum . . . Liceat etiam legi passiones martyrum quum anniversarii dies eorum celebrantur.

27 Augustine, Sermons 280–2, and the recently-published Sermon 282 auct. 3 = Erfurt 1, which is a more complete version of Sermon 282 (Schiller et al. 2008: 260–4). Dating follows Hill (1994: 76, 80, 82). Other references to Perpetua appear in Sermon 159A, Enarrationes in Psalmos 47.13, and the treatise De natura et origine animae 1.10.12–11.13; 2.10.14–12.16; 3.9.12; 3.13.19; 4.18.26–7. The first two appearances are perfunctory and offer no basis for textual comparison. In De natura, however, the correspondence between Augustine and the Passio's description of Perpetua's second and fourth visions align.

28 Augustine, Sermo 280.1. Since the moment of death was equivalent to second baptism, or rebirth into the Spirit, these days were called dies natalis. The custom of referring to the acts of saints and martyrs as gesta makes more explicit the parallel between the Christian commemorations and the Roman celebration of the Emperors' birthdays. In his commentary on Psalms, Augustine cites the text as The Passion of Blessed Perpetua which 'we know and read' (Enarrationes in Psalmos 47.13).

29 Pseudo-Augustine, Sermons 394 and 394A. See Amat (1996: 271). One sermon is tentatively identified by Shewring as authentic Augustine, yet he admits 'Whether it may in fact be genuine I lack the competence to say' (1931: xxix).

30 Heffernan (2012: 107).

31 Braun (1979: 105); Frend (1965: 363, 365); Fridh (1968: 9–10); Harris and Gifford (1890: 8). It is implausible to suggest that Augustine and pseudo-Augustine could have made a mistake in their sermons just after the text had been read aloud before their congregations. Kitzler attributes the discrepancies to Augustine's strenuous efforts to domesticate the unsettling elements of the Passio (2015: 86–91), but this does not account for all the inconsistencies.

32 Augustine, Sermo 281.3, ET in Hill. Subsequent quotations for Augustine's sermons are from this translation.

33 For an ET of the Acts of (Paul and) Thecla, see Kraemer (2004: 299–308); for a feminist commentary with helpful bibliography, see McGinn (1994). See also Kraemer (2011: 118–20).

34 Heffernan (1995: 315–25; 2012: 4–5), citing its oral quality; Habermehl (1992: 241–8), who raises concerns but ultimately does not resolve the question of the authenticity of the diary.

35 David Konstan explores the formal and thematic parallels to romantic novels (2012).

36 Heffernan (2012: 83), a revision of his view in 1995: 323–4.

37 Dronke (1984: 1–17); Petroff (1986: 63); Shaw (1992: 19).

38 See, e.g., Shaw (1993), Dronke (1984) and Petroff (1986), all of whom argue for a distinctive female style.

39 Kenneth Steinhauser argues that Vincentius was Montanist, rather than Pelagian, as is generally assumed (1997: 245–9).

40 Interestingly, the possessive eorum does occur in Tertullian's citation of these verses, which itself differs from other ancient attestations: in novissimis temporibus effundam de Spiritu meo in omnem carnem et prophetabunt filii filiae que eorum et super servos et ancillas meas de meo Spiritus (sic?) effundam (Adversus Marcionem 5.8).

41 For the thesis that she was not, see Poirier (1970). Neither Augustine nor Ps. Augustine nor Quodvultdeus describes Felicitas as a slave.

42 Survey of the literature can be found in Butler (2006: 2–6). Although recent scholarship notes that Montanists comprised one of the many varieties within the Christian congregations of Carthage, and that their heretical status is a later development, Tabbernee suggests that opposition to the movement may have emerged in early third-century Carthage (2009: 63–5). Heffernan argues that the prologue frames the Passio as a defense of the New Prophecy, whose status had already come under attack at the beginning of the third century in Rome (Heffernan 2012: 11).

43 In a manner not unlike that which Kugel (1990) argues for the rabbinic Joseph traditions, and Kraemer (1998) explores with regard to the Greek tales of Joseph and Aseneth.

44 Examples of women's lives include the Life of Macrina; the Life of Melania the Younger; and the Life of Olympias.

45 See Shaw (1993: 10–11), for more detailed discussion of the issues such as the antiquity of the Vibii, whether or not they were of Senatorial status, and so forth.

46 See again Shaw (1993: 10, esp. note 28) for details; see also critical apparatus to 2.1 in Amat (1996: 104), and her commentary (192–3).

47 Cooper (2011: 198); Moss (2012: 131). Although see Sigismund-Nielsen's proposal that this was local custom (2012: 108) and Heffernan's suggestion that Perpetua's imprisonment terminated her wet nurse's services (2012: 205).

48 Snyder (1989); Kraemer (1991); Harris (1989); Hallett (1999).

49 Shaw (1993: 12), citing Harris (1989) and Dronke (1984: 107–11).

50 See Cooper's argument that Perpetua's marital status was added by a later editor to overcome the embarrassment of her illegitimate child (2011: 198–9).

51 Amat (1996: 32; 200), where she asks whether the frater is here Saturus, presumably because it is Saturus who appears in the requested vision. In 5.3, Perpetua's father implores her to think of her brothers (aspice fratres tuos) who will be devastated by her death. Were it not for the claim of the narrator that one of her brothers was a catechumen as well, we might read this to suggest that however many brothers she had were not Christians, any more than her mother, aunt, or father were Christians.

52 On which, see Hallett (1984); Kraemer (1993).

53 Shaw (1993); Perkins (1995); Cooper (2011).

54 In 4.1, the 'brother' also addresses Perpetua as domina soror.

55 See Amat (1996: 193) for brief treatment of the possibility that conserva designates a spouse.

56 But see also the possibility discussed above that a desire to conform to the biblical citation of Joel 2:28–29/ Acts 2:17–18 also affects the representation of Felicitas.

57 The chronology of Tertullian's life, including his period as a Montanist, is quite complex: for discussion, see Barnes (1971).

58 E.g., C. Th. 16.5.59 (from 423) and various others. Ancient evidence is collected in Heine (1989); Tabbernee (1997). For a recent treatment, see Trevett (1996); for briefer overviews of the movement, particularly with reference to women, see Kraemer (1992: 157–73); Elm (1994). One might speculate that the preface, which is preserved in only one Latin manuscript and the Greek, reflects a Montanist framing of the Passio.

59 Epiphanius, Panarion 49.2; Kraemer (1992: 163–5).

60 An important study on this topic is Robeck (1992). Cf. Tabbernee (1997: 56–7).

61 According to Tertullian, Christians visited confessors to ask for intercessions of various sorts: adulterers and 'fornicators' flocked to those imprisoned to ask for absolution, bring with them food and drink for the martyrs, reminiscent of Passio 9.1; De pudicitia 22.1.

62 For further discussion of this, and of women's leadership in early Christian churches, see Kraemer (1992: 174–98, esp. 179–81); Cardman (1999).

63 Perpetua is even listed on the Syriac calendar, yet her co-martyr there is Saturnilus ('l' and 'n' are easily confused in Syriac), not Felicitas (W. Wright in Robinson [1891: 23]).

Bibliography

Amat, J. (1996) Passion de Perpétue at de Félicite suivi des Acts: Introduction, Texte Critique, Traduction, Commentaire et Index. Source Chrétiennes, 417. Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf.

Aronen, J. (1984) 'Indebtedness to Passio Perpetuae in Pontius' Vita Cypriani,' Vigiliae Christianae 38: 67–76.

Atkinson, P. C. (1982) 'The Montanist interpretation of Joel 2: 28, 29 (LXX 3: 1, 2),' Studia Evangelica 126(7): 11–15.

Barnes, T. D. (1968a) 'Legislation against the Christians,' Journal of Roman Studies 58: 32–50.

Barnes, T. D. (1968b) 'Pre-Decian Acta Martyrum,' Journal of Theological Studies 19(2): 509–31.

Barnes, T. D. (1971) Tertullian: A Historical and Literary Study. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Barnes, T. D. (2010) Early Christian Hagiography and Roman History. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Bastiaensen, A. A. R. (1982) 'Tertullian's reference to the 'Pasio Perpetuae' in 'De Anima' 55,4,' Studia Patristica 17(2): 790–95.

Bowersock, G. (1995) Martyrdom and Rome. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Braun, R. (1979) 'Nouvelles observations linguistiques sure le rédacteur de la "Passio Perpetuae",' Vigiliae Christianae 33: 105–17.

Bremmer, J. N. (2003) 'The vision of Saturus in the Passio Perpetuae,' in Martínez, F. G. and Luttikhuizen, G. P. (eds) Jerusalem, Alexandria, Rome: Studies in Ancient Cultural Interaction in Honour of A. Hilhorst. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 55–73.

Bremmer, J. N. and Formisano, M. (eds) (2012) Perpetua's Passions. Multidisciplinary Approaches to the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Burrus, V. (2008) Saving Shame. Martyrs, Saints, and Other Abject Subjects. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Butler, R. D. (2006) The New Prophecy and 'New Visions': Evidence of Montanism in the Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Cardman, F. (1999) 'Women, ministry and church order in early Christianity,' in Kraemer, R. S. and D'Angelo, M. R. (eds) Women and Christian Origins. New York: Oxford University Press, 300–29.

Castelli, E. A. (2004) Martyrdom and Memory. Early Christian Culture Making. New York: Columbia University Press.

Cobb, L. S. (2008). Dying to Be Men. Gender and Language in Early Christian Martyr Texts. New York: Columbia University Press.

Cooper, K. (2011) 'A father, a daughter, and a procurator: Authority and resistance in the prison diary of Perpetua of Carthage,' Gender and History 23(3): 685–702.

Cox-Miller, P. (1992) 'The Devil's gateway: An eros of difference in the dreams of Perpetua,' Dreaming 2: 45–63.

Delehaye, P. (1912) Les origines du culte des martyrs. Brussels: Bureaux de la Société des Bollandistes.

De Ste. Croix, G. (1963) 'Why were early Christians persecuted?,' Past and Present 26: 6–38.

Dolbeau, F. (1995) 'Un sermon inédit d'origine africaine, pour la fête des saintes Perpétue et Félicité,' Analecta Bollandiana 113: 89–106.

Dronke, P. (1984) Women Writers of the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua (†203) to Marguerite Porete (†1310). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Duval, Y. (1982) Loca Sanctorum Africae. Le culte des martyres en Afrique du IVe au VIIe siècle, vols. 1–2. Rome: École française de Rome.

Ehrmann, B. D. (2011) Forged: Writing in the Name of God: Why the Bible's Authors Are Not Who We Think They Are. New York: HarperOne.

Ehrmann, B. D. (2013) Forgery and Counterforgery: The Use of Literary Deceit in Early Christian Polemics. New York: Oxford University Press.

Elm, S. (1994) 'Montanist oracles,' in Fiorenza, E. S. (ed.) Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Commentary. New York: Crossroad, 2: 131–8.

Fantham, E., Peet Foley, H., Boymel Kampen, N., Pomeroy, S. B. and Shapiro, H. A. (eds) (1994) Women in the Classical World. New York: Oxford University Press.

Farina, W. (2009) Perpetua of Carthage: Portrait of a Third-Century Martyr. Jefferson, NC and London: McFarland and Co., Inc.

Franchi de'Cavalieri, P. (1962) 'La passio SS. Perpetuae et Felicitatis,' in Scritti agiografici, vol. 1, Studi e testi 221: 41–154. Città del Vaticano: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana. Originally published in (1896) Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und Kirchengeschichte. Supplementhefte 5. Rome: Buchdruckerei des Senates, Forzani n. Co.

Frend, W. H. C. (1965) Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church from the Maccabees to Donatus. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Frend, W. H. C. (1975) 'A Severan persecution? Evidence of the Historia Augusta,' Forma Futuri. Studi in onore del Cardinale Michele Pellegrino. Turin, Italy: Bottega D'Erasmo, 470–80.

Frend, W. H. C. (1978) 'Blandina and Perpetua: Two early Christian heroines,' in Leglay, M. (ed.) Les Martyrs de Lyons (177). Paris: Éditions du Centre nationale de la recherche scientifique. Reprinted (1993) in Scholer, D. N. (ed.) (1993) Women in Early Christianity 14. New York: Garland, 87–115.

Fridh, Å. (1968) Le problème de la passion des saintes Perpétue et Felicité, Studia Graeca et Latina Gothoburgensia, 26. Gothenburg, Sweden: Acta Universitatis Gothoburgensis.

Graf, F. (2004) 'Bridge and the ladder: Narrow passages in late Antique visions,' in Boustan, R. and Reed, A. Y. (eds) Heavenly Realms and Earthly Realities in Late Antique Religions. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 19–33.

Habermehl, P. (1992) Perpetua und der Ägypter oder Bilder des Bösen im frühen afrikanischen Christentum. Ein Versuch zur Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.

Hallett, J. (1984) Fathers and Daughters in Roman Society: Women and the Elite Family. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Hallett, J. (1999) 'Women's lives in the ancient Mediterranean,' in Kraemer, R. S. and D'Angelo, M. R. (eds) Women and Christian Origins. New York: Oxford University Press, 13–34.

Halporn, J. W. (1991) 'Literary history and generic expectations in the Passio and Acta Perpetuae,' Vigiliae Christianae 45: 223–41.

Harris, R. and Gifford, S. (1890) The Acts of the Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicity. The original Greek text now first edited from an ms. in the library of the Convent of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. London: C. J. Clay and Sons.

Harris, W. V. (1989) Ancient Literacy. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Heffernan, T. (1995) 'Philology and authorship in the Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis,' Traditio: Studies in Ancient and Medieval History, Thought, and Religion 50: 315–25.

Heffernan, T. (2012) The Passion of Perpetua and Felicity. New York: Oxford University Press.

Heine, R. J. (1989) Montanist Oracles and Testimonia. North American Patristic Society 14. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Hill, E. (1994) The Works of Saint Augustine: A Translation for the 21st Century 3. Hyde Park, NY: New City Press.

Kitzler, P. (2015) From 'Passio Perpetuae' to 'Acta Perpetuae': Recontextualizing a Martyr Story in the Literature of the Early Church. Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte 127. Berlin; Munich, Germany and Boston, MA: Walter de Gruyter.

Klawiter, F. (1980) 'The role of martyrdom and persecution in developing the priestly authority of women in early Christianity: A case study of Montanism,' Church History 49(3): 251–61.

Konstan, D. (2012) 'Perpetua's martyrdom and the metamorphosis of narrative,' in Bremmer, J. H. and Formisano, M. (eds) Perpetua's Passions. Multidisciplinary Approaches to the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 291–9.

Kraemer, R. S. (1988) Maenads, Martyrs, Matrons, Monastics: A Sourcebook of Women's Religions in the Greco-Roman World. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Kraemer, R. S. (1991) 'Women's authorship of Jewish and Christian literature in the Greco-Roman period,' in Levine, A.-J. (ed.) 'Women Like This': New Perspectives on Jewish Women in the Greco-Roman Period. Early Judaism and its Literature 1. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 221–42.

Kraemer, R. S. (1992) Her Share of the Blessings: Women's Religions Among Pagans, Jews and Christians in the Greco-Roman World. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kraemer, R. S. (1993) 'Jewish mothers and daughters in the Greco-Roman world,' in Cohen, S. J. D. (ed.) In the Jewish Family in Antiquity. Brown Judaic Studies 289. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 89–112.

Kraemer, R. S. (1998) When Aseneth Met Joseph. A Late Antique Tale of the Biblical Patriarch and His Egyptian Wife, Reconsidered. New York: Oxford University Press.

Kraemer, R. S. (ed.) (2004) Women's Religions in the Greco-Roman World: A Sourcebook. New York and Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kraemer, R. S. (2011) Unreliable Witnesses: Religion, Gender and History in the Greco-Roman Mediterranean. New York and Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kraemer, R. S. (2012). 'Becoming Christian,' In James, S. L. and Dillon, S. (eds) A Companion to Women in the Ancient World. Blackwell Companions to the Ancient World. Malden, MA and Oxford, UK: Wiley-Blackwell, 524–38.

Kugel, J. (1990) In Potiphar's House: The Interpretive Life of Biblical Texts. San Francisco, CA: Harper Collins.

LeClercq, H. (1939) 'Perpétue et Félicité (Stes),' in Cabrol, F. and LeClercq, H. (eds) Dictionnaire d'Archéologie Chrétienne et de Liturgie. Letouzey et Ané 14(1): 393–444.

Lefkowitz, M. R. (1976) 'The motivations for St. Perpetua's martyrdom,' Journal of the American Academy of Religion 44: 417–21.

Lomanto, V. (1975) 'Rapporti fra la Passio Perpetuae e Passiones africane,' in Maddalena, A. (ed.) Forma futuri: Studi in onore del Cardinale Michele Pellegrino. Turin, Italy: Bottega d'Erasmo, 566–86.

Maitland, S. (1996) The Martyrdom of Perpetua. Visionary Women 3. Evesham, UK: Arthur James.

McGinn, S. E. (1994) in Fiorenza, E. S. (ed.) Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Commentary. New York: Crossroad, 800–28.

Miles, M. (1989) Carnal Knowing: Female Nakedness and Religious Meaning in the Christian West. New York: Random House.

Mommsen, T. (ed.) (1891) Monumenta Germaniae Historica. Auctores Antiquissimi. Berlin: Weidmann.

Moss, C. (2010) 'Blood ties: Martyrdom, motherhood, and family in the passion of Perpetua and Felicitas,' in Ahearne-Kroll, S. P., Kelhoffer, J. A. and Holloway, P. A. (eds) Women Seeking the Divine: Interdisciplinary Approaches. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, 183–202.

Moss, C. (2012) Ancient Christian Martyrdom: Diverse Practices, Ideologies, and Traditions. Yale Anchor Reference Library. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Moss, C. (2013) The Myth of Persecution: How Early Christians Invented a Dangerous Legacy. San Francisco, CA: HarperOne.

Musurillo, H. (1972) The Acts of the Christian Martyrs. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Osiek, C. (2002) 'Perpetua's husband,' Journal of Early Christian Studies 10: 287–90.

Perkins, J. B. (1995) The Suffering Self. Pain and Narrative Representation in the Early Christian Era. London: Routledge.

Perkins, J. B. (2007) 'The rhetoric of the maternal body in the passion of Perpetua,' in Penner, T. and Vander Stichele, C. (eds) Mapping Gender in Ancient Religious Discourses. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 318–32.

Petroff, E. A. (1986) Medieval Women's Visionary Literature. New York: Oxford University Press.

Poirier, M. (1970) 'Note sur la Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis: Félicité était-elle vraiment l'esclave de Perpetué?,' in Cross, F. M. (ed.) Studia Patristica 10(1): 306–9.

Potter, D. S. (2010) 'Entertainers in the Roman empire,' in Potter, D. S. and Mattingly, D. J. (eds) Life, Death, and Entertainment in the Roman Empire. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 280–349.

Rader, R. (1981) 'Perpetua,' in Wilson–Kastner, P. et al. (eds) A Lost Tradition: Women Writers of the Early Church. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1–32.

Reardon, B. P. (1989) Collected Ancient Greek Novels. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Rives, J. B. (1995) Religion and Authority in Roman Carthage from Augustus to Constantine. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Robeck, C. Jr., (1992*) Prophecy in Carthage. Perpetua, Tertullian, and Cyprian*. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press.

Robinson, J. A. (1891) The Passion of S. Perpetua. Newly Edited from the Mss. with an Introduction and Notes. Cambridge Theological Studies 1.2. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Salisbury, J. E. (1997) Perpetua's Passion. The Death and Memory of a Young Roman Woman. New York: Routledge.

Schiller, I., Weber, D. and Weidmann, C. (2008) Sechs neue Augustinuspredigten: Teil 1 mit Edition Dreier Sermones. Vienna, Austria: Wiener Studen 121, 227–84.

Shaw, B. (1987) 'The age of Roman girls at marriage: Some reconsiderations,' Journal of Roman Studies 77: 30–46.

Shaw, B. (1993) 'The passion of Perpetua,' Past and Present 139(1): 3–45.

Shaw, B. (2004) 'Postscript 2003,' in Osborne, R. (ed.) Studies in Ancient Greek and Roman Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Shewring, W. H. (1931) The Passion of Perpetua and Felicity. A New Edition and Translation of the Latin Text Together with the Sermons of Saint Augustine. London: Sheed and Ward.

Sigismund-Nielsen, H. (2012) 'Vibia Perpetua—An indecent woman,' in Bremmer, J. H. and Formisano, M. (eds) Perpetua's Passions. Multidisciplinary Approaches to the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 103–17.

Snyder, J. (1989) The Woman and the Lyre: Women Writers in Classical Greece and Rome. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press.

Steinhauser, K. B. (1997) 'Augustine's reading of the Passio sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis,' Studia Patristica 33: 244–9. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Streete, G. C. (2009) Redeemed Bodies. Women Martyrs in Early Christianity. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press.

Stevenson, J. (1987) A New Eusebius. Documents Illustrating the History of the Church to AD 337. London: SPCK. (Reprint of 1957 edition).

Tabbernee, W. (1997) Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia. Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism. North American Patristic Society Patristic Monograph Series 16. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Tabbernee, W. (2005) 'Perpetua, Montanism, and Christian ministry in Carthage c. 203 CE,' Perspectives in Religious Studies 32(4): 421–42.

Tabbernee, W. (2007) Fake Prophecy and Polluted Sacraments: Ecclesiastical and Imperial Reactions. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press.

Tabbernee, W. (2009) Prophets and Gravestones: An Imaginary History of Montanists and Other Early Christians. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers.

Thurston, H. and Attwater, D. (1956) Butler's Lives of the Saints. New York: P. J. Kennedy & Sons.

Tilley, M. (1994) 'The passion of Perpetua and Felicity,' in Fiorenza, E. S. (ed.) Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Commentary. New York: Crossroad, 2: 829–58.

Trevett, C. (1996) Montanism. Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Van Beek, C. J. M. J. (1936) Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Vol 1. Textum Graecum et Latinum ad fidem codicum MSS. Nijmegen, The Netherlands: Noviomagi, Deker & Van de Vegt. Repr. 1956.

Van Beek, C. J. M. J. (1938) Passio Sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Latine et Graece. Florilegium Patristicum 43, Geyer, B. and Zellinger, J. (eds). Bonn: Peter Hanstein.

Von Franz, M.-L. (1951) 'Die Passio Perpetuae: Versuch einer psychologischen Deutung,' in Jung, C. G. (ed.) Aion: Untersuchungen zur Symbolgeschichte. Zurich: Rascher.

Von Franz, M.-L. (1980 [1949]) The Passion of Perpetua: A Psychological Interpretation of Her Visions. Jungian Classics Series 2. Irving, TX: Spring Publishers.

Williams, C. (2012) 'Perpetua's gender. A Latinist reads the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitas,' in Bremmer, J. H. and Formisano, M. (eds) Perpetua's Passions. Multidisciplinary Approaches to the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 54–77.

Wilpert, J. (1903) Die Malereien der Katakomben Rom, Tafeln. Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder.

Wypustek, A. (1997) 'Magic, Montanism, Perpetua, and the Severan persecution,' Vigiliae Christianae 51: 276–97.

50

CONSTANTINE

Bill Leadbetter

Introduction

Constantine remains a figure of controversy. He is one of those people who seem by their personality, their acumen and their ability both to take the opportunities offered and to leave the world markedly changed by their presence in it. He has bequeathed a series of paradoxes: an autocrat who never ruled alone; a firm legislator for the Roman family, yet who slew his wife and eldest son and was perhaps, himself, illegitimate; a dynastic puppet-master, who left no clear successor; a soldier whose legacy was far more spiritual than temporal.

Constantine's origins

His origins lay within the ruling Roman military caste. By the late third century, the traditional Roman landed aristocracy had given way to a new class of men distinguished by their military merits. Constantine's father, Constantius, was one such. Of Pannonian origin (Aurelius Victor, De Caesaribus 39.26), he followed a career within the senior echelons of the army. At some point during Constantius' rise through the senior ranks he acquired Helena, a concubine of humble origins (Leadbetter 1998b). In about 272, their son Constantine was born in the Pannonian town of Naissus, the modern Niš, in southern Serbia (Barnes 1982: 39–42).

The Dyarchy and the Tetrarchy

In November 284, the guard captain, Valerius Diocles, was proclaimed emperor. Taking the name Diocletian, he sealed his usurpation with victory in the field over Carinus, his rival, in the following year. Diocletian's accession to unchallenged power marked a change in the way in which the Roman world was ruled. Beset by pressure on the frontiers, separatist revolt and the pressing need for administrative change, he appointed a deputy with whom he formally shared power, thus creating a 'Dyarchy' ('rule by two'). The person whom he appointed, Maximian, was another Pannonian military man (Epitome de Caesaribus 40.10). Diocletian was careful to preserve both the trappings and the reality of seniority (Leadbetter 1998c), but the junior emperor was still a formidable figure.

A cryptic passage in a panegyric to Maximian, delivered in 289, has led many scholars to accept that, by that time Constantius was Maximian's Praetorian Prefect (Barnes 1982: 37, 125 f.; Nixon and Rodgers 1994: 70 f.; Leadbetter 1998b: 75–77). The passage (Panegyrici Latini 10 [2] 11.4) celebrates a marriage, in all likelihood the marriage of Constantius and Maximian's daughter, Theodora. At this point, then, Constantius put his concubine aside for the sake of a highly advantageous dynastic match.

In 293, Diocletian expanded the imperial college still further. While he and Maximian retained their ranks as emperors of more senior status (Augusti), two deputies, each with the title of 'most noble (nobilissimus) Caesar', were appointed. This arrangement is referred to by modern scholars as the 'Tetrarchy' ('rule by four') and was commemorated in imperial statuary (see Chapter 10 and Figures 10.1 and 10.2 in this volume). Diocletian's deputy was his own son-in-law, Galerius. Maximian's was Constantius. The principal task for the Caesars was to assert imperial authority on the frontiers and win back separatist regions. As generals, they were extremely successful. Constantius recaptured Britain from the separatist emperor, Allectus; Galerius shattered the power of Rome's ancient enemy, Persia.

Constantine's early career

Like his father, Constantine pursued a military career. He was assisted by his father's rank, but all of his early military service was in the armies of Galerius and Diocletian (Barnes 1982: 41 f.). While it is legitimate to conjecture that he was hostage for his father's loyalty during this period, he was also an active and valiant warrior. He was in the army of Galerius which invaded Persia, and fought with distinction against Sarmatian bands on the Danube frontier. Soon afterwards, he was transferred to Diocletian's personal staff, where he served until 305.

Figure 50.1   Head of Constantine from the Basilica of Constantine in Rome. Photo J. C. N. Coulston

In May 305, Diocletian and Maximian abdicated. Diocletian's abdication was voluntary (although it followed upon a long illness); Maximian was less willing, but he complied with his senior colleague's wishes. Both retired to country houses and were succeeded by their deputies: Constantius replaced Maximian and Galerius took the place of Diocletian. Constantius, however, was the senior of the two, and his name appears first in inscriptions of the period. One source suggests that it was expected that the new Caesars would be Constantine and Maxentius, the son of Maximian (Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 18.8). Instead, they were Maximin Daia and Severus, both men loyal to Galerius.

Galerius had benefited immensely from the transfer of power. While he could not inherit Diocletian's formal seniority, he sought to exercise Diocletian's station (Leadbetter 2009: 156–167). Constantius, for his part, seems to have accepted the situation. It may be that he had no desire to risk open conflict with Galerius; it may be that he was mindful Constantine was now posted to the court of Galerius. Constantius certainly sent to Galerius, asking that his son be returned to him (Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 23.3–4; Origo Constantini imperatoris 2.2.). Galerius, unable to decline such a request, acceded, and Constantine returned to his father's side in time to accompany him on campaign against the Picts (Panegyrici Latini 6 [7] 7.5). On 25 July 306, however, Constantius died and Constantine was proclaimed emperor by the troops in York (for the dates, see Barnes 1982: 61).

Constantine the politician

Constantine did not immediately set himself up as a rival to Galerius. Rather, he sought Galerius' recognition. His opportunism was swiftly imitated. In late October 306, Maximian's son Maxentius, then resident in Rome, was proclaimed emperor by the remnants of the Praetorian Guard still resident there. He was careful to claim no title, striking coins instead as princeps rather than Augustus or Caesar (Cullhed 1994: 32–34). This did not suffice to appease Galerius, who might reward audacity when there was an imperial vacancy to fill, but could not countenance disloyalty otherwise. Severus, Constantius' successor in the west, marched against the rebel, who sat securely behind the walls of Rome. Maxentius called upon his father for aid. Maximian had commanded the troops now serving under Severus. He recalled them to their old loyalty and, deserted by his army, Severus fled to Ravenna, where he was handed over to Maximian, compelled to abdicate and then executed (Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 26.6–11; Origo Constantini Imperatoris 3.6–4.10.). The vacancy which Maxentius required had been created, but not in any way calculated to endear him to Galerius. The senior emperor himself now marched on the rebel, but with only marginally more success. Galerius retired from Italy with his life and his army, but Maxentius still remained, unscathed, behind the walls of Rome.

Maxentius' successful revolt was a piece of extraordinary good fortune for Constantine. It reintroduced Maximian into the affairs of the empire, and robbed effective control of the west from Galerius, thus effectively leaving Constantine a free hand in his own lands. Constantine used his opportunity to cement his position through dynastic arrangements of his own. He had previously enjoyed a relationship with a concubine, Minervina, who had borne him a son, Crispus (Epitome de Caesaribus 41.4; Zosimus 2.20.2 and Zonaras 13.2.37 all call Minervina a concubine. There is no reason to dispute their testimony, although Jones et al. 1971: 602–603 suggest otherwise). This relationship was now put aside for a grand match.

As the armies of Galerius marched through Italy in 307, Constantine was marrying Maximian's daughter Fausta. An orator celebrated the occasion in a panegyric, which also noted a further development. Constantine had accepted promotion to the rank of Augustus from the hands of Maximian (Panegyrici Latini 7 [6] 5.3). Constantine's claim to the senior rank was attractive and plausible. He had been Caesar to the slain Severus, and his claim was recognized by Maximian, whose authority, at this point, was still considerable. This latter point was not lost on the panegyrist who made much of it.

Galerius, however, claimed the right to nominate Severus' successor. He nominated himself and the retired Diocletian as consuls for the following year (308) and summoned an imperial conference at Carnuntum in Pannonia. Diocletian's presence added due weight to its deliberations. Maximian was prevailed upon to return to private life; the two, together with Galerius nominated a new Augustus for the west, Licinius, an old friend and ally of Galerius (Origo Constantini imperatoris 5.13). Constantine was not rejected from this scheme; instead, he retained the insignia of Caesar.

This arrangement was hardly satisfactory to Constantine who did not attend the conference and ignored its decisions. He remained the effective ruler of Britain, Gaul and Spain, whereas his nominal superior, Licinius, controlled a patch of Pannonia, and had the task of recovering Italy and Africa from Maxentius. Constantine took his responsibilities seriously. When not engaged in high politics, he was on campaign (Barnes 1982: 70). In 310, Maximian, excluded from power by Maxentius and reduced to the pathetic status of vexatious supplicant, sought to depose Constantine. The coup was ludicrous; the aged Augustus, its only casualty, was forced into suicide. Constantine's condign treatment of his father-in-law illustrates the limits of his pietas. Another panegyric, delivered in Autun in 310, sets out the official version (Nixon and Rodgers 1996: 237–243).

The panegyrist of 310 was also entrusted to deploy a hitherto undisclosed fact about Constantine's family. In praising the emperor, he also praised his ancestry: not merely his father Constantius, but also a more remote antecedent: the emperor Claudius II Gothicus (r. 268–270), a hero of the Roman recovery, mythologized for the defeat of a Gothic horde and premature death from plague (Panegyrici Latini 6 [7] 2; Syme 1974; Nixon and Rodgers 1996: 219). Although the precise nature of Constantine's kinship with Claudius was never explained by the panegyrist, it is nevertheless clear that a new image was being crafted. Hitherto, Constantine had rested his claims to legitimacy upon both his recognition by Galerius and Constantine and his proclamation by Constantius' army in 306. He now set these narratives aside in favour of one more overtly dynastic. One reason for this change of strategy may well have lain with Galerius. The senior Augustus had already begun making plans for his retirement. A palatial villa was being constructed for him at Romuliana, the place of his birth (Srejovic et al. 1983; Srejovic 1985, 1992/3; Leadbetter 2009: 237–232). Lactantius states that he had already commenced amassing state resources for the celebration of his vicennalia (Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 31.2). This year-long celebration of his accomplishment and longevity was due to commence in March 312 and conclude with his abdication twelve months later.

Constantine was probably therefore preparing the ground for his own claim to seniority within the empire. His anticipation was rewarded when Galerius died prematurely in May 311, granting a grudging toleration to the Christians on his deathbed (Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 34–35; Leadbetter 2009: 223–225; Potter 2013: 134). No successor was proclaimed. Rather, Licinius and Maximinus partitioned the territories that he had occupied: Licinius took control of the Balkan provinces; Maximinus those of Asia Minor. The empire was again ruled by four emperors, but it was not a collegial arrangement. War between them was inevitable.

War with Maxentius

The historical image of Maxentius has largely been crafted by Constantine's propagandists. From them emerges a picture of a greedy, wanton and superstitious ruler. But Maxentius was never so wicked. He was a conscientious ruler who retained the loyalty of his troops. He tolerated Christianity, although he did exile two popes whose elections had occasioned disorder (Cullhed 1994: 72–73). Constantine, however, felt the need to blacken his memory, in all likelihood because the war which he waged against Maxentius was unprovoked.

In the summer of 312, Constantine invaded Italy. His army defeated a large force led by Maxentius' general, Pompeianus, at Verona, and then marched on Rome. Maxentius, sensitive to disloyalty, abandoned his earlier policy of sitting behind Rome's mighty walls and subverting his opponent's army. Instead, he marched out to confront Constantine. A recent discovery has thrown remarkable new light on this event. In December 2006 archaeologists excavating on the Palatine discovered a blue-green orb-topped sceptre in a wooden box that may have belonged to Maxentius. If so, Maxentius either arranged for the sceptre to be buried on the Palatine before he left to confront Constantine or his followers buried it after his defeat.[1] The armies met in battle outside Rome on the northern side of the Milvian Bridge (see Figure 50.2) and Maxentius was defeated, drowning in the Tiber in the chaotic retreat to Rome.

In consequence of his victory at the Milvian Bridge, Rome, Italy and Africa were now Constantine's. Constantine's victory and subsequent triumphal entry into Rome were celebrated on the Arch of Constantine later erected in the city (see Figure 50.3).

Eusebius, in his Life of Constantine (composed soon after the emperor's death in 337), states that Constantine himself had told him that one afternoon before this battle while marching with his army he saw with his own eyes, as did all his army, a cross of light written in the sky, together with the words 'In this conquer'. The following night Christ appeared to him in a vision with the sign seen in the sky and told him to make a copy of it to serve as his standard in war. Next day, Constantine summoned his craftsmen and produced such a standard, consisting of a tall pole and a cross-bar, with the now familiar chi-rho monogram (symbolizing Jesus Christ, chi and rho being the first two letters of Christos) embellished with gold and jewels at the top of the pole, and a banner carrying the image of Constantine hanging from the cross-bar. Thus was created the famous Labarum. Constantine also had his soldiers paint the chi-rho monogram on their shields (Jones 1972: 98–101).

The conversion of Constantine

The question of the conversion of Constantine has continued to excite controversy. Its authenticity has been questioned and asserted with equal ferocity (e.g. Keresztes 1981; Kee 1982). More recently, historians have preferred to accept the authenticity of Constantine's conversion but see it as a process rather than an event (e.g. Odahl 2004: 108–110; Potter 2013: 142–143). Whatever his private convictions, Constantine came to frame a religious policy that did more than merely tolerate Christianity.

Figure 50.2 The Milvian Bridge in Rome. Photo Philip F. Esler

Immediately following his defeat of Maxentius, Constantine confirmed his policy of toleration in an edict issued from Rome in which he ordered the cessation of persecution everywhere (Corcoran 1996: 187). This order was principally directed at Maximinus, who initially complied. Some months afterwards, Constantine met with Licinius in the city of Milan. There, the alliance between the two was sealed by the marriage of Licinius to Constantine's sister Constantia (Pohlsander 1993). They also produced a document, 'The Edict of Milan', which was enforced in the territory that they ruled directly. This granted universal toleration and the restitution of all Christian property.

Licinius' newfound acceptance of Christianity was one substantial policy difference which he had with Maximinus who had recommenced a persecution that he had been reluctant to abandon in the first place (Castritius 1969: 63–86; Mitchell 1988: 115; Nicholson 1994). Before the two armies of Maximinus and Licinius met in battle at Adrianople, that of Licinius recited a prayer to 'the supreme God', the words of which were (according to the emperor) dictated to him in a dream by an angel. The battle necessarily took on a religious dimension; Licinius, the champion of 'the supreme God' was challenging Maximinus, publically zealous for the traditional deities. In this religious trial by combat, Licinius was victorious and Maximinus fled to Tarsus where he died. Licinius was the master of the east; the last vestiges of persecution ceased; and the survivors of the families of both Diocletian and Galerius were eradicated (Lactantius, On the Deaths of the Persecutors 50–1).

Licinius' alliance with Constantine guaranteed peace for the Christians under his direct rule. His wife was Christian and places were found for bishops at his court (Pohlsander 1993: 156–157). The political relationship between the two was uneasy, however. A war broke out in 316 and Licinius was defeated, losing most of his European possessions to Constantine. It was only after this that Licinius revived a policy of hostility towards the Christians, perhaps fearing Christians as a fifth column for his rival. Licinius' anti-Christian measures became the substantive cause of the final war with Constantine, who was, no doubt, glad of the excuse which they provided for him (Barnes 1981: 72–73). In 324, Licinius was defeated and deposed by Constantine. The empire was now united under his authority. Persecution had gasped itself out and the Constantinian Church reigned triumphant.

Constantine and the Church

Introduction

When Constantine entered Rome in October 312, he brought with him an entirely new approach to Christianity. His predecessors had been hostile or ambivalent. He became an active patron and benefactor. In so doing, he was not careless of the sensitivities of those in the empire who were not Christians. Constantine was not a crass triumphalist. In the city of Rome itself, the only image of him that referred to the new faith was the great statue in the basilica in the Forum (see Figure 50.1). This statue depicted him holding the Labarum, his own symbol of Christianity, mentioned earlier. Otherwise, he expressed a dutiful traditionalism. The inscription on his triumphal arch in Rome refers coyly to 'the divinity' (Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae 694 = Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum 6. 1139). For five years or more after his victory at the Milvian Bridge his coinage retained traditional pagan images, such as Hercules the Victorious, Mars the Destroyer, Jupiter the Preserver and, above all, Sol Invictus, 'the Unconquered Sun' (Bruun 1966: 61–64; Jones 1972: 97;), which also features on his triumphal arch (see Figure 50.3).

These ought not to be taken as uncertainty in Constantine's own mind or policy but courtesy to the considerable numbers of people in the empire with traditional religious beliefs. Taken as a whole, Constantine's actions make his preference for Christianity perfectly clear. The tenor of his legislation

Figure 50.3 Relief of Constantine's triumphal entry into Rome, from the Arch of Constantine, showing Sol Invictus over the emperor and also in a chariot. Photo J. C. N. Coulston makes this clear as do his patronage of the Church, which was on a vast scale, and his involvement in its internal disputes, particularly the Donatist and Arian schisms. Christians in turn made their own preference for Constantine clear. A new theology of empire emerged which exalted the Christian emperor, a development with which Constantine was pleased to co-operate.

Legislative acts

Constantine's patronage of Christianity became evident soon after his victory over Maxentius. There is evidence of imperial subsidy of the Church and the exemption of Christian clergy from civic duties as early as 313 (Eusebius, H.E. 10.6–7). Such acts of favour towards the Church reflect a determination by Constantine to legitimate its place in the wider community. Because Christian groups had hitherto been fringe or clandestine, the Church had no clear public role. Throughout his legislation, Constantine sought to provide this. The exemption of clergy from civic duties, already flagged in a letter to the governor of Africa, was made more explicit in later mandates (Theodosian Code 16.2.1, 2). Such directives encouraged the view that bishops and other clergy were already, by virtue of their office, men in public life. Christian congregations, too, found a place in law. Slaves could now be manumitted by declaration before a gathering, in the presence of a bishop (Theodosian Code 4.7.1, 2.8.1; Code of Justinian 1.13.1); episcopal courts were given official legal status (Code of Justinian 1.27.1; Sirmondian Constitutions 1), clergy exempted from taxation (Theodosian Code 16.2.10), and the Christian day of worship (Sunday) declared a day of rest (Code of Justinian 3.12.2). Moreover, Constantine removed one legal impediment to Christian practice when he rescinded the old Augustan penalties against celibacy and childlessness (Theodosian Code 8.16.1) and sought to privilege Christians over Jews for the first time (Theodosian Code 16.8.3; Lindner 1987: 120–124). Moreover, he ordained that Jews be restrained from attacking members of their communities who converted to Christianity (Theodosian Code 16.8.1; Code of Justinian 1.9.3; Sirmondian Constitutions 4; Lindner 1987: 124–132, 138–144). These laws are not as innocuous as they might appear. They provide legal privileges for Christians and remove traditional privileges enjoyed by Jews.

The most controversial question relating to Constantine's legislation is that relating to traditional sacrifice. Eusebius makes a remark to the effect that Constantine abolished it altogether (Life of Constantine 2.45). This statement has been variously believed and disbelieved (Barnes 1981: 210–212; Drake 1982: 462–466). Endeavours to harmonize the evidence have been offered (Errington 1988; Bradbury 1994). Constantine's abhorrence of blood sacrifice is clear from his own statements and his preference for Christian governors ensured that public sacrifices normally performed by imperial officials would be discontinued (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 2.44; Bradbury 1994: 129–130).

Constantine as imperial patron

Constantine's patronage of the Christian Church also produced architectural innovation. Christians had not developed a distinct architecture for their public buildings for the simple reason that they did not have many. Those which they did possess were, by and large, private dwellings converted for the purpose like the third-century church building at Dura-Europos (Krautheimer 1965: 4–8), or humble affairs of mud and stone, as at Aqaba (Parker 1998: 254). In the city of Rome itself, there are twenty-five known pre-Constantinian Christian communities (Kirsch 1935; Lampe 1989) that met in converted premises. In all likelihood, these were confiscated by the state during the Great Persecution. Constantine unconditionally restored all Christian property very soon after his victory over Maxentius (Eusebius, H.E. 10.2.15–17).

These were humble venues and did not befit a religious community now in imperial favour. To ameliorate this, in early November 312 Constantine donated land to the Church on the outskirts of Rome (Krautheimer 1979: 89–90, 1983: 13–15). This was the station of the praetorian cavalry unit, the equites singulari, now disbanded. On this site, there swiftly rose the great basilica which we know today as St John Lateran (Holloway 2004: 57 – 8). Across the Tiber, in the Vatican fields, the entire side of a hill was levelled, the spoil tumbling into, and filling up, a gully in which both a pagan cemetery and a cenotaph of St Peter were located (Toynbee and Ward-Perkins 1956; Holloway 2004: 120–155.). Upon this terrace, another monumental basilica was constructed, dedicated to St Peter.

Temple-building had always been a major feature of imperial euergetism. When Constantine ordered the construction of the new Christian basilicas within Rome itself, he was extending imperial munificence to the new faith. This accorded the Christian Church a status which it had never possessed before, and permitted it to express a new grandeur of display in ritual and self-advertisement (Johnson in Lenski 2006: 278–297).

Such properties were maintained by a generous endowment (Janes 1998: 54–56). The Liber Pontificalis, an early chronicle of the Papacy, lists the extraordinary amount of property which Constantine donated to the Church. The well of Constantine's financial generosity to the various sees was both deep and wide. In taking on the role of imperial patron of the Church, however, Constantine also necessarily involved himself in its internal disputes.

Constantine's new city

Although Constantine embellished Rome with great cathedrals, perhaps the most enduring of his architectural legacies lay on the Bosporus. There, after the defeat of Licinius in 324, he laid the foundations of a new city – Constantinople. This was to be a Christian city, uncontaminated by pagan cult or tradition (Barnes 1981: 212). Constantine, at first, did not spend much time in his new foundation, preferring to base himself at Nicomedia while his newest city was being constructed. Occasionally, he made tours of inspection, but it was not until 330, when the city was formally dedicated, that he moved there permanently (Dagron 1974: 33; Barnes 1982: 69, 75–78). His foundation was embellished with art plundered from Greece and endowed with a hippodrome, baths and a Senate house (Dagron 1974: 36–37; Krautheimer 1983: 45–50). No temples were built, however. Instead, a series of great churches was constructed, the most notable being the Church of the Holy Wisdom – a vast and lofty basilica attached to the imperial palace (Krautheimer 1983: 50–55). This landmark cathedral was located in the ceremonial heart of the new city. It proclaimed the solid institutional identification between emperor and Church.

This identification was strengthened in the mausoleum that Constantine planned for himself. This became the Church of the Holy Apostles (Apostoleion) and was intended to be endowed with memorials of all twelve apostles (Krautheimer 1983: 55–60; Dagron 2003: 138–141). There he would lie as the thirteenth and last of the messengers of God.

When Constantine founded this city, Rome had long ceased to be the centre of the imperial world. The capital was where the emperor was (Millar 1977: 15–53). He intended this to be a new metropolis, attracting a population there through tempting incentives (Eunapius, Lives of the Sophists 462). He endowed a senatorial class for the city, although not one equivalent to their venerable western colleagues. Their titles and entitlements differed. This new town was, however, constructed in Constantine's image. As such, it became Constantine's favoured place – simultaneously a museum of the pagan past and an aggressive assertion of the Christian future. It became a capital as Constantine and his successors increasingly made their residence there.

The pilgrimage of Helena

In 326, Constantine's mother Helena and Eutropia, the widow of Maximian travelled to Palestine. During the course of their tour, they located a number of holy places including the sites of the crucifixion and resurrection. Constantine ordered the construction of major shrines in these places, most notably the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem and, in Jerusalem, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, a vast and innovative structure which enclosed both Calvary and the empty tomb (Odahl 2004: 211–218; Johnson 2006: 292–294).

Constantine and Christian dissent

The Donatist controversy

Constantine's involvement in the doctrinal and disciplinary affairs of the Church commenced with an appeal for his intervention in a dispute over the see of Carthage. This was being contested by rival bishops, Caecilian and Majorinus. The appeal to the emperor was not without precedent. In 270 a dispute over the tenure of the see of Antioch went to the Emperor Aurelian. On that occasion, Aurelian had referred the appellants to the Bishop of Rome (Eusebius, H.E. 7.30.19–21). On this occasion, the African church appealed to Constantine who did likewise, referring the matter to Miltiades, the Bishop of Rome (Eusebius, H.E. 10.5.18).

Miltiades' response was to call a wider council of bishops to Rome to resolve the matter. They judged in favour of Caecilian, and the response of the supporters of Majorinus (Donatists) was to appeal once more to the judgement of Constantine. Constantine ordered a council of bishops to be held at Arles, a city in which he was sometimes resident, in order to hear the appeal. The Donatists again lost their suit and sought a third time for Constantine's intervention. Perhaps exasperated by their persistence, Constantine finally took a stand, rejecting the Donatist appeal and aligning himself firmly with the previous judgements of Miltiades and the Council of Arles.

Constantine's involvement in the Donatist dispute had been unwilling, forced by the intransigence of the Donatists themselves. Nevertheless, it taught him a valuable lesson about the relationship between himself and the Christians. When the next controversy arose, his approach was far more interventionist.

The Arian controversy

For some years, a dispute had been brewing between two Alexandrian clergy about the nature of the godhead. A presbyter, Arius, asserted a theological view which emphasized the transcendence of the Father, and within which the Son was conceived of as a subsequent and was therefore neither co-eternal nor co-valent with the Father. To his critics, it seemed that Arius had departed from strict monotheism, in favour of ditheism, positing a greater and a lesser god. Arius was a popular preacher whose views found ready acceptance, both within his own community in Alexandria, and also within the wider Christian world. He also encountered considerable opposition, not the least from his own bishop, Alexander.

When Constantine took control of the eastern provinces, after the final defeat of Licinius in 324, he was presented with this controversy. Unlike the Donatist schism, this was over a matter of theological doctrine rather than church order. Constantine's first instinct was to seek to negotiate an agreement between the disputants. Accordingly, he sent Ossius of Cordova, his theological adviser, to Alexandria to mediate a solution. With him, Ossius took a letter from Constantine which characterized the whole matter a triviality; an inconsequential conflict over an unnecessary question. He urged forbearance and forgiveness (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 2.63–72).

For the participants, however, such a dispute had far greater weight than mere philosophical hair-splitting. Neither could simply beg to differ. Ossius himself sought to resolve the conflict by resorting to Church order: Alexander was bishop; Arius a presbyter who owed him obedience. A subsequent gathering of bishops in Antioch likewise supported episcopal authority over priestly inspiration. At this council, three of Arius' sympathizers were provisionally excommunicated, pending confirmation at a council to be held later in the year at Ancyra (Barnes 1981: 213–214). No such council was, however, called. Constantine, perhaps dismayed by the failure of the bishops to agree amongst themselves, intervened and summoned a council at Nicaea.

Constantine at Nicaea

Nicaea was the most comprehensive church council called to that point, with representatives from all parts of the empire and also from dioceses outside the empire. Constantine's patronage of the Council was apparent from its inception. The bishops were transported, housed and fed at public expense. The sessions were not held in an ecclesiastical building, but on imperial property. Constantine opened the conference, addressing the bishops and exhorting them to reach agreement. Then he withdrew and Ossius assumed the presidency of the Council. Constantine was never formally a member of the Council, but his stamp was upon it, and all of the participants were aware of his own desire to reach a settlement.

In this, he seems to have been let down. As with the Donatists, Constantine was disappointed by the incapacity of the bishops to reach an agreement. In his various interventions, Constantine himself sought to be a voice for moderation. Final resolution upon a doctrinal statement, however, could only be enforced by Constantine's own insistence that it would be the final word on the matter, and dissent meant exile.

Constantine was to be frustrated here. While the Council of Nicaea achieved many things, its confected agreement on the divine nature failed, and the dissident Arian church continued to expand and thrive. When, on his deathbed, Constantine was baptized, it was by the Arian Bishop Eusebius of Nicomedia.

Constantine and the empire

Constantine's reforms

Constantine's adoption and championing of Christianity affected much of the imperial policy which Constantine pursued. While many of his reforms do not appear, at least overtly, to be Christian, it was impossible for Constantine not to nuance them somehow in favour of the Church. Military chaplains appeared, for example, for the first time (Jones 1953); Christians were preferred for administrative posts; bishops were entrusted with juridical responsibilities.

In general, Constantine continued the tenor of administrative reform commenced by Diocletian. He stablilized the currency by abandoning the traditional silver standard and instead striking a new gold coin of remarkable purity (the solidus) which became a highly prized and stable means of storing and transferring value (Jones 1964: 107–109). Within the structure of the imperial administration, he created new offices and orders which completed a process, begun in the time of Augustus, of the transformation of the emperor's private household into a stratified, hierarchical imperial court.

He also made changes to the structure of the army. Significantly, he supplemented its numbers by recruitment from outside the empire. Constantine's later pagan critic, Zosimus, charged him with barbarizing the army (New History 2. 34). While the charge is exaggerated and rhetorical, it is certainly true that in the generations which immediately followed even senior commanders could be drawn from the ranks of non-Roman communities. The static arrangements of the first two imperial centuries had been slowly dispensed with. Between them, Diocletian and Constantine remodelled the imperial army so that it was, in essence, two forces. There were troops on permanent garrison duty (the limitanei), who acted as a police and intelligence service. Then there were the mobile field armies (comitatenses), flexible enough to act as a defensive force when occasion arose, and as an offensive force without denuding the garrisons of necessary troops.

Constantine's wars

Constant campaigning on the frontiers by Constantine and his predecessors had created a measure of peace and security. The necessity for such skirmishing continued in his later years. Campaigns are attested against Danubian peoples (particularly the Sarmatians, Barnes 1982: 75–79, 258). Towards the end of his reign, he mounted a successful campaign in Dacia (modern Transylvania), in which he claimed to have recovered territory which had been given up in the time of Aurelian (Julian, The Caesars 329 b–d; Barnes 1982: 80).

Relations with the great rival empire of Sassanid Persia were less successful. When Armenia became a Christian nation, Rome's position in the east was strengthened. Some time later, he received Hormisdas, a Sassanid prince, as a refugee from the rule of the Great King, Shapur II. At some point, he personally wrote a letter to Shapur, asserting a role as protector of Shapur's Christian subjects (Barnes 1985: 130–133). War between the two states broke out during the last years of Constantine's reign. Persian troops invaded Armenia and expelled its Christian king. Constantine responded by making his own disposition for the rule of Armenia: his nephew Hannibalianus was proclaimed as its king, and an army was sent under his son Constantius to enforce this claim (Epitome de Caesaribus 41.20; Origo Constantini imperatoris 6.35). The initial campaigning was a success. Constantius drove the Persians from the key fortress town of Amida, and in the course of the fighting Narses, another of Shapur II's brothers, was slain (Dodgeon and Lieu 1991: 153–155). Emboldened by success, Constantine was preparing a further assault when he was overtaken by illness and died in May 337. His death left the Persian War as a long and bloody inheritance for his successors.

Constantine's dynasty

Constantine's family was a large one. His father's marriage to Theodora had produced six children, three of whom (his sisters) were deployed in dynastic matches (Barnes 1982: 37). His half-brothers, on the other hand, he preferred to keep away from the centre of power (Leadbetter 1998b: 80). Julian complained that this was at the behest of Constantine's mother who wished to see her own grand-children exalted (Libanius, Oration 14.30). Like his father, Constantine fathered a son by a concubine, Minervina (Jones et al. 1971: 602–603). This son, Crispus, was a bright and engaging prince. Raised to the rank of Caesar in 317, he played an active role in Constantine's victory over Licinius in 324 (Jones et al. 1971: 233). Shortly after, however, he was executed, probably a victim of the clumsy intrigues of his stepmother Fausta, who herself met a similar fate not long afterwards (Jones et al. 1971: 326).

The death of Crispus, together with the relegation of Constantine's half-brothers, left the succession clear for Constantine's sons by Fausta. There were three of these, Constantine, Constantius and Constans (Barnes 1982: 43). Each of these was raised to the rank of Caesar in the lifetime of their father: Constantine in 317, Constantius in 324 and Constans in 333 (Barnes 1982: 7–8; Kienast 1990: 305, 307, 309). In 335, however, Constantine complicated this neat arrangement. His nephew Flavius Dalmatius was raised to the rank of Caesar also (Kienast 1990: 303). This, together with the new prominence of Constantius I's children, occasioned a succession crisis after the death of Constantine. The consequence was a long interregnum. Uncertainty was only resolved by the intervention of the army, which proclaimed Constantine's sons his legitimate successors and killed everyone else.

Constantine never ruled alone. He successfully safeguarded his own position through the deployment of members of his family as nominal colleagues. While this was of great political benefit to Constantine, it left an ambiguous legacy. His sons came to rule after his death through violence rather than a peaceful transition. Their own relationship was marked by mutual suspicion. In 340, Constantine was eliminated by Constans, who was in turn removed by a usurper. Constantius II, himself childless was forced to turn to the two surviving grandsons of Constantius I. Of these, he executed one (Gallus), while the other rebelled against him (Julian). Julian's own reign was ephemeral. His death in 363 marks the end of a dynasty that had, only one generation previously, been richly populated (Frakes in Lenski 2006: 98–103).

Note

1 See www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/1544019/Sceptre-from-Roman-emperor-exhibited.html

Bibliography

Barnes, T. D. (1975) 'The Beginnings of Donatism', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 26: 13–22.

Barnes, T. D. (1976a) 'Sossianus Hierocles and the antecedents of the Great Persecution', Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 80: 239–252.

Barnes, T. D. (1976b) 'The Emperor Constantine's Good Friday sermon', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 27: 414–423.

Barnes, T. D. (1981) Eusebius and Constantine. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Barnes, T. D. (1982) The New Empire of Diocletian and Constantine. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Barnes, T. D. (1985) 'Constantine and the Christians of Persia', Journal of Roman Studies 75: 126–136.

Baynes, N. H. (1934) 'Eusebius and the Christian empire', Annuaire de l'Institut de Philologie et d'Histoire Orientales (Mélanges Bidez) 2: 13–18.

Baynes, N. H. (1972) Constantine the Great and the Christian Church. 2nd ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Bradbury, S. (1994) 'Constantine and pagan legislation in the fourth century', Classical Philology 89: 120–139.

Brown, P. (1961) 'Aspects of the Christianization of the Roman aristocracy', Journal of Roman Studies 51: 1–11.

Brown, P. (1995) Authority and the Sacred: Aspects of the Christianisation of the Roman World. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Bruun, P. M. (1958) 'The disappearance of Sol from the coins of Constantine', Arctos 2: 15–37.

Bruun, P. M. (1962) 'The Christian signs on the coins of Constantine', Arctos 3: 5–35.

Bruun, P. M. (1966) The Roman Imperial Coinage Volume 7: Constantine and Licinius A.D. 313–337. London: Spink and Son Ltd.

Cameron, A. (1991) Christianity and the Rhetoric of Empire: The Development of Christian Discourse. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.

Castritius, H. (1969) Studien zu Maximinus Daia: Frankfurter Althistorische Studien 2. Kallmünz, Germany: Verlag Michael Lassleben.

Corcoran, S. (1996) Empire of the Tetrarchs: Imperial Pronouncements and Government AD 284–324. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Cullhed, M. (1994) Conservator Urbis Suae: Studies in the Politics and Propaganda of the Emperor Maxentius. Stockholm, Sweden: Acta Instituti Romani Regni Sueciae, Series in 8°, 20.

Dagron, G. (1974) Naissance d'une Capitale. Constantinople et ses institutions de 330 à 451. Paris: Bibliothèque Byzantine, Études 7.

Dagron, G. (2003) Emperor and Priest: The Imperial Office in Byzantium (trans. J. Birrell). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge university Press.

De Decker, D. (1968) 'La politique religieuse de Maxence', Byzantion 38: 472–562.

De Ste Croix, G. E. M. (1954) 'Aspects of the Great Persecution', Harvard Theological Review 47: 75–109.

Dodgeon, M. H. and Lieu, S. N. C. (1991) The Roman Eastern Frontier and the Persian Wars A.D. 226–363. A Documentary History. London: Routledge.

Drake, H. A. (1975) In Praise of Constantine: A Historical Study and New Translation of Eusebius' Trecennial Orations. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.

Drake, H. A. (1982) 'Review of T. D. Barnes: "Eusebius and Constantine"', American Journal of Philology 103: 462–466.

Errington, R. M. (1988) 'Constantine and the pagans', Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies 29: 309–318.

Fowden, G. (1993) Empire to Commonwealth: Consequences of Monotheism in Late Antiquity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1952) The Donatist Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Frend, W. H. C. (1965) Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Frend, W. H. C. (1984) The Rise of Christianity. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press.

Frend, W. H. C. and Clancy, K (1977) 'When did the Donatist schism begin?', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 28: 104–109.

Holloway, R. R. (2004) Constantine and Rome. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Hunt, E. D. (1982) Holy Land and Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire AD 312–460. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hunt, E. D. (1993) 'Christianising the Roman Empire: The evidence of the code', in Harries, J. and Wood, I. (eds) The Theodosian Code. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 143–158.

Isaac, B. (1992) The Limits of Empire: The Roman Army in the East. Rev. ed. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Janes, D. (1998) God and Gold in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Johnson, M. J. (2006) 'Architecture of Empire', in Lenski, N. (ed.) The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Constantine. Cambridge, UK and New York: Cambridge University Press, 278–297.

Jones, A. H. M. (1953) 'Military chaplains in the Roman army', Harvard Theological Review 46: 239–240.

Jones, A. H. M. (1963) 'The social background of the struggle between paganism and Christianity', in Momigliano, A. (ed.) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 17–37.

Jones, A. H. M. (1964) The Later Roman Empire. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.

Jones, A. H. M. (1972) Constantine and the Conversion of Europe. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin.

Jones, A. H. M., Martindale, J. R. and Morris, J. (1971) The Prosopography of the Later Roman Empire I. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Judge, E. A. (1983) 'Christian innovation and its contemporary observers', in Croke, B. and Emmet, A (eds) History and Historians in Late Antiquity. Sydney: Pergamon, 13–29.

Kee, A. (1982) Constantine Versus Christ. London: SCM Press.

Keresztes, P. (1981) Constantine: A Great Christian Monarch and Apostle. Amsterdam: J. C. Gieben.

Kienast, D. (1990) Römische Kaisertabelle: Gundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie. Darmstadt, Germany: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft.

Kirsch, G. P. (1935) Origine e carattere degli antichi Titoli ecclesiatici a Roma' Atti Dell III Congresso Nationzionale di Studi Romani. Vol I. Bologna, Italy: Instituto di Studi Romani, 39–47.

Krautheimer, R. (1965) Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin.

Krautheimer, R. (1979) Corpus Basilicorum Christianum Romae. Vatican City: Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology.

Krautheimer, R. (1983) Three Christian Capitals: Topography and Politics. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.

Lampe, P. (1989) Die Stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhundert. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum neuen Testament 2 Reihe, 18. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr.

Leadbetter, B. (1998a) 'Lactantius and Paideia in the Latin west', in Hillard, T. W., Kearsley, R. A., Nixon, C. E. V. and Nobbs, A. M. (eds) Ancient History in a Modern University. Vol II. Grand Rapids, MI: Eeerdmans, 245–252.

Leadbetter, B. (1998b) 'The legitimacy of Constantine', Lieu, S. N. C. and Montserrat, D. (eds) Constantine: History, Historiography and Legend. London: Routledge, 74–85.

Leadbetter, B. (1998c) 'Patrimonium Indivisum? The empire of Diocletian and Maximian 285–289', Chiron 28: 213–228.

Leadbetter, B. (2009) Galerius and the Will of Diocletian. London: Routledge.

Lenski, N. (ed.) (2006) The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Constantine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Lindner, A. (1987) The Jews in Roman Imperial Legislation. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.

Macmullen, R. (1984) Christianizing the Roman Empire. New Haven, CT and London: Yale University Press.

Macmullen, R. (1990) The End of Ancient Christianity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Maier, J.–L. (1987) Le Dossier du Donatisme. Berlin: Akademie Verlag.

Millar, F. (1977) The Emperor in the Roman World (31 BC–AD 337). London: Duckworth.

Mitchell, S. (1988) 'Maximinus and the Christians in 312: a new latin inscription', Journal of Roman Studies 78: 103–124.

Nicholson, O. (1994) 'The "Pagan churches" of Maximinus Daza and Julian the Apostate', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 45: 1–10.

Nixon, C. E. V. and Rodgers, B. S. (1994) In Praise of later Roman Emperors: The Panegyrici Latini. Berkeley, CA and Oxford, UK: University of California Press.

Nixon, C. E. V. and Rodgers, B. S. (1996) In Praise of Later Roman Emperors: The Panegyrici Latini − Introduction, Translation and Historical Commentary. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Odahl, C. M. (2004) Constantine and the Christian Empire. London: Routledge.

Parker, S. T. (1998) 'An early church, perhaps the earliest in the world, found at Aqaba', Near Eastern Archaeology 61(4): 254.

Pohlsander, H. A. (1993) 'Constantia', Ancient Society 24: 151–167.

Pohlsander, H. A. (1996) The Emperor Constantine. London and New York, Routledge.

Potter, D. (2013) Constantine the Emperor. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Srejovic, D. (1985) 'Felix Romuliana, le palais de Galère à Gamzigrad' (French abstract), Starinar 36: 65–67.

Srejovic, D. (1992/1993) 'A Porphyry head of a tetrarch from Romuliana (Gamzigrad)', Starinar 43/44: 41–47.

Srejovic, D., Jankovic, D., Lalovic, A. and Jovic, V. (1983) Gamzigrad: An Imperial Palace of the Late Classical Times. Belgrade, Serbia: Serbian Academy of Sciences and Arts.

Syme, Sir R. (1974) 'The Ancestry of Constantine', Bonn: Bonner Historia Augusta Colloquium 11: 237–253.

Toynbee, J. and Ward-Perkins, J. (1956) The Shrine of St Peter and the Vatican Excavations. London, New York and Toronto, ON: Longmans Greeen and Co.

Van Dam, R. (2001) Remembering Constantine at the Milvian Bridge. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Vogt, J. (1963) 'Pagans and Christians in the family of Constantine the Great', in Momigliano, A. (ed.) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 38–55.

Wilken, R. L. (1992) The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

51
ANTHONY THE GREAT

Columba Stewart OSB

Whose Anthony?

Having let go of our hope that we can recover 'history' as if it were something awaiting discovery with the proper tools, it is harder to surrender our desire to know about the 'real' person when considering someone like Anthony the Great. Once pen was put to papyrus, a gap was fixed between the observed and the observer, magnified by each subsequent reading. When the subject is famous, immensely famous, like Anthony, and the literary portraits are numerous, the resulting parallax effect of so many viewpoints, each crowded with viewers, becomes severe. The 'quest for the historical Anthony' has consumed students of monasticism just as their colleagues in New Testament studies have circled round and round in their quest for another, and even more famous, maker – and product – of history.

We can be confident on the basis of many written sources, and of so many different kinds, that Anthony was a major, even dominant, presence in early fourth-century Egyptian monasticism. It was Anthony's fortune not only to be great but also to have a masterful and highly placed biographer intent on keeping him so. The Life of Anthony, written by the controversial bishop Athanasius of Alexandria within a year of the monk's death at his retreat in the eastern desert, has been the most successful and widely imitated hagiographical text of all time. It evoked competition from Jerome, who wrote a rival Life of Paul the First Hermit. It prompted Augustine's crisis of conversion when he heard of the spiritual triumphs of an uneducated Copt. The Life inspired remarkable paintings by Bosch, Grünewald, Breugel and others. Breugel's version sparked the literary imagination of the nineteenth-century French novelist Gustave Flaubert, who in his La Tentation de Saint Antoine took it upon himself to supplement the dialogue provided by the more discreet Athanasius. Anthony provoked scorn from Gibbon but fascinated other scholars, who have not ceased from producing study after study about him, especially in the last century and a half. What is perhaps most remarkable is that Anthony's life and teaching, however mediated, remain an inspiration to men and women claiming to follow him in the monastic life. This monk, and the traditions surrounding him, must indeed be reckoned with.

Principal sources

Athanasius' portrait of Anthony has been the most important one for both monastic audiences and other readers. The longest and most detailed account, it is the predictable mix of factual information gathered from those who knew Anthony, idealized scenarios about Anthony's life and teaching, and Athanasius' own agenda. The question of authorship has been settled in Athanasius' favour, though without excluding the possibility that he worked with some earlier documents about Anthony (Bartelink 1994: 27–42; Brakke 1994). He certainly wrote with earlier literary models in mind, establishing Anthony as a Christian (and superior) counterpart to the philosopher-heroes whose biographies circulated widely in the Hellenistic world.

Opinions vary about the reliability of Athanasius' version of Anthony and his teaching. Attempts have been made to test the Life by checking its data against other extant information about Anthony (Rubenson 1995: 126–91). As is generally the case with such assessments, the peculiarities of the sources themselves tend to make any conclusions about them impressionistic. The position taken here is that Athanasius' portrait does resemble the Anthony found in the other sources, though the biographer has exercised his power to emphasize and to de-emphasize certain traits. These traits and Athanasius' handling of them will be considered later. The important point to note here is that the Life was an immediate success, soon translated into Latin (in two versions) and several other languages, widely distributed, and eagerly read in both Christian east and west (Bartelink 1994: 37–42, 68–70, 95–108). It is arguable that no other non-biblical Christian text has enjoyed so wide a circulation or been so influential a model for spiritual biographies of other notable figures such as Martin of Tours, Syncletica of Alexandria or the monks remembered by Cyril of Scythopolis.

Next in importance to the Life are the many sayings, or apophthegmata, attributed to Anthony or about him (Dörries 1949; Rubenson 1995: 145–62). The textual history and editorial complexities of the sayings are notorious, and using them as a check against other texts becomes a scholarly hall of mirrors. On the other hand, they can provide broad-stroke portraits of their subjects, as is immediately evident when reading sayings of or about major figures such as Arsenius, John Kolobos or Poemen. One gains a sense of these monks even though the details cannot be pressed too closely. The sayings about Anthony, especially the most frequently repeated ones, are important evidence for how Anthony's monastic heirs chose to remember him. While surely preserving some actual dicta and historical information, they in any case illustrate the place accorded Anthony in the tradition and highlight what later monks found most constructive or memorable about his teaching.

Athanasius' Life was not the only narrative portrait of Anthony in early monastic literature. Palladius (c. 364–c. 425), an educated monk sympathetic to the controversial spiritual theology of Origen and his heir Evagrius Ponticus, has several stories about Anthony in his Lausiac History (c. 419). This work was actually written almost seventy years after Athanasius' Life though it was based on the author's sojourn in Egypt at the end of the fourth century. Palladius had read the Life of Anthony – so had virtually everyone of his social class and religious interests – but he also had access to other sources from his own visits to various Egyptian monasteries, including Anthony's at Pispir near the Nile. Palladius' Anthony sounds more like a classic desert elder than does Athanasius', perhaps because Palladius wrote from inside the monastic tradition and was more interested in Anthony's interactions with other monks than with the non-monastic luminaries highlighted by Athanasius. Palladius also wrote after Anthony's legacy and 'official' monastic reputation were firmly established.

In the Lausiac History we find Anthony capable of severity toward other monks in the name of spiritual discipline (LH 21–22), a quality absent from Athanasius' portrayal. Palladius also notes Anthony's strategem for screening visitors (LH 21.8), another indication that however holy he may have been, he did not suffer fools gladly. Similar in tone to Palladius' accounts are the references to Anthony in the History of the Monks of Egypt, a travelogue roughly contemporary to the Lausiac History. Both works are most significant for the information they provide about Anthony's network of disciples and their descendants, who were leaders of the Origenist party to which Palladius belonged (Rubenson 1995: 178–82).

The last major source of information about Anthony from the early period comes from the hagiography of the 'other' Egyptian monastic tradition, Pachomian cenobitism. Two versions of the Life of Pachomius, a kind of biography-cum-institutional history, describe a visit to Anthony by Pachomian monks shortly after their leader's death in 346 (Bohairic Life of Pachomius 126–33; Greek Life 120).

The upshot of the interview is Anthony's praise of Pachomius and his communal form of monastic life. The Coptic Life even includes Anthony's regrets that he had been unable to become a cenobite himself! Setting aside questions of historical accuracy, the significance of the accounts lies in the importance accorded to Anthony's validation of the Pachomian movement as authentically monastic.

These were the principal sources about Anthony. There remain the writings by Anthony. The Life by Athanasius mentions Anthony's correspondence with emperors (Life 81) and with an Arian official (Life 86). In the Life of Pachomius there are references to letters sent by Anthony to monks and to Athanasius; the Coptic version quotes from these letters (Bohairic Life of Pachomius 126–34; Greek Life 120). Seven other letters by Anthony, all addressed to monks and pertaining to the spiritual life, have survived in various states. Jerome notes the existence of the letters and their translation into Greek, though it is unclear whether he himself had read them (De viris illustribus 88). Obviously the Letters are of great importance for any study of Anthony since they are the most direct evidence we have of his own teaching (Rubenson 1995: 35–42). They contain no biographical information, though their affinities with Origen's theology and their use of philosophical language have important consequences for an assessment of Anthony's educational background. Only one contains information about its addressees, who were monks at Arsinoë (Letter 6).

The Letters bear notable similarities of style and Letters 2–7 have close parallels of structure and content. This means that at least those six were probably written at about the same time; a reference to Arius in Letter 4 suggests a date in the late 330s, i.e. about twenty years before Anthony's death (Rubenson 1995: 42–6). The Letters, then, offer snapshots of Anthony's concerns for particular audiences at a particular time. The letters quoted in the Life of Pachomius are later (346, the year of Pachomius' death); they provide no information about Anthony himself though the use of the epithet 'Israelite', interpreted as 'one who sees God', is a stylistic parallel with the earlier letters (Letters 3.6; cf. 5.1–2, 6.2, 78, 93; 7.5, 58).

The influence of Anthony's Letters on later monastic tradition has been much less than that of the Life. The Coptic original survives only in one seventh-century fragment. The Greek translation of the Letters, the earliest and also the most useful for wide distribution, has been lost. The Syriac version seems to have been early but partial (by 534, only one letter), and the Latin version is relatively modern (1475, from the now-lost Greek text). The best surviving witness is the Georgian translation. Much of the material is preserved in a thirteenth-century Arabic translation made from the lost Coptic original; according to the best study of the Letters, the Arabic appears to be the only version based on the Coptic (Rubenson 1995: 15–34). This curious legacy suggests that even monks found the Life and the sayings to be more useful to them than the Letters. There are also aspects of the letters, particularly their more speculative passages, which would have made later readers nervous after the traumas of the Origenist Controversy. It has been suggested that the Anthony of the letters differs rather considerably from Athanasius' hero (Rubenson 1995); to assess this claim we will look at the teaching of the Letters in more detail shortly.

It is clear from even this brief review of the sources that we have to approach Anthony through the impressions, memories and agenda of others except in so far as we can use the Letters to nuance those perspectives. To evaluate Anthony's role in monastic tradition, however, is a somewhat different matter than seeking the historical person. To begin to see Anthony as the greater number of his followers have seen him means working with all of the sources available. The resulting construct may not be 'historical' but it is arguably 'authentic' as a monastic archetype in which we can see the genesis of practices and teaching which would become central to monastic spirituality.

The story

The basic plot of Anthony's life as presented by Athanasius is easily told. Born a Christian to prosperous landowning parents, he was orphaned with his younger sister when he was eighteen. Following a call to the ascetic life manifested externally in a dramatically literal obedience to Jesus' commands to leave all for his sake and to renounce all cares, Anthony disposed of his property, placed his sister in the care of local virgins and apprenticed himself to a village ascetic. Subject to the usual struggles of disengagement from the past and from alternative ways of life, Anthony showed a marked eagerness to confront the challenges directly, spending time in solitude in tombs at the edge of the nearby desert. After severe and frightening trials, he resolved to pursue greater solitude and made the move that would bring him fame.

Going deeper into the desert, away from the security offered by proximity to settled land, he lived twenty years as a recluse in an abandoned fort at Pispir. After his protracted retreat he became available to both monks and seculars for advice. Many followed his example and settled around his retreat. He made at least two trips to Alexandria, one in the first decade of the fourth century to show his solidarity with Christian martyrs, the second (in 337 or 338) to fight Arianism.

In time, he sought greater solitude and journeyed deeper into the eastern desert, where he found a site remarkable for its beauty and its fresh spring. There he established his so-called 'Inner Mountain', from which he would commute periodically to the 'Outer Mountain', his first retreat at Pispir, to offer advice and teaching. He died at the Inner Mountain in 356 at an advanced age (Athanasius claims 105) and his Life was written the following year.

To this sketch we can add a few important elements from other sources. First, the Letters prove that Athanasius' references to Anthony's lack of letters (Life 1.2; 3.7; 73.3; 85.5; 93.4) are not to be taken as suggesting illiteracy but rather a Christian education instead of a primarily philosophical one (cf. Life 4.1, 44.2). Even Athanasius' Anthony, depicted as refuting the arguments of visiting philosophers by virtue of his faith in Christ and knowledge of the Bible (Life 74–80), urges his disciples to write down their thoughts as a technique of self-knowledge and discipline (Life 55.9–12). Study of the Letters reveals an acquaintance with the writings of Origen and a familiarity with the Hellenistic thought-world of the time. Despite his use of interpreters when meeting Greek-speakers (Life 74.2, 77.1; cf. 81.4), Anthony must have known some Greek himself (Rubenson 1995: 41–2); in any case Coptic is saturated with Greek loanwords.

Second, other sources provide the names of Anthony's closest associates. Athanasius names only two monks, Amoun of Nitria (Life 60) and Paphnutius 'the monk and confessor', bishop of the Upper Thebaid (Life 58.3). Neither was Anthony's disciple. Palladius and the Apophthegmata, however, identify as Anthony's close followers Paul the Simple and Macarius the Egyptian ('the Great') (Palladius, Dialogue 17), and the History of the Monks of Egypt names Antony's successors at Pispir, Ammonas and then Pityrion (HM 15.1–2). This lineage connects Anthony to major figures in later Egyptian monasticism. In sayings and letters attributed to these monks we can see the development of Anthony's teaching. Those texts both verify the monastic authenticity of Athanasius' presentation of Anthony and confirm Anthony's links to theologically sophisticated members of the Egyptian monastic scene.

Sacred geography

Anthony was not the first monk, nor even the first hermit. What set him apart in the eyes of his contemporaries was his commitment to anachoresis, 'withdrawal'. Anthony's practice of anachoresis was expressed physically by greater and greater distance from settled regions. The stages of physical withdrawal were mirrored psychologically in his progressively deeper encounter with himself, a theme we will return to later.

Athanasius presents the physical journey in a somewhat stylized manner, but other sources confirm Anthony's withdrawal into deeper solitude at greater distances from human settlement. The move to the edge of the village as an ascetic was followed by brief periods spent in the tombs in the near desert. The spiritual symbolism of being sealed within a tomb is obvious, but for Anthony, an Egyptian, the move from the realm of the living to the abode of the dead had even more significance. The geographical distinction between life and death was clear in a land dependent on the river for sustenance. One did not have to go far to find the desert, to leave the zone of safety. But the difference was dramatic. The abode of the dead was also the home of the demons, spiritual counter-forces to human progress.

For Anthony to spend time in tombs was more than morbid curiosity. It was a challenge to everything within and beyond him that was opposed to life. Athanasius plays up this aspect of Anthony's story, using him as an exemplar of the fully divine Christ's victory over evil and death, a victory shared with those who believe in him. Although Athanasius' theological agenda is plain, there is no indication that he is betraying or even greatly distorting Anthony's own struggles or his reliance on faith in Christ. The direct literary parallels between the Life of Anthony and Athanasius' other writings are largely confined to the sections describing Anthony's debates with visiting philosophers (Life 74–9; see Bartelink 1994: 36–7). Furthermore, Anthony himself attacks Arius in Letter 4.17–8. As we shall see, battle against the demons was the principal focus of Anthony's ascetic teaching as recorded in both the Life and the Letters.

Anthony's decision to become a solitary in the desert was regarded by his peers as something novel (Life 3.2, 11.1–2). A link with civilization remained, for he settled in an abandoned fort 'in the mountain' (i.e. above the river valley) 'across the river' (Life 12.3) at the site known as Pispir. Neither was it the end of human contact, for he relied on others to bring him bread every six months and acquired disciples who would visit him there, though Athanasius claims he would only speak to them through the door and not actually see them (Life 12–13). A definitive break with ordinary society and with ascetic custom had nonetheless been made, and this became the basis for his extraordinary reputation. After twenty years he became available for consultation and would leave his hermitage to visit other monks, including those who settled around him. The scope of his pastoral activity will receive more attention later.

After an unspecified time, he established a further retreat at what became known as the 'Inner Mountain' to distinguish it from the 'Outer Mountain' at Pispir. This move into the deep desert required both divine guidance and reliance on a Saracen caravan. Together they led him to a remote but beautiful location distinguished by a striking mountain and a vigorous fresh-water spring (Life 49–50). The site traditionally considered that of the Inner Mountain, where the Coptic

Figure 51.1   The Monastery of Saint Anthony today, with his 'Inner Mountain' rising behind.
Photo: C. Stewart

Figure 51.2   Entrance to Anthony's cave near the top of the 'Inner Mountain'. Photo C. Stewart Monastery of Saint Anthony (Deir Amba Antonios) can be visited to this day, was three days' journey east of the river toward the Red Sea.

Athanasius records that Anthony 'loved' his mountain. There he spent most of his time for the rest of his life, though he continued to visit Pispir for pastoral purposes (Life 57–8, 84.3–5, 85.1–4). Occasionally he would receive visitors at the Inner Mountain but the distance and harsh conditions of the journey would have discouraged all but the most intent (Life 50.7, 59.2, 82.3). Tended in extreme old age by two disciples, Anthony died at the Inner Mountain in 356 at the age of 105 and was buried, claims Athanasius, in a secret location (Life 92).

Athanasius depicts Anthony's move into the desert as the beginning of monastic colonization of demon-held territory, threatening Satan's domination of lifeless regions (Life 14.7, 41.1–4). He complements this hyperbolic, propagandist stance with a more attractive vision of the desert as an alternative, truly Christian, society where prayer, love and ascetic discipline ensured peace (Life 44.2–4). Anthony himself was able to reestablish the paradisiacal harmony between human beings and animals (Life 50.8–9). The notion of an ideal society in the desert was not new; Philo had said the same of the Therapeutae in his treatise On the Contemplative Life. In the Christian and monastic context, however, there was an added theological dimension of establishing a kind of intermediate zone between earth and heaven in which human beings (and all of nature) were restored to their intended condition in preparation for eschatological glorification.

Anthropology and asceticism

The anthropology found in both Life and Letters presumes the essential goodness of human beings created with freedom of the will (Life 20; Letters 7). The decision to listen to evil insinuations by fallen spiritual essences (Satan, demons) led humans to an irrationality in which the body escaped the control of the intellect (Greek nous) and was subject to domination by the passions and constant suggestions from the demons (e.g. Letters 2). Alongside this basically biblical model there are elements of Origen's cosmological perspective emphasizing a fall from the original unity of spiritual essence to the present multiplicity of creatures (see Letters 6.5–6, 56–62, 84; cf. Rubenson 1995: 64–8). The incarnation and resurrection of Christ made 'resurrection of the mind' possible (Letters 2.23, etc.), to be realized through ascetic discipline prompted and supported by the Holy Spirit, who teaches knowledge and discernment (Letters 1.18–34).

The Life offers a generally holistic view of the interaction of body and spirit (Life 14.3–4, 67.6–8) while being suspicious of allowing the body too much in the way of concession (Life 45.2–7). This latter point is stressed in the Letters, which emphasize the captivity of the body to the passions and to evil spirits (e.g. Letters 6.51–3). Even so, the body is not scorned or ignored, but is involved in the ascetic process and transformative work of the Spirit (Letters 1.46–71, Life 22.3, Antony, Sayings 8 and 13). The powerful pneumatology of the Letters is all the more striking when compared with the Life's almost entirely Christological orientation. It may be here particularly that one sees the anti-Arian agenda of Athanasius, for whom a potent pneumatology would not have been nearly as helpful as an emphasis on the divine power of Christ. The Letters present a more balanced perspective that is both centred on Christ and dynamically pneumatological.

As Athanasius describes it, Anthony's asceticism was typical of what we know about Egyptian anchoritic monasticism. It was a severe but, in relative terms, not an excessive regimen (Life 7.6, 47.2, 51.1). He ate once daily, relying on bread, salt, vegetables, olives and oil but excluding meat and wine (Life 7.6, 51.1). Often he would extend his fast and eat less frequently (Life 7.6, 47.2). He never bathed or used oil on his body (Life 7.6, 47.2, 93.1). He wore a goatskin garment with the hair turned inside, and slept on a mat or sometimes on the bare ground using a cloak given him by Athanasius (Life 4.1, 7.6, 47.2, 91.8–9). The basic elements of his spiritual discipline were dedication to prayer, especially in night-time vigil, memorization of biblical texts and manual labour (Life 4.1, 30.2, 44.2, 55; Letters 1.77). He worked both for personal economic support and to help the poor; it is noted in the Life that Anthony made rope to earn money for food (Life 30.2, 44.2, 53.1). The exhortatory nature of the Letters means that they have little to say about ascetic practices.

The distinctive traits of Anthony's ascetic teaching were his emphasis on focused intention and self-knowledge. The first is most prominent in the Life, the second pervades both Life and Letters. He cautioned against dwelling on memories of the past (Life 7.11; 20.1–2; cf. Anthony, Sayings 6). Monastic life means daily recommitment to the discipline (Life 7.12; 16.3; 47.1; 91.2) in awareness of the brevity of life (Life 16.4–8; 19.2–3; 45.1; 89.4; 91.3). In the Letters, self-knowledge is the overarching theme, set within the broadly 'gnostic' framework of those texts (Rubenson 1995: 59–64). In the Life, however, the Stoic language of 'paying heed (prosechein) to the self' is preferred (Life 3.1–2; 55.5–13; 91.3) and gnostic language is absent. This could be owing to anxiety on Athanasius' part that such language would be construed in a heterodox manner despite its roots in both biblical (especially Johannine) and Alexandrian tradition. In ascetic terms the difference is minimal, though theologically in the Letters the gnostic terminology is tied closely to the pneumatological emphasis equally absent in the Life. In later monastic texts the terminology of the Life would prevail.

Figure 51.3   View from Anthony's cave near the top of the 'Inner Mountain'. Photo: C. Stewart

Thoughts and demons

The practical application of self-knowledge is learning to 'discern spirits', i.e. to understand the activity of one's thoughts (logismoi) and the manipulation of them by demonic counter-forces (Stewart 2005). In the Life of Anthony, the terms 'demon', 'spirit' and 'thought' are used synonymously for these counter-forces, with a preference for 'demon' (60 instances versus 16 for 'thought' and 2 for 'spirit'). In the Letters the proportions are equal (about 6 each), and the term 'passion' occurs alongside them to describe the human faculty stirred by demonic suggestion. Athanasius claims that Anthony learned how to understand and combat the demons from the Bible (Life 7.3; 16.1); the key text, Eph. 6:11–17, is cited or alluded to five times in the Life.

Athanasius describes Anthony's personal struggles with memories and temptations, especially in the early stages of his monastic life, as a progression from issues about external material and social issues (possessions, family, money, fame) to bodily ones (food, leisure, lust), and finally to emotional issues such as struggle with sadness and discouragement (see Life 5). The descriptions in the Life are vivid: he experienced physical traumata (to the point of unconsciousness, Life 8), heard voices, and saw apparitions (Life 6, 8–9, 13, 35, 51.2–5).

These descriptions are fascinating but disturbing to the reader. To help the reader understand their significance, Athanasius includes a lengthy discourse (28 chapters) attributed to Anthony summarizing his teaching about how the demons play on human weakness to discourage hopes for progress (Life 16–43; see Guillaumont and Guillaumont 1957: 189–96). Although we cannot know how much of the address is actually attributable to Anthony, its basic teaching clearly derives from considerable ascetic experience and must have come to Athanasius from within the monastic movement. This text, or perhaps one should say the teaching contained in it, was the basis for later development by ascetic theologians such as Evagrius Ponticus (d. 399). In the Letters the appeal for self-knowledge is directed in the first place toward understanding the inner confusion caused by sin and demonic influence; one could see Letters 1 and 6 as counterparts to the discourse in the Life.

Figure 51.4 The temptations of Anthony as imagined by Jan and Raphael Sadeler, after figures by Maarten de Vos, c. 1590

Anthony is more interested in providing practical directives than in developing a demonology as such (see Life 21.5, and cf. the emphasis on Anthony's experience in 22.4, 39–41, 51–3). The general theological framework is the conventional one, articulated and developed by Origen, that demons are fallen spiritual creatures motivated by jealousy to retard human recovery of original goodness (Life 21–2, Letters 6.30–62; see Daniélou 1957: 182–9). In both Life and Letters the ascetic's confrontation with the demons is placed within a cosmic salvation history that regards the incarnation, death and resurrection of Christ as a definitive turning point in the human struggle against sin. Since Christ's coming, the demons have been robbed of their real power and must do what they can through deception and pretense (Life 28–9).

The ascetic's task is to see through the schemes of the demons and to claim the power that comes through invoking the name of Christ (as in the Life) or receiving the Spirit (as in the Letters). Indeed, Athanasius uses Anthony's triumph over the demons as a case in point that Christians serve the true God and tread the false gods (the demons) of the pagans underfoot (Life 94). Demons have no bodies of their own, which makes them invisible (Letters 6.50), impossible to exclude (Life 28.3–5), and able to move so quickly from place to place that they can seem to predict the future on the basis of what they have seen somewhere else (Life 33.2–6). Their lack of bodies means that they work within the human soul ('we are their bodies', Letters 6.51) and have direct access to thoughts. Therefore they can pattern themselves according to what they find, playing on anxiety or despair or pride: if one avoids such states, the demons have less room for manoeuvre (Life 27.4, 42). More dangerously, they can also masquerade as angels promising glory (Life 35.1) or as exemplary monks shaming one into despair (Life 25).

The best technique for discerning the activity of the demons is awareness of one's feelings: fear or distress are signs of demonic instigation, while joy and calm are good spirits (Life 35–6). Any intrusive thought or apparition is to be interrogated (Life 11.3–4; 43; cf. 41.2), and thoughts can be written down as an aid to self awareness (Life 55.9). The Letters repeat incessantly the imperative to know oneself. To block the corrosive work of the demons, Anthony used and recommended the use of biblical texts, especially the Psalms (Life 9.3; 13.7; 37.4; 39.3, 6; 40.5; 52.3). This practice, known in later tradition as 'antirrhetic' (literally, 'counter-suggestive') prayer, was a basic component of monastic discipline (Stewart 2011). He recommends invocation of the name of Christ (Life 39.2; 40.2; 41.6; 63.3) and use of the Sign of the Cross as defensive tactics (Life 13.5; 35.2; 53.2; 80.4). All of these techniques require the ability to be aware of what is happening and to achieve some distance from the immediacy of the experience. Such perspective is what 'discernment of spirits' means in practice; Anthony regards it as a divine grace given in answer to much prayer (Life 22.3, 38.5; Letters 1 and 6, passim).

Monk and minister

Anthony is famous as ascetic and hermit, but he was extraordinarily available to others. Athanasius notes how much he was loved in his early days as a village ascetic (Life 4.4) and emphasizes his grace of speech and presence (Life 14.6, 73.4, 87). In a crowd of monks, Anthony was unmistakable because of the calm and joy he radiated to others (Life 67.4–8). The calm was contagious: Anthony was a 'physician given to Egypt by God' (Life 87.3). One of the most striking sayings attributed to him contains the line: 'our life and death is with our neighbour' (Anthony, Sayings 9). He emphasized love for others (Life 4.1, 17.7, 44.2, 81.5–6; Letters 6.91–2; Anthony, Sayings 21) and the dangers of anger (Life 4.1, 17.2, 30.2, 55; Letters 6.33–9). The latter theme would be of central importance in later monastic writings.

In the Life, Anthony's twenty years of reclusion at the Outer Mountain ended when disciples broke down the door and called him forth to minister to them (Life 14.2). He handled such demands without apparent resentment (Life 14.4; 70.4), though he guarded his solitude; his most famous dictum is that a monk away from his cell is like a fish out of water (Life 85.3–4; Anthony, Sayings 10).

As noted earlier, after his withdrawal to the Inner Mountain he preferred to see visitors only at the Outer Mountain of Pispir. Palladius records that even at Pispir he used a receptionist, Brother Macarius, to screen visitors. If they were announced as coming 'from Egypt' they received a meal and a blessing; if 'from Jerusalem', Anthony would stay up all night talking with them (LH 21.8).

Naturally enough, his primary ministry was to other monks through teaching and counselling. This work is mentioned several times in the Life and was the context for the sayings preserved in the apophthegmata and for the Letters. However, monks were not his only audience. Many lay people came to him for healing. When health was granted he attributed it to the power of Christ called upon in prayer; when healing did not occur, Athanasius observes, the suppliants benefited from his words of encouragement (Life 48; 56–8; 84.1). According to the Life, Anthony visited Alexandria at least twice. The first time was to show solidarity with Christian martyrs during the fierce persecutions of early fourth-century Egypt. After visiting the imprisoned and practising a form of civil disobedience, he returned to the desert intent on sharing the suffering of the martyrs through his own ascesis (Life 46–7). About twenty years later (c. 337–8), he returned to Alexandria to battle Arianism in support of the Nicene cause (Life 69–70).

In addition to the letters mentioned earlier, he wrote to an Arian official in protest of his treatment of Nicene Christians (Life 86) and was consulted by emperors (Life 81.1; cf. Anthony, Sayings 31). One should note that these events and the extant collection of Letters appear to date from around the 330s, a period when Anthony's fame was well established and he was still active in his various ministries (if Athanasius' chronology is accurate, he would have been in his 80s). It is clear from the ubiquity of Anthony in monastic and other literary sources that Athanasius gives us a faithful portrait of this monk very much involved in the lives of other people.

Legacy

Anthony was both exemplar and exception. Later tradition venerated his example while cautioning his imitators to do nothing without counsel: Anthony's largely solitary formation was not to be the prevailing model (cf. Anthony, Sayings 1 for his angelic spiritual director). The psychological experiences Athanasius describes present the array – and even the stages – of struggles against forces of gluttony, lust, avarice, anger, sadness, accidie, vainglory and pride that would be systematized by Evagrius Ponticus at the end of the fourth century. The transformed, peaceful and inviting Anthony of the Life (e.g. Life 14 and 67) is the perfect embodiment of the ideal Evagrius would describe as apatheia or Cassian as 'purity of heart'. We cannot draw the lines of spiritual descent as precisely as we would like, but Anthony's influence on Ammonas, his successor at Pispir, and Macarius the Great, teacher of Evagrius, placed him at the origins of the most important theological tradition of the Egyptian desert.

Perhaps most significant is that Anthony was a force not only of that extraordinary period of early monastic fervour. His story has endured better than those of most of his contemporaries, and perhaps best of them all. A 'physician given to Egypt by God', indeed, but not to Egypt only.

Bibliography

Note: References to the Life of Anthony (Life) are to chapter and sections as in Bartelink 1994; the same chapter divisions are found in Migne, Patrologia Graeca 26: 837–976, and in modern translations. References to the Letters are to the English translation in Rubenson 1995: 197–231; for differences of numbering among the versions, see Rubenson 1995: 15. References to the Sayings are to the Alphabetical Collection to be found in Migne, Patrologia Graeca 65: 72–440, translated in Ward 1975.

Bartelink, G. J. M. (1994). Athanase d'Alexandrie. Vie d'Antoine. Sources chrétiennes 400. Paris: Cerf.
Brakke, D. (1994) 'The Greek and Syriac versions of the Life of Antony', Le Muséon 107: 17–56.

Daniélou, J. (1957) 'Démon II.3: Le combat spirituel chez Origène', Dictionnaire de spiritualité 3: 182–9.

Dörries, H. (1949) 'Die Vita Antonii als Geschichtsquelle', Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, Philologisch-historische Klasse 14: 359–410.

Guillaumont, A. and Guillaumont, C. (1957) 'Démon III.1: Les vies des moines du 4e siècle', Dictionnaire de spiritualité 3: 189–96.

History of the Monks of Egypt. Greek text and French trans.: André-Jean Festugière. Subsidia hagiographica 53. Brussels: Société des Bollandistes, 1961. English trans.: Norman Russell. The Lives of the Desert Fathers. Oxford, UK: Mowbray, 1981.

Pachomian Koinonia I (1980) The Life of Saint Pachomius. Cistercian Studies Series 45. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.

Pachomius (1932) Greek Life. Greek text: François Halkin, Sancti Pachomii vitae Graecae. Subsidia hagiographica 19. Brussels: Société des Bollandistes, 1932. English trans: Armand Veilleux. Pachomian Koinonia I: The Life of Saint Pachomius. Cistercian Studies Series 45. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications, 1980.

Pachomius (1952–53) Bohairic Life. Bohairic text and French trans.: Louis Theodore Lefort. S. Pachomii vita Bohairice scripta. Corpus scriptorum christianorum orientalium 89 and 107. Louvain, Belgium: L. Durbecq. English trans.: Armand Veilleux.

Palladius (1988) Dialogue on the Life of John Chrysostom. Greek text ed: Anne-Marie Malingrey. Sources chrétiennes, 341–2. Paris: Les Editions du Cerf, 1988. English trans.: Robert T. Meyer. Ancient Christian Writers 45. New York: Newman Press, 1985.

Palladius. Lausiac History. Greek text ed.: Cuthbert Butler, The Lausiac History of Palladius . . . with Notes. Texts and Studies 6.1–2. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1898 and 1904. Chapter subheadings as in the English trans. by Robert T. Meyer. Ancient Christian Writers 34. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1964.

Rubenson, S. (1995) The Letters of St. Antony. Monasticism and the Making of a Saint. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Sadeler, J., Sadeler, R., De Vos, M. and De Leu, T. (c. 1606) Oraculum anachoreticum. Paris: Thomas de Leu.

Stewart, C. (2005) 'Evagrius Ponticus and the "eight generic logismoi"', in Newhauser, R. (ed.) In the Garden of Evil: The Vices and Culture in the Middle Ages. Toronto, ON: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 3–34.

Stewart, C. (2011) 'The use of biblical texts in prayer and the formation of early monastic culture', American Benedictine Review 61: 193–206.

Ward, B. (1975) The Sayings of the Desert Fathers. The Alphabetical Collection. London: Mowbray and Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian.

52

PACHOMIUS THE GREAT

James E. Goehring

Tradition has recognised Pachomius (c. 292–346 CE), a native of Upper Egypt, as the founder of the first centrally regulated communal form of the ascetic life (coenobitism). His innovations included the development of the first monastic rule and the eventual interconnection of multiple monasteries into a centrally organised federation. The emerging success of his movement spawned imitation throughout Egypt and beyond, and in the process coenobitism took its place alongside the solitary hermit or anchorite and the laura or anchoritic community, as the third and final form of the ascetic life.

The sources

The Pachomian dossier contains an abundance of sources pertaining to Pachomius and his immediate successors, including lives, rules, letters, instructions, a testament, a few apophthegmata, miscellaneous stories and two accounts composed by outsiders. While the sources that claim Pachomian authorship (eleven letters, two instructions and five short fragments) offer some insight into the nature of his person and teaching, accounts of his life and the nature of his monastic innovation derive primarily from the complex vita tradition. Its portrayal of his role in the rise and success of coenobitic monasticism remains beyond dispute. When, however, one turns to examine the details of his life and the nature of his movement, it becomes clear that the later tradition adapted the story over time to the changing needs of the community. Communal memory continuously moulded it as a source of edification and support for current monks and, in the process, aligned it more closely with the contours of an increasingly powerful and centralised church.

 The Life of Pachomius, which includes accounts of his immediate successors, survives in numerous versions and editions in Coptic, Greek, Arabic and Latin (Veilleux 1968: 16–107, 1980: 1–21). While it is possible to unravel the relationships between many of the versions, the continuing fluidity of the tradition over time within and between the various language groups compels any historical reconstruction of Pachomius' life to draw from multiple sources, each of which was both shaped by its author's and/or later editors' concerns. The First Greek Life (G1), for example, aligns Pachomius with later ecclesiastical concerns by incorporating anti-Origenist elements into its account, elements absent in the Coptic tradition (SBo 28; G1.31; Goehring 1999: 209–11). At the same time, however, the tradition preserves elements that seem problematic in terms of the movement's later concerns (Goehring 1986: 22–23). The same First Greek Life that added the anti-Origenist passage, for example, retains an enigmatic account of a church sanctioned meeting in Latopolis where Pachomius was summoned to answer questions about his clairvoyant abilities before a body of monks and bishops, and during which an attempt was made on his life (G1.112). As a result, any effort to disentangle the historical Pachomius from such accounts requires the same critical tools, care and caution applied in the quest for the historical Jesus. Furthermore, even the earliest accounts that one can imagine derive from after Pachomius' death, most likely in the tenure of Theodore as head of the federation. The latter's efforts to regain control of the federation, which came close to dissolving following Pachomius' death, coupled with his closer ties to the Alexandrian church hierarchy, impacted the way the story was told and memories formed. Subsequent versions or editions continued to reshape the stories as needed. In this context, one should note that most of the Coptic texts that survive derive from Shenoute's White Monastery, which, given the fluid nature of the literary tradition, raises the question of its impact on the transmission of the Pachomian story (Goehring, forthcoming 1).

Figure 52.1   Icon of Pachomius from the Coptic Church in Faw Qibli. Photo James E. Goehring

The Rules attributed to Pachomius and his successor Horsiesius are similarly wrought with problems for the historian. Those attributed to Pachomius (Precepts, Precepts and Institutes and Precepts and Laws) are complete only in the Latin translation produced by Jerome from a Greek version he obtained in Lower Egypt (Veilleux 1968: 115–32, 1981: 7–13). While efforts have been made to trace certain of the rules back to Pachomius (Joest 2009), in truth one is left with little certainty with respect both to the make-up of the rules at various points in Pachomius' life and to how precisely they were used within the community. The text that Jerome used may well have been flavoured, for example, under the influence of the Lower Egyptian monastery of Metanoia from which it came. The rules attributed to Horsiesius present similar problems. References within the collection suggest at least some stem from his successors, again calling the status of the collection as a whole into question with respect to its date and therefore the earlier functioning of the rules.

The various non- and semi-Pachomian accounts present their own difficulties. While the Letter of Ammon was composed by an individual who spent three years in his youth in the Upper Egyptian Pachomian monastery of Pbow during Theodore's tenure as abbot, he composed his account much later as a bishop in Lower Egypt in response to a request from Theophilus, mostly likely the Patriarch of Alexandria (Goehring 1986: 103–22). Not only did time reshape his memory of those distant years, but the nature of the request, given his current status as a bishop, would have compelled him to mould the story to serve the needs of the church as he then saw them. The brief account in the History of the Monks in Egypt (3.1–2), while composed by a visitor to an unnamed Pachomian monastery, visited the community some forty years after Pachomius' death. The account in Palladius' Lausiac History (32.1–12), perhaps with its story of the rule being delivered by an angel the most well-known piece of Pachomian hagiography, seems equally distant from the Pachomian milieu. The Paralipomena and other independent stories that survive have perhaps greater potential as history, though their provenance remains uncertain (Veilleux 1981: 1–13). In the case of the Paralipomena, the inclusion of non-Pachomian elements from Lower Egypt indicates at least some degree of separation. Moreover, in all of this material numerous fanciful enhancements enliven the account in traditional hagiographical form.

The eleven letters and two instructions attributed to Pachomius move us closer to the historical figure, though they present problems of their own (Veilleux 1982: 1–89). The letters incorporate a mysterious alphabetic code, which leaves their meaning opaque at best. While efforts have been made to break the code, some with apparent success (Joest 1996), the reasons behind its use remain unclear. The mere fact that Pachomius incorporated this technique in his letters, which none of his successors continued as far as we can tell, raises questions with respect to its origin and purpose. One is left to associate their use with an understood Egyptian love of signs and secret language, reflected in the culture's earlier use of hieroglyphs (Quecke 1975: 34–5). In the case of the two instructions, while there is little reason to doubt that they go back in their original form to Pachomius, it seems clear, at least in the case of the first and longer example, that the present text includes later interpolations from Horsiesius, a fact that once again underscores the fluidity of the tradition (Joest 2010). Even in the sources attributed to Pachomius, one must consider the possibility of changes effected upon the original text. Furthermore, even if these sources stem from Pachomius and offer insight into his teaching and concerns within the community, their evidence is limited with respect to the chronology of his life and the development of the monasteries. For such information, one remains dependent on the vita tradition.

Archeological evidence is limited and mostly stems from later periods in the movement's history. While the locations of the various monasteries within the federation have been identified in a general sense (Lefort 1939), only the site of the central monastery of Pbow is know exactly due to the remains of the great fifth-century basilica still visible in the modern village of Faw Qibli (see Figure 52.2). Archeological excavations have uncovered three churches built successively on the site, the earliest and smallest of which may date back to Pachomius' era (Grossmann 1991, 2002; Lease 1991). Unfortunately the excavations have been confined primarily to the basilica due to the surrounding construction of the village, and therefore evidence of the monastery proper is limited. Evidence of monastic occupation of caves in the nearby cliffs of the Jabal al Tarif and the Wadi Sheikh Ali (Lundhaug and Jenott 2015: 39–43; Goehring 2016) add to the evidence of the area's ascetic diversity.

Figure 52.2   Photo of surface remains of the great fifth-century Basilica of Pbow from the 1977–1978 season of excavations. Photo James E. Goehring

The discovery of the Nag Hammadi codices near the centre of the Pachomian federation has challenged traditional presentations of Pachomian monasticism. While this heterodox collection of texts offers no specific evidence of Pachomian origin and/or use, the possibility alone has compelled a rethinking of Pachomian monasticism. Although consensus on this issue seems unlikely at the moment, the mere fact that the traditionally portrayed orthodoxy of the Pachomian movement may have allowed for use of such materials compels one to rethink the traditional sources and the notion of ideological boundaries (Lundhaug and Jenott 2015). In addition to the late fourth-century codices themselves, a series of monastic documentary texts have emerged among the cartonnage, papyrus documents used to stiffen the leather covers. These texts, whether Pachomian or not, offer valuable insight into monastic practice in the area in the early years of the Pachomian movement and perhaps from the time of Pachomius himself (Laundhaig and Jenott 2015: 104–45; Goehring 2001: 243–48).

In the end, it remains notoriously difficult to unravel Pachomius from the surviving sources. The archeology is limited and difficult to interpret, and the literary accounts emerged as edifying stories, designed to further the religious and ascetic practice of the community as it was then understood, after Pachomius' death and beyond. The latter tend to idealise the past, conforming it to the present so as to undergird and support current structures and beliefs. The story was shaped by what the authors chose to tell and how they chose to tell it, as well as by what they chose to ignore or leave out. The making of a saint necessarily constrains the available evidence. The historian must learn to read behind the lines and against the grain. Episodes that seem out of place or incongruous in the later tradition offer, in particular, suggestive alternatives to the traditional storyline. Such elements allow one to reach behind the idealised portrait to imagine the complexity of the historical moment. The picture that emerges, albeit constructed with its own degree of uncertainty, offers a necessary counterweight to the ideologically crafted image of the saint.

Pachomius and his monasteries

The account of Pachomius prior to his entry into the monastic life quickly illustrates the difficulty in unravelling history from hagiography. According to the vita tradition, Pachomius was born into a pagan family where, as a child, his mere presence disturbed the pagan gods much to his parents' distress. As a young man, he was forcefully conscripted into the army during the reign of Constantine I and held in a prison with his fellow recruits. There he was befriended by Christians who distributed food and, as a result, he prayed to God promising to serve him if he were freed. Upon his eventual release, he fulfilled his promise and became a monk (SBo 3–10; G1.2–6). While the miraculous recognition of the pagan child Pachomius by the demons as a future enemy clearly participates in the typical elaboration of a saint's origins, the foundation of the entire account suffers under the fact that both Pachomius' elder brother and sister have Christian names, respectively John and Mary (SBo 19, 27; G1.14), a rather odd choice in a fully non-Christian family. While not necessarily negating all of the story's details, it underscores the problem. Where and how the modern historian draws the line in the process of extracting history from legend determines the history that is told. The following account aims to capture the basic elements of Pachomius' life apart from his later elaboration as a saint.

Pachomius was born c. 292 ce in the Upper Egyptian diocese of Sne (Latopolis; see Figure 52.3) (SBo 3). While the tradition indicates that his family worshipped pagan gods, the fact that his siblings have biblical names, as noted above, leaves one suspicious with regard to the account of his early childhood and conversion.[1] If his later use of a cryptic alphabetic code in his letters reflects an Egyptian mentality born out of the culture's use of hieroglyphs as some suggest (Quecke 1975: 34–35), it might reflect a close connection to a non-Christian past. Whatever the case may be with respect to his parents' beliefs, judging from the role education and books played in his later ascetic career, one suspects they belonged to the literate class and had their son educated in some fashion (G1.9, 59; SBo 15; Praecepta 139–40, 82, 100–101; Praecepta et Instituta 2). In his early twenties, Pachomius served as a soldier, perhaps unwillingly, in the war between Maximinus Daia and Licinius (313 ce; SBo 7; G1.4). Soon after his release, possibly influenced by experiences he had during his military service, he decided to become a monk. Among the various monastic options available to him in the area at that time, he elected to join a small anchoritic community situated in the fertile valley beside the village of Šeneset led by an old monk named Palamon (SBo 10; G1.6).

After training under Palamon for seven years, Pachomius set out with his brother to establish their own anchoritic community in the nearby deserted village of Tabennisi (S1.3; SBo 17; G1.12). As the community grew, Pachomius began to envision and sought to impose a more organised structure. While the tradition presents this shift as the origin of coenobitic monasticism, one imagines that Pachomius' innovation reflects rather his successful harnessing of a more general process occurring in monasteries at this time. In seems clear that Pachomius' efforts did not occur overnight, neither were they put in place without opposition. While the precise nature of his initial difficulties remains unclear, an early Sahidic version of the Life reports arguments between Pachomius and his brother, and describes an initial group of disciples who belittled and took advantage of him, who he eventually expelled (S1.3–4). Only then, after this initial failure, do the sources report the arrival of his first disciples and the beginning of the successful coenobitic experiment (SBo 22–24; G1.23–26).

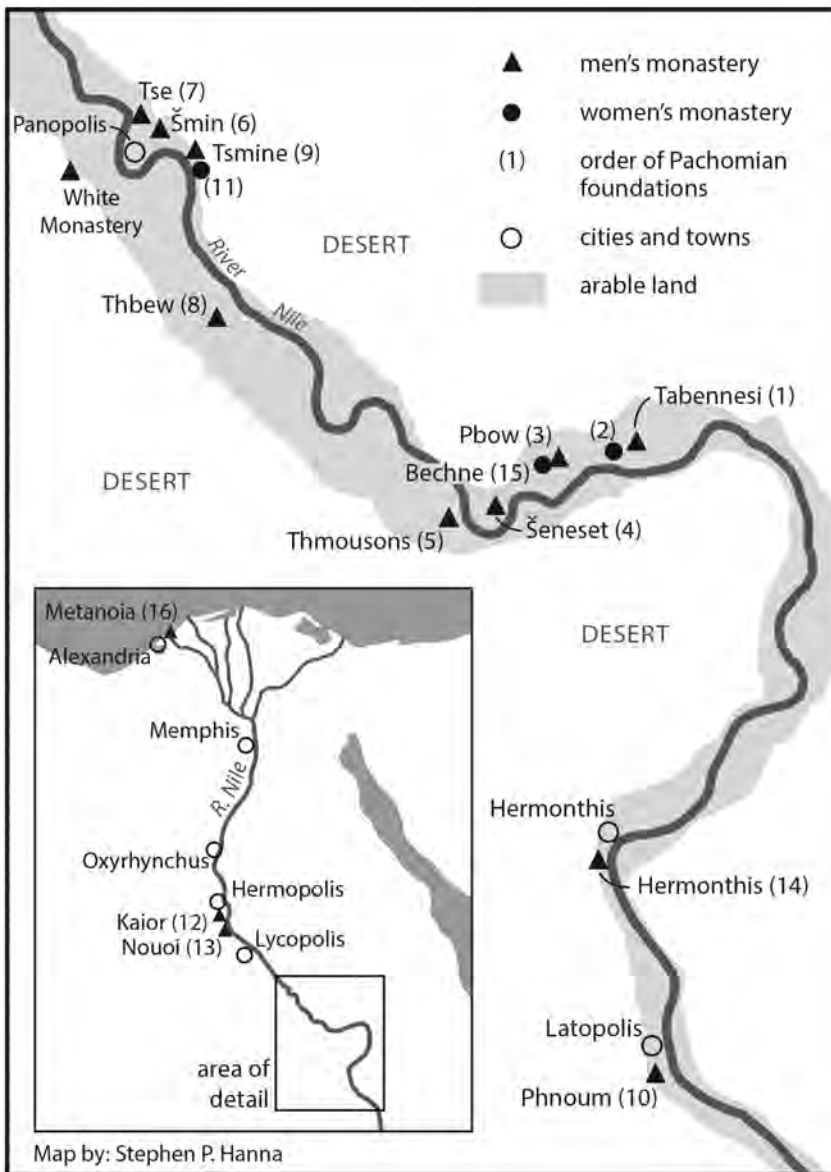
As his community grew, so did his experiment with its organisation (SBo 26; G1.28). The achievement of the latter in meeting the needs of the monks fostered the community's growth and continuing success over time. The initial expansion towards a federation of independent monasteries occurred with the founding of a sister monastery for women (SBo 27; G1.32). Its creation initiated the need for inter-community organisation and control. The appointment of an elder monk from Tabennisi as its father effectively tied it to the home community, as did a written list of shared organisational principles or rules. It is in this period at Tabennisi that Theodore, who would ultimately succeed Pachomius as head of the federation, joined the movement. When he learned of Pachomius


Figure 52.3 Map of the Pachomian monasteries, including their order of entry into the federation based on their appearance in the vita tradition. Created by Stephen Hanna and used with his permission from a fellow monk in his monastery in the diocese of Sne, he decided to leave and join the new movement in Tabennisi (SBo 29–30; G1.34–35). His abilities led to his rapid advancement in the Pachomian movement.

From its initial centre in Tabennisi, the Pachomian federation expanded northward in stages. When the numbers became too great at Tabennisi, the brothers built a second male community a short distance down the Nile in the deserted village of Pbow. It was destined to become the central governing monastery of the federation (SBo 49; G1.54). As word of the movement's success spread, three existing monastic communities, Šeneset led by Apa Ebonh, Thmoušons led by Apa Jonas, and Thbew led by Petronius, petitioned and joined the federation, each in sequence extending its reach further down the Nile towards Alexandria (SBo 50–51, 56; G1.54, 80). In the following years, the federation, with the support of the local bishop, added the monasteries of Šmin, Tse and Tsmine, creating a second northern cluster of monasteries around the city of Šmin (Panopolis; SBo 52, 57; G1.81, 83). Their proximity to one another and shared distance from the federation's earlier cluster of monasteries centred at Pbow led Pachomius to place them under the care of a single father. Pachomius also added a women's monastery at Tsmine (G1.134). The final addition to the federation, the community of Phnoum, broke the pattern of northward expansion (SBo 58; G1.83). Constructed in the diocese of Sne (Latopolis) south of Pbow, it may represent the draw of Pachomius' and Theodore's place of origin. Each community that entered the federation, either through petition or as a new foundation, agreed to follow the federation's rules and organisational principles.

Pachomian monasticism, like most forms of Christian asceticism in Egypt, drew heavily on scripture (Ruppert 1971: 128–58; Rousseau 1985: 100–1). Scripture served as the principle sourcebook for monastic practice (SBo 63; G1.68). The federation encouraged the ability to recite sizeable portions of it by heart (SBo 15; G1.9; Precepts 139; Regulations of Horsiesius 16–17), which required literate monks. New recruits were expected to begin by memorising twenty psalms or two of Paul's letters, and if they were illiterate, they were taught to read (Precepts 139), a requirement that suggests some form of monastic school, though such is never specifically spelled out. The power of scripture in shaping Pachomian monasticism is particularly evident in the later letters of Horsiesius, where the language of scripture has become so integrated into the author's thought that he simply expresses his ideas through it (Goehring 1999: 225–26)

In their final form, Pachomian monasteries were well-organised, self-sufficient communities connected through the central monastery of Pbow and fully integrated into the surrounding economy (Rousseau 1985: 149–73; Goehring 1999: 105–9). Each monastery had its own superior or head, occasionally referred to as the steward (oikonomos), as well as a second (deuteros) who served under him and ran the monastery in his absence (Ruppert 1971: 282–328; Harmless 2004: 125–26). Within the monastery the monks were lodged in group houses, each overseen by a housemaster and his second who answered to the superior of the monastery. Jerome reports that each house held about forty monks, each with his own cell within the house (Preface 2). In the central monastery of Pbow at least, one house was dedicated to foreign monks (Greek and Latin speakers), for whom translators were required (SBo 89–91; G1.95; Jerome, Preface 1). The leadership presented a well-organised chain of command from the general superior of the federation at Pbow down through the individual monks in the various monasteries (Rousseau 1985: 105–18).

In terms of their physical structure, each monastery was separated from the surrounding world by a wall. Access in and out of the monastery was controlled at a gatehouse. It was there that visitors and monks were first met and, if they wished to stay overnight, housed in a guesthouse outside the wall. Inside the monastery, in addition to the monastic houses or dormitories, one could find a kitchen, a dining hall, an assembly hall (synaxis), a church, an infirmary and a bakery (Harmless 2004: 125). The frequent mention of books raises the possibility of a library and scriptorium developing at some point in the tradition (Rousseau 1985: 81). As numbers grew, buildings were enlarged and/or replaced, a fact documented in the archeological excavations of the federation's basilica at Pbow (Grossmann 1991, 2002).

While reference to the variety of skilled craftsmen among the monks stems from later accounts (Palladius, HL 32.9–12: Jerome, Preface 6), there is no reason to doubt the claim, given the federation's draw and the origin of its leadership from the educated classes. The requirement that monks be able to read would have necessitated some form of school with teachers. The production of books would have required scribes, and the construction of the physical plant would have involved various craftsmen. One imagines the need of cooks, bakers, stonemasons, metalworkers and shoemakers. The existence of the latter in monastic circles is evident in the engraved graffito portrait of a monk from Wadi Sheikh Ali with the caption, 'I am John, the shoemaker' (see Figure 52.4). Tailors and tanners would have been required as well to fashion the distinctive garb of the Pachomian monk, and traders would have negotiated financial dealings with the surrounding world. The monasteries, strung out along the Nile, eventually possessed and even built boats to facilitate travel both among the monasteries of the federation and eventually for trips to and from Alexandria (see, for example SBo 96; G1.113, 146; Jerome, Precepts 118; Goehring 1999: 95–96).

Figure 52.4 Engraved graffito portrait of a monk from Wadi Sheikh Ali with the caption, 'I am John, the shoemaker'. Photo James E. Goehring

Pachomian monks wore a distinctive uniform. According to the rule, it included a linen tunic (lebiton), scarf, goatskin cloak (melote), hood, belt and staff (Harmless 2004: 127; Jerome, Praecepta 81). Daily life involved the individual reciting of scripture in one's cell, communal gatherings for prayer both in the assembly hall and in the individual houses, two meals in the refectory, and individual work assignments within the monastery or outside in the fields, and catecheses or instructions delivered by the monastery's head or superior (Harmless 2004: 127–30; Rousseau 1985: 77–86). The monks from the various monasteries gathered together at Pbow twice each year, once at Easter when catechumens were baptised, and again in August for a general financial reckoning (SBo 71; G1.83).

The detailed organisation of the federation found in the vita tradition and rules represents the Pachomian movement in its completed form. Judging from the difficulties in the movement's early years, however, one must assume that the organisational structure and detailed regulations developed over time, and given the nature of the sources, we are left in the dark with respect to the details of that process. Even if one could determine, for example, which collection of rules translated by Jerome is the earliest and establish that it dates back to the time of Pachomius, it remains impossible to unravel the order in which rules were added in his lifetime. Moreover, how such rules were imagined and used within the federation over time, let alone within its individual monasteries, remains uncertain. One cannot assume, based on the use of monastic rules later in the Christian tradition, that the Pachomian federation employed them in the same way. In similar fashion, the vita tradition, which arose after Pachomius' and Theodore's deaths, aims at edification and as such generally presents the organisational structure and daily practices in their completed and ideal form. Later developments clearly impacted the memory and eventual literary presentation of earlier stages in the movement's history.

There can be little doubt, however, of Pachomius' charismatic appeal and organisational abilities. The early and continuing success of the movement during his lifetime bears witness to it. While he faced some initial difficulties, once begun, his monastery, one among many in the area, attracted disciples quickly, soon outstripping the ability of the community to house and deal with the numbers. Rather than turn people away to other independent ascetic communities, Pachomius expanded by founding a second monastery. This in turn led other existing communities to join his system. Such does not happen apart from the organisational abilities, forward thinking and charisma of the leader. Pachomius clearly met the needs of those who joined his community, developing in the process an ever expanding, devoted following.

Over time, Pachomius' success came to the attention of the ecclesiastical authorities in the area and raised questions with respect to the relationship of his authority to theirs. As one might expect, opinions varied. The vita tradition, in fact, confirms it. Various stories illustrate the new movement's mixed relationship with church authorities. While the bishop of Šmin, for example, invited Pachomius to establish a monastery in his diocese (SBo 54; G1.81), the bishop of Sne gathered a large crowd in an effort to drive him and his monks away when he sought to found a monastery there (SBo 58). The opposition seems to have endured, as the Greek tradition reports an appearance of Pachomius before a gathering of monks and bishops in the church in Sne a year before his death to answer charges of being clairvoyant. The account records an attempt made there on his life, after which he escaped back to the federation's nearby monastery of Phnoum (G1.112). Whatever lay behind these two very different reactions to the Pachomian movement, it seems apparent that the movement, whether willingly or not, was caught up in its early years in the church's efforts to extend its authority and control into and over the ascetic movement (Brakke 1995: 111–38). The impact of this effort is evident in the Pachomian sources. Pachomius, whose personal authority controlled the federation, never ventured beyond it. He did not journey to meet with Antony or Athanasius, and when he learned of Athanasius' plan to ordain him on his visit to the Thebaid, he went into hiding. His successor Theodore, on the other hand, cemented the federation's relationship with the church. Gone are the conflicts that survive in accounts of Pachomius, and in their place one reads of trips to Alexandria and meetings with Antony and the archbishop (Goehring 1999: 166–79). None of this is to deny the early pull of Alexandria on the federation or any direct opposition to its authority in general. It simply suggests that the aligning of the two independent centres of authority was a work in process.

The federation attracted members representing a broad cross-section of Roman society. The upper leadership, where one can tell, came from the literate class, either entering with leadership experience or gaining it within the movement. Petronius, for example, whom Pachomius placed in charge of the federation's northern cluster of monasteries around Šmin, came from a well-to-do family, had founded his own monastery and brought considerable wealth into the federation in the form of livestock, gear and boats (SBo 56; G1.80). Theodore, who became Pachomius' favourite, likewise came from a family of note (SBo 30; G1.33), and the surviving letters and Testament of Horsiesius, who eventually succeeded Theodore, likewise point to his literate origins.

The draw of the federation reached already in Pachomius' day to Alexandria. In addition to attracting native Coptic speakers, it drew Greek and Latin speakers, many from the city. The numbers required a special house for foreigners at Pbow with the requisite translators to facilitate their integration into the community (SBo 89; G1.95). Such connections undoubtedly influenced the movement, perhaps even nurturing the development of the federation's impressive literary dossier (Goehring, forthcoming 2). Together with an assumed parallel draw of native Copts from throughout Egypt, the monasteries of the federation became a 'melting pot' of ideas, languages and dialects within Egypt.

Events in the last few years of Pachomius' life unravelled plans for an orderly transition in leadership after his death and underscored his role in holding the federation together. Theodore, who had joined the movement in its early stages, had become Pachomius' favourite and heir apparent through the years. An influential group of older brothers and monastery superiors came to recognise his status and ability, and supported him, if quietly, as Pachomius' heir apparent. In the end, however, Theodore's ambition, albeit played down in the sources, proved his undoing, which in turn unleashed a crisis within the federation following Pachomius' death. When the latter took ill two years before his eventual death in 346 CE, a group of older brothers obtained Theodore's promise to succeed Pachomius as the head of the federation. The move, however, was premature. Pachomius recovered, learned of the plan and Theodore's involvement in it, and stripped him of any authority within the federation (SBo 94; G1.106). Theodore accepted the penance imposed upon him, but two years later, as Pachomius lay dying from the plague that ravished the federation, he named Petronius, who headed the northern cluster of monasteries, as his successor (SBo 121; G1.114). Pachomius died on 9 May (14 Pašons) and was buried the following day at the mountain, which equates to a desert cemetery situated up against the escarpment. That night, following a death bed instruction from Pachomius, Theodore took three trusted brothers, removed the body, and reinterred it at a secret location, presumably lest the site become a shrine (SBo 123; G1.116).

The federation after Pachomius

The choice of Petronius to succeed Pachomius as head of the federation proved unfortunate. He was already ill from the same plague when he moved to Pbow to assume his new leadership position and died shortly thereafter.[2] On his deathbed he again passed over Theodore and appointed Horsiesius as his successor (SBo 124, 130; G1.117). Horsiesius, who first appears in the vita tradition in connection with Pachomius' illness and death, came the from the federation's monastery of Šeneset. Judging from his later writings, he, like Theodore and Petronius, represented the learned ranks from which the Pachomian leadership drew, though his absence from accounts prior to Pachomius' death raises questions with respect to the nature of his selection. While the tradition indicates that he had Theodore's support, others within the federation rejected him. Led by Apollonios, the head of the monastery of Thmoušons, the opposition rallied around cries of 'We will have nothing to do with Horsiesius nor will we have anything to do with the rules he lays down' (SBo 139), and 'We no longer belong to the Koinonia of the brothers' (G1.127). As the federation began to break apart, Horsiesius recognised the problem, resigned and appointed Theodore as his replacement to head the federation (c. 350 CE; SBo 139–40; G1.129–30). Given the fact that the older brothers had supported Theodore from the start, having convinced him to accept the role even before Pachomius' death, one cannot help but see the ensuing events as a power struggle that they eventually won.

Theodore moved quickly to reintegrate the monasteries into the federation and develop procedures designed to avoid similar crises in the future. He called the leaders of the monasteries together at Pbow, challenged their actions against Horsiesius and visited their communities in their absence (SBo 142–43). Upon his return he rotated the leaders among the various monasteries so as to disengage them from the independent bases of power they held in their original communities. To keep them from generating an independent base of support in their new monasteries, he introduced a policy of rotating them among the federation's monasteries twice each year (SBo 144). One sees in Theodore's efforts the work of an able administrator, one who fashioned rules designed to centralise authority within the federation at Pbow. While Pachomius' charismatic ability had formed and held the federation together in its first generation, its sudden withdrawal had led to the reemergence of centrifugal forces that threatened his creation. Theodore served as the transitional link, translating Pachomius' charisma into a more prescribed form that guaranteed the survival of the institution (Goehring 1999: 166–79).

Theodore clearly proved to be an effective leader. Not only did he hold Pachomius' federation together, but he continued its expansion. He founded the monasteries of Kaior and Oui near Hermopolis further north towards Alexandria, another near Hermonthis midway between Pbow and Phnoum, and the federation's second monastery for women, called Bechne, near Pbow (G1.134).

His efforts furthered the movement's reach and prestige, increasing its economic and political power both locally and beyond. Such success is evident, if somewhat submerged beneath a hagiographical veneer, in the account of Theodore's distress over the federation's expanding wealth (SBo 197–98; G1.146). At the same time, Theodore reflects the federation's growing connection to Alexandria and its authority. His trips to Alexandria (SBo 96, 124; G1.109, 120), meetings with and support of Athanasius and Antony (SBo 96, 126–34, 185, 200–203; G1.113, 120, 136–7, 143–44), and reading of the archbishop's festal letter (SBo 189), whether in every case factual or not, demonstrate the tradition's association of Theodore with the movement's growing alignment with the Alexandrian church and submersion in the broader unifying discourse of Coptic Christianity.

Another disease struck the federation during Passover in 368 CE, during which Theodore fell ill. He summoned Horsiesius back from Šeneset and presented him to the brothers as his successor. The disease progressed rapidly and Theodore died after a few days on 27 April (2 Pašons). Like Pachomius, he was buried by the brothers in the cemetery and later that night removed and reinterred alongside Pachomius at the latter's presumably secret burial site (SBo 205–7; G1.147–48). The vita tradition ends with Horsiesius' return as head of the federation, this time with the acceptance of the brothers. The writings attributed to Horsiesius, which include fragments of seven instructions, four letters, a lengthy, complete testament, and a series of rules (Veilleux 1982: 7–9, 135–224; 1981: 11–12, 197–223), support his stature as a learned and successful head of the federation.

It is worth noting that it is in the later period under Theodore and Horsiesius that the vita tradition, from which one derives the most information on Pachomius and the history of his movement, first emerges. At which point and in what form or forms remains a subject of some dispute (Goehring 1986: 3–23). What is clear, however, is that the memory and portrayal of the movement's early years has been shaped to conform to the ideals as understood in the period of the vita's composition, and then continually reformulated as the stories and various versions of the Life were edited over time.

The end of Pachomian monasticism

With the end of the vita tradition's accounts, chronological information on the Pachomian federation and its development diminishes fairly dramatically. While the writings of Horsiesius supply considerable information on the man and his times (Bacht 1972), they are less forthcoming, as one would expect, with respect to chronological details. Evidence does indicate the continued strengthening of ties with the Alexandria ecclesiastical hierarchy. A letter from the archbishop Theophilus to Horsiesius includes a request that the latter bring a copy of the Life of Pachomius and Theodore with him when he comes to Alexandria (Lefort 1943: 389–99). The establishment of the Pachomian foundation of Metanoia in the Alexandrian suburb of Canopus likewise dates to Theophilus' reign (Gascou 1991). It may account for the archbishop's request for a copy of the Life, and likely supplied the copy of the Rules that Jerome translated (Preface 1).

After Horsiesius' death sometime after 387 CE, access to the Pachomian federation, its monastic practice and chronological history becomes increasingly difficult as the few surviving accounts centre on specific events or crises, which serve primarily hagiographic and/or ideological concerns. While the names of five later leaders or archimandrites of the federation survive, only the accounts of Victor and Abraham expand much beyond the name (Goehring 2012: 42). According to the Coptic sources, Victor, who led the federation in the mid fifth century, corresponded with Cyril of Alexandria and accompanied the archbishop to the Council of Ephesus in 431 (Kraatz 1904; Goehring 2012: 52–53). He is also connected with the construction of the great fifth-century basilica at Pbow, remains of which are still visible on the surface today (Van Lantshoot 1934). The sheer size of this basilica (75 x 37 metres) and the apparent support the Pachomians received from the archbishop for its construction, underscore the federation's continuing strength and growing political muscle during the course of the fifth century (Goehring 2012: 60–61).

The Pachomian federation experienced a final crisis in the reign of the Byzantine emperor Justinian I (527–565 CE). Evidence for this period, heavily shaped by hagiographic concerns, depends on a series of late Coptic panegyrics centred on Abraham of Farshut, the federation's archimandrite at Pbow (Goehring 2012). The location of the Pachomian monastery of Metanoia in a suburb of Alexandria had facilitated ties to the ecclesiastical office of the archbishop. In the aftermath of the Council of Chalcedon (451 CE), Metanoia appears to have contained a strong pro-Chalcedonian component. Over the course of the fifth and sixth centuries, three Chalcedonian patriarchs were drawn from its members (Goehring 2012: 52). The federation's Lower Egyptian monastery thus served as a logical stepping stone in Justinian I's efforts to establish religious unity throughout the empire on the basis of the Chalcedonian creed. At the same time, however, the Upper Egyptian elements of the federation centred at Pbow remained staunchly non-Chalcedonian. As a result, certain pro-Chalcedonian elements within Metanoia brought charges against the Upper Egyptian archimandrite Abraham. With the support of the emperor, they effected his removal and replacement by one of their own, the pro-Chalcedonian monk Pancharis. Abraham fled to Shenoute's federation and then on to found a monastery of his own at Farshut. As the non-Chalcedonian monks left, the Pachomian federation became a pro-Chalcedonian movement in an increasingly anti-Chalcedonian Egypt. As a result, one hears little about its fate after Abraham. For all practical purposes Pachomian monasticism came to an end. As the subsequent discourse of Coptic Christianity took shape, the early history of the Pachomian movement folded naturally into the later developments of Shenoute and his White Monastery federation, which came to represent the continuing coenobitic tradition in Egypt (Goehring 2012: 50–67).

General observations

Any account of Pachomius and his monastic movement must take care not to fold its origins and subsequent history into a general account of desert monasticism. His movement represents rather a form of village or urban asceticism. He began his ascetic career as an anchorite under the old ascetic Palamon, who inhabited an inarable patch of land beside the village of Šeneset well within the Nile's fertile valley. When he departed to found his first monastery, he chose to locate it in the deserted village of Tabennisi, which sat alongside the river. Evidence suggests that the pattern continued as the federation expanded. Pbow, the second foundation and eventual headquarters of the federation was again located in a deserted village in the fertile valley. Subsequent monasteries were likewise located within or near villages and towns (Goehring 1996). The Pachomian federation did not withdraw and isolate itself from the world, but rather situated its communities in its midst and interacted with it. The tradition, for example, indicates that people returned to the village of Tabennisi after Pachomius established his first monastery there, which led the brothers to build a church for them even before constructing one of their own (SBo 25; G1.29). It is important to keep this in mind as one reimagines Pachomius' life and the history of his movement.

One must likewise remember that accounts of Pachomius rely on sources which, for the most part, were produced and edited within and beyond his community after his death. Memory over time conforms the life of its chosen saint to the expectations and needs of a changing community. The historical processes whereby the community developed into its later form are collapsed into the creative genius of its founder. Pachomius' participation in a broader process of increasing monastic communal organisation, as well as the awkward early stages of his own efforts, are collapsed by the tradition into a visionary moment that inaugurates the coenobitic experiment (SBo 17; G1.12). In a similar way, Palladius collapses the development of the Pachomian Rule into a momentary encounter with an angel, who gives it to Pachomius on an engraved bronze tablet (Historia Lausiaca 32.1). While Palladius' fashioning of Pachomius as the Moses of monasticism clearly moves from history into hagiography, it simply represents the predictable end of a process already evident in the Pachomian sources. By projecting later forms of the movement back into the life of the saint, the sources naturalise their own authors' and editors' understanding of the monastic enterprise. The reconstruction of Pachomius' life must therefore proceed with extreme caution. The historian must learn to employ tools similar to those developed in the quest for the historical Jesus. She must read between the lines, imagine the processes that lay behind the collapsed form that appears in the sources, and consider what later authors may have left out of the account. The effort is fraught with difficulty and uncertainty, but such is the only path available back to the historical Pachomius.

Finally, it is essential to consider the integration of the movement's identity with that of the Alexandrian patriarchate over time and the impact such integration had on the production of its early history. Pachomius' charismatic ability drew and held the federation together. His independent base of authority led to his avoidance of Athanasius and created tension with certain local bishops. One finds little evidence of such tensions in the later periods of Theodore and Horsiesius, indicative of the growing comfort level between the two spheres of authority. While there can be little doubt of the movement's orientation towards Alexandria from the start, illustrated by the pattern of its expansion and the early presence of Alexandria monks in its monasteries, the shifting pattern coincides with the patriarchate's efforts to integrate the ascetic movement into its conception of the church. As such one must consider the possibility of divergent practices within the movement in its earlier stages that disappeared in later accounts of it. It is in this context that the debate over the Pachomian origin and use of the Nag Hammadi codices has swirled (Goehring 2001). While we cannot know with certainty what Pachomian monks read beyond scripture and how they interpreted it in their fourth-century context, the nature of the Pachomian sources equally deny any certainty with respect to what they did not read. Given the geographically expansive, diverse and literate nature of Pachomian monasticism, it is not hard to imagine the circulation and use of such recycled literature among certain of its monks (Lundhaug and Jenott 2015).

Notes

1 It is of course possible that the Christian names came into the tradition at a later date.
2 19 July (25 Epip) according to SBo 130, or 21 July (27 Epip) according to G1.117.

Bibliography

Note: References to sections of the Life of Pachomius refer to the Bohairic life supplemented in Veilleux's translation (SBo) in places where it is missing by the parallel Sahidic version, the First Sahidic Life (S1), and the First Greek Life (G1). Citations from the Rule refer to the four series translated by Jerome: Precepts, Precepts and Institutes, Precepts and Judgements, and Precepts and Laws. The entire Pachomian dossier can be found in English translation in Armand Veilleux's three volume Pachomian Koinonia.

Primary sources: the Pachomian dossier

Coptic and Greek lives

Halkin, F. (1932) Sancti Pachomii Vitae Graecae. Subsidia hagiographica 19. Brussels: Société des Bollandistes (Greek lives, Letter of Ammon, and Paralipomena).
Lefort, L. T. (1925) S. Pachomii vita bohairice scripta. CSCO 89. Paris: e typographeo Reipublicae (Bohairic life).
Lefort, L. T. (1933) S. Pachomii vitae sahidice scriptae. CSCO 99/100. Paris: e typographeo Reipublicae (Sahidic lives).
Lefort, L. T. (1943) Les vies coptes de saint Pachôme et de ses premiers successeurs. Bibliothèque du Muséon 16. Louvain, Belgium: Bureaux du Muséon (French trans.).
Veilleux, A. (1980). Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 1, The Life of Pachomius and His Disciples. Cistercian Studies 45. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Press (English trans.).

Letters and catecheses

Joest, C. (2010) Über den geistlichen Kampf: Katechesen des Mönchvaters Pachoms. Weisungen der Väter 9. Beuron, Germany: Beuroner Kunstverlag (German trans.).

Lefort, L. T. (1956) Oeuvres de S. Pachôme et de ses disciples. CSCO 159 [Coptic] and 160 [French trans]. Louvain, Belgium: L. Durbecq.

Veilleux, A. (1982) Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 3, Instructions, Letters, and Other Writings of Saint Pachomius and His Disciples. Cistercian Studies 47. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Press (English trans.).

Rules

Boon, A. (1932) Pachomiana latina: Règle et épitres de S. Pachome, épitre de S. Théodore Et 'liber' de S. Orsiesius. Texte latin de S. Jerome. BRHE 7. Louvain, Belgium: Bureaux de la Revue.

Lefort, L. T. (1956) Oeuvres de S. Pachôme et de ses disciples. CSCO 159 [Coptic] and 160 [French trans]. Louvain, Belgium: L. Durbecq, 30–36 (Coptic fragments).

Veilleux, A. (1981) Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 2, Pachomian Chronicles and Rules. Cistercian Studies 46. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Press (English trans.).

Other writings

Butler, C. (1967) The Lausiac History of Palladius I/II. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1898. Reprint ed., Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms (Greek text; English trans. Robert T. Meyer (1964) Palladius: The Lausiac History. New York: Newman Press).

Goehring, J. E. (1986) The Letter of Ammon and Pachomian Monasticism. Patristische Texte und Studien 27. Berlin: De Gruyter (Greek text and English trans.).

Goehring, J. E. (2012) Politics, Monasticism, and Miracles in Sixth Century Upper Egypt: A Critical Edition and Translation of the Coptic Texts on Abraham of Farshut. STAC 69. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Veilleux, A. (1981) Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 2, Pachomian Chronicles and Rules. Cistercian Studies 46. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Press (Introductions and English trans. of the Paralipomena, Draguet fragments, Letter of Ammon, and Pachomian materials in the Historia Lausiaca, Historia Monachorum, and the Apophthegmata).

Secondary literature

Bacht, H. (1972) Das Vermächtnis der Ursprungs. Studien zur Theologie des geistlichen Lebens. Würzburg, Germany: Echter.

Brakke, D. (1995) Athanasius and the Politics of Asceticism. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Chitty, D. J. (1966) The Desert a City: An Introduction to the Study of Egyptian and Palestinian Monasticism under the Christian Empire. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

Gascou, J. (1991) 'The Monastery of Metanoia', in Atiya, A. S. (ed.) The Coptic Encyclopedia. New York: Macmillan, vol. 5: 1608–11.

Goehring, J. E. (1990) 'Theodore's entry into the Pachomian movement (Selections from the Life of Pachomius)', in Wimbush, V. L. (ed.) Ascetic Behavior in Greco-Roman Antiquity. A Sourcebook. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 349–56.

Goehring, J. E. (1996) 'Withdrawing from the desert: Pachomius and the development of village asceticism in Upper Egypt', Harvard Theological Review 3: 267–85; reprinted in Goehring 1999: 89–109.

Goehring, J. E. (1999) Ascetics, Society, and the Desert: Studies in Early Egyptian Monasticism. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.

Goehring, J. E. (2001) 'The provenance of the Nag Hammadi Codices once more', Studia Patristica 35: 234–53.

Goehring, J. E. (2016) 'Exploring the Wadi Sheikh Ali: Photographic evidence from the 1980 survey', in Bidmead, J. and Stearns, G. J. (eds) Invest in Your Humanity: Celebrating Marvin Meyer. Eugene, OR: Pickwick Publications, 69–90.

Goehring, J. E. (forthcoming 1) 'Pachomius and his successors in the Library of Deir Anba Shenouda', in Brakke, D. and Emmel, S. (eds) From Gnostics to Monastics: Studies in Coptic and Early Christianity. Louvain, Belgium: Peeters.

Goehring, J. E. (forthcoming 2) 'The Pachomian federation and lower Egypt: The ties that bind', in Gabra, G. and Takla, H. N. (eds) Christianity and Monasticism in Northern Egypt: Beni Suef, Giza, and the Nile Delta. Cairo, Egypt: American University in Cairo.

Grossmann, P. (1991) 'Pbow: Archaeology', in Atiys, A. S. (ed.) The Coptic Encyclopedia. New York: Macmillan, vol. 6: 1927–9.

Grossmann, P. (2002) 'Christliche Architektur in Ägypten', Handbook of Oriental Studies – The Near and Middle East. Leiden, The Netherlands; Boston, MA; Cologne, Germany: Brill, 546–54.

Harmless, W. (2004) Desert Christians: An Introduction to the Literature of Early Monasticism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University.

Joest, C. (1996) 'Die Geheimschrift Pachoms – Versuch einer Entschlüsselung: Mit Übersetzung und Deutung der Pachom–Briefe 9a und 9b', Ostkirchliche Studien 45: 268–89.

Joest, C. (2009) 'Die Praecepta Pachoms: Untersuchung zu dem grössen Abschnitt der Pachom-Regeln', Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 13: 430–51.

Kraatz, W. (1904) Koptische Akten zum Ephesinischen Konzil vom Jahre 431. Leipzig, Germany: J. C. Heirichs.

Ladeuze, P. (1898) Étude sur le cénobitisme pakhōmien pendant le IVe siècle et las première moitié du Ve. Louvain, Belgium: Van Linthout.

Lease, G. (1991) 'Traces of early Egyptian Monasticismn: The Faw qibkli Excavations', Occasional Paper 22. Claremont, CA: Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

Lefort, L. T. (1939) 'Les premiers monastères pachōmiens: Exploration Topographique', Muséon 52: 379–407.

Lundhaug, H. and Jenott, L. (2015) The Monastic Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices. STAC 97. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Quecke, H. (1975) Die Briefe Pachoms: Griechischer Text der Handschrift W. 145 der Chester Beatty Library eingeleitet und herausgegeben. Texte Patristici et Liturgici 11. Regensburg, Germany: Friedrich Pustet.

Rousseau, P. (1985) Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt. Berkeley, CA: University of California.

Ruppert, F. (1971) Das pachomianische Mönchtum und die Anfänge klösterlichen Gehorsams. Münsterschwazacher Studien 20. Münsterschwarzach, Germany: Vier-Turme.

Van Lantshoot, A. (1934) 'Allocution de Timothée d'Alexandrie prononcée a l'occasion de ladédicace d'église de Pachome a Pboou', Le Muséon 47: 13–56.

Veilleux, A. (1968) La liturgie dans le cénobitisme pachōmien au quatrième siècle. Studia Anselmiana 57. Rome: Herder.

53

ATHANASIUS

David M. Gwynn

Elected as bishop of Alexandria in 328, Athanasius led the Egyptian Church during the crucial formative years that followed the conversion of Constantine and saw the rise of an increasingly Christian Roman empire. A figure of controversy for much of his long career, Athanasius was exiled on five separate occasions by four different emperors, but by his death in 373 he was widely hailed as a champion of orthodoxy and patron of the emerging ascetic movement. For over a millennium, Christians in both east and west celebrated Athanasius for his uncompromising defence of the original Nicene Creed against the 'Arian heresy'. Yet in recent times Athanasius' reputation has once more become contested, between those who still hail him as a saint and those for whom his polemical writings and violent reputation threaten to outweigh his theological and pastoral achievements.

In any assessment of Athanasius and his legacy, it is essential to place him firmly within the historical context in which he lived and wrote (Barnes 1993; Gemeinhardt 2011; Gwynn 2012). Athanasius was born in the final decade of the third century, and was a child in 303 when the emperor Diocletian unleashed the Great Persecution upon the Church. Constantine's patronage from 312 onwards began the transformation of Christianity into the dominant religion of the empire, and Athanasius attended the Council of Nicaea in 325 as a deacon serving bishop Alexander of Alexandria. When he was chosen to succeed Alexander in 328, Athanasius was inevitably drawn into the ongoing Trinitarian theological debates usually and inaccurately known as the 'Arian Controversy' (Hanson 1988; Ayres 2004). At the same time, the increasing scale and prestige of the fourth-century Church placed new demands upon Christian bishops and shaped Athanasius' vision of his ecclesiastical and pastoral role. The ascetic movement which took root in the Egyptian desert was itself in part a reaction to the changing status of Christianity and the end of persecution, and raised a further potential threat to episcopal authority (Brown 1988; Brakke 1995). Responses to all these diverse challenges are expressed in Athanasius' numerous surviving writings, which range from theological treatises and polemics to ascetic exhortations and the homiletic Festal Letters. What these writings never fully reveal, however, is the inner man. Athanasius did not write an autobiographical work to compare with Augustine's Confessions, and perhaps it is true that he simply was not the kind of person to do so. Only the public Athanasius, the bishop of Alexandria, remains accessible to us today.

An age of controversies

Alexander of Alexandria died on 17 April 328, and on 8 June Athanasius was consecrated as his successor. The two month interregnum did not bode well. Young and relatively inexperienced, Athanasius immediately had to fight to defend his position. The bishop of Alexandria was the head of the Egyptian Church and an important figure in the wider Christian community (Martin 1996; Davis 2004). But major conflicts were already raging among the Christians of Roman Egypt (see Figure 53.1) and across the eastern Mediterranean. The Melitian Schism which erupted in the aftermath of the Great Persecution created a rival Egyptian clerical hierarchy, while the theological debates over the Trinity had begun in Alexandria with Alexander's condemnation of his presbyter Arius. Athanasius would struggle for almost half a century to maintain his authority and the unity of his Church. He faced repeated periods in exile as his relationships with the reigning emperors fluctuated, and he had to outlast a number of rivals before his triumph was secure.
Figure 53.1 Map of Roman Egypt. Adapted from Haas (1997: 4), by permission of the Johns Hopkins University Press

The Church divided: 'Melitians' and 'Arians'

The Melitian Schism formed the Egyptian parallel to the better known Donatist Schism in Roman North Africa. Bishop Melitius of Lycopolis was imprisoned in 305/6 alongside Peter of Alexandria (bishop 300–11), and denounced the relative mildness with which Peter treated those who lapsed under the strain of persecution (Vivian 1988). This rigorous attitude found supporters among the bishops of Upper Egypt, who also desired greater independence from Alexandrian hegemony, and Melitius began to organise his followers into a rival 'Church of the Martyrs' (Hauben 1998). The Breviarium Melitii, the list of Melitian clergy that Melitius presented to Alexander after the Council of Nicaea, records a Melitian presence all along the Nile Valley. Athanasius clashed repeatedly with the Melitians right down to the 360s, and the speed with which Melitius' message spread highlighted the challenge Athanasius would face in seeking to unite Alexandrian Christianity more closely with the rest of Egypt.

Within Alexandria itself, tensions regarding theology and clerical authority were already rising. Arius is remembered today as the chief heresiarch of the fourth century, but in our sources he first appears as the pious and ascetically minded presbyter of the Alexandrian parish church of Baucalis. A popular preacher in the intellectual tradition of Clement and Origen, Arius attracted a strong following and his teachings alarmed his bishop Alexander (Williams 2001). Arius' writings now survive merely in fragments, but he consistently upheld the unique divinity of God the Father. He did not deny that the Son was in some sense divine, but he subordinated the Son as God but not true God and neither co-eternal nor co-essential with the Father. Arius particularly feared Sabellian Modalism, which reduced the Trinity to three faces or modes and so compromised the distinct identities of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. In his efforts to maintain the status of the Father and the separation between Father and Son, however, Arius went too far. If the Son was so inferior to the Father, how could He fulfil the promise of salvation through the Incarnation? This was the attitude of Alexander, who summoned a Council of Alexandria in c. 321 at which Arius was condemned. Yet Arius still had supporters, both inside Egypt and beyond, who recognised the traditional elements within his beliefs and welcomed an opportunity to undermine the bishop of Alexandria. It was this escalation of the controversy that led Constantine, who only conquered the eastern half of the Roman empire in 324, to summon the Council of Nicaea in May-June 325.

For Alexander, the Nicene council was a personal triumph. The pre-eminence of the Alexandrian see over the churches of Egypt and Libya received canonical approval (Nicaea, canon 6). The Melitian clergy recorded in the Breviarium Melitii were permitted to retain their offices, but they were declared inferior to the equivalent clergy of the majority Egyptian Church. Arius was sent into exile, his most notorious teachings anathematised, and the Nicene Creed proclaimed the Son homoousios (of one essence) with the Father. Later tradition awarded Athanasius a leading role in the debates, a pious fiction that reflects Athanasius' legacy as the champion of Nicaea. In truth he was a young deacon in 325, although we may assume that he listened closely and discussed the issues with bishop Alexander. Like his contemporaries, he must also have been awestruck by the splendour of the largest gathering that the Church had ever witnessed. Unfortunately for Alexander and Athanasius, their triumph at Nicaea failed to resolve the underlying problems. The attempted reconciliation with the Melitians collapsed after Alexander's death, and the rival Melitian hierarchy continued to threaten Alexandrian authority. A number of leading eastern bishops who shared Arius' fear of Sabellianism were disturbed by the Nicene Creed, particularly the unscriptural term homoousios which seemed to blur any clear distinction between Father and Son. When Athanasius succeeded Alexander in 328 he inherited these ongoing tensions as he fought to establish his own ecclesiastical and doctrinal standing.

Bishop and emperor

The opening years of his episcopate were a difficult time for Athanasius and the Alexandrian see. His election was disputed, despite his status as Alexander's protégé, in part on the grounds that Athanasius may not have quite reached the minimum age of thirty expected for bishops. Athanasius' Egyptian opponents in turn gained support from elements within the wider eastern Church, notably the influential figure of Eusebius of Nicomedia who had previously supported Arius and clashed with Alexander. It was alleged that Athanasius resorted to intimidation and violence in his efforts to enforce his authority. The presbyter Macarius was said to have broken a sacred chalice in a Melitian church, while the Melitian bishop Arsenius was reported to have been murdered. A long and complex sequence of events culminated in Athanasius' condemnation at the Council of Tyre in 335 and his banishment to Gaul by order of the emperor Constantine:

> All the proceedings against me, and the fabricated stories about the breaking of the chalice and the murder of Arsenius, were for the sole purpose of introducing impiety into the Church and of preventing their being condemned as heretics.
>
> (Apologia contra Arianos 85)

For the rest of his life, Athanasius consistently proclaimed his innocence of the charges on which he was condemned in 335. He was the victim of an 'Arian conspiracy', led by Eusebius of Nicomedia and those whom Athanasius branded as hoi peri Eusebion ('the ones around Eusebius' or 'the Eusebians', Gwynn 2007). Modern scholars have been less unanimous (for widely contrasting judgements see Arnold (1991) for the defence and Barnes (1993) for the prosecution). The accusation of murder was certainly false, as Arsenius was found alive. But the charge of excessive violence receives partial confirmation from Papyrus London 1914, a contemporary Melitian letter written shortly before the Council of Tyre (Bell 1924: 53–71), and the council itself was a significant gathering of the eastern Church not the vehicle of a small faction. Although Athanasius returned from exile upon Constantine's death in 337, he was immediately under pressure. Imperial rule was now divided between Constantine's three surviving sons – Constantine II, Constantius II and Constans – and the new eastern emperor Constantius was in attendance when a Council of Antioch met in late 338 to reconsider Athanasius' case. Athanasius was condemned once more, and Gregory of Cappadocia appointed to replace him as bishop of Alexandria. Gregory entered the city on 22 March 339, and on 16 April Athanasius fled Egypt for Rome.

Figure 53.2 Constantius II, depicted in the Codex-Calendar of 354. Wikicommons

During his second exile to the west, Athanasius rallied support for his cause (Parvis 2006). The theological denunciation of his opponents as 'Arian' was developed in detail in the three Orationes contra Arianos (c. 339–46). Julius of Rome upheld his innocence in 340/1, and so did the western bishops at the divided council of Serdica in 343 (the parallel council of eastern bishops, on the other hand, renewed Athanasius' condemnation). At the same time, Athanasius worked hard to keep in contact with his Egyptian followers and counteract his rival Gregory, particularly through the annual Festal Letters that he continued to circulate whenever possible to announce the date of the Easter celebration. Finally, after Gregory died in 345, Constantius permitted Athanasius to return to Alexandria. Now Athanasius reaped the benefit of his labours. The joyful procession that welcomed him home on 21 October 346 stretched for miles, and was later compared by Gregory of Nazianzus (Oration 21.29) with Christ's entry into Jerusalem.

So began Athanasius' 'Golden Decade', the longest uninterrupted span for which he held the see of Alexandria. The Festal Letters from these years document Athanasius' ongoing efforts to reinforce his authority across the Egyptian Church, in a period of great theological debate and rising ascetic fervour. Yet these were also years of growing tensions between Athanasius and Constantius, who in 353 united the empire under his sole rule. Constantius sought to impose doctrinal and ecclesiastical harmony on the divided Church, and Athanasius swiftly became a primary target of that campaign. Councils in Arles (353) and Milan (355) were ordered to denounce Athanasius, although a number of western bishops including Julius' successor Liberius of Rome maintained Athanasius' innocence and were themselves sent into exile. Athanasius protested his loyalty to Constantius in the original version of his Apologia ad Constantium, but he could not avert the coming storm. On the night of 8/9 February 356, soldiers attacked the Church of Theonas in Alexandria where Athanasius was presiding over a vigil. Athanasius fled, to be replaced as bishop by his new rival George, who entered the city a year later in February 357.

Athanasius the Great

Many stories surround Athanasius' third exile, for despite the attack upon his church the bishop refused to abandon his homeland. There were several narrow escapes in the six years during which Athanasius hid within the houses of Alexandria and the monastic communities of the Egyptian desert. His success in evading capture reflected the loyal following that his personality and pastoral labours had inspired, and indeed the years between 356 and 362 saw Athanasius' most intensive period of literary production. The Encyclical Letter to the Bishops of Egypt and Libya, the revised Apologia ad Constantium, the Apologia de Fuga and the highly polemical Historia Arianorum all presented Athanasius' interpretation of recent events and upheld his status as the legitimate possessor of the Alexandrian see against the 'Arian' imposter George. It was also at this time that Athanasius composed the famous Life of Antony, invoking the great hermit to support Athanasius' cause, and he continued to circulate his Festal Letters when the opportunity arose. The violent persecution of Athanasius' followers failed to break their spirit, and as an outsider George's position was never secure. In October 358 he abandoned Alexandria after nearly being killed by an angry mob, and only returned late in 361. Then George's patron Constantius died, to be succeeded by Julian 'the Apostate' (361–3), the last pagan Roman emperor. George was imprisoned, and a month later he was lynched either by pagans or by Athanasius' supporters. Julian had proclaimed an amnesty for all bishops exiled under Constantius, and in February 362 Athanasius reclaimed his city.

Athanasius immediately summoned a Council of Alexandria in 362. His aim was twofold: to reaffirm his authority over the Egyptian Church and to promote unity among the defenders of the Nicene Creed. The Tomus ad Antiochenos composed at that council was addressed to the divided Antiochene Church, where the Nicene Christians were split between two factions led by Paulinus (whom Athanasius favoured) and the more popular Meletius. As an appeal for harmony, the Tomus was a failure. But the Tomus expresses both Athanasius' vision for the Church and his standing as the recognised champion of Nicene orthodoxy. Even the emperor Julian, who opposed direct persecution of Christians, made Athanasius an exception. When Athanasius went into exile once more in October 362, he is said to have remarked prophetically that Julian was merely 'a small cloud which will soon pass away' (first quoted in Rufinus, Ecclesiastical History 10.35). Julian's death in Persia in June 363 allowed Athanasius to make a swift return, and briefly Athanasius found an imperial ally in the short-lived emperor Jovian (363–4), to whom he wrote a letter laying down the Nicene faith (Letter 56). Sadly, Jovian's successor Valens (364–78) reverted to the ecclesiastical and theological programme of Constantius, and in late 365 Athanasius withdrew into his fifth and final exile. By this time, however, his position was increasingly secure. In February 366 Valens permitted Athanasius to return undisturbed, as he remained until his death on 2 May 373.

In his final years, Athanasius has been aptly described as the 'elder statesman' (Barnes 1993: 152–64) of Nicene Christianity. Challenges still remained ahead, but through his long struggles with opponents within and beyond Egypt Athanasius had transformed the status of the Alexandrian see. Although the Melitians reappear prominently in Athanasius' Festal Letters of the late 360s (39–42), suggesting a resurgence of the schism in Upper Egypt, the vast majority of Egyptian clergy, monks and laity were united behind Athanasius' leadership. And while the three Cappadocian Fathers now led the theological defence of Nicene orthodoxy, their admiration for Athanasius is reflected in the tone of Basil of Caesarea's letters to the Alexandrian (e.g. Letters 69, 80 and 82) and in Gregory of Nazianzus' Oration 21: On the Great Athanasius. It was the achievements of Athanasius that laid the foundation upon which his successors Theophilus (385–412) and Cyril (412–44) would build. The Egyptian Coptic Church remembered Athanasius as their second founder (Davis 2004), and the seventh-century Coptic chronicler John of Nikiu depicted the bishop as a spiritual saviour preserving Alexandria from the tsunami of 365:

> The venerable father accompanied by all the priests went forth to the borders of the sea, and holding in his hand the book of the holy Law he raised his hand to heaven and said 'O Lord, Thou God who liest not, it is Thou that didst promise to Noah after the flood and say: "I will not again bring a flood of waters upon the earth"'. And after these words of the saint the sea returned to its place and the wrath of God was appeased. Thus the city was saved through the intercession of the apostolic Saint Athanasius, the great star.
>
> (John of Nikiu, Chronicle 82.22–3)

Ascetic champion and pastoral father

While Athanasius was a leading player outside Egypt in imperial and ecclesiastical affairs, he remained at all times the bishop of Alexandria and the head of the Egyptian Church. The privileges that Constantine granted to Christianity from 312 onwards transformed the social status of the clergy and the role of bishops in civic and provincial life. Expanding Christian congregations required instruction and pastoral guidance, while in cities and desert alike the rising ascetic movement flourished.

Asceticism offered an expression of faith that attracted devout Christians, but such holy men and women represented a potential challenge to both episcopal authority and the unity of the Christian community that Athanasius could not ignore.

City and country

From its foundation by Alexander the Great, the city of Alexandria had always been a melting pot of diverse cultures and religions. By the fourth century, a large but divided Christian population lived alongside pagans and Jews in uneasy peace that could quickly explode into violence (Haas 1997). Despite his years in exile, Athanasius maintained and increased episcopal standing in the city. Control over the charitable distribution of bread and oil offered an important means of patronage in a society with extreme contrasts of rich and poor (Brown 2002), and that control had to be defended against rival bishops like Gregory and George. At the same time, the physical topography of Alexandria was reshaped by Christianity's increasing wealth and prestige. The Church of Theonas just inside the western gate, in which Athanasius initially presided and where he was attacked in February 356, was enlarged and ornamented. The Caesarion, the imperial cult temple on the harbour in the city centre, was converted during Constantius' reign into the new cathedral. Work was not quite completed when Athanasius used the church to celebrate Easter in c. 351, an action he justified to Constantius by citing the enormous multitude who assembled for the feast (Apologia ad Constantium 14–18). By the end of his episcopate Athanasius had firmly established the bishop's pre-eminence within the city, paving the way for the more aggressive policies of Theophilus and Cyril.

Athanasius was no less concerned to preserve Alexandrian authority over the wider Church of Egypt and Libya. Following his accession he travelled widely, touring the Thebaid in 329–30 (Festal Index 2) and Pentapolis and Ammoniaca in 331–2 (Festal Index 4). The devoted following that he inspired would later prove crucial, particularly when he remained in concealment between

Figure 53.3   Map of Alexandria. Athanasius' headquarters, the Church of Theonas, lay near the western gate. Adapted from Haas (1997: 2), by permission of the Johns Hopkins University Press

356 and 362. Throughout his episcopate, Athanasius kept communication with the scattered congregations of his region by means of the annual Festal Letters that delivered his Easter message to his churches. No authentic sermons of Athanasius survive, and these Letters are essential to our knowledge of his pastoral activities (Camplani 1989; Ng 2001; Gwynn 2012: 131–57). He wrote even from exile when circumstances allowed, and through the Letters reaffirmed his own position and promoted his theological and moral principles. The conclusion to the first Festal Letter, the earliest work composed by Athanasius as bishop of Alexandria, encapsulates his message:

> Let us remember the poor, and not forget kindness to strangers; above all, let us love God with all our soul and might and strength, and our neighbour as ourselves. So may we receive those things which the eye has not seen nor the ear heard, and which have not entered into the heart of man, which God has prepared for those that love Him through His only Son, our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ; through Whom, to the Father alone, by the Holy Spirit, be glory and dominion for ever and ever, Amen. Salute one another with a kiss. All the brethren who are with me salute you.
>
> *(*Festal Letter 1.11)

The Festal Letters also attest to Athanasius' ongoing efforts to unite the Egyptian clergy. The schismatic Melitian hierarchy threatened his authority, as did the appointment of bishops by Gregory and George during Athanasius' periods in exile. Athanasius wrote to his friend Serapion of Thmuis from the west in c. 337 or c. 339/40 (the letter is incorrectly preserved as Festal Letter 12) asking him to circulate an enclosed Easter message which included a list of approved appointments to vacant Egyptian sees. After Athanasius returned to Alexandria in 346, Festal Letter 19 for Easter 347 likewise ended with the postscript: 'I have thought it necessary to inform you of the appointment of bishops, which has taken place in the stead of our blessed fellow-ministers, that you may know to whom to write, and from whom you should receive letters' (Festal Letter 19.10). He then listed the bishops appointed to sixteen sees, several of whom appear to be former Melitians now 'reconciled to the Church' (one such figure was Arsenius of Hypsele, the Melitian cleric involved in the charges against Athanasius at the Council of Tyre). A similar list of appointments appears at the end of Festal Letter 40 (368), in which Athanasius criticises irregular ordinations of priests and bishops in Upper Egypt. By using his Festal Letters to assert his right to confirm episcopal appointments, Athanasius encouraged the loyalty of his chosen candidates and made a powerful statement of his leadership over a unified catholic Church.

Figure 53.4   The Caesarion in Alexandria at the turn of the nineteenth century. From the Napoleonic Description de l'Égypte, Paris, 1808–28

The ascetic revolution

> In our generation in Egypt I see three chapter-heads given increase by God for profit of all who understand – the bishop Athanasius, Christ's champion for the Faith even unto death; and the holy Abba Antony, perfect pattern of the anchoretic life; and this Community, which is the type for all who desire to gather souls according to God, to take care of them until they be made perfect.
>
> (Pachomius, quoted in the Vita Prima Pachomii 136)

Athanasius' lifetime witnessed the dawn of Christian asceticism's golden age. As the threat of persecution faded in Egypt and elsewhere, men and women seeking a deeper religious commitment expressed their faith through an ascetic lifestyle of austerity and self-discipline. The eremitic monasticism of the solitary hermit was exemplified by the Egyptian monk Antony (c. 251–356), while collective cenobitic monasticism was originally associated in Egypt with Antony's younger contemporary Pachomius (292–346). The Life of Antony was Athanasius' most influential work, proclaiming his admiration for the older monk while constructing a particular interpretation of how Antony's words and deeds should be remembered. Athanasius likewise had close associations with Pachomian monasticism, although he did not apparently meet Pachomius himself, and he wrote to numerous other ascetics including the Letter to Amoun (concerning bodily emissions and the respective value of marriage and celibacy) and several letters to virgins (Brakke 1995). Not all the ascetic works preserved in Athanasius' name are authentic (Brakke 1994), but the very existence of a number of pseudo-Athanasian writings confirms the reputation Athanasius held among later generations of ascetics.

The rise of a new ascetic elite, to whom other Christians looked for guidance, offered an inspiration to greater faith but also held potential dangers for the Church. The personal charismatic authority of a holy man like Antony might undermine or supersede the ecclesiastical authority of clerical office (Rapp 2005). In the Life, Athanasius presented Antony as a model of ascetic humility. 'He honoured the rule of the Church with extreme care, and he wanted every cleric to be held in higher regard than himself. He felt no shame at bowing the head to the bishops and presbyters' (Life of Antony 67). This obedience, however, Antony reserved for representatives of the true faith and he renounced any communion with Melitians or Arians (Life of Antony 68–9). Athanasius further sought to unite monks and clergy by drawing ascetics into the episcopal hierarchy, even though not all monks believed that service as a bishop was compatible with their ascetic discipline (Sterk 2004). His Letter to Dracontius (353/4) was written to a monk, raised unwillingly to the episcopate, who had fled back to his monastery. Rebuking Dracontius for abandoning his duty and neglecting the pastoral needs of his congregation, Athanasius insisted on the righteousness of the monk-bishop and reminded Dracontius of other monks who had followed the clerical path before him. This appeal obviously succeeded. Bishop Dracontius was exiled in 356 with other supporters of Athanasius, and in 362 he joined the restored Athanasius at the Council of Alexandria.

The ascetic revolution also threatened to create division within Christianity, separating monks and virgins from the 'ordinary' laity. Athanasius constantly reminded his ascetic audiences that they must not fall into pride and hold themselves above their fellow Christians. Virginity may be superior to marriage, but marriage itself should not be degraded (First Letter to Virgins 18–19, Letter to Amoun). Simultaneously, Athanasius through his Festal Letters appealed to his lay congregations to embrace ascetic practices if only for the Easter period. Ascetic commitment should not be the sole preserve of a spiritual elite. In Festal Letter 10 for Easter 338, Athanasius drew on Jesus' Parable of the Sower to hail the divine grace that exalted those who followed an ascetic lifestyle yet rewarded every Christian who heeded the call of their own free will and to the best of their ability:

> Not with virgins alone is such a field adorned, nor with monks alone, but also with honourable matrimony and the chastity of each one. For in sowing, He did not compel the will beyond the power. Nor is mercy confined to the perfect, but it is sent down also among those who occupy the middle and the third ranks, so that He might rescue all men generally to salvation.
>
> (Festal Letter 10.4)

Easter fasts and the canon of scripture

In his desire to promote unity and ascetic values across the Egyptian Church, Athanasius introduced a major change into the celebration of the great festival of Easter. The traditional custom in Egypt had been to hold a six-day fast before Holy Week, and Athanasius' earliest Festal Letters continued to prescribe this short fast. A few years after his election, however, most probably in 334, Athanasius began a campaign to promote a 40-day Lenten fast (Brakke 2001: 457–61). His aim was both to bring Egypt into line with the wider Roman Church and to provide a longer period during which lay Christians might adopt ascetic abstinence:

> As Israel, when going up to Jerusalem, was first purified in the wilderness, being trained to forget the customs of Egypt, the Word by this typifying to us the holy fast of forty days, let us first be purified and freed from defilement, so that when we depart hence, having been careful of fasting, we may be able to ascend to the upper chamber with the Lord.
>
> (Festal Letter 6.12)

The biblical justification cited for the 40-day fast reflects the novelty of Athanasius' reform, and he certainly faced opposition. Following his return from his second exile in 346, he condemned those who were so rash and impious that they still neglected the 40-day fast (Festal Letter 19.9). By the end of his episcopate he appears to have carried the argument. The 40-day Lenten fast remained a focus for Christian spirituality for laity and ascetics alike under the leadership of the bishop of Alexandria.

Festal Letter 39, for Easter 367, concerns the scriptural canon. It is the best known of Athanasius' Easter epistles, for it contains the oldest extant list of the New Testament books that corresponds with the New Testament canon in the modern Bible (Brakke 2010). But Athanasius did not write this Festal Letter for the benefit of scriptural historians. Definition of the accepted scriptural canon was a further statement of his authority and of his concern for his congregations. Simple believers must be instructed from the divine books and protected from being led astray by apocryphal works. Athanasius concedes that some books outside the canon might have value, including the Wisdom of Solomon and the popular Shepherd of Hermas, but other writings are to be shunned as the inventions of heretics. The inspired works alone provide all that Christian instruction requires:

> Let the teacher teach from the words of Scripture, and let him place before those who desire to learn those things that are appropriate to their age. In the case of those who begin to study as catechumens, it is not right to proclaim the obscure texts of Scripture, because they are mysteries, but instead to place before them the teaching that they need: what will teach them how to hate sin and to abandon idolatry as an abomination.
>
> (Festal Letter 39.28)

Figure 53.5   A folio containing Matthew 6:4–32 from Codex Sinaiticus, the earliest surviving manuscript of the complete New Testament, dated to the fourth century and possibly produced in Alexandria. Wikicommons Teaching the faithful was a fundamental clerical duty, which rapidly increasing Christian numbers in the later fourth century made ever more significant. But independent teaching encouraged diversity rather than unity, and Athanasius denounced those who questioned his interpretation of Scripture and the canon as 'Melitians' or 'Arians'. Festal Letter 39 is reported to have been read out and then posted in Pachomian monasteries (Bohairic Life of Pachomius 189), and it is possible that the famous collection of Gnostic codices discovered at Nag Hammadi were buried by nearby Pachomian monks in response to Athanasius' condemnation of non-canonical works. Here as throughout Athanasius' career, sincere pastoral concerns and issues of ecclesiastical authority were inextricably intertwined.

The Word of God

Across his long episcopal career, Athanasius' fundamental theological principles remained strikingly consistent (Pettersen 1995; Anatolios 1998, 2004; Morales 2006; Weinandy 2007). At the heart of his theology lay the salvation of humanity through the Incarnation of God's true Son and Word. Only by the sacrifice of the Son, who shared the full divinity of His Father and yet became human and died for our sake, could humanity be raised up and cross the divide that separates creation from God. This conviction shaped Athanasius' vision of the Christian life, and he opposed implacably Arius' subordination of the Son and any teaching that alienated the Son from the ousia (essence) of the Father. Over the course of the fourth-century Trinitarian debates, Athanasius came to see his faith embodied in the original Nicene Creed with its insistence that the Son was homoousios (of one essence) with the Father. The final resolution of those debates perhaps owed more to the Cappadocian Fathers, but Athanasius prepared the ground and deserved to be celebrated as the champion of Nicene orthodoxy.

'He became human that we might become divine'

Shortly after becoming bishop in 328, Athanasius began his earliest major theological work: the double treatise Contra Gentes-De Incarnatione (c. 328–35). The treatise culminated in the memorable words:

> He became human that we might become divine (theopoiēthōmen); and He revealed Himself through a body that we might receive an idea of the invisible Father; and He endured insults from human beings that we might inherit incorruption.
>
> *(*De Incarnatione 54)

For Athanasius, salvation was achieved by the deification or divinisation of humanity through the Son. Between God and the created order existed an ontological gulf, separating the eternal unchanging Creator from His fallible and mutable creation. In order to bridge that gulf, the mediating Word and Saviour who became incarnate in Jesus Christ had to fully share in the divinity of the Godhead (Anatolios 1998). The Son therefore is not created but begotten of the same essence (ousia) and nature (phusis) as the Father. The error that Athanasius saw in Arius' teachings lay precisely in the alienation of the Son from the Father, which compromised the Son's divinity and so made His saving work impossible.

Figure 53.6   Egyptian tapestry of the Nile, from the fourth or fifth century, showing two putti, part of the entourage of the river god Nilos and symbolic of the river's fertility, playing among fish and ducks. By permission of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, Gift of George F. Baker, 1890, 90.5.825

By comparison with Origen a century earlier or the later Cappadocian Fathers, however, Athanasius was never a theoretical or intellectual theologian. As bishop of Alexandria and head of the Egyptian Church, his doctrinal teachings were driven by the needs of his clergy and congregations (Lyman 1993). The original motive behind the Contra Gentes-De Incarnatione was to prove the rationality of Christian belief against pagans who might mock the crucifixion and resurrection. Christianity's triumph over paganism was a theme of obvious relevance for a work written during the reign of Constantine, and Athanasius' attack on pagan idolatry included the Egyptians who still worshipped the water (De Incarnatione 45) in a society whose rhythms were dominated by the river Nile.

Salvation through Christ was inseparably intertwined with the faith and morality required to live a Christian life. This was a natural focus for Athanasius' Festal Letters. God permitted His Son to die for our sakes, and so the holy feast:

> leads us on from the cross through this world to that which is before us, and God produces even now from it the joy of glorious salvation, bringing us to the same assembly and in every place uniting all of us in spirit.
>
> *(*Festal Letter 5.2)

Throughout the Festal Letters Athanasius unites his theological concerns with his wider ascetic and pastoral vision. And in doing so, he demonstrates how the doctrinal controversies that divided the fourth-century Church were not mere academic arguments but had profound implications for ordinary Christians.

The 'Arian Heresy' and the Nicene Creed

Christian tradition hailed Athanasius as the hero of the long fight against 'Arianism', and it was Athanasius above all who constructed the enduring image of the contemporary theological debates as a single 'Arian Controversy'. Beginning in the three Orationes contra Arianos (c. 339–46), and continuing across his later polemical writings, Athanasius split the Church into two polarised factions: the 'orthodox' (whom he represented) and the 'Arians' (everyone whom he opposed):

> When the blessed Alexander cast out Arius, those who remained with Alexander remained Christians; but those who went out with Arius abandoned the Saviour's Name to us who were with Alexander, and they were henceforth called Arians . . . While Arius is dead, and many of his followers have succeeded him, nevertheless those who hold the doctrines of that man, as being known from Arius, are called Arians.
>
> *(*Oratio contra Arianos 1.3)

Athanasius' polarisation of fourth-century Christianity between 'orthodoxy' and 'heresy' proved extremely influential on subsequent centuries and has significantly distorted modern understanding of this complex period (Wiles 1996; Gwynn 2007). No agreed orthodox interpretation existed to resolve the questions that Arius' teachings had raised, and for much of his lifetime Athanasius' theology was far from representative of the beliefs held by the majority of the eastern Church. Arius was far less influential than the polemical emphasis upon his name might imply, and no later Christians actually held his doctrines. What emerged during the 340s–360s was a wide spectrum of competing theologies that cannot be neatly categorised as 'orthodox' or 'Arian' (Ayres 2004). The spectrum ranged from those who taught that the Son was unlike (anomoios) the Father by essence to those who believed that He was like (homoios) or like in essence (homoios kat' ousian or homoiousios). Athanasius regarded all these alternatives with suspicion, for each compromised to a varying degree the ontological unity of Father and Son. Amidst these competing arguments, in the De Decretis Nicaenae Synodi (c. 350–5), Athanasius for the first time brought the Nicene Creed into the forefront of debate.

In the years directly following the Council of Nicaea, the original Nicene Creed was regarded with distrust and largely consigned to silence. The majority of eastern Christians disliked the unscriptural term homoousios and certainly did not endorse the creed as an authoritative statement for the Church. Even Athanasius paid little attention to Nicaea in his early writings, and the term homoousios occurs just once in the three Orationes contra Arianos (1.9). By the 350s, with tensions mounting between himself and Constantius, Athanasius needed a focus around which to rally support for his definition of the orthodox faith. The Council of Nicaea was still remembered as one of the chief events of Constantine's reign and had publicly condemned Arius and his heresy. From the De Decretis Nicaenae Synodi onwards, Athanasius proclaimed the Nicene Creed to be the only true safeguard against 'Arianism'. The prestige that the creed came to possess as the pre-eminent symbol of fourth-century orthodoxy was perhaps Athanasius' greatest single legacy. In his own words: 'one who does not hold the doctrines of Arius necessarily holds and intends the doctrines of the council' (De Decretis Nicaenae Synodi 20).

The triumph of Nicene orthodoxy

When Athanasius endorsed the Nicene Creed as the symbol of orthodoxy in the early 350s, neither his construction of 'Arianism' nor his theological principles underwent any significant change. Salvation was still achieved through the deification of humanity, with the ontological unity of Father and Son now expressed through the Nicene watchword homoousios. Near the end of the 350s, Athanasius extended the same principle to the hitherto rather neglected figure of the Holy Spirit. Nicaea had barely mentioned the third person of the Trinity, but in c. 357 Athanasius' friend Serapion of Thmuis alerted him concerning Egyptian Christians who denied that the Spirit shared the fully divine status of the Son. Athanasius' Letters to Serapion on the Holy Spirit (c. 357–8) represent the first in-depth justification of the Spirit's full divinity and place within the Trinity (Anatolios 2004: 212–33). Humanity is created and sanctified through the Spirit, and so our deification rests upon the unity of the Trinity in whose names we are baptised.

During the 360s and 370s, new doctrinal issues arose regarding Trinitarian terminology and Christ's human soul (Vaggione 2000). Athanasius was growing old and to a degree losing touch as debates moved beyond his 'anti-Arian' polemics. Nevertheless, his writings reveal how he continued to adapt his arguments for another Christian generation. The De Synodis Arimini et Seleuciae (359) and the Tomus ad Antiochenos (362) sought reconciliation with members of the eastern Church whom Athanasius had previously condemned as 'Arians', and the latter work upheld the human soul of Jesus which had been rejected by Athanasius' admirer Apollinaris of Laodicea. In his final major theological work, the Letter to Epictetus of Corinth (c. 372), Athanasius reaffirmed once more his vision of salvation and anticipated the fifth-century controversies over Christ's divine and human natures:

> What the human body of the Word suffered, this the Word, dwelling in the body, ascribed to Himself, in order that we might be enabled to be partakers of the Godhead of the Word. And truly it is strange that He it was who suffered and yet suffered not.
>
> *(*Letter to Epictetus 6)

Judged by later definitions of Christian orthodoxy, Athanasius' theology leaves certain crucial questions unresolved. While more careful in his language than his contemporary Marcellus of Ancyra, who was denounced for the error of Sabellianism, Athanasius lacked the terminology to express clearly his understanding of the divine Trinity as three in one. The key terms ousia and hypostasis are used throughout his writings as synonyms, although he gradually accepted those who described the Trinity as three hypostases as orthodox. Athanasius therefore never adopted the Trinitarian formula of 'three hypostases in one ousia' popularised by the Cappadocian Fathers. A similar difficulty is visible in Athanasius' doctrine of the Incarnation. Contrary to claims that Athanasius taught a 'spacesuit' Christology (Hanson 1988: 448), in which the divine Word had no share in the experiences of His human body, Athanasius consistently maintained the full humanity and full divinity of the incarnate Christ. But once again he struggled to articulate Christ's unity in a single person, and he did not develop the communication of idioms (attributing the properties of each of Christ's two natures to the other) exploited so effectively by Cyril of Alexandria. Neither could Athanasius' restricted use of the term hypostasis convey the doctrine of the Incarnation as the hypostatic union of two natures in one person that was adopted at the Council of Chalcedon in 451. These were differences of terminology, however, rather than of theological principles. In his vision of the Trinity and the Incarnation Athanasius differed little if at all from the Cappadocian Fathers or from Cyril, and his status as the defender of Nicaea against 'Arianism' made him a figure of authority in east and west for more than a millennium.

The Athanasian legacy

Athanasius had been a controversial figure for most of his career, but by his death in 373 he was recognised in east and west as the champion of the Nicene faith. When Gregory of Nazianus spoke in honour of Athanasius in Constantinople in May 380, the Alexandrian bishop was hailed as a model for future generations. 'His life and habits form an ideal of an episcopate and his teaching the law of orthodoxy' (Gregory, Oration 21.37). The fifth-century Greek ecclesiastical historians Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret shared the same heroic vision, and drew their narratives of the 'Arian Controversy' from Athanasius' polemic. In the Christological controversies that flowed directly from the fourth-century Trinitarian debates, Nestorius and Cyril alike appealed to Athanasius' authority, as did the councils of Ephesus in 431 and Chalcedon in 451 (Graumann 2002; Wessel 2004). Unfortunately, Athanasius' 'anti-Arian' writings now held little direct relevance, and his Christological language was too vague to aid in resolving the later debates. The expression 'one nature (mia phusis) of the Word incarnate', which Cyril believed to be Athanasian, in fact derived from the Apollinarian De Incarnatione Dei Verbi. Edited versions of Athanasius' genuine works also circulated, with their content revised to support differing interpretations (on the Armenian Miaphysite version of the Letter to Epictetus, see Thomson 1965). Athanasius' reputation commanded respect, but in the Byzantine east his original voice was increasingly lost behind legendary stories and pseudonymous or altered writings.

A similar story unfolded in the west. Athanasius is a rare example of a Greek father who attracted a western following during his own lifetime, aided by his years of exile in Gaul and Italy. Nevertheless, few of Athanasius' Greek works were widely read or translated into Latin after his death. The exception, unsurprisingly, was the Life of Antony. Jerome recommended Athanasius' ascetic writings to the women whom he taught (Letter 107.12), and even sought to surpass Athanasius and Antony in his Life of Paul the First Hermit. Augustine in his Confessions (8.6) vividly recalled the part that the Life of Antony played in his commitment to ascetic Christianity. The admiration that Jerome and Augustine showed for Athanasius was sincere, but did not require detailed knowledge of his ecclesiastical career or theology. Indeed, the single greatest contribution to Athanasius' reception in the Latin west was made once again by a work that he did not write. The so-called Athanasian Creed (or Quicunque from its opening word) was probably composed in southern Gaul near the end of the fifth century (Kelly 1964; Drecoll 2007). In theology the creed is clearly post-Athanasian (particularly in Christology) and western in the double procession of the Holy Spirit. Yet for the next thousand years, from Thomas Aquinas and the Scholastics to Martin Luther and John Calvin in the Reformation, it was this creed that Latin Christianity associated most strongly with Athanasius' name (Gwynn 2015).

In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Athanasius' reputation still stood high. Even Edward Gibbon, rarely moved to praise Christian bishops, conceded that: 'Although his mind was tainted by the contagion of fanaticism, Athanasius displayed a superiority of character and abilities which would have qualified him, far better than the degenerate sons of Constantine, for the government of a great monarchy' (Edward Gibbon, The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776–88), chapter 21). John Henry Newman's panegyrical depiction of Athanasius in The Arians of the Fourth Century (first published in 1833) was followed by William Bright in the Athanasius entry for the Dictionary of Christian Biography (1877) and by Archibald Robertson's introduction to the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers translation of Athanasius' works (1892). In Germany, Adolf von Harnack admired Athanasius no less than his British counterparts, 'If we measure him by the standard of his time we can discover nothing ignoble or mean about him' (Harnack, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte (third edition 1894–8), translated into English as History of Dogma IV.62).
Figure 53.7   Statue of St Athanasius (1883–4) by Carl Rohl-Smith, Frederiks Church, Copenhagen, Denmark. Wikicommons

The last century has witnessed a resurgence of interest in Athanasius (see the recent syntheses in Gemeinhardt 2011 and Gwynn 2012). While some modern students continue to express unreserved admiration, however, most now view him with varying degrees of ambivalence. Athanasius' theological depth and his place in the history of Christian doctrine has gained greater appreciation, as have his ascetic and pastoral teachings. But his courage and dedication must be balanced against his violence in word and deed towards those who challenged his vision of Christianity. Whatever judgement we draw, Athanasius was beyond question a key figure in a period of fundamental transformation for both the Christian religion and the Roman empire. His career and writings offer a priceless insight into the age in which he lived, and in turn Athanasius' legacy continues to exert its influence on each new Christian generation.

Bibliography

Anatolios, K. (1998) Athanasius: The Coherence of His Thought. London and New York: Routledge.

Anatolios, K. (2004) Athanasius. London and New York: Routledge.

Arnold, D. W-H. (1991) The Early Episcopal Career of Athanasius of Alexandria. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Ayres, L. (2004) Nicaea and its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Barnes, T. D. (1993) Athanasius and Constantius: Theology and Politics in the Constantinian Empire. Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press.

Bell, H. I. (1924) Jews and Christians in Egypt: The Jewish Troubles in Alexandria and the Athanasian Controversy. London: British Museum.

Brakke, D. (1994) 'The authenticity of the ascetic Athanasiana', Orientalia 63: 17–56.

Brakke, D. (1995) Athanasius and the Politics of Asceticism. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Brakke, D. (2001) 'Jewish flesh and Christian spirit in Athanasius of Alexandria', JECS 9: 453–81.

Brakke, D. (2010) 'A new fragment of Athanasius's thirty-ninth Festal Letter: Heresy, apocrypha and the canon', HThR 103: 47–66.

Brown, P. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Brown, P. (2002) Poverty and Leadership in the Later Roman Empire. Hanover, NH and London: University Press of New England.

Camplani, A. (1989) Le Lettere Festali di Atanasio di Alexandria. Rome: C.I.M.

Davis, S. J. (2004) The Early Coptic Papacy: The Egyptian Church and its Leadership in Late Antiquity. Cairo, Egypt and New York: The American University in Cairo Press.

Drecoll, V. H. (2007) 'Das Symbolum Quicumque als Kompilation augustinischer Tradition', Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 11: 30–65.

Gemeinhardt, P. (ed.) (2011) Athanasius Handbuch. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Graumann, T. (2002) Die Kirche der Väter: Vätertheologie und Väterbeweis in den Kirchen des Ostens bis zum Konzil von Ephesus (431). Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Gwynn, D. M. (2007) The Eusebians: The Polemic of Athanasius of Alexandria and the Construction of the 'Arian Controversy'. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Gwynn, D. M. (2012) Athanasius of Alexandria: Bishop, Theologian, Ascetic, Father. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Gwynn, D. M. (2015) 'Athanasius of Alexandria', in Parry, K. (ed.) The Wiley-Blackwell Companion to Patristics. Chichester, UK: Wiley-Blackwell, 111–25.

Haas, C. (1997) Alexandria in Late Antiquity: Topography and Conflict, Baltimore, MD and London: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Hanson, R. P. C. (1988) The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy 318–381. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.

Hauben, H. (1998) 'The Melitian "church of the martyrs": Christian dissenters in ancient Egypt', in Hillard, T. W., Kearsley, R. A., Nixon, C. E. V. and Nobbs, A. M. (eds) Ancient History in a Modern University, Volume 2: Early Christianity, Late Antiquity and Beyond. Sydney: Macquarie University, Ancient History Documentary Research Centre, 329–49.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1964) The Athanasian Creed. London: A&C Black.

Lyman, J. R. (1993) Christology and Cosmology: Models of Divine Activity in Origen, Eusebius and Athanasius. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Martin, A. (1996) Athanase d'Alexandrie et L'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373). Rome: École française de Rome.

Morales, X. (2006) La Théologie Trinitaire d'Athanase d'Alexandrie. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

Ng, N. K-K. (2001) The Spirituality of Athanasius: A Key for Proper Understanding of This Important Church Father. Bern, Switzerland: Peter Lang.

Parvis, S. (2006) Marcellus of Ancyra and the Lost Years of the Arian Controversy 325–345. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Pettersen, A. (1995) Athanasius. London: Geoffrey Chapman.

Rapp, C. (2005) Holy Bishops in Late Antiquity: The Nature of Christian Leadership in an Age of Transition. Berkeley; Los Angeles, CA and London: University of California Press.

Sterk, A. (2004) Renouncing the World yet Leading the Church: The Monk-Bishop in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Thomson, R.W. (1965) 'The transformation of Athanasius in Armenian theology (a tendentious version of the Epistula ad Epictetum)', Le Muséon 78: 47–69.

Vaggione, R. (2000) Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Vivian, T. (1988) St. Peter of Alexandria: Bishop and Martyr. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress.

Weinandy, T. G. (2007) Athanasius: A Theological Introduction. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate.

Wessel, S. (2004) Cyril of Alexandria and the Nestorian Controversy: The Making of a Saint and of a Heretic. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Wiles, M. (1996) Archetypal Heresy: Arianism through the Centuries. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Williams, R. D. (2001) Arius: Heresy and Tradition, 2nd Impression. London: SCM Press.

54

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

Wendy Mayer and Pauline Allen

John in context

Biographic outline

Considering his importance, the details of John Chrysostom's life prior to his consecration as bishop of Constantinople in 397 are surprisingly obscure. The little that is certain is that he was born in Syrian Antioch, on the Orontes, c. 350 CE (Kelly 1995: 296–8). His family was sufficiently wealthy that in his youth he studied philosophy and rhetoric, the latter possibly from the famous Antiochene sophist Libanius. That training, in Greek paideia, was directed towards his formation as an elite male citizen and shaped his worldview and writings as much as the Christian training that was to follow (Mayer 2015b; Stenger 2016). When he was about eighteen he was baptised into the Christian faith, becoming a lector under the neo-Nicene bishop Meletius, who led one of two such factions within the Antiochene church. During this period (the 370s) he also began studying asceticism and scripture. The precise form that ascetic formation took (urban or extra-urban) is a point of disagreement among scholars (Illert 2000; Ritter 2012: 56–66). The results, however, are not. Throughout his ecclesiastical career a moderate urban ascetic agendum informed many of his treatises and homilies, and his emulation of the apostle Paul (Hartney 2004; Heiser 2012; De Wet 2015; Mayer 2015a). John was ordained a deacon in 381 by bishop Meletius and a priest in 386 by Meletius' successor, Flavian. He held that office from 386–97, establishing a reputation as one of the greatest orators the church has ever known. For much of this period, Theodosius I, a key supporter of Nicene Christianity, was emperor in Constantinople.

   In September 397, when Nectarius, the bishop of Constantinople, died, John was chosen to succeed him. From expectation of a continuing career in Antioch, he was now obliged to turn his focus to the welfare of the Nicene community in the eastern imperial capital. The reasons given for John's deposition after fewer than six years on the episcopal throne are various (Liebeschuetz 1985; Elm 1998; Tiersch 2002; Van Nuffelen 2013b). Due to the overwhelming bias of the sources (Wallraff 2008; Katos 2011; Mayer 2013; Van Nuffelen 2013a), the best that can be said is that the factors are likely to have been multiple. On 20 June 404 he was exiled from Constantinople to Cucusus in Lesser Armenia, where he remained for three years. But his troubles were not over. Since many of his supporters from Antioch visited him in Cucusus, his enemies in Constantinople saw to it that he was exiled to a more remote place, Pityus on the eastern shore of the Black Sea. He died on the journey there, at Comana in Pontus, on 14 September 407.

Figure 54.1   Icon of Saint John Chrysostom, date unknown. Published courtesy of the Michigan–
Princeton–Alexandria Expeditions to Mount Sinai

Understanding John Chrysostom

John, who has left a more extensive literary legacy than any other Greek Father, has been one of the most studied figures in early eastern Christianity. Mostly, however, he has been approached from a theological/spiritual standpoint (e.g. Meyer 1933), or chronological perspective, as demonstrated by two influential twentieth-century biographies, those by Chrysostomus Baur (1929–30) and J. N. D. Kelly (1995). These approaches have resulted in a compartmentalised treatment, whereby either John is presented against the backgrounds of first Antioch and then Constantinople, as if the two phases of his life are unconnected, or he is viewed from various perspectives (e.g. preacher, bishop, pastor, master of the spiritual life), without a systematic attempt to integrate all these facets. The resulting picture has either taken on a hagiographic slant whereby he is presented as a saintly man much wronged by his time – a view influenced by the success of his supporters' accounts and John's later reception (see Mayer 2008, 2015c; Van Nuffelen 2013b) – or as one of a politically naïve and harsh authoritarian who in Constantinople alienated the nobility, the empress Eudoxia and many of his clergy. Additionally, there have been charges of misogyny (see Mayer 2014) and anti-semitism (Bibliowicz 2013: 185–92) levelled against him. It is our aim in this chapter to cut through some of these characterisations and to approach John Chrysostom in an integrated fashion by situating him in his cultural setting. In order to allow this perspective to come to the fore, John will be viewed through his interactions with different individuals and strata in the societies in which he operated during various phases of his life.

A preliminary note about sources

At the outset a word needs to be said about the considerable literary sources at our disposal. Not only have nearly 1,000 of John's homilies survived whole or in part, but some 238 letters of his have come down to us, the latter dating from his time in exile. Added to these are some fourteen treatises, some penned as early as 378, two written in 407, the last year of his exile (Mayer 2015e). In the case of the homilies it is often impossible to determine whether they were delivered during his presbyterate in Antioch or during his patriarchate in Constantinople (Mayer 2005). Many of them are available only in editions which date to the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries (see Malingrey 1973), and the definition of the corpus of homilies authentic to John is still not absolute (Voicu 2008). Similarly, the correspondence that survives is one-sided, within its limited time span contains numerous gaps, and was probably assembled selectively by his supporters (Mayer 2015d). Beyond his own works, the literary evidence focuses on John's life in Constantinople: the Church Histories of Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret, the anonymous Life of Olympias, the homilies of Severian of Gabala, the funeral oration by 'Martyrius', and Palladius' Dialogus de vita Iohannis Chrysostomi (see Kelly 1995: 291–5). Incidental information from liturgical or archaeological sources (Mayer and Allen 2012) can also be used with caution to supplement the literary sources. Despite this plethora of material, there is very little evidence that would enable us to draw a responsible portrait of John prior to his ordination as presbyter and even for much of his presbyterate, while the biases of the numerous sources that illustrate his episcopate are problematic.

John Chrysostom's social interactions

Close relationships

First, we will consider his interactions in close relationships, as bishop John seems to have worked directly with a number of women deacons of high social standing attached to the churches in Constantinople (Mayer 1999). The most famous of these, because the relationship is the best documented, was the aristocratic ascetic, Olympias, who had founded a female monastery in the city during the episcopate of John's predecessor, Nectarius (Hatlie 2007: 72–4). The nature of the relationship which existed between John and Olympias is attested in the surviving letters which John wrote to her (Ep. 1–17), which are much longer and more personal than the bulk of his correspondence, and in her biography (Vita Olympiadis) and Palladius' Dialogue. Unfortunately, her responses to his letters have not come down to us. Although in her biography her generosity towards John and his exclusive care for her community in return (Vita Olymp. 6, 8) are intended to elevate her piety and sanctity, it is possible that there is some truth in the details. John is said to have been the only male permitted to enter the premises of her ascetic establishment, which abutted the Great Church and had its own private passage feeding directly into the church's narthex. Similarly, it is alleged that he ordained as deacon three of her relatives (Vita Olymp. 7), which implies some form of prior instruction and ongoing supervision by him. In return, she is said to have seen to his general and domestic needs, including day-to-day expenses and laundry (Vita Olymp. 8; Nicephorus Callistus, in Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 13.24).

Palladius' account of John's priorities when he learned of the order for his second exile indicates the esteem in which he held not just Olympias, but the circle of women deacons with whom she served in the Great Church. Whereas he farewelled the assembled bishops in the bishop's palace, he moved into the baptistery to take his leave separately of all the deacons – Olympias, Pentadia and Procla, with the widow Silvina (Dial. 10). All four elite widows had close imperial associations. Palladius further claims that John arranged to have a presbyter lead the grief-stricken women from the premises in order to prevent them stirring up the crowd, a precaution which suggests that the women's close association with the bishop was widely known. It is noteworthy, too, that it was not just Olympias but also Pentadia who was arrested and charged with setting fire to the Great Church as a protest against John's departure into exile (see Ep. 94). A number of women patrons at Antioch with whom he continued to correspond in exile were likewise identified by his enemies as key supporters and similarly prosecuted. Sabiniana, John's elderly aunt, a deacon much respected in Antioch, in fact arrived at Cucusus in 404 on the same day as John, declaring her intention to follow him wherever he was sent (Ep. 6 ad Olymp.). Together with his letters to other Antiochene women of some wealth and status, which hint at pre-existing long-standing relationships, this evidence suggests that the connections with wealthy, aristocratic women that he forged upon his arrival in Constantinople mirrored a familiar practice (Mayer 2014).

While we are not informed in such detail about John's close relationships with male clergy, we know that the Antiochene presbyter Constantius travelled to Cucusus to be with John in his exile (Ep. 6 ad Olymp.), was closely associated with John's circle of supporters and patrons in Antioch, and was next in line to succeed John's mentor, Flavian, as that city's bishop. Constantius seems to have spent a great deal of time with John in Cucusus, and to have been instrumental in supervising the latter's concerns in his absence, at least outside Constantinople (Delmaire 1997: 304). Like Olympias, Constantius rates a special mention by Palladius (Dial. 16), and it is clear in letter 62 that he has just been with John and is on his way back to the Antiochene presbyters to whom John is writing. Among these presbyters there is a group around Diophantes to whom John writes several warm letters from exile, which suggests a close relationship of long standing between them (Ep. 222, 239–41). A number of these presbyters are in turn intimately networked with the Antiochene women with whom John corresponded (Mayer 2014: 217–19). Delmaire (1997: 306–9) provides useful detail concerning John's correspondence with non-clerical men and women at both Constantinople and in Syria during the period of his exile and concludes that, with rare exceptions, the relationships with individuals in Syria were more enduring.

Kelly (1995: 16–17, 57) would also have the younger John working and associating closely at Antioch with both bishop Meletius and bishop Flavian, when lector and presbyter. In his late teens or early twenties he was, further, part of a close circle of young men of like background who experimented with the ascetic life (Illert 2000), a number of whom, like John, later entered the priesthood (e.g. Theodore of Mopsuestia). Concerning his later years, although his letters to Helpidius, bishop of Laodicea, differ considerably from those to Olympias, together these two are the sole recipients of letters from John in the final year of his exile (Delmaire 1997: 309), which may indicate that the relationship between the two bishops was closer than that of a senior bishop and his supporter. Similarly, John's defence at Constantinople of his archdeacon Serapion against Severian, bishop of Gabala, and his willingness to alienate the latter, could simply be a matter of principle, but may also suggest a greater than usual loyalty to this member of his clergy (see Mayer 2008: 43–5). Given that the greater portion of his life was spent in the service of the neo-Nicene church, it is not unreasonable to suppose that John's closest and most enduring relationships in each city were with women and men who were either themselves ordained or who worked closely with him in his ministry.

The imperial family

As bishop of the imperial capital John had ex officio contacts with the royal couple, the emperor Arcadius and the empress Eudoxia (Tiersch 2002: 183–228). We know that on a state occasion, the anniversary of the death of Theodosius I, John delivered a panegyric in the Church of the Holy Apostles in the presence of Arcadius and Eudoxia (Nov. hom. 6). He interacted with them also on extraordinary religious occasions that involved public processions (Nov. hom. 2–3). Sozomen (Historia Ecclesiastica 8.18.5) indicates that John baptised all their children, although there is some doubt as to whether John in fact officiated at the baptism of their son, Theodosius II, or whether this was performed in January 402 by John's rival and episcopal locum, Severian of Gabala. In the third Homily on Acts John suggests that as bishop he was treated at court with special reverence (PG 60,41 6–10). In regard to the relations between bishop and emperor, John's interaction with Arcadius cannot be gauged with any certainty, whether because of the emperor's carefully managed and therefore anonymous role, or the prominence accorded the empress in the sources. In a period when emperors and bishops were in competition for ecclesiastical authority, it is natural that John's parrhesia (exercise of frank speech) before the emperor is accorded prominence in the few explicit sources (Liebeschuetz 2011). John himself similarly brings to the fore his resistance to the soldiers sent to carry out Arcadius' decree when this conflicted with the authority of the church to grant asylum (In Eutropium). When writing to the bishop of Rome after he had been recalled from his first exile, on the other hand, John refers courteously to the emperor and, contrary to ps-Martyrius, Socrates and Sozomen, indicates that it is Arcadius (not his wife) who instigated his recall and reinstatement (Ep. 1 ad Innocentum, SC 342,78–9). Here, rather than emphasising the competition between bishop and emperor for spiritual authority, John describes the authority of the emperor and church as symbiotic and the emperor's support as validation of his own position. At the same time, it must be remembered that John could not have been deposed and sent into exile in 403 and again in 404 had the emperor not endorsed a synodical decision by the bishops who opposed John and on that basis issued the appropriate decree.

Regarding bishop and empress, the interests of both Johannite and anti-Johannite sources present us with the opposite problem. There is a great deal of information, little of it, however, to be relied upon (Mayer 2006a, 2013). In some sources Eudoxia is vilified as an arch-enemy of John (ps-Mart., Oratio funebris; Socr., H. E. 6.18; Soz., H. E. 8.20), in others praised as a pious supporter (ps-Chrys., Sermo post reditum 2). The sole verifiable reference that John himself makes to her occurs in a homily dating to 400 or later in which her piety and humility are substantially praised by him (Nov. hom. 2). This aligns with the claim made by Socrates (H. E. 6.8) and Sozomen (H. E. 8.8) that when John introduced Nicene nocturnal processions in Constantinople to counter those of the Homoian party, he received support from the empress in the form of large silver crosses and the participation of her chamberlain, Brison. The sources highlight an additional role that may have been authentic – her patronage too of visiting bishops. Eudoxia is said to have mediated in the dispute between John and his locum, Severian of Gabala, who had seemingly usurped the bishop's position during the latter's absence in Asia Minor in 402 (Socr., H. E. 6.11; Soz., H. E. 8.10), while also providing hospitality for those hostile to John's interests, notably Theophilus of Alexandria and Epiphanius of Salamis (Soz., H. E. 8.15). To place her actions in context, Olympias is said similarly to have provided hospitality impartially for visiting bishops hostile to John (Pall., Dial. 17). Both women extended their largesse in ways that were normative for powerful, wealthy women. Perhaps the most telling corrective to the sources that portray Eudoxia as John's arch-enemy is the evidence offered by imperial legislation to the effect that following her death in 404 the persecution of John and his supporters intensified (Delmaire 1991: 83). This suggests that up until that point she was able to restrain his enemies and their influence on the emperor to some degree. On her death, the latter seized the opportunity to escalate hostilities, including alienating John irretrievably from the emperor.

Figure 54.2   Solidus of Arcadius. ©Dumbarton Oaks, Byzantine Collection, Washington, DC

Congregations and laity

As far as his relationships with the laity is concerned, John had the ability to inspire either great loyalty or great disaffection. Both these reactions we find at Constantinople. For instance, when John had a visiting bishop from Galatia preach in his stead, his congregation reacted negatively because they had wanted John to preach and had been expecting him (In illud: Pater meus usque modo operatur). When he returned both from his trip to Asia Minor in 402 and his first exile in 403, his supporters welcomed him back in the streets of the city with enthusiasm (Sermo post reditum 1; De regressu). Some laity, however, most notably women, grew hostile towards him, and attended synaxis (a liturgical assembly) elsewhere in the city presided over, it seems, by another bishop, who trod a fine line with respect to John's authority (In Eph. hom. 11). Since as bishop, with the exception of those who were his intimates, he probably had limited contact with laity on a pastoral level outside synaxis (Allen and Mayer 2000: 373–4), it is within worship and particularly through preaching that his polarisation of the laity was most likely effected. That this had already occurred while he was a priest at Antioch is suggested by Sozomen, who states that there, John's parrhesia pleased the people but grieved the wealthy and the powerful at whom it was targeted (H. E. 8.2.11). Most likely it was his employment of harsh as well as gentle speech (Rylaarsdam 2014), his constant emphasis on virtue and diagnosis of vices, and his message that it was the personal responsibility of everyone to correct their own soul (Mayer 2015b) that either appealed to his audiences or alienated them.

That John had relationships with a variety of individual congregations is evidenced in both cities. So in In illud: In faciem ei restiti it is clear that in Antioch he was assigned to the congregation at the old church (Palaia), and had the opportunity to build up a particular rapport with the group of Christians who regularly worshipped there. At other times, we find him attached to the clergy at the Great Church, but he also seems to have preached on a semi–regular basis in the Church of St Babylas (Mayer and Allen 2012: 174–80). At Constantinople, it seems that in order to preserve Nicene control of them, he was, in addition to the Great Church there, obliged to preside and preach periodically in a number of other churches (Mayer 2000a). This evidence of the expansiveness of his reach needs to be modified, however. Since a much larger number of Christians or nominal Christians tended to attend worship only at times of major festivals (particularly when they involved spectacular processions), his relationship with such irregular attendees in both cities is likely to have been less close. John's effect on his audiences varied markedly also, since in De proph. obsc. hom. 2 he refers to members of the audience pushing and shoving to get close to the ambo from which he was preaching, while in In Heb. hom. 15 it is clear that people are chatting and making amusing comments to each other or else openly laughing while he is preaching his sermon.

Figure 54.3   Ambo of Great Church, Constantinople. Photo by Wendy Mayer and John Hunter Farrell

Clergy

In John's relationships with clergy, whether of the same status as himself, of a more elevated status or subordinate, we also observe a variety of interactions. In Antioch his relations with bishop Meletius and with Flavian, Meletius' successor, have traditionally been thought to have been close (e.g. Kelly 1995: 57, 103), to the point where Flavian deputised John to take over many of his duties during the latter part of John's presbyterate. There is no clear evidence for this, however, beyond John's obvious popularity as a preacher, the suggestion in In illud: In faciem ei restiti that Flavian on at least one occasion took John away from his regular duties to accompany him on some official occasion, and John's close relationship with the presbyter Constantius who appears to have been groomed as Flavian's successor after John departed for Constantinople. The fact that John preached as one of a number of presbyters or in conjunction with Flavian on festival occasions (e.g. De b. Philogonio, De s. Babyla, In diem natalem) merely reflects routine procedure during this time. Again, John's warm encomia on Flavian and Meletius in Cum presbyter ordinatus fuit, In Meletium and De statuis hom. 3 and 21 could owe as much to rhetoric as to a genuinely close and warm relationship between John and these bishops. His relations with other clergy, male and female, in Antioch have yet to be explored properly and documented. Nonetheless, we know that he had more or less annual contact with a group of rural Syriac-speaking monk-priests who came in from the surrounding countryside to consult with Flavian and appeared in John's own congregation on occasion (Van de Paverd 1991: 260–89), and, as we have seen, there is also evidence in his letters of his continuing contact with various clergy from Antioch after his transfer to Constantinople.

We are much better informed about John's relations with the clergy in the imperial capital, although these are not usually highlighted in the biographies. Regarding the clergy whom John inherited at Constantinople, Palladius (Dial. 5) makes it clear that on his arrival the new bishop conducted a major review of their activities and lifestyles, alienating many of them in the process because of his stricter views (Tiersch 2002: 135–51). At the Synod of the Oak a number of the charges in fact targeted his alleged mistreatment of them (Van Nuffelen 2013b). Additionally, John was not averse to ordaining and promoting his own candidates to positions. This was demonstrated most notably by his interference in church affairs in Ephesus which resulted in the consecration of Heracleides as bishop there (Socr., H. E. 6.11.11), and by the promotion of the deacon Serapion to the post of chief supervisor of church administration in Constantinople, and later to bishop of Heracleia (Socr., H. E. 6.17). Chrysostom's relations with visiting clergy were not always smooth, as evidenced by the visit of Theophilus of Alexandria (Ep. 1 ad Innoc.) and Epiphanius of Salamis, who eventually snubbed him (Pall., Dial. 8; Socr., H. E. 6.14; Soz., H. E. 8.14). Despite John's initially cordial contact with Severian of Gabala, empress Eudoxia, as we have seen, had to intervene in order to reconcile the two, and the homilies De pace imply an interim public reconciliation. On the other hand, if we may believe that around forty bishops were with Chrysostom at the time he received news of his exile (Palladius, Dial. 8), it seems that a large number of visiting bishops supported his authority and activities. Palladius' partisan account of John's life and trials is witness to the strength of attachment to John on the part of at least one fellow bishop, as is the equally partisan funeral oration by 'Martyrius', if the identification of its author as Philip, bishop of Side (Wallraff 2008: 27 n. 11), proves valid. John's authority over and pastoral care of his clergy in Constantinople are revealed by his letters to the presbyters Theophilus and Sallustius (Ep. 212, 203), in which he dwells on their failure to continue their duties immediately after his deposition.

The biases in these relationships can be brought out by supplying further context, in that all of the clergy mentioned thus far, whether colleague, friend or enemy, are neo-Nicene. At the time that he was bishop of Constantinople, the Novatian Christians had also been accorded imperial sanction and worshipped freely inside the city in their own churches. John's relationship with their bishop is said to have been antagonistic (Socr., H. E. 6.22), while in 402 he deposed a number of Novatian bishops and replaced them with Nicene counterparts in Asia Minor on his way home from Ephesus (Socr., H. E. 6.11.13). Similarly, it should be pointed out that John provided a fertile basis for the charge of supporting Origenism that Theophilus and the monk Isaac levelled against him (Katos 2011: 86–95; Van Nuffelen 2013b), in that John gathered around himself, ordained, and offered hospitality in Constantinople to a number of deacons, presbyters and bishops who had studied with Evagrius in Egypt and were identified as Origenist, Palladius and John Cassian among them.

Ascetics

If John's relationships with women are now somewhat clearer, the precise nature of his own ascetic formation and its influence upon his subsequent relationships with ascetics both in Antioch and Constantinople have in the last decade become considerably more obscure. Whatever form it took, John's experimentation with the ascetic life during his twenties in Antioch as well as the spectrum of ascetic life available in that city and its vicinity gave him first-hand experience of various ascetic lifestyles and their devotees. Importantly, there is crossover between the category of clergy and ascetics in that a number of the clergy with whom John associated in both Antioch and Constantinople were practising ascetics as well as ordained. This is the case with the bishops Flavian, Palladius and Diodore, and the initial supporter and subsequent enemy of John, Acacius of Berrhoea. One of the few details that seems certain is that John trained with several companions in an urban asketerion under Diodore and Carterius. Among those companions was Theodore, subsequently bishop of Mopsuestia. Certainly, a strong interest in urban asceticism and the transformation of the domestic households of his congregants into modified asketeria permeates his preaching (De Wet 2015; Stenger 2016). Similarly, his admiration of the apostle Paul leads John ultimately to present him as an ascetic exemplar (Heiser 2012).

John seems to have been surrounded by ascetic women. His close contact with Olympias and her monastery in Constantinople is, as we have seen, well attested. Similarly, the women deacons who formed his inner circle there were all widows who had chosen not to enter into a second marriage. This reflected his family experience, in that his own mother was a widow and probably led a celibate life (Ad viduam iuniorem 2; SC 138.120), while his aunt Sabiniana seems to have been a celibate as well as a deacon. He also appears to have considered male ascetics (monks) essential to certain charitable and missionary activities, although his relationship with these ascetic men was most likely administrative rather than personal. His letters witness to his recruitment of monks for, and their active involvement in, a pagan mission in Phoenicia conducted under the auspices of the Antiochene church (Ep. 53, 123, 221), while at Constantinople he appointed monks to staff the hospitals he founded (Pall., Dial 5).

His admiration for, and appreciation of the psychotherapeutic value of, askesis had, however, specific limits. While he approved of the male eremetic ascetics and monastic communities that dotted the mountains that formed a backdrop to Antioch, encouraging his parishioners to walk up and visit them (e.g. In Matt. hom. 69/70, 72/73; In 1 Tim. hom. 14), he disapproved strongly of the urban practice in which ascetic women set up domestic households with clergy (syneisaktism) (Leyerle 2001). He similarly disapproved of male ascetics who lapsed into general audience behaviour, such as laughter, during worship (In Heb. hom. 15; PG 63,122 5–7). In Constantinople he came into conflict with monks who operated as patrons independently of his episcopal authority (Soz., H. E. 8.9). This was particularly the case with the influential monk Isaac (Caner 2002: 190–9). There are hints of a further negative encounter, this time of a personal nature, indicating that as a young man John may have been abused by a male ascetic mentor (Morris 2016: 99–136).

Administrative officials

Both in Antioch and in Constantinople, John had opportunity to observe the work of administrative officials and to become acquainted with them personally. In Antioch, for example, in 387 the consularis Syriae came into the church to calm the people in the period of intense fear after the riots (De statuis hom. 16; Van de Paverd 1991: 55), while it is possible that an official of similar status, who is simply termed 'the archon', led the procession occasionally in Antioch on the feast-day of certain martyrs (Hom. in martyres). When John was escorted from Antioch to Constantinople for consecration as bishop of that city, it is said that a comes was entrusted with the task of summoning and escorting him (Pall., Dial. 5). Officials who were Christians, such as the magister militum per Orientem Ellebichus, may also have been encountered by John when he assisted in distributing the eucharist.

In Constantinople contact with high-level officials occurred both in and outside the domain of worship. John alludes to a long-standing hostility between himself and the powerful eunuch and chief chamberlain Eutropius (In Eutropium), involving personal representations to Eutropius on John's part. The power in the relationship was reversed when Eutropius, who had banned the right of churches to provide asylum, later sought asylum at John's altar. In 400, at imperial behest, John was involved in negotiations with the Gothic general, Gainas, who had demanded of the emperor that his three chief political enemies, the ex-consul Aurelianus, the general Saturninus and the comes (Count) John, be handed over to him as hostages. Count John, who managed to escape being handed over to Gainas, nonetheless conceived a great dislike for Chrysostom because of John's failure to support him adequately, while Saturninus' widow, Castricia, was left with an enduring dislike of the bishop as well (Tiersch 2002: 281–308). Close contact must have developed between John and Eudoxia's chamberlain, Brison, who trained the church choir and assisted with the nocturnal processions which John instituted. He also encountered Brison when he was recalled from his first exile, in that the chamberlain was the official entrusted with the letter of recall (Socr., H. E. 6.16; Soz., H. E. 8.18). John continued to write to him from exile (Ep. 190, 234). En route into exile the second time, John met various officials from other cities, perhaps at Caesarea (Delmaire 1997: 306), and most obviously consorted constantly with the military escort (praefectiani) who accompanied him. He wrote to several high-level Constantinopolitan officials from his place of exile, although in thinking that they were his supporters John made a number of mistakes (Delmaire 1997: 306–8).

Relations with non-Christians

Jews

We come now to John's conduct towards people who practised other religions. As awareness of the role of rhetoric in Christian identity formation has advanced, determining the reality of his interactions with non-Christians, both Jews and pagans, has become increasingly complicated. It has recently been suggested, for instance, that the well-known account by John of a woman in Antioch forced by another Christian to ratify a business contract in a local synagogue is not real, but a fictional construct (Fonrobert 2005). Complicating the definition of Jew (whether by ethnicity or religion) is the recent argument that the 'Judaisers' who are addressed by John in his infamous homilies Adversus Judaeos are not Christians who adopt Jewish practices, but in fact local Messiah-worshippers who are ethnic Jews (Black 2014). Although in practical terms it should be pointed out that on the days he preached these homilies few of these individuals, if any, were among his audience. Meanwhile, the existence of a vibrant and diverse Jewish community in Antioch in late antiquity is well established (Van der Horst 2000), and a number of active synagogues were present within both the city and its suburbs. The Jews in Antioch had links with the community in Palestine. The orator Libanius, for instance, both corresponded with the Jewish patriarch there and dealt with Jewish tenants on his own family estate locally (Sandwell 2007: 113–14). Whereas these Jews are mostly defined in ethnic terms and Libanius' attitude varies from one of sympathy and support to one of disapproval, depending on the nature of the patron-client relationship involved, John's relations with Jews are considerably more opaque, in large part because he is reacting to the religious policies of the emperor Julian vis-à-vis Christians, in which Christians were viewed as errant Jews and Jewish interests promoted (Côté 2012). John's persistent identification of Jews with the religion, along with everything that he says about them, both positive (see Ritter 2012: 110) and negative (see Wilson VanVeller forthcoming), needs to be viewed in this light. Unfortunately, this concern is so dominant that it obscures how he might in fact have related to Jews in person. A quite different aspect of Jewish–Christian interaction in which John participated in Antioch, on the other hand, has recently been brought to light. In his exegesis of Genesis, John displays knowledge of a roughly contemporary specifically Jewish exegetical tradition. Whether that knowledge was direct or mediated through his teacher, Diodore, via Eusebius of Emesa, is uncertain (Pomeroy forthcoming).

While we must assume that Jews played a part in the society of Constantinople too, there is little information about Jews or a Jewish community in that city in the sources. A rare exception is John's reference to the city-wide response to the military harassment of the baptisands on Easter 404 (Ep. 1 ad Innoc. 8), where he claims that not just Nicene Christians, but even the local Jews, Greeks and heretics were horrified.

Pagans

In terms of pagans and John's relationship with them, it is again somewhat difficult to separate his preaching against their religious beliefs and practices from his encounter with them on a day-to-day basis. This is because at both Antioch and Constantinople pagan rituals and events had an integral role in civic and day-to-day life, regardless of the religious affiliations of the inhabitants. So at Antioch the rhythms of the city, its calendar, theatrical performances and horse races were intimately linked to long-standing pagan celebrations. This included the local Olympic games. In In S. Iulianum John expresses his concerns about the established custom among the Antiochene citizenry of retiring to Daphne on the following day for a meal, which was accompanied by male choruses and other lewd festivities (PG 50,672–4). In In kalendas, too, he references some of the alcohol-fuelled celebrations with which the church had to compete at that time of year. The influence of pagan activities undoubtedly obtained to a large degree in Constantinople as well, where the impact of the imperial cult, despite the overt Christianisation of the imperial family, would have been more in evidence. In the capital both the hippodrome and festivities associated with the imperial cult physically disturbed church services, either through the noise or through the competition for attendance (Contra ludos et theatra; PG 56,263). The church historians Sozomen and Socrates describe public celebrations associated with the new statue erected in honour of the empress Eudoxia (Soz., H. E. 8.20; Socr., H. E. 6.18). As was the case with Judaism, here too it was John's constant concern to instruct his parishioners to differentiate Christian civic obligations from pagan or paganising activities. In private life the influence of pagan practices was similarly dominant. John tells us, for instance, that his parishioners preferred to consult pagan priests when they lost a valuable animal (In 2 Tim. hom. 8), and indicates that the influence of Christianity on both marriage and funeral rituals continued to be minimal (e.g. In Col. hom. 12).

Even without precise detail, the influence of John's encounters with paganism and pagan individuals on a personal level should not be underestimated. His entire education prior to his baptism conformed to the traditional upbringing of an elite young male. During that period he was instructed by non-Christian teachers in every aspect of Greek paideia. This pagan education permeates every aspect of his own pedagogical method (Rylaarsdam 2014; Mayer 2015b), and strongly shapes his ideas on slavery (De Wet 2015).

Relations with heterodox and schismatic Christians

Closely aligned with how John related to non-Christians is his interaction with heterodox Christians and schismatics. As a young man he grew up in Antioch in a church that was divided between at least three factions, including homoian Christians and two schismatic Nicene communities. For a brief period around 375, the city also boasted a fourth bishop, an Apollinarian. John himself was appointed lector in one of the two schismatic factions – the one that was led by bishop Meletius – at a time when homoian, rather than Nicene Christianity was in favour (Kelly 1995: 10–17). John's experience among that group of Christians involved services in the open air on the campus martius across the river from the city, because the group had been banned from the city itself and its churches placed in the hands of the homoians by the emperor Valens. It is likely that the asketerion run by Diodore and Carterius, both adherents of the Meletian faction, was situated across the river in the same vicinity (Mayer and Allen 2012: 51–2). It was only when John was ordained deacon that his faction became prominent in Antioch. The schism between his group of Nicene Christians and the other persisted, however, during the entire length of his presbyterate there, and it was only after his elevation to the see of Constantinople that the issue was resolved (Kelly 1995: 116–18). Consequently, when John speaks of the Christians in Antioch he is always talking about a confused and divided community, just as when he talks of processions with the whole city in attendance on days of martyrial festivals his comments must be viewed with some scepticism. The techniques which he learned during those years in Antioch for promoting the Christian faction to which he was attached, techniques which would have included careful phrasing of doxologies and the conduct of nocturnal processions and of litanies, would have prepared him for the situation which he found on his arrival in Constantinople. There the homoians, who had dominated the city until the accession of Theodosius, still exerted a degree of influence over the populace. Similarly, some of the early monastic communities there had heterodox leanings (Hatlie 2007: 62–5). In a sermon attacking the Anomoeans, the most radical of the homoian parties, John himself indicates that the Nicene Christians of Constantinople are in the minority (Contra Anomoeos hom. 11). The presence of the Novatians within the city, with their own churches and imperial protection, is likely to have struck him as contributing to a situation that paralleled what he had been familiar with in Antioch. What is noteworthy in regard to the way John treats the heterodox and schismatic in his preaching is that they are to be managed in the same way as Jews and pagans, namely as having sick souls that require healing (Laird 2013). The one difference, in his view, is that the souls of heterodox and schismatic Christians are perhaps less far gone in their illness and slightly more amenable to therapy.

Figure 54.4 Tyche of Antioch, Galleria dei candelabri, Vatican Museum, Rome. Photo by Wendy Mayer and John Hunter Farrell

Relationships across the social strata

Lower status groups?

When we consider John's relationships with the various social strata in Antioch and Constantinople, it is interesting to speculate in the first instance whether ascetics with whom he associated as a young man came from markedly different social backgrounds from those with whom he was used to associating or whether they were of a similar social standing. Bishop Flavian, while ascetic, was clearly from the upper class (Sermo cum presbyter [PG 48,696 46–9]; In Gen. sermo 1 [PG 54,585 47–67]), and the young men with whom John lived when experimenting with urban asceticism in the asketerion of Diodore and Carterius were all from the same comfortable social background (Kelly 1995: 18–23). On the other hand, the Syriac-speaking rural monk-presbyters whom he encounters in Antioch every year or so are less educated and probably of a lower social status (Van de Paverd 1991: 281). In regard to the social strata of John's audiences when he preached, it is likely that at least one of the congregations with which he was involved in Antioch contained middle-class persons, including artisans, and possibly also soldiers (De baptismo Christi [PG 49,365 5–14]; De paen. hom. 3 [PG 49,291 31–5 a.i.]).

Aside from preaching, it is difficult to say whether John ever had any direct interaction with lower social classes. Certainly he passed beggars and the homeless in the streets of Antioch (De eleemosyne) and encountered them outside the churches and martyria there (De paen. hom. 3; PG 49,294); it is also possible that he was accosted by beggars in the agoras of Constantinople (In Acta apost. hom. 3; PG 60,39 27–8). While, according to Palladius (Dial. 5), John organised hospitals in Constantinople, including one specialising in the care of lepers (Ps. Mart., Or. funeb. 61–4), there is no evidence that he visited these institutions or involved himself in the day-to-day care of the inmates. Again, it is valid to wonder what he means when, as in In princ. Actorum hom. 1 (PG 51,69 51–61), he says that the poor are absent from the church on that occasion because they have to earn their living. Is this perhaps a similar social group to the one he refers to in De mutatione nom. hom. 3 (PG 51,136 21–7), where he says that married males who spend their lives in daily toil or are caught up in business affairs can only manage to attend the liturgy once a week? From John's other homilies it is patent that the poverty which he discusses on many occasions is relative, possibly because the truly poor may not have taken part in the synaxis, but waited outside the church to beg (Mayer 2006b).

Upper status groups

In general, however, the bulk of the evidence points to audiences comprised of the wealthy to the very wealthy, in particular the aristocratic elite (Mayer 2000b). This is consonant with the circles of patrons (ordained, lay and/or ascetic) in both cities with whom John worked. The women from Antioch with whom he continued to correspond in exile, for instance, all belong to the upper echelons of Antiochene society, as do the men with whom they and John are networked (Mayer 2014). In Constantinople, as already indicated, John seems to have moved to a large extent in the circles of the rich and influential, that is, the senatorial and curial classes. As foster-mother of Eudoxia, Marsa had influence on, and an especially close connection with, the empress. On his travels in exile, it is the wealthy who offer hospitality in particular and assist John in whatever way possible. For example, Seleucia, the wife of Rufinus in Caesarea, offers him her suburban estate and gives instructions for her manager to gather farmers from her various estates to defend John, if the monks should threaten him there (Ep. 9 ad Olymp.), while John himself says that on arrival in Cucusus stewards and managers kept turning up, whose masters had written instructing them to see to his needs (Ep. 6 ad Olymp.).

Different ethnic and language groups

While the city of Constantinople must have struck John in many ways as similar to Antioch in that both cities were large, wealthy, influential and Hellenised, there was not only similarity but also difference in the two locations with regard to the different language groups and ethnic communities with which he came into contact. In Antioch he regularly encountered Syriac-speaking farmers on the occasion of martyrial festivals which drew such people to the city from the surrounding countryside, particularly when a market-day was associated (De b. Philogonio; De ss. martyribus [PG 50,705–7]). In the case of Syriac-speaking ascetics who also operated as priests, such occasions apparently also provided an opportunity for consultation with their bishop. Since such persons appear not to have spoken Greek, and it is probable that Flavian, who grew up in Antioch as a member of the wealthy upper classes, did not speak Syriac, the episcopal entourage must have incorporated bilingual interpreters. The same may also have been the case on the occasions when such persons attended worship, although it may be that worship continued in Greek as usual and the Syriac-speaking visitors were passively literate. The regular influxes of beggars and the rural poor into Antioch at times of famine would also have exposed John and his fellow citizens to non-Greek speakers (Libanius, Or. 1.205–11). The extent to which Syriac-speakers lived within the city of Antioch and comprised a normal sector of the community is unknown, although recent research on linguistic diversity in this region suggests that bilingualism, as well as the presence of local Aramaic-speakers, may have made for a more linguistically fluid demography (Shepardson 2014: 137–41).

At Constantinople there was a relatively large Gothic-speaking community because of the strong representation of ethnic Goths in the armed forces. The Nicene members of this community had their own church, in which John preached in Greek on at least one occasion (Cum presbyter Gothus). While he preached in Greek, the lessons were read in Gothic, and a homily was also preached by a presbyter in Gothic. The extent to which the liturgy itself was conducted in Gothic is unknown. John also wrote in Greek to a group of Gothic monks whose monastery was situated in the suburbs of Constantinople, suggesting bilingualism on their part (Ep. 207). The letter indicates that they had been working with John to care pastorally for the local Gothic Nicene community. John also encountered a range of languages and ethnicities simply because Constantinople was the capital of the eastern empire and the residence of the imperial couple, a factor which drew people from all over the east who were seeking patronage and influence. Severian of Gabala was a native speaker of Syriac who arrived during John's tenure and to whom John entrusted the task of preaching (in Greek) while he himself was absent in Asia Minor (Socr., H. E. 6.11; Soz., H. E. 8.10). Acacius of Berrhoea, a semi-permanent resident of Constantinople at this period, was likewise a Syrian native, although presumably, like Severian, he was capable of conversing in Greek. By the same token, John Cassian, whom John ordained to the priesthood in Constantinople (Pall., Dial. 3), came from the west and presumably spoke Latin by preference, as did the aristocratic widow Silvina, with whom John was closely associated (Mayer 1999). This also appears to be the case with Amprucla, to whom

Figure 54.5   Panel, Great Church, Constantinople. Photo by Wendy Mayer and John Hunter Farrell

John wrote from exile and who he says could have written to him in her own language (Ep. 103). John himself, due to his secular education in Antioch, where Latin continued to be the official language of imperial administration, was literate in it and possibly bilingual (ps-Mart., Or. funeb. 50). Regarding the diversity of languages and ethnicities in the capital, John states explicitly that during one nocturnal procession the Psalm was sung in Greek, Latin, Syriac and Gothic (Nov. hom. 2).

Relations with visitors

This brings us to a final category with whom John interacted: visitors, as distinct from permanent residents. Firmly fixed as John Chrysostom was in his communities, there were numerous occasions when he was called upon to interact with people who were not a permanent part of the communities in Antioch or Constantinople. Here we have to think of visitors, itinerants, country people and clergy from elsewhere in the same district as well as from other districts. Aside from the rural Syrian monk-priests who came to Antioch for consultation, Antioch was a major see in Syria and the east, and synods of varying dimensions were frequently held there (see e.g. De incompr. dei nat. hom. 2; SC 28 bis.142 20–5), a fact which would explain why sometimes a number of bishops were in attendance on Flavian when John was preaching (In Gen. sermo 8). Because of seasonal factors Antioch was also particularly susceptible to the influx of homeless individuals and beggars, who were greeted with deep suspicion by the permanent residents (De eleemosyna). These same people are probably some of the homeless whom John passed in the street on his way to the church. Antioch was also the site of military administration for the eastern front and John encourages his parishioners there to set aside a room for strangers to the city, just as they provide clothing, food and board in their houses for soldiers when required (In Phil. hom. 9; In Acta apost. hom. 45).

In Constantinople the semi-permanent presence of a large number of bishops during John's episcopate is striking. Often these men were in residence for reasons of personal advantage, as the cases of Acacius of Berrhoea, Severian of Gabala and Antioch of Ptolemais illustrate. Relations between episcopal peers were delicate and expectations of the local bishop, in terms of the hospitality and diplomatic respect to be accorded such visitors, high. Severian, it will be remembered, was appointed John's locum in his absence, while, as already mentioned, on at least one occasion a visiting bishop was given licence by John to preach in his stead. In his letter to the bishop of Rome, John claims that on the night of Easter Saturday 404 there were more than forty bishops with him for the baptism of the female catechisands (Ep. 1 ad Innoc.). Some bishops, like Theophilus of Alexandria, were summoned to the capital for reasons of ecclesiastical politics, while Epiphanius of Salamis travelled there in order to charge John with Origenism at the instigation of Theophilus. Where Theophilus spurned John's hospitality and failed to greet him as expected, Epiphanius, it is alleged, attempted to ordain on John's territory, held a synaxis without permission, and had the intention of denouncing John during a synaxis in the Church of the Holy Apostles (Socr., H. E. 6.12–14; Soz., H. E. 8.14). Monks too came to Constantinople, such as Isaac (from Syria), and those from Nitria who sought arbitration between themselves and Theophilus of Alexandria. For canonical reasons John tried to avoid the latter issue, organising various noble women to feed the monks and help them support themselves. Ultimately the men, frustrated by John's inaction, went directly to the empress Eudoxia for help (Soz., H. E. 8.13; Pall., Dial. 7–8). Visitors could be both a blessing and a curse and nowhere more so than in the imperial capital.

Conclusion

What we begin to observe when we view the person of John from these different perspectives is an array of interconnecting pieces which together offer up a picture of a complex man in a complex society. For instance, the blurred boundaries between church, city and state at this time, in conjunction with John's private background, see him interacting throughout his life with a range of administrative officials both within the ecclesiastical sphere and outside it. Similarly, the picture of the patronage relationships and networks, clerical, imperial and lay, in which John participated in both cities is emerging as increasingly complex. Thanks to the scholarship since the mid 2000s, the distinctiveness of the features of each city within which he lived and worked has to some degree collapsed, particularly in regard to ethnicity, language, social strata, demographic complexity and the role of elite women. Substantially dissolved too is any boundary that remained, in the historian's view, between John's secular and Christian-ascetic education. At the same time, the biases in the historical sources concerning his life and the need to filter their accounts through the lens of the Johannite schism have become significantly clearer. Emerging into greater focus too is the problematic of reading John's rhetoric about Jews, pagans and heterodox Christians at face value. How John genuinely interacted with Jews is further from our grasp than ever before. Finally, it should now be clear that further careful work has yet to be done before a reliable psychological study of John (pace Liebeschuetz 2011) can be arrived at or the predominant image of John as a wronged saint that is promoted by the bulk of the sources deconstructed.

That said, what remains firm is the value of viewing John Chrysostom through the lens of his relationships and interactions. Whether in Antioch or Constantinople, John was, on the one hand, a cleric who devoted his life to promoting the interests of neo-Nicene Christianity; and, on the other, very much a man of the large, wealthy, bustling, Hellenised city. His reactions to the circumstances of his exile serve to underline the intelligence with which the route and manner of his deportation were selected. Few other punishments could have been more painful to a man of his particular background, status and generation.

Bibliography

Allen, P. and Mayer, W. (2000) 'Through a bishop's eyes: Towards a definition of pastoral care in late Antiquity', Augustinianum 40: 345–97.

Baur, C. (1929–30) Johannes Chrysostomus und seine Zeit, 2 vols. Munich, Germany: Hueber = (1959–60) John Chrysostom and His Time, Sr M. Gonzaga (trans.), 2 vols. Westminster, MD: Newman Press.

Bibliowicz, A. M. (2013) Jews and Gentiles in the Early Jesus Movement: An Unintended Journey. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Black, S. (2014) 'Ethnic Judeans and Christian identity formation in John Chrysostom's Adversus Judaeos', in Black, S. K. (ed.) To Set at Liberty: Essays on Early Christianity and Its Social World in Honor of John H. Elliott. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 62–92.

Caner, D. (2002) Wandering, Begging Monks: Spiritual Authority and the Promotion of Monasticism in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Côté, D. (2012) 'Le problème de l'identité religieuse dans la Syrie du IVe siècle. Le cas des Pseudo-Clémentines et de l'Adversus Judaeos de saint Jean Chrysostom', in Mimouni, S. C. and Pouderon, B. (eds) La croisée des chemins revisitée. Quand l'Église et la Synagogue se sont-elles distinguées? Paris: Éditions du Cerf, 339–70.

Delmaire, R. (1991) 'Les "lettres d'exil" de Jean Chrysostome. Études de chronologie et de prosopographie', Recherches Augustiniennes 25: 71–180.

Delmaire, R. (1997) 'Jean Chrysostome et ses "amis" d'après le nouveau classement de sa Correspondance', Studia Patristica 33: 302–13.

De Wet, C. (2015) Preaching Bondage: John Chrysostom and the Discourse of Slavery in Early Christianity. Oakland, CA: University of California Press.

Elm, S. (1998) 'The dog that did not bark. Doctrine and patriarchal authority in the conflict between Theophilus of Alexandria and John Chrysostom of Constantinople', in Ayres, L. and Jones, G. (eds) Christian Origins. Theology, Rhetoric and Community. London: Routledge, 66–93.

Fonrobert, C. (2005) 'Jewish Christians, Judaizers, and anti-Judaism', in Burrus, V. (ed.) Late Ancient Christianity: A People's History of Christianity, Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 234–54.

Hartney, A. (2004) John Chrysostom and the Transformation of the City. London: Duckworth.

Hatlie, P. (2007) The Monks and Monasteries of Constantinople, ca. 350–850. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Heiser, A. (2012) Die Paulusinszenierung des Johannes Chrysostomus. Epitheta und ihre Vorgeschichte. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Illert, M. (2000) Johannes Chrysostomus und das antiochenisch-syrische Mönchtum. Studien zu Theologie, Rhetorik und Kirchenpolitik im antiochenischen Schrifttum des Johannes Chrysostomus. Zurich and Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Pano Verlag.

Katos, D. (2011) Palladius of Helenopolis: The Origenist Advocate. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1995) Golden Mouth. The Story of John Chrysostom – Ascetic, Preacher, Bishop. London: Gerald Duckworth & Co. Ltd.

Laird, R. (2013) 'John Chrysostom and the Anomoeans: Shaping an Antiochene perspective on Christology', in Mayer, W. and Neil, B. (eds) Religious Conflict from Early Christianity to the Rise of Islam. Berlin: De Gruyter, 129–49.

Leyerle, B. (2001) Theatrical Shows and Ascetic Lives. John Chrysostom's Attack on Spiritual Marriage. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Liebeschuetz, W. (1985) 'The fall of John Chrysostom', Nottingham Medieval Studies 29: 1–31.

Liebeschuetz, W. (2011) Ambrose and John Chrysostom: Clerics between Desert and Empire. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Malingrey, A.-M. (1973) 'L'Édition critique de Jean Chrysostome. Actualité de son oeuvre. Volumes Parus. Projets', in SYMPOSION. Studies on St. John Chrysostom. Thessalonika, Greece: Patriarch. Hidruma Paterikon Meleton, 77–90.

Mayer, W. (1999) 'Constantinopolitan women in Chrysostom's circle', Vigiliae Christianae 53: 265–88.

Mayer, W. (2000a) 'Cathedral church or Cathedral churches? The situation at Constantinople (c. 360–404 AD)', Orientalia Christiana Periodica 66: 49–68.

Mayer, W. (2000b) 'Who came to hear John Chrysostom preach? Recovering a late fourth-century preacher's audience', Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 76: 73–87.

Mayer, W. (2005) The Homilies of St John Chrysostom – Provenance. Reshaping the foundations. Rome: Pontificium Institutum Orientalium Studiorum.

Mayer, W. (2006a) 'Doing violence to the image of an empress: The destruction of Eudoxia's reputation', in Drake, H. (ed.) Violence in Late Antiquity. Perceptions and Practices, Aldershot, UK: Ashgate Publishing Ltd, 205–13.

Mayer, W. (2006b) 'Poverty and society in the world of John Chrysostom', in Bowden, W., Gutteridge, A. and Machado, C. (eds) Social and Political Life in Late Antiquity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 465–84.

Mayer, W. (2008) 'The making of a Saint. John Chrysostom in early historiography', in Wallraff, M. and Brändle, R. (eds) Chrysostomosbilder in 1600 Jahren: Facetten der Wirkungsgeschichte eines Kirchenvaters. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter, 39–59.

Mayer, W. (2013) 'Media manipulation as a tool in religious conflict: Controlling the narrative surrounding the deposition of John Chrysostom', in Mayer, W. and Neil, B. (eds) Religious Conflict from Early Christianity to the Rise of Islam. Berlin: De Gruyter, 151–68.

Mayer, W. (2014) 'John Chrysostom and women revisited', in Mayer, W. and Elmer, I. J. (eds) Men and Women in the Early Christian Centuries. Strathfield, NSW: St Pauls Publications, 211–25.

Mayer, W. (2015a) 'Medicine in transition: Christian adaptation in the later fourth-century east', in Greatrex, G. and Elton, H. (eds) Shifting Genres in Late Antiquity. Farnham, UK: Ashgate, 11–26.

Mayer, W. (2015b) 'Shaping the sick soul: Reshaping the identity of John Chrysostom', in Dunn, G. D. and Mayer, W. (eds) Christians Shaping Identity from the Roman Empire to Byzantium: Studies inspired by Pauline Allen. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 140–64.

Mayer, W. (2015c) 'John Chrysostom', in Parry, K. (ed.) The Wiley Blackwell Companion to Patristics. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 141–54.

Mayer, W. (2015d) 'The ins and outs of the Chrysostom letter-collection: New ways of looking at a limited corpus', in Neil, B. and Allen, P. (eds) Collecting Early Christian Letters: From the Apostle Paul to Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 129–53.

Mayer, W. (2015e) 'The persistence in late Antiquity of medico-philosophical psychic therapy', Journal of Late Antiquity 8: 337–51.

Mayer, W. and Allen, P. (2012) The Churches of Syrian Antioch (300–638 CE). Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Meyer, L. (1933) Saint Jean Chrysostome. Maître de perfection chrétienne. Paris: Beauchesne et fils.

Morris, S. (2016) 'When Brothers Dwell in Unity': Byzantine Christianity and Homosexuality. Jefferson, NC: McFarland & Company, Inc.

Pomeroy, S. (forthcoming) 'Representing the Jews: John Chrysostom's use of exegetical and theological traditions for Gen. 1,26a (Hom. Gen. 8)', in Roskam, G. and Verheyden, J. (eds) Light on Creation. Ancient Commentators in Dialogue and Debate on the Origin of the World. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Ritter, A. M. (2012) Studia Chrysostomica. Aufsätze zu Weg, Werk und Wirkung des Johannes Chrysostomos (ca. 349–407). Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Rylaarsdam, D. (2014) John Chrysostom on Divine Pedagogy: The Coherence of his Theology and Preaching. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Sandwell, I. (2007) Religious Identity in Late Antiquity. Greeks, Jews and Christians in Antioch. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Shepardson, C. (2014) Controlling Contested Places: Late Antique Antioch and the Spatial Politics of Religious Controversy. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Stenger, J. (2016) 'Where to find Christian philosophy? Spatiality in John Chrysostom's counter to Greek Paideia', Journal of Early Christian Studies 24: 173–98.

Tiersch, C. (2002) Johannes Chrysostomus in Konstantinopel (398–404). Weltsicht und Wirken eines Bischofs in der Hauptstadt des Oströmischen Reiches. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Van der Horst, P. (2000) 'Jews and Christians in Antioch at the end of the fourth century', in Porter, S. and Pearson, B. (eds) Christian-Jewish Relations through the Centuries. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 228–38.

Van de Paverd, F. (1991) St. John Chrysostom, The Homilies on the Statues. An Introduction. Rome: Pont. Institutum Studiorum Orientalium.

Van Nuffelen, P. (2013a) 'Palladius and the Johannite schism', Journal of Ecclesiastical History 64: 1–19.

Van Nuffelen, P. (2013b) 'Theophilus against John Chrysostom: The fragments of a lost liber and the reasons for John's deposition', Adamantius 19: 138–55.

Voicu, S. (2008) 'L'immagine di Crisostomo negli spuri', in Wallraff, M. and Brändle, R. (eds) Chrysostomosbilder in 1600 Jahren: Facetten der Wirkungsgeschichte eines Kirchenvaters. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter, 61–96.

Wallraff, M. (2008) 'Tod im Exil. Reaktionen auf die Todesnachricht des Johannes Chrysostomos und Konstituierung einer "johannitischen" Opposition', in Wallraff, M. and Brändle, R. (eds) Chrysostomosbilder in 1600 Jahren: Facetten der Wirkungsgeschichte eines Kirchenvaters. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter, 23–37.

Wilson VanVeller, C. (forthcoming) 'John Chrysostom and the troubling Jewishness of Paul', in De Wet, C. and Mayer, W. (eds) (Re)Visioning John Chrysostom: New Theories and Approaches. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

55

GREGORY OF NYSSA

Elena Ene D-Vasilescu

Gregory's life

St Gregory of Nyssa (c. 332 – after 385),[1] often referred to as Nyssen, was one of the three represent-atives of the Cappadocian theological school, the other two being Basil of Caesarea, 'the Great' (his older brother), and Gregory Nazianzus (his friend). He was probably born in Neocaesarea, Pontus (the modern Nikşar in north-eastern Turkey). Gregory was first educated by his brother, Basil, his sister Macrina and their mother Emmelia,[2] and probably later at schools in Caesarea and Athens[3] where he might have studied philosophy, literature, and very probably the sciences of his day; at least this is what the knowledge displayed in his writings suggests. It is not easy to verify the details of his education as he himself declares that, additionally to Basil, 'Paul, John and the rest of the Apostles and prophets' were his teachers'.[4] He was initially an Anagnostes (a layman reader), and then decided on a career in rhetoric. He married,[5] but when his wife died he became a priest at the entreaty of his friends, Nazianzen especially. Nyssen worked for a short while in Constantinople in 349, which he visited often.[6] In c. 371 his older brother, Basil, Bishop of Caesarea at that time, ordered him, rather against his will, to become bishop of the seat of Nyssa, a small town in St Basil's metropolitan district, in today's central Turkey.

In 376, while St Gregory was absent, a synod of Arian bishops and court prelates gathered in Nyssa and deposed him, inducing him for a while to adopt a wandering life. In 378, after the death of the Arian emperor Valens,[7] 'the father of fathers' (as Gregory would later be called by the Second Council of Nicaea/the Seventh Ecumenical Council in AD 787[8]) returned to his see in Nyssa. A year later, he attended a Synod at Antioch and was subsequently sent by attendees of this gathering to visit the diocese of Pontus. While there, he was elected archbishop of Sebaste/Sebasteia (380), which he had to administer for a few months, although much against his will. In 381, together with his friend St Gregory of Nazianzus, Nyssen took a prominent role at the Second Ecumenical Council in Constantinople where the trinitarian dogmas of Nicene Orthodoxy prevailed; he supported Nazianzen on that occasion. In 383 Gregory of Nyssa was again in the capital of the Byzantine Empire at the summons of emperor Theodosius for another council,[9] and again in 394 for a synod called by the Patriarch Nectarios/Nektarios, and also in 385 when he delivered a funeral oration in the same city for the princess Pulcheria (on the 24 August 385) and, after a few weeks ('perhaps 14 September'),[10] for her mother, the empress Flacilla.[11] Apparently he died soon afterward.[12] His memory is celebrated on 10 January.

Gregory's writings

Among Nyssen's treatises still central to scholarly preoccupations are: On Virginity (before 379), De opificio hominis/On the Making of Man (380), Against Eunomius (its books were written in various years between 378 and 384),[13] Homilies on the Song of Songs (381),[14] The Life of Macrina (382),[15] another work that was later entitled A Refutation of Eunomius's Profession [of Faith] (383) – this is a critique done by Nysses to Eunomius's Profession of Faith (383) for emperor Theodosius,[16] On the Divinity of the Son and On the Holy Spirit (delivered in 383),[17] On Not Three Gods (370–380?),[18] Against the Pneumatomachoi (384–385),[19] Antirrheticus against Appollinarius (c. 385),[20] To Theophilus (written at the earliest in 385),[21] De anima et resurrectione/On the Soul and the Resurrection (383–384),[22] The Life of Moses (391–392)[23] and The Great Catechechetical Oration (after 381).

His epistles have been increasingly scrutinized by researchers: John Behr,[24] Neil McLynn[25] and Johannes Zachhuber[26] discuss them in their works. Of particular interest is Epistle 38 thought for a long time to have been written by Basil of Caesarea, but attributed by more and more scholars to Gregory of Nyssa; in any case, all editions, including the critical one,[27] introduce it as an epistle between the two brothers on 'the difference between substance and person'. (There is another important extant letter sent by Gregory to his brother Peter, Letter 35, on the distinction between ousia and hypostasis.[28])

Gregory's theology

On the Trinity

In To Eustathius on the Holy Trinity,[29] On Not Three Gods. To Ablabius[30] and, if we accept it as his, in Letter 38,[31] Nyssen expresses his trinitarian position in the vein of Athanasius (293–298)[32]; as we shall see, he refines the view of the Alexandrian. Like Basil of Caesarea and Gregory of Nazianzus, he offers equal status to the Trinity. Even though the Cappadocians did not have identical ideas on all the issues they wrote about, their Christology and their stands concerning the Trinity were common to the three of them.

Figure 55.1   St Gregory of Nyssa, fresco from the fourteenth century, Chora Church, Istanbul. This image (on line) is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution 2.5 Generic license

Basil and the Gregories maintained that the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are three eternal hypostases (ὑποστάσεις) of the same essence (οὐσία). Epistle 38 mentioned above 'presents the relation between ousia and hypostasis in terms similar to those applied to the grammatical distinction between the general and the particular'.[33] Its line of argument clarifies what consubstantiality means for Nyssen: whatever terms indicate the substance of one member in a class, this will apply to the others as well; those members that are described by the same terms in regard to their substance are consubstantial.

When thinking that each member of the Trinity is both a person and an individual entity, it seems that Gregory has in view that each of them has a different role within it. At least this is what the ending of To Eustathius on the Holy Trinity suggests:

> Only-begotten God is the Anointed, and the Holy Spirit is His Unction, and the appel-lation of Anointed points to the Kingly authority, and the anointing is the token of His Kingship, then the Holy Spirit shares also in His dignity. If, therefore, they say that the attribute of Godhead is significative of dignity, and the Holy Spirit is shown to share in this last quality, it follows that He Who partakes in the dignity will also partake in the name which represents it.[34]

On Not Three Gods. To Ablabius emphasizes that there is no difference in nature among the members of Trinity:

> [e]very activity that proceeds from God to creation and is named in accordance with all sorts of ideas begins from Father and proceeds through the Son and is completed into the Holy Spirit. For this reason, the name of the activity is not divided up into the plurality of the agents.
>
> (GNO III. 1, 47. 21–48.5, Mueller)

But certainly they are intimately interconnected; it is impossible to think about one without the other; Paul Fides says that they are in a dance of love, a perichoresis.[35] Sarah Coakley has coined and operates with the expression 'ordered causality' when she described the dynamics specific to the Trinity.[36]

Many contemporary researchers have analysed Nyssen's stand on the triune nature of God, and on its implications for other theological notions from both Antiquity and modern times.[37] For instance, Johannes Zachhuber considers that 'the innovative Cappadocian settlement to the trinitarian debate provided the backdrop for the first theological theory of the individual cast as a definition of the hypostasis'.[38] To Gregory of Nyssa, individuals are 'the universal nature in its con-crete existence'.[39] Trinity as understood by Gregory can be considered a distinctive version of what Marmodoro calls the 'One and Many Problem', 'a chapter in the history of Mereology'.[40] Nyssen, as did the other representatives of the Cappadocian school, 'expanded the Church's understanding of the Trinity by applying Nicene conclusions about Christ to the Holy Spirit'.[41] Thus they countered the Pneumatomachians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit.[42] Lucian Turcescu considers that for Gregory, 'The three divine persons know and love each other, are in communion with each other, and freely act together in their common will'.[43] In time Trinity has become a model for social existence and action (in Pavel Florensky's work, for instance[44]) and some theologians opine that Gregory's Trinity can be seen from this angle: among them we can mention Sarah Coakley,[45] Alister E McGrath[46] and John Zizioulas.[47]

Christology

In Gregory's understanding, Christ has two natures: one divine and one human; these are simultane-ously united and distinctive. As Morwenna Ludlow indicates,[48] some scholars have treated the divisive aspect,[49] while others have underlined the distinction between the two.[50] The bishop expresses the union of the two natures of Christ in terms of 'unconfused union'/henōsis,[51] 'mixture' and 'fusion'. He expounds, in terms strongly reminiscent of Athanasius, that Christ 'mingled' with humanity and received its nature in order to make possible for "the whole mass of our nature" to be sanctified'.[52] The distinctiveness consists in the fact that the Son is begotten, while the Father has no originator. But they are consubstantial – as the Holy Spirit also is – and all three are coeternal. They constitute the three hypostasis of the Godhead.[53] A fragment from the above-mentioned Letter 38 encapsulates some of this:

> Since then, as says the Lord in the Gospels, he that hath seen the Son sees the Father also; on this account he says that the Only-begotten is the express image of His Father's person. That this may be made still plainer I will quote also other passages of the apostle in which he calls the Son 'the image of the invisible God', and again 'image of His goodness'; not because the image differs from the Archetype according to the definition of indivisibility and goodness, but that it may be shewn that it is the same as the prototype, even though it be different. For the idea of the image would be lost were it not to preserve throughout the plain and invariable likeness. He therefore that has perception of the beauty of the image is made perceptive of the Archetype.[54]

It would be correct to affirm that, at least in part, Gregory's Christology took shape in his dialogue with Apollinarius (c. 310–390) and, paradoxically, with one of the latter's opponents, the Arian/Anomoean Eunomius of Cyzicus (d. c. 393). In arguments that suggest Nyssen had a solid philosophical education, he explains how it is possible for Christ to be homoousios with both God and humans.[55] To briefly present the ideas of his conversants, one should notice that the bishop of Laodicea, in his effort to emphasize Jesus's divinity and the unity of his person, went so far as to deny the existence of a rational human soul (νοῦς) in Christ's human nature. Apollinarius thought that the Son was totally infused by the Logos and that his body was a glorified and spiritualized form of humanity. From another perspective, Eunomius (d. c. 393) argued that the created nature of Christ is a simple derivation of the uncreated nature of God, which is solely so ('unbegotten'). That while the Son, as Christ himself stated, is 'begotten from the Father'.[56]

To Apollinarius Gregory replied by saying that human nature has a universal as well as an individual character, and that Christ is homoousios with us with regard to its universal aspect. It is easy to observe here Gregory's intimate knowledge of Platonic philosophy and the way in which he adapted it to Christian ideas.[57] To Eunomius, Gregory replied that the language of 'cause' and 'of the cause' do not refer to nature, but to the difference concerning the manner of existence. Because of this, the attributes of the Father which we usually express by way of negation (i.e. apophatically) also hold for the Son and the Holy Spirit.

Christopher Beeley commented on Nyssen's belief that Christ's two natures are united but unconfused (a view he shared with Basil and Nazianzen), and inquired as to how Gregory fathomed that some characteristics of both the human and divine nature of Christ can be predicated (one of the issues the bishop of Nyssa tried to elucidate especially in his debate with Eunomius). The scholar from Yale emphasizes one difference between the divine and the human nature that is certain: the former is impassible, while the latter can feel suffering. Additionally, Beeley questions whether the concepts of ousia, hypostasis and eidos as comprehended by Nyssen constitute the basis for a consistent metaphysics, i.e. he queries whether there is a consistent metaphysics to support Gregory's doctrinal position?[58] I believe one can securely answer this in the positive.

The discussion with Eunomius was also an opportunity for Gregory to underline that no philosophical analysis or conceptual derivation can inform about God's nature (phusis).[59] He stated that the most appropriate way to refer to it is apophatically (Against Eunomius II [953–960, 1101–1108], IV 11 [524]).[60] With this the bishop anticipates Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite's position. Gregory repeatedly asserts that while God is transcendent, some knowledge of him is granted to those open to the manifestation of his energeiai/'energies' in the world.

Knowledge of God

Patristic scholars have tried to define Gregory's specific type of mysticism, and they have observed that it is very different from that characteristic of the medieval mystics: it does not involve visions or dreams, but prayers and asceticism.[61] Nevertheless, it is obvious that the fourth-century bishop is not only a believer in knowledge about reality acquired through God's grace; he is also a dialectician. Questions such as 'How . . . can a word of movement come from one that is rest?'; 'How can an immaterial God create matter?'; and 'How is unity related to multiplicity?' abound in his treatises and homilies. Anna Marmodoro, Andrew Radde-Gallwitz, Jonathan Hill and Johannes Zachhuber, among others, have analysed Gregory's ontology in the light of possible answers to these conundrums.

As evident from his debate with Eunomius[62] and underlined above, Nyssen thought that God's essence cannot be known, hence the human efforts to express the notion of the Creator through various approximating definitions that rely on observation of how God's 'energies' manifest. These are noticeable in nature as well as in the development of human soul, and are described in the Holy Bible. One way of becoming aware of the existence of the divine energies is by remarking the harmony within the cosmos. The preservation of a balance among contrary forces is, according to Gregory, only possible through God's intervention.[63] As I argued elsewhere, Gregory believed that everything that exists has an inner nature that cannot be immediately known and becomes manifest only through its own energies.[64]

The moral human development which Nyssen calls the 'perpetual progress' (epektasis),[65] is another means through which God's energeiai are at work. The process involves the cultivation of virtues and expresses the striving of the human being to join God, to become deified.[66] Gregory believed that people can have glimpses of the kingdom to come in the virtue of being made in the divine image; these previews occur in special moments of ecstatic experience (The Life of Moses). As observed, such a view placed him in opposition with the Anomoians, especially with Eunomius, who maintained that God can be known by the human mind through logical operations. At the same time, Gregory underlines the importance of human reason in articulating the faith; he considers that human beings progress in their knowledge of both the mundane and the transcendent realities.

Creation

According to Gregory, the world was created by God out of love and as an act of his will. The creation of humans is still happening in God's mind; it will be so until pleroma (fullness) is reached. Some contemporary works contest that such a notion exists in Nyssen's corpus; Anna Marmodoro's discussion about how, in Gregory's writings, God as an immaterial entity produces something material given the principle 'like causes like', is relevant from this point of view. The researcher answers this query by saying that through a process of abstraction, Nyssen individuates 'physical aspects of the material objects as definable, intelligible entities'.[67] Most scholars agree Gregory believed that after purification both the souled and un-souled elements of the universe will be saved/restored. This is in consequence of the same divine love that prompted the initial creative action, and that has primacy among the virtues and among the divine commandments.

Gregory avers that initially there were no divisions within creation (of a sexual or of any other kind); they only occurred in consequence of the fall. There will be none at the end of the universe. The lapse of the human being, the only existing rational entity, caused that of the entire cosmos, therefore it is logical to assume that salvation will be both singular and collective. When the world will reach its completion, even this division [between the singular and the collective] will be transcended. His explanation with regard to how such a process takes place is different from that of Origen; Gregory does not believe in the preexistence of the souls and in the pre-cosmic fall (On the Soul and the Resurrection). Adamantius thought that before the creation of the material world, logikoi or rational intellects (noes) existed by themselves (without the support of a body). They were in union with the Supreme creative Logos but eventually, with one exception, they turned away from it and received bodies. The exceptional logikos became the human soul of Christ. As for the others, they received bodies in accordance with the degree of their lapse. The holiest souls received light-weight bodies and became angels; those who fell furthest became gruesome demons; those who were in between the two became humans. For Origen, restoration means the return to the initial state of the primordial henad that has just been described. Nyssen managed to escape this circularity because for him restoration (apokatastasis) does not imply the existence of primordial logikoi, and even less that of the episode concerning their fall. In On the Soul and the Resurrection he explains that the end:

> [i]s one and only one; it is this: when the complete whole of our race shall have been perfected from the first man to the last, some transformation and obliteration of the prop-erties of human nature (such as mortality) [will take place] – a transformation that only occurs fully after Christ's ascension into heaven.[68]

Freedom of choice for humans was stated before the fourth century – in Origen's writings for instance; the theologian from Alexandria was convinced that God's will shall eventually be con-sensually accepted by his creation. Gregory of Nyssa is even sounder on this aspect;[69] for him, after purification through 'fire' and the conversion of passions, all – 'from the first man to the last'[70] – will be saved. Mario Baghos finds inconsistencies within the writings of the Cappadocian bishop on the issue of redemption (he thinks that in some passages Gregory affirms universal salvation, but in oth-ers not), and advises a reading of this doctrine merely in terms of intentionality. He opines that 'any allusion to universal salvation in St Gregory['s works should be seen] as an expression of God's inten-tion for humanity'.[71] The example Baghos adduces to justify his assertion is Macrina's, i.e. Gregory's, statement in On the Soul and the Resurrection that some people are saved 'straightway', i.e. they are purified from evil in this life, while others cleansed hereafter through fire for an 'appropriate length of time'. The researcher then comments that: 'we can choose either to accept or ignore this puri-fication; [that] is confirmed by the saint's many exhortations that we freely undertake the virtuous path'.[72] Ilaria Ramelli agrees that in Gregory's work each person would need a period of purification prior to his or her salvation (depending on the multitude and gravity of each individual's sins), but in the end everyone will align their will to that of God. She observes that since for Gregory every person would eventually accept the good having gone through purification, in his thought free will is compatible with universal salvation.[73] Such an idea made Kallistos Ware posit that, 'if dissociated from speculations about a pre-cosmic fall, a carefully qualified expression of universal hope is accept-able, even within the bounds of strict orthodoxy'.[74]

Anthropology, soteriology/eschatology

As already mentioned, Gregory speaks about a perpetual progress (ἐπέκτασις) towards the Beautiful and Good (only two of God's many titles), an ascending movement of the human souls through time into its (the Divine's) infinity. As the bishop states in On the Making of Man and Contra Eunomium, while the biological processes end at the moment of apokatastasis, the moral and spiritual development continues. But the unfolding of this growth, either in a linear or cyclical manner, does not contradict the fact that the kingdom of God, which the transfigured souls will finally reach, is transcendent. This transcendence is to be celebrated because it is the ground for the infinite human ascent to God. Rowan Williams emphasizes that this ascent is possible only through Christ and the Holy Spirit.[75]

Nyssen's knowledge and appreciation of Plato and Origen's writings, of Greek literature, and of the science of his time instilled in him an open-mindedness that allowed his writings to convey some courageous ideas, most notable among them being the last two commented on earlier (the non-existence of divisions within the initial creation, and especially that of universal salvation). On the latter, he said: 'Every one of us will participate "in the blessings which are in Him"'.[76] His conception was the most daring among all Patristic theories on this issue;[77] nevertheless, the bishop of Nyssa was not reproved for it – as known, Origen greatly suffered for thinking in a similar way. Gregory was probably spared because he was Basil's brother.[78]

In another text that focuses on salvation and deification, The Great Catechechetical Oration, Gregory holds that instrumental in those processes is not only the personal relation with God, but also the daily exercise of love towards fellow humans. According to him, redemption means that everything is continually transfigured, and that includes human emotions (which manifest themselves in the soul, but are not of the soul). Hence those that are negative can be employed for positive purposes: fury and jealousy, for instance, can be used to energize someone to act, and their performance can lead to good deeds (On the Making of Man). The final thing to be surpassed is death.

Gregory of Nyssa and the science of his time

In some of his writings, especially in An Apology for The Hexaemeron, Gregory engaged with the contemporary Hellenistic theories concerning the natural world. He did not hesitate to utilize ideas of his time that explained the creation of the universe as long as these did not contradict his belief, in line with the biblical account, in a universe created by God. He accommodated coeval philosophical insights and scientific data – drawn from physics and cosmology – into his theological accounts, thus continuing the dialogue with contemporary culture initiated by earlier Christian apologists.

As already suggested when referring to the logikos of every created element, Nyssen believed that the ability to create was conferred not only to humans, but also to the non-human universe; this has generative energies. In order to account for this inherent capacity of creation to unfold by itself over time, Gregory adapted and elaborated further the theory of logoi spermatikoi, originally put forward by the Stoics, and taken over by Plotinus (204/5–270) and the Christian writers of the second century. The theory, also circulated by Augustine via the Latin cognate terms of rationes seminales/causales, enjoyed a widespread popularity in the theological circles during the following centuries and was further developed. What is of paramount importance is that for Gregory matter is not inert but possesses energies that allow it to develop and further generate. In his work he employed elements from the natural philosophy of his age and adopted the seminal reason concept in order both to understand and explain why such a dignity was bestowed on the matter, and to expound the teleological progression of the universe. Such ideas explain those of determinism and freedom.

It might be the case that modern theories of evolution and theologies of creation can be accommodated within the theological framework proposed by Gregory. His natural theology, by assimilating the scientific knowledge of his era, could constitute a model for other theologians who might be able to understand that there should not be an antagonism between natural philosophy and religion, and that theology can dialogue with scientific enquiry.

Nyssen and language

Gregory is concerned with the semantic phenomena at work in his texts; he is aware that the capacity of human language to capture the richness of divine reality is limited. That especially in discussions concerning the Trinity and issues such as the nature of the universals.[79] There is currently a tendency to look for a theory of language in Gregory of Nyssa's writings. Among others, Beeley,[80] Radde-Gallwitz, Behr and Cassin[81] elaborate on predications concerning God's nature and the role of nouns in elaborating on the distinction between ousia and hypostasis.[82] Sarah Coakley pays attention to Gregory's use of gendered language.[83]

Gregory of Nyssa and Byzantium

Gregory and the other two representatives of the Cappadocian school greatly contributed to the development of Byzantine culture. They did so in various ways, one of them being the adaptation of Platonic categories to Christian realities. Concepts such as beauty and goodness, which constitute the subject of the dialogues penned by the Greek philosopher, are deployed by the bishop of Nyssa to explain the relationship between image and archetype. Because of this, David Bradshaw considers that Nyssen, as well as Basil and Nazianzen, assumed an 'iconic' outlook of life that became defining for the empire. He also thinks that the notions concerning the realization of the divine image within people are a part of the same ideatic process.

Scholarly afterlife of Nyssen's ideas

As previously mentioned, many of Gregory of Nyssa's notions are still the focus of academic preoccupations and debates today; that is especially true with regard to his Christology and trinitarian position. In the twentieth century, Jean Daniélou and Hans Urs Balthasar[84] made Gregory a subject of theological, philosophical and historical research in the twentieth century. Contemporary theological discussions led by theologians such as Christopher A. Beeley, John Behr, Paul M. Blowers, Hans Boersma, Mark Edwards, Sr. Nonna Verna Harrison, Jonathan Hill, Morwenna Ludlow, L. F. Mateo-Seco and G. Maspero, Anthony Meredith, Ilaria Ramelli, Kallistos Ware, Johannes Zachhuber, John Zizioulas and others keep Nyssen in the centre of scholarly discussions. It is interesting to emphasize that in the twenty-first century, his ideas form the bases of themes not only in theological, but also in philosophical and historical conversations through, for instance, the publications authored by Sarah Coakley, Anna Marmodoro, Neil B. McLynn, Richard Sorabji and Andrew Radde-Gallwitz.

Notes

1 Gregory attended a council of Constantinople in 394; his name appears there between that of the metropolitans of Caesarea and Iconium, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nyssa: Dogmatic Treatises, etc., ed. P. Schaff and H. Wace; trans. W. Moore and H. A. Wilson, NPNF, second series; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1983, vol. 5. 8. After that event there are no records concerning Nyssen. See Silvas 2007b, Gregory of Nyssa. The Letters: Introduction, Translation and Commentary, Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, Vigiliae Christianae, Supplements 83, 57. Also Pierre Maraval, 'La date de la mort de Basile de Cesaree', Revue d'études augustiniennes, 1988: 25–38.
2 See Silvas 2007a: 5. Also Van Dam 2003: 1.
3 Silvas 2007b: 5.
4 Ludlow 2000: 21.
5 Silvas, 'Introduction. Was Gregory of Nyssa married?', 2007b: 16–25. Also Daniélou 1956: 71–8 and Karras 2005: 111–21.
6 Silvas 2007b: 6. Most of Gregory's biographical information here was taken from Ludlow 2000 and Silvas 2007b.
7 The Arian emperor Valens died in the catastrophic battle of Adrianople on 9 August 378, and was succeeded by the Orthodox emperor, Theodosius I, who ruled 379–395.
8 Gregory was also called 'Luminary of Nyssa'; see Nikephoros Kallistos Xanthopoulos, Ecclesiastical History, xi. 201, in J.-P. Migne (i.e. his 'accurante'), Patrologia Graeca 146. 725B, Paris: Bibliothecae cleri universae, 1865 (PG 146. 725B); 1865: xi. 201.
9 Silvas, Gregory of Nyssa. The Letters, pp. 50–1. See also J. Daniélou 1955.
10 Silvas, Gregory of Nyssa. The Letters, p. 52.
11 Idem., p. 52.
12 See note 1.
13 Silvas 2007b: 49–53 (Silvas dates Contra Eunomium ll to the year 382, Contra Eunomium lll between 382–383, and Contra Eunomium lV between 383–384); Cassin 2014: 3 dates Contra Eunomium l to 378; he attributes the other books of Contra Eunomium to dates close to those proposed by Silvas (Cassin 2014: 3–4).
14 Silvas 2007b: 52.
15 Gregory of Nyssa 1952: 370–414; Maraval 1971; Silvas 2007a.
16 Silvas, Gregory of Nyssa, The Letters, p. 51–2. M. Cassin, in his Contre Eunome lll: une introduction, dates it 'after the summer of 383', pp. 3–4.
17 Silvas 2007b: 50.
18 See Gregory of Nyssa/F. Mueller/W. Jaeger (ed.) 1958: 37–57, trans. 1893: 331–6. See also Ayres 2004 and 2006; and Karfikova 2011: 131–68.

19 Silvas 2014: 51.

20 Gregory of Nyssa/W. Jaeger (ed.) 1960; Gregory of Nyssa/Callahan/J. W. Jaeger (ed.), Gregorii Nysseni Opera, 8. 1, 1952: 370–414; Maraval 1971.

21 Silvas Gregory of Nyssa, The Letters, 2007: 53–4.

22 Silvas 2007b: 51 (cf. Daniélou; he believes that On the Soul and the Resurrection was written in the winter of 383–384).

23 Silvas 2007b: 55.

24 Behr 2004, vol. 2: 415–27.

25 Neil B. McLynn 'The two Gregories: Nyssen and Nazianzen', paper at the Seminar 'Gregory of Nyssa: Historical and Philosophical Perspectives', 25 May 2016. During Trinity term 2016, Anna Marmodoro and Neil B. McLynn hosted this seminar dedicated to Nyssen in Corpus Christi College, University of Oxford.

26 Zachhuber 2003: 73–90.

27 Gregory of Nyssa?/Basil Magni/the Great 380s; Courtonne 1957: 81–93, vol. 1; Wace and Schaff (eds) 1895: 137–41. See also Deferrari 2014: 196–227, vol. 1. As mentioned, this epistle has been discussed, among others, by Zachhuber 2003: 73–90; Fedwick 1978: 31–51; Maspero et al. 2014: 579–94 (the authors of the article conclude that the letter was 'very probably' written by Nyssen) and Turcescu 2003: 97–110.

28 Gregory of Nyssa 378–380. See Silvas 2007b: 249–59; commentary 247–49. See also Behr 2004: 415–27, vol. 2, and Turcescu 1977: 63–82.

29 Gregory of Nyssa. Mueller/W. Jaeger (ed.) 1958; trans. Wace and Schaff (eds) 1893: 527–48.

30 Gregory of Nyssa. Mueller/W. Jaeger (ed.) 1958; trans. Wace and Schaff (eds) 1958: 37–57 trans. Wace and Schaff (eds) 1893: 331–6. See Ayres 2004 and 2006; Karfikova 2011: 131–68.

31 Gregory of Nyssa?/Basil Magni/the Great? 380s; Courtonne 1957: 81–93, vol. 1; trans. Wace and Schaff (eds) 1895: 137–41. See also Deferrari 2014: 196–227.

32 Maspero 2014: 401–29.

33 Behr 2004, vol. 2: 415.

34 Gregory of Nyssa. Mueller/W. Jaeger (ed.) 1958; trans. Wace and Schaff (eds) 1893: 330.

35 Fiddes 2000.

36 Sarah Coakley 'Introduction' in S. Coakley (ed.) 2003.

37 Zachhuber 2003: 73–90; Stead 1990: 149–63, 1981: 170–91; Turcescu 2003: 97–110.

38 Zachhuber 2014: 97.

39 Idem., p. 99.

40 Anna Marmodoro, 'Gregory of Nyssa on the Trinity', paper at the Seminar 'Gregory of Nyssa: Historical and Philosophical Perspectives', 8 June 2016. During Trinity term 2016, Anna Marmodoro and Neil B. McLynn hosted this seminar dedicated to Nyssen in Corpus Christi College, University of Oxford.

41 Papandrea 2012: 210.

42 Meredith 1999.

43 Turcescu 2005.

44 Florensky 1997.

45 Coakley 2002; Coakley (ed.) 2003.

46 McGrath 2011 [1994].

47 Zizioulas 1985.

48 Ludlow 2007: 97–107 (especially).

49 Kelly 1977: 299.

50 Sorabji 1988: 120.

51 Gregory of Nysa/Jaeger (3. 1) 1958: 184.

52 Idem. 151, 16–20. For a commentary on Gregory's Christology see Daley 1997: 87–96 and 2002: 469–88.

53 In a recent talk given in Oxford, Andrew Radde-Gallwitz presented Gregory's 'ways of understanding what the name "deity" (θεότης) means in his opinion. It is worth mentioning it here because it introduces a new idea; "deity" could be taken either as a nature-name or as an activity-name. Nyssen prefers to take it as an activity-name, though he also entertains the former hypothetically since it is the majority view'; A. Radde-Gallwitz, Gregory of Nyssa and the three Gods problem, paper delivered at the Patristic Seminar, Christ Church, University of Oxford, June 2016; (I have his permission to include his thoughts here). Ayres 2003: 15–44.

54 Basil of Caesarea/Gregory of Nysa? 1986: 141; Courtonne 1957: 91–2.

55 Gregory of Nysa/W. Jaeger, ed. 1960: 953–60, 1101–8, and 2014: 524, trans. Wace and Schaff (eds) 1893: 35–314.

56 Eunomius/Vaggione 1987.

57 Turcescu 2005.

58 Beeley 2016.

59 Gregory of Nysa/Friedrich Mueller/W. Jaeger (ed.) 1958: 131–233. See contemporary comments on it in Daley 1997: 87–96.

60 For a general discussion on the apophatic method in Christianity, see Turner 1995, the last reprint 1999.
61 Louth 2007; McGinn 2004; Musurillo 1979; Edwards, 'Allegory and Mysticism in Gregory of Nyssa', paper at the Seminar 'Gregory of Nyssa: Historical and Philosophical Perspectives', Corpus Christi College, University of Oxford, 27 April, 2016.
62 Gregory of Nyssa, Against Eunomius II [984–985, 1009, 1069]; Great Catechism 'Prologue' [12], 12 [44]; Hexameron [73]; Life of Moses II 168 [377–80]; Ecclesiastes I [624], II [644–5]; Song of Songs I [781–4], XI [1009–13], XIII [1049–52]; Beatitudes VI [1268]).
63 Heine 1995 and 1997: 130–6.
64 Ene D-Vasilescu 2013: 151–69.
65 Blowers 1992: 151–71.
66 Ene D-Vasilescu 2016.
67 Marmodoro 2015: 110.
68 Gregory of Nyssa/Wace and Schaff 1893: 639.
69 Harrison 1992.
70 Gregory of Nyssa/Wace and Schaff 1893: 639.
71 Baghos 2012: 125–62.
72 Idem.
73 Ramelli 2013: 433–4.
74 Ware 2004: 206, vol. 1.
75 Williams 1979: 58. He affirms that this ascent is possible only through Christ and the Holy Spirit. See also McGuckin 2009.
76 Gregory of Nyssa/Wace and Schaff 1893: 639.
77 Constas 2014: 139–63.
78 Ware 2004, vol. 1: 206.
79 Radde-Gallwitz 2009a.
80 Beeley 2012.
81 Cassin 2013: 41–67.
82 Behr 2004, vol. 2: 415–27.
83 Coakley (ed.) 2003.
84 Von Balthasar 1995.

Bibliography

Primary sources

Basil, St. (1895) 'Letters and select works', in Wace, H. and Schaff, P. (eds) NPNF 8. Oxford, UK: James Parker & Company; New York: The Christian Literature Company, 137–41.

Eunomius (1987) Eunomius. The Extant Works, ed. and trans. R. P. Vaggione, Oxford early Christian texts. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Gregory of Nyssa?/Basil Magni? (1857) 'Epistula XXXVlll. Gregorio fratri de discrimine essentiae et hypostasis', ed. by Migne, J. P. PG 32, columns 325–40.

Gregory of Nyssa (1863) 'Apology in Hexameron', PG 44: 69A–71B.

Gregory of Nyssa (1863) De anima et resurrectione, PG 46.

Gregory of Nyssa, St (1863) De hominis opificio, PG 44.

Gregory of Nyssa (1863) Hexameron liber, PG 44.

Gregory of Nyssa, St (1863) On the Soul and the Resurrection, PG 46.

Gregory of Nyssa (1893) Dogmatic Treatises, etc.; ed. by Schaff, P. and Wace, H. trans.; W. Moore, M.A. and H. A. Wilson, M.A.; NPNF 5, second series. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Gregory of Nyssa (1893) 'Letters', in Schaff, P. and Wace, H. (eds) A Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, vol. 5: Gregory of Nyssa: Dogmatic Treatises. Oxford, UK and New York: John Henry Parker.

Gregory of Nyssa (1893) On the Making of Man, in Wace, H. and Schaff, P. (eds) NPNF5: Gregory of Nyssa: Dogmatic Treatises. Oxford, UK and New York: John Henry Parker.

Gregory of Nyssa, St (1893) 'On the making of man', in Wace, H. and Schaff, P. (eds) A Selected Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, vol. V (NPNF5).

Gregory of Nyssa, St (1893) On the Soul and the Resurrection, in Wace, H. and Schaff, P. (eds) NPNF5. Oxford, UK and New York: John Henry Parker.

Gregory of Nyssa (1893) 'On virginity', in Schaff, P. and Wace, H. (eds) NPNF5: Gregory of Nyssa: Dogmatic Treatises. Oxford, UK and New York: John Henry Parker.

Gregory of Nyssa, St (1893) 'To Ablabius. That there are not three Gods', in Wace, H. and Schaff, P. (eds) A Selected Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (NPNF5). Oxford, New York: John Henry Parker, 331–6.

Gregory of Nyssa (1893) 'To Eustathius on the Holy Trinity', trans. in Wace, H. and Schaff, P. (eds) NPNF 5, 527–48.

Gregory of Nyssa (1952) 'Vitae Sanctae Macrinae', ed. by Callahan, V. W. in Jaeger, J. W. (ed.) Gregorii Nysseni Opera, 8. 1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 370–414.

Gregory of Nyssa/Cavarnos, J. P. (ed.) (1952) 'Gregorii Nysseni: De Virginitate', ed. by Jaeger, W. Gregorii Nysseni Opera 8/1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 217–343.

Gregory of Nyssa (1958) Antirrhereticus adversus Apollinarium, ed. by Mueller, F. in W. Jaeger (ed.) Opera dogmatica minora, GNO 3.1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1958) 'To Ablabius. That there are not three Gods', ed. by Mueller, F. in W. Jaeger (ed.) Opera dogmatica minora, GNO 3,1, Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 37–57.

Gregory of Nyssa (1958) 'To Eustathius on the Holy Trinity', ed. by Mueller, F. in W. Jaeger (ed.) Opera dogmatica minora, GNO 3.1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1960) 'Commentarius in Canticum Canticorum', ed. by Langerbeck, H. Gregorii Nysseni Opera 6. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1960) 'Contra Eunomium III, Refutatio confessionis Eunomii', ed. by Jaeger, W. Gregorii Nysseni Opera 1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1967) 'On perfection', in V. Woods Callahan (trans.) Saint Gregory of Nyssa: Ascetical Works, FC 58. Washington, DC: Catholic University Press of America, 93–124.

Gregory of Nyssa (1967) 'The life of St. Macrina', ed. by Woods Callahan, V. Saint Gregory of Nyssa: Ascetical Works, FC 58, Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 163–91.

Gregorius Nyssenus (1972) 'Sermones de Creatione Hominis', in Opera supplementum. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregorius Nyssenus, St (1972) 'Sermones de Creatione Hominis', in Opera supplementum. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1978) 'The life of St. Moses', ed. by Musurillo, H.; trans. A. J. Malherbe and E. Ferguson, Classics of Western Spirituality. New York: Paulist Press.

Gregory of Nyssa (1986) 'De Vita Macrini', ed. Jaeger, W. Gregorii Nysseni Opera 8/1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill: 370–414.

Gregory of Nyssa (1986) 'In Inscriptiones Psalmorum. In Sextum Psalmum: In Ecclesiasten Homiliae', in McDonough, J. and Alexander, P. (eds) Gregorii Nysseni Opera 5. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1986) 'Opera ascetica et Epistulae', pars 1, ed. Jaeger, W. and Cavarnos, J. P.; trans. V. W. Callahan, Gregorii Nysseni Opera 8/1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1987) 'Commentary on the Song of Songs', trans. C. McCambley. Brookline, MA: Hellenic College Press.

Gregory of Nyssa (1991) 'De Vita Moysis', ed. by Jaeger, W. Gregorii Nysseni Opera 7/1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (1991) 'The life of Moses', in A. J. Malherbe and E. Ferguson (trans.), The Classics of Western Spirituality. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press.

Gregory of Nyssa (1993) On the Soul and the Resurrection, trans. C. P. Roth. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, reprint 2000.

Gregory of Nyssa (2002) 'Contra Eunomium libri I et II', ed. by Jaeger, W. Gregorii Nysseni Opera 1. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (2002) 'Contra Eunomium liber III', ed. by Jaeger, W. Gregorii Nysseni Opera 2. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Gregory of Nyssa (2002) On the Soul and the Resurrection, trans. C. P. Roth. Crestwood, NY: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Gregory of Nyssa (2002) 'Opera ascetica et Epistulae', ed. by Pasquali, G. pars 2, Gregorii Nysseni Opera. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, vol. 8/2.

Gregory of Nyssa (2012) Homilies on the Song of Songs, trans. R. A. Norris Jr. Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature.

Gregory of Nyssa (2012) Homilies on the Song of Songs. Translation, introduction and notes by Norris, R. A. Jr., in Fitzgerald, J. T. (gen. ed.) Writings from the Greco-Roman World, vol. 13. Atlanta, GA: The Society of Biblical Literature.

Gregory of Nyssa (2014) Gregorii Nysseni Opera Online, ed. by Jaeger, W. Brill Online, 2014; Oxford University libraries. Accessed 24 November 2014: referenceworks.brillonline.com/entries/gregorii-nysseni-opera/de-anima-et-resurrectione-aGNO_15_t.

Gregory of Nyssa, 'Opera exegetica In Genesim', pars II, ed. by Jaeger, W. vol. 4/2 – currently unavailable.

Nikephoros Kallistos Xanthopoulos (1904) Ecclesiastical History, PG 145.

Schaff, P. and Wace, H. (eds.) (1892) Gregory of Nyssa: Select Works and Letters. Edinburgh, UK: Clark & Clark.

Schaff, P. and Wace, H. (eds.) (1893) Gregory of Nyssa: Dogmatic Treatises, etc., trans. W. Moore and H. A. Wilson, NPNF, second series. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Secondary sources

Ayres, L. (2003) 'Not three people: The fundamental themes of Gregory of Nysa's Trinitarian theology seen in "To Ablabius: On not three gods"', in Coakley, S. (ed.) Re-thinking Gregory of Nyssa. Oxford, UK: Willey-Blackwell, 15–44.

Ayres, L. (2004) On Not Three Gods: Gregory of Nyssa's Trinitarian Theology in Nicaea and its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Ayres, L. (2006) Nicaea and Its Legacy. An Approach to Fourth-Century Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Azkoul, M. (1995) St. Gregory of Nyssa and the Tradition of the Fathers. Lewiston, NY: E. Mellen Press.

Baghos, M. (2012) 'Reconsidering Apokatastasis in St. Gregory of Nyssa's "On the soul and the resurrection and the catechetical orations"', Phronema 27(2): 125–62.

Barnes, M. R. (2001) The Power of God: Δύναμις in Gregory of Nyssa's Trinitarian Theology. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Beeley, C. A. (2012) The Unity of Christ: Continuity and Conflict in Patristic Tradition. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Beeley, C. A. (2016) 'Predication, metaphysics, and divine impossibility in Gregory of Nyssa's Christological exegesis'. Paper presented at the Patristic Seminar, Christ Church, University of Oxford, 11 May 2016.

Behr, J. (1999) 'The rational animal: A re-reading of Gregory of Nyssa's De homini opificio'. Journal of Early Christian Studies 7(2): 219–47.

Behr, J. (2004) Formation of Christian Theology. The Nicene Faith. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, vols. 1–2.

Blowers, P. M. (1992) 'Maximus the Confessor, Gregory of Nyssa, and the concept of spiritual progress', Vigiliae Christianae 46. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 151–71.

Blowers, P. M. (2016) 'Beauty, tragedy and new creation: Theology and contemplation in Cappadocian cosmology', International Journal of Systematic Theology 18(1): 7–29.

Boersma, H. (2013) Embodiment and Virtue in Gregory of Nyssa: An Anagogical Approach, Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Bradshaw, D. (2013) 'The Cappadocian fathers as founders of Byzantine thought', in Costache, D. and Kariatlis, P. (eds) The Cappadocian Legacy: A Critical Appraisal, Sidney: St Andrew's Orthodox Press, 11–22.

Canévet, M. (1983) Grégoire de Nysse et h'erméneutique biblique: étude des rapports entre le language et la connaissance de Dieu. Paris: Études augustinniennes.

Cassin, M. (2012) L'Écriture de la controverse chez Grégoire de Nysse. Polémique littéraire et exégèse dans le 'Contre Eunome'. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Cassin, M. (2013) Prédication patristique et prédication moderne: préfaces aux homélies cappadociennes, Revue Bossuet, Supplément to vol. 4: 41–67.

Cassin, M. (2014) Contre Eunome III: une introduction, in Matthieu Cassin and Johan Leemans, Gregory of Nyssa: Contra Eunomium III: an English Translation with Commentary and Supporting Studies; Proceedings of the 12th International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa (Leuven, 14–17 September 2010); Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 12. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 3–37.

Cassin, M. (2015) 'Extraire pour réfuter. Pratiques de la fin du IVe siècle après Jésus-Christ, in Morlet, S. (ed.) Lire en extraits. Lecture et production des textes de l'Antiquité à la fin du Moyen Āge. Paris: Presses Universitaires Paris-Sorbonne, 239–57.

Cassin, M. and Grelier, H. (2008) Grégoire de Nysse: la Bible dans la construction de son discours. Actes du colloque de Paris, 9–10 février 2007 (Études augustiniennes, série Antiquité 184). Paris: Institut d'Études Augustiniennes.

Cassin, M. and Leemans, J. (eds) (2014) Gregory of Nyssa: Contra Eunomium III: An English Translation with Commentary and Supporting Studies; Proceedings of the 12th International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa (Leuven, Belgium, 14–17 September 2010); Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 12. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Cleary, J. J. (ed.) (1997) The Perennial Tradition of Neoplatonism. Leuven, Belgium: Leuven University Press.

Coakley, S. (2002) '"Persons" in the "social doctrine of the Trinity": A critique of current analytic discussion', in Davis, S. T., Kendall, D. SJ, and O'Collins, G. SJ (eds) The Trinity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Coakley, S. (ed.) (2003) Re-thinking Gregory of Nyssa. Oxford, UK: Wiley-Blackwell.

Constas, N. and Maximus, P. (2004) 'The last temptation of Satan: Divine deception in Greek patristic interpretations of the passion narrative', Harvard Theological Review, 97(2): 139–63.

Conway-Jones, A. (2014) Gregory of Nyssa's Tabernacle Imagery in Its Jewish and Christian Contexts, Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Courtonne, Y. (ed.) (trans.) (1957) Saint Basil. Letters. Paris: Societé d'Édition 'Les Belles Lettres', vols. 1–3.

Cross, F. L. and Livingston, E. A. (eds) (1985) The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Daley, E. B. (1997) 'Divine transcendence and human transformation: Gregory of Nyssa's Anti–Appolinarian christology', Studia Patristica 32: 87–96.

Daley, E. B. (2002) '"Heavenly man" and "eternal Christ"': Appollinarius and Gregory of Nyssa on the personal identity of the Saviour', Journal of Early Christian Studies 10(4): 469–88.

Daniélou, J. (1954) Platonisme and théologie mystique. Paris: Aubier.

Daniélou, J. (1955) La chronologie des sermons de Grégoire de Nysse. Paris: Palais Universitaire.

Daniélou, J. (1956) 'Le mariage de Grégoire de Nysse et la chronologie de sa vie', Revue d'études augustiniennes et patristiques 2: 71–8.

Davis, S. T., Kendall, D. and O'Collins, G. (eds) (2002) The Trinity: An Interdisciplinary Symposium on the Trinity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Deferrari, R. J. (ed.) (trans.) (2014) Basil. Collected letters. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, Loeb classical library.

Edwards, M. J. (2009) Catholicity and Heresy in the Early Church. Farnham, UK: Ashgate.

Edwards, M. J. and Swain, S. (2004) Approaching Late Antiquity: The Transformation from Early to Late Empire. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Ene D-Vasilescu, E. (2013) 'How would Gregory of Nyssa have understood evolutionism?', in Vinzent, M. (ed.) Studia Patristica 67(15). Leuven, Belgium: Peeters; Paris: Walpole, 151–69.

Ene D-Vasilescu, E. (2016) 'Love never fails'. Gregory of Nyssa on theōsis, in Edwards, M. and Ene D-Vasilescu, E. (eds) Visions of God and Ideas on Deification in Patristic Thought. Oxford, UK: Taylor and Francis.

Fedwick, P. J. (1978) 'A commentary of Gregory of Nyssa or the 38th letter of Basil of Caesarea', Orientalia Christiana Periodica 44: 31–51.

Fiddes, P. S. (2000) Participating in God: A Pastoral Doctrine of the Trinity. London: Darton, Longman and Todd.

Florensky, P. (1997) The Pillar and Ground of the Truth. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Harrison, V. N. E. F. (1992) Grace and Human Freedom According to St. Gregory of Nyssa. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press.

Heine, R. E. (1984) 'Gregory of Nyssa's apology for allegory', Vigiliae Christianae 38: 360–70.

Heine, R. E. (1995) Gregory of Nyssa's Treatise on the Inscriptions of the Psalms. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Heine, R. E. (1997) 'The form of Gregory of Nyssa's treatise on the inscriptions of the Psalms', Studia Patristica 32: 130–6.

Hill, J. (2009) 'Gregory of Nyssa. Material substance and Berkeleyan idealism', British Journal for the History of Philosophy 14(4): 653–83.

Jaeger, W. (1954) Two Rediscovered Works of Ancient Christian Literature: Gregory of Nyssa and Macarius. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Karfikova, L. (2011) 'Ad Ablabium. Quod Not Sint Tres Dei', in Drecoll, V. H. and Berghaus, M (eds) Gregory of Nyssa, The Minor Treatises on Trinitarian Theology and Apollinarism. Proceedings of the 11th International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa (Tübingen, 17–20 September 2008). Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 131–68.

Karfiková, L., Douglass, S. and Zachhuber, J. (eds) (2007) Gregory of Nyssa-Contra Eunomium II (An English Version with Supporting Studies). Proceedings of the 10th International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa Olomouc, 15–18 September 2004). Vigiliae Christianae Supplements 82. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, v. 2.

Karras, V. A. (2005) 'A re-evaluation of marriage, celibacy, and irony in Gregory of Nyssa's on virginity', Journal of Early Christian Studies 13(1): 111–21.

Kazhdan, A. P. (ed.) (1991) The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium. Oxford, UK and New York: Oxford University Press, vol. 2.

Keenan, M. E. (1950) 'De Professione Christiana and De Perfectione: A study of the ascetical doctrine of Saint Gregory of Nyssa', Dumbarton Oaks Papers 5: 167–207.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1977) Early Christian Doctrines. London: A & C. Black, 5th ed.

Ladner, G. B (1958) 'The philosophical anthropology of Saint Gregory of Nyssa', Dumbarton Oaks Papers 12: 59–94.

Lossky, V. (1983) The Vision of God. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Louth, A. (2007) The Origins of the Christian Mystical Tradition: from Plato to Denys. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Ludlow, M. (2000) Universal Salvation: Eschatology in the Thought of Gregory of Nyssa and Karl Rahner. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Ludlow, M. (2007) Gregory of Nyssa: Ancient and (Post)Modern. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Maraval, P. (1971) Grégoire de Nysse: La vie de Sainte Macrine, (Coll. Sources Chrétiennes, 178). Paris: Éditions du Cerf.

Maraval, P. (1988a) 'Grégoire de Nazianze identifié: Pansophios d'Ibora', Vigiliae Christianae 42. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 24–6.

Maraval, P. (1988b) 'La date de la mort de Basile de Cesaree', Revue d'études augustiniennes, 25–38.

Maraval, P. (1990) Grégoire de Nysse, Lettres, Introduction, Texte Critique, Traduction, Notes et Index, (Coll. Sources Chrétiennes, 363). Paris: Éditions du Cerf.

Marmodoro, A. (2015) 'Gregory of Nyssa on the creation of the world', especially in Marmodoro, A. and Prince, B. (eds) Causation and Creation in Late Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Maspero, G. (2007) Trinity and Man. Gregory of Nyssa's Ad Ablabium. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Maspero, G. (2014) 'Life from life: The procession of the Son and the divine attributes in Book Vlll of Gregory of Nyssa's Contra Eunomium', in Cassin, M. and Leemans, J. Gregory of Nyssa: Contra Eunomium III: An English Translation with Commentary and Supporting Studies; Proceedings of the 12th International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa (Leuven, 14–17 September 2010); Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 12. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 401–29.

Maspero, G. and Woźniak, R. J. (eds) (2012) Rethinking Trinitarian Theology. Disputed Questions and Contemporary Issues in Trinitarian Theology. London: T&T Clark.

Maspero, G., Degli Espositi, M. and Benedetto, D. (2014) 'Who wrote Basil's Epistula 38? A possible answer through quantitative analysis', in Cassin, M. and Leemans, J. (eds) Gregory of Nyssa: Contra Eunomium III: An English Translation with Commentary and Supporting Studies; Proceedings of the 12th International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa (Leuven, 14–17 September 2010); Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 12. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill, 579–94.

Mateo-Seco, L. F. and Maspero, G. (eds) (2010) The Brill Dictionary of Gregory of Nyssa. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

McGinn, B. (2004) The Foundation of Mysticism. New York: Herder and Herder.

McGrath, A. E. (2011) Christian Theology: An Introduction, 5th ed. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.

McGuckin, J. A. (2009) 'Eschatological horizons in the Cappadocian fathers', in Daly, R. (ed.) Apocalyptic Thought in Early Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

Meredith, A. (1995) The Cappadocians. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Meredith, A. (1999) Gregory of Nyssa. London: Routledge.

Musurillo, H. (1979) From Glory to Glory: Texts from Gregory of Nyssa's Mystical Writings. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Papandrea, J. L. (2012) Reading the Early Church Fathers. From the Didache to Nicaea. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press.

Pfister, E. J. (1964) 'A biographical note: The brothers and sisters of St. Gregory of Nyssa', Vigiliae Christianae 18(2): 108–13.

Quasten, J. (1983) Patrology III. Westminster, MD: Christian Classics.

Radde-Gallwitz, A. (2009a) 'Gregory of Nyssa', in Markham, I. S. (ed.) The Blackwell Companion to the Theologians. Oxford, UK: Wiley-Blackwell.

Radde-Gallwitz, A. (2009b) Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, and the Transformation of Divine Simplicity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Ramelli, I. (2013) Apokatastasis: A Critical Assessment from the New Testament to Eriugena. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Silvas, A. M. (2005) 'Gregory of Nyssa. The letters: Introduction, translation and commentary', Vigiliae Christianae, Supplements 83. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Silvas, A. M. (2007a) Macrina the Younger, Philosopher of God. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Silvas, A. M. (2007b) Gregory of Nyssa. The Letters: Introduction, Translation and Commentary. Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 52. Leiden, The Netherlands and Boston, MA: Brill.

Sorabji, R. (1988) Matter, Space, and Motion: Theories in Antiquity and Their Sequel. London: Duckworth; Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Sorabji, R. (ed.) (2005) The Philosophy of the Commentators, 200–600 AD: A Sourcebook. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, vols. 1–3.

Sorabji, R. (2006a) Time, Creation and the Continuum. Theories in Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages. London: Duckworth, 1983; reprinted Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1886, and Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Sorabji, R. (2006b) Self: Ancient and Modern Insights about Individuality, Life, and Death. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Stead, G. C. (1981) 'Individual personality in Origen and the Cappadocian fathers', in Bianchi, U und Crouzel, H. (eds) Arché e Telos: L'antropologia di Origene e di Grigorio di Nissa. Analisi storico-religiosa (Atti del Colloquio Milano 17–19 maggio 1979), Studia Patristica Mediolanensia 12. Milan, Italy: Vita e Pensiero, 170–91.

Stead, G. C. (1990) '"Why not three Gods?" The logic of Gregory of Nyssa's Trinitarian doctrine', in Drobner, H. R. and Klock, C. (eds) Studien zu Gregor von Nyssa und der Chrislichen Spätantike, Supplements to Vigiliae Christianae 12. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 149–63.

Stead, G. C. (1994) Philosophy in Christian Antiquity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Turcescu, L. (1977) 'The concept of divine persons in Gregory of Nyssa's to his brother Peter, on the difference between Ousia and Hypostasis', Greek Orthodox Theological Review 42(1/2): 63–82.

Turcescu, L. (2003) '"Person" versus "Individual", and other modern misreadings of Gregory Of Nyssa', in Coakley, S. 2003: 97–110.

Turcescu, L. (2005) Gregory of Nyssa and the Concept of Divine Persons. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Turner, D. (1995) The Darkness of God: Negativity in Christian Mysticism. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, last reprint 1999.

Van Dam, R. (2003) Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Von Balthasar, H. U. (1995) Presence and Thought – An Essay on the Religious Philosophy of Gregory of Nyssa. San Francisco, CA: Ignatius Press.

Vinzent, M. (2011) Christ's Resurrection in Early Christianity and the Making of the New Testament. Farnham, UK: Ashgate.

Ware, K. (2001) The Collected Works, volume I: The Inner Kingdom. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Ware, K. (2004) The Inner Kingdom, vol. 1. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 206.

Williams, R. (1979) The Wound of Knowledge. London: Darton, Longman & Todd.

Zachhuber, J. (2003) 'Nochmals: Der "38. Brief" des Basilius von Caesarea als Werk des Gregory von Nyssa', Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 7: 73–90.

Zachhuber, J. (2014) 'Individuality and the theological debate about 'hypostasis', in Torrance, A. and Zachhuber, J. (eds) Individuality in Late Antiquity. London: Routledge.

Zizioulas, J. (1985) Being as Communion: Studies in Personhood and the Church. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Zizioulas, J. (2006) Communion and Otherness: Further Studies in Personhood and the Church. London and New York: T&T Clark.

56

JEROME

Dennis Brown

Life and context

St. Jerome, in some quarters seen as the greatest doctor of the church, is chiefly remembered as one of the most forceful personalities and one of the most important interpreters of the Bible in the early centuries of Christianity. Jerome was born in the early 340s CE in the town of Stridon, in Dalmatia, modern day Croatia. He died in 420, renowned for his exegetical and translation activities, and for living a holy and ascetic life.

Jerome was born into a well-off Christian family. In one of his early letters (Ep. 3.5), Jerome recalls running through the slave quarters of his home and being looked after by foster-nurses and a personal attendant. In Stridon, he attended the ludus litterarius or elementary school, the normal age for which was 6 to 11 or 12 years of age. Jerome would have learned how to read and write here, as well as elementary arithmetic. He may also have picked up the rudiments of Greek. It must also have been at Stridon that Jerome began to train his astonishingly retentive memory, which was later to prove very useful in his scholarly activities.

Jerome was sent to Rome for his secondary education, to one of the most famous teachers of his age – Aelius Donatus. The curriculum would have included some mathematics, science and music, but was principally concerned with the rules of grammar, particularly the correct analysis and use of language, and classical literature. The favourite authors were Vergil the poet and founder of liberal Latin culture; Terence the comic playwright; Sallust the historian; and Cicero the stylist, orator and philosopher. Jerome obviously loved his time in Rome, for his works are full of quotations from and allusions to classical literature. At the age of about 15 or 16 Jerome would have graduated to a Roman school of rhetoric, where he would have learned the art of public speaking, with a view, perhaps, to entering a career in advocacy or the civil service. Jerome's later writings show how well he learned the art of rhetoric, for instance, its stylized procedures, its stock emotional phrases and its tendency to exaggeration (Commentary on Galatians 2.1). His education provided the foundation upon which he was to base all his later work.

Jerome and asceticism

Though education was perhaps the single most important aspect of Jerome's personality, it was not the only one. He was a fervent supporter of asceticism. After finishing his Roman education, Jerome travelled widely. He seems to have become interested in the ascetic life while in Trier, which had become an important centre for monasticism. He soon decided to withdraw to the desert at Chalcis in northern Syria, to experience first hand the spiritual life offered by a colony of hermits. His sojourn in the desert lasted only two or three years, but the desire to lead a holy and ascetic life stayed with him and became part of his life-long quest.

He moved to Aquileia in c. 375 CE, but left there in 377 and travelled widely for the next five years. At this point he returned to Rome, taking up residence in the city under the patronage of pope Damasus. He served as secretary to Damasus from 382 to 385. During this time, Jerome became widely known for his advocacy of monasticism, and he gathered a number of disciples, some of whom were noble-born women. He studied the Bible and asceticism with them, meeting in the house of Marcella on the Aventine. His association with this group of women met a deep-seated need in his personality. His correspondence with them reveals a great deal about his warm sympathies, his skill at adapting himself to their different interests, and his ability to gain a stronghold over several of them, particularly the wealthy widow Paula and her daughter Eustochium.

Following the death of Damasus in 385, Jerome's influence in Rome waned and he was forced to leave, but he was accompanied by Paula and Eustochium. The group visited many of the sacred sites in the Holy Land and Egypt. Their route was recorded by Jerome in Epistle 108 and in his Apology against Rufinus. In these travels, Jerome learned much about the topography of the sites important to Christian history and this information was to be very useful to him in his exegesis of both Testaments, particularly when he interpreted the literal sense of texts. He also wrote a trilogy of books, in part based on his travels, which informed his exegetical studies. These were the Book of the
Figure 56.1   St. Jerome Reading in the Countryside, Giovanni Bellini, 1505. National Gallery of Art, Washington. Wikicommons

Interpretations of Hebrew Names, the On Sites and Names of Hebrew Places, and the Hebrew Questions on the Book of Genesis. These were largely etymological books, whose type had a long history not only in Christianity but also in Judaism and Paganism.

Jerome and the group of women finally settled in Bethlehem after their travels. Paula provided the finance to build two monasteries, one for men under the guidance of Jerome, and one for women, over which Paula presided. Jerome formulated rules of monastic living for both communities, and remained here for the rest of his long life. He became a champion for the ideal of virginity, not just for monks but for lay Christians too. He died there in 420 and his remains rest in St. Catherine's church in Bethlehem.

Jerome as biblical interpreter and translator

The Roman empire in which Jerome lived was in a period of rapid change. The Christian emperor, Constantine the Great, had pushed through policies that favoured Christianity, and many churches were built throughout the empire. Constantine's benevolent actions, and those of his successors, had a dramatic effect on the church. Instead of persecution, the church now enjoyed many privileges and it increasingly gained an influential role in society. Christianity was becoming more and more popular and respectable, and consequently people were streaming into the church. One result of this was that the Christian population wanted to learn more about the scriptures, and scholars like Jerome had the important function of providing commentaries to explain the biblical books.

Previous biblical interpretation

Jerome inherited a long tradition of biblical interpretation, both Jewish and Christian. In Judaism, rabbinic scholars had developed a system of interpretative rules and techniques for studying biblical texts. These may be broadly classified as haggadah and halakhah. Haggadah ('information' or 'anecdote') is seen largely in collections of midrash (a kind of commentary on scripture) and often takes the form of moral exegesis. Various techniques were used to achieve this, including juxtaposing originally discrete biblical texts, creative elaboration of the biblical narrative and the use of parable. This method could create profound theological insights. Jerome used a great deal of haggadic material in his works and he was an important source through which echoes of the haggadah reached some of the western Church Fathers. Halakah ('procedure') was concerned with ensuring that the Torah could be successfully adapted to the changing conditions in Jewish life. Jerome often used this halakhic principle in his own exegesis of scripture.

One Jewish scholar who found favour with Jerome was Philo of Alexandria. He calls Philo an 'ecclesiastical' writer, on the grounds that Philo praises Christians at Alexandria and mentions that Christianity is present in other provinces (Jerome, De Viris illustribus 11). Philo had been aware of haggadic and halakhic traditions, but found that the 'impossibilities' and 'absurdities' produced by a literal reading of the texts could be unravelled by using an allegorical method based on Stoic ethics and Platonic cosmology. By searching carefully in scripture for clues like contradictions, odd expressions, word derivations and mysterious numbers, the interpreter could discover the 'real' message which God intended to convey.

This allegorical interpretation spread from Philo into Christianity and became widely used by the catechetical school at Alexandria, especially by its two foremost representatives, Clement and Origen. For Clement, most of scripture was expressed in enigmas, and it was the task of the interpreter who had received the deeper knowledge (gnosis) given by Christ to his apostles after the resurrection, to unlock the spiritual truth of biblical language to those who could understand. Following Philo, Clement allegorized the Old Testament freely. His hermeneutical principle for identifying true meaning was an eclectic mix of Hellenistic (and gnostic) cosmology, soteriology and morality, combined with the conviction that in the Logos–Christ, all foreshadowing of truth had found its goal.

Jerome learned a great deal from Origen. Much of Origen's literary output was devoted to biblical interpretation. Jerome classified this into three categories: scholia (short explanatory glosses), commentaries and homilies. Origen had wanted to show, in his De Principiis, how the world's diversity came about and how it would eventually return to a divine unity. The interpretation of scripture was fundamental to this project. Scripture was divinely inspired so they had a spiritual purpose. To give them a simplistic understanding was to insult their divine author. Origen argued that all biblical texts had a spiritual sense but not always a literal one. To gain the spiritual truth in a text, it was sometimes necessary to use allegory. This method would unlock the hidden, symbolic meaning of texts, and Origen made allegory the dominant method of biblical interpretation until the Middle Ages. Jerome was at least partly responsible for ensuring that Origen's writings and his allegorical method were transmitted throughout the western church.

Not all Christian scholars were convinced that Origen's allegorical method was correct. The exegetical 'school' of Antioch developed in reaction to the allegorizing tendencies of Alexandria. The school's early history is associated with the name of Lucian, the teacher of Arius, but the most influential Antiochenes were Diodore of Tarsus, Theodore of Mopsuestia and John Chrysostom. The Antiochenes insisted on the historical basis of the biblical text and that, wherever possible, it ought to be understood literally. Only where this could not be achieved should typology and allegory be deployed. The Antiochene emphasis on the literal or historical understanding may be seen in Lucian's emphasis on the details of the biblical text. He knew Hebrew and corrected the Septuagint by using the Hebrew text. Jerome praised his recension and used it widely in his own work on the biblical text.

Jerome and Hebrew

Before it was possible to interpret the biblical text properly, it was necessary to have the best text available. The inescapable conclusion for Jerome was that he had to learn the original biblical languages. As far as the New Testament was concerned, Jerome encountered no problems, for he had learned Greek at school, and had attended the lectures of Gregory of Nazianzus in Constantinople. But for the text of the Old Testament, Jerome was faced with a considerable hurdle for, apart from Origen, very few other Christian scholars had any knowledge of Hebrew. Jerome took lessons in Hebrew from a Jewish convert to Christianity, and it is clear that he found it a difficult language to master. It must be remembered that no grammars or concordances were available, so he had to learn the language orally, memorizing the sounds of the consonants and vocabulary. Presumably, he practised writing the Hebrew characters by copying out manuscripts. Of his Hebrew studies, Jerome says: 'What labour I spent on this task, what difficulties I went through, how often I despaired and how often I gave up and in my eagerness to learn, started again' (Epistle 125.12).

Jerome believed, along with the rest of the ancient Jewish and Christian world, that Hebrew was the world's original language. Despite its antiquity, however, Jerome found Hebrew a barbarous language, which affected his Latin style. In the preface to his Commentary on Galatians, Jerome apologizes for his unliterary style, blaming it partly on eye trouble and problems with copyists, but also on his study of Hebrew: 'I leave it to others to judge how far my unflagging study of Hebrew has profited me; what I have lost in my own language, I can tell'.

It is clear that Jerome had a much more extensive and profound knowledge of Hebrew than did any other Christian scholar, including Origen. Jerome had the same quantitative use of Hebrew as did Origen, but he added to it a qualitative use of Hebrew as a guide to the right meanings (Barr 1966: 282). This qualitative use of Hebrew manifests itself in various ways. The very fact, for instance, that Jerome undertook the task of translating the Old Testament from Hebrew points towards his possessing a high degree of ability in Hebrew. Even bearing in mind that he had the previous Greek translations of Theodotion, Symmachus and especially of Aquila, which must have been of considerable value to him, Jerome's own translation from the Hebrew was a quite remarkable achievement, especially when it is seen to be a generally accurate and faithful one. A second way of showing Jerome's extensive understanding of Hebrew is to look at his vocalizations of Hebrew. The Hebrew text with which Jerome worked would have been unpointed (that is, without vowels). This means that distinctions in meaning could be brought about by different vocalizations of the same consonants. The following example comes from Jerome's Commentary on Jeremiah:

> The Hebrew word, which is written with the three letters 'd–b–r' (it has no vowels in it) according to the natural progression of the passage and the judgement of the reader, if 'dabar' is read it means 'word'; if 'deber', it means 'death'; and if 'dabber', it means 'speak'.
>
> (9.22)

In an unvocalized text, all three words (dabar, deber and dabber) would have been identical in Hebrew. It would only have been possible to discern the correct grammatical construction (the first two are nouns. the third a verb) and the meaning of the word by studying its position in the sentence. In this example, Jerome is combating the incorrect translations of this word that had appeared in the Greek versions, which implied different vocalizations. The Septuagint omitted the word: Origen's Hexapala had interpreted it as 'death'; Aquila had understood it as 'speak', as had Symmachus. It has been suggested that Jerome may have been influenced here by the Jewish al-tikre interpretation (Barr 1966: 282). This means 'do not read {the word in the text} but {another similar one}'. It was a midrashic technique used to introduce alternative readings to a text for purely homiletical purposes. It was understood as a legitimate extension of the literal exegesis of a passage. It seems unlikely in this case, as, if Jerome had been using this technique, he would have used the different possibilities of vocalization in his own interpretation. It is more likely that Jerome is merely revelling in his good knowledge of Hebrew and showing off to his Christian readers by exhibiting his mastery of the language. It was this extensive knowledge of Hebrew that helped Jerome so much in his major task of translating the Bible from its original languages.

Textual criticism

As an essential part of producing an accurate translation of the Bible, Jerome had to be assured that he was working with the best possible text. Jerome, more than any other Church Father of the first five centuries, was very well versed in principles and techniques of textual criticism (Hulley 1944). It is largely due to his labours in this area that scholars today can ascertain accurately the state of the text of the Old Testament, Septuagint, Hexapla and New Testament in the fourth century.

Jerome acquired an interest in manuscripts and books early in his adult life. Before the end of his formal education, he had made copies of classical authors, and soon after he left Rome, he laboriously copied out Hilary of Poitier's commentaries on the Psalms and the De Synodis. During his travels, Jerome collected many manuscripts of biblical and other material. One of the most advantageous from this point of view was his visit to the famous library at Caesarea, which had been assembled by the priest and martyr Pamphilus, friend of Eusebius of Caesarea. Jerome relates that Pamphilus was so impassioned with sacred literature that he himself transcribed the greater part of the works of Origen, and these are still preserved today in the library at Caesarea (De viris illustribus 3).

Jerome became very attached to the manuscripts he had collected and took them with him when he moved from place to place. In a letter to Paul of Concordia Jerome suggested that they could make a mutually beneficial arrangement, whereby Jerome would send Paul a copy of his newly composed treatise, the Life of Paul the Hermit, if, in return, Paul who owned a substantial library him-self would provide Jerome with copies of several books, including the commentaries of Fortunatian, the History of Aurelius Victor and the letters of Novatian, so that Jerome might increase his personal collection. Unfortunately, we do not know whether the deal was closed and the books exchanged (see Ep. 22.30 and Ep. 10.3).

Textual criticism is fundamentally concerned with variant readings in texts. Jerome realized this and asked where these variant readings came from and why they arose. As far as Jerome was concerned, the text critic's task was to remove any errors in the text and to establish a trustworthy one. Careless or incompetent copyists produced many errors – either accidentally or intentionally. Jerome observed that some copyists did not pay attention to their work and even went to sleep over it, or they carelessly changed the reading, writing not what was in front of them, but what they understood. So, at Commentary on Matthew 13:35, Jerome noted that the copyist wrote 'Isaiah' instead of 'Asaph', because the former name was more familiar to him and he believed the previous copyist to have been mistaken. In addition to general comments about the causes of errors in texts, Jerome frequently mentioned detailed causes of corruption. Punctuation, for example, was very important for understanding a passage correctly, and faulty punctuation may be a cause of error. The confusion of number symbols was another cause of error. Jerome made the interesting suggestion that the reason why the evangelist Mark seems to disagree with Matthew and John about the exact time of Jesus' crucifixion was due to a copyist's error. Jerome says that the copyist confused the number symbols 'S' and 'Y' and therefore produced an error in the text (Tractatus in Psalms 77). Jerome also mentions that copyists could easily confuse similar letters.

Most of his references to this relate to the confusion of Hebrew letters by the translators of the Septuagint, especially the letters resh and daleth, distinguished only by a small stroke, and the letters yad and vau, which differ, he says, only in size. Also noticed by Jerome are occasional examples of dittography and haplography, metathesis of letters, assimilation, omission of words and transposition (Brown 1993: 36–7).

One of the areas Jerome would have to approach in writing a commentary on a biblical book was that of authorship, and the authenticity or otherwise of sections of particular books. Although he does not use the terms, Jerome utilizes two criteria for deciding on these issues: internal and external evidence. With regard to external evidence, one method of ensuring the authenticity of a writing is the subscriptio. The apostle Paul, Jerome reported, had used his signature along with a few words, to take away from false teachers any opportunity of tampering with his own doctrines (Commentary on Galatians 6:11). The subscription, however, was not a very good criterion by which to judge a book's authenticity. The signature could be forged or imitated. Another criterion was the anulus signatarius, or 'seal' which one put on letters or other works.

Jerome attaches great value to the internal evidence in a work when it comes to verifying its authenticity. First, one must determine whether the contents are consistent with those of its supposed author. For instance, with a book by the Pythagorean author and philosopher, Sixtus, whom Jerome's erstwhile friend Rufinus equates with the Christian martyr, Sixtus, Jerome applies this criterion and establishes that in the entire volume there is no mention of Christ or the apostles. How, then, could it have been written by a Christian martyr (see the preface to his Commentary on Philemon)?

When Jerome discusses the suspicions concerning the authorship of the Letter to Philemon, he again uses the criterion of internal evidence. Certain contemporary critics held that it was not Pauline because of its brevity, its seemingly inferior subject matter, and its mundane tone. Jerome, however, argues strongly that if this letter is rejected because of its brevity, then others must also be rejected – for instance Obadiah, Nahum and Zephaniah. He also states that brevity in a document which has in it so much of the beauty of the gospel, is a sign of its inspiration. Further, many of the other (undisputed) epistles mention mundane, worldly matters, like the cloak left at Troas (2 Tim. 4:13). To suppose that common life is distinct and separate from God is to approach the heresy of Manichaeanism, Jerome warns. Should these powerful arguments based on internal evidence not be enough to convince some people, Jerome also uses one piece of external evidence – he says that Marcion, who altered many of the epistles of Paul, did not touch the letter to Philemon, believing it to be genuinely by Paul. If even Marcion believed it to be authentic, Jerome says, then no orthodox Christian should have any reason to doubt it (Preface to the Commentary on Philemon).

Jerome never discusses his principles of textual criticism systematically, and this is really because he saw the text critic's task to be a practical one of establishing the correct text. Without the correct text, it was impossible to have any real understanding of its meaning, and this was of paramount importance for Jerome. For his understanding of scripture, this meant that textual criticism preceded the task of translating the biblical texts, and it was only when both of these had been accomplished that true understanding would be achieved.

The Vulgate translation

Jerome was, as he himself says, a vir trilinguis, knowing Hebrew, Greek and Latin. One of the greatest achievements for which Jerome is remembered is the translation of the Bible known as the 'Vulgate'. This term comes from the Latin 'vulgata' meaning common. It is used of the Latin version of the Bible followed by the Roman Catholic church, often attributed to Jerome. He used the term himself to refer to his own translation of the Bible, because he wanted to make the scriptural texts available to everyone, not just to scholars who could understand Greek and Hebrew (Sutcliffe 1948: 250). Jerome, more than any other person, was responsible for fixing the literary form of the Bible of the entire western church. The complicated history of the Vulgate translation and Jerome's involvement in it began in 383, when pope Damasus came to the conclusion that because of the proliferation of variant readings in the Latin Bible of the day, a thorough revision was needed. For this task, he commissioned Jerome. Although we do not have the actual words of his commission, we get a very clear idea of his wishes from Jerome's Preface to the Four Gospels. He says:

> You urge me to compose a new work from the old, and, as it were, to sit in judgement on the copies of the scriptures which are now scattered throughout the world; and, insofar as they differ from one another, you would have me decide which of them agree with the Greek original. The labour is one of love but at the same time dangerous and presumptuous; for in judging others I must in turn be judged by all; and how can I change the language of the world at this late stage, and carry it back to its early childhood? Is there a man learned or otherwise, who, when he takes the volume in his hands and sees that what he reads does not suit his settled tastes, will not break out immediately into violent language and call me a forger and a profane person for having had the audacity to add anything to the ancient books, or to make any changes or corrections to them?

Jerome, however, was prepared to risk castigation in this way for two reasons. First, he explains, is the pope's command. Second, was the great diversity of Old Latin manuscripts. He exclaims that there were 'almost as many forms of texts as there are manuscripts'. Jerome's younger contemporary, Augustine, confirms this when he laments:

> Those who translated the scriptures from Hebrew into Greek may be counted, but the Latin translators are without number. For in early days of the faith, every man who happened to get hold of a Greek manuscript (of the New Testament) and who imagined he had any facility in both languages, however slight that might have been, dared to make a translation.
>
> (De doctrina Christiana 2.16)

Jerome's and Augustine's statements were not mere hyperbole, but based on sound factual information. The Old Latin version was begun in the second century, simultaneously in Africa and western Europe. By the fourth century, it existed in a bewildering number of forms, showing a huge number of variant readings. This was partly because different scholars had undertaken the task of translation at different times in different areas, and partly because of errors in translation and careless transcription.

The Latin of these early versions was very odd, as the language was adapted to Christian usage, with special vocabulary created for the new translation (Brown 1993: 98–9). The idiom of this form of Latin often recalled the Greek on which the Christian vocabulary was based, and, because it was written for uneducated people, it had a strong colloquial feel (Metzger 1977: 285–330).

Jerome's statement concerning the many text-types of the Old Latin version would also seem to be substantiated, for the modern scholarly consensus distinguishes four main text-types among Old Latin manuscripts: African, European, Italian and Spanish.

Faced with a bewildering array of variant readings and different text-types, Jerome prepared to carry out Pope Damasus' wish to revise the Latin Bible and create (or re-create) a uniform text. Naturally enough, he began his revision with the four Gospels. Pope Damasus did not commission Jerome to make a fresh translation of the Bible, but Jerome found himself checking the accuracy of the Latin text by referring constantly to the Greek original. He was conscious, however, of his commission to revise the existing Old Latin version, and changed this text only when it was necessary. He finished his revision of the Gospels and presented it to the pope in 384, shortly before the latter's death.

That Jerome revised the four Gospels is certain. Less certain, however, is how much of the remainder of the Old Latin New Testament he revised. In On Famous Men and elsewhere, he claims to have restored the New Testament to its Greek original. Scholars have expressed opposing views on Jerome's statement. Some, notably Dom J. Chapman (1923), believed that Jerome did, in fact, revise the whole of the New Testament. Chapman argued that Jerome's quotations from Paul in Epistle 27 showed his intention of publishing a revision of the Pauline epistles soon and that the lack of prefaces to the New Testament other than the Gospels could be explained easily: because the pope for whom Jerome was making the revision died soon after the Gospels had been revised, Jerome did not wish to write prefaces to anyone else. Chapman also attempted to explain why Jerome's quotations from the Pauline epistles often differ from those in the Vulgate: he often quotes readings with which he disagrees and he may have thought a certain reading to be a fairly good one, his own suggestion being meant only to explain the real force of the Greek, not to serve as a tolerable Latin rendering. Jerome is often inconsistent anyway, and the differences between the Vulgate readings and those found in Jerome's works do not necessarily prove that he was not the author of the Vulgate of the Pauline epistles. Chapman cites examples from the Gospels that vary from the Vulgate. Those who argue that Jerome did not revise the text of the Pauline epistles because his quotations differ from the Vulgate, must also conclude that he did not revise the text of the Gospels, which is absurd. Stylistically, he says, the Vulgate New Testament is the work of a single author and that author must be Jerome. Furthermore, Jerome is always accurate when enumerating his own works, so when he says he had revised the whole New Testament, he must have done. Chapman dates the revision of the complete New Testament to 391.

Other scholars have seriously questioned this traditional belief that Jerome revised the text of the complete New Testament. F. Cavallera made a detailed study of the Vulgate of Acts, the Pauline epistles and Revelation and noted especially the discrepancies between the Vulgate and quotations in Jerome's work (1922). Sometimes Jerome employs a text that coincides more or less with the Vulgate, but more often he quotes one that differs. Sometimes he rejects readings which are found in the Vulgate. It is very important in this context that in his commentaries on Galatians, Ephesians, Philemon and Titus written c. 387, shortly after his supposed revision of these letters, he never attributes the Latin text he uses to himself, but, on the contrary, often uses the phrase 'Latinus interpres' of the translator. He sometimes disagrees with their readings. More recently J. N. D. Kelly stated his opinion that the style of the Vulgate of Acts is against Jerome's authorship. Kelly also asserted categorically that 'the only tenable conclusion is that Jerome, for whatever reason, abandoned the idea of revising the rest of the New Testament (if indeed he ever entertained it at all) once he had completed the Gospels' (1975: 88).

Before he left Rome in 385, after having revised the text of the Gospels, Jerome revised the Latin text of the Psalter according to the Septuagint. He says he revised this book very quickly, but made substantial changes. This revision used to be identified as the 'Roman Psalter', but recent work has indicated that while the Roman Psalter is not the version that Jerome made at Rome in 384, it may well represent the text on which he worked and which he corrected. A few years later (c. 387–8), Jerome made another translation of the Psalms, this time using Origen's Hexaplaric Septuagint text as his basis. This version is known as the 'Gallican Psalter', as it was first accepted for use in the churches of Gaul. It also remained in greater use than his later translation of the Psalms from Hebrew, and so became included in the official Vulgate edition of the Bible, ratified by the Council of Trent. In this 'Gallican Psalter', Jerome included Origen's diacritical signs, which were intended to show where the Septuagint text differed from the Hebrew original. In the same period, Jerome also translated the books of Job, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs. The Psalter, Job (in two manuscripts) and (in only one manuscript) Song of Songs, are all that remain of this translation of parts of the Old Testament from Origen's critical Hexaplaric Septuagint text. The other books are not now extant. In 416, when Augustine asked to consult Jerome's revised Septuagint, the latter had to inform the African bishop that due to someone's deceit, he no longer had a copy of the other books.

By 390, Jerome had become convinced of the necessity to make a fresh translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew text, and, encouraged by friends and the desire to demolish the arguments of the Jews, he began to translate each of the books of the Hebrew canon, a task which was not completed until 406. It is probable that Jerome began this new translation with the books of Samuel and Kings. After explaining that the Hebrew canon has three divisions, Law, Prophets and 'Hagiographa', Jerome goes on to say:

> This preface to the scriptures may serve as a 'helmeted' introduction to all the books which I translate from Hebrew into Latin . . . Read first, then, my Samuel and Kings; mine, I say, mine. For whatever by careful translation and cautious correction I have learnt and comprehended, is my very own. And when you understand anything of which you were ignorant before, either (if you are grateful) consider me a translator, or (if ungrateful) a paraphraser, although I am not at all conscious of having deviated from the Hebrew original.
>
> *(Preface to Samuel and Kings)*

It sounds as if Jerome is writing this preface as a general introduction to his whole translation of the Old Testament, discussing the contents and limits of the Old Testament canon. He refers to the preface as 'helmeted' (galeatus) because he arms himself in advance to defend himself from the critics he knows will rise up against him.

Soon after he had finished the translation of Samuel and Kings, Jerome started on Job, the Psalter and the Prophets. His friend Sophronius made an 'elegant Greek translation' of Jerome's renderings of Job and the Psalter, and in Epistle 49, composed in 393–4, Jerome informs Pammachius that he has translated the 16 prophets (thus including Daniel) and Job, of which he will be able to borrow a copy from his cousin Marcella. Of this book, Jerome says: 'Read it both in Greek and Latin, and compare the old version with my rendering. You will then see clearly that the difference between them is that between truth and falsehood'. He also tells Pammachius that he has translated Samuel and Kings. The omission of Psalms must have been an oversight on Jerome's part. Ezra, Nahum and Chronicles were translated in 394–5.

It was not until late 404 and early 405 that Jerome translated any more of the Hebrew Old Testament. He gives no reason for the long delay in completing the project, but it is very probably due to his involvement in the Origenist controversy from 393 to 402–3, and also to the fact that he wrote several commentaries in this period. He first translated the Pentateuch, having been asked to by his friend Desiderius. His preface makes it clear that he thinks there is still a good deal to be done before his translation of the Old Testament would be complete.

Next, he translated Joshua, Judges and Ruth, in early 405. In the preface, he expresses his relief at having finished the Pentateuch, 'I feel like a man released from a crippling load of debt'. The rest of the Old Testament books were completed by early 406, thus bringing to an end a labour of some 14 years.

Implications for the canon

One of the major results of Jerome's translations of biblical books was the resolution (to his own satisfaction) of the question of the canon of scripture. In Jerome's early works, he often quotes from the 'apocryphal' books; that is, books which were included in the Septuagint version. The Greek Septuagint had been the accepted Christian version of the Old Testament since the second century, and it had taken on the mantle of divine inspiration. Several different versions of the Greek Old Testament existed in Jerome's day, and this diversity was one of the main reasons that he undertook the long task of translating the biblical books from the original languages. His most balanced state-ment on the relation between his translation from Hebrew and the older versions is seen in the Preface to Samuel and the Kings:

> I beg you, brother, not to think that my work is in any way meant to debase the old translators. Each one offers what he can to the service of the tabernacle of God; some gold and silver and precious stones, others linen and blue and purple and scarlet; we shall do well if we offer skins and goats' hair.

There are several lists of canonical books in Jerome's writings. One such is found in Epistle 53.8, where Jerome includes all the books in the Hebrew bible, but the order in which they are recorded is influenced by the Septuagint canon in two ways. First, the Minor Prophets are placed before the other prophetic books, and second, Daniel is placed at the end of the Prophets, ostensibly as one of them. This is a good example of the ambivalent attitude Jerome showed towards the canon. The serious scholar is influenced by the Hebrew canon, while the churchman cannot stray too far from the revered tradition of the Septuagint canon (Brown 1993: 62–71).

As regards the New Testament canon, Jerome's views are relatively straightforward. He affirms the books that are now in the New Testament canon, with the possible exception of 2 and 3 John, concerning which he expresses some doubt about whether they were composed by John the Apostle or John the Presbyter. However, he includes both in the canon (De viris illustribus 9). He did much to stabilize the opinion of the western church concerning the position of the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Book of Revelation. He recognized that various sections of the church rejected these books because of doubt concerning their apostolic authorship, but says:

> The epistle called 'to the Hebrews' is received not only by the church in the east, but also all church writers of the Greek language before our own time, as being written by Paul the Apostle, though many think that it is by Barnabas or Clement. And it makes no differ-ence whose it is, since it is from a churchman, and is celebrated in the daily readings of the churches. And if the usage of the Latins does not receive it among the canonical scriptures, neither do the Greek churches receive the Revelations of John. And yet we receive both, because we do not follow today's habit, but the authority of ancient writers, who for the most part quote each of them . . . as canonical and churchly.

Other translation work

Jerome did not restrict his translation activities solely to scripture. He is also responsible for translating into Latin a considerable number of Greek theological works (Brown 1993: 91–6; Kelly 1975: 73–7).

The first of these translations was made in 380, when he rendered Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicle into Latin. Having spent several years studying the works of Greek theologians, Jerome was apparently anxious that the Latin-speaking world should have the opportunity of benefiting from their scholarship. Interestingly enough, Jerome was not content with this particular work simply to translate it; he omitted sections he thought unnecessary and added a new section, bringing the Chronicle up to date and thereby providing the western world with a history of the world from Abraham to 379.

Jerome then turned to translating into Latin the works of Origen, from whose exegetical writings he had learned so much. Jerome was interested in translating most, if not all, of Origen's works, but was prevented from doing so by a painful eye irritation caused by constant reading, and by a lack of money to employ copyists. Jerome did succeed, however, in translating quite a number of Origen's homilies. He also translated a work of Didymus the Blind, On the Holy Spirit, from Greek to Latin. This work, along with some of Origen's homilies, is now lost in Greek, and Jerome's translation is the only way we can know these important works today.

Biblical commentaries

By far the major part of Jerome's literary output is in commentary form. He states that the purpose of a commentary is 'to discuss what is obscure, to touch on the obvious, to dwell at length on what is doubtful' (Commentary on Galatians 4.6). Scripture, for Jerome, was full of obscurities and a reliable guide was needed. A commentary ought to 'repeat the opinions of the many . . . so that the judicious reader, when he has perused the different explanations . . . May judge which is the best and, like a good banker, reject the money from a spurious mint' (Apology against Rufinus 1.16).

In most of his commentaries, Jerome acknowledges the previous authors from whom he borrowed, and they are valuable because they transmit a great wealth of comments from other scholars, some of which would otherwise have been lost. Jerome wrote commentaries on almost all the books of the Old Testament, and on some of the New Testament. One of Jerome's earliest works was the Hebrew Questions on Genesis, which was more a grammatical and etymological study of some passages in Genesis. He paid special attention to the (supposed) meaning and etymology of the Hebrew words, and intended it to be the first of a series of such volumes. He dropped the project, however, when he began his translation of the Hebrew text of the Old Testament. The work dates from about 390 (Hayward 1995: 23–7). A little earlier, in 386–7, Jerome wrote his Commentary on Ecclesiastes, dedicated to the young widow Blesilla, whom Jerome had taught in Rome. He used Origen as his main source, but the short work shows some traces of originality. It is based on the Hebrew text.

During the period 391 and 406, Jerome wrote commentaries on all the Minor Prophets. Most notable among these is the Commentary on Jonah. It is interesting because it follows earlier Christian exegesis of this story in seeing in Jonah a prefigurement of Christ and his resurrection. He translated it first from Hebrew and then from the Greek text, and gave a double exegesis, first literal then spiritual. Jerome treated the story as genuinely historical and argued strongly that Jonah really did spend three days in the belly of the whale. On the spiritual level, he argued for Jonah as a 'type' of Christ, and interpreted many of the details of the story in this light. Thus Jonah's flight from the Lord's face points to the Son's descent from the heavenly realm, and his preaching to Nineveh points to Christ's post-resurrection command to preach to the nations (Duval 1977).

The Commentary on Daniel, composed in 407, is a study of selected passages from Daniel, based on Jerome's own translation from the Hebrew. This is one of Jerome's most interesting commentaries, for he spends most of the book criticizing the anti-Christian polemic of the third-century Neo-platonist philosopher, Porphyry. The latter had argued (correctly) that Daniel was not a prophecy dating from the sixth century BCE, but rather a tract for the times, written to encourage Jews who were suffering persecution at the hands of Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 167–164 BCE. Jerome, on the other hand, rejected this interpretation and argued that the revelation of Christ was to be found throughout the book. So, for instance, he suggests that 'the stone . . . cut from the mountain by no human hand' (Dan 2:45), was none other than the Saviour who was conceived without human intercourse.

Jerome's most extensive commentary was on Isaiah, finished in 410, and consisting of 18 books, each with its own preface. Jerome laboured under the false impression that Isaiah was the work of one man, but followed his normal practice of alternating literal and spiritual exegesis, although he reproduced the Greek version only where it differed significantly from the Hebrew, in order to avoid excessive length (Jay 1985).

Jerome's final commentary on the Old Testament was his unfinished work on Jeremiah. This was begun in 414 or 415, and was interrupted by Jerome's involvement in the Pelagian controversy. The commentary covers only 32 of Jeremiah's 52 chapters, but contains several interesting features. There is an increasing emphasis on the Hebrew text, and he argues that the Septuagint text was unreliable as it had been corrupted by copyists (Commentary on Jeremiah 17:1–4). Also interesting is the fact that Jerome criticizes his former hero, Origen, very severely. This is probably because of the Pelagians (who considered themselves to be disciples of Origen), against whose beliefs Jerome wrote a treatise (Dialogue against the Pelagians). A third point of interest in this commentary is that Jerome concentrates on the straightforward literal interpretation of the text, rather than on allegorical exegesis. This may be partly because of the nature of Jeremiah's text and partly because Jerome was writing for his friend Eusebius of Cremona, who preferred the literal sense (Kelly 1975: 316).

Figure 56.2   St. Jerome in His Study, Domenico Ghirlandaio, 1480, Church of Ognissanti, Florence. Wikicommons

Jerome the controversialist

Jerome was involved in several theological controversies. Some of these were relatively good–natured. His younger contemporary, Augustine, initiated a correspondence between the two. Augustine criticized Jerome for taking the position (in Commentary on Galatians 2:11) that when Paul chastised Peter at Antioch over eating food with Gentile converts, there was really no difference of opinion between the two apostles. Augustine argued that Jerome's interpretation of this passage shows Paul's rebuke of Peter to have been deliberately simulated. According to Augustine, this meant that a passage of scripture contained a falsehood, and this meant that the truth of the whole Bible was put in jeopardy. The vagaries of the postal system meant that Jerome did not receive Augustine's criticisms until years later (see Kelly 1975: 265–7). When he did finally reply, Jerome essentially ignored Augustine's criticism, but made a veiled warning that if the younger man persisted in criticizing his exegesis, he could expect much harsher treatment in the future.

Jerome's other 'controversial' writings were more bitter. These polemical works do not reveal Jerome as a deeply speculative or innovative thinker, but rather as a vigorous and vitriolic defender of the Faith and of his own reputation. The most important theologically was his involvement in the 'Origenist' controversy. Jerome had been an admirer of Origen, but, when the dispute between Epiphanius, the fanatical bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, and Bishop John of Jerusalem broke, Jerome sided with the former, while Jerome's old friend Rufinus took the side of the latter. Jerome was more concerned about justifying his own reputation as an orthodox thinker rather than with the question of Origen's orthodoxy. Jerome wrote:

> I revered him [Origen] as an exegete, not as theologian – for his genius not his faith, as a philosopher rather than an apostle; believe me I have never been an Origenist.

Early in 397, Jerome wrote a ferocious attack on Bishop John of Jerusalem (Against John of Jerusalem) in which he demolished John's arguments in favour of Origen, and heaped numerous insults on John personally. Jerome found the bishop's beliefs dangerously ambiguous, avoiding the real issues in the dispute, and riddled with heresy. On the crucial issue of the state of the body of Christ and of Christians after the resurrection, Jerome was at pains to show, in an extended analytical passage, that John's teaching was hopelessly inadequate; he had always spoken of the resurrection of the body, never of the resurrection of the flesh (Against John of Jerusalem 23–6). Jerome ridiculed John on a personal level, labelling him as grovelling, arrogant and insufferably proud.

Jerome and John of Jerusalem were finally reconciled later in 397 in the Church of the Resurrection in Jerusalem. He was never to be reconciled with his erstwhile friend, Rufinus, however. In 398, Rufinus translated Origen's *On First Principl*es, and composed The Falsification of the Works of Origen, in which he propounded the thesis that Origen's writings had been interpolated wholesale by heretics, and that this accounted for all the unorthodox passages. Jerome was incensed both by the translation then by Rufinus' support for Origen. He immediately produced his own literal translation of On First Principles and wrote a scathing letter (Epistle 84) in which he set out his own attitude to Origen, playing down his early enthusiasm and appealing to some of his own commentaries to justify his acceptance of some of Origen's judgements and interpretations, but not his doctrines. Rufinus argued that if Jerome was denouncing Origen, he was really denouncing himself.

Jerome's reply came immediately and was full of indignant rage. This two–part invective first justified Jerome's own actions, and then launched into a violent castigation of Rufinus. In the following year, Jerome added a third part to this tirade against Rufinus. This has been described as 'quite extreme in its violence' (Murphy 1952: 153) It added little to what he had already written in the Apology against Rufinus, reinforcing the charges of heresy, falsehood and provocative translations. It is a bitter, malicious and spiteful attack on Rufinus' person. Rufinus do not reply to this work, but Jerome continue to direct abuses at him even after Rufinus' death. What Jerome's part in the Origenist controversy shows is the depths to which he was prepared to sink in order to uphold what he believed to be orthodox Christian beliefs as well as his own reputation as a biblical scholar and orthodox believer.

Jerome the person and his legacy

Jerome was prodigiously hard-working, often studying or writing into the early hours, labouring, even when ill, to finish letters or larger works. He composed the Commentary on Matthew in just two weeks, for instance, so that his friend Eusebius of Cremona would have something to read on an imminent sea voyage. He had to work at astonishing speed to get this finished on time, and it should be no surprise that he made historical errors, and that some parts of the gospel are given very cursory treatment. In many ways, Jerome was not a perfectionist; he did not work and re-work material until it was perfect. Rather, he responded to the immediate needs of his friends, who often asked for advice or help of one sort or another.

Jerome could be, as with Eusebius of Cremona, extremely generous, both with his time and talents. He could also be extremely vicious in his attacks on former friends or teachers. Rufinus, as we have seen, had been a very close friend in Jerome's youth, but Jerome turned against him viciously after the Origenist controversy. Jerome's malicious temperament is also seen during the Origenist controversy in the open hostility he shows towards Origen, the man he formally called 'the greatest teacher of the church after the apostles' (Preface to the Book of the Interpretations of Hebrew Names). Jerome summarizes the heretical views put forward in On First Principles, but often distorts Origen's opinions. He unjustly accuses Origen of having denied the Incarnation, misrepresents Origen's views on the salvation of the Devil, the transmigration of souls and the resurrection (Epistle 124.2, 4, 8, 11).

As a scholar, Jerome was essentially eclectic. He searched diligently in the works of others and drew the best points from each, while avoiding their errors. This holds true also of the different 'schools' of interpretation accessible to Jerome – Alexandrian, Antiochene and Jewish.

From the Antiochene school, Jerome learned that an interpreter of the Bible must first study and explain the literal, plain sense and only after this has been accomplished should he venture beyond this to the deeper, spiritual interpretation. From the Alexandrian school, especially from Origen, Jerome borrowed many specific allegorical interpretations. Jerome cites Alexandrian authors much more frequently than he does Antiochenes, but the reason for this is not necessarily that he was more in tune with the former, but rather that the works of Alexandrian exegetes were more readily available to him, and also that the Antiochene school was still in its youth when Jerome was writing and had produced a relatively small collection of commentaries from which he could borrow. From Jewish exegesis, Jerome learned the primary importance of the original text of the Old Testament, so that he was unique among the early Church Fathers in his use of the Hebrew text as the basis of his exegesis of the Old Testament.

Even during his lifetime, Jerome was held by many to be a great authority on the interpretation of the Bible. Jerome's contemporary Sulpicius Severus wrote in 405:

> I would be surprised if he (Jerome) were not already known to you through his writings since he is read throughout the world.
>
> (Dialogues 1.8)

In the centuries following Jerome's death, he was universally acknowledged as the prince of Christian biblical scholars, and his works became a fertile ground for the labours of subsequent exegetes. The reasons for this fame were twofold. First, Jerome's translation of the Bible became accepted everywhere as the standard biblical text in the western church; second, Jerome's immense and intimate knowledge and understanding of the Bible surpassed that of any other Christian scholar for centuries.

Although Jerome wrote commentaries on several of the Pauline letters and on Matthew's gospel, it is for his Old Testament commentaries that he is chiefly remembered. He is the only ancient author who commented on all the books of the Major and Minor Prophets. Jerome saw it as his special task to explain these Old Testament books, because they were more difficult to understand than the books of the New Testament. Jerome's enormous erudition is exhibited on every page of his writings. He quotes frequently from classical authors, as well as from the Bible and other Christian writers. In addition, Jerome, with his highly developed powers of observation, makes many suggestive and original contributions to the understanding of the biblical text.

The writings of Jerome are of lasting value to Christians today because they offer a splendid example of the state of biblical interpretation in the west in the fourth century, because they give us an interesting insight into relations between Christians and Jews in the generations after Christianity became the religion of the state, and also because they paint for us, in vivid colours, a picture of the 'irascible monk' who devoted his life to a study of the sacred scriptures – in his own words:

> What other life can there be without the knowledge of the scriptures, for through these Christ himself, who is the life of the faithful, becomes known.

(Epistle 30.7)

Bibliography

Barr, J. (1966) 'St. Jerome's appreciation of Hebrew', Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 49: 280–302.

Braverman, J. (1978) Jerome's Commentary on Daniel. A Study of Comparative Jewish and Christian Interpretations of the Hebrew Bible. Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series, 7. Washington, DC: Catholic University Press.

Brown, D. (1993) Vir Trilinguis: A Study in the Biblical Exegesis of Saint Jerome. Kampen, The Netherlands: Kok Pharos.

Cain, A. (2009) The Letters of Jerome. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Cavallera, F. (1922) Saint Jeróme. Sa Vie et son oeuvre, 2 vols. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Chapman, J. (1923) 'St. Jerome and the Vulgate New Testament', Journal of Theological Studies 24: 33–51, 113–25.

Duval, Y.-M. (1977) Le livre de Jonas dans la littérature chretienne grecque et latine: Sources et influence du commentaire sur Jonas de Saint Jérôme, 2 vols. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Grützmacher, G. (1901–1908) Hieronymus: Eine biographische Studie zur alten Kirchengeschichte, 3 vols. Leipzig, Germany: Scientia Verlag Aalen.

Hagendahl, H. (1974) 'Jerome and the Latin classics', Vigiliae Christianae 28: 216–27.

Hayward, C. T. D. (1995) Jerome's Hebrew Questions in Genesis. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Hulley, K. (1944) 'Principles of textual criticism known to St. Jerome', Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 55: 87–109.

Jay, P. (1985) L'Exégèse de Saint Jérôme d'après son Commentaire sur Isaie. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Kelly, J. N. D. (1975) Jerome. His Life, Writings and Controversies. London: Duckworth.

Metzger, B. (1977) The Early Versions of the New Testament. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Murphy, F. X. (ed.) (1952) A Monument to Saint Jerome. New York: Sheed & Ward.

Penna, A. (1950) Principi e carattere dell'esegesi di S. Gerolamo. Rome: Gregorian University.

Rebenich, S. (2002) Jerome. London: Routledge.

Rousseau, P. (1978) Ascetics, Authority and the Church in the Age of Jerome and Cassian. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Scourfield, J. H. D. (1993) Consoling Heliodorus. A Commentary on Jerome, Letter 60. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Sutcliffe, E. (1948) 'The name "Vulgate"', Biblica 29: 245–52.

Williams, M. H. (2006) The Monk and the Book: Jerome and the Making of Christian Scholarship. Chicago, IL: Chicago University Press.

57

AMBROSE

Ivor J. Davidson

Books profiling the leading figures of the early church tend to commit one of three crimes against Ambrose, bishop of Milan from 374 to 397. Very often they trivialize him, reducing his significance to that of supporting actor to the real protagonist of the later West, Augustine, whose creative genius and theological influence more or less totally eclipse the gifts of the one under whose spell he took his decisive steps towards Christianity in the first place. At best, Ambrose merits a bland paragraph or two outlining his impact upon Augustine, with a few predictable phrases explaining that he was in any case first and foremost a 'man of action', which (however true) is apparently intended to suggest that his intellectual abilities were slight. In other surveys, conversely, Ambrose is idolized, depicted as the stained-glass saint, other-worldly to the core, staunch champion of truth against error and sponsor of the rights of the church against every hubristic claim from secular authority. Icon of holiness and fearless defender of the faith, he appears to have scarcely a shortcoming at all. Third, worst of all, and remarkably often, Ambrose has been ignored altogether. The assumption apparently is that, doctor of the church or no, he holds little interest for those concerned to trace the big picture of Christianity's development. In far too many undergraduate church history syllabuses, and in the textbooks which they spawn, Ambrose scarcely merits a mention.

Each of these treatments is, wittingly or unwittingly, an injustice to an individual whose role in the formation of Christianity in the West was in fact both remarkable and complex. Ambrose deserves far better. Thankfully, there are signs that he is starting to receive it. Recent years have witnessed the publication of a number of sophisticated studies which seek to explore the man in his own context and to assess his achievements in the light of the advances that have occurred in our understanding of his social and political world (McLynn 1994; Williams 1995; Ramsey 1997; Savon 1997; Moorhead 1999; Liebeschuetz 2011: pt. II). It is increasingly acknowledged that (a) Ambrose does merit a serious place in the history books, and (b) he can only be accessed by reading between the narrow lines of a hagiography which has deftly but dangerously abstracted him from the realities of his time. We now know that his successes were far harder won than a good deal of earlier scholarship (e.g. De Labriolle 1928; Von Campenhausen 1929; Palanque 1933; Homes Dudden 1935; Paredi 1964a) could or would perceive; that Ambrose struggled against considerable opposition for much of his episcopal career, and often survived not just by dint of an unbending spiritual fidelity but also because of his ability to improvise in tight corners. Sanctity of character and steadfastness of doctrine are undoubtedly relevant categories in any summary of Ambrose's qualities; the shrewdness of the political operator, the theatricality of the skilled public orator, and the evocative powers of the image-maker were also among his gifts.
Figure 57.1 Late antique mosaic of St. Ambrose in the church St. Ambrogio in Milan, possibly an actual portrait, made while Ambrose was living. Photo Wikimedia Commons

In the attempt to escape both patronizing dismissal and uncritical veneration, however, it is easy to fall prey to yet another danger. If we are not careful, we can create the impression that Ambrose's significance was little more than political, and that his political success in itself should be interpreted with a strong dose of cynicism (cf. Ramsey 1997: ix). The quest for the historical Ambrose, the attempt to strip away the accretions of a reverential portraiture which left the real man buried beneath the weight of his own glory, can equally readily fashion an individual after its own image: reconstructions of Ambrose the saint can, with little difficulty, be replaced by reconstructions of Ambrose the Machiavellian. No sketch of an historical figure can in the end be anything other than a fictive attempt to capture its subject's personality, but the sensitive historian must try to steer between the equal and opposite extremes of seeing Ambrose only as an idol to be venerated or as a political phantom whose inner personality is obscure to the point of unreality.

Mindful of the pitfalls, we shall seek to explore Ambrose in a three-pronged approach. First, we shall look at his context, the kind of influences and perspectives which formed him, and the circumstances of his elevation to the episcopate. Second, we shall consider his quest to find his own role as a Christian leader, as one catapulted out of a civil career, with little or no spiritual or theological preparation, and charged with stabilizing an ecclesiastical situation fraught with factional tensions. This must involve an examination of developments which belong in the political realm, for although Ambrose was much more than a politician it was through his participation in many of the public events of his time that he carved out his distinctive niche as a churchman. Even in an age when politics and theology were exceptionally intertwined, he exercised an unparalleled influence upon political affairs. Finally, we shall try to evaluate the larger-scale results of that quest for self-definition as seen in the ecclesial community which Ambrose laboured to construct, both in Milan and further afield.

Scholarship has in recent years come to appreciate in much more nuanced fashion the intellectual contours of Ambrose's activity as biblical interpreter, preacher, liturgist and pastor, recognizing the complex ways in which his moral teaching and practice reflect his efforts to demonstrate the transformative power of divine grace. Ambrose saw Christian baptism as the gateway to human existence as it was divinely intended to be (Satterlee 2002), and his ends were thoroughly practical. He sought a reconfiguration of late Roman attitudes to gender, sexuality, freedom, wealth, poverty, power, leadership and service in light of a Christian narrative of salvation (Brown 2012: 120–47). Specific, embodied social situations were in view, not abstract ideas (Colish 2005); in addressing these circumstances as he did, through the lens of scripture and creed, he set forth a comprehensively imaginative vision of human fulfilment and change. Much more than some have thought, Ambrose was indeed a creative moral thinker, and while his ideas of course continued to be heavily shaped by his classical inheritance, they also deserve to be appraised as theological at their core, not as some pastiche of jostling philosophical influences or an exercise only in pragmatism (Smith 2011). Ambrose's representations of virtue will not necessarily be regarded by late moderns as emancipatory in any straightforward sense (e.g. Burrus 2000: 134–83), and in his own time his audiences were hardly always changed as profoundly as he wished (cf. generally Salzman 2002). But his rhetorical and symbolic methods were not less than creative, neither were they less than theological. Taken together, they may be seen as a vital instrument in the expansion of his account of the Christian message in his cultural world. In the end, Ambrose's spiritual as well as his practical legacy may be gauged in the particular character that he created for the public face of the Nicene faith on the stage of the Western empire. He was scarcely the only artist of that image, but he was one of the most important.

Context, formation and election

Ambrose' early life

Aurelius Ambrosius did not come from the top drawer of senatorial society, but he did hail from a privileged background. He was born at Trier, probably early in 339 (Palanque 1933: 480–2, 542–3), while his father served at the court of Constantine II, almost certainly as praetorian prefect of the Gauls, a high-level role which carried administrative responsibility for a vast area of Western Europe (Fischer 1984; Mazzarino 1989: 75–82). Ambrose senior died young, leaving his widow with three children: a girl, Marcellina, and two boys, Uranius Satyrus, and Ambrose junior. The family moved to Rome (probably returning to a property they already held), and the metropolis became their adopted home. His late father's office did not afford him an automatic entrée into patrician society; he and his brother had to earn their place among an aristocratic set by cultivating the appropriate social mores. They passed through an education in 'the liberal arts', receiving the standard training in classical literature, rhetoric and law which equipped young men for a career in the imperial civil service. Ambrose's schooling in the quadriga of Cicero, Vergil, Terence and Sallust remained with him for the rest of his days, profoundly influencing the style and texture of his speech and writing.

Their household established itself firmly in Roman Christian society. Marcellina took vows of chastity and received the veil from Pope Liberius in the new basilica of St. Peter's, probably on the festival of Epiphany in 353. Marcellina adopted a life of domestic piety, residing in semi-seclusion with her family and a virginal companion, occupied in the kind of spiritual activities described so memorably by Jerome in his sketches of Lea, Paula and Marcella (Epistles 23, 108, 127) and above all in his famous Epistle 22 to Eustochium. Ambrose spent his youth in a household in which visits from clergymen were a regular event, and where talk of ecclesiastical affairs (such as news from the Council of Milan in 355) was part of regular conversation. Like plenty of other scions of Christian households, however, he and Satyrus remained unbaptized in childhood.

On completing their education, the brothers became advocates at the court of the praetorian prefect of Italy, Volcacius Rufinus, at Sirmium on the Danube. This choice of career path would not have been the fastest track to promotion for full-blooded aristocrats, who could count on their connections to open doors for them more directly, but it was a promising appointment for young men whose natural place was on the margins rather than at the core of the senatorial élite. As it turned out, both distinguished themselves as orators, and recognition was not long in coming. The fabulously wealthy Sextus Anicius Petronius Probus was appointed as Rufinus' successor in 368. Like many men of his type, Probus was a largely nominal Christian, but he had (particularly through his wife) significant connections with the church at Rome, and for the Ambrosii the associations were fortuitous. Ambrose soon became an assessor in Probus' consiliarium; then, in c. 372/3, he was raised to the rank of consularis and made governor of Aemilia-Liguria (Satyrus evidently received parallel favours, though the location of his governorship is unknown). This was a prestigious post which carried the title of clarissimus and brought jurisdiction – a responsibility for enforcing law and order, administering justice and collecting taxes – over a considerable tract of north-west Italy. His headquarters were in Milan, which had steadily emerged as the principal urban centre in the Western empire, now more important in political terms than the mother-city, Rome.

The see of Milan had been occupied since 355 by Auxentius, a homoian 'Arian', or subscriber to the position that Christ the Son was not, as the Council of Nicaea had said, 'of the same substance' (homoousios) with God the Father, but 'like' (homoios) him (Hanson 1988: 557–97; on Western as well as Eastern homoianism, see Ayres 2004: 133–86). A Cappadocian by birth, Auxentius had been appointed following the deposition of a pro-Nicene bishop, Dionysius, and he had survived more than one attempt from Nicene dissidents to remove him from office, including some serious broadsides from combatants as able as Hilary of Poitiers and Eusebius of Vercelli (Williams 1995: 38–68). He was a popular preacher, well-read in contemporary Greek theology, and a skilful player of church politics. He presided in an immense basilica, seating up to 3,000, the magnificence of which could hardly have failed to impress his parishioners.

Most importantly of all, Auxentius enjoyed the support of Valentinian I (emperor 364–75). A devout Christian, Valentinian aspired to religious neutrality, but while he resided in Milan in 364–5 he had issued an edict calling upon the city to rally behind the man who was after all its official bishop, and he had Hilary banished for protesting that Auxentius' heretical views debarred him from such support. The homoians constituted a clear majority within the Milanese church; the Nicenes could only observe and disapprove of Auxentius' hegemony from without, maintaining a separatist identity by meeting in private houses or by congregating at outdoor conventicles, typically held around the cemetery areas outside the city where their forebears of similar doctrinal sympathies were buried.

The appointment of Ambrose as bishop of Milan

In the autumn of 374 Auxentius died, and the city was thrown into turmoil. The pro-Nicenes demanded a say in the appointment of a successor, and infiltrated an official gathering of homoian clergy and people in Auxentius' basilica to press their case. There is no evidence that the dispute had turned violent, but Ambrose chose to intervene, arriving at the cathedral in person to deliver a stern official's speech on the necessity of keeping the peace. On the face of things, his motives were formal and juridical, an attempt to defuse a dangerous situation and forestall public disorder. In reality, he was seen to be endorsing the legitimacy of the Nicenes' effort to disrupt an official ceremony being held for the purposes of acclaiming a new, and inevitably homoian, candidate. As a son of the Roman church, and by now a catechumen, Ambrose's sympathies undoubtedly lay with the Nicene camp, but he could hardly have anticipated the outcome of his actions. According to Paulinus, his secretary-biographer, all of a sudden, in the midst of the uproar a child's voice was heard to cry, Ambrosius episcopus!, 'Ambrose for bishop!'. At this sound, the story goes, the whole mood of the gathering changed: Arians and catholics forgot their differences and united in a plea for their consularis, truly a wild-card candidate, to become bishop himself (Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii 6).

But Ambrose, by his actions seeking to distance himself from the unexpected outcome of the meeting (Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 6–9; Rufinus, Historia Ecclesiastica 2.11; Duval 1976), immediately left the church and resumed his administrative duties, deliberately ignoring the clamour for his election. He returned to his tribunal and, contrary to his usual practice (or so it is said – implausibly), passed a sentence of public torture on a number of people, in a bid to compromise his image as a just and humane adjudicator. His supporters, however, having followed him from the basilica, cried out that as far as they were concerned, his sin could fall upon their heads; it made no difference to their wish that he be bishop. Ambrose had now received public acclamation to bolster the attestation already afforded him at the church gathering.

Retreating to his own home, he resorted to some more desperate expedients, this time entering into direct negotiation with his crowd of pursuers. First, he professed that he wished to devote himself to the life of a philosopher. Judging by the later evidence of his reading in philosophical texts, this may have been a genuine plea, but it too failed. Next he tried once more to disqualify himself morally by inviting prostitutes under his roof, but this elicited the same response as his previous attempt to compromise himself: 'Your sin be upon us'. Finally, he resolved to flee Milan. He left the city by night, destined for Pavia, but was discovered the next morning at the Porta Romana, the main triumphal route into Milan. From there he was escorted back into the city. It is improbable that the governor did not know which road to take; Ambrose appears to have deliberately staged the spectacle of a triumphal return, simultaneously frustrated in his attempt to escape yet buoyed up by a clear display of public support. Nevertheless, he still resisted ordination. An appeal was sent to Valentinian, but the accompanying report of Ambrose's attempts to escape was probably intercepted by the prefect Petronius Probus himself, who, as Ambrose's patron, had his own interests in engineering the right outcome. By the time the plea reached the emperor, it doubtless seemed a clear-cut case of sanctioning a candidate for whom there was unanimous popular approval. There is nothing to support the once-standard idea that Ambrose's election was an example of ordination purely by public acclamation (Gryson 1980: 269–73), but it is easy to imagine Valentinian's readiness to rubber-stamp the appointment of an able administrator whose candidacy was presented to him, however tendentiously, as a potential cure for Milan's doctrinal divisions. Meantime, Ambrose sought to flee once more, going into hiding at the estate of Leontius, one of his aristocratic friends. His aim was probably to ensure that if he were to be appointed bishop, it would be with the express endorsement of the emperor and not simply as the partisan choice of the pro-Nicenes. On the arrival of the appropriate response from Valentinian, the vicarius, Probus' deputy in Milan and Ambrose's immediate superior, issued an edict threatening severe punishment for anyone found harbouring the fugitive governor, and Leontius wasted no time in handing him over. In the end, we are told, Ambrose gave in, realizing that he could no longer resist the destiny that providence had in store for him (Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 9).

To modern eyes, the whole process appears bizarre. Ambrose had no theological training for a clerical role and had not even been baptized. There is little reason to doubt his reluctance to accept the future being thrust upon him. It was common in the late Roman world for those elected to high public office formally to decline preferment, pleading unworthiness and inability, and the same convention became widespread in church life. Ambrose's refusal, though, must have been genuine enough. A talented young administrator with influential connections, security of tenure and healthy prospects, he had little reason to desire the invidious task of holding together a community riven by conflicting tribal loyalties. However devout his background in Rome, he must scarcely have considered it likely that this could be his calling.

Nevertheless, his flair for stage-managing events was obvious in his handling of the circumstances in which he found himself. The episodes narrated by Paulinus are not hagiographical embellishments, designed merely to bolster an image of Ambrose's self-effacement. Rather, they reveal the earliest indications that the new bishop had a keen sense of the importance of public gestures (McLynn 1994: 44–52). Ambrose had been faced with a situation which must have surprised him and a prospect which he quickly realized he could not in the end escape. He turned it into a series of steps which ensured that he established his inherently shaky credentials on the best footing possible. First, he insisted upon receiving baptism only at the hands of a Catholic bishop. This was a clear gesture to the Nicenes, for whom baptism by any other brand of cleric would have been invalid. At the same time, he made sure that he was seen to identify with a clerical body that was firmly homoian. After baptism, he was ceremonially passed through each of the clerical grades, from doorkeeper to presbyter, in the course of a week, before being consecrated the following Sunday, 7 December (for a defence of the traditional date, see Faller 1942). This strategy was not a formal satisfaction of the canonical rule that a novice ought not to be elevated to the episcopate overnight (pace Gryson 1968: 225 n. 18; Williams 1995: 114–15 n. 48), neither is the account of it an apologetic fabrication by Paulinus (pace Fischer 1970; cf. Ramsey 1997: 20–1); rather, it provided a deliberate build-up to the finale of Ambrose's consecration. It successively associated him with each of the ranks in his church, and pre-empted a lengthy examination of his qualifications prior to the formal nomination ceremony on 7 December (McLynn 1994: 51).

As part of the final display, he publicly handed over his gold and silver to the church and to the poor (Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 38). This was no naïve relinquishing of all his wealth, for the family estates, centred particularly in Africa (plus, it seems, some lands in Sicily), remained in his control, and his sister's needs at Rome were well provided for by the donation of a regular income from the property. It was designed, rather, to signal his new role as civic benefactor and patron of those in need. What must have happened in reality was that a proportion of the family assets was invested in Milan in order to help finance Ambrose's future strategy for managing his diocese.

Ambrose' qualifications and preparation for the episcopacy

Ambrose brought to the episcopate a specific complex of social, intellectual and practical perspectives. Thanks to natural talent, hard work and some assiduous networking, he had managed by his early thirties to attain high office in an imperial system which could well have passed over men of his background in favour of those whose Romanitas was of more venerable standing.

He had been shaped by the kinds of opinions, pretensions and prejudices typical of those who had worked their way to a position of influence and power rather than enjoying it by birthright. He remained profoundly affected by a concern for what 'men of the first rank' would think, for the sort of standards of public behaviour deemed appropriate for gentlemen, and the need to preserve a proper assurance and gravitas in social interaction; all these are expected features in a culture where honour was a central value (see Chapter 1 of this volume). Though he would make much of biblical patterns of altruism, traditional aristocratic assumptions about ethnic identity, class and social dignity would also stay not far beneath the surface of his moralizing.

Ambrose's mind remained steeped in the literature and mythology of the classical world. Acutely conscious of his lack of preparation for his new role and the sudden obligation that it brought to teach and learn at the same time (De officiis 1.1–4; De virginibus 1.1–4; 2.1–5), he had to apply his gifts to a whole new field. His greatest asset was that he had been trained to read Greek fluently. The skill proved invaluable as he began to educate himself in the complexities of contemporary Christological discourse and the conventions of how to exegete biblical texts. He set himself a rigorous programme of reading in Philo, Origen, Basil, Didymus, Athanasius and others, rapidly assimilating the Alexandrians' techniques of allegory and typology, and learning to imitate standard moralizing expositions of biblical exemplars. The theological and hermeneutical influences would be deeply formative for his preaching. Besides these authorities, he also studied Platonist texts, familiarizing himself with a philosophical literature that enjoyed a certain popularity among Milan's intelligentsia. His sermons would evince vestiges from Apuleius, Porphyry and Plotinus, and his spirituality would be configured around the theme of a spiritual ascent towards wisdom – though conceptualized in significantly new guise, as a journey initiated in the waters of baptism and climaxing in eschatological union with the God of Jesus Christ (Courcelle 1968: 93–138). Ambrose was no unreconstructed philosopher, or naïve synthesizer of Platonist dualism with biblical anthropology; he knew very well that his Christian theology of creation and redemption meant radical differences as well. He read with a great deal more discernment than has sometimes been imagined. Habitually, it seems, he made sure that his study was visible to his people: Augustine tells of how the Milanese would watch their bishop as he pored in silence over his books in whatever precious intervals he could snatch from an administrative and pastoral workload which must from the start have been very heavy (Confessions 6.3.3).

In addition, Ambrose had proved himself to be an accomplished rhetorician. His abilities in this field had helped to win him early distinction as an advocate at Sirmium. He would learn to harness these gifts to his new knowledge; his powerful and learned pulpit performances soon marked him out as one of the most effective preachers of the patristic age, revered for the eloquent charm of his style (Augustine, Conf. 5.13.23). He played no small part in finally persuading Augustine of his gospel, and it was by Ambrose that Augustine would be baptized, in 387 CE (Willis 2012).

Figure 57.2   The Saint (i.e. Augustine) Baptized by Ambrose, Painting by Niccolò di Pietro (fl. Venice 1394–1430) in the Vatican. Photo Wikimedia Commons

Ambrose had also acquired invaluable experience as an administrator and adjudicator. In an age when bishops, particularly in metropolitan sees like Milan, had become linchpins in the system of imperial bureaucracy (Rapp 2005), he would require all of his organizational skills and all of his flair for negotiation and bargaining. Ambrose would find himself not only in charge of considerable financial and material assets, and responsible not just for (often fractious) human resources both in his own city and across north Italy; he would become a hearer of civil disputes (the onerous work of the audientia episcopalis), a go-between and sponsor of interests and causes at an imperial court, a mediator and ambassador on political business. He always looked back on his life as a provincial governor in negative terms (De paenitentia 2.67, 72–3; Off. 1.4; cf. Epistle extra collectionem 14 [63].65: Lenox-Conyngham 1982a), but without the training and expertise acquired in his former career it is very unlikely he would have become the kind of episcopal leader he proved to be.

Devising an episcopal role

The achievements of preaching, pastoring and leading, however, lay somewhat down the track: first, Ambrose had to work out a basic modus operandi. He had inherited a clerical body which remained dominated by homoian officials, and it was not practicable for him to make sweeping changes in his staff. His congregation, too, was predominantly loyal to the memory of Auxentius. As yet he possessed neither the knowledge nor the experience necessary to take on those with whom he disagreed. Prudently, he chose to avoid confrontation and concentrated on building up his profile as bishop of the whole see, rather than playing directly to a pro-Nicene constituency. There is possible evidence that he sought the help of Basil of Caesarea to return to Milan the bones of Auxentius' Nicene predecessor, Dionysius, who had died in exile in Armenia, but it is uncertain whether the information (Basil, Ep. 197.2) is authentic: Ambrose may or may not have been able to venture such a gesture. What he did do was show favour to at least one notable former Catholic dissident, the venerable presbyter Simplicianus, who returned from Rome to become his baptismal instructor, and perhaps continued to act as a theological mentor beyond the initiation process (at an advanced age, Simplicianus would one day be nominated by his pupil as his successor in the see).

Ambrose's earliest attentions were devoted to the acquisition of theological knowledge, and he waited more than two years before he published his first written work. When it came, its subject was significant: De virginibus. The theme neatly avoided the doctrinal tensions in his church, and gave Ambrose an opportunity to establish a distinctive didactic voice of his own. He speaks as the brother of a consecrated virgin (the work is dedicated to Marcellina), and the son of a pious widow. His family associations with female asceticism are presented as implicitly qualifying him to give instruction on this subject at least, however unprepared he still is for a general teaching role. He draws particularly upon Athanasius and Cyprian, though the debts are barely signalled (Duval 1974). The Italian churches already had plenty of women consecrated to a life of domestic asceticism, but Ambrose preached a new variant on the theme. He called upon the young women of Milan to devote themselves to Christ and his church as a public dedication of their desire to escape the game of being used as financial pawns in marriages arranged by wealthy parents. In a bid to persuade their families to encourage such commitment, he argued that the presence of a consecrated virgin in a household would bring merit to cover the family's sins (Virg. 1.32). This kind of strategy provoked some resentment, for the bishop was interfering in the private affairs of the family; but it also won results (Riggi 1980; Brown 1988: 341–65; Savon 1989). Ambrose was able to stage impressive processions of young candidates coming forward in large numbers to receive the veil, some of them from as far afield as North Africa. The spectacle of these parades can only have boosted the fledgling bishop's prestige in the eyes of his public.

Preoccupation with outward form characterized other moves as well. Encountering a cleric who happened to walk in a fashion that displeased him, Ambrose set about dealing with him: the man was summoned before the bishop's tribunal, whereupon he promptly deserted the clergy rather than face the ire of his superior (Off. 1.72). The concern for correctness of gait nicely illustrates Ambrose's concern to ensure standards of public behaviour which would commend the church to the eyes of discerning onlookers; he could not institute a wholesale restaffing schedule, but he could make a few changes indirectly which would improve the appearance of his clerical body by raising its proficiency in the semiotics of classical good conduct. He himself adopted a lifestyle which combined these polite manners with a self-conscious austerity, devoting himself not only to study and prayer but also to frugality of dress and diet, including the observance of regular fasts (Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 38 speaks of his body being wasted by 'daily fasts'), all designed to demonstrate his consecration to asceticism (Augustine thought his chastity his one obvious hardship: Conf. 6.3.3).

Most strikingly of all in terms of public display, he set about a major church-building programme. In time, it would transform the religious landscape of Milan, as the city's suburbs came to be dominated by a series of towering edifices epitomizing the style of Ambrose's regime. Most of the construction took place in the 380s, but there is evidence that the work had begun as early as the late 370s (De excessu fratris 1.20). There are signs, too, that the homoian majority soon came to see the scheme for what it was: an audacious policy of imposing Ambrose's presence, and with it his increasingly open doctrinal alignment, upon the city and its hinterland. Some of the funds for the projects came from the private money which Ambrose had invested in the church, but not all. In order to ransom prisoners of war caught up in the Gothic ravages after the Roman wipe-out at the battle of Adrianople in 378 (Burns 1974), Ambrose opted to melt down and sell church plate to provide extra financial resources (Off. 2.70–5, 136–43). In itself, this might not have been especially problematic: there were precedents for such measures. In this case, however, Ambrose evidently made sure that the chalices in question were ones which had been donated to the church by homoian benefactors. He also seems to have diverted some of the proceeds from the sale of the plate to boost his building fund on the grounds that the cemetery basilicas being constructed were providing burial plots for needy Christians. In short, he appears to have been practising opportunism of a conspicuous kind – clearing his attic of assets which to him were tainted by association, while furthering his scheme to extend the physical presence of his church, all in the name of public sacrifice in the interests of a good cause (Brown 1992: 96).

At the time of his consecration, Ambrose's brother Satyrus had abandoned his career in order to devote his life to assisting with the administration of the see, renouncing all his own rights to marry or to make a will – a huge sacrifice. Satyrus undertook the supervision of the family estates, with a view to maximizing the income accrued by the Milanese church. He had, it appears, always been of delicate constitution, and on a return trip from Africa in the late summer of 378 he fell ill and died. His death was undoubtedly a major blow to Ambrose. The brothers had always been close, and their working lives had been intertwined to an unusual degree. But Ambrose did not miss the opportunity to define Satyrus' importance to the Milanese community, and by implication to signal his own significance as civic leader as well. His funeral sermon offered a highly wrought lament, sketching Satyrus' character throughout with reference to the supporting role he played to the bishop. The personal grief is clearly intense, but the formal conventions of the classical consolatio genre also shine through unmistakably (Duval 1977; Savon 1980). However acute his loss, it provided scope for him to impress his authority upon his people through the art of rhetorical performance (Biermann 1995).

All the while, Ambrose faced increasingly serious hostility within his community. His footsteps were dogged in particular by the presence of one Iulianus Valens, a homoian bishop who (presumably because of the barbarian invasions) had fled to Milan from his native Pettau in Noricum. Valens established a rival community in direct opposition to Ambrose. In addition, the anti-pope Ursinus seems to have stirred up some hard-line Nicenes to protest against what they perceived to be the compromising pragmatism of Ambrose's refusal to reform the overall structure of Auxentius' clergy. Ursinus himself was not a homoian (he was primarily interested in making life difficult for his real bête noire, Damasus), but Ambrose pictures Valens and him in an unholy alliance, for his activities lent added weight to the cause of the Arian opposition (Ep. extra coll. 5 [11].3). Although the strength of these hostile forces continues to be underestimated by one or two scholars (e.g. Kaufman 1997), it was in fact considerable. Dissident household meetings seem to have been held, with distinct liturgies and apparent plots against Ambrose. Ursinus was exiled to Cologne in 375/6, but this was probably in punishment for the behaviour of his supporters at Rome rather than as a consequence of the trouble he had caused in Milan; evidently there was no official sanction of his activities there. Ambrose made matters considerably worse for himself with the homoians by intervening in a synod in his former base of Sirmium, more than 500 miles away, to ensure the election of a Nicene candidate as bishop in late 377 or early 378. This highly questionable involvement in the ecclesiastical affairs of a territory quite outside of his jurisdiction (which implied that Ambrose was prepared to take a heavier hand outside Milan than he was yet in a position to do on his own patch) provoked a furious protest locally in Illyricum, where the homoian community was strongly entrenched.

Most ominously of all, it incurred the wrath of the strongly pro-Arian Justina, mother of another son of Valentian I, the young man who would become Valentinian II; her influence over the church at Sirmium was considerable. By forcing the result, Ambrose had directly insulted Justina. It would only be a matter of time before she sought her revenge, in collusion with the homoians of Milan.

Valentinian I died in 375, having arranged his succession so that his brother Valens would rule in the East and his teenage son Gratian in the West. When Valentinian's half-brother, the young Gratian, arrived in Sirmium after the disastrous defeat by the Goths at Adrianople in 378, where Valens himself was killed, it appears that he was met with warnings from the local homoian clergy that Ambrose's theology deserved to be investigated more closely. Probably they feared that his coup in the recent election would lead to further cross-border activities. Gratian was a devout youth, but he clearly lacked the theological knowledge to decide for himself. He opted to request from Ambrose a statement of his faith (Nautin 1974). Ambrose did not respond at once, perhaps because he knew that Gratian was due to visit Milan soon afterwards on his return to Gaul. When they subsequently met, in the summer of 379, Ambrose managed to impress the emperor and his entourage sufficiently to prevail upon Gratian to silence the homoians (Ep. extra coll. 12 [1].2). Evidently the pressure upon Ambrose from these opponents was serious: in a number of references stemming from this period, he warns of the dangers of false prophets leading the faithful astray or, fox-like, stealing sheep from the true fold (e.g. Expositio evangelii secundum Lucam 7.28–31, 44–53). When Gratian returned to Milan in the spring of the following year, he was presented with the initial stages in Ambrose's first public manifesto against Arianism, the opening two books of his De fide (Markschies 1995: 165–212, esp. 197ff.; Williams 1995: 128–53).

Ambrose's argument amounted to a full-scale attack on the theology of the homoians. With remarkable boldness, it is presented not as a defence of the bishop's personal beliefs but as a specially commissioned articulation of a doctrinal position already espoused by the emperor. Ambrose does everything in his power to dissuade Gratian from becoming attracted to homoian ideas while on his forthcoming campaign against the Goths, but he poses not as an apologist but as a spiritual spokesman. As the first serious evidence of his reading in Greek authorities, the work might seem at first glance a rather weak piece of intellectual endeavour (Hanson 1988: 669–75). Ambrose refuses to differentiate between the various strands of 'Arianism'. The homoians are lumped in with those of much more radical beliefs, such as Aetius and Eunomius, who denied that God the Father and God the Son bore any likeness at all according to essence (Vaggione 2000). At another level, however, the broad-brush polemic reflects Ambrose's commitment to a more general pro-Nicene effort to characterize 'Arian' theologies en bloc in thoroughly negative terms. The text carries a poignant political message which gives an important clue to his ideological strategy. The Gothic triumph at Adrianople and the ensuing ravages of the Danubian provinces are depicted in the last paragraphs (Fid. 2.136–43) as a divine judgement on 'Arian' strongholds; fidelity to the true faith, conversely, would guarantee a resounding Roman victory this time around. Ambrose was sounding a note that would become a familiar refrain: theological orthodoxy and the security of the empire are all of a piece (Palanque 1933: 325–35; Meslin 1964; Sordi 1988; Inglebert 1996: 297–309; Berndt and Steinacher 2014).

On his return to Illyricum, Gratian showed the work to Palladius of Ratiaria, the most senior and the ablest of the local bishops (Meslin 1967: 111–34). Palladius issued a sharp rejoinder, refuting Ambrose's misrepresentation of the homoian position and inviting him to engage in a direct debate (Palladius, Apology 81–7: McLynn 1991). Palladius was aware that Gratian had decided to convene a general council at Aquileia the following year, intended to resolve the differences between the Nicene and homoian parties, and on the basis of the logic evidenced in De fide 1–2, he must have been confident of his own chances of victory in an open encounter with Ambrose. Probably at his encouragement, Gratian requested further clarification from Ambrose, who opted to wait until the emperor had left Illyricum and was safely back at Trier, far from Palladius' influence, before he replied. He promised to fulfil the emperor's request, and once again deliberately turned around Gratian's plea for further information to make it sound as if the emperor's doctrine was confirmedly in line with his own (Ep. extra coll. 12 [1]). He rushed off a further three books to De fide and followed these up with another three De Spiritu Sancto, the first treatise on the Holy Spirit in the West. Once again, the theological energy was obvious, though the key points were heavily derived from Greek authorities, and the clarity with which they were expressed was not always profound. Notably, Ambrose declined to engage directly with Palladius' criticisms of his earlier work.

Throughout this time, Ambrose's position in Milan remained precarious. One illustration of this can be glimpsed in his reference in De Spiritu Sancto 1 to a (presumably recent) attempt to sequestrate a basilica in Milan in the name of the emperor (Spir. 1.19–21). The episode may well have been orchestrated by Justina, who had arrived in the city at some point after Adrianople. If so, it was a clear act of revenge for Ambrose's earlier humiliation of her at Sirmium, and a direct plea on behalf of the Milanese homoians (Williams 1994). Even if Justina was not directly behind it, her presence would undoubtedly have emboldened the homoians to press their case that worship in private was no longer good enough: they wanted churches of their own, where they could establish their presence publicly as an official opposition to Ambrose. In this particular case, the order was rescinded, perhaps when Gratian himself arrived in the city, but it reflects tensions which were all too real. The quest for territory was to prove an enduring concern in the years that followed (Maier 1994).

A reversal of Ambrose's fortunes, however, lay around the corner. The catalyst was Gratian's plan for a theological council. Late in 378, Gratian had issued an edict of toleration for the East, proclaiming the right of free worship for all religious groups except the Manichaeans, the Photinians (who denied the pre-existence of Christ), and the Eunomians (Codex Theodosianus 16.5.5). However, shortly after his accession to the purple in January of 379, his new colleague Theodosius for his part had expressly proclaimed that 'all peoples' should follow the 'Catholic' faith as articulated by pope Damasus and Peter of Alexandria (C. Th. 16.1.2). There is considerable dispute surrounding this edict: was it a binding legal injunction, implicitly threatening imperial retribution for those who refused to comply, or was it simply a manifesto statement, setting out the new emperor's personal preferences – preferences shaped by minority Nicene pressure from the bishop of Theodosius' base at Thessalonica, Acholius? The latter is more likely; but at any rate the edict reflected Theodosius' concern to have his own say in the theological affairs of the East. In a bid to assert his authority over his junior colleague, Gratian announced that a general council would meet in 381 at Aquileia (a place convenient for both Western and Eastern delegates), but Theodosius was again not to be outdone. He summoned the bishop of Constantinople, Demophilus, and required him to subscribe to the Nicene faith; Demophilus refused and opted to take his congregation into effective exile beyond the city walls. At the beginning of 381, Theodosius then issued a now-famous decree outlawing Arianism along with other sects (C. Th. 16.5.6), and in May of that year he convened his own assembly at Constantinople to elect a successor to Demophilus. It looked as if there was little point in Gratian's general council going ahead.

Ambrose, however, had other ideas. First, he saved Gratian the embarrassment of cancelling his council by insisting that the meeting should be held. But, crucially, he also persuaded the emperor that there was no need to call another large-scale gathering of Eastern bishops so soon after Constantinople, for the dispute was, after all, a private one between himself and a few of his brethren from Illyricum. The upshot was that Aquileia proved to be a mere shadow of what Gratian had originally planned. Ambrose ensured that he was surrounded by a group of staunchly loyal supporters from north Italy and Gaul, while Palladius enjoyed far more limited support. In such a fiercely partisan environment, Ambrose orchestrated an overwhelming condemnation of Palladius, and of his prominent colleague, Secundianus, bishop of Singidunum. He swiftly followed it up with conciliar appeals, not only to Gratian but also to Theodosius himself, to act decisively against the Arians, first by legally enforcing the deposition of Palladius and Secundianus from their sees, and then by removing other menaces, such as the presence of Iulianus Valens in North Italy (Ep. extra coll. 4 [10] − 6 [12]). A potentially awkward theological contretemps had been turned into a major political advantage. The Ambrose who had been struggling for so long had at last, by sheer opportunism, succeeded in establishing a decisive Nicene bridgehead (Williams 1995: 154–84).

A matter of months before Aquileia, Gratian had officially transferred the Western court from Trier to Milan. Ambrose found himself with unprecedented access to the machinery of government, and he made sure to exploit it to the full. He became an effective lobbyist not only for his own causes but also on behalf of the careers and aspirations of friends and contacts from the local area and beyond, and a giver of strategic hospitality to assorted officials and visiting dignitaries. Such activity called for a delicate balancing act, for his own rhetoric insisted that the affairs of a corrupt world were none of the church's concern (Off. 1.185), and that clerics were not to involve themselves in financial disputes (Off. 2.125; 3.59), or go around attending the power-dinners of the rich (Off. 1.86). Ambrose seemed to manage it, nevertheless, and in the process he reinforced his position as a key player in the political affairs of metropolitan society (Matthews 1975: 191–203).

Palladius, meanwhile, continued to protest against the treatment he had received at Aquileia, but to little avail. The details of his argument were apparently relayed to Ambrose, who happened to be publishing a sermon preached against two Arian courtiers who had criticized him (and had ominously managed to get themselves killed when they had failed to turn up to engage in a debate with him which they themselves had requested: Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 18); he was able to add a special section responding to Palladius (De incarnatione 79–116), in terms as shallow as before. Ambrose never did (Gottlieb 1973) enjoy the kind of ascendancy over Gratian that he duped his biographers into positing; incidents such as the controversy surrounding the Spanish ascetic, Priscillian of Avila, in which Ambrose's antipathy was drowned out by the agencies of Priscillian's supporter, the magister officiorum Macedonius (Chadwick 1976: 111–69), illustrate that. Nevertheless, in the latter days of a regime marked by indecisiveness, his influence over an essentially bored and impressionistic emperor was not inconsiderable. Gratian's weak grasp on power was met with the revolt of the British commander Maximus in 383, and death at the hands of one of Maximus' subordinates at Lyon; it was easy for Ambrose to portray him as an innocent victim of betrayal, fostering the assumption that Gratian had been under his wing all along, and that he had even died with the word 'Ambrose!' on his lips (In Ps. 61 enarratio 23–6; De obitu Valentiniani consolatio 78–81).

The political significance which Ambrose's agencies had come to assume also brought him a remarkable role in the checking of Maximus' rebellion. In order to gain time for the forces loyal to Valentinian who were gathering under the Frankish general, Bauto, the bishop went in person to Trier to appeal to Maximus for peace (Epistle 30 [24]). Valentinian's supporters at Milan also proclaimed their independence from the coup and urged Theodosius to muster forces against the usurper. In the end, no fighting actually took place, for Theodosius was finally persuaded to grant recognition to Maximus in return for the assurance that Valentinian's court was legitimate. But Ambrose, for his part, soon called in the debt for his diplomatic efforts. In 384, the urban prefect of Rome, the distinguished Quintus Aurelius Symmachus, formulated a legal petition seeking the restoration of the altar of Victory, a potent symbol of Rome's traditional religion, to the senate-house, an incident related in detail by Bill Leadbetter in Chapter 10 of this work. Ambrose led the attack on Symmachus. He guaranteed that the direst of consequences would ensue if the altar were restored, for this would symbolize a capitulation on the part of a Christian emperor to the old religious order. Reminding the court of its personal debt to him in his embassy to Trier, he warned Valentinian II, who was a teenage ruler of obvious vulnerability, that he would face the full opposition of his bishop if he chose to heed the pagans' case. Not surprisingly, the threats worked and Symmachus' petition was rejected (Wytzes 1936; Klein 1972; Matthews 1975: 203–11).

Valentinian's relations with Ambrose were, however, destined to run anything but smoothly. In part, this was because of the influence of Justina, forever characterized by the bishop as the Jezebel of the fourth century (or by Palanque 1933: 140 as the Catherine de Medici of Arianism). But it took more than the will of the queen-mother to make any onslaught (infestatio, as Ambrose would call it: Off. 1.72) against the bishop and his church a reality, particularly when the pursuit of such a vendetta would conceivably jeopardize political stability. Justina's machinations must have been only part of a tenuous but sinister alliance of hostile forces, in which the lead was taken by the homoians themselves. Chief among the latter was one Mercurinus Auxentius (Williams 1995: 202–10), a former protégé of Ulfila, the so-called 'apostle' to the Goths during the reign of Constantius II (Heather and Matthews 1991: 133–53). As bishop of Durostorum on the Lower Danube, Auxentius had been recognized by Palladius as a potential challenger to Ambrose, and after being removed from his see by Theodosius he found refuge in Milan, probably in the second half of 384. The ensuing period witnessed a revival of the homoians' prospects (Williams 1995: 185–217). Its climax, in the years 385–6, amounted to the most serious crisis of Ambrose's episcopate. Yet that crisis would also become the defining moment in his effort to assert his authority over his own territory once and for all, and to establish the catholics as the definitive Christian community of Milan.

The pretext for battle was, once again, the vexed issue of space for worship. In the spring of 385, Ambrose was summoned to the imperial palace to be informed that the emperor wished to have a cathedral in which the court's worship could be led by homoian clergy: one of the bishop's basilicas, probably the Basilica Portiana, just outside the city walls, was to be handed over forthwith (Ep. 75a [C. Aux.].29). This ultimatum was a direct rebuttal of Ambrose's earlier attempt to dominate Valentinian (though, by way of diplomacy, it was delivered courtesy of a special invitation to the bishop to attend the imperial consistory). Ambrose had, however, apparently informed his supporters that he had been called to the palace, and the meeting was interrupted by a crowd clamouring that the churches of God must remain inviolate. Fearing a public riot, the court had little option but to back down.

On 23 January of the following year, a law was issued (C. Th. 16.1.4) requiring freedom of worship for those who followed the (Arian) faith as specified at the councils of Rimini (359) and Constantinople (360). The language of the directive warned that there would be firm retaliation against any who resisted or claimed that such freedom was theirs alone; any such responses would be treated as treasonous. The law was a clear violation of the spirit of Theodosius' edict of 380, and, in so far as it was designed to prevent another popular uprising against the right of homoians to worship in their own space, it was equally clearly targeted at Ambrose. In all probability, it was framed with the direct involvement of Auxentius, as Ambrose himself contended (Ep. 75a [C. Aux.].16, 22, 24). The issue now was not just about a private site for the liturgical use of the emperor and his retinue; this time there was an implicit validation of the entire homoian community which had existed in opposition to Ambrose from the start.

In late March, just prior to Easter, Ambrose was once again issued with a request for a church. Now it was no longer the Basilica Portiana, but the central Basilica Nova itself that was sought (the chronology and topography of the affair are both subject to considerable scholarly dispute: see, in particular, Van Haeringen 1937; largely followed by Lenox-Conyngham 1982b; Gottlieb 1985; McLynn 1994: 158–219; cf. Nauroy 1988; see also Barnes 2000; Colish 2002). This demand for the bishop to give up his own cathedral can hardly have been fully serious, but Ambrose was reminded of the sanctions destined to follow upon any violation of the January law. He replied that a bishop had no power to surrender a 'temple of God', and implicitly appealed to his people to back him in his resistance of any infringement upon their rights (Ep. 76 [20].2). At a meeting in his church next day, proceedings were interrupted by the arrival of the praetorian prefect, who came with new orders. It was not the Basilica Nova that was being sought for the emperor's use after all, it was said, but the Basilica Portiana. Ambrose's congregation themselves shouted a firm refusal. On Palm Sunday, the bishop was celebrating worship in his church when news came that the Basilica Portiana was being decked with imperial banners, evidently in preparation for use by the emperor and his entourage. It was also reported that a group from his own congregation, going to occupy the church for themselves, had violently assaulted a homoian presbyter (probably a court chaplain). He managed to send some of his men to rescue the unfortunate priest, but it was clear that the situation had taken an unpleasant turn. A severe fine was imposed on the corpus negotiatorum from which the rioters had come, and a number of them were imprisoned. It now seemed entirely possible that the court would deploy force to evict the catholics.

Nevertheless, emboldened by the persistence of his supporters, Ambrose refused to comply with a further demand to persuade them to give up the Basilica Portiana, arguing that he was bound by a higher obligation than any human law not to betray 'divine' property (Ep. 76 [20].8); he could not, however, challenge the actual legality of the state's claim in the circumstances. Troops were sent to blockade the church, and things threatened to turn nasty when a contingent of them also entered the Basilica Nova while Ambrose was conducting a service. In the event, the latter group, Nicene sympathizers themselves, were induced to desert. Strengthened by this, Ambrose proceeded to deliver a passionate sermon, urging his congregation to remain steadfast in the cause of truth, and asserting that the basilicas were not Caesar's but God's (Ep. 76 [20].19). At the news that the imperial hangings had been removed from the Basilica Portiana, he dispatched some clergy to join the occupiers of the church. This was a tactical mistake: it now appeared incontrovertible that he was supporting the sedition of the people directly. The news that the imperial hangings had been damaged worsened matters further. Ambrose denied any involvement in the affray, but fearing that he might be arrested he opted to remain in his church with his congregation during the night of Wednesday of Holy Week. It was during this vigil that he made one of his most successful and ultimately enduring moves: he introduced his congregation to the Eastern practice of antiphonal singing. The process fostered a sense of solidarity in tense circumstances and provided a stunningly effective channel for popularizing the idioms of Nicene theology, for Ambrose's followers were given not just Psalms to sing, but hymns of his own composition. The faithful stood together and sang together while Satan's forces – or the devotees of a lesser theology – prowled at the doors (cf. Augustine, Conf. 9.7.15). The 'Ambrosian hymn', typically eight stanzas of basic iambic dimeters, was to become a widely imitated form: brilliantly, yet almost by accident, Ambrose had devised a formula which would revolutionize Western liturgical practice (Fontaine 1992; Dunkle 2016). Hilary of Poitiers before him had sought to develop the metrical hymn as a medium for doctrinal teaching in the West, but it took Ambrose's delicate poetic gift, the spell of his charisma and the intensity of his followers' emotions in an hour of crisis to make congregational singing really catch on.

On Maundy Thursday, while the bishop addressed his people, news arrived that the emperor had ordered the withdrawal of the soldiers from the Basilica Portiana and the repayment of the fines imposed on the businessmen. But the affair was not entirely over. After Easter, Ambrose was summoned before the imperial consistory to engage in a debate with Auxentius, the outcome of which was to be decided by a panel of judges nominated by the contestants and chaired by the emperor himself. The bishop would be less confident, it was assumed, off his own ground. He declined to comply and withdrew to his church in the company of his congregation. The arrival of troops outside provided him with the opportunity to create another (this time imaginary) siege environment. In reality, the government had presumably sent some soldiers merely to forestall further public disturbances, but the scenario allowed Ambrose to argue that he was in no position to come to the palace. Once again, the singing and liturgy went on day and night, this time for a number of days. A final summons was then issued: the bishop must either nominate his arbiters for the debate or else leave the city.

Evidently his congregation feared that he might take the latter course, and he had to reassure them that he would face martyrdom rather than abandon his church. To the court's demands, he responded with a sermon against Auxentius (Ep. 75a [C. Aux.]), a brilliant appeal to his people's sense of outrage that a man of God should yield to the will of evil schemers. He deliberately conflates the January law with Valentinian's orders to engage in dialogue with Auxentius. In an official letter of reply to the emperor (Ep. 75 [21]), he paints Auxentius as a dangerous upstart, not fit to debate with one such as himself. He contends that the January law would have to be rescinded in its entirety before any such debate could take place, for if Auxentius were to be defeated this would logically invalidate it. He would, he claimed, be most willing to come and discuss matters of the faith – only his clergy and congregation would not let him.

Faced with such skilful evasion, such obstinacy in the guise of reasonableness, Valentinian had few choices left, particularly since there were veiled threats from Maximus and renewed problems on the Danube frontier. Ambrose had gained the upper hand by a combination of audacity, legal posturing and a fortuitous turn of political events. He wasted no time in pressing his advantage. In June of 386, construction was completed on a magnificent new cathedral, to be known as the Basilica Ambrosiana, where the bishop himself intended to be buried, in the Hortus Philippi west of the city centre, close by the resting place of the martyr Victor and of his own brother Satyrus (Mirabella Roberti 1984: 120–4). At the dedication ceremony, Ambrose pledged that the building would be decorated appropriately if the remains of some martyrs could be discovered. Next day, he led his people to the memorial to the celebrated martyrs Nabor and Felix, and gave his clerics orders to start digging nearby. Not surprisingly, they soon discovered remains, which were claimed to be those of another two martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius, who were believed to have suffered under Nero; the names were attested by a 'demon' being exorcized from an elderly woman. Amidst great rejoicing from the bishop's supporters, the skeletons were solemnly transported to the new church for re-interment; en route, even fleeting contact with the bones is said to have proved sufficient to heal all sorts of diseases among the attending crowds (Doignon 1956; Zangara 1981).

Ambrose's opponents are said to have made accusations that the whole thing was staged by the bishop (Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 15), and for all his protests about their impiety (Ep. 77 [22].16–23), they were doubtless right. But whatever the identity of the relics, what mattered was the impact that the discovery and ceremonial transference of them had upon the volatile Milanese community. Ambrose had provided a spectacular distraction from the tensions of the previous weeks; he had also signalled that even if his foes had him killed, they would not be able to remove what he stood for: a martyred bishop would be commemorated in noble company in a vast new shrine. His tactics presupposed the growing significance of the cult of the martyrs in the late fourth century (Grig 2004), and its ability to evoke powerful passions in a people already stirred by religious fervour (Brown 1981: 36–7). It was not hard for him to connect the inventio, the demonic testimonies, and the miraculous healings with fidelity to a theological cause, and to foster the idea that here was reward for spiritual steadfastness (Dassmann 1975). In the end, hopelessly outstaged by the excitement the bishop had inspired, the court gave up in its pursuit of its cause. The January law may or may not have been formally repealed; either way, it was dropped in practice. Rather than risk a further outbreak of potentially more serious anarchy, and increasingly preoccupied elsewhere with the problem of Maximus, Valentinian was advised to abandon the campaign his mother had supported. There were various gestures of reconciliation: Ambrose, for his part, undertook another mission to Maximus at Trier, which in the event did little or nothing to help the cause of peace. Valentinian's regime was nevertheless left fatally wounded by its encounter with Ambrose's intransigence, and within a matter of months the emperor and his retinue were in flight from Maximus' invading forces.

Nothing served to define Ambrose's style so much as this struggle with the forces of Arianism. His victory was won only through his gift for creating the impression that he was always in control, most of all when it must have been anything but true, and for portraying the sense that God was on his side. That is not to denigrate his personal courage, for the possibility of suffering violence or even martyrdom was at points in the crisis real for him as well as for his supporters. But the whole episode revealed his ability to exploit mass emotion and to use his own networks to achieve vital leverage in desperate circumstances. Much of his assurance, for example, only made sense if he had contacts able to supply him with information about developments in his enemies' ranks, and much of his ability to persuade others to support his cause depended on his knack of extracting all the compliance that episcopal auctoritas could muster. Ambrose knew how to manipulate crowds while remaining aloof from the uglier side of their actions; he could seem to be one with the sufferers while pleading his willingness to be reasonable with the authorities responsible for the peril to which they were exposed (MacMullen 1990).

Ambrose's initial relations with Theodosius, the swift victor over Maximus' forces in the summer of 388, were conditioned by his existing standing with Valentinian. While in retreat at Thessalonica, Valentinian had repudiated his past homoian allegiances, perhaps in the wake of his mother's death. Ambrose was happy to welcome him back to Milan, and to glory in the triumph of orthodoxy in yet another military confrontation. Theodosius, who accompanied him home, had clear Nicene credentials, but Ambrose lacked the kind of diplomatic history with his inner circle that he had built up with Valentinian's. His strategy, instead, was to use the political profile he had already secured to impress Theodosius with the authoritative grandeur he saw as attaching to his episcopal role.

A famous incident illustrates his approach. At the end of 388 there occurred a riot in the city of Callinicum, on the Euphrates, in which a Christian mob, led by the local bishop, plundered and burned down a synagogue. Theodosius, consulted by regional officialdom, responded by ordering that the perpetrators be punished and the bishop made to bear the cost of rebuilding the synagogue in person. When Ambrose got wind of this, he reacted sternly, urging Theodosius to revoke his orders, on the grounds that no bishop could with a good conscience be responsible for the construction of a synagogue, a place of 'idolatry'. He even claimed that he himself had validated the Callinicum mob's activities (Ep. 74 [40].8). Theodosius decided to rescind the fine, but Ambrose wanted more. He argued that the whole case should be dropped. His logic, set out in a skillfully crafted letter to the emperor (Ep. 74 [40]), reflects some starkly anti-Semitic sentiment, from which even his least critical admirers have felt obliged to recoil (e.g. Homes Dudden 1935: 372–9; on such tendencies generally in this period, see Wilken 1983; Millar 1992). It also raised enduring questions about the legitimacy of violence in a religious cause. On the next occasion when he preached in the presence of Theodosius, Ambrose went further and directly appealed for a pardon to be extended to the rioters. When the emperor and his party protested that having commuted the original sentence they still had every right to punish those who had defied law and order, Ambrose refused to continue with the service until he got his own way. Theodosius elected to give in. The situation is depicted by the bishop (Ep. extra coll. 1 [41]) as a personal triumph, and it has traditionally been interpreted as a daring confrontation – a bold churchman reducing an emperor to a humiliating climb-down, an episcopal Nathan rebuking an imperial David (Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 23, influencing, e.g. Palanque 1933: 219). In fact, it is likelier that Theodosius recognized the political capital to be made out of a measured gesture of beneficence: by exercising clemency, he guaranteed himself the affection and gratitude of the Italian Nicenes, whom his advisers had been working hard to win over.

Another incident which reflects the same abilities on the part of Ambrose occurred in the summer of 390 in the city of Thessalonica and is described by Bill Leadbetter in Chapter 10 of this work. A popular charioteer was arrested and put in prison for allegedly making sexual advances to one of the attendants of Botheric, the commander of the local garrison. The people rioted and Botheric was killed, along with other officials. When news of this serious outrage reached Theodosius, extreme retaliation was ordered. It is improbable that Theodosius acted simply in anger, without serious consideration of the consequences; but however the decision was made, he endorsed a punitive plan that yielded nothing to clemency (McLynn 1994: 315–23). The garrison at Thessalonica was given orders to execute the faction responsible for the revolt. The details of the order may well have been misunderstood, or the troops were determined to wreak much severer vengeance than had been mandated, for in the space of a few hours a considerable number of innocent residents of the city, possibly up to 7,000 in all (Theodoret, Historia Ecclesiastica 5.17), were brutally massacred. The true perpetrators of the murder of Botheric may well have escaped. Theodosius, faced with public outrage on a large scale, attempted to distance himself from the atrocity, implying that it was an act of blood-lust by an army stationed far from his immediate control, but he was obliged to bear ultimate responsibility. Ambrose saw to it that Theodosius did public penance for this massacre by threatening, in effect, excommunication if he did not.

Ambrose never did cement the kind of dominant relationship with Theodosius that many historians have imagined. His prevarication in dealing with Eugenius, Valentinian's successor in 392–3, reflected an enduring sense of uncertainty as to what would be politically expedient. Ambrose was caught between an initial attitude of warmth towards Arbogast's new Augustus and a desire to wait and see which way Theodosius himself would go. When Eugenius invaded Italy in the spring of 393, Ambrose opted to leave Milan (while away, he managed to preside over the exhumation of further martyr relics at Bologna: Exh. virg. 1–10; Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 29), returning only when Eugenius' forces had vacated the city the following year. He himself presents this as a measured decision to rebuff one who, for all his Christian professions, had given into demands from his pagan supporters for subsidies for their cults (Ep. extra coll. 10 [57]; cf. Paulinus, Vita Ambros. 26.3); more probably, he anticipated the embarrassment of meeting Eugenius after finally opting to side with Theodosius against him. Theodosius' triumph was naturally greeted by Ambrose with rejoicing, and the emperor's death not long afterwards in January 395 gave him the final opportunity to claim Theodosius as his own. The ebbs and flows which had marked their relations were speedily forgotten, and the bishop's eloquent funeral eulogy (De obitu Theodosii oratio) proclaimed Theodosius as a model Christian ruler and patron of a Nicene faith that had now definitively captured the West (Duval 1977: 274–91). Ambrose was himself to die just over two years later, on 4 April 397, from an illness incurred after a trip to Pavia, before the imperial dream was shattered, when Stilicho, the Vandal general whom Theodosius had appointed regent over his sons Honorius and Arcadius, lost control, and Milan itself became a potential prey to the invading Goths. His political prominence in these last years, under a governor whose Christianity was nominal, had not been so great, and he had been spared the turmoil of the cataclysmic times which lay ahead.

Ambrose had served his episcopate as a remarkably political figure, in close proximity to a succession of emperors and their courts, over a critical period in the history of the later Western empire. Against a disparate but powerful range of opponents (Cracco Ruggini 1974, who nevertheless overstates the degree to which they constituted an organized alliance), and in the face of often considerable tensions with the imperial powers, he had learned to develop a style which, for all its ambiguities, was outstandingly effective. Almost nothing about the process had been as straightforward as Ambrose had managed to make it seem; but manage he had. At once a kind of fusion of Old Testament prophet and judge and the epitome of the classical public man, he had skilfully succeeded in presenting himself as power-broker and spiritual mentor to the highest authorities, one capable of moving with assurance and impact at the ultimate levels of political influence, articulating a message which combined intellectual conviction and social respectability. It was a persona designed to reflect an unswerving belief that his version of truth would inevitably prevail, and that a Christianized empire meant the sure triumph of the Nicene faith, not just over the impieties of every theological alternative, but over the social and ethical structures of its cultural inheritance.

Creating an ecclesial community

When Ambrose assumed office, the Nicene-Arian divisions were only part of the problems afflicting the church in north Italy. The region's bishoprics, each with its own traditions and practices, were spread across a considerable area. Milan, for all its political significance, still needed to evolve an ecclesial identity distinct from Rome's by weaving its independent customs into a tighter and more confident package. The smaller sees required their larger neighbour to provide them with a kind of symbolic leadership. Milan had to find a way of being both the chief mediator of Rome's authority and the figurehead for a proudly particular northern church (Lizzi 1990; Humphries 1999). The obvious political instability of the 370s and 380s made the need for social cohesion within these communities all the greater. Ambrose was able to capitalize on a Zeitgeist which reflected both a sense of uncertainty and a growing perception of the need to consolidate the north Italian church within its own sphere.

His spirituality presupposed a dialectical tension between two worlds, the seen and the unseen, the literal and the spiritual, the temporal and the eternal (Seibel 1958). He carefully engendered what has aptly been described as a 'siege mentality', whereby the church, devoted to the service of Christ, the true 'emperor', was to be seen as surrounded by the evil forces of the saeculum (epitomized variously by Manichees, pagans and 'Arians' of every kind), whose constant determination, satanically inspired, was to bring about its downfall (Meslin 1967: 51, cited by Brown 1988: 347–8). He combined this rhetorical image of a spiritual warfare against the powers of darkness with a pragmatic exploitation of all the leverage that a Christianized imperial system could secure. His dream was for a church that would simultaneously dominate and transcend its social world. Catholic faith and Roman empire were bound together, but the church was to exercise a prophetic vocation to act as the critic and purifier of the residual corruption of the empire's ethos, for it had an eschatological destiny to surpass any merely human moral configurations. The sensualism, the self-absorption and the material iniquities which characterized the unregenerate human condition were to be decried then remedied in the ascesis of devotion to Christ (Dassmann 1965). The social distinctions presupposed by the world were to be overridden: rich and poor, court officials and illiterate peasants, would come together; the emperor was to worship alongside the most vulnerable members of society. To enter this community by baptism was to leave behind the pollution of the world and to become privy to the deep things of God, which only spiritual eyes could see. Sacramental initiation was a profoundly mystical process, its catechesis (Satterlee 2002) a disciplina arcani hedged about by solemn warnings about privilege and responsibility, and presided over by a sacerdotal class who were to be seen as the guardians of secret rites as awe-inspiring as those over which the Levites of old presided (Jacob 1990). Through the strictures of the system of public penance, the clerical hierarchy acted not only as gatekeepers but also as guarantors of in-house discipline. To be the populus Dei in Milan in the 380s was to be the spiritual offspring of patriarchs, prophets and apostles, in direct continuity with the elect of every age who had been summoned into a life which ascended beyond the standards accepted by a godless world; it was to be destined, at last, for a reward that was heavenly (Hahn 1969; Toscani 1974).

To be effective, the religious mystery of this 'true philosophy' required to be presented in a way that conveyed a powerful sense of cultural assurance. Ambrose's intellectual message was one plank in that strategy. Doubtless a large proportion of his hearers never identified the allusions to Greek texts which he paraded in his sermons, or the evocations of classical literature which lurked in his narratives of biblical stories, when phrases from Vergil and Terence slipped out almost subconsciously, or stereotyped characterizations of money-lenders, legacy-hunters or greedy merchants crept into his generalized moral disquisitions on contemporary social evils (Vasey 1982; Colish 2005). Reading the transcripts or reworked versions of these homilies today, his spontaneous, discursive articulations of scriptural texts may seem unappealing: they are not systematic expositions in any obvious sense. But the density of their style impressed those who first listened to them. When Ambrose preached (as he frequently did) on the Old Testament narratives – the patriarchs, the Psalms, the prophets – the sheer range of his textual reference (which regularly included allusions to the Septuagint, his preferred version, and to variant readings gleaned from authorities such as Origen's Hexapla) and the intensity of his delivery conveyed authority and passion, and a mind soaked in the idioms of a scriptural spirituality (Nauroy 1985; Graumann 1994). To the cultivated critics of court society, and to judges like Augustine who understood very well what to look for in an orator, Ambrose came across as a pastor and teacher who knew what he was about. Ambrose recast ancient accounts of moderation in light of a biblical anthropology. Along the way, he anticipated significant aspects of later Western thinking on natural law (Maes 1967), original sin (Homes Dudden 1935: 612–24), the transformation of the eucharistic elements (Johanny 1968), the veneration of Mary (Neumann 1962; see more generally, Hunter 2009), and the notion of a just war (Swift 1970). If his theological ideas were once seen as heavily derivative, modern scholarship has shown that his personal role in reshaping the concepts he imbibed from his exegetical sources could be significant (Lazzati 1960; Pizzolato 1965, 1978; Auf der Maur 1977; Lucchesi 1977; Savon 1977); his accounts of sacramental regeneration and the moral life of the baptized are profoundly influenced by his own reading of the divine salvific economy set forth in Christian scripture (Smith 2011). Ambrose was indeed a creative thinker. Enemies like Jerome may have mocked him as a plagiarist (Paredi 1964b), but what mattered in the end was that Ambrose's intellectual skills worked for those whom he needed to sway most – the movers and shakers of his own city and their social peers within a wider Italian radius (embracing Rome itself), who needed to be either convinced or reminded that the philosophy of the saeculum had been vanquished by a definitive revealed truth (Madec 1974; Lenox-Conyngham 1993). Through a programme of extensive writing, and by publishing redacted versions of his sermons as written treatises (for a basic summary of texts and editions, see Ramsey 1997: 55–68), he was able to drive the message home to as wide a literary public as possible (Colish 2005).

Another vital element in Ambrose's mission was his programme to dominate the physical landscape of his city (Mirabella Roberti 1984; Krautheimer 1987: 69–92). At the very time when he was most under pressure to yield official space to his opponents, he was also most intent on extending the presence of his own community through the rapid construction of churches. Milan came to be encircled by a string of massive new buildings outside the city walls: the Basilica Ambrosiana (Sant' Ambrogio), dedicated with such ceremony in 386, the emblem of Ambrose's claim to an ineradicable entry in the religious history of his city; the strikingly impressive Basilica Apostolorum (San Nazaro), the first cruciform basilica to appear in the West, modelled, like a number of its Eastern contemporaries, on Constantine's Apostoleion in Constantinople and built strategically on the route taken into Milan by Theodosius, who seems to have donated relics of the evangelists to be housed inside the church; and the Basilica Virginum (San Simpliciano), a smaller cruciform building constructed to the north of the city. (A fourth church, the Basilica Salvatoris (San Donighi) is attributed to Ambrose by later tradition, and marked on Krautheimer's plan of the city (Figure 57.3) but it is improbable that it is as old as the fourth century). The new churches were designed to symbolize that the social triumph of the Nicene cultus was irreversible. They were consecrated using liturgical language which was deliberately anti-Arian, and their architectural and decorative elaborations were intended to placard the wealth and status of the Nicene community's benefactors. The ecclesiastical establishment had traditionally been concentrated in the area around the central cathedral; now it had colonized suburbia.
Figure 57.3   Milan c. 400, showing location of fourth-century churches; from Krautheimer (1987: 73), by permission of the University of California Press

A third great feature in Ambrose's strategy was the reformation of his ecclesiastical hierarchy. In his early years, as we saw, his options in this area were limited; but by the second half of the 380s his retinue looked very different. Some of his clergy had perhaps been successfully converted to their leader's theological stance; a large proportion were very probably weeded out and replaced by younger men carefully selected for their malleability (it is also clear that there had been some attrition of staff during the Arian crisis: cf. Off. 1.72). Ambrose's most famous literary legacy, penned in the late 380s, is his De officiis, a treatise on moral responsibilities based upon Cicero's famous text of the same name and significantly influenced by his version of Stoic ethics (Davidson 2002). As Cicero wrote for his son, Marcus, and for a politically ambitious class of young Roman gentlemen living amidst the débâcle of the Republic in 44 BCE, Ambrose writes for his spiritual 'sons', the clergy of Milan. His aim is not to build bridges between the gospel and secular philosophy, or to create a systematic parody of a celebrated classical exemplar, but to adapt the Ciceronian paradigms to a new, Christian context, and to show that the old account of duties has been superseded by a moral framework which goes much further. His anticipated readers are not only ecclesiastics; he also intends the work to be perused by non-Christians who will be able to compare his exposition of biblical morality with the details of the Ciceronian text around which it is structured. For both classes of reader, his message is that a new élite has emerged, one that is concerned no longer with the service of the saeculum but with a nobler end, which it must realize by profounder means. To be in the service of God is to be called to a higher path of 'perfect duty', modelled on Christ's self-sacrifice and oriented towards conformity to his image. Many of the assumptions of the classical patterns of correct behaviour are still regarded as critical – clerics are to be paragons of 'seemliness', walking, talking and conducting themselves in a way which reveals a true self-mastery and 'manliness' (Kuefler 2001), and thus impressing a watching world with their social finesse. Some aspects of the cardinal virtues, notably of mental fortitude and temperance, remain very close to the Roman Stoic ideals. But others are quite different. Prudence is no longer viewed simply as practical good-sense: it is, in an ultimate sense, the fear and knowledge of God. Justice is not just about giving to each his or her own; it is also, supremely, about Christian charity, the civic euergetism (cf. generally Holman 2001; Brown 2002) of a new, spiritually commissioned officialdom (Becker 1994). The 'effeminacy' and uncouthness traditionally abhorred in the public figure no longer reflect mere ill-breeding; they now bespeak compromise with the defilements of the corrupt world of the flesh. The athleta Christi ('Christ's athlete') or the Dei miles ('God's soldier') is to be seen to be a conqueror over tendencies that are both aesthetically distasteful and repugnant to God; he is to be chaste, self-denying, altruistic, pure, heavenly-minded and conscious of his ultimate accountability to a divine judge. Virtue and expediency, rightly conceived, are the same thing precisely because each of them is directed towards and determined by the prospect of eschatological reward.

De officiis represents a literary dissemination of a vision which was also expressed through preaching, personal example and letter-writing (Zelzer 1997; Liebeschuetz 2005), and backed up locally by a strict code of discipline. Ambrose succeeded in surrounding himself with subordinates who followed the very norms which he himself had laboured to polish; his own priestly ideal, a distinctive synthesis of images drawn from the Hebrew cultus, the classical tradition and the Pastoral Epistles (Gryson 1968; Bonato 1987; Coppa 1992), was passed on. Evidently he had no shortage of clerical candidates: as a metropolitan see, regarded as a valuable springboard for ecclesiastical promotion, Milan attracted plenty of young men ready and willing to be schooled in the bishop's ways. From this mini-seminary environment, a number of his trainees went on to episcopal office elsewhere, sometimes directly (and controversially) through Ambrose's engineering. Through regular correspondence and personal contacts with these and other brethren whom he deemed worthy of direct encouragement and instruction, Ambrose built up a considerable network of loyal supporters throughout north Italy and beyond. By ensuring that these satellites looked to him as their leader and remained faithful to the standards he strove to inculcate, he saw to it that the next generation of leaders was equipped to reinforce the social dominance of their church as the new century dawned (Lizzi 1990). The episcopi of the future, having learned to style themselves in the same basic way as the patrons, guides and regulators of their communities, would head up an ecclesial hierarchy fashioned after their mentor's example (Davidson 2002: 1:73–95).

For Ambrose, in the end, the whole of life was about being seen to be Christian, and about the rendering of a Christian image that would impress a watching world. That is not to cast doubt on his sincerity, or to suggest that everything about him was a façade. His spiritual commitment and his scriptural reasoning deserve no such suspicion, and the seriousness of his quest to renovate a great deal of his Roman inheritance ought to be beyond dispute. In an age increasingly prone to privatize beliefs and morals, Christian communities today might indeed learn from his passionate concern to demonstrate the validity of his message, and to work out intellectual, social and political routes by which to commend it to its critics. In any case, Ambrose lived in a time and culture uniquely susceptible to the potency of the particular image he laboured to present, and by styling his ministry as he did he proved to be one of the major architects of catholicism's victory in the fourth-century West. We can hardly ignore the questionable realities of some of his methods, or the intellectual as well as political challenges which confronted his pursuit of cultural success at the confluence of different worlds. But if we can hold in our mind's eye both the remarkable nature of his achievements and the complexity of his tactics, we may at least avoid some of the mistakes into which earlier historians have fallen. We may, in fact, have begun to glimpse the only Ambrose who ultimately matters.

Bibliography

Auf der Maur, H. J. (1977) Das Psalmenverständnis des Ambrosius von Mailand: Ein Beitrag zum Deutungshintergrund der Psalmenverwendung im Gottesdienst der alten Kirche. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Ayres, L. (2004) Nicaea and its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Barnes, T. D. (2000) 'Ambrose and the basilicas of Milan in 385 and 386: The primary documents and their implications', Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 4: 282–99.

Becker, M. (1994) Die Kardinaltugenden bei Cicero und Ambrosius: De officiis. Basel, Switzerland: Schwabe.

Berndt, G. M. and Steinacher, R. (eds) (2014) Arianism: Roman Heresy and Barbarian Creed. Farnham, UK and Burlington, VT: Ashgate.

Biermann, M. (1995) Die Leichenrede des Ambrosius von Mailand: Rhetorik, Predigt, Politik. Stuttgart, Germany: Steiner.

Bonato, A. (1987) 'L'idea del sacerdozio in S. Ambrogio', Augustinianum 27: 423–64.

Brown, P. R. L. (1981) The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. London: SCM Press.

Brown, P. R. L. (1988) The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.

Brown, P. R. L. (1992) Power and Persuasion in Late Antiquity: Towards a Christian Empire. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press.

Brown, P. R. L. (2002) Poverty and Leadership in the Later Roman Empire. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England for Brandeis University Press.

Brown, P. R. L. (2012) Through the Eye of a Needle: Wealth, the Fall of Rome, and the Making of Christianity in the West, 350–550 AD. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Burns, T. S. (1974) 'The battle of Adrianople: A reconsideration', Historia 22: 336–45.

Burrus, V. (2000) 'Begotten, Not Made': Conceiving Manhood in Late Antiquity. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Chadwick, H. (1976) Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Colish, M. L. (2002) 'Why the Portiana? Reflections on the basilica crisis of 386', Journal of Early Christian Studies 10: 361–72.

Colish, M. L. (2005) Ambrose's Patriarchs: Ethics for the Common Man. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Coppa, G. (1992) 'Istanze formative e pastorali del presbitero nella vita e nelle opere di Sant' Ambrogio', in Sergio, F. (ed.) La formazione al sacerdozio ministeriale nella catechesi e nella testimonianza di vita dei Padri: Convegno di studio e aggiornamento, Facoltà di Lettere cristiane e classiche (Pontificium Institutum Altioris Latinitatis), Roma 15–17 marzo 1990. Rome: LAS, 95–132.

Courcelle, P. (1968) Recherches sur les 'Confessions' de saint Augustin, 2nd ed. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Courcelle, P. (1973) Recherches sur saint Ambroise. 'Vies' anciennes, culture, iconographie. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Cracco Ruggini, L. (1974) 'Ambrogio e le opposizioni anticattoliche fra il 383 e il 390', Augustinianum 14: 409–49.

Dassmann, E. (1965) Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius von Mailand. Quellen und Entfaltung. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff.

Dassmann, E. (1975) 'Ambrosius und die Märtyrer', Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum 18: 49–68.

Davidson, I. J. (2002) Ambrose, De officiis: Edited with an introduction, translation, and commentary, 2 vols. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

De Labriolle, P. (1928) The Life and Times of St. Ambrose. ET. St. Louis, MO and London: Herder.

Doignon, J. (1956) 'Perspectives ambrosiennes: SS. Gervais et Protais, génies de Milan', Revue des Etudes Augustiniennes 2: 313–34.

Dunkle, B. P. (2016) Enchantment and Creed in the Hymns of Ambrose of Milan. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Duval, Y.-M. (1974) 'L'originalité du "De virginibus" dans le mouvement ascétique occidental: Ambroise, Cyprien, Athanase', in Duval, Y.-M. (ed.) Ambroise de Milan. XVIe Centenaire de son élection épiscopale. Dix études. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes, 9–66.

Duval, Y.-M. (1976) 'Ambroise, de son élection à sa consécration', in Lazzati, G. (ed.) Ambrosius Episcopus: Atti del Congresso internazionale di studi ambrosiani nel XVI centenario della elevazione di Sant' Ambrogio alla cattedra episcopale (Milano, 2–7 dec. 1974). Milan, Italy: Vita e Pensiero, 243–83.

Duval, Y.-M. (1977) 'Formes profanes et formes bibliques dans les oraisons funèbres de saint Ambroise', in Fuhrmann, M. (ed.) Christianisme et formes littéraires de l'Antiquité tardive en Occident. Geneva: Fondation Hardt, 235–91.

Faller, O. (1942) 'La data della consecrazione vescovile di Sant' Ambrogio', in Ambrosiana: scritti di storia, archeologia ed arte pubblicati nel XVI centenario della nascita di Sant' Ambrogio, CCXL–MCMXL. Milan, Italy: Arturo Faccioli, 97–112.

Fischer, B. (1970) 'Hat Ambrosius von Mailand in der Woche zwischen seiner Taufe und seiner Bischofskonsekration andere Weihen empfangen?', in Granfield, P. and Jungman, J. A. (eds) Kyriakon: Festschrift Johannes Quasten, 2 vols. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff, 2: 527–31.

Fischer, B. (1984) 'Ist Ambrosius wirklich in Trier geboren?', in Dassmann, E. and Thraede, K. (eds) Vivarium: Festschrift Theodor Klauser zum 90. Geburtstag. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff, 132–5.

Fontaine, J. (1992) Saint Ambroise: Hymnes, texte établi, traduit et annoté. Paris: du Cerf.

Gottlieb, G. (1973) Ambrosius von Mailand und Kaiser Gratian. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Gottlieb, G. (1985) 'Der Mailänder Kirchenstreit von 385/386: Datierung, Verlauf, Deutung', Museum Helveticum 42: 37–55.

Graumann, T. (1994) Christus Interpres. Die Einheit von Auslegung und Verkündigung in der Lukaserklärung des Ambrosius von Mailand. Berlin and New York: De Gruyter.

Grig, L. (2004) Making Martyrs in Late Antiquity. London: Duckworth.

Gryson, R. (1968) Le prêtre selon saint Ambroise. Louvain, Belgium: Edition Orientaliste.

Gryson, R. (1980) 'Les élections épiscopales en Occident au IVe siècle', Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 75: 257–83.

Hahn, V. (1969) Das wahre Gesetz: Eine Untersuchung der Auffassung des Ambrosius von Mailand vom Verhältnis der beiden Testamente. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff.

Hanson, R. P. C. (1988) The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–81. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.

Heather, P. J. and Matthews, J. F. (1991) The Goths in the Fourth Century. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Holman, S. R. (2001) The Hungry are Dying: Beggars and Bishops in Roman Cappadocia. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Homes Dudden, F. (1935) The Life and Times of St. Ambrose, 2 vols. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Humphries, M. (1999) Communities of the Blessed: Social Environment and Religious Change in Northern Italy, AD 200–400. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hunter, D. G. (2009) Marriage, Celibacy, and Heresy in Ancient Christianity: The Jovinianist Controversy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Inglebert, H. (1996) Les romains chrétiens face à l'histoire de Rome. Histoire, christianisme et romanités en Occident dans l'Antiquité tardive (IIIe–IVe siècles). Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Jacob, C. (1990) 'Arkandisziplin', Allegorese, Mystagogie: ein neuer Zugang zur Theologie des Ambrosius von Mailand. Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany: Hain.

Johanny, R. (1968) L'eucharistie, centre de l'histoire du salut chez saint Ambroise de Milan. Paris: Beuachesne.

Kaufman, P. I. (1997) 'Diehard homoians and the election of Ambrose', Journal of Early Christian Studies 5: 421–40.

Klein, R. (1972) Der Streit um dem Victoriaaltar: Die Dritte Relatio des Symmachus und die Briefe 17, 18 und 57 des Mailänder Bischofs Ambrosius. Darmstadt, Germany: Wiss. Buchgesch.

Krautheimer, R. (1987) Three Christian Capitals: Topography and Politics. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Kuefler, M. (2001) The Manly Eunuch: Masculinity, Gender Ambiguity, and Christian Ideology in Late Antiquity. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press.

Lazzati, G. (1960) Il valore letterario della esegesi Ambrosiana. Milan, Italy: Archivio Ambrosiano.

Lenox-Conyngham, A. (1982a) 'The judgement of Ambrose the bishop on Ambrose the Roman governor', Studia Patristica 17: 62–5.

Lenox-Conyngham, A. (1982b) 'The topography of the basilica conflict of AD 385/6 in Milan', Historia 31: 353–63.

Lenox-Conyngham, A. (1993) 'Ambrose and philosophy', in Wickham, L. R. and Bammel, C. P. (eds) Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy in Late Antiquity: Essays in Tribute to George Christopher Stead. Vigiliae Christianae suppl. 19. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 112–28.

Liebeschuetz, J. H. W. G. (2005) Ambrose of Milan: Political Letters and Speeches, Translated with an introduction and notes. Translated Texts for Historians. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Liebeschuetz, J. H. W. G. (2011) Ambrose and John Chrysostom: Clerics between Desert and Empire. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Lizzi, R. (1990) 'Ambrose's contemporaries and the Christianization of Northern Italy', Journal of Roman Studies 80: 156–73.

Lucchesi, E. (1977) L'usage de Philon dans l'œuvre exégétique de saint Ambroise. Une 'Quellenforschung' relative aux commentaires d'Ambroise sur la Genèse. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

MacMullen, R. (1990) 'The historical role of the masses in late antiquity', in MacMullen, R. (ed.) Changes in the Roman Empire: Essays in the Ordinary. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 250–76, 385–93.

Madec, G. (1974) Saint Ambroise et la philosophie. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Maes, B. (1967) La loi naturelle selon Ambroise de Milan. Paris: Presses de l'Université Grégorienne.

Maier, H. O. (1994) 'Private space as the social context of Arianism in Ambrose's Milan', Journal of Theological Studies 45: 72–93.

Markschies, C. (1995) Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie: Kirchen- und theologiegeschichtliche Studien zu Antiarianismus und Neunizänismus bei Ambrosius und an lateinischen Westen (364–381 n. Chr.). Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck.

Matthews, J. (1975) Western Aristocracies and Imperial Court, AD 364–425. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Mazzarino, S. (1989) Storia sociale del vescovo Ambrogio. Rome: Bretschneider.

McLynn, N. B. (1991) 'The "apology" of Palladius: Nature and purpose', Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 42: 52–76.

McLynn, N. B. (1994) Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in a Christian Capital. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Meslin, M. (1964) 'Nationalisme, Etat et religions à la fin du IVe siècle', Archives de sociologie des religions 18: 3–20.

Meslin, M. (1967) Les Ariens d'Occident. Paris: De Seuil, 335–430.

Millar, F. G. B. (1992) 'The Jews of the Graeco-Roman diaspora, AD 312–438', in Lieu, J., North, J. and Rajak, T. (eds) The Jews among Pagans and Christians in the Roman Empire. London: Routledge, 97–123.

Mirabella Roberti, M. (1984) Milano Romano. Milan, Italy: Rusconi.

Moorhead, J. (1999) Ambrose: Church and Society in the Late Roman World. London and New York: Longman.

Nauroy, G. (1985) 'L'Ecriture dans la pastorale d'Ambroise de Milan', in Fontaine, J. and Pietri, E. (eds) La Bible de tous les temps 2: Le monde latin antique et la Bible. Paris: Beauchesne, 371–408.

Nauroy, G. (1988) 'Le fouet et le miel. Le combat d'Ambroise en 386 contre l'Arianisme Milanais', Recherches Augustiniennes 23: 3–86.

Nautin, P. (1974) 'Les premières relations d'Ambroise avec l'empereur Gratien' in Duval, Y.-M. (ed.) Ambroise de Milan: Dix études. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes, 229–44.

Neumann, C. W. (1962) The Virgin Mary in the Works of Saint Ambrose. Fribourg, Switzerland: Fribourg University Press.

Palanque, J.-R. (1933) Saint Ambroise et l'Empire romain. Contribution à l'histoire des rapports de l'Eglise et de l'Etat à la fin du quatrième siècle. Paris: de Boccard.

Paredi, A. (1964a) Saint Ambrose: His Life and Times. ET. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.

Paredi, A. (1964b) 'Gerolamo e S. Ambrogio', in Mélanges E. Tisserant 5: Studi e Testi 235. Vatican City: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, 183–98.

Pizzolato, L. F. (1965) La 'Explanatio Psalmorum XII'. Studio letterario sulla esegesi di Sant' Ambrogio. Milan, Italy: Archivio Ambrosiano.

Pizzolato, L. F. (1978) La dottrina esegetica di Sant' Ambrogio. Milan, Italy: Vita e Pensiero.

Pizzolato, L. F. (ed.) (1997) Nec timeo mori. Atti del Congresso Internazionale di Studi Ambrosiani nel XVI centenario della morte di Ambrogio, a Milano 4–11 aprile 1997 (2 Vols). Milan, Italy: Vita e Pensiero.

Ramsey, B. (1997) Ambrose. London and New York: Routledge.

Rapp, C. (2005) Holy Bishops in Late Antiquity: The Nature of Christian Leadership in an Age of Transition. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Riggi, C. (1980) 'La verginità nel pensiero di S. Ambrogio', Salesianum 42: 789–806.

Salzman, M. R. (2002) The Making of a Christian Aristocracy: Social and Religious Change in the Western Roman Empire. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Satterlee, C. A. (2002) Ambrose of Milan's Method of Mystagogical Preaching. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press/Pueblo.

Savon, H. (1977) Saint Ambroise devant l'exégèse de Philon le Juif. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Savon, H. (1980) 'La première oraison funèbre de saint Ambroise (De excessu fratris I) et les deux sources de la consolation chrétienne', Revue des études latines 58: 370–402.

Savon, H. (1989) 'Un modèle de sainteté à la fin du IVe siècle: la virginité dans l'œuvre de saint Ambroise', in Marx, J. (ed.) Sainteté et martyre dans les religions du Livre. Brussels: Editions de l'Université des Bruxelles, 21–31.

Savon, H. (1997) Ambroise de Milan (340–397). Paris: Desclée.

Seibel, W. (1958) Fleisch und Geist beim heiligen Ambrosius. Munich, Germany: Zink.

Smith, J. W. (2011) Christian Grace and Pagan Virtue: The Theological Foundations of Ambrose's Ethics. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Sordi, M. (1988) 'La concezione politica di Ambrogio', in I Christiani e l'Impero nel IV secolo. Atti del congresso di Macerata (17–18 decembro 1987). Macerata, Italy: Università degli Studi, 143–54.

Swift, L. J. (1970) 'St. Ambrose on violence and war', Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association 101: 533–43.

Toscani, G. (1974) Teologia della Chiesa in Sant' Ambrogio. Milan, Italy: Vita e Pensiero.

Vaggione, R. P. C. (2000) Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Van Haeringen, J. H. (1937) 'De Valentiniano II et Ambrosio. Illustrantur et diguruntur res anno 386 gestae: Valentinianus II basilicam adornitur (De Ambrosii Epistula XX)', Mnemosyne ser. 3(5): 28–33, 152–8, 229–40.

Vasey, V. R. (1982) The Social Ideas in the Works of St. Ambrose: A Study on De Nabuthe. Rome: Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum.

Von Campenhausen, H. F. (1929) Ambrosius von Mailand als Kirchenpolitiker. Berlin and Leipzig, Germany: De Gruyter.

Wilken, R. L. (1983) John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late 4th Century. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Williams, D. H. (1994) 'When did the Emperor Gratian return the basilica to the Pro-Nicenes in Milan?', Studia Patristica 24: 208–15.

Williams, D. H. (1995) Ambrose of Milan and the End of the Nicene-Arian Conflicts. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Willis, G. (2012) Font of Life: Ambrose, Augustine, and the Mystery of Baptism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Wytzes, J. (1936) Der Streit um den Altar der Viktoria. Die Texte der betreffenden Schriften des Symmachus und Ambrosius. Amsterdam & Paris.

Zangara, V. (1981) 'L'inventio dei martiri Gervasio e Protasio. Testimonianze di Agostino su un fenomeno di religiosita popolare', Augustianum 21: 119–33.

Zelzer, M. (1987) 'Ambrosius von Mailand und das Erbe der klassischen Tradition', Wiener Studien 100: 201–26.

Zelzer, M. (1997) 'Vescovi e pastori alla luce delle lettere ambrosiane', in Vescovi e pastori in epoca teodosiana. In occasione del XVI centenario della consacrazione episcopale di s. Agostino, 396–1996. XXV Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità Cristiana, Roma, 8–11 maggio 1996. 2 vols. Rome: Instititum Patristicum Augustinianum. 2: 559–68.

58

AUGUSTINE

Carol Harrison

The importance of Augustine for Western Christianity cannot be over-estimated.[1] Born in Africa in 354, he spent almost half of his life as the bishop of the North African seaport, Hippo Regius (modern Annaba, Algeria). Here, drawing on his classical education, his former career as a rhetor, and his experience as a priest, preacher, teacher and pastor, he turned his brilliant mind, his persuasive and moving eloquence, and his deep devotion and love of God, to reflect on Christian faith and life for his congregation, and in the process almost singlehandedly transformed the Western Church into the one we recognise today. He preached over 8,000 sermons, which were recorded by scribes; he was the most prolific early Christian theologian, and more has been written on him than any other figure in the Western tradition (with the exception, perhaps, of Shakespeare!).

Figure 58.1   Mosaic from Utica in Tunisia depicting olive cultivation. Photo: J. C. N. Coulston

Augustine's birthplace was the small, traditionally Berber town of Thagaste (modern Souk Ahras, Algeria) in the eastern part of Numidia. His father, Patrick, belonged to that class of modest land-owners who were permanently impoverished by the enormous tax burdens imposed by the emperor, which, as a town councillor (decurion or curiale) he was either obliged to collect from peasant tenants (coloni) or pay himself (see Chapter 1 of this volume).

Patrick obviously entertained higher aspirations for his son and was aware that the best way to advance his prospects was to ensure that he obtained that universally recognised, exclusive and dis-tinguishing marker of social prestige and office: a traditional Roman education. This began with the school of grammar in Thagaste where he would have learnt to read a text and study the disciplines of the liberal arts, and then, thanks to a wealthy patron, he went to the school of rhetoric, the art of public speaking, at Madura and Carthage.

The office of rhetor was the highest goal of late antique education; thus, in deciding to become a teacher of rhetoric Augustine entered an aristocracy, not of birth, but of educational formation.[2] He taught at Carthage (376–383) and Rome (383–384) and was eventually appointed to the municipal chair of rhetoric in Milan (384), the imperial capital. From here he could well have aspired to a pro-vincial governorship and to senatorial rank. Instead, in 386, at the age of 32 he abandoned his career, broke off his arranged marriage, relinquished any future hope of financial security or worldly status, and converted to Christianity.

Figure 58.2   St. Augustine taken to School by St. Monica, by Nicolo di Pietra (1413–1415), Pinacoteca, Vatican. Photo Wikimedia Commons

Why? Augustine's answer is to be found in his well-known Confessions.[3] Here we can read his own account of his life (from infancy, childhood, school, adolescence . . .) and his intellectual journey in search of wisdom, the true philosophy. His autobiographical account of his conversion to Christianity in Books 1–9 is presented as a microcosm of the conversion of creation towards God in Books 11–13, where he comments upon Genesis 1–3. (Book 10 reflects upon his present life as a fallen human being in a fallen world, and therefore on how conversion is not so much the end, as the beginning of his search for God).

The problem with the Confessions is that, like all autobiographies, it was written with the benefit of retrospective reflection and interpretation at least ten years after the events he recounts (397–401). They are therefore fundamentally anachronistic and frustrate any attempt to find out what really happened: Augustine had too many critics, too much to defend and justify, too much to teach and recommend to his readers, too much cultural 'baggage', for this. The Confessions must therefore be read on his terms.

Conversion of the mind, heart and will

He would obviously like to portray himself as a rather dissolute youth: fighting for milk at his mother's breast, failing to learn Greek at school, stealing pears, enjoying adolescent sexual adventures, deceiving his despairing mother, unable to remain chaste – all this to demonstrate his own sinfulness and the operation of God's grace in bringing him willingly to embrace Christianity.

He also conveys a sense of intellectual earnestness: he read and understood Aristotle's Ten Categories at an early age, was tormented by the question of evil and at the age of nineteen was fired by Cicero's Exhortation to Philosophy (a text book he read while studying rhetoric) to seek for wisdom, the true philosophy. Turning to the Christian scriptures, his cultured sensibilities found them quite rebarbative – they were 'unworthy to be compared to the majesty of Cicero'. Instead, he became a member of a dualistic, ascetic, gnostic-type religious sect, founded upon the teaching of the prophet Mani (born in Babylonia in 216 CE; see Chapter 46 in this volume). For a time the Manichees seemed to offer Augustine everything for which he had been searching: they claimed to represent a true and purified form of Christianity and criticised precisely those aspects of it which Augustine too had found problematic (contradictory, seemingly immoral scriptures; an anthropomorphic conception of God; an emphasis on faith and authority).[4] He found the communal nature of the sect, its extensive, lavishly illustrated scriptures and above all, its attempt to distance itself from evil matter by extreme asceticism in its 'elect' deeply attractive, even though he himself felt unable to embrace celibacy and joined the lower rank of 'hearers'. At some stage during the nine years he remained in the sect disillusionment began to set in: their claim to possess truth was revealed as mere pseudo-science, their asceticism proved to be more a matter of words than of practice, their dualism raised more problems than it solved, and the much acclaimed Manichee, Faustus, failed to answer any of these problems. On finally breaking with them, Augustine despaired of ever finding the truth, and hints at a period of scepticism in the Confessions.

During this period Augustine moved from Rome to the imperial capital, Milan, to take up the municipal chair of rhetoric, secured for him through the influence of Manichaean friends, and it was while he was in Milan that two decisive encounters occurred which completely transformed his thought. The first was with what he describes as 'some books of the Platonists, translated from Greek into Latin' (Confessions 7.9.13). It is unclear what exactly Augustine read; scholars generally conclude that it was probably some Latin translations of the Enneads of Plotinus (204–270 CE) (he could not read Greek with any great facility) and maybe some translations of Plotinus' editor and disciple, Porphyry (232–300).[5] Whatever the works were, they revolutionised his thought, in particular, their insight that the true nature of reality was spiritual. Augustine was finally able to free himself from the prevailing materialism of the thinkers of his day, including the Manichees, to find a convincing alternative to anthropomorphic conceptions of God, finally to discover an answer to the problem of evil (as a privation of the good) and to understand himself as a spiritual being who might find truth in the God who is both the foundation of himself and who transcends him.

The second encounter was with Ambrose, bishop of Milan, whom Augustine heard preach (see Chapter 57 in the volume). Part of Augustine's acquaintance with Neoplatonism no doubt came through his sermons, but what especially struck him at this time was Ambrose's allegorical, spiritual exegesis of scripture, which overcame all the objections which the Manichees' literal, rationalisitic exegesis had posed.

In recounting these events in his Confessions, Augustine obviously wishes to persuade his reader (and, of course, himself) of the rational, logical force of the religion he had embraced. In doing so he would have in mind his own critics, who doubted the genuineness of his conversion, and questioned, for example, whether he had really left Manichaeism behind, and also his intellectual peers, to whom Christianity (and especially its scriptures) appeared somewhat illogical, absurd, crude and rather distasteful, and who criticised its credulity in putting faith in authority before reason.

The final dramatic moment of conversion is, however, not a scene of intellectual argument and proof, but a highly emotional turning of his heart and will towards God. The Confessions are, in fact, one of the first works of Antiquity to reveal a keen sense and candid portrait of the writer's inner self: his emotions, affections, the intricate and confusing workings of his mind and the depths of his subconscious. This is reflected in their highly charged, vivid poetic language, in dialogue with God.

Describing his gradual ascent towards God in Neoplatonic terms in Book 10, Augustine concludes with the realisation that in fact, he had no need to seek for Him, since God had always been graciously present, calling to him, as seen in the almost rhapsodic 27th chapter.

Sero te amavi, pulchritudo tam antiqua et tam nova, sero te amavi! et ecce intus eras et ego foris, et ibi te quaerebam, et in ista formosa, quae fecisti, deformis inruebam. mecum eras, et tecum non eram. ea me tenebant longe a te, quae si in te non essent, non essent. vocasti et clamasti et rupisti surditatem meam: corucasti, splenduisti et fugasti caecitatem meam: fragrasti, et duxi spiritum, et anhelo tibi, gustavi et esurio et sitio, tetigisti me, et exarsi in pacem tuam.	Late have I loved you, Beauty so ancient and so new, late have I loved you. Yes, you were inside me while I was outside myself. I sought you there and – in my deformity – rushed upon the lovely things of your creation. You were with me, but I was not with you. Holding me far from you were objects which would have had no existence if they did not exist in you. You called! You cried! You shattered my deafness. You glistened! You shone! You put my blindness to flight. You gave off your fragrance and I drew in breath, so now I breathe for you. I tasted you and now I hunger and thirst for you. You touched me, and I am afire for your peace. (Augustine, The Confessions 10.27, ET Philip F. Esler)

In Confessions 8 he describes the actual moment of his conversion as inspired by a divinely graced reading of a passage from the apostle Paul: hearing a voice chanting tolle lege ('take up and read'), he opened the copy of Paul's epistles which he had been reading in the garden of his lodgings at Milan and his eyes fell upon Rom. 13:13, 'Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and impurities, not in contention and envy, but put on the Lord Jesus Christ and make not provision for the flesh in its concupiscences' (Confessions 8.12.29). Augustine's final conversion was one of his will, away from the temptations, distractions and allurements of the world to true celibacy (continentia) – a single-minded, single-hearted devotion to God.

Conversion from Christianity to Christianity

Perhaps most importantly, (and most anachronistically?) he describes his search for truth against the ever-present backdrop of Christianity, as if he was never not a Christian but was merely seeking to reconcile himself to it: he had drunk it in with his mother Monica's milk; he had been dedicated to it as a child; when he read Cicero the only thing he found lacking was the name of Christ; the Manichees attracted him because they claimed to be true Christians (integri Christiani); the Sceptics he rejected because Christ was absent from their thought; the Platonists he measured against Christian thought and found wanting. Obviously this way of presenting his conversion again serves to dem-onstrate the insuperable operation of God's grace, this time in a rather errant intellectual, but more to the point, it passes judgement upon the philosophers and religious cults of Augustine's day and vindicates Christianity as the 'true philosophy' and 'true religion', with Christ as the 'one mediator' between God and humanity. Whereas the philosphers would proudly maintain that truth is accessible to reason or through the cult of the gods,[6] Augustine affirms in the Confessions that it is only acces-sible through the revelation and mediatorship of Christ, and that it is only appropriated by humble faith, hope and love in him. Augustine often uses Rom. 1:19–23 to demonstrate the philosophers' insight into the truth:

> For what can be known about God is plain to them; because God has shown it to them. Ever since the creation of the world, his invisible nature, namely, his eternal power and deity, has been clearly perceived in the things that have been made.

But the verses which follow demonstrate the philosophers' pride and guilt, because, although they thereby knew God, they:

> [d]id not give thanks to him as God, but became futile in their thinking, and their senseless minds were darkened. Claiming to be wise they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images resembling mortal man or birds or animals or reptiles.

The doctrine of the Fall

What was it that brought about this decisive break with his own past life and habits on the one hand, and with ancient philosophy on the other, to precipitate his conversion to such a distinctive form of Christianity? The apostle Paul provides a clue.

Paul was being read and commented upon by many of Augustine's contemporaries, and in the early years of the 390s, Augustine undertook a series of works on Romans and Galatians.[7] It was here that he found the material to articulate his understanding of the nature of moral evil, free will and grace. The question of evil had haunted Augustine from the very beginning of his search for truth, because it, more than anything else, militated against the Christian belief in an omnipotent, just and loving Creator God. The Manichees' dualistic explanation, which attributed evil to matter, but not to the transcendent God, for a while satisfied him, but later raised more problems than it solved: how could God be omnipotent if an independent force of evil could overcome the good? He found an answer to these problems in the notion (probably discovered in Plotinus) that evil is a privation of the good: that everything that exists is good, but insofar as it turns away from the good, it moves towards non-being and thereby becomes evil. Reflecting on his own experience of evil by characteristically turning within in order to analyse his own inner experiences, emotions and passions, he vividly depicts the vitiated, flawed operation of his will, alienated and dissociated from itself, knowing the good but unable to act upon it and thus locates the origin of evil in the turning of the human will away from the good. This was confirmed for him by Paul's portrait of his divided will in Rom. 7:15: 'For that which I do I allow not: for what I would, that do I not:

but what I hate, that do I' (although this is very much Paul interpreted by Augustine: as Krister Stendahl has suggested, the sense of agonised interiority which Augustine describes was probably not Paul's own experience [Stendahl 1963]).

In the earlier commentaries on Paul, he seems to have entertained the possibility that God's election of a sinful human being was based on merit, on the person's choice of faith and anticipation of God's grace, and that it was in this way that someone moved from being under the law to being under grace. In a letter written to his friend, the priest Simplicianus, in 396, however, he sets forth, explicitly, a doctrine of original sin which leaves no room for merit, but makes everything hinge upon the operation of God's grace.

In response to Simplicianus' question concerning the fates of Esau and Jacob, which seem to have been determined before their birth, he expounds an uncompromising doctrine of the fallenness of humankind – of human beings as a massa peccati, 'one lump in which the original guilt [of Adam] remains throughout' (Letter to Simplicianus 2.17, 20) – of the culpability of all human beings, their inability to do the good and the unmerited grace of God which can alone, regardless of faith, reason or works, inspire in them a delight in the good. Romans 7 is therefore interpreted as a portrait of humankind under grace, unable to do anything but sin without the inspiration of God's grace which moves a person's will to delight in the good: 'if these things delight us which serve our advancement towards God, that is due not to our own whim or industry or meritorious works, but to the inspiration of God and to the grace he bestows' (To Simplicianus 2.21).

The doctrine of original sin was not, however, Augustine's invention, rather, he was able to draw upon African tradition, not least Cyprian (who also used it to justify the baptism of infants) and Ambrose.[8] He also appeals to a number of scriptural texts, especially 1 Cor. 15:22, 'As in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be given life', and Rom. 5:12, 'in whom [sc. Adam] all sinned' (though, in fact, they are all probably either mistranslated or misconstrued[9]). The doctrine of original sin also makes him incline towards a traducianist (that all souls are derived from that of the first man and handed on from one generation to the next) rather than a creationist (that a particular soul is created for each individual) explanation of the soul's origin. But it is his own experience of humanity's inveterate sinfulness, of the inner conflicts and incapacity of his will, which seems to have provided him with decisive proof of man's falleness. Most especially, it is humankind's concupiscence, their disordered lust, evidenced most forcefully in sexual intercourse, which provides, for Augustine, decisive proof of their subjection to original sin. The will or reason no longer controls the body in the ordered and harmonious fashion which would have characterised all its operations, including intercourse,[10] before the Fall; rather our actions are now characterised by disordered and uncontrolled concupiscence.

In the texts where he discusses the Fall,[11] however, Augustine is at a loss as to how to explain why Adam's will first turned away from his Creator and disobeyed His commandment. He suggests that perhaps the defection of Adam's will was attributable to his original creation from nothing, so that he is liable to move back to nothingness; that Eve, who was the first to be seduced by the serpent, was not yet as advanced in knowledge as Adam; that Adam, in 'friendly benevolence', went along with Eve, rather than abandon her; that he did not think God would deal with him so harshly; that Adam and Eve were already beginning to turn towards themselves in pride; that God foreknew the greater good he would bring from their sin and allowed the serpent to tempt them.

Whatever the reason for the Fall, it meant that Adam and Eve, already mortal, were no longer on the path to immortality but justly subject to death. They no longer enjoyed a direct, intuitive knowledge of God or of each other, but became dependent upon language and signs in order to communicate, a means fraught with difficulties and open to misrepresentation, deception and ambiguity. In turning away from God, they abandoned the source or their existence, that which gave it order, unity and harmony, and thereby found their attention fragmented, scattered and dispersed, attached and held as with glue to the temporal, mutable things to which they had turned. They became aliens and exiles from their true home; deaf and blind to the truth, subject to the whims of their vitiated will. They were wholly dependent upon the work of God's grace to heal their faculties and to enable them to desire and move towards their lost homeland. Such is Augustine's depiction of all human beings in this life.

Augustine's reflections on original sin, which are in fact present from his earliest works, are the background against which he interpreted, and chose to present, his conversion as the working of God's grace upon a mind which was, in fact, fundamentally alienated and dissociated from itself, which could not apprehend the truth, or will to act, without the revelation of God's grace in the incarnate Son to inspire his faith, hope and love. They also explain his rather daunting post-conversion portrait of himself in Confessions Book 10, as someone still subject to temptation, still prone to sin and still wholly dependent upon the grace of Christ, the mediator between God and human beings.[12]

Priest, bishop and monk

For Augustine, conversion to Christianity meant embracing celibacy. Obviously this was not a strict requirement, but it seems that he would be satisfied with nothing less than what he regarded as the acme of the Christian life. Why this was the case is difficult to establish. The highest rank of the Manichees, Augustine's former co-religionists, were distinguished by their celibacy. Asceticism, frequently expressed as celibacy, had long been the ideal of the philosophic life. The ascetic spirit, fostered by the likes of Tertullian, Cyprian and Ambrose in the West, had made significant inroads into Christian life and practice following the conversion of Constantine in 312, as an effective means of keeping alive the martyr spirit and of resisting 'secularisation'. Augustine's first encounter with the famous Life of Antony, the Egyptian ascetic, and the story of two civil servants who had embraced celibacy on reading it for the first time, had been very influential in precipitating his conversion. Above all, Augustine seems to have possessed a natural monastic spirit,[13] which found its true home in a community of like-minded individuals, pursuing a common life, in friendship and love. After his baptism in Milan in 387, he immediately set about realising this ideal in a retreat with family and friends at a country villa in the north Italian village of Cassiciacum, where he also began a series of works on such classical subjects as the nature of wisdom, scepticism, the happy life and order.

Although intending to return to his native town of Thagaste with his mother, Monica, and friends to carry out their 'holy enterprise' (Confessions 9.9.2), presumably establishing a community, he was forced to spend a year in Rome, due to a blockade of the Mediterranean in 387–388. Here he no doubt became better acquainted with the vigorous ascetic movements and debates which characterised fourth-century Rome, and encountered for the first time male and female monastic houses organised following eastern models.[14]

In Thagaste he established a lay community of servi dei, or servants of God, spending his time in fasting, prayer, study and good works.[15] There he completed a number of works which are more distinctively Christian in their concern with exegesis of scripture, the Church, faith and the Incarnation, than those written at Cassiciacum.[16] Although he tells us that he was careful not to visit towns which needed a bishop, it was while visiting a possible recruit for the Thagaste community in Hippo, in 392, that he was laid hold of by the congregation and forcibly ordained priest in order to help their own ageing bishop, Valerius. Quickly realising the exceptional qualities of his priest, Valerius ensured he could not be snatched away by a neighbouring diocese, by (somewhat irregularly) ordaining him co-adjutor bishop, to succeed him on his death. Thus Augustine was to spend the rest of his life as priest and from 396, as bishop of Hippo.

He also continued to pursue a communal life, first in a lay monastery in the garden of the basilica, and then, as bishop, in a clerical monastery established in the bishop's house.[17] His Rule is explicitly modelled on the first Christian communities of Acts in its emphasis on the unity in charity of the common life of its members, with 'one heart and soul' directed towards God, putting the interests of the community before personal interest.[18] Its primary concern is not with asceticism, 'holiness' or celibacy, but with the social, ethical aspects of life lived in common. The monastic vocation was the closest Augustine thought human beings might come, in this life, to overcoming the self-referential pride which had fractured society in the Fall, and of approximating to the social life of the saints – even though, in practice, the community fell far short of such ideals and inevitably shared the unavoidable ambiguity of Christian life in a fallen, vitiated world.

From the moment of his ordination, Augustine was never again free to pursue the life of a scholar. He was immediately obliged to preach, to address the assembled African bishops in council, to refute the Manichees, to battle against the Donatist schism which had torn the African Church apart, as well as attempting to pursue his own writing. The latter was to become increasingly circumstantial, responding to needs, questions, challenges and demands as they arose.

As bishop, these demands intensified, for not only was he expected to preach, celebrate and baptise (the first two often daily) but he also assumed the role of administrator and legal arbitrator which had fallen to the bishops following the conversion of Constantine. The Church was now a legally recognised institution able to receive gifts, donations and bequests. It was the bishop's duty to administer these goods, which often included land and estates, for the benefit of the Church and the needy to whom it had traditionally ministered. More importantly, the bishop could now arbitrate between any two parties who chose to consult him and who agreed to abide by his judgement. In an empire with no organised police force and no organised system of legal advice or representation, this episcopal jurisdiction was tremendously popular: it was free, quick and impartial. Augustine heard cases each weekday, from morning, frequently until late afternoon – tedious, petty cases of family quarrels and disputes over land, property, debts, children. He also found himself interceding for members of his congregation to higher officials – with little success, to his enormous frustration.

Scripture and preaching

Although Augustine would have preached almost every day – and therefore in all about 8,000 times – we possess only 546 extant sermons as well as the 124 Tractates on John's Gospel, the 10 Homilies on the First Epistle of John and a series of sermons on all 150 Psalms.[19] He was a very popular preacher, had an enthusiastic congregation at home and was often invited as a visiting preacher, especially at Carthage (see Figure 58.3). This was no doubt due to his simple, straightforward style, which, combined with his finely honed rhetorical skills and his training and experience as a teacher, enabled his congregation to build up a solid knowledge of scripture and to follow even the most difficult theological argument.

Augustine, however, as we have seen, regarded language as a result of the Fall: before the Fall human beings would have known and communicated intuitively, without the need for words. His awareness of the problems and techniques of teaching and communicating are cogently presented in On Teaching the Uninstructed and in a number of works on language and exegesis.[20] Most especially, he is clear that for teaching to be rightly communicated and understood it must be motivated by and received in love.[21] Thus, one of his favourite analogies for the role of the preacher is the descent of Christ to become incarnate in order to lead humanity back to Himself. Language, too, then, like the common life of the monastic community, when rooted in love, has a social function in enabling the Christian community to cohere, understand and live its faith. And for Augustine, the language of Christianity was its scriptures.

When he had first examined the Christian scriptures as a student of rhetoric, fired by Cicero's Exhortation to Philosophy, they had jarred with his cultured sensibilites. They appeared crude, badly written full of vulgarisms and solecisms, unworthy when compared with 'the dignity of Cicero' (Confessions 3.5.9). The early third-century Old Latin translation which Augustine no doubt consulted was indeed an extremely literal, rather poor translation, but scripture's defects were a notorious feature of pagan criticism of Christianity which any educated person, pagan or Christian, could not but be sensitive to. Augustine's attitude to them is therefore unavoidably ambiguous. To an extent, he was able to reconcile himself to them by finding features which could be accommodated to

Figure 58.3   Remains of the Church of St. Cyprian in Carthage where Augustine once preached. Photo
J. C. N. Coulston

cultured, late antique taste: Ambrose had shown him that they were full of mysteries and could be interpreted allegorically in order to sound their spiritual depths; they could be analysed according to the rules of rhetoric and not found wanting (De doctrina Christiana 4).

Augustine was sensitive to questions of exegetical method. In some passages he outlines a fourfold sense (the historical, analogical, aetiological and allegorical), which necessitate a consideration of the author's intention, his culture and thought forms, his initial inspiration and also of the readers' possible interpretation and re-application of what he has said. He seems to allow for a multiplicity of meaning and interpretation on the part of author and reader, so long as neither contradicts the basic rule of love of God and neighbour. Similarly, he allows for discrepancies between the authors of scripture (for example, in On the Harmony of the Gospels) on the basis that what matters is not the details each remembers and has presented in his own fashion, but their shared intention, which is unified because of their common inspiration by the Holy Spirit. It is in this context that he explains and justifies his frequent use of allegory as an exegetical tool, especially in sermons: it allows him to investigate the spiritual sense of the literal text of scripture; to present its truth to his hearers at their various levels; to meet the criticisms of scripture's sensitive, erudite pagan critics; to deal with obviously symbolic, figurative or otherwise offensive or absurd passages; to delight the hearer and inspire him to seek for, and delight in finding, the truth.

Most important was what the scriptures had to teach: humility not pride; confession not presumption; grace not self-reliance. These lessons of the Incarnation to fallen human beings were as relevant to the cultured critic as to the self-sufficient philosopher, and it is the commandment of love of God and neighbour, and the doctrine of the Incarnation, which provide the rules and method for Augustine's interpretation, rather than those of classical grammar and rhetoric.

Nevertheless, Augustine, like most of the fathers, was a product of a classical education; he had been formed by it, and to a large extent, even as a Christian, it determined his mind-set. It could not simply be dispensed with. It is with the rather ambiguous, but often fruitful, relation between classical culture and Christianity that we find Augustine coming to terms in On Christian Doctrine (De doctrina Christiana), which is both a work on Christian exegesis and preaching, and also a detailed examination of the place and use of secular culture. Of course, pagan religious practice – idolatry, sacrifice, the mysteries – was wholly rejected, but other aspects of pagan culture – the disciplines, philosophy, moral rules, monotheist affirmations and aspirations – had so much in common with Christianity that they were often thought to be derived from earlier teaching in Moses and the prophets. These were 'seeds of the Logos' and could be legitimately appropriated and used by Christians who, like the Israelites, spoiled the Egyptians of their treasure.[22] For Augustine, they are to be used insofar as they facilitate the interpretation and expression in preaching of the truth of scripture.

Christianity and paganism

Secular culture was an issue for Augustine and his contemporaries, not just at a cultural, literary level, but also, as our comments about the social function of scripture above might suggest, at a social level too. Although the empire became officially Christian in the course of the fourth century following Constantine's conversion, the society in which the Church found itself was still more than vestigially pagan. Indeed, some scholars suggest that the Church made very little impact indeed on the municipal life of the towns of the empire which remained, if not pagan, at least secular and 'unchristianised': it showed no interest in those institutions and offices of state which had traditionally been grounded in paganism; provided no alternatives to the pagan civic rites; did not erect Christian civic buildings or establish Christian schools.[23] But Augustine could not but be aware of the 'vestigial' paganism of his congregation. As his sermons witness, they still carried charms, wore amulets, consulted diviners, swore oaths, used the pagan religious calendar, observed the old funerary customs, and most especially, took part in the processions and attended the theatre, games, spectacles and shows which were still a central part of civic life. In a very real way, it was the duty of the bishop to define just what being a Christian meant in this shadowy and confusing overlap of sacred and secular in the lives of his congregation.[24] Indeed, Augustine and his fellow bishops were forced into making very clear-cut distinctions when imperial policy turned from toleration to the proscription of paganism under Theodosius.

The unattainability of perfection

Augustine's understanding of the Fall, of original sin, and of the operation of divine grace meant that any school or doctrine which claimed to be able to attain perfection in this life was, in his eyes, fundamentally unsound and contradictory to Christian doctrine and experience. In the course of his episcopate he encountered three such schools of thought which each, in different ways, challenged his understanding of the Christian life and forced him to defend and elaborate the basic principles of his faith. The first, which proclaimed itself to be the true, holy and untainted Catholic Church in Africa was the Donatist schism. The second, which upheld the individual's freedom to will to do the good unhindered by original sin was represented by the school of Pelagius. The third was the classical idea of a wholly just and peaceful society realisable in this life.

Donatism

The Donatist Church (so called after its main founder, Donatus, bishop of Carthage [313–355]) was a schism within the African Church which arose during the 'Great Persecution' of 303–305 among those who had taken a rigorous, separatist, uncompromising stance towards other Catholics, who, for whatever reason or by whatever means, seemed to have compromised with the Roman authorities, by, for example, handing over the sacred scriptures (see Chapter 44 in this volume). The rigorists refused to accept as bishop of Carthage someone whom they regarded as tainted by the sin of such compromise.[25] Thus two churches were formed, and over the years, despite fierce imperial opposition, the Donatist faction became deeply established in African tradition and custom, so much so that by Augustine's day it was larger than the Catholic Church and for many had become very much the Catholic Church in Africa.

The Donatists represented an attempt to preserve the true identity of the African Church – the church of the martyrs, of Cyprian and Tertullian – and also a movement of opposition to the world which they regarded as hostile and demonic. They were prepared to defend their faith to the death, to preserve the church without spot or wrinkle. In their opposition to the state, the Donatist schismatics seem to have attracted the support of its other disaffected critics, who, whether for economic, political or strategic reasons, wished to defy imperial policy. Some scholars have identified the origins of the Donatist schism in these varied non-religious grievances, but even their most extreme wing, the violent, criminal gangs of martyr-seeking Circumcellions, were primarily religious in their self-understanding.

The schism was one Augustine had to counter from the moment of his ordination. He did so in a characteristically thorough and dedicated manner, even though it necessarily distracted him from more congenial, and often more pressing, concerns. He meticulously and painstakingly established the history and facts of the schism for himself, compiling huge dossiers of evidence with which he corrected Optatus' earlier version of the schism; ensured that his own clergy were beyond reproach by taking energetic measures to enforce clerical discipline; preached innumerable sermons; attempted to organise public debates; composed numerous treatises and letters to Donatist leaders and bishops.[26] However, his efforts would probably have been in vain without the aid of imperial legislation.

In 405 the emperor Honorius issued an Edict of Unity which for the first time branded the Donatists not only as schismatics but as heretics, and therefore subject to strict and punitive laws The final, official blow to a weakened Donatist Church came in 411, following the momentous Conference of Carthage, when Donatist and Catholic bishops from throughout Africa faced each other under the presidency of the imperial representative, Marcellinus. In 412 the Edict of Unity was renewed and Donatism became a criminal offence, with a scale of fines according to rank. Clergy were exiled, property was to be surrendered. Although the Donatists did not give in, they were inevitably weakened, and their future restricted.

The controversy raised a number of practical, as well as theological issues for Augustine, which were to shape his understanding of the nature of the church and its sacraments, as well as its relation to the state.

His attitude to the persecution and coercion of heretics was at first an ambiguous one, but faced with the violence of the Circumcellions, who were not above theft, arson, assault or murder, and the Donatists' deep-rooted, defiant hostility which his own efforts had done little to counter, he seems to have become increasingly supportive of state intervention. He buttressed his acceptance with arguments for the necessity of loving discipline, correction and punishment in order to per-suade the sinner of his fault, convert him to the truth, and perhaps, eventually, even change his inner attitude and bring about a genuine conversion. However, he unfailingly intervened to moderate what he regarded as excessive punishment and to avert the death penalty.

The Donatists regarded themselves as the true Catholic Church in Africa, which had stood firm during the persecutions and which was untainted by the sins of apostasy or compromise with the state authorities. They had preserved the Church as a pure and holy congregation of the saints. Augustine ridicules their position: is anyone without sin? Who are they to judge the whole of the rest of the Church throughout the world, which is largely unaware of them, and to condemn it? Do they not also suffer internal schisms and sinful behaviour? Have they not appealed to the authorities when it suited them? Obviously his theology of the Fall, original sin, the operation of divine grace and election led him to cut incisively through the Donatists' all too circumstantial and conveni-ent arguments to demonstrate that the most heinous sin is not that of compromise, but of schism, whereby they had cut themselves off from the unity of charity in the universally recognised Catholic Church; that all human beings are unavoidably sinful; that the Church necessarily comprehends righteous and unrighteous and will remain a mixture of wheat and tares until the Last Judgement; that no one merits salvation; that the only source of holiness and purity within the Church is Christ in His Holy Spirit.

The last point was the crux of Augustine's argument against the Donatists' insistence that the priestly orders of the clergy of the Catholic Church were invalidated and rendered ineffective by sin and that therefore the sacraments they administered were likewise tainted, invalid and ineffective. The one source of sanctification, holiness, purity and sacramental effectiveness, Augustine argued, was Christ, through his Holy Spirit, irrespective of the moral character of the minister; the sacraments are 'holy in themselves' (On Baptism 4.18). Furthermore, the sacraments were valid, wherever they were administered, if they were performed in the name of Christ who instituted them, following the correct form of words. There was therefore no need for rebaptism, as the Donatists argued: even Donatist baptism, in these terms, was valid. But to be effective for salvation, however, the baptised needed to be reconciled to the unity of the Catholic Church, as it was only here that the Spirit can be given and received. The Donatists' separation from the Church is a sign of their lack of charity, the absence of the Holy Spirit, and without this, like a tree without roots, everything they did would be fruitless.

Pelagianism

The movement which has become known as 'Pelagianism' does not just refer to the thought of Pelagius, but to a number of authors, throughout the empire, from Britian to Sicily, Spain to the Holy Land, whose thought varied according to their specific contexts and concerns, but who together possess a certain homogeneity, either through their acquaintance with Pelagius, or because of the basic perfectionist thrust of their ideas.[27]

Pelagius (350–425) himself was a British monk who first lived in Bethlehem and then in Rome, whose teaching proved especially popular with a group of influential, extremely conservative, Roman aristocrats, because of its asceticism and call for perfection through a strict moral code. Its uncompromisingly high standards allowed them to set themselves apart from 'institutional' Christianity and become true Christians, integri Christiani (Augustine's insistence upon celibacy in embracing Christianity can, strangely, be placed in the same context).

Pelagius and his followers stood in a tradition firmly rooted in classical moral reflection, which insisted upon individual self determination, moral responsibility, autonomy of will and the realisation of perfection through knowledge. Apart from a commentary on Romans, Pelagius' work consists largely of letters of ascetic advice and moral exhortation to converts, penitents, virgins, celibates and widows. Advising Demetrias, the daughter of an eminent noble family who wanted to pursue a vocation of virginity, he was emphatic that the choice of good or evil is 'voluntary and independent, not bound by necessity' (To Demetrias 3.2); that human beings possesses natural goodness, reason and wisdom, an inner law, which enables them to recognise and serve God. Although sin might obscure this natural state, he urged that it is not a fault in our nature but our will, and that our original state can be restored by the remission of sin and Christ's new law appropriated in baptism. It is baptism, above all else, which marks the decisive break with our past life for it remits our sins and allows the new law to operate, restoring our original, natural state of knowledge and freedom.

Pelagius had encountered criticism and hostility well before his encounter with Augustine and had already engaged in fierce controversy with Jerome. His arrival in North Africa as an exile, following the fall of Rome in 410, brought him into a context where his teaching, and that of his followers, almost immediately faced censure. Foremost among the latter was Caelestius who remained in Carthage while Pelagius went on to Palestine. His open denial of Adam's original sin, its transmission to his descendants, of the necessity of infant baptism and his conviction that it was possible for human beings to be sinless, led to his condemnation and excommunication. The issues were brought to Augustine's notice by letter and from then on, in a number of early treatises and letters we find Augustine rebutting Pelagianist ideas.[28]

But it was only in 415 that he began to attack Pelagius himself in On Nature and Grace. From that moment on Pelagian teaching was condemned by councils, imperial rescripts and church canons and its proponents relentlessly pursued. As a result 'Pelagianism' was definitively identified and its details defined. It was a heresy which Augustine used all his powers to counter in numerous treatises, in particular against the southern Italian bishop, Julian of Eclanum, on the subjects of original sin, infant baptism, grace, free will, marriage and concupiscence, until the end of his life.[29]

To Augustine the effects of Adam's Fall and the inheritance of his sin (original sin) were abundantly clear in our vitiated will, our inability to will or to do the good, and in the lust (concupiscence) which overcomes our reason. He therefore argued for the necessity of baptism, even for new-born infants, in order to remit the guilt of original sin. Even so, he was aware that the effects of original sin remained after baptism: no one can do anything of themselves but sin; in order to do the good they stand in continual need of God's grace. Whereas for Pelagius grace was found in the power which enables human beings freely to will and to act, in their created nature and in the 'new law' introduced by Christ's teaching and example which restored that nature, for Augustine the law was of no avail without the aid of God's Spirit. Without the life-giving Spirit the law is the 'letter that kills'. It is not enough for human beings to obey simply through fear of punishment or hope of reward, they must be moved to desire, love and delight in it – and this is the work of grace.

Reflections such as these made it difficult for Augustine to speak meaningfully of freedom in relation to the will. In some contexts he speaks of God as helper, as preparing the will, of human beings co-operating with God and resists the idea of compulsion in the operation of the will under grace. Many passages do, however, seem to suggest that divine election is irresistible. The reader needs to be aware that Augustine has in mind not the power of grace to coerce, override or control the will but rather its ability to unfailingly call forth a response which corresponds with humanity's true identity as creatures of God, a response of freely willed subjection, delight, desire for and love of God's revelation. This is effected by God making what is good at the same time attractive, pleasing and delightful to human beings: 'the good begins to be desired when it begins to be sweet . . . therefore the blessing of sweetness is the grace of God, whereby we are made to delight in and to desire, that is, to love, what he commands us' (Against the Letters of Pelagius 2.21). God does not thereby deny human beings their freedom but enables them to attain it.

The fact that some are not saved, however, raised and continues to raise, intractable problems for Augustine's theory of grace. Why do some believe, while others do not? For Augustine, this is a matter of God's election, not human merit. But if so, why does he choose some but not others? What occupied Augustine, however, was not so much why some are left to damnation but rather why, when all human beings justly deserve damnation, God has shown mercy by electing some to be saved. His doctrine of original sin, divine election, foreknowledge and predestination was unable to answer why some were not saved, but was nevertheless able to demonstrate that the fact that they were not was wholly just. To the monks of Hadrumetum[30] in North Africa and those in Marseilles[31] in southern Gaul, for whom this theology seemed to undermine their raison d'être and to leave no room for human responsibility or initiative, he argues forcibly that both the beginning of faith (which the monks at Marseilles wished to attribute to our free choice) and the perseverance to continue in faith, are wholly the work of grace.

The two cities[32]

When Rome fell to Alaric and his Gothic troops in 410, the future of a number of long-held ideals was also threatened. Since Constantine's conversion in 312 there had been a strong current of Christian thought, beginning with Eusebius of Caesarea, which regarded the empire as God's chosen vehicle to establish the Christian Church throughout the earth, and the emperor as an almost messianic figure, providentially appointed to deliver the empire from the forces of paganism and to ensure its salvation in the Christian Church. This 'imperial theology' suffered a tremendous blow when Rome, the heart of the empire, fell to barbarian forces. The pagans, of course, as they had always done in times of crisis, blamed the catastrophe on the Christians' neglect of the gods, who could now be seen wreaking their revenge.

Augustine responded to the pagans' charges by addressing them – or at least, the cultured, aristocratic, intellectuals who voiced these charges – in the first half of his City of God. Arguing from the same pagan classics as his opponents, he demonstrated that Rome had suffered similar crises well before the advent of Christianity and that this was not the judgement of the gods who were mere jumped-up mortals, but the judgement of divine providence on their vicious subjection of others, not for the sake of peace or justice, but for personal glory and the desire to dominate. As Cicero had made clear, the Romans had long ago ceased to be a commonwealth in any real sense, because they failed to give to everyone their due.

Although Augustine's earliest work shows some leaning towards an 'imperial theology', it is obvious that after 410 he decisively broke with any conception of living in 'Christian times'. Rather, as Robert Markus has demonstrated, he seems to regard the empire as 'theologically neutral', as having no role to play in the work of divine providence, for good or evil, but merely as part of the temporal, as it were, secular, context (saeculum), in which Christians and pagans alike lead their lives in the world.[33] Instead, he increasingly drew upon Tyconius' earlier Christian tradition, especially early Jewish-Christian works, scripture and themes first sketched within his own earlier works, to develop the idea of two cities – the city of God and the city of the world. He understood these cities to be societies made up of individuals united by a common goal or aim. The city of God included all those predestined by God for salvation, whose goal was not earthly goods or glory, but obedience to, and love of, God and the common good. The city of this world, on the other hand, comprehends all those who have turned away from God to temporal goods, who seek their own selfish ends and who are therefore destined for damnation.

In developing the theme of the two cities, one of Augustine's main preoccupations is polemical: to refute those philosophers and those Christian idealists who thought that humankind's ultimate good, the happy life, the ideal city, true justice and peace could be attained in this life.[34] He regards such thought as 'amazing folly' which, given the wretched necessities of life in society, everyone, without exception, encounters and suffers at every level of human existence: in the family, the city, the world; they exist even among the angels. Experience underlines the fundamentally flawed and vitiated nature of the human will, the essentially selfish, self-seeking nature of human society, the impossibility of ever attaining peace or realising true justice. All of this, for Augustine, is a sign of our fallenness; of the outworkings of original sin.

In this life, therefore, where true peace and justice are unattainable, the two cities are inextricably interwoven; their members share the same society, the same city, the same occupations and laws, and in some cases, the same family and worship. Because the city of God can only be fully realised in the life to come, its divinely elected and predestined citizens are separated from the city of the world only in will and their desire for their ultimate goal. In this world they are pilgrims, resident aliens, using and abiding by the powers, institutions and laws that be. They take part in government, the administration of the law and military service, in order to maintain whatever degree of peace and justice is possible after the Fall, aware that its effects need to be delimited and controlled.

Even the Church cannot be identified with the city of God. Although he believed that membership of it, through baptism, was necessary to belong to the city of God, Augustine was well aware, as he made clear during the Donatist controversy, that it in fact contained wheat and tares, righteous and unrighteous, the predestined elect and the damned, and that they will only finally be separated in the life to come.

The last four books of City of God deal with the consummation and fulfilment of history in eternity, in the Last Judgement, Heaven and Hell. Asserting the original and eternal unity of the body and soul, Augustine takes a distinctly anti-Platonic stand in defending and discussing the problems which arise from a doctrine of the resurrection of the body. In heaven there will no longer be any need for communication by language and signs, there will be no time or mutability, no need for faith and hope, no need to 'use' and refer things to God, rather there will be eternal contemplation, love and possession of God Himself, giving rise to eternal praise. Whereas now we can only see 'through a glass darkly', there we shall see 'face to face'.

Doctrine

Faith and reason

The crucial role which philosophy, and especially Neoplatonism, played in Augustine's conversion means that his early reflection on the Christian faith takes place very much within a rational, philosophically inspired context, in which the emphasis was placed upon the attainment of truth through the exercise of the mind in the liberal disciplines. These intellectual arts, he thought, enabled human beings to extricate themselves from the temporal, mutable and deceptive reality experienced by the senses and to attain the eternal, immutable truth which can only be grasped by their highest, spiritual part: their mind, soul or intellect.

Augustine, was, however, moved to fundamentally revise and temper his early confidence in reason in a number of decisive ways. First of all, his polemic against the Manichees, which became more urgent when he returned to Africa, led him to emphasise and defend the important role of faith in apprehending the truth, as opposed to their claim to be able to explain everything by reason.[35] Second, his attempts to communicate the Christian faith to his largely illiterate, uneducated congregation could not but make him acutely conscious of the incongruence between traditional, philosophically based classical culture and their simple devotion and insight into the faith. His attempts to adapt his teaching to their various levels led to a deeper appreciation of the necessity and usefulness of faith. While faith and reason are complementary, and reason enables us to decide between authorities, we must believe in order to understand.

It was his developed doctrine of the Fall, however, with its conviction that the truth is inaccessible to our darkened minds, and unattainable by our vitiated wills, which confirmed for Augustine the indispensability of faith in God's temporal revelation of Himself to fallen human beings within the very temporal, mutable realm in which their fragmented selves has become imprisoned. It is in this context that Augustine's mature understanding of the scriptures and his doctrines of creation, salvation history and most especially, of the Incarnation, are fully worked out.

Incarnation

Augustine did not write a work specifically on the Incarnation, rather his reflections on God becoming man are found in a number of different contexts.[36] Most of these are pastoral, where he is primarily concerned to make clear the exemplary, healing, paedagogic, salvific and sacramental role of the Incarnation. In other contexts, Augustine's intention is obviously polemical, and he expounds orthodox doctrine against Docetists, Apollinarians, Arians, Photinians and Sabellians. He also often seems to expound Christological doctrine with the philosophers in mind. This was not least because, although he was prepared to concede (following Rom. 1:19–20) that some philosphers had been able, through reason, to see the truth, he is convinced that they cannot understand or attain it, because the only way to truth is a confession of humble faith which follows the way which is Christ; the proud presumption of the philosophers who think they can grasp the truth through their own powers is merely a symptom of their failure to do so.

Although he was largely ignorant of Eastern Christological debates and terminology, Augustine does attempt to emphasise the unity of the Word, soul and body, of Godhead and manhood in Christ, partly in order to oppose the philosophers' denigration of the flesh and partly to counter their repugnance at the idea of the resurrection of the body. Perhaps most importantly, however, the unity of Godhead and manhood in Christ forms the basis for Augustine's emphasis upon Christ as the One Mediator between God and human beings, who was able to effect what the demonic mediators of pagan theurgy could never achieve. As God and man, as both the wisdom (sapientia) and the knowledge (scientia) of God, he is uniquely able to lead human beings from the temporal realm (of scientia) into which they have fallen, back to the realm (of sapientia) from which they have fallen. In this sense, Christianity offers the 'Universal Way' to salvation, which the philosophers had sought but never found (City of God 10.32).

The Trinity

Aware that there was very little reflection on the Trinity within the Latin tradition and that much Greek thought was inaccessible to Latin speakers, Augustine worked on his fifteen-book On the Trinity over a period of twenty years (399–419). Although polemical considerations do not predominate, he was aware of the threat which Arianism and Sabellianism, in particular, posed to Trinitarian doctrine, and at various points seeks to refute them. His main concern, however, seems to have been to define and illustrate the traditional, orthodox doctrine of the identity of substance within the Trinity and the inseparable operation of its persons. He establishes the basis for this doctrine, and therefore its authority, in the scriptural account of the Incarnation of the Son and the revelation of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost.[37]

In examining the traditional, philosophical terminology which had been used to articulate the doctrine of the Trinity, he is aware that the simple transposition of Greek terms, such as ousia and hypostaseis, into Latin, would be misleading and confusing, since they could only be translated as one essence and three substances. Although he himself preferred the term essence or nature to refer to the One Trinity, he acknowledges the traditional use of 'substance', and therefore endorses the traditional Latin terminology of one substance and (in order not to remain silent, though aware of the inadequacies of language) three persons. He stresses, however, that despite the language of three persons, the only way in which we can meaningfully talk of distinction within the Trinity is in terms of relation: of the unbegotten Father, the begotten Son and the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Father and the Son. In every other respect, in mind, will, substance and attributes, they are identical. In describing the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, Augustine's intention was not polemical. He was simply drawing upon Latin precedents and was unaware of the Greek creed of Constantinople (381) which stated that the Spirit proceeded from the Father.

In Books 8–15, Augustine proceeds to examine various similitudes to illustrate the inseparable operation and identical nature of the three persons of the Trinity. In a rather original way, he derives his similitudes from the image of God in human beings, assuming, on the basis of Gen. 1:26 ('Let us make man in our image and our likeness'), that it is a Trinitarian image. In our capacity for self-awareness, reason and love (which he at one point defines as memory, understanding and love), he locates that which sets us apart from the rest of creation and enables us to come closest to our Creator. Most especially, in our awareness, knowledge and love of the Trinity as revealed in the incarnate Christ, he finds the means whereby the deformed, fragmented, fallen image of God in us might be reformed and ultimately come to full knowledge and love of the Trinity.

It is clear, however, that the reformation of the image of God in human beings will never be fulfilled in this life: it is a gradual, progressive process of faith, hope and love, whereby the operation of God's grace and the revelation of His love in the incarnate Christ enables our response, to bring us to ultimate perfection in the life to come.

Conclusion

Augustine remained bishop of Hippo until his death in 430 CE. As he recited the penitential psalms on his death bed and wept for his sins, Hippo was being besieged by the Vandals, Alans and Goths under their leader Geiseric. They finally took the town, and, after an orgy of looting, pillage, murder, rape and torture, evacuated it and burnt it to the ground in 431. A whole world came to an end with Augustine's passing.

What survived, quite extraordinarily, was Augustine's library in the secretarium of the basilica at Hippo, which contained among other things, the vast body of his own works, which he had spent the last years of his life carefully annotating, correcting and commenting upon in his Retractations. Through these, he continues to give us one of our closest insights into the history and theology of the West in late Antiquity.

Notes

1 The most accessible general books on Augustine in English are Bonner 1963 (rev. 2009) and 1987; Brown 1967 (rev. with Epilogue 2000); Chadwick 2010; Harrison 2000; Hollingworth 2013; Lancel 2002; Lane Fox 2016; Levering 2013; Rist 1994; Williams 2016; Madec 1994, in French, should not, however, be missed. There is a bibliographical search tool for Augustine bibliography at www.findingaugustine.org. For an Encyclopedia see Fitzgerald 1999; for collections of essays see Lawless and Dodaro 2000; Meconi 2014; Vessey 2012; for a very useful selection of texts see Harmless 2010.

2 See Brown 1992; Kaster 1988.

3 Burton 2005; Clark 1993; Conybeare 2016; Kenny 2005; O'Donnell 1992.

4 On Manichaeism, see BeDuhn 2010; Lieu 1985: 117–53; Bonner 1963: 157–236.

5 See Madec 1996; O'Donnell 1992 II: 421–4.

6 I.e. theurgy. Augustine has Porphyry, in particular, in mind. Cf. City of God 10.

7 See Frederiksen 1986; Martin 2001.

8 Couenhoven 2013.

9 Kirwan 1989: 131–2.

10 Augustine is a rare exception to the fathers' general teaching that sexual intercourse is a result of the Fall. See Literal Commentary on Genesis 9.3.6. Hunter 1994.

11 City of God 14; Literal Commentary on Genesis 11.

12 1 John 2.16.

13 Lawless 1987: 36.

14 See On the Morals of the Catholic Church and the Manichees.

15 Vita 3.

16 The Teacher; 83 Diverse Questions; On the Morals of the Catholic Church; On True Religion; On Genesis against the Manichees.

17 He probably didn't know of Eusebius of Vercelli's (363) similar arrangement in Northern Italy.

18 The male version of the Rule (Praeceptum) was written c. 395/6 and was probably soon after re-edited in a form for nuns (Regularis informatio) in the convent where Augustine's own sister was superior (Verheijen 1967).

19 On Augustine's preaching, see Harmless 1995; Harrison 2012; Houghton Kolbet 2010; Van der Meer 1962.

20 On Dialectic; The Teacher; On Christian Doctrine.

21 On Christian Doctrine, prologue 6; On Teaching the Uninstructed 10.15. On teaching, see Arnold and Bright (eds) 1995. On language, see Morgan 2011. On exegesis, Schnaubelt and Van Fleteren 2001.

22 De Doctrina Christiana 2.40.60; Harrison 2000, chapter 2.

23 Lepelley 1975.

24 Brown 1995; Markus 1990.

25 On Donatism, see Brown 1972: 237–59, 279–300; Crespin 1965; Frend 1952; Monceaux 1922 IV and VII; Tengström 1964; Tilly 1997; Ployd 2015.

26 Including Psalm against the Donatists; Against Cresconius; Against the letter of Parmenianus; Against the Writings of Petilianus; On Baptism against the Donatists; Against Gaudentius.

27 On Pelagianism, see Bonner 1987, 2007; Brown 1972; De Bruyn 1998; Evans 1968; Lohr 2015; Rees 1991.

28 On the Consequences of Sins and their Forgiveness; On the Spirit and the Letter; Epistle 157.

29 Against the Letters of Pelagius; On Marriage and Concupiscence; Against Julian; Unfinished Refutation of Julian's Second Response.

30 On Grace and Free Will; On Correction and Grace.

31 On the Predestination of the Saints; On the Gift of Perseverance.

32 On the City of God and Augustine's social and political thought, see Markus 1970; O'Daly 2004; Ruokanen 1993; Van Oort 1991; Wetzel 2014.

33 Markus 1970: 42–51.

34 See especially Book 19.
35 For example, in On True Religion and On the Usefulness of Belief.
36 For secondary literature, see Van Bavel 1954; Dodaro 2008; Rémy 1979; Verwilghen 1985; Madec 1989.
37 For secondary literature, see Ayres 2010; Boersma 2016; Gioia 2008; Hochschild 2012; Schindler 1965.

Bibliography

Translations of Augustine's works can be found in the Library of the Fathers, the Nicene and Post Nicene Fathers, the Ancient Christian Writers, the Library of Christian Classics and the New City Press Works of Saint Augustine series.

Arnold, D. W. and Bright, P. (1995) De Doctrina Christiana: A Classic of Western Culture. Notre Dame, IN: Notre Dame University Press.

Ayres, L. (2010) Augustine and the Trinity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

BeDuhn, J. (2010) Augustine's Manichaean Dilemma. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania.

Boersma, G. (2016) Augustine's Early Theology of Image: A Study in the Development of Pro-Nicene Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Bonner, G. (1963; rev. 2009) Augustine, Life and Controversies. London: SCM Press.

Bonner, G. (1987) God's Decree and Man's Destiny. London: Variorum.

Bonner, G. (2007) Freedom and Necessity: Saint Augustine's Teaching on Divine Power and Human Freedom. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America.

Brown, P. (1967; rev. 2000) Augustine. London: Faber & Faber.

Brown, P. (1992) Power and Persuasion in Late Antiquity. Wisconsin, WI: University of Wisconsin Press.

Brown, P. (1995) Authority and the Sacred. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Burns, J. P. and Jensen, R. M. (2014) Christianity in Roman Africa: The Development of Its Practices and Beliefs. Grand Rapids, MI. Eerdmans.

Burton, P. (2007) Language in the Confessions of Augustine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Chadwick, H. (2010) Augustine of Hippo: A Life. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Clark, G. (1993) The Confessions. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Conybeare, C. (2016) The Routledge Guidebook to Augustine's Confessions. London: Routledge.

Crespin, R. (1965) Ministère et Sainteté – Pastorale du Clergé et Solution de la Crise Donatiste dans la Vie et la Doctrine de saint Augustin. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

De Bruyn, T. D. E. (1998) Pelagius' Commentary on Saint Paul's Epistle to the Romans. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Dodaro, R. (2008) Christ and the Just Society in the Thought of Saint Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Evans, R. F. (1968) Pelagius: Inquiries and Reappraisals. New York: Seabury Press.

Fitzgerald, A. (ed.) (2000) Encyclopedia of Saint Augustine. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

Frederiksen, P. (1986) 'Paul and Augustine: Conversion narratives, orthodox traditions and the retrospective self', Journal of Theological Studies 37: 3–34.

Frend, W. H. C. (1952) The Donatist Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Gioia, L. (2008) The Theological Epistemology of Augustine's De Trinitate. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Harmless, W. (1995) Augustine and the Catechumenate. Collegeville, MN: LiturgicalPress.

Harmless, W. (2010) Augustine in His Own Words. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America.

Harrison, C. (2000) Christian Truth and Fractured Humanity: Augustine in Context. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Harrison, C. (2012) The Art of Listening in the Early Church. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hochschild, P. (2012) Memory in Augustine's Theological Anthropology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hollingworth, M. (2013) Saint Augustine of Hippo: An Intellectual Biography. New York: Bloomsbury.

Houghton, H. (2008) Augustine's Text of John. Patristic Citations and Latin Gospel Manuscripts. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Hunter, D. (1994) 'Augustinian pessimism? A new look at Augustine's teaching on sex, marriage and celibacy', Augustinian Studies 25: 153–77.

Kaster, R. A. (1988) Guardians of Language: The Grammarian and Society in Late Antiquity. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Kenney, J. P. (2007) The Mysticism of Saint Augustine: Re-reading the Confessions. London: Routledge.

Kirwan, C. (1989) Augustine. London: Routledge.

Kolbet, P. (2010) Augustine and the Cure of Souls: Revising a Classical Ideal. Notre Dame, IN: Notre Dame University Press.

Lancel, S. (trans.) (2002) Augustine. London: SCM.

Lane Fox, R. (2015) Augustine: Conversions and Confessions. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin.

Lawless, G. (1987) Augustine of Hippo and his Monastic Rule. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Lawless, G. and Dodaro, R. (eds) (2000) Augustine and his Critics. London: Routledge.

Lepelley, C. (1975) 'Saint Augustin et la Cité Romano-Africaine', in Kannengiesser, C. (ed.) Jean Chrysostome et Augustin. Théologie Historique, 35. Paris: Beauchesne, 13–41.

Levering, M. (2013) The Theology of Augusitne: An Introductory Guide to His Most Important Works. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic.

Lohr, W. (2015) Pelage et Pelagianisme. Paris: Cerf.

Madec, G. (1994) Petites Études Augustiniennes. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

Madec, G. (1996) Saint Augustin et la Philosophie. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

Markus, R. (1970) Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of Saint Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Markus, R. (2012) The End of Ancient Christianity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Martin, T. F. (2001) Rhetoric and Exegesis in Augustine's Interpretation of Romans 7:24–25A. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen.

Monceaux, P. (1922) Histoire Littéraire de l'Afrique Chrétienne, IV and VII. Paris: Leroux.

Morgan, E. (2011) The Incarnation of the Word: The Theology of Language of Augustine of Hippo. Berlin: Peter Lang.

O'Daly, G. (2004) Augustine's City of God: A Reader's Guide. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

O'Donnell, J. J. (1992) Augustine: Confessions I–III (Introduction, Text and Commentary). Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.

Ployd, A. (2015) Augustine, the Trinity and the Church: A Reading of the Anti-Donatist Sermons. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Rees, B. R. (1991) The Letters of Pelagius and his Followers. Woodbridge, UK: Boydell Press.

Rist, J. M. (1994) Augustine: Ancient Thought Baptized. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Ruokanen, M. (1993) Theology of Social Life in Augustine's City of God. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoek & Ruprecht.

Schaubelt, J. and Van Fleteren, F. (2001) Augustine: Biblical Exegete. Berlin: Peter Lang.

Schindler, A. (1965) Wört und Analogie in Augustins Trinitätslehre. Tübingen, Germany: Siebeck.

Stendahl, K. (1963) 'The Apostle Paul and the introspective conscience of the west', Harvard Theological Review 56: 199–215. Reprinted in Stendahl 1977: 78–96.

Stendahl, K. (1977) Paul Among Jews and Gentiles. London: SCM Press; first published in the US by Fortress in 1976.

Tengström, E. (1964) Donatisten und Katholiken: soziale, wirtschaftliche und politische Aspekte einer nordafrikanischen Kirchenspaltung. Studia Graeca et Latina Gothburgensia, XVIII. Göteburg, Germany: Elanders Boktryckeri Aktiebolag.

Tilly, M. (1997) The Bible in Christian North Africa. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.

Van Bavel, T. (1954) Recherches sur la Christologie de saint Augustin: l'humain et le divin dans le Christ d'après saint Augustin. Fribourg, Switzerland: Editions Universtaires.

Van Oort, J. (1991) Jerusalem and Babylon. A Study into Augustine's City of God and the Sources of his Doctrine of the Two Cities. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Verheijen, L. M. J. (1967) La règle de saint Augustin. Paris: Etudes Augustiniennes.

Vessey, M. (2012) The Blackwell Companion to Augustine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Wetzel, J. (ed.) (2014) City of God: A Critical Guide. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

59

EPHREM THE SYRIAN

Kathleen E. McVey

Ephrem: life, character and importance

Ephrem the Syrian, the foremost writer in the Syriac tradition of Christianity, was born in the early fourth century CE in Nisibis, an ancient city of enduring commercial, political, and military significance,[1] which is now Nusaybin in Turkey. After a century of struggle between the Roman and Persian empires, Syro-Mesopotamia had been restored to Roman control by a treaty of 298 CE, which specified Nisibis as the only place for commercial exchange between the two empires.[2] Its population and hence its cultural environment were constituted by a mix of many diverse peoples: Arameans, Arabs, Parthians, Iranians, Greeks, Jews, and Romans. He came from a Christian family, as he himself affirms in a well-known if somewhat puzzling passage in his Hymns against Heresies 26.10:

> In the way of truth was I born > even though I as a child did not yet perceive it.
> Examining, I acquired it for myself, as I perceived it.
> My faith despised the confusing paths that came toward me.[3]

There are many possible interpretations of 'the confusing paths' among which the young Ephrem found himself. There had been Christians in the environs of Nisibis since at least the late second century as the epitaph of Bishop Aberkios of Hierapolis attests.[4] Yet the size, beliefs, and history of the community are elusive; sources are scarce and difficult to place chronologically, geographically, and theologically. A few relative certainties can be affirmed: by c. 300 CE Syriac-speaking Christians used the Peshitta translation of the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament in the Old Syriac version as well as Tatian's Diatessaron. They were also familiar with writings connected with the apostle Thomas (e.g., the Acts of Thomas and possibly the Gospel of Thomas) and with the Odes of Solomon. These and a handful of sources that purport to tell the early history of Syriac Christianity (namely, the Chronicle of Edessa, the Teaching of Addai, and the Chronicle of Arbela) present numerous challenges to the historian.

Like their co-religionists everywhere before the fourth century CE, the Christians of Syro-Mesopotamia were diverse in their beliefs and practices. Bardaisan, Marcion, and Mani were well-known religious figures here, as was, probably, Aphrahat, Ephrem's older contemporary. The pairing of Semitic language with ascetic tendencies led earlier scholars to ponder whether to categorize the first Syro-Mesopotamian Christians as 'Gnostic' or 'Jewish-Christian' encratites with ties to Qumran.[5] The dismantling of these two scholarly categories coincided with the recognition that emerging Jewish and Christian communities in Mesopotamia linked sexuality with holiness in ways that were, in some respects, similar and, in other respects, distinct from one another.[6] The Qumran texts continue to provide intriguing parallels to Syriac Christian literature and liturgical practice more broadly as well as specifically to Ephrem.[7] Yet radical rethinking of the study of Judaism as well as of early Christianity has made scholars more hesitant to link the earliest Syriac Christians with a single thread in either of these complex and evolving religious communities.[8] All aspects of the Greco-Roman, Persian, and Judaic worlds are now seen as areas of lively interaction for Syriac-speaking Christians, many of whom were probably bi-lingual or multi-lingual in some degree.[9] In the case of a poet-theologian-controversialist like Ephrem, the question now is how he takes up broadly used themes and images and shapes them to his purpose.[10]

Soon after Nisibis and its environs were reincorporated into the Roman empire under Diocletian, Constantine became sole ruler and converted to Christianity. The Council of Nicea, convened in 325 by the emperor, posed new questions about authoritative belief among Christians as well as about the relationship between Christian and imperial authorities. Jacob, bishop of Nisibis, attended the Council of Nicea, and upon his return, he appointed Ephrem as 'interpreter' or 'exegete.' Although this is not a title or office known elsewhere, it apparently entailed the composition of hymns, homilies, and commentaries.[11] Through his writings, Ephrem pressed his vision of a unified and pro-Nicene church allied with Roman Christian power with the endorsement of a succession of orthodox bishops.[12] Material remains attest the alliance of the fourth-century Nisibene bishops with imperial might: large stone blocks trace the foundation of a massive basilica, probably built by Jacob; a few paces southeast stand the remains of the large baptistery completed by Bishop Vologeses in 359/60 (see Figure 59.1).[13]

As Rome and Persia continued the struggle for domination of Mesopotamia, Ephrem's homeland became a battleground, and he became an avid chronicler of the religious and political dimensions of the war. Here, too, his allegiance was clearly to Rome, as the divinely ordained Christian power. He was an eyewitness to the Roman military procession into Nisibis in 363 CE with the corpse of the defeated emperor Julian 'the Apostate.' He mourned, not the faithless emperor, but the tribulations of the Nisibene Christians, who were forced to abandon their native city and to move westward in order to remain within the Roman empire. He, too, went to Edessa, where he continued to write and where he is said to have established a school of biblical and theological studies and women's choirs to sing his hymns. Ordained to the diaconate there, he died while ministering to victims of famine in 373 CE.[15]

Figure 59.1 Excavations at Nisibis showing the so-called 'Church of Mar Jacob.'[14] Photograph by Gareth Hughes, https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:Mar_Jacob_Church,_Nisibis.jpg

Ephrem was, then, a man deeply engaged in the conflicts of his time and clear in his allegiances, yet, especially in his hymnody, he shows openness to the beauty of other religious expressions. For example, despite his fierce commitment to orthodoxy, Ephrem appreciated the appeal of the ante-Nicene Syriac Christian literature. Thus he not only wrote commentaries on the canonical scripture but he also wrote notes or lectured on Tatian's Diatessaron; in the hands of his disciples this became a commentary.[16] He utilized graphic feminine imagery for God, as some of the Odes of Solomon had done.[17] In his Hymns on the Pearl he explored the image of salvation as a precious pearl, an image that has roots not only in the New Testament but also in the Hymn of the Pearl in the Acts of Thomas.[18] Yet his Hymns against Heresies are harshly polemical, attacking Mani, Marcion, Bardaisan, and the astrologers.[19]

Similarly, Ephrem appears to be well acquainted with Jewish exegetical traditions, but these may be juxtaposed with various Christian modes of scriptural study as well as anti-Judaic polemics. The Hymns on Paradise and his Commentary on Genesis and Exodus are permeated with non-canonical Jewish traditions; yet the commentary also addresses questions common among Greek and Latin Christian exegetes.[20] His Carmina Nisibena and Hymns against Julian represent Christian appropriations of the prophetic tradition of the Hebrew Bible.[21] Yet in many of his compositions each positive theological statement seems to evoke propositions for refutation. The unseen opponent may be Jewish as often as pagan or heretical; generally, their identities are masked with epithets (for example, 'scrutinizers' for Arians, 'slanderers' or 'crucifiers' for Jews). As he expounds his Trinitarian doctrine in the Sermons on

Figure 59.2   St. Ephrem, as portrayed in a twelfth-century manuscript belonging to the Syrian Orthodox Patriarch of Antioch, Moran Mor Ignatius Aphrem II (Dam. Pat. 12/15. Folio 5b). Photo Kathleen McVey

Faith and the Hymns on Faith, he argues against Judaizing Christians as well as against Arians.[22] In his Paschal Hymns he elaborates a theology of redemption in the midst of polemics against Jewish ritual.[23] The rich incarnational theology of his Nativity Hymns is co-mingled with arguments in defense of Mary's virginity over against the 'slanderers'—possibly Jewish critics—who would deny it.[24]

In the complex and uncertain world of fourth-century Mesopotamia, Ephrem's emphatic belligerence is comprehensible. In the Greco-Roman context, moreover, where virtuoso displays of rhetoric in what was a highly competitive culture (see Chapter 1 of this work) were highly prized, his compositions were stunningly successful. His ability to couch his polemics in richly symbolic verse and to set them to familiar melodies made his efforts all the more memorable and thus more effective. Having seen the damage done over the centuries by hostile inter-religious rhetoric, so easily translated into violent acts, most Christians today rightly hesitate to wield the rhetorical rapier against the adherents of religious beliefs different from their own as Late Antique Christians did. Clearly a passionate man, deeply persuaded that God's love and redemption are present and on display for all who open their eyes and ears, Ephrem had little patience for those who saw things differently. It is a challenge for his present readers to disentangle the beauty of his symbolic theology from his recurrent polemics. The recent emphasis in historical scholarship on identity formation has provided one solution to this quandary by using Ephrem's words to explore his notions of the limits of the Christian community and his self-understanding as a poet rather than to discern the putative views of his contemporaneous religious competitors.[25]

Ephrem's importance for the history of Syriac literature and for the history of Christianity in the Syriac-speaking context is substantial.[26] His hymns, collected in fifth- and sixth-century manuscripts, attest his early popularity and the ongoing influence of both his theological views and his use of hymnody to instill those views in church members. His fame is attested among Greek and Latin writers as well: Jerome (de viris illustribus 115), Epiphanius (Panarion 52.22.7), Palladius (Historia Lausiaca 40), Sozomen (Historia Ecclesiastica 3.16), and Theodoret (Historia Ecclesiastica 4.26). He played a role in the emergence of dramatic dialogues in Syriac as well as the dramatic kontakia of Romanos the Melode.[27] Sizeable corpora of writings in Greek, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, Arabic, Latin, and Slavonic are also attributed to him.[28] As might be expected, his success is the scholar's bane since his works underwent continual updating to address the theological issues of the subsequent centuries; identifying Ephrem's authentic compositions among the interpolated or truncated versions of his followers can be challenging.[29] Today, as in the past, the Syriac poet-theologian is appreciated for his sophisticated awareness of the presence of God in the world.

Ephrem's theology of the presence of God in the world

Ephrem's world is permeated by the divine presence. His poetry is based upon a vision of the created order as a vast system of symbols or mysteries.[30] No person, thing, or event in the world exists without a mysterious relation to the whole. History and nature constitute the warp and woof of reality. To divorce an individual person, event, or thing from its context in either direction would destroy the handiwork of God in time and space. Each moment of life is governed by the Lord of Life and is an opportunity to see oneself and the community in relation to that Lord. So not only the events described in scripture, but all historical events must have profound religious significance.

Nature, too, is replete with intimations of the presence of God. In creating the world, God deliberately presented us not only with examples of beauty and order but also with symbols that allude more richly to the identity of their Creator:

> In every place, if you look, His symbol is there, > and when you read, you will find His prototypes.
> For by Him were created all creatures, > and he imprinted His symbols upon His possessions.

> When He created the world,
> He gazed at it and adorned it with His images.
> Streams of His symbols opened, flowed and poured forth
> His symbols on its members.

(Hymns on Virginity 20.12)

At the center of all is Jesus Christ, the Incarnate Word, who is at once the apex of history and the metaphysical Mediator between the ineffable Creator and the creation. Ephrem sets forth this notion most succinctly in the Hymns on Virginity 28–30, where he speaks of the three harps of God:

> The Word of the Most High came down and put on > a weak body with hands, > and He took two harps [Old and New Testaments] > in His right and left hands.
> The third [Nature] He set before Himself > to be a witness to the [other] two, > for the middle harp taught > that their Lord is playing them.

(Hymns on Virginity 29.1)

This strophe shows clearly not only that scripture and nature play complementary roles in Ephrem's theology but also that the lynchpin of his theological system is the Incarnate Word of God, through whom God has revealed the relation of the two Testaments to one another and to nature.

In examining his theology of divine presence, we will begin with his understanding of the Incarnation and proceed to the closely related notions of spiritual progress and sanctification or theosis/divinization. Next we will turn to God's presence in history, first considering scripture as the record of salvation history, especially as understood through typological exegesis, and then addressing the sacred dimension of the rest of history, specifically the events which Ephrem himself witnessed and contemplated. Finally, we will consider nature as God's domain, first in human beings created in the divine image, then in the sacraments and finally in the rest of the creation.

The Incarnation: lynchpin of Ephrem's theology

A central theme of Ephrem's Hymns on the Nativity is the wonder of the Incarnation, conceived as a paradoxical entry of the ineffable, infinite, and omnipotent God into the limitations of human life. It is a theological concept that evokes profound questions: How can the Ruler of the Universe, whom the entire created order is unable to contain, have been contained in a single, small human womb?

> The Power that governs all dwelt in a small womb.
> While dwelling there, He was holding the reins of the universe.
> His Parent was ready for His will to be fulfilled.
> The heavens and all the creation were filled by Him.
> The Sun entered the womb, and in the height and depth
> His rays were dwelling.

(Hymns on the Nativity 21.6)

Not only the bare fact of the Incarnation but also its specific circumstances are miraculous and paradoxical: '[God] deprived the married womb; He made fruitful the virgin womb' (Hymns on the Nativity 21.17). Far from showing a weakness, these apparent contradictions show the majesty of the Creator, the 'Lord of natures.'

Yet these are not pointless displays of might; instead they are the concessions of a loving God to human frailty:

> God had seen that we worshiped creatures.
> He put on a created body to catch us by our habit.
> Behold by this fashioned one our Fashioner healed us, > and by this creature our Creator revived us.
>
> (Hymns on the Nativity 21.12)

Thus this miraculous and paradoxical self-abasement of God is clearly motivated by love for human-kind. Ephrem often associates the language and imagery of divine compassion, mercy, and maternal love with the Incarnation. Among his many epithets for Christ is 'the Compassionate One,' a title which he applies in virtually every moment in the life of Christ. The feast of the Incarnation, the Nativity, is the day on which 'the Compassionate One came out to sinners' (Nat. 4.5). Even before his birth, 'He dwelt [in Mary's womb] because of His compassion' (Nat. 21.8). The Compassionate One, he says, put on the garment of the body to rescue Adam:

> He was 'wrapped in swaddling clothes . . .
> He put on the garments of youth . . .
> [and] the water of baptism . . .
> [and] the linen garments in death':
> All these [garments] are changes > that the Compassionate One first shed and then put on again > when He contrived to put on Adam the glory he had shed.
> He entwined swaddling clothes with [Adam's] fig leaves, > and he put on garments in place of his skins.
> He was baptized for [Adam's] wrongdoing and embalmed for his death.
> He rose and raised him up in glory.
>
> (Nat. 23.12–13)

That same Compassionate One 'bore our pain' (Nat. 3.2). 'He endured spitting and scourging, thorns and nails for our sake' (Nat. 18.35).

Out of compassion and mercy, Christ freed human beings and all creation from the slavery of idolatry (Nat. 22.4–7). Ephrem relates this theme to the Roman tradition of temporarily releasing slaves for the Saturnalia:

> The mercy of the High One was revealed, > and he came down to free His creation.
> In this blessed month in which manumission takes place, > the Lord came to slavery to call the slaves to freedom.
> Blessed is He Who brought manumission!
>
> (Nat. 22.5)

Finally, Christians are expected to imitate the merciful condescension of their redeemer. Addressing Christ in his own voice, Ephrem says:

> O [You] Greater than measure Who became immeasurably small, > from glorious splendor you humbled Yourself to ignominy.
> Your indwelling mercy inclined You to all this.
> Let Your compassion incline me to become praiseworthy in [spite of] my evil.
>
> (Nat. 21.13)

The same is expected of all Christians since their baptism is a rebirth from the side of Christ, 'the Compassionate One who came to take up the body that would be struck so that by the opening of His side he might break through the way into Paradise' (Nat. 8.4).

We are all expected to reciprocate, as Ephrem reminds his congregation once again on the feast of the Nativity:

> On this day on which God came into the presence of sinners, > let not the just man exalt himself in his mind over the sinner.
> On this day on which the Lord of all came among servants, > let the lords also bow down to their servants lovingly.
> On this day when the Rich One was made poor for our sake, > let the rich man also make the poor man a sharer at his table.
> On this day a gift came out to us without our asking for it;
> let us then give alms to those who cry out and beg from us.
> This is the day when the high gate opened to us for our prayers;
> let us also open the gates to the seekers who have strayed but sought [forgiveness].
>
> (Nat. 1.92–96)

Finally, Ephrem explicitly binds this imitation of Christ, the Compassionate One, to non-violent behavior:

> Glorious is the Compassionate One
> Who did not use violence, and without force, by wisdom,
> He was victorious. He gave a type to human beings > that by power and wisdom they might conquer discerningly.
>
> (Nat. 8.5)

The divine condescension to humankind in the Incarnation has brought about a permanent change in the relationship between human beings and their Creator:

> [t]he Deity imprinted Itself on humanity, > so that humanity might also be cut into the seal of the Deity.
>
> (Nat. 1.99)

In addition to this language of seals and stamps, which he shares with the Logos theology of Greek Christianity, Ephrem expresses the intimate union of divine and human with the language of painting, likening it to the artist's blending of pigments:

> Glorious is the Wise One Who allied and joined > Divinity with humanity,
> One from the height and the other from below.
> He mingled the natures like pigments, > and an image came into being: the God-human!
>
> (Nat. 8.2)

The similarity of Ephrem's thought here to Athanasius's dictum, 'The Word of God became human so that we might become divine' has been noted.[31] But the difference in Ephrem's view needs also to be stressed. For him the Incarnation not only opens up the way to theosis but it also brings a humanization of God. He explores the dimensions of that humanization of God especially through images of birth and suckling. In the Incarnation:

Christ entered [Mary's] womb a mighty warrior and inside her womb He put on fear.
He entered Nourisher of all and He acquired hunger.
He entered the One who gives drink to all and He acquired thirst.
Stripped and laid bare, He emerged from [her womb]
the One who clothes all.

(Nat. 11.8)

The image of the suckling child provides a radical image of divine love for humankind. To the infant Christ Ephrem says:

[i]t is as if your love hungers for human beings
. . . what moves you so to bestow yourself upon each who has seen you? . . .
Whence did it come to you so to hunger for human beings?

(Nat. 13.12–14)

On the one hand, the Son freely chose to become incarnate: 'By His will, He clothed himself with a body' (Nat. 3.5). Yet this choice is clearly prompted by love, and it has the result that He became truly needy by this mingling of divinity with humanity:

Glory to Him Who never needs us to thank Him.
Yet He [became] needy for He loves us, and He thirsted for He cherishes us.
And He asks us to give to Him so that He may give us even more.
His Fruit was mingled with our human nature to draw us out toward Him Who bent down to us.
By the Fruit of the Root He will graft us onto His Tree.

(Nat. 3.17)

Perhaps the strongest image of the reciprocity which results from God's condescension to us occurs in a context not of the Incarnation but rather in its figurative equivalent, God's willingness to be clothed in human language, that is to say, the existence of revealed scripture.[32] In this regard Ephrem characterizes the Deity as like a nursing mother or wet nurse:

Attuned to us is the Deity as a nursing woman to an infant, observing the time for its wellbeing, knowing the time for weaning it, when it is to be nurtured with milk and when to be fed with solid food, weighing and offering benefits according to the measure of its maturity.

(Hymns on the Church 25.18)

This image of the Triune God pondering the right moment to move each human being from milk to solid food provides the perfect transition from Ephrem's understanding of the Incarnation as a singular historical event, the culmination of the history of salvation, to his notion that it is an ongoing reality accessible to each human being according to the level of his or her spiritual advancement.

The ongoing, individualized presence of God to each human being

Although God's grand concession to human frailty took place uniquely in the Incarnation, it also continues to take place in every time and place for each individual human being. God is revealed to each according to his or her capacity to perceive:

> He was cheerful among the infants as a baby;
> awesome was He among the Watchers[33] as a commander.
> Too awesome was He for John to loosen His sandals;
> accessible was He for sinners who kissed His feet.
> The Watchers as Watchers saw Him;
> according to the degree of his knowledge each person saw Him.
> Everyone according to the measure of his discernment > thus perceived Him, that One greater than all.

*(*Nat. 4.197–200)

The encounter between Jesus and the Samaritan woman (John 4)

For Ephrem, Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman at the well in John 4 is especially symbolic of the individualized relationship God conducts with each human being:[34]

> The glorious fount of Him Who was sitting > at the well as Giver of drink to all, > flows to each according to His will:
> different springs according to those who drink.
> From the well a single undifferentiated drink > came up each time for those who drank.
> The Living Fount lets distinct blessings > flow to distinct people.

*(*Virg. 23.2)

But, not satisfied merely to meet each of us at our present level of spiritual discernment, God leads each of us step by step to higher levels of understanding. Again, the Samaritan woman is paradigmatic of this process:

> Because she in her love said, 'The Messiah will come,'
> He revealed to her with love, 'I am He.'
> That He was a prophet she believed already, > soon after, that He was the Messiah . . .
> . . . she is a type of our humanity > that He leads step by step.

*(*Virg. 22.21)

Most ancient commentators on the story of the Samaritan woman saw her as an immoral woman, one who had been divorced many times or who had simply lived with several men without benefit of marriage. Ephrem found another solution to her having had five husbands and a sixth who was not really her husband. Like Tamar (Gen. 38:11) or like Sarah in the Book of Tobit (6:10–8:21), she had been unlucky in marriage: her husbands had died, so no man was brave enough to marry her. Thus her sixth husband did not share her marriage bed. This little detail is not only indicative of Ephrem's style of commentary—one that is narrative, literary, and based on a broad familiarity with scripture. It is also significant that having removed the cloud of opprobrium from over her head, Ephrem moves on to portray the Samaritan woman as an apostle, prophet, and type of the Theotokos, the Mother of God. He praises her for her readiness to share her insight into Jesus' messianic identity:

> Blessed are you, O woman, for not suppressing > your judgment about what you discovered.

(Virg. 23.1.1–2)

Ephrem notes that just as Jesus' love for her led him to meet her need, her love for her neighbors led her to share her news with them:

> The glorious Treasury was Himself present > for your need because of His love.
> Your love was zealous > to share your treasure with your city.
> Blessed woman, your discovery became > the Discoverer of the lost.

(Virg. 23.1.3–8)

Also laudable is the immediacy of her response to one small sign, to be contrasted with the obstinacy of those who refused to accept even the greater evidence of miracles. In her revelation to others of what she had heard, she is like Mary who conceived by her ear and thereby brought the Son to the world:

> [Praise] to you, o woman in whom I see > a wonder as great as in Mary!
> For she from within her womb > in Bethlehem brought forth His body as a child, > but you by your mouth made Him manifest > as an adult in Shechem, the town of His father's household.
> Blessed are you, woman, who brought forth by your mouth > light for those in darkness.
> Mary, the thirsty land in Nazareth, > conceived our Lord by her ear.
> You, too, O woman thirsting for water, > conceived the Son by your hearing.
> Blessed are your ears that drank the source > that gave drink to the world.
> Mary planted Him in the manger, > but you [planted him] in the ears of His hearers.

(Virg. 23.4–5)

Like the words of the prophets, what she spoke became reality:

> Your word, O woman, became a mirror > in which He might see your hidden heart.
> 'The Messiah,' you had said, 'will come, > and when He comes, He will give us everything.'
> Behold the Messiah for Whom you waited, modest woman!
> Through your voice . . . prophecy was fulfilled.

(Virg. 23.6)

She is comparable to the apostles since even before the Twelve were permitted to do so, she preached the good news of salvation to the gentiles:

> Your voice, O woman, first brought forth fruit, > even before the apostles [brought fruit] with their preaching.
> The apostles were forbidden to announce Him > among pagans and Samaritans.
> Blessed is your mouth that He opened and confirmed.
> The Storehouse of life took and gave you to sow.
> [Your] city, dead as Sheol,
> You entered, and you revived your dead [land].

(Virg. 23.7)

Spiritual progress and sanctification or theosis

Mary and the Beloved Disciple at the foot of the cross
(John 19:25–27)

Mary, the mother of Jesus, and the Beloved Disciple are also especially significant in Ephrem's under-standing of the ongoing process of the Incarnation in sanctification or theosis, the full restoration in each human being of the lost imago dei. Mary and John (with whom the Beloved Disciple has often been identified) see in one another the complementary mysteries of God's condescending love for us and the bold access to divine love now open to human beings.[35] Through them we, too, may see this twofold mystery of the Savior. John and Mary, the mother of Jesus, are 'types' through whom we are able to see Christ as in a mirror while they themselves saw Him in one another. Ephrem begins by evoking the scene at the foot of the cross as it is portrayed in John's gospel, where Jesus invites Mary and John to regard one another as mother and son:

> Blessed are you, O woman, whose Lord and son > entrusted you to one fashioned in His image.
> The Son of your womb did not wrong your love, > but to the son of His bosom He entrusted you.
> Upon your bosom you caressed Him when He was small, > and upon His bosom He also caressed [John],
> so that when He was crucified
> He repaid all you had advanced to Him, > the debt of His upbringing.
> For, the Crucified repaid debts;
> even yours was repaid by Him.
> He drank from your breast visible milk,
> but [John drank] from His bosom hidden mysteries.
> Confidently He approached your breast;
> confidently [John] approached and lay upon His bosom.
> Since you missed the sound of His voice,
> He gave you his harp > to be a consolation to you.

(Virg. 25.2–3)

The love and care which flowed from Mary to her son are echoed by the love of Jesus for John and repaid by entrusting her to his care. John shows a special resemblance to Jesus, Ephrem assumes, because he takes his place as Mary's son. But a deeper ethical mystery is contained here: the love of John for his Lord led him to imitate him, thus bringing into higher relief in him the imago dei engraved on each human being:

> The youth who loved our Lord very much,
> who portrayed [and] put Him on and resembled Him, > was zealous in all these matters to resemble Him:
> in his speech, his aspect and his ways.
> The creature put on his Creator, > and he resembled Him although indeed he did not resemble what He was.
> It is amazing how much the clay is able to be imprinted > with the beauty of its sculptor.
>
> (Virg. 25.4)

By meditating on the relationship of Jesus to His mother, John was better able to understand the Incarnation:

> The youth in the woman was seeing > how much that Exalted One was lowered, > how He entered [and] dwelt in a weak womb > and emerged [and] was suckled with weak milk.
>
> (Virg. 25.8.1–4)

Meanwhile, by observing the behavior of the Beloved Disciple Mary learned about the possibility of spiritual growth and the boldness it encourages:

> The woman also wondered at how much he grew > that he went up and lay upon the bosom of God.
> The two of them were amazed at one another,
> how much they were able to grow by grace.
> [It is] You, Lord, Whom they saw . . .
> while observing one another:
> Your mother saw You in Your disciple;
> And he saw You in Your mother.
>
> (Virg. 25.8.5–9.4)

Neither does the benefit of this insight stop with these two privileged and holy people, it extends to all who are willing to look deeply into their fellow human beings:

> O the seers who at every moment > see You, Lord, in a mirror > manifest a type so that we, too, in one another > may see You, our Savior.
>
> (Virg. 25.9.5–8)

Consecrated virginity

For Ephrem, thinking of the story of Martha and Mary, Mary Magdalen exemplifies perfectly the concentration on the inner presence of Christ that leads to the full restoration of the imago dei:

She turned her face away from everything to gaze on one beauty alone.
Blessed is her love that was intoxicated, not sober, so that she sat at His feet to gaze at Him.
Let you also portray the Messiah in your heart and love Him in your mind.

*(*Virg. 24.7.3–8)

More broadly speaking, for Ephrem it is the consecrated virgin who has most fully stripped off the old Adam to put on the new at baptism. Her body is clothed in a new garment; it is the Temple of God and His Royal Palace. But however strongly Ephrem admonishes the virgin to preserve her sexual innocence, it is clear that this is not an end in itself, but rather it is symbolic of the full dedication of self to God which is the goal of every Christian life:[36]

Let chastity be portrayed in your eyes and in your ears the sound of truth.
Imprint your tongue with the word of life and upon your hands [imprint] all alms.
Stamp your footsteps with visiting the sick, and let the image of your Lord be portrayed in your heart.
Tablets are honored because of the image of kings.
How much more will one be honored who has portrayed the Lord in all the senses.

*(*Virg. 2.15)

Biblical symbols and the presence of God in historical events

Among the historical symbols, biblical typology plays the central role. The events in the history of Israel narrated in Hebrew scripture have religious significance for all people. Like most early Christian writers, however, Ephrem saw the Hebrew scripture as preliminary sketches, as shadows, when compared with the realities of the New Testament:

[Christ's] power perfected the types, and His truth the mysteries,
His interpretation the similes,
His explanation the sayings,
and His assurances the difficulties.
By His sacrifice He abolished sacrifices, and libations by His incense,
and the [passover] lambs by His slaughter,
the unleavened [bread] by His bread, and the bitter [herbs] by His Passion.
By His healthy meal
He weaned [and] took away the milk.
By His baptism were abolished the bathing and sprinkling that the elders of the People taught.

*(*Virg. 8.8–10)

Despite the intrinsic importance of the events and persons of the 'Old Testament,' they are only 'antitypes' which were fulfilled in the 'types' of the New Testament. On the one hand, the Passover Lamb is an anticipation of Christ and of the salvation gained through Him. To attempt to understand Christ without knowing about the Passover would be to deprive oneself of the depth and richness of meaning placed in human history by God Himself. Yet conversely, in Ephrem's view, to stop with the Passover Lamb rather than interpreting it as a symbol of Christ would mean missing the fullness of God's revelation and accepting a truncated version of the meaning of history.

Ephrem's hymns are permeated with typological exegesis. The central figures of this typology are Jesus and Mary. Ephrem presents a rich variety of Old Testament types for Christ. In the second of his Nativity Hymns he systematically presents Jesus as the prophet, priest, and king. His selection of Old Testament figures as forerunners of Christ is similar to many other early Christian writers, but he adds unexpected interpretations as well. For example, Jesus is anticipated not only by Isaac, Melchizedek, Moses, and David, but also by Jacob, who is kicked by Esau but does not retaliate.

Ephrem's Mariology is central to his understanding of the Incarnation. Mary was chosen because she was most pleasing to God. Yet she who gave birth to the Son of the Most High was given birth by Him in baptism. Paradoxically, Mary gave birth to and nourished and cared for the Incarnate One who gave life, nourishment, and care to her. In this she represents all humans and indeed all creation:

> By power from Him Mary's womb became able > to bear the One Who bears all.
> From the great treasury of all creation
> Mary gave to Him everything that she gave.
> She gave Him milk from what He made exist.
> She gave Him food from what He had created.
> As God, He gave milk to Mary.
> In turn, as man, He was given suck by her.
>
> (Nat. 4.182–185)

Her theological importance is confirmed by the wealth of Ephrem's typology for Mary. She is not only the second Eve, but she is also a second Sarah, Rachel, and Anna; she is favorably compared and contrasted with Tamar, Ruth, and Rahab (Hymns on the Nativity 8.13, 13.2–5, 9.7–16, 15.8, 16.12).[37] Most unusual is Ephrem's imagery drawn from the Jewish priestly cult to provide a typology for Mary's role. The virginity of Mary and of all the 'daughters of the covenant' is the vestment of the High Priest, who is Christ:

> May all the evidences of virginity of Your brides > be preserved by You. They are the purple [robes] > and no one may touch them > except our King. For virginity > is like a vestment for You, the High Priest.
>
> (Nat. 16.13)

Like the Ark of the Covenant, Mary is honored not for herself but for the divine presence within her:

> Joseph rose > to serve in the presence of his Lord
> Who was within Mary. The priest serves > in the presence of Your Ark because of Your holiness.
>
> (Nat. 16.16)

The Tablets containing the teachings of the Mosaic Law also constitute an antitype which is fulfilled in Mary:

Moses bore the tablets of stone that His Lord had written. And Joseph escorted the pure tablet in whom was dwelling the Son of the Creator. The tablets were left behind since the world was filled with Your teaching.

*(*Nat. 16.17)

These unusual typologies are all based on the premise that in the Incarnation, Mary became the dwelling place of God on earth.

To grasp more fully the significance for Ephrem of these metaphors one must be aware that in Syriac 'virginity' (bethulutha) is synonymous with 'chastity' (qaddishutha) which also means 'holiness.'[38] Behind the coincidence in meanings between 'chastity' and 'holiness' is ultimately a notion of mysterious power, untouchable sacral presence. Mary as the virgin par excellence is uniquely suited to be the holy one in whom—or perhaps better the holy place in which—God deigns to be present.

The sacred dimension of all of history

Not only the events described in scripture, but all historical events must have profound religious significance. Ephrem's Hymns against Julian, along with the Nisibene Hymns, display his kinship with the Jewish prophets. Like them, he contemplates the political and military events of his time in the light of his ethical and theological tenets, looking for evidence of divine activity, rewards, punishments, and edifying moral lessons. Living as he did in an area at the easternmost edge of the Roman empire constantly under the pressure of Sassanid Persia, Ephrem was presented with dramatic historical events for his contemplation. When the Persian army besieged his town of Nisibis for the third time and it was spared even after its protecting city wall had been broken down, he composed poetry about salvation and grace:

[God] saved us without a wall and taught that He is our wall.
He saved us without a king and made known that He is our king.
He saved us in all from all and showed He is all.
He saved us by His grace and again revealed that He is freely gracious and life-giving. From each who boasts
He takes away the boast and gives to him His grace.

*(*Nisibene Hymns 2.2)

Warnings against idolatry and encouragement in adversity are as prominent in his hymns as in the pronouncements of Jeremiah and Isaiah. When the apostate Roman emperor Julian brought his army into Mesopotamia, ostentatiously offering sacrifice to the old pagan deities, pressuring the Christians of Mesopotamia to join in that worship, but finally dying in battle (in June 363 CE), Ephrem was not at a loss for words. He elaborated the view that God had made the apostate emperor Julian the representative and symbol of all who hold erroneous views—not only pagans but also heretics and Jews. His defeat was a sign to all nations of the ultimate fate of those who oppose God.

The first of Ephrem's five Hymns against Julian stands apart from the rest since it was written prior to the emperor's death in battle. Here the poet offers a message of hope and perseverance to the people of Nisibis, threatened with persecution. The other four hymns reiterate and develop that message in the light of subsequent events. Rather than focusing on the loss of their city to the Persians, a catastrophe caused by Nisibene acquiescence to Julian's re-establishment of paganism there, Ephrem emphasizes that the claims of paganism have been proved false by the fate of the apostate emperor. The political events provide a larger-than-life drama of the cosmic conflict between good and evil. God's partisans, the true members of the Church of Nisibis, with the encouragement of the watching angels, withstood the onslaughts of Satan in the form of imperial persecution and Persian military attacks.

Using a favorite metaphor, the mirror as the instrument of divine ethical lessons, Ephrem takes the apostate emperor as the model of human pride as well as of political promotion of religious error. His policies unmasked the false Christians within the church; his ignominious death demonstrates the folly of his pride as well as the falsity of his beliefs. The divine purpose in the defeat and death of the Roman emperor was to present to all people a model of the vanity of idolatry. At the same time, the fidelity of Christians has been tested and many have been found wanting during the pagan emperor's brief reign. Weak or false Christians have returned openly to paganism, or they have attacked their Creator in the contentious error of the Arian heresy. The Jewish people, he contends, have also returned to idolatrous worship. On the other hand, the city of Nisibis presents, again as if in a mirror, a model for fidelity to God, its rewards, and the consequences of its lapse. Reinforcing this primary imagery is the symbol of the church as the true vine, beneficially pruned by the rigors of persecution:

> Rely on the truth, my brothers, and be not afraid > for our Lord is not so weak as to fail us in the test.
> He is the power on which the world and its inhabitants depend.
> The hope of His Church depends on Him.
> Who is able to sever its heavenly roots?
>
> *(*Hymns against Julian 1.1)

> Although the branch is living, on it are dead fruits > blooming only outwardly.
> The wind tried them and cast off the wild grapes.
>
> *(*Jul. 1.5)

Several other metaphors serve to teach the same lesson: separation of the wheat from the tares, the purification of gold in the furnace, and separation of the curds and whey in cheesemaking (Jul. 1.10–13, 2.10–11; 1.13, 2.24, 4.1; 4.2).

To these symbols current in both biblical and general Hellenistic contexts, Ephrem adds biblical examples of faithless sovereigns and the consequences of their erroneous ways: Nebuchadnezzar, Jeroboam, Ahab, Jotham, Manasseh, Jezebel, Athaliah, and Saul provide precedents for Julian's errors as well as his fate (Jul. 1.8, 1.20, 2.2, 4.5, 4.8). The attendant notions of true and false prophecy provide a context for his contention that in this case the church has followed the course of Daniel, confronting the pagan ruler, whereas the Jewish people have followed the precedent of the Israelites under Jeroboam, worshiping the golden calf (Jul. 1.16–20, 2.2.). While this general approach, aptly named by Ruether 'prophetic anti-Judaism,'[39] is typical of patristic writers, Ephrem pursues his view with tenacious originality, accompanied, one suspects, by a modicum of perverse misrepresentation. In support of the parallel with the Israelite worship of the golden calf, for example, he associates Julian's bull coinage (see Figures 59.3a and b) with his attempt to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem as well as claiming that the music and sacrifice of traditional Jewish worship resemble pagan worship in its raucousness. Likewise, to the established argument that Daniel prophesied the permanent destruction of the Jewish Temple, he adds the claim implicit in Constantine's building program but not generally stated in theological polemics that Christian pilgrimage functions as a substitute for the Jewish cult of Jerusalem (Jul. 4.23–25).

Throughout these hymns, he exploits an extensive variety of animal imagery. The Orphic and broadly Hellenistic notion of a philanthropic shepherd king, already well-established as a model for Christ, is presented as a foil for Julian, the bad king (Jul. 1.1–2). Rather than a good shepherd, he is a wolf in sheep's clothing, or a he-goat, favoring the goats rather than the sheep (Jul. 2.1–4). The latter image has the added punch of alluding to Julian's unpopular beard as well as intimating lasciviousness (Jul. 2.6–9). Ephrem's almost apocalyptic description of the conflict between the forces of good and evil is enhanced by his association of the pagans with vermin, dragons, and the primal chaos as well as with the more mundane insults of association with hogs and filth (Jul. 1.3, 1.5, 2.13).

Figure 59.3a and b   Billon or bronze follis (AE1) of Julian II, 'the Apostate' (an example of his 'bull' coinage).[40]
Photo American Numismatic Society

Finally, Ephrem's symbolic imagination provides several examples of the ironic outcome of Julian's efforts. Considering it suitable that 'the punishment should fit the crime,' he finds numerous coincidences to confirm this view. For example, the emperor's death near Babylon in conjunction with his 'denial' of Daniel's prophecy cements the parallel of Julian with Nebuchadnezzar (Jul. 1.18–20). Moreover, Ephrem spins out in elaborate detail the inherent contradiction of Julian's attempt to use Chaldean religion to defeat Persians, and the paradox that he was misled by the oracles to become himself the sacrificial goat (Jul. 2.4–25, 4.5–14). The coincidental features of his uncle Julian's fate should have astonished the emperor as they did Ephrem (Jul. 4.3). Likewise laden with significance is the similarity of Julian's death by a lance to the death of his sacrificial animals, both of which are implicitly contrasted with the death of the True Lamb who, being pierced, released humankind from the curse of the lance that barred the gate to Paradise (Jul. 3.14).

After the death of Julian, the Roman army had chosen a new emperor, Jovian, an orthodox Christian. Seeing no alternative to surrender under the disadvantageous terms offered him by Shapur, Jovian accepted them. These terms included cession to Persia of the city of Nisibis without its inhabitants. The city was, in Ephrem's eyes, the sacrificial lamb that saved the Roman army (Jul. 2.15.6). Unlike Ammianus Marcellinus, however, who portrays the fate of Nisibis in exclusively negative terms, Ephrem stresses that, although the city itself was ceded to Persia, the Persian ruler showed respect for its Christian churches and permitted its citizens to depart for Roman territory rather than executing them, enslaving them, or exiling them into the eastern reaches of the Persian empire, as had been the fate of the inhabitants of other recalcitrant Mesopotamian cities (Jul. 2.22–27). To celebrate his victory and show appropriate disdain for the religion of the Roman army that had attacked his empire, the Persian king was apparently satisfied to destroy the pagan temples associated specifically with Julian (Jul. 2.22). Still, the entire Christian population of this fortress city migrated within a short time to the adjacent cities of the Roman empire. Ephrem was among those who went to Edessa, where he would spend his last ten years. Thus the heroic struggle of his native city, a symbol of Rome and of Christianity, against the mighty Persian empire, a struggle which had occupied most of his adult life, ended in defeat and disgrace. The 'constant, unwearying herald' was surrendered to the Persians (Jul. 2.16.6). As he meditates on these events in his Nisibene Hymns and in his Hymns against Julian, Ephrem again shows himself to be a genuine heir to the Jewish prophetic tradition, interpreting historical events as directed by divine Providence toward the attainment of justice in this world.[41] There must be a reason for God's allowing Nisibis to be taken. For him that reason is clear: the apostasy of the Christian Roman emperor and of those who followed him in reinstating pagan worship:

Who else has so multiplied altars?
Who else has so honored all the evil spirits?
Who else has so pleased all the demons?
He angered only the One, and he was broken.
In him was confuted the entire faction of wrong,
a force unable to support its worshipers!

(Jul. 4.6)

Human beings in the divine image and divine presence in all of nature

Ephrem's emphasis on the Incarnation and his extension of that historical moment into the process of sanctification show clearly that human beings have a special place in the created order:

Blessed is He Who engraved our soul and adorned and betrothed her to Him[self].
Blessed is He Who made our body a Tabernacle for His hiddenness.
Blessed is He Who with our tongue interpreted His secrets.
Let us give thanks to that Voice Whose praise on our lyre and Whose power on our kithara are sung.

(Nat. 3.7.1–5)

He is He Who Himself constructed the senses of our minds so that we might sing on our lyre something that the mouth of the bird is unable to sing in its melodies.
Glory to the One Who saw that we had been pleased to resemble the animals in our rage and greed, and [so] He descended and became one of us that we might become heavenly.

(Nat. 3.16)

Although it is clear that human beings with the imago dei enjoy a unique position in the world, certain material things enjoy a privileged place since they link the world of nature to the world of scripture. That privileged place is rooted in nature, in their physical properties and their names. So oil is symbolic of Christ and the salvation brought by Him, not only because He is literally, 'the Anointed One' who fulfills the roles of priest, prophet, and king, but also due to the natural properties of oil: its healing and strengthening properties, its capacity to provide light, its use with pigments for painting an image, its ability to ease forces in conflict, and even its property of floating on water, as Jesus walked on the water (Virg. 4–7)! All these properties resonate in the baptismal anointing in which the imago dei is restored to us:

The lamp returned our lost things, and the Anointed also [returned] our treasures.
The lamp found the coin, and the Anointed [found] the image of Adam.

(Virg. 5.8.5–6)

The bread and wine of the Eucharist, although they provide a less fertile field for Ephrem's imagination, play a similar role:[42]

Blessed is the Shepherd Who became the sheep for our absolution.
Blessed is the Vineshoot that became the cup of our salvation.
Blessed also is the Cluster, the source of the medicine of life.

Blessed also is the Ploughman Who Himself became the grain of wheat that was sown and the sheaf that was reaped.
He is the Master Builder Who became a tower for our refuge.

(Nat. 3.15)

Not only the elements of the sacraments, however, but other material things and concepts are symbolic of Christ. So Satan's temptations of Jesus have ironic appropriateness: he tempted with bread the 'Sustainer of all,' with stones, 'the perfect Stone,' with kingship the true king (Virg. 14). Even things without a symbolic tradition in scripture may be seen as representative of Christ's altruistic suffering. In one of his Virginity Hymns he considers a long series of minerals, plants, and animals all worked by human craft for our benefit despite the harm done to them. Like a Buddhist or Manichaean sage, Ephrem notes that they all suffer for our benefit, making them symbolic of Christ, as the following excerpt from the list shows:

Iron and a sharp stake, indeed, pierce the pearl like that One Who was pierced by nails and on the cross.
It becomes by its suffering an adornment for humankind.
When a fruit is eaten, by means of its suffering its taste pours out in the mouth. This is a symbol of that Fruit that brings to life His eaters when His body is eaten.
The sheep in its shame strips off its garment and cloak and gives all of it to its shearers, like the Lamb Who divided His garments for His crucifiers.
All these things teach by their symbols:
they open by their sufferings the treasure of their riches, and the suffering of the Son of the Gracious One is the key of His treasures.

(Hymns on Virginity 11.9, 12, 17, 20)

Finally, every beauty of daily life is a tangible reminder of the graciousness of God:

But remaining are all those things the Gracious One made in His mercy.
Let us see those things that He does for us every day!
How many tastes for the mouth! How many beauties for the eye!
How many melodies for the ear! How many scents for the nostrils!
Who can be compared to the goodness of these little things!

(Virg. 3.16)

Abbreviations

APB = Acta Patristica et Byzantina
CSCO = Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium
GEDSH = Gorgias Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Syriac Heritage, ed. Sebastian Brock et al. Piscataway, NJ, 2011
Hugoye = Hugoye: Journal of Syriac Studies. http://www.acad.cua.edu/syrcom/Hugoye
JECS = Journal of Early Christian Studies
OC = Oriens Christianus
OHECS The Oxford Handbook of Early Christian Studies. Edited by Susan A. Harvey and David G. Hunter. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2008.
PdO = Parōle de l'Orient

PO = Patrologia Orientalis
SA = Studia Anselmiana
SP = Studia Patristica
VC = Vigiliae Christianae
ZAC = Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum
Jul. = Beck 1957
Nat. = Beck 1959
Virg. = Beck 1962

Notes

1 On the history and culture of Nisibis and its Christians up to and during Ephrem's time there, see Fiey 1977, Bundy 2000 and 2002. On the origins of Christianity more broadly in Syro-Mesopotamia, see Murray 2004: 1–38, Van Rompay 2008, Harrak 2014, Tubach 2015.
2 On relations between the two empires, see Drijvers 2009.
3 See also Hymns on Virginity 37.10. All translations of the Syriac are mine and based on Beck's editions.
4 On Aberkios and his inscription, now see Ferguson 2017 and Tabbernee 2017.
5 Drijvers 1970, Murray 2004: 1–38; on the problematic nature of these categories, see Williams 1996, Boyarin 2009.
6 Koltun-Fromm 2010.
7 Golitzin 2003, Tuschling 2007, Fomicheva 2013.
8 On new perspectives in the study of Judaism, see Collins 2010.
9 Taylor 2002, Millar 2011, Andrade 2014.
10 For example, Bou Mansour 1988, Den Biesen 2006. On Ephrem's use of Greek philosophical concepts, see Possekel 1999. Recent work has drawn attention to Ephrem's melding of poetic and rhetorical skills; see, for example, Den Biesen 2006, Botha 2006 and 2008, but still there is hesitation to claim the influence of Greek rhetoric.
11 For a comprehensive treatment of the types of writings in Ephrem's corpus, see Brock 2007. On the problem of whether to translate his madrashe as 'teaching songs' rather than 'hymns,' see Lattke 1989, Den Biesen 2006: 329.
12 Griffith 1986. On Ephrem's Trinitarian theology in the broader context, Ayres 2004, Possekel 2009, Wickes 2015a, Fiano 2015.
13 Keser-Kayaalp and Erdoğan 2013, Possekel 2017.
14 An inscription identifies the building as the baptistery completed by Bishop Vologeses in 359/60. Its popular designation is the result of later overbuilding and reuse as a burial place for Jacob; eventually (after destruction by an earthquake of the basilica Jacob had constructed) it functioned as a church; this probably led to its popular identification as 'Church of Mar Jacob.'
15 Some overviews of Ephrem's life: McVey 1989: 5–28, Brock 2011, Wickes 2015a: 3–14. On sources for Ephrem's life, Brock 1999, Amar 2011. On Ephrem and women's choirs, Amar 1995, Harvey 2005, McVey 2007.
16 Lange 2008.
17 On female imagery in the Odes and in Ephrem, Brock 1990b, Harvey 1994 and 2012, McVey 2001 and 2014.
18 On the hymn in the Acts of Thomas, Ferreira 2002; on Ephrem's hymns, Mathews 1994; on the broad cultural and religious resonances of Ephrem's hymns, Fredrikson 2003.
19 Griffith 1999a, 1999b, 2001, and 2002, Lieu 2015: 151–76.
20 Séd 1968, Kronholm 1978, Brock 1990a, Maier 2012, Monnickendam 2015.
21 Martikainen 1974, Griffith 1987, McVey 1989: 34–9, 221–57.
22 Beck 1949 and 1953, Shepardson 2008a; on 'Arians' see Lyman 2008.
23 Rouwhorst 1989, Naduvilezham 2000, Shepardson 2008b, Walters 2011.
24 McVey 1990, cf. Daelemans 2011 and 2012.
25 Shepardson 2008a, Wickes 2015b.
26 On his later influence, see Palmer 1998 and 1999.
27 Brock 2002 and 2010, Petersen 2011.
28 On the corpus of ancient translations, see Den Biesen 2011: 16–21.
29 See, e.g., Palmer 1995, 2003, and 2009, Brock 1999, Van Rompay 2007, Butts forthcoming 2017.
30 The literature on Ephrem's use of symbols is vast. The present essay draws principally on the Hymns on the Nativity, on Julian and on Virginity in Beck's editions; central to it are the insights of Murray 1975 and Brock 1992. See also Bou Mansour 1988, Den Biesen 2006.

31 Brock 1990a: 72–4, McVey 1989: 74, n. 66. For the broader context of theosis in Ephrem's thought, see Koonammakkal 1991, Brock 1992, Buck 1999, Daelemans 2011 and 2012.

32 Brock characterizes this as another sort of 'incarnation' of the Word (1990a: 45–9).

33 On 'Watchers,' a class of angels important to Ephrem, see now Tuschling 2007: 70–93, 153–75.

34 Further on Ephrem and the Samaritan woman, see McVey 1987–88 and 1989: 354–64, Beck 1990, McCarthy 2000: 198–204, Lange 2005: 65–6 and 2008: 381–6, Ri 2010, McVey 2017.

35 On these themes, see McVey 1989: 369–75; for a more comprehensive treatment, see Yousif 1989.

36 On Ephrem's understanding of virginity and of 'singleness' in the context of early Syriac tradition, see Koonammakal 1999.

37 Botha 2006.

38 On the notions of holiness more broadly, see Koltun-Fromm 2010.

39 Ruether 1974: 117–82.

40 Obverse: Portrait bust pearl-diademed, draped, cuirassed, right. Legend: D[ominus] N[oster] FL[avius] CL[audius] IVLI-ANVS P[ius] F[elix] AVG[ustus]; Reverse: Bull, head facing, standing right; two stars above: Legend SECVRITAS REIPVB[licae]. (Palm) ANT[iochia] Δ (palm). Minted at Antioch 4th officina. Weight 8.77 grams, Diameter 27.5 mm. ANS 1984.146.576. American Numismatic Society. On the much-disputed interpretation of the symbols on this coin, now see Woods 2000, Tougher 2004.

41 See Martikainen 1974, Griffith 1987.

42 For example, see Hymns on Virginity 16.2.4.5 and 31.13–14. Further on Ephrem's understanding of the Eucharist, see Yousif 1984.

Bibliography

Bibliographic Tools

Minov, S. et al. (2013) A Comprehensive Bibliography on Syriac Christianity. The Center for the Study of Christianity, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem: www.csc.org.il/db/db.aspx?db=SB

Brock, S. (2007) 'A brief guide to the main editions and translations of the works of Saint Ephrem,' Saint Éphrem, un poète pour notre temps. Patrimoine Syriaque, Actes du Colloque XI. Antélias, Lebanon: Centre d'Études et de Recherches Orientales, 281–338.

Den Biesen, K. (2011) Annotated Bibliography of Ephrem the Syrian. 2nd ed. Lulu. www.lulu.com.

Secondary sources

Amar, J. (ed.) (trans.) (1995) A Metrical Homily on Holy Mar Ephrem by Mar Jacob of Serugh. PO 47. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols.

Amar, J. (ed.) (trans.) (2011) The Syriac Vita Tradition of Ephrem the Syrian. CSCO. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters.

Andrade, N. (2014) 'Assyrians, Syrians and the Greek language in the late Hellenistic and Roman imperial periods,' Journal of Near Eastern Studies 73: 299–317.

Ayres, L. (2004) Nicaea and its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Beck, E. (1949) Die Theologie des Hl. Ephraem in seinem Hymnem über den Glauben. SA 21. Rome: Libreria Vaticana, Beck, E. (1953) Ephräms Reden über den Glauben. Ihr theologischer Lehrgehalt und ihr geschichtlicher Rahmen. SA 33. Rome: Pontificio Ateneo S. Anselmo.

Beck, E. (ed.) (1957) Des Heiligen Ephraem des Syrers Hymnen de Paradiso und Contra Julianum. CSCO 174. Louvain, Belgium: CSCO.

Beck, E. (ed.) (1959) Des Heiligen Ephraem des Syrers Hymnen de Nativitate (Epiphania). CSCO 186. Louvain, Belgium: CSCO.

Beck, E. (ed.) (1962) Des Heiligen Ephraem des Syrers Hymnen de Virginitate. CSCO 223. Louvain, Belgium: CSCO.

Beck, E. (1990) 'Der syrische Diatessaronkommentar zu der Perikope von der Samariterin am Brunnen,' OC 74: 1–24.

Botha, P. J. (2006) 'Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Mary—the bold women in Ephrem the Syrian's Hymn De Nativitate 9,' APB 17: 1–21.

Botha, P. J. (2008) 'The poet as preacher: St. Ephrem the Syrian's Hymn De Virginitate XXXI as a coherent, aesthetic, and persuasive poetic discourse,' APB 19: 44–72.

Bou Mansour, T. (1988) La Pensée symbolique de Saint Ephrem le Syrien. Bibliothèque de l'Université Saint-Esprit 16. Kaslik, Lebanon: Université Saint-Esprit.

Boyarin, D. (2009) 'Rethinking Jewish Christianity: An argument for dismantling a dubious category (to which is appended a correction of my Border Lines),' Jewish Quarterly Review 99: 7–36.

Brock, S. (intro.) (trans.) (1990a) St Ephrem the Syrian. Hymns on Paradise. Crestwood, NY: St Vladimir's Seminary Press.

Brock, S. (1990b) 'The Holy Spirit as feminine in early Syriac literature,' in Soskice, J. M. (ed.) After Eve: Women, Theology and the Christian Tradition. London: Marshall Pickering, Collins, 73–88, esp. 83–4.

Brock, S. (1992) The Luminous Eye: The Spiritual World Vision of St Ephrem. Rev. ed. Cistercian Studies 124. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications.

Brock, S. (1999) 'St Ephrem in the eyes of later Syriac liturgical tradition,' Hugoye 2: 5–25.

Brock, S. (2002) 'The seeds of liturgical drama in Syriac?' In Chehwan, A. and Kassis, A. (eds) Études Bibliques et Proche-Orient Ancien: Mélanges offerts au Rvd. Père Paul Feghali. Beirut: Fédération Biblique, 323–41.

Brock, S. (2010) 'Dramatic narrative poems on biblical topics in Syria,' SP 45: 183–96.

Brock, S. (2011) 'Ephrem,' GEDSH: 145–7.

Buck, C. (1999) Paradise and Paradigm: Key Symbols in Persian Christianity and the Bahā'ī Faith. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.

Bundy, D. (2000) 'Vision for the city: Nisibis in Ephrem's Hymns on Nicomedia,' in Valantasis, R. (ed.) Religions of Late Antiquity in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 189–206.

Bundy, D. (2002) 'Bishop Vologese and the Persian Siege of Nisibis in 359 C.E.: A study in Ephrem's Mēmrē on Nicomedia,' Encounter 63: 55–63.

Butts, A. M. (forthcoming 2017) 'Manuscript transmission as reception history: The case of Ephrem the Syrian (d. 373),' Presented at 'Beyond Authority: Composition and Transmission of Tradition in Late Antiquity' Department of Religion, Princeton University, March 20–22, 2016. Journal of Early Christian Studies 25.

Collins, J. J. (2010) 'Early Judaism in modern scholarship,' in Collins, J. J. and Harlow, D. C. (eds) Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1–23.

Daelemans, B. (2011) 'Dieu sauve en se montrant: La révélation rédemptrice dans la troisième hymne sur la Nativité de St. Éphrem,' Orientalia Christiana Periodica 77: 351–98.

Daelemans, B. (2012) 'Le caché nous relève en se révélant: La révélation rédemptrice dans les hymnes sur la Nativité de St. Éphrem,' Orientalia Christiana Periodica 78: 29–80.

Den Biesen, K. (2006) Simple and Bold: Ephrem's Art of Symbolic Thought. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Drijvers, H. J. W. (1970) 'Edessa und das jüdische Christentum,' VC 24: 4–33.

Drijvers, J. W. (2009) 'Rome and the Sasanid empire: Confrontation and coexistence,' in Rousseau, P. (ed.) with Raithel, J. A Companion to Late Antiquity. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell, 441–54.

Ferguson, E. (2017) 'Aberkios,' in Finney, P. C. (ed.) Eerdmans Encyclopedia of Early Christian Art, 3 vols. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmanns Publishing, 1.2–3.

Ferreira, J. (2002) The Hymn of the Pearl: The Syriac and Greek Texts with Introduction, Translations, and Notes. Sydney: St. Pauls Publications.

Fiano, E. (2015) 'The Trinitarian controversies in fourth-century Edessa,' Le Muséon 128: 85–125.

Fiey, J.-M. (1977) Nisibe: Métropole syriaque orientale et ses suffragants des origines à nos jours. CSCO 388 subsidia 54. Louvain, Belgium: CSCO.

Fomicheva, S. V. (2013) 'Taina (rā'zā) u Efrema Sirina: iudeiskie paralleli,' in Bitner, K. A. and Lukintsova, L. A. (eds) Jewish and Biblical Studies: The Proceedings of the 2nd Academic Conference on the Jewish and Eastern Studies 17 December 2012. St. Petersburg, 139–57. (Russian).

Fredrikson, N. I. (2003) 'La perle, entre l'océan et le ciel. Origines et évolution d'un symbole chrétien,' Revue de l'histoire des religions 220: 283–317.

Golitzin, A. (2003) 'Recovering the "Glory of Adam": "Divine Light" traditions in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Christian ascetical literature of fourth-century Syro-Mesopotamia,' in Davila, J. R. (ed.) The Dead Sea Scrolls as Background to Postbiblical Judaism and Early Christianity: Papers from an International Conference at St. Andrews in 2001. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 275–308.

Griffith, S. H. (1986) 'Ephraem, the deacon of Edessa, and the church of the empire,' in Halton, T. P. and Williman, J. P. (eds) Diakonia: Studies in Honor of Robert T. Meyer. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press, 25–52.

Griffith, S. H. (1987) 'Ephraem the Syrian's Hymns "Against Julian": Meditations on history and imperial power,' VC 41: 238–66.

Griffith, S. H. (1999a) 'Setting right the church of Syria: Saint Ephraem's Hymns against Heresies,' in Klingshirn, W. E. and Vessey, M. (eds) The Limits of Ancient Christianity: Essays on Late Antique Thought and Culture in Honor of R. A. Markus. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 97–114.

Griffith, S. H. (1999b) 'The marks of the "true church" according to Ephraem's Hymns against Heresies,' in Reinink, G. J. and Klugkist, A. C. (eds) After Bardaisan: Studies on Continuity and Change in Syriac Christianity in Honour of Professor Han J. W. Drijvers. Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta 89. Louvain, Belgium: Peeters, 125–40.

Griffith, S. H. (2001) 'The thorn among the tares: Mani and Manichaeism in the works of St. Ephraem the Syrian,' SP 35: 395–427.

Griffith, S. H. (2002) 'Christianity in Edessa and the Syriac-speaking world: Mani, Bar Daysan, and Ephrem; the struggle for allegiance on the Aramean frontier,' Journal of the Canadian Society for Syriac Studies 2: 5–20.

Harrak, A. (2014) 'Was Edessa or Adiabene the gateway for the Christianization of Mesopotamia?' in Aitken, E. B. and Fossey, J. M. (eds) The Levant: Crossroads of Late Antiquity. History, Religion and Archaeology/ Le Levant: Carrefour de l'Antiquité tardive. Histoire, religion et archéologie. McGill University Monographs in Classical Archaeology and History 22. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 165–80.

Harvey, S. A. (1994) 'The Odes of Solomon,' in Fiorenza, E. S. (ed.) Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Commentary. New York: Crossroad, 2: 86–98.

Harvey, S. A. (2005) 'Revisiting the daughters of the covenant: Women's choirs and sacred song in ancient Syriac Christianity,' Hugoye 8(2): 125–49.

Harvey, S. A. (2012) 'Performance as exegesis: Women's liturgical choirs in Syriac tradition,' in Groen, B. J. et al. (eds) Inquiries into Eastern Christian Worship: Acts of the Second International Congress of the Society of Oriental Liturgy. Eastern Christian Studies 12. Louvain, Belgium: Peeters, 47–64.

Keser-Kayaalp, E. and Erdoğan, N. (2013) 'The cathedral complex at Nisibis,' Anatolian Studies 63: 137–54.

Koltun-Fromm, N. (2010) Hermeneutics of Holiness: Ancient Jewish and Christian Notions of Sexuality and Religious Community. New York: Oxford University Press.

Koonammakkal, T. (1991) The theology of divine names in the genuine works of Ephrem. Oxford dissertation.

Koonammakkal, T. (1999) 'Ephrem's ideas on singleness,' Hugoye 2(1): 57–99.

Kronholm, T. (1978) Motifs from Genesis 1–11 in the Genuine Hymns of Ephrem the Syrian, with Particular Reference to the Influence of Jewish Exegetical Traditions. Uppsala, Sweden: Almqvist & Wiksell.

Lange, C. (2005) The Portrayal of Christ in the Syriac Commentary on the Diatessaron. Louvain, Belgium: Peeters.

Lange, C. (2008) Ephraem de Syrer Kommentar zum Diatessaron übersetzt und eingeleitet. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols, Fontes Christiani 54.

Lattke, M. (1989) 'Sind Ephraems Madrāšē Hymnen?,' OC 73: 38–43.

Lieu, J. M. (2015) Marcion and the Making of a Heretic: God and Scripture in the Second Century. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Lyman, J. R. (2008) 'Arius and Arians,' in Harvey, S. A. and Hunter, D. G. (eds) OHECS. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 237–57.

Maier, C. E. (2012) 'Poetry as exegesis: Ephrem the Syrian's method of scriptural interpretation especially as seen in his "Hymns on Paradise" and "Hymns on Unleavened Bread",' PhD dissertation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton Theological Seminary.

Martikainen, J. (1974) 'Some remarks about the Carmina Nisibena as a literary and a theological source,' in Ortiz de Urbina, I. (ed.) Symposium Syriacum, 1972: célébré dans les jours 26–31 octobre 1972 à l'Institut Pontifical Oriental de Rome. Orientalia Christiana Analecta 197. Roma: Pontificium Institutum Orientalium Studiorum, 345–52.

Mathews, E. G. (1994) 'St. Ephrem, Madrase on faith, 81–85: Hymns on the Pearl, I–V,' St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 38: 45–72.

McCarthy, C. (2000) Saint Ephrem's Commentary on Tatian's Diatessaron: An English Translation of Chester Beatty Syriac MS 709 with Introduction and Notes. Journal of Semitic Studies Supplement 2. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press

McVey, K. E. (1987–88) 'St. Ephrem's understanding of spiritual progress: Some points of comparison with Origen of Alexandria,' The Harp 1(2/3): 117–28.

McVey, K. E. (intro.) (trans.) (1989) Ephrem the Syrian. Hymns. Classics of Western Spirituality. New York: Paulist.

McVey, K. E. (1990) 'The anti-Judaic polemic of Ephrem Syrus' Hymns on the Nativity,' in Attridge, H. W. et al. Of Scribes and Scrolls: Studies on the Hebrew Bible, Intertestamental Judaism, and Christian Origins Presented to J. Strugnell on the Occasion of His Sixtieth Birthday. New York: University Press of America, 229–40.

McVey, K. E. (2001) 'Ephrem the Syrian's use of female metaphors to describe the Deity,' ZAC 5: 261–88.

McVey, K. E. (2007) 'Ephrem the kitharode and proponent of women: Jacob of Sarug's portrait of a 4th c. churchman for the 6th c. viewer and its significance for the 21st c. ecumenist,' in Kimbrough, S. T. (ed.) Orthodox and Wesleyan Ecclesiology. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 229–53.

McVey, K. E. (2014) 'Syriac Christianity and gender in Trinitarian theology,' in Anatolios, K. (ed.) The Holy Trinity in the Life of the Church. Holy Cross Studies in Patristic Theology and History. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 199–216.

McVey, K. E. (2017) 'Samaritan woman,' in Finney, P. C. (ed.) Eerdmans Encycledia of Early Christian Art, 3 vols. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmanns Publishing, 2.451–3.

Millar, F. (2011) 'Greek and Syriac in Edessa: From Ephrem to Rabbula (CE 363–435),' Semitica et Classica 4: 99–114.

Monnickendam, Y. (2015) 'How Greek is Ephrem's Syriac? Ephrem's commentary on Genesis as a case study,' JECS 23: 213–44.

Murray, R. (1975) 'The theory of symbolism in St. Ephrem's theology,' PdO 6: 1–20.

Murray, R. (2004) Symbols of Church and Kingdom: A Study in Early Syriac Tradition, rev. ed. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Naduvilezham, J. (2000) The Theology of the Paschal Lamb in Ephrem of Nisibis. Oriental Institute of Religious Studies India Publications 239. Kottayam, India: Oriental Institute of Religious Studies.

Palmer, A. (1995) 'Words, silences, and the silent word: Acrostics and empty columns in saint Ephrem's Hymns on faith,' PdO 2: 129–200.

Palmer, A. (ed.) (1998, 1999) 'The influence of Saint Ephraim the Syrian,' Hugoye Special Issue 1(2) and 2(1).

Palmer, A. (2003) 'Restoring the ABC in Ephraim's cycles on faith and paradise,' JECS 55: 147–94.

Palmer, A. (2009) 'Interpolated stanzas in Ephraim's Madroshe III-VII on faith,' OC 93: 1–27.

Petersen, W. L. (2011) 'Romanos the melodist,' in GEDSH, 353b–354b.

Possekel, U. (1999) Evidence of Greek Philosophical Concepts in the Writings of Ephrem the Syrian. CSCO 580, Subsidia 102. Louvain, Belgium: Peeters.

Possekel, U. (2009) 'Ephrem's Doctrine of God,' in McGowan, A. B., Daley, B. E. and Gaden, T. J. (eds) God in Early Christian Thought: Essays in Memory of Lloyd G. Patterson. Leiden: Brill, 195–237.

Possekel, U. (2017) 'Nisibis,' in Finney, P. C. (ed.) Eerdmanns Encyclopedia of Early Christian Art, 3 vols. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmanns Publishing, 2.221–4.

Ri, A. S. (2010) 'Mar Éphrem, la femme samaritaine et les fragments d'Héracléon,' in Amir–Moezzi, M.-A. et al. (eds) Pensée grecque et sagesse d'Orient. Hommage à Michel Tardieu. Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études, Sciences religieuses 142. Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols, 511–22.

Rouwhorst, G. A. M. (1989) Les Hymnes Pascales d'Éphrem de Nisibe. Analyse théologique et recherche sur l'évolution de la fête pascale chrétienne à Nisibe et à Edesse et dans quelques églises voisines au quatrième siècle. Supplements to VC 7. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Ruether, R. (1974) Faith and Fratricide. New York: Seabury.

Séd, N. (1968) 'Les hymnes sur le Paradis de saint Ephrem et les traditions juives,' Le Muséon 81: 455–501.

Shepardson, C. C. (2008a) Anti-Judaism and Christian Orthodoxy: Ephrem's Hymns in Fourth-Century Syria. Patristic Monograph Series 20. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Shepardson, C. C. (2008b) 'Paschal politics: Deploying the Temple's destruction against fourth-century Judaizers,' VC 62: 233–60.

Tabbernee, W. (2017) 'Epigraphy: Clandestine and Crypto-Christian,' in Finney, P. C. (ed.) Eerdmanns Encyclopedia of Early Christian Art, 3 vols. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmanns Publishing, 1.476–81.

Taylor, D. G. K. (2002) 'Bilingualism and diglossia in late Antique Syria and Mesopotamia,' in Adams, J. N. et al. (eds) Bilingualism in Ancient Society: Language Contact and the Written Text. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 298–331.

Tougher, S. (2004) 'Julian's bull coinage: Kent revisited,' The Classical Quarterly 54: 327–30.

Tubach, J. (2015) 'Die Anfänge des Christentums in Edessa,' ZAC 19: 5–25.

Tuschling, R. M. M. (2007) Angels and Orthodoxy: A Study in their Development in Syria and Palestine from the Qumran Texts to Ephrem the Syrian. Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum 40. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr Siebeck, Van Rompay, L. (2007) 'Mallpānā dilan *s*uryāyā: Ephrem in the works of Philoxenos of Mabbog: Respect and distance,' Hugoye 7: 83–105.

Van Rompay, L. (2008) 'The East (3): Syria and Mesopotamia,' OHECS, 365–86.

Walters, J. E. (ed.) (trans.) (2011) 'Ephrem the Syrian, Hymns on the Unleavened Bread,' Tests from Christian Late Antiquity 30. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.

Wickes, J. T. (ed.) (trans.) (2015a) 'Ephrem, Hymns on Faith,' Fathers of the Church 130. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press.

Wickes, J. T. (2015b) 'The poetics of self-presentation in Ephrem's Hymns on Faith 10,' in Doerfler, M. et al. (eds) Syriac Encounters. Eastern Christian Studies 20. Louvain, Belgium: Peeters, 51–63.

Williams, M. E. (1996) Rethinking "Gnosticism": An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Woods, D. (2000) 'Julian, Gallienus, and the Solar Bull, American Journal of Numismatics 12: 157–69.

Yousif, P. (1984) L'Eucharistie chez S Ephrem de Nisibe. Orientalia Christiana Analecta 224. Rome.

Yousif, P. (1989) 'La Vierge Marie et le disciple bien-aimé chez saint Éphrem de Nisibe,' Orientalia Christiana Periodica 55: 283–316.

60

JULIAN THE APOSTATE

Michael Bland Simmons

In this chapter I offer a profile of a man whose ambition, had it been realized, would probably have meant this volume would never have been written. Whereas the preceding profiles speak of men and women whose lives contributed to the establishment of Christianity in its first few centuries, Julian lived the last years of his short life determined to restrain it in favour of a resurgence of pagan religious culture (Simmons forthcoming 2017a; forthcoming 2017b).[1]

Flavius Claudius Julianus (c. 331–63 CE) was born at Constantinople. His grandfather was Constantius Chlorus, a member of Diocletian's Tetrarchy, and his uncle was Constantine.[2] After Constantine's death in 337, his son Constantius II may have ordered the execution of Julian's father, Julius Constantius, and several of his male relatives. During this period Constantius II was ruling the eastern provinces of the empire. Julian's mother Basilina died when he was an infant, and her family assumed the responsibility of the young orphan and his half-brother Gallus, who was five years his senior. Basilina's former Scythian tutor, Mardonius, taught Julian in Nicomedia, and inculcated in him a great reverence for Greek culture. Eusebius the Arian bishop of the same city was his principal teacher.[3] It was during these formative years of his life that the basic attributes of Julian's disposition were being developed. Our sources inform us that he was eloquent, studious, shy, often inconsistent, very talkative, prone to nervousness, sexually chaste, extremely superstitious and he loved the applause of the masses.[4]

In 342 Constantius II sent Gallus and Julian to Macellum in central Turkey where they lived for six years (Henck 1999–2000).[5] Julian received a good education in Christian literature, including the scriptures, and we are told that eunuchs were assigned to prevent his wavering from the faith.[6] His love of Hellenism which had been inspired by Mardonius, continued to develop from his studies in Greek literature. It would be unreasonable to question the sincerity of his faith at this time, or the assertion that he became a reader in the church at Nicomedia.[7] Indeed, Christian writers of the period lament the emperor who had once been dedicated to the church, and pagans confirm his apostasy from a genuine faith.[8]

Constantius II recalled Gallus and Julian from Macellum in 348 to the capital. Julian studied rhetoric there and at Nicomedia until 351, often attending the lectures of Libanius (Elm 2012: 91f.), who became his life-long friend and dedicated several orations to him after he became emperor (Soz., HE 5.2; Smith 1995: 2). It was also during this time (348–51) that Julian met Maximus of Ephesus, who exerted a significant philosophical and religious (especially mystical) influence on the young man, and played a role in his apostasy.[9] Constantius II appointed Gallus Caesar in 351, and Julian was given freedom to continue his studies in western Asia Minor at Pergamum and Ephesus under the Neoplatonic philosophers Aecesius, the disciple of Iamblichus, Eusebius and Chrysanthius, in addition to Maximus (Bowersock 1978: 28ff.; Smith 1995: 2ff.). The Iamblichean Neoplatonism espoused by these philosophers profoundly impacted his intellectual and spiritual development. Writing from Gaul in 358–9 to his fellow Neoplatonist Priscus, Julian referred to Iamblichus as a godlike man ranking next to Plato and Pythagoras.[10] Neoplatonism by this time was characterized by a combination of religious philosophy and a mystical experience often described as theurgy (Simmons 2015). The latter was associated with the Chaldaean theology and oracles which also had a significant influence on Porphyry. In 351 Julian had made the decision to renounce Christianity, and he was initiated into the Chaldaean theurgical rites by Maximus of Ephesus. From that time onward, Maximus continued to have a great influence on Julian, persuading him to convert to paganism, and was a moving force behind Julian's later attempts to revive Hellenism in the eastern provinces.[11] He was by his side when the emperor died during the Persian campaign in 363. Julian continued his studies in Asia Minor until Constantius II ordered the execution of Gallus for treason (354), at which time the younger brother was summoned to the imperial court at Milan. He was saved from execution on the charge of complicity by the intervention of the empress Eusebia.[12] The following year Julian went to Athens to study where he met the great Cappadocian father, St. Basil.[13] It proved to be a short stay because Constantius II summoned him to Milan where he was appointed Caesar on 6 November (Soz., HE 3.1; 5.2; Soc., HE 2.34; Eun., Vit. phil. 476). By December he was dispatched to Gaul to begin a campaign against the Germanic tribes.[14] After a decisive victory over the Goths at Strasbourg in 357, Constantius II became increasingly suspicious of his growing power[15] and eventually ordered the bulk of Julian's army to be transferred to the east to help in the Persian campaign against Shapur II (Amm. Marc. 20.4.1f.; Lib., Or. 28.92–117). Receiving the imperial order in Paris early in 360, Julian's troops mutinied and at once proclaimed their general the new emperor (Amm. Marc. 20.4.14). By the next year both armies were preparing for war, but Constantius II became ill and died in November. Now recognized as the sole emperor, Julian and his army entered Constantinople in December.[16] He soon began to mint coinage bearing his image (see Figure 60.1).

One of his first acts as emperor was the promulgation of the Edict on Religious Toleration which provided for the raising of temples, construction of altars, restoration of sacrifices and the reorganization of the pagan priesthood.[17] The major objective of this legislation was to promote the cultural revival of the eastern cities on the basis of Hellenic paideia (Lib., Or. 15.67; 18.23, 161; Von Nesselrath 2013; Greenwood 2014a; Simmons forthcoming 2017a). Libanius tells us that Julian very zealously participated in the programme. He sacrificed animals at dawn and dusk and turned his imperial gardens and palace into a pagan temple (Lib., Or. 12.80ff.; 17.4; Soc., HE 3.17). His fingers were stained red by the blood of so many animals (Lib., Or. 12.82). Julian moved quickly to reform the court at Constantinople (Soc., HE 3.1; Amm. Marc. 22.5.1–5). After expelling a large surplus of barbers, eunuchs and cooks from the palace, he turned to reducing the number of secretaries in the civil service. He also restricted the mode of imperial transportation and the conveyance of necessities (Soc., HE 3.1). Gregory of Nazianzus interpreted these actions as an attempt to eliminate Christians who had served under Constantius II.[18] Although he was careful not to begin an official state persecution of the Christians for fear that this might produce martyrs,[19] Julian nonetheless systematically began to move against the religion that had been favoured since the conversion of Constantine.[20]

Figure 60.1   Julian the emperor on a bronze coin minted at Antioch during 360–63 CE; Wikicommons; photo by Yves Léon Charles

Figure 60.2   Painting of Julian the Apostate Presiding at a Conference of Sectarians, by Edward Armitage (1875), in the Walker Art Gallery, National Museums Liverpool; Wikicommons

Early in his reign Julian recalled the bishops who had been exiled by Constantius II, which appeared to be an act of benevolence, but the true motives were most probably to cause internal dissension in the eastern churches.[21] This interpretation is tenable in light of legislation which deprived Christian clergy of the immunities, honours and provisions granted by Constantine (Theod., HE 3.3; Lieu 1986: 40–6). We must remember that Julian was familiar with the internal disputes of the Christians and could therefore distinguish between orthodox, Arian and heretical (e.g. Gnostic) believers (Julian, Ep. 40, To Hecebolus in later 362/early 363 from Antioch). Widows of clergy had to pay back money formerly supplied by imperial funds (Soz., HE 5.5). The emperor publicly ridiculed Christian bishops.[22] We are told that he refused to receive Christian embassies, did not send military aid to the Christian city of Nisibis during the Persian invasion and made another Christian city, Constantia, a tributary of the pagan stronghold Gaza. Christians in Caesarea in Cappadocia were heavily taxed (Soz., HE 5.3, 4; Balty 1974; Fowden 1978). Even though the emperor did not overtly persecute the Christians, he attempted to make it as difficult as possible for them, especially in the eastern provinces.[23]

Martyrdom, however, did occur sometimes tolerated by the emperor himself. At Palestinian Askalon and Gaza, Christian priests and virgins were tortured and executed, while at Sebaste a martyr's bones were burned and scattered.[24] Open persecutions, including the executions of Christians, broke out at Heliopolis and Emesa in Phoenicia, in the Thracian city of Dorystolum, and Arethusa in Syria (Theod., HE 3.3; Soz., HE 5.10). Sozomen informs us that Eusebius, Bestabus and Zeno became martyrs at Gaza, and unlike bishop George's murder at Alexandria, which was met with a letter of rebuke from the emperor, Julian's only response was to depose the governor of the province (Soz., HE 5.9).

In addition to a change in imperial policies towards the newly favoured religion of the empire, one of the major goals of Julian was to bring about the revival of paganism in the urban centres of the east. The heart of his programme was expressed in the ancient Greek ideal of paideia, which included all the elements of high culture from literature, art, drama, music and the art of government, to science, philosophy and religion. Julian perceived Greek paideia to be a synthesis of the outstanding attributes of Hellenism combined with Romanitas, which collectively revealed salvation to humanity and civilization to the world because it had been the product of divine revelation.[25] While its spiritual legacy was soteriological and revelatory, in a political and civic sense it was the only hope for the restoration of the former greatness of the empire which began to diminish with the rise of the Galilean superstition.[26] In light of this conviction to resurrect the old cults of the cities, it should not surprise us that Julian set out to reorganize paganism, often in the midst of pagan apathy towards the gods (Julian, Ep. 20), according to the structure and practices of the church. For example, high priests were appointed over areas with the authority to appoint priests in every city and assign them various responsibilities (Ep. 20). Writing to Arsacius, the high priest of Galatia, Julian demanded a higher ethical standard for all priests. They must not enter theatres, he advises, drink in taverns, nor involve themselves in disrespectable trade (Ep. 22). In another epistle he laments that the Galilean folly has 'overturned almost everything' (Ep. 22). After ordering a high priest to make provisions in every city to help the poor, he adds that the Galileans are helping not only their own poor, but 'ours' as well (Ep. 22). He commands priests to be benevolent towards humanity because this was the practice of the ancient Hellenic religion.[27]

Julian systematically continued to move against the Christians by the implementation of new legislation. The edict of 17 June 362, which forbade Christian teachers to teach classical literature, was considered a harsh measure even by the pagan historian Ammianus Marcellinus (25.4.20; Banchich 1993; Averil Cameron 1993: 4). The rescript issued later directed provincial magistrates to exclude Christians from educational employment (Julian, Ep. 36, after 17 June 362 at Antioch; Hardy 1968: 131). Julian defines the Galilean religion as a mental disease and emphasizes that literary culture has been revealed to civilization by the gods through, e.g. Homer, Hesiod, Demosthenes and Herodotus (Ep. 36). Christian theologians had for many years been using classical works to show how it served God's plan as a preparation for the definitive revelation in Christ. Julian's concept of paideia, based on the religious mos maiorum of ancient polytheism, affirmed the superiority of Graeco-Roman culture to the man-made myths of the Galileans. The edict therefore had a twofold purpose: it aimed at reviving Hellenism in the cities, and it was part of imperial policies related to Christianity which were becoming increasingly antagonistic.[28]

Julian moved his court to Antioch during July 362 to prepare for his Persian campaign that began in March of the following year (Amm. Marc. 22.9.15; Soz., HE 5.19). The emperor soon alienated the ruling classes because of his ascetic life, interest in reviving paganism in a Christianized metropolis, reluctance to support the chariot races and a serious conflict with the Antiochene curia concerning price-gauging at urban markets (Soc., HE 3.17; Athanassiadi 1992: 216; Simmons forthcoming 2017a). The latter was the main cause of discontent amongst the citizens of the city (Lib., Or. 15.8–19; Soc., HE 3.1). When the emperor arrived in the city, food shortages had already occurred. Libanius tells us that an edict reducing the price of food coincided with a severe drought. Vendors left the city, famine ensued accompanied by scarcity and the Antiochenes blamed the economic problems on Julian (Soc., HE 3.1; Soz., HE 5.19; Lib., Or. 15.8, 19, 21, 70; 18.195f., 148). Having now become unpopular, he was constantly ridiculed by the people, yet it was during this period that many of his extant works were written (Smith 1995: 7ff.). Within this situation of growing hostility, Julian's anti-Christian posture was reinforced. During the winter of 362–3, he was doing research for his Contra Galilaeos. According to Theodoret (HE 3.4), an edict was issued at this time which expelled Christians from the army. Whether this is true is unlikely, owing to the fact that since Diocletian the number of Christians in the military had increased (Simmons forthcoming 2017c), and Julian needed a large army for his Persian campaign. On 29 January 363, however, a number of Christians who served in the army were executed (Jones 1963: 24f.; Woods 1997). Other policies against the Christians were the edicts forbidding daytime funerals (Julian, Ep. 56), in a culture where pagan funerals occurred at night; and the support of pagan intellectuals in the east to revive the Imperial Cult by sacrificing to the emperor (Lib., Or. 15.36). Although scholars continue to debate the precise meaning of Julian's motives at this time, it is clear that the growing hostility towards the Christians from June 362 to March 363, and the concomitant favouritism shown to pagans, strongly indicates a movement of imperial policies towards an increasingly anti-Christian programme. And this appears to have been a driving force in Julian's beginning at least with the death of Constantius II.[29]

Other significant events occurred while he resided at Antioch. Before launching the Persian campaign, the emperor consulted the oracle at Daphne located about six kilometres south-east of Antioch (Lieu 1986: 51–7). Desiring to restore the shrine's Castalian springs which were believed to possess prophetic powers, Julian invoked the deity, who ordered that the bodies buried nearby be removed to another place.[30] Julian interpreted this to mean that the remains of St. Babylas, bishop of Antioch who was martyred during the Decian persecution, and who was buried close to the shrine, must be relocated. On 22 October 362 the Temple of Apollo at Daphne, along with the cult statue, was destroyed by fire.[31] Accusing the Christians of starting the fire, Julian retaliated by ordering the great church in Antioch to be closed (Theod., HE 3.6). Fresh persecutions against the Christians began under the leadership of the emperor's uncle Julian (Lieu 1986: 51–7). According to Libanius (Oratio 18.157), in March 362 CE (that is, during the winter before his Persian campaign) and while he was at Pessinus, Julian wrote his Hymn (or Oration) to the Mother of the Gods, that is, to Cybele, an important goddess in that city (see Figure 60.3).

Under Iamblichus, Neoplatonism had evolved into a syncretistic system comprising metaphysics, ethics and Chaldaean theurgical rites (Simmons 1995: 216–303; 2015). This new religious philosophy was characterized by a strong belief in divine revelation (oracles) thought capable of giving to the recipient guidance for individuals and political leaders, wisdom in the affairs of life and even glimpses into the future. With respect to the history of religion in the ancient Mediterranean world, Julian the Apostate is very significant for our understanding of this mystical belief in 'personal prophecy'. pagan and Christian sources inform us that early in his life Julian became obsessed with an interest in augury, sorcery, enchantments, dreams and visions, divination, extispicy, oracles, soothsaying, necromancy, horoscopes, prodigies, zodiac signs, seeking out seers, all kinds of omens and many other prophetic 'signs' (Julian, Ep. 6; Lib., Or. 12.69; 13.14, 48f.; 15.53; Ephrem's Hymns Against Julian, passim). Indeed, he offers to students of ancient religions, particularly those interested in 'prophetic revelation', a gold mine of information. For example, Julian tells us that the foundation of the Roman Empire consists of the body of ancestral religious customs passed down from antiquity, the mos maiorum, which beginning in the Regal Age (753–510 BC) came about by divine revelation. Under king Numa great blessings occurred because the Sibyl and others experienced 'divine possession' and 'inspiration' and gave oracles for the city from Zeus (Julian, C.Gal. 194B; Ep. 20). By placing this concept of Sacred History in contradistinction with the Christian 'fulfilment from prophecy' argument, Julian aimed at dismantling a powerful weapon in traditional Christian apologetics to show that the Christian interpretation of the Old Testament prophecies about Jesus was untenable (Julian, C.Gal. 106C, 138C). But it was not just an academic argument. Owing to his strong belief that prophecy was a 'blessed gift' from the gods (C.Gal. 106C), the extent to which it influenced both his personal affairs and, more importantly, his decisions as emperor should not be overlooked. Often prophecies, meaning here all means of acquiring important information from the gods, directly affected governmental appointments and military decisions (Amm. Marc. 22.12.6f.; Lib., Or. 18.180; Julian, Ep. 9). By prophecy Julian knew when people would die, including himself (Amm. Marc. 22.1.2; Soz., HE 5.1; Eunapius, Vit. phil. 475f.; Averil Cameron 1993: 91). Even though he alludes to the rare manifestation of the prophetic spirit in his own day, he stresses that it has altogether ceased amongst the Hebrews and Egyptians, and finds comfort in the 'sacred arts' of divination through which heaven can aid man now.[32] And if it was rare, oracular revelation did continue at a few temples of Apollo, and the incident at Daphne proves how zealously Julian sought out divine oracles.[33] Finally, Julian was significantly influenced by dreams and visions, and kept in his imperial entourage a group of experts who were adept at their interpretation (Amm. Marc. 23.3.3; 25.2.3f.; 25.3.9; Julian, Ep. 4).

Julian's keen interest in prophetic revelation may shed some light on the edict which he issued at Antioch, probably late 362, that ordered the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem (Simmons 2006).

Figure 60.3   Statue of seated Cybele, with the portrait head of her priestess; now in the Getty Museum; Wikicommons by an unknown photographer

A former vice-prefect of Britain, Alypius, was appointed to supervise the project, but shortly after it began an earthquake and a fire brought about its termination (Amm. Marc. 23.1.2f.; Seaver 1978; Simmons 2006). Several reasons have been given for Julian's motives. First, he wanted to rebuild the Temple as part of his programme to revive animal sacrifices (Blanchetière 1980; Athanassiadi 1992: 164). Second, it was part of his anti-Christian policies (Klein 1986: 287; Smith 1995: 193). Finally, Julian wanted to disprove Christ's prophecy of Matt. 24:2, Mark 13:2 and Luke 21:6 which predicted the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple (Browning 1976: 176; Bowersock 1978: 89f.; Potter 1994: 171; Simmons 2006). One other motive that has recently been investigated

(Simmons 2006) concerns an oracle, undoubtedly derived from Porphyry's Philosophia ex oraculis, and quoted by Augustine in the De Civitate Dei:

> For when they saw that it could not be destroyed by all those many great > persecutions but rather increased amazingly because of them, they thought > up some Greek verses or other, as if they were the outpouring of a divine > oracle in reply to someone consulting it; in them they make Christ blame> less, to be sure, of this charge of sacrilege (so to call it), but explain that > Peter contrived by sorcery that the name of Christ should be worshipped > for three hundred and sixty-five years, and then after the completion of > that number of years it should immediately come to an end.
>
> (Civ. Dei 18.53)

The important elements of this prophecy are (1) a pagan god gives 'prophetic revelation'; (2) it is a futuristic prophecy containing a specific date; (3) it predicts the termination of Christianity exactly 365 years after Christ began to be worshipped. At least five data strongly suggest that the oracle derives from Porphyry's Philosophia ex oraculis: (1) the oracle was in a collection of Greek verses; (2) oracular revelation was given after someone inquired about Christianity; (3) the many 'Great Persecutions' are now in the past; (4) Christ is not criticized; and (5) Peter practised sorcery. During the winter of 362–3, Julian was doing research for the C.Gal. (Lib., Or. 18.178) which he finished before March 363. While writing the work, it is highly possible that Porphyry's anti-Christian works were consulted, and the oracle cited above was discovered. Realizing that he could be instrumental in the fulfilment of the prophecy, Julian called a conference with Jewish officials which resulted in issuing the Edict on Rebuilding the Temple in Jerusalem (Simmons 2006). Moreover, he will have perceived both the fulfilment of the prophecy and the rebuilding of the Temple as interrelated events that could bring about the realization of his dream to revive Hellenism. As a fervent anti-Christian, he will have viewed the rebuilt Temple as a historical confirmation of Porphyry's oracle and the crowning event of his imperial career. A comforting thought in his twi-light years would have been that the gods used him to fulfil the prophecy given by a prominent Neoplatonic philosopher, and the greatest anti-Christian author in antiquity, about the demise of a religion for which they possess a mutual hatred (Simmons 2006). We may also give the following data to support this interpretation:

1 Even by pagan accounts Julian was very superstitious and possessed a fanatical interest in oracles.
2 Julian performed many kinds of ritual regularly in order to look into the future.
3 Julian personally believed in oracular (and other kinds of) revelation and depended on it for guidance in his affairs.
4 Porphyry wrote c. 50–60 years before Julian and was still considered the most famous anti-Christian writer of the period. His books were in circulation, and it would be unreasonable to think that he did not have a significant influence on Julian.[34]
5 The discovery of the '365-year oracle' may have resulted from the acquisition of George of Alexandria's library which Julian was keenly interested in procuring as early as July 362.[35] The oracle was most probably in the Philosophia ex oraculis, and its discovery was the main stimulus for the conference with the Jews. In Ep. 51, written in late 362, Julian refers to his plans to rebuild the Temple after his Persian campaign. The discovery of the Porphyrian oracle changed his mind to start the project before the campaign began in March 363.
6 Ammianus Marcellinus (23.1.2) informs us that Julian was eager to extend the memory of his reign by great works, and he planned at great cost to restore the Temple in Jerusalem. He also says that he entrusted the speedy performance of the work to Alypius. Why speedy? What made him change his mind not only about the timing of the project, but also what made him between July 362 and the following winter (December–February 363) feel compelled to do it hurriedly? The answer could very well be that he desired to see the fulfilment of the prophecy in his lifetime before the 365 years were terminated.

7 From an early age, Julian was familiar with Christian scripture, including the Olivet Discourse of Matthew 24, Mark 13, and Luke 21 which give Jesus' prophecy about the Temple. The Porphyrian oracle was perceived as divine inspiration for the restoration of the Temple and retribution for Jesus' false prediction.

8 Julian constantly relied upon Neoplatonic philosophers for prophetic wisdom, often in direct opposition to the traditional practices of his soothsayers.[36] Ephrem (Hymn against Julian 4.22) describes Julian's attempts to rebuild the Temple as the divination of a madman. This may indeed imply that the Porphyrian oracle motivated him. 'Divination' was a word used in the preface of the Phil. orac. to explain the salvific benefits that Porphyry's readers would receive (see Eusebius, Praeparatio evangelica 4.6f.).

9 Ephrem the Syrian is one of the earliest Christian writers to refer to Julian's Temple restoration, but he never mentions the Olivet discourse passages. He uses the Book of Daniel to argue from prophecy that the Temple would not be rebuilt. Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, also uses Daniel's prophecy, which he says was confirmed by Christ, to show that the Temple would not be rebuilt. Porphyry's interpretation of Daniel in the Contra Christianos, combined with the 365-year oracle, motivated Julian to begin the project when he did. Both were integral to his desire to disprove Jesus' prophecy. Ephrem calls Julian the 'king of Greece' (Alexander) who 'rejected Daniel' and provoked God to anger. We have seen that Porphyry argued that Daniel was not a true prophecy, but simply a historical book.

10 Socrates (HE 3.23) says that both Porphyry and Julian were scoffers at those they disliked (the Christians), referring to Porphyry's as Julian's anti-Christian polemics.

11 Julian admits that the manifestation of the prophetic spirit in his day was rare. Yet he sought oracles for guidance and to know the future. He kept several collections of books on the proper interpretation of prophetic revelation in a chest which he took with him even while on campaign. One book was a Book of Oracles. He also consulted the Sibylline Books in Rome. We hear of books on the interpretation of lightning, Tarquitian books On Signs from Heaven, and Etruscan books On War for the precise interpretation of omens before battle. If these were consulted regularly, and he had a preference for Neoplatonic oracles, how much more would he confide in the collection of oracles (Phil. orac.) compiled by a renowned anti-Christian Neoplatonist (Porphyry)?[37]

12 Julian strongly believed that 'signs' in the form of concrete historical events must follow a prophecy in order to confirm its authenticity (Simmons 2006):

> It is not possible to behold the truth from speech alone, but some clear > sign must follow on what has been said that will guarantee the prophecy that has been > made concerning the future.
>
> (C.Gal. 358E)

Ammianus tells us that Julian was an expert in the discernment of such prophetic signs (21.1.6; also 22.1.2; 23.3.6f.; 23.5.8f.; Simmons 2006 and forthcoming 2017a), and the emperor wrote to Libanius on 10 March 363 that at the beginning of the Persian campaign Zeus showed many favourable signs from heaven (Ep. 58). Because he received oracles and accompanying signs, Libanius says that Julian carried out his plans 'with the end already in full view' (Or. 13.49). A project as vast as rebuilding the Temple presupposes two known facts about Julian's belief in prophetic revelation. First, an oracle motivated him to restore the Temple. Second, the rebuilt Temple could be a concrete sign to prove that Jesus' prophecy about the Temple was false, and Porphyry's oracle about Christianity's termination 365 years after Jesus began to be worshipped was true.

The date is arguably important. Augustine, who of course believed in the deity of Christ, dates the beginning of his worship at Pentecost (Civ. Dei 18.54) c. 29 CE in the consulship of the two Gemini. He calculates that the 365 years ended on the Ides of May in the consulship of Honorius and Eutychianus in 398. The next year (18 March 399) officials in Carthage demolished pagan temples and images. Augustine then gives a concrete 'sign' that the prophecy was false. In the 30 years since that day, he says, Christianity has increased, and adds:

> Who does not see how much the worship of the name of Christ had grown during the period of nearly thirty years from then to the present, especially after many of those became Christians who had been held back from the faith by that supposedly true prophecy, which they now saw, after the completion of the specified number of years, to be foolish and ridiculous?
>
> *(*Civ. Dei 18.54)

This demonstrates clearly that many pagans during Augustine's day strongly believed in Porphyry's prophecy.

In 363 Julian had about two years left for the 'sign' confirming Porphyry's prophecy to occur, provided that he dated the beginning of Christianity at the birth of Christ. Porphyry's oracle declared that Christianity would expire immediately 365 years from the worship of Christ. Julian knew that according to the Gospel of Matthew, this began in Bethlehem when the Magi brought presents to the stable. Julian's insistence on calling Jesus the Galilean is not so much because he denied the Christians any claim to universality (Athanassiadi 1992: 161, n. 2) as it was to stress the mere humanity of Jesus. Yet if Julian dated the beginning of the worship of Jesus at Pentecost as Augustine did, he could still look forward to seeing the fulfilment of Porphyry's prophecy in his lifetime, because in 394 CE (Augustine's calculations were inaccurate) he would have been 63. Even if he had not lived to see the Temple completed, he would have been given credit for its ultimate construction. Ammianus' remark that Julian was compelled to move forward hurriedly with the project is best understood as a decision that was motivated by his belief in the fulfilment of the Porphyrian oracle within two years from the time he finished the Contra Galilaeos. We may conclude that he wrote the C.Gal. during the winter of 362–3 in his palace during the night while dealing with growing discontent in Antioch, preparing for the Persian campaign and meeting with Jewish officials concerning the rebuilding of the Temple. He had sent two letters months before to Alexandria demanding that books from George's library be sent to him immediately. This is one possible source of Porphyry's works on philosophy, which may have included polemical writings. It is logical to assume that the emperor consulted the Contra Christianos and Phil. orac. while writing the C.Gal., and he may have discovered the prophecy that predicted the termination of Christianity 365 years after its beginning while reading the Phil. orac. This motivated him to convene a speedy meeting with Jewish officials to initiate work on the Temple project, which helps us to understand why he moved the date for the beginning of the construction from after to before the Persian campaign, and why he moved forward with it hurriedly (Simmons 2006).

In March 363 Julian set out for his Persian campaign against the advice of his best soothsayers who admonished him both before and during the invasion that the gods did not favour the enterprise (Lib., Or. 12.76; Soc., HE 3.19ff.; Amm. Marc. 23.2.7; 23.5.11). As we have noted, the emperor increasingly relied on prophetic guidance, especially oracles, provided by Neoplatonic philosophers like Maximus of Ephesus (Rufinus, HE 1.36; Amm. Marc. 22.12.6f.; Ephrem, Hymn against Julian 2.8; Soc., HE 3.21). Ammianus Marcellinus describes many 'signs' which occurred during the invasion to prove the divine disfavour expressed by the soothsayers (23.5.10; 23.3.6f.; 23.5.4f.; 23.5.12ff.; 25.2.7f.). After an attempt to take Ctesiphon (May 363) failed, Julian ordered a retreat as Shapur II's army was approaching, and on 26 June 363 he was fatally wounded at the age of 32 while leading a counter-attack against the Persians. He died later in the evening in his tent (Amm. Marc. 25.3.1–23;

Figure 60.4   Sassanian relief at Taq-e Bostan, Iran of Mithra, Shapur II and Ahura Mazda standing above the body of the defeated Julian; Wikicommons

Lib., Or. 17.23; Soc., HE 3.21; Soz., HE 6.1), and his body was taken to Tarsus where it was given a customary imperial burial. This did not stop the Sassanian king Ardashir II commissioning a stone relief for his investiture that shows Mithra, Shapur II and Ahura Mazda standing above a defeated Julian (Figure 60.4). The Christian Jovian became the next emperor (Amm. Marc. 25.5.4–9).[38]

Themes of the Contra Galilaeos

As we have seen, during the winter of 362–3, Julian hurriedly wrote the C.Gal. in the midst of economic problems in Antioch, planning the Persian campaign and beginning the construction of the Temple in Jerusalem (Lib., Or. 18.178; Masaracchia 1986; Athanassiadi 1992: 362f.; Smith 1995: 190). The text of the C.Gal. is lost, though parts of the first book of an original three are preserved in Cyril of Alexandria's refutation written in the 430s (Masaracchia 1986). Lacking in original thought and not profoundly intellectual, the C.Gal. is described by Libanius as a work that was produced without any attention to elegance (18.178). Julian often irritates his readers by jumping from one subject to another, then back again to his original theme (C.Gal. 213B–C; 218A–B). He sometimes promises that he will cover a subject later in his treatise, then proceed to do it (213A). It is indeed a disappointing work, often repetitive, and according to one scholar, it demonstrates the emperor's inability to distinguish the fundamental from the trivial (Malley 1978). Julian possessed neither the analytical, theological, historical or linguistic expertise of Porphyry, nor the propriety and objectivity of Celsus. The whole work would have been well served by an efficient editorial revision.

Early in Book I Julian informs us about the purpose of writing the C.Gal.:

> [t]o set forth to all mankind the reasons by which I was convinced that the fabrication of the Galileans is a fiction of men composed by wickedness.
>
> (C.Gal. 39A: Wright)

He says further that the Christian uses that part of the soul that loves childish fables to induce men to believe that a 'monstrous tale' is true (39B). Christians wail over the corpse of a Jew because they have abandoned the ever-living gods of the Romans. Their religion is absurd and their doctrines are not divine (39B; 138C; 194D; 197C; 206A; 229D). The C.Gal. appears to have been written in association with Julian's attempt to revive Hellenism in the eastern urban centres of the empire with the objective of demonstrating the superiority of Greek paideia to Christian doctrine, and showing that the Christians lacked the support of ancestral religious customs. To achieve this goal, Julian developed six major themes in the C.Gal. which we will now address.[39]

Jesus

The purpose of Julian's criticism of Jesus is to show that he was not God, and he reinforces his argument first by proving the novelty of Christianity. The Galileans, he asserts, have abandoned both Hellenism and the ancestral teachings of the Jews. Just yesterday Jesus' doctrine appeared, and it has done nothing to ameliorate the urban culture of the empire (Ep. 47; C.Gal. 106C; 194D; 197C; 201E; 238A). Christianity is an enormous pretension (116A), primarily because the Christians have misinterpreted the Hebrew scriptures. Jesus was never recognized by God in the Old Testament as his 'Son' (159E). Of all the New Testament writers, it was only John who made up the 'evil doctrine' of the divinity of Christ (335B). Anyway, even the Jews themselves rejected Jesus, who brought an infectious disease to the world and actually opposed God's will for mankind to worship many gods (159E; Simmons forthcoming 2017a). The Logos Doctrine of Johannine theology, moreover, is contradictory: if Jesus is indeed God, why does John say: 'No man has ever seen God at any time' (333D)? Because the Christian teaching about Jesus is a myth, he cannot therefore in any way save mankind (Greenwood 2014c). Mankind has prospered much more from the worship of such deities as Helios (Ep. 47; 55; Ugenti 1992: 395–402; Smith 1995: 197–204; Simmons forthcoming 2017a).

Julian also criticizes the teachings and works of Jesus. For example, to reinforce his claim that Hellenism is superior to Christianity because the latter has abandoned its ancestral customs, Julian mocks the assertion of Jesus that the Jews are God's 'Chosen people' (106B). Since Jesus neither lived a pure life, nor did he teach it to his disciples (205E), his teachings recorded in the gospels would cause the disintegration of the Roman empire if everyone practised them (C.Gal. Frag. 5). Hence the Galilean man-made myth is detested by the gods and will poison Hellenism, which is the true salvation of the world (Ep. 147; Malley 1978: 12). Jesus' works are equally condemned. To prove that Jesus was not God, Julian develops further the argument of Celsus which attributed Jesus' miraculous power to the operation of magic by maintaining that Moses, the prophets, Jesus and his disciples surpass all the magicians and charlatans of every place and period in history (100A). Julian thus greatly minimizes the soteriological value of Jesus' works:

> Yet Jesus, who won over the least worthy of you . . . accomplished nothing > worth hearing of, unless anyone things that to heal crooked and blind > men and to exorcise those who were possessed by evil demons in the > villages of Bethsaida and Bethany can be classed as a mighty achievement.
>
> (191E)

If Jesus did not offer any lasting benefits to his own people, who in the end rejected him, why should an erudite person not accept Hellenism which has been the fount of many divine blessings since ancient times?[40]

As we have already noted above, a classic theme in anti-Christian polemics was the rejection of the apologists' 'proof from prophecy' argument. Julian continued this tradition, and because of his sound knowledge of scripture, he was able to attack it from several perspectives. The major point he makes is that the Old Testament Messianic prophecies have been misconstrued by the Christians, who falsely applied them to Jesus. Nowhere in the Pentateuch, he argues, did Moses predict a Messiah who would be 'God born from God'. Moses taught the Hebrews to worship one

God, not two (262B–C, E; 276E; 290C–D; 291A). Christian biblical theologians have eisegeted Old Testament prophecies which have resulted in worshipping Jesus as a false God. Besides, the Mosaic prophecies often apply to king David, and Isaiah 7.14 did not predict the virgin birth of a God (253B–E; 261E; 262B–D). Julian also asserts that the mythological tritheism expressed in the baptismal formula given by Jesus in Matthew 28.14 clearly contradicts the Mosaic monotheism of the Pentateuch (291A). Other examples of the New Testament doctrines that came about by the corruption of the original teaching of Moses and the prophets are the Incarnation; the deity, passion and resurrection of Christ; the Pauline concept of Christ as the 'end of the Law'; the Marian doctrine of Theotokos; and the cult of the martyrs which, to the emperor, was tantamount to witchcraft and violates Old and New Testament teaching (320B–C; 327A–C; 335D; 339A–C; 262D; 276E–277A).

God

To Julian, Christian teaching about God is absurd and trivial, and it lacks the superior rationalism of Greek philosophy (160E). Though some scholars have interpreted Julian's thought as based on a concept of natural theology which presupposes an innate knowledge of God, this does not, as we have already seen, rule out any need for divine revelation (52B–C; Smith 1995: 192f.). Innate knowledge provided a general epistemology concerning the nature of the divine and helped to answer a number of teleological questions about the relationship between providence and the natural world. Revelation, whether manifested by oracles, Chaldean-Neoplatonic theurgy, soothsaying or extispicy, made the divine world and its otherwise inaccessible, mysterious and secret knowledge relevant and accessible to the inquirer. The recipient of the revelation possessed the confidence that the personal decisions of his daily life were influenced and protected by supernatural guidance. 'Personal religion' of this kind was a symptom of the age; it affected pagans and Christians alike, permeated all classes in society, made contact with the gods possible, and it often degenerated into absurd practices. Neoplatonism supplied Julian with much of the conceptual basis of the cosmos (69C). Hence God does not increase or decrease, he is immutable, free from decay and generation. He is pure, immortal, eternal and transcendent (69C). As an intellectual, Julian rejected the Graeco-Roman myths which depicted, e.g. Kronos eating his children and Zeus having sex with his mother (44A–B). Even more so will he call Hebrew myths absolutely incredible (75A; Meredith 1980: 1143), and the Judaeo-Christian God of scripture gave him plenty of ammunition for the Contra Galilaeos. He specifically criticizes the particularity of the Hebrew God which, he argues, prevents Christianity from being a truly universal religion (100C; Simmons 2015, forthcoming 2017a). In contradistinction to the Platonic doctrine of divine impassibility, Julian excoriates the irrational nature of the Christian God which is inferior even to the mildness of Lycurgus, the forbearance of Solon and the benevolence of the Romans (168C; 171D)., The God of scripture possesses weaknesses of character normally condemned in humans. He constantly expresses jealousy, anger, resentment and other features inconsistent with divinity, which prove his indisputable irrationality (106E; 152B–D; 155C–D; 160D; 161A). The Hebrew God is best understood as one of the many national deities to whom the higher power has delegated responsibilities for their particular territories. The incorporation of the Hebrew God into his philosophical system will have benefitted his attempt to revive Hellenism in the urban centres of the east in at least four ways. First, he was able to defend traditional polytheism and at the same time give a coherent explanation for the diversity of religious culture. Second, he could attempt to explain the tension between monotheism and polytheism based on a theology of the cosmos which was characterized by a Neoplatonic understanding of a hierarchy of Being. Third, on a broader scale, he could see it as an impetus for the revival of Hellenism in the urban centres of the Eest. Finally, he could show that Christianity should be abandoned because it lacks the support of ancient ancestral customs (115D–E; 116A–B; 143B–C; 148B–C; 155E). The Christian doctrine of God is therefore pure nonsense (155E).

Creation

Julian quotes Plato's Timaeus 30B to prove that Platonic cosmology is superior to the biblical account of creation found in Genesis 1–2 (57B–C). The cosmos exists as a living creature with a soul and intelligence (57C–D). Exegeting Tim. 41A–C, Julian maintains that the visible celestial planets and stars are likenesses of the invisible gods (65B–C). The immortal part of humans was given by the Demiurge as the rational soul, and the rest of the process of Becoming consisted of weaving mortality and immortality (65D). In Genesis Moses fails to inform us of the immediate creator of the universe (66A). Julian follows Plato by saying that God is not the creator of material things, but only disposes of pre-existing matter (49C–D). The transcendent God who is the principle of ultimate reality is at the pinnacle of the hierarchy of Being, and from him emanates all other ontological levels of reality.

As the creator of mortal beings and material reality, the God of Genesis was perceived by pagan philosophers as a being demoted in the metaphysical realm, and because of this Julian specifically castigates the creation stories in Genesis 1–2. For instance, on the creation of Eve, he asks whether God did not know that she would be a misfortune to Adam (75B). He further asks why God denied to humans the power to distinguish between good and evil (89A). To Julian this is a ludicrous myth for four reasons. First, it depicts God as being ignorant that the woman became a deceiver. Second, God refused something beneficial for Adam and Eve: the knowledge of good and evil. Third, God was jealous about the possibility of humans eating from the tree. Finally, God became envious when Adam and Eve knew good and evil, and expelled them from the garden (75B; 89A; 93E; 94A). Such concepts as sin, human free will and choice were abhorrent to a Neoplatonist who believed that all levels of material reality are immutably ordered by providence for a world which is essentially eternal.

Criticism of scripture

Julian is similar to Porphyry in that both possessed a sound knowledge of scripture and used it against the Christians (Simmons 1995, 2006, 2015, forthcoming 2017a, forthcoming 2017d). To ascertain the nature of his knowledge, we may first observe scriptural passages cited or alluded to in Julian's works, and most of these occur in the C.Gal. Fifty-seven are from the Old Testament and 41 from the New.[41] Forty-four of the Old Testament passages come from the Pentateuch: (16) Genesis, (11) Exodus, (9) Deuteronomy, (5) Leviticus, (3) Numbers; 13 derive from other books: (2) I Samuel, (3) I Kings, (1) II Kings, (5) Isaiah, (1) Psalms, (1) Hosea. Of the New Testament passages, there are 28 from the evangelists: (13) Matthew, (5) Matthew or another gospel; (4) Luke, (1) Mark, (1) Mark or Luke; (4) John; and from the other books: (6) Acts; (11) Pauline epistles; (1) Hebrews. Of the New Testament figures named we have Jesus (24 occurrences), John (8), Matthew (7), Mark (4), Luke (4) and Paul (13).[42] The function of scripture in the polemics of Julian was probably influenced by Porphyry, and we may give four premises of his argument (Meredith 1980: 1147):

1   Christians have abandoned Hebrew traditions and have misinterpreted the Old Testament (238B; Ep. 47).
2   Even if one trained a child in the scriptures from a young age, his character would not be any better than that of a slave (230A–235B). Scripture does not make one wiser, braver, or better than one was before he read it (230A). It is not therefore for the intelligent, nor for those seeking wisdom (229D).
3   Greek writings, which Christians often ascribe to the Devil, enable people to acquire courage, wisdom, and justice. They actually produce virtue in those not endowed with the natural ability to apprehend them. To the person so endowed, he becomes a gift of the gods to civilization (229D; 230A–B).
4   Christians use Greek learning in their theology. If their scripture is sufficient, why do they nibble at Greek literature (229C)?

Christian doctrine and practice

The apostate emperor believed that the church is under a double curse because it has abandoned both the polytheism of the Greeks and the traditions of its Hebrew fathers (238A–B). Although Julian admits that he is not a Jew, he expresses respect for the God of Abraham and Isaac, and argues that the Christians rebelled against the Mosaic Law. For example, they do not keep the Passover, practise circumcision, sacrifice animals or honour the food laws of the Covenant (314C; 343C; 351A; 354A–B). Furthermore, the Galileans have not accepted a single admirable teaching from the Greeks or the Hebrews (43A), and the only thing that the latter have in common with the Christians is the rejection of polytheism (238C–D). This is very unfortunate, he claims, because the gods have sent many lawgivers to the Greeks who were superior to Moses (141D). At least the Christians would be following some sort of law if they had not abandoned Hebrew customs, although it is harsh and inferior to the humane laws of the Romans (202A), and in reality they have transgressed all the commandments that God gave Moses (351B; 42E–43A; 99E; 141C–D; 218B; 253A–B; 254B; Ep. 20).

In conjunction with this theme of the Christian abandonment of the truth Julian develops a protean attack upon the past and contemporary followers of Jesus. He says, probably following Celsus, that only the very base people of society like shopkeepers, slaves, maidservants and dancers become Christians (206A; 238D–E; 245A–C; 191D–E; Ep. 55). Christians are misguided and foolish, wicked and arrogant (194C; 229C; 230A; 238B). Julian focuses on the early leaders of the Apostolic Age such as Peter (314D–E) and Paul (106B). For example, he maintains that Paul's teaching is full of contradictions, and his concept of Christian universalism is ridiculous. After quoting Rom. 2:29 and Gal. 3:28, he asks why did God neglect most of humanity for thousands of years, who in ignorance served idols, but only recently came to a small tribe in an isolated part of Palestine. If he is indeed the God of all alike, as Paul teaches, why did he neglect the Greeks (106D)?

Julian's criticism of Christianity often includes contemporary practices in the church. Calling Christians the most depraved of all people, for instance, he mocks those believers who make the sign of the cross and 'hiss at demons' (Ep. 19; Bolton 1968). Why should they adore the wood of the cross, he asks, but refuse to revere the shield that providentially fell from the sky during Numa's reign (194C)? The cult of the martyrs is based on witchcraft, it has caused the worship of many corpses and it disobeys Jesus' teaching recorded in Matt. 23:27 (Ep. 41; C.Gal. 201E; 202A; 224E; 327B; 335B–C; 340A). Christian worship is maligned as impure, unholy, superstitious, an infectious disease and atheistic (Epp. 20 and 47; C.Gal. 43B; 202A). He uses Nicene Logos theology against the Semi-Arians to prove that because of their disagreement over doctrines Christians certainly cannot possess the truth (206A). The rite of baptism is supposed to 'wash' sin away according to 1 Cor. 6:9–11, but in fact Julian says it is not conducive to the reformation of character (245D). The new revelation from God claimed by the Galileans is rejected because Moses made it clear the Old Testament Law is for all time (319D–E; Ep 47; C.Gal. Frag. 1). Indeed, Christians have not even remained faithful to Apostolic doctrines, and evidence of this is the Johannine notion that Jesus is God (327A).

The superiority of Greek paideia

Julian's programme to revive Hellenism in the eastern urban centres of the Roman empire[43] was predominantly motivated by the unswerving personal conviction that Greek paideia was a gift of the gods which had preserved civilization, caused the development of high culture and blessed humanity with true salvation (Criscuolo 1986; Alan Cameron 1993: 25–9; Greenwood 2014a; Simmons forthcoming 2017a). This latter point – the soteriological implications of Julian's policy – has not been given the attention it deserves. For example, Julian was aware that some of the success of Christianity during its 300 years was attributable at least partly to the church's claim to a unique revelation from God (Ugenti 1992: 393), the application of the Hebrew concept of the 'Chosen People' to its own doctrine and the belief that it was the only truly universal religion (Couloubaritis 1995; cf. Simmons 2015, forthcoming 2017a). To confront these notions, Julian stresses the sacred origin of Rome beginning with the Regal Period (753–510 BCE). Zeus brought about the birth of Rome and her great empire by setting over her Numa, the great philosopher-king who communed with the gods in pure thought and was inspired by divine oracles given by the Sibyl (194B–C; see Fouquet 1981: 196; Wallace-Hadrill 1981; Scott 1987: 345; Simmons forthcoming 2017a).

Julian builds on this conceptual foundation in a number of ways. We may first mention his conviction that Greek literature is far superior to Christian scripture, and educated Christian writers have borrowed much from it (171D; 229C). He also contrasts the Greek gods with the Hebrew God. Relying on Platonic soteriology, he says that men should not imitate the God of scripture, if indeed salvation is based on imitating God, the contemplation of the intelligibles and freedom from passion, because this God often expresses anger, jealousy, wrath, resentment and grief (171E). Jews and gentiles are in agreement on many doctrines except monotheism, and actually Solomon, who was the wisest of the Hebrews, practised polytheism (141C–D; 171E; 176A–B; 224E; 306A–B). It must be emphasized here that for Julian, 'gods' does not refer to the deities of the Greek myths, but rather to Helios, Asclepius and others which have been given a philosophical reinterpretation. Because they have a superior aptitude for the mysteries and theology, the wise men of the Greeks have given civilization a more noble concept of deity than that espoused by the Hebrews. Plato was more worthy than Moses of communion with God, the Greeks had an aptitude for theology, and therefore the Hebrews – and even much more the Christians – do not have a legitimate claim to a 'unique revelation' or to the status of the 'Chosen People of God' (49A–B; 171D; 176A–B; Epp. 3 and 36).

His concept of Greek paideia is not, however, restricted to religion, but rather encompasses every facet of Graeco-Roman civilization. In every area of the arts and sciences Greek learning greatly surpasses that of the Hebrews, and he gives as examples law, government, military science, medicine, philosophy, cosmology, astronomy, mathematics, music and, of course, theology (178A–B; 190C; 222A; 224C–D; 235C). Finally, Julian strikes at the central message of Christianity, the doctrine of Christ the saviour of the world, by referring to the 'greatest gift of the gods', the saving deity Asclepius. Salvific theophanies of this god have been numerous in history. He has descended to earth as a man and visited Epidaurus, Pergamum, Rome and many other cities. His salvation is even now universally available to all throughout the empire, and the benefits he gives to his worshippers far exceed the paltry number of miracles performed by the Galilean years ago in a dark corner of Palestine. Asclepius has healed many sick bodies, trained and educated many souls, and his oracles have been found everywhere on earth. Julian himself testifies that the god healed him of illnesses by prescribing remedies, and he will grant eternal salvation in the next life. He concludes that as a saving and healing deity, Asclepius is far superior to Jesus (200A–B; 235B–D).

Notes

1 See the magisterial study by Elm (2012) for Julian's cultural Sitz im Leben.

2 See Libanius, Oration 18.8 and Simmons (forthcoming 2017a and forthcoming 2017b). The many writers who have analysed the biography of Julian include Browning (1976), Bowersock (1978), Athanassiadi (1992), Smith (1995), Tougher (2007) and Von Nesselrath (2013). Vidal (1964) is an impressive novelistic account.

3 Libanius, Or. 13.8; 18.10f.; Socrates, HE 3.1. Cf. Bowersock (1978: 23f.) and Smith (1995: 2, 23–48).

4 Libanius, Or. 12.3, 80; 13.13 (very religious); 12.94; 18.30 (studious); 12.95 (ascetic); Julian, Ep. 60 (sensitive to human pain); Ep. 23 (personal library); Amm. Marc. 25.4.1–3 (sexually pure after his wife's death); 25.4.5f. (moderation in eating and drinking); 25.4.7 (his wisdom); 25.4.8–14 (political and military skills); 25.4.16 (inconsistent); 25.4.17 (talkative and superstitious); Soc., HE 3.1 (self-controlled). Ammianus Marcellinus (24.4.27) says that after a Roman victory during the Persian campaign, Julian would not so much as look at the young virgins taken captive, even though Persian girls were known for their beauty. See also, in general, Browning (1976: 42); Bowersock (1978: 12–20) and Smith (1995: 7). Bouffartigue (1989) tries unconvincingly to give a psychological sketch of Julian, especially concerning his 'paranoia'. On his love of applause, see Amm. Marc. 25.4.18.

5 See Festugière (1957) and Smith (1995: 2). For this formative period, see Browning (1976: 40f.); Athanassiadi (1977); Bowersock (1978: 25); Demarolle (1986); Klein (1986); Gauthier (1987); Buck (1990) and Bouffartigue (1992: 13–49).

6 Eunapius, Vit. phil. 473. Sozomen, HE 5.2 says that Julian was brought up in the knowledge of the scriptures.

7 On being a reader, see Soc., HE 3.1; Theodoret, HE 3.1. I find no reason to doubt that Julian was a sincere Christian in his early life. See Amm. Marc. 21.2.3f.; Ephrem, Hymn against Julian 1.14; Lib., Or. 13.12; Soc., HE 3.1; Sozomen, HE 5.1; Theodoret, HE 3.1; Vogt (1963); Masaracchia (1990: 9) and Smith (1995: 182–9).

8 E.g. Ephrem, Hymn against Julian 1.1. For Ephrem, see Lieu (1986). Drinkwater (1983: 355) believes Julian was a Christian in outward appearance. For Macellum see, e.g. Sozomen, HE 5.2; Browning (1976: 40); Smith (1995: 2); Henck (1999–2000); Elm (2012) and Simmons (forthcoming 2017a). Bidez (1930) remains useful.

9 Cf. Soz., HE 5.2; Elm (2012: 105f.). For Julian's education, see Lacombrade (1960).

10 Ep. 2, To Priscus. Ephrem, Hymn against Julian 1.16 calls Julian a 'Chaldaean'. For the influence of Iamblichus, see Alonso-Nuñez (1973); Balty (1974: 267ff.); Browning (1976: 51–62); Lewy (1978: 151, n. 313; and 270); Saffrey (1981); Sheppard (1982); Penati (1983); Marcone (1984); Shaw (1985); Dillon (1987), who gives an excellent survey of Iamblichean Neoplatonism; Finamore (1988); Scott (1987); Athanassiadi (1992: 136) and Ugenti (1992).

11 Eunapius, Vit. phil. 473 (Maximus was Julian's teacher); 475 (he used theurgy to make Hecate's statue smile); Soc., HE 3.1 (Maximus influenced Julian philosophically); Soz., HE 5.1 (asserts that Julian renounced Christianity and purged himself of baptism with pagan sacrifices); Lib., Or. 18.18 (Julian's conversion to Neoplatonism); Soz., HE 5.2 and Theod., HE 3.1 (Julian's initiation). On Julian's initiation/apostasy, see Athanassiadi (1977); Lewy (1978: 248); Fouquet (1981: 191–202); Gauthier (1987: 233) and Klein (1986: 278). Drinkwater (1983: 359) argues that from 351 Julian was not the centre of a pagan resistance movement, and Maximus 'stage-managed' his formal apostasy, views with which I disagree on evidence given earlier; cf. Averil Cameron 1993: 89; Smith 1995: 138. Athanassiadi (1977) argues for a conversion to Mithraism evidenced in Julian's Hymn to King Helios; for a different view, see Smith (1995: 139–62). On Mithraism, see Gordon (1972) and Ulansey (1989).

12 Lib., Or. 18.24–7, 29; Soc., HE 2.34; Soz., HE 3.1, 5.2; Smith (1995: 3); Browning (1976: 64ff.).

13 Julian, Ep. 26, early 362 from Constantinople for Julian's affection for St. Basil. Cf. Elm (2012: 23–6).

14 Lib., Or. 13.24–32; Eun., Vit. phil. 476; Soz., HE 5.1f.; Soc., HE 3.1; Browning (1976: 79–104); Bowersock (1978: 33–45); Elm (2012: 60–4).

15 See Lib., Or. 12.44ff.; 13.24–32 for the Strasbourg and Gaul campaign in general; also 18.55; 18.75–91; Smith (1995: 3).

16 Lib., Or. 12.65; 13.36; Amm. Marc. 21.7–16.6; 20.10f.; Soz., HE 5.1; Soc., HE 3.1; Theod., HE 3.1; Browning (1976: 120) and Smith (1995: 3).

17 Amm. Marc. 22.5.1–5; Lib., Or.; Soz., HE 5.3, on restoring priests' tax exemptions; Theod., HE 3.3; Soc., HE 3.1, 11; Eunapius, Vit. phil. 478; Lib., Or. 12.69; 17.9, 18; cf. Ephrem, Hymn against Julian 1.4, 2.1, 2.3, 2.27; Julian, Ep. 41, To the Citizens of Bostra (1 Aug. 362) and Ep. 47, To the Alexandrians (Nov. or Dec. 362). Also cf. Downey (1955; 1957); Arce (1975); Browning (1976: 178); Chuvin (1990: 43); Athanassiadi (1992: 181–9); Averil Cameron (1993: 93f.) and Bradbury (1995).

18 Or. 4.64. Cf. Bidez (1930: 310); Downey (1957: 98); Hardy (1968) and Malley (1978: 205).

19 Soc., HE 3.12; Lib., Or. 18.122ff.; Julian, Ep. 41, To the Citizens of Bostra from Antioch (1 Aug. 362); see also Hardy (1968: 136); Chuvin (1990: 43) and Woods (1997).

20 Soc., HE 3.11.1; Soz., HE 5.5; Theod., HE 3.2; Amm. Marc. 22.5.2.

21 Lib., Or. 18.126; Amm. Marc. 22.4.3; Soc., HE 3.1; Soz., HE 5.2, 5; Theod., HE 3.2; Lieu (1986: 45).

22 Soc., HE 3.12: Julian told Maris, bishop of Chalcedon, who was suffering from cataracts, that he was a blind old fool, and the Galilean God would never heal him.

23 For instance, note his special hatred for bishops like Athanasius: Theod., HE 3.5 (exile ordered); Soc., HE 3.14 (his flight); Julian, Ep. 24, An Edict to the Alexandrians (exiled); Ep. 46, To Ecdicius Prefect of Egypt, calling Athanasius 'the enemy of the gods' and ordering him to leave Egypt. For Julian's treatment of bishops, see Fowden (1978).

24 Theod., HE 3.3, reporting that the bones belonged to John the Baptist. Cf. Soc., HE 5.10.

25 Cf. Athanassiadi (1992: 122): Graeco-Roman culture is a product of divine revelation. This is evidence that Julian was interested in prophecy.

26 See Julian, Ep. 20, To Theodorus the High Priest (Spring 362), who is told to avoid innovations in religion and observe the customs inherited from their forefathers because the gods gave them to humanity.

27 See Julian, Ep. 22. The emperor caused a number of Christians to apostasize (Theod., HE 3.8). Another reform was forbidding the religious curse: priests should be men of prayer and blessing (Ep. 18). On his religious reforms, see Alonso-Nuñez (1973: 185) and the standard reference texts previously mentioned.

28 See Jones (1963: 30). I disagree with Hardy (1968: 138), who interprets the edicts as ancillary to Julian's political reforms and not as persecuting policy. Browning (1976: 174); Bowersock (1978: 83f.); Malley (1978: 27) and Meredith (1980: 1138) see them as at least partly anti-Christian. Cf. also Klein (1986: 47); Masaracchia (1990: 11) and Smith (1995: 199).

29 Cf. Bidez (1930: 266ff.): Julian desired to set up a pagan church centrally organized like that of the Christian which practised theurgy and Neoplatonism. For discussion, see Browning (1976: 134–43); Bowesock (1978), who reasonably argues that Julian was decidedly anti-Christian from the beginning; Athanassiadi (1992: 181); Bradbury (1995) and Smith (1995).

30 Amm. Marc. 22.12.7 and 22.13; Soc., HE 3.18; Theod., HE 3.6f.; Julian, Ep. 29; Lib., Or. 17.30. Cf. also Gregory (1983) with standard references.

31 Amm. Marc. 22.13.1 says the fire was caused by a pagan philosopher who left burning candles by the cult statue.

32 Cf. C. Gal. 198B–C; Eunapius, Vit. phil. 475f., says Julian prophesied the demise of Greek religion including the cessation of oracles in his lifetime.

33 In C. Gal. 235C he refers to the oracles of Asclepius found everywhere in the world, an exaggeration no doubt, but it contained some truth nonetheless.

34 For various views on the extent to which Porphyry influenced Julian, see, e.g. Simmons (2006, 2015, forthcoming 2017a, forthcoming 2017b); Smith (1995: 40); Potter (1994: 104f.); Masaracchia (1990: 15); Demarolle (1986: 40–6) and Chadwick (1985).

35 Julian, Ep. 23; Ep. 38; Ep. 51; and Simmons (2006). For George of Alexandria, see Soz., HE 3.2f.; 5.7. He was bishop of Alexandria and murdered by a mob in 361 CE.

36 Amm. Marc. 23.5.10f. relates that Etruscan soothsayers repeatedly told Julian not to invade Persia, but he preferred the authority of his Platonic advisers. Cf. Smith (1995: 8) and Simmons (2006 and forthcoming 2017a).

37 Amm. Marc. 22.12.6f.: Julian consulted many oracles; on the rarity of the prophetic spirit, see Julian, C. Gal. 198B–C; on the Book of Oracles (plausibly including the Phil. orac.) see Lib., Or. 18.118; on the Sibylline Books see Amm. Marc. 23.1.7; the Books on Lightning, Amm. Marc. 23.5.12ff.; the Tarquitian Books, Amm. Marc. 25.2.7f.; the Books on War, Amm. Marc. 23.5.10.

38 For Julian's campaign and death, see Browning (1976: 187–218); Bowersock (1978: 106–19); Lieu (1986: 92) and Simmons (forthcoming 2017a); cf. Griffith (1987: 244–7) on eastern Christians' interpretation on his death as God's ultimate triumph.

39 For some of the secondary literature on the C. Gal., see Courcelle (1948: 64f.); Bartelink (1957: 37–48); Bolton (1968: 496f.); Malley (1978); Meredith (1980: 1138–40); Demarolle (1986: 41f.); Gauthier (1987: 233); Masaracchia (1990: 20f.); Athanassiadi (1992: 161–9); Smith (1995: 190–207) and Simmons (forthcoming 2017a).

40 Cf. 213B; Frag. 2: Moses fasted 40 days and received the Law; Elijah fasted 40 days and saw God; what did Jesus receive after his 40 day fast? Frag. 3: ridiculing Jesus' temptation; Frag. 4: why did Jesus need help from an angel if he was God?

41 For an analysis of these data, see Bouffartigue (1992: 156–70). For Julian's scripture references, see his Appendix II: 683f.

42 See Bouffartigue (1992: 114–17). Demarolle (1986: 44) gives 180 references to scripture in the C. Gal.; Cf. Meredith (1980: 1147); Klein (1986: 286); Smith (1995: 205) and Simmons (forthcoming 2017a).

43 For the literature on this topic, see the standard works cited earlier and Dostalova (1982).

Bibliography

Alonso-Nuñez, J. M. (1973) 'En torno al Neoplatonismo del Emperador Juliano', Historia Antigua 3: 179–85.

Ammianus Marcellinus. (See under Rolfe).

Arce, J. J. (1975) 'Reconstrucciones de templos paganos en época del emperador Juliano (361–363 d.C.)', Rivista Storica dell'Antichita 5: 201–15.

Athanassiadi, P. (1977) 'A contribution to Mithraic theology: The emperor Julian's Hymn to King Helios', Journal of Theological Studies 28: 360–71.

Athanassiadi, P. (1992) Julian: An Intellectual Biography. London: Routledge.

Balty, J. C. (1974) 'Julien et Apamée. Aspects de la Restauration de l'Hellenisme et de la politique antichrétienne de l'empereur', Dialogues d'Histoire Ancienne I: 267–304.

Banchich, T. M. (1993) 'Julian's School Laws: Cod. Theod. 13.3.5 and Ep. 42', The Ancient World 24: 5–14.

Bartelink, G. J. M. (1957) 'L'empereur Julien et le vocabulaire chrétien', Vigiliae Christianae II: 23–48.

Bidez, J. (1913) Vie de Porphyre. Leipzig, Germany: Teubner; G. & E. van Goethern.

Bidez, J. (1930) La vie de l'empereur Julien. Paris: Belles Lettres.

Blanchetière, F. (1980) 'Julien Philhellène, Philosémite, Antichrétien: L'affaire du Temple de Jerusalem (363)', Journal of Jewish Studies 33: 61–8.

Bolton, C. A. (1968) 'The emperor Julian against "hissing Christians"', Harvard Theological Review 61: 496–7.

Bouffartigue, J. (1989) 'L'état mental de l'empereur Julien', Revue des Études Greques 102: 529–39.

Bouffartigue, J. (1992) L'Empereur Julien et la culture de son Temps. Paris: Institute d'Études Augustiniennes.

Bouffartigue, J. and Patillon, M. (1977) Porphyre de l'Abstinence. Tome I Livre I. Paris: Belles Lettres.

Bowersock, G. W. (1978) Julian the Apostate. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Bradbury, S. (1995) 'Julian's pagan revival and the decline of blood sacrifice', Phoenix 49(4): 331–56.

Browning, R. (1976) The Emperor Julian. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.

Buck, D. F. (1990) 'Some distortions in Eunapius' account of Julian the Apostate', Ancient History Bulletin 4: 113–15.

Buck, D. F. (2003) 'Socrates Scholasticus and Julian the Apostate', Byzantion 73: 301–18.

Buck, D. F. (2006) 'Sozomen on Julian the Apostate', Byzantion 76: 53–73.

Cameron, Alan (1993) 'Julian and Hellenism', Ancient World 24: 25–9.

Cameron, Averil (1993) The Later Roman Empire. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Caouloubaritsis, L. (1995) 'La religion chrétienne a-t-elle influencé la philosophie greque?', Kernos 8: 97–106.

Chadwick, H. (1985) 'Oracles of the end in the conflict of paganism and Christianity in the fourth century', in Lucchesi, E. and Saffrey, H. (eds.) Memorial A. J. Festugière. Geneva: P. Cramer, 125–9.

Chuvin, P. (1990) A Chronicle of the Last Pagans. Trans. B. A. Archer. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Courcelle, P. (1948) Les Lettres Greques en Occident. Paris: Boccard.

Criscuolo, U. (1986) 'Guiliano e l'Ellenismo: Conservazione e Riforma', Orpheus 7: 272–92.

Demarolle, J.-M. (1972) 'Un aspect de la polémique païenne à la fin du IIIe siècle: Le vocubulaire chrétien de Porphyre', Vigiliae Christianae 26: 117–29.

Demarolle, J.-M. (1986) 'Le Contre Galiléens: continuité et rupture dans la démarche polémique de l'empereur Julien', Ktaema 11: 39–47.

Dillon, J. (1987) 'Iamblichus of Chalcis (c. 240–325 A.D.)', Aufstieg und Niedergang des Römischen Welt II. 36(2): 863–908.

Dostalova, R. (1982) 'Christentum und Hellenismus', Byslav 44: 1–12.

Downey, G. (1955) 'Philanthropia in religion and statecraft in the fourth century after Christ', Historia 4: 199–208.

Downey, G. (1957) 'The emperor Julian and the schools', Classical Journal 53: 97–103.

Drinkwater, J. F. (1983) 'The "pagan underground", Constantine II's "secret service", and the survival, and the usurpation of Julian the Apostate', in Deroux, C. (ed.) Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History III. Latomus 80: 348–87.

Elm, S. (2012) Sons of Hellenism, Fathers of the Church. Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press.

Festugière, A. J. (1957) 'Julien à Macellum', Journal of Roman Studies 47: 53–8.

Finamore, J. F. (1988) 'THEOI THEŌN: An Iamblichean doctrine in Julian's Against the Christians', Transactions of the American Philological Association 118: 393–401.

Fouquet, C. (1981) 'L'hellenisme de l'empereur Julien', Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé: 192–202.

Fowden, G. (1978) 'Bishops and temples in the eastern Roman empire A.D. 320–435', Journal of Theological Studies 29: 53–78.

Gauthier, N. (1987) 'L'expérience religieuse de Julien dit "Apostat"', Augustinianum 27: 227–35.

Gordon, R. L. (1972) 'Mithraism and Roman society: Social factors in the explanation of religious change in the Roman empire', Religion 2: 93–121.

Greenwood, D. N. (2013) 'A cautionary note on Julian's "pagan Trinity"', Ancient Philosophy 33(2): 391–402.

Greenwood, D. N. (2014a) 'Five Latin inscriptions from Julian's pagan restoration', Bulletin of the Institute of Classical Studies 57(2): 106–24.

Greenwood, D. N. (2014b) 'Crafting divine personae in Julian's Oration 7', Classical Philology 109: 140–9.

Greenwood, D. N. (2014c) 'The Alethes Logos of Celsus and the historicity of Christ', Anglican Theological Review 96(4): 705–13.

Greenwood, D. N. (2016) 'Celsus, Origen, and Julian on Christian miracle-claims', The Heythrop Journal LVII: 99–108.

Gregory, T. E. (1983) 'Julian and the last oracle at Delphi', Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies 24: 355–66.

Griffith, S. H. (1987) 'Ephraem the Syrian's Hymns Against Julian: Meditations on history and imperial power', Vigiliae Christianae 41: 238–66.

Hardy, B. C. (1968) 'The emperor Julian and his school law', Church History 37: 131–43.

Henck, N. (1999–2000) 'From Macellum to Milan: The movements of Julian the Apostate', Kodai 10: 105–16.

Jones, A. H. M. (1963) 'The social background of the struggle between paganism and Christianity', in Momigliano, A. (ed.) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 17–37.

Klein, R. (1986) 'Julian Apostata. Ein Lebensbild', Gymnasium 93: 273–92.

Kroll, W. (1894) De Oraculis Chaldaici. Breslau, Poland: W. Koebner.

Lacombrade, C. (1960) 'Julien et la tradition romaine', Pallas 9: 155–64.

Lacombrade, C. (1967) 'L'empereur Julien emule de Marc-Aurele', Pallas 14: 9–22.

Lanata, G. (1993) 'Il discorso vero di Celso. Un addendum bibliografico', Paideia 48: 277–82.

Lewy, H. (1978) Chaldaean Oracles and Theurgy. Paris: Études Augustiniennes.

Lieu, N. C. (ed.) (1986) The Emperor Julian: Panegyric and Polemic. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press.

Malley, W. J. (1978) Hellenism and Christianity. Rome: Università Gregoriana Editrice.

Marcone, A. (1984) 'L'imperatore Giuliano, Giamblico e il Neoplatonismo', Rivista Storica Italiana 96: 1046–52.

Masaracchia, E. (1986) 'Sul testo del Contra Galilaeos', in Gentili, B. (ed.) Giuliano Imperatore. Urbino, Italy: Società Italiana per lo Studio dell' Antichita Classica, 109–20.

Masaracchia, E. (1990) Giuliano Imperatore. Contra Galilaeos. Rome: Edizioni dell'Ateneo.

Meredith, A. (1980) 'Porphyry and Julian against the Christians', Aufstieg und Niedergang des Römischen Welt II. 23(2): 1119–49.

Penati, A. (1983) 'L'influenza del Sistema Caldaico sul pensiero teologico dell'imperatore Giuliano', Rivista di Filosofia Neo-scolastica 20: 329–40.

Potter, D. (1994) Prophets and Emperors. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Puiggali, J. (1982) 'La Démonologie de Celse Penseur Médico-Platonicien', Les Études Classiques 55: 17–40.

Rolfe, J. C. (1937) Ammianus Marcellinus I. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Saffrey, H. O. (1981) 'Les Neoplatoniciennes et les Oracles Chaldaïques', Revue des Études Augustiniennes 27: 209–25.

Scott, S. (1987) 'L'Empereur Julien: Transcendence et subjectivité', Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 67: 345–62.

Seaver, J. (1978) 'Julian the Apostate and the attempted rebuilding of the Temple of Jerusalem', Res Publica Litterarum I: 273–84.

Shaw, G. (1985) 'Theurgy: Rituals of unification in the Neoplatonism of Iamblichus', Traditio 41: 1–28.

Sheppard, A. (1982) 'Proclus' attitude to theurgy', Classical Quarterly 33: 212–24.

Simmons, M. B. (1995) Arnobius of Sicca. Oxford Early Christian Studies. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Simmons, M. B. (1997) 'The function of oracles in the pagan-Christian conflict during the age of Diocletian: The case of Arnobius and Porphyry', Studia Patristica 31(3): 49–56.

Simmons, M. B. (2006) 'The emperor Julian's order to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem: A connection with oracles?', Journal of Ancient Near Eastern Studies XLIII: 68–117.

Simmons, M. B. (2015) Universal Salvation in Late Antiquity. Porphyry of Tyre and the Pagan-Christian Debate. Oxford Studies in Late Antiquity. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Simmons, M. B. (forthcoming 2017a) 'Julian the Apostate (A.D. 331–26 June 363)', in Van Geest, P. and Peerbolte, B. J. L. (eds) Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Simmons, M. B. (forthcoming 2017b) 'Philosophical opposition to early Christianity', in Van Geest, P. and Peerbolte, B. J. L. (eds) Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Simmons, M. B. (forthcoming 2017c) 'Diocletian', in Van Geest, P. and Peerbolte, B. J. L. (eds) Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Simmons, M. B. (forthcoming 2017d) 'Porphyry of Tyre', in Van Geest, P. and Peerbolte, B. J. L. (eds) Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Smith, R. (1995) Julian's Gods. London: Routledge.

Tougher, S. (2007) Julian the Apostate. Edinburgh, UK: Edinburgh University Press.

Ugenti, V. (1992) 'Altri spunti di polemica anticristiana nel discorso Alla madre degli Dei di Giuliano Imperatore', Vigiliae Christianae 29: 391–404.

Ulansey, D. (1989) The Origins of the Mithraic Mysteries. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Vidal, G. (1964) Julian. London: Heinemann.

Vogt, J. (1963) 'Pagans and Christians in the family of Constantine the Great', in Momigliano, A. (ed.) The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 38–55.

Von Nesselrath, T. (2013) Kaiser Julian und die Repaganisierung des Reiches. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff.

Wallace-Hadrill, A. (1981) 'The emperor and his virtues', Historia 30: 298–323.

Woods, D. (1997) 'The emperor Julian and the passion of Sergius and Bacchus', Journal of Early Christian Studies 5(3): 335–67.

Woods, D. (2014) 'Julian, Arles, and the eagle', Journal of Late Antiquity 79(1): 49–64.

Wright, W. C. (1913–1923) The Works of the Emperor Julian. 3 vols. (repr.) Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Wright, W. C. (1922) Philostratus and Eunapius. London: Heinemann.

INDEX OF BIBLICAL REFERENCES

Old Testament

Genesis

1–2	1181
1–3	1128
1–4	859
1:14–15	52
1:26	856, 1141
1:27	536
2:7	859
2:21f.	799
2:24	376
3:21	303
4:4	303
6:4	859
8:4	303
9:27	80
17	199
17:23	199
18	200
24	739
25:23	766
26:15–33	660
32:33	304
49:10f.	654

Exodus

12	655
12:1–35:3	78
15	78
15:1–19	753, 754
15:3	80
15:7	79
16:9–10	688
20:4–5	84, 717
35:1	688

Leviticus

25:10	114

Numbers

21:17–18	753
24:17	76, 653

Deuteronomy

5:22	688
8:8	98
23:1–3	688
23:2	108
23:8	688
31:1–43	753
31:19	753
31:21	753
31:22	753
31:30	688, 753
32:1–43	754
32:20	200

Joshua

1:10–2:24	949
6:22–23	949

Judges

5:1	753
5:1–31	753
5:2–31	756
5:12	753

1 Samuel

6:7	766
16:16–23	746

INDEX OF CLASSICAL REFERENCES

INDEX OF JEWISH REFERENCES

INDEX OF PATRISTIC REFERENCES

Ambrosiaster

Anthony of the Desert

Aphrahat

Athenagoras

Augustine

Hilary of Arles

Hilary of Poitiers

Hippolytus

Horsiesius

Hymnscroll (Manichaean)

Ignatius of Antioch

SUBJECT INDEX